The first part of the document discusses the importance of maintaining accurate records of all transactions. It emphasizes that every entry should be supported by a valid receipt or invoice. This ensures transparency and allows for easy verification of the data.

In the second section, the author outlines the various methods used to collect and analyze the data. This includes both manual and automated processes. The goal is to ensure that the information is both reliable and up-to-date.

The third part of the document provides a detailed breakdown of the results. It shows that there has been a significant increase in certain areas, while other areas remain relatively stable. This analysis is crucial for understanding the overall performance and identifying areas for improvement.

Finally, the document concludes with a series of recommendations. These are based on the findings of the analysis and are designed to help the organization achieve its long-term goals. It is important to follow these guidelines to ensure continued success.

INTRODUCTION

The principles which guided the Commission in taking evidence, and a broad indication of the scope of the evidence received, are contained in paragraphs 5 to 13 of the Report. The places at which evidence was heard, and the parties into which the Commission was divided for the hearing of witnesses, are set out in Appendix I to that Report.

2. Wherever possible the Commission sat as one body. On those occasions a verbatim record of the evidence heard was normally taken, and such verbatim records are reproduced in full. Editing has been confined to the exclusion of repetitions, and to corrections made solely in the interests of clarity.

3. Outside the main centres, however, the Commission toured the Federation and took evidence in Parties. And even in the main centres the Commission had often to be divided, because of the large number of witnesses who wished to be heard. On some occasions the Parties were obliged to sub-divide into smaller groups. Whenever the Commission was divided in this way it was generally only possible to produce summaries of the evidence received. If complete verbatim records had been taken, the staff of the Commission would have had to be increased to an unmanageable size. It is recognised that the summarising of evidence has inevitably resulted in some compression, and sometimes possibly in over-simplification, of what witnesses actually said. But it is believed that no important arguments have been omitted, and it is hoped that witnesses will understand the need for their evidence to be recorded in this way.

4. In some areas, particularly in Nyasaland, witnesses were reluctant to appear before the Commission or would do so only on the understanding that their names would not be published. Wherever this happened, the witness in question is listed in the evidence under the name of the town or village in which his evidence was heard. In such cases a typical entry appears as—"A European resident of Kitwe" or "An African resident of Blantyre".

5. A small proportion of witnesses stipulated that their evidence should not be published at all, or that part of it should be withheld from publication. So far as is known, all such requests have been complied with. Wherever possible, witnesses who submitted written memoranda unsupported by oral evidence have been asked by letter whether they had any objection to their evidence being published. Witnesses who appeared before the Commission in person were asked the same question orally. We are glad to say that the great majority of witnesses raised no objection to the publication of their name and evidence in full.

6. The documents contained in these volumes have been so arranged that, where a witness gave oral evidence before the Commission, any written memorandum or associated documents submitted by him immediately precede the record of the interview. In some cases, witnesses read a written document aloud to the Commission; such documents are usually treated as oral evidence. The records of oral evidence and the written documents connected with them have been arranged as far as possible in chronological order.

7. The written evidence of those organisations or individuals who did not appear in person before the Commission has been included in separate sections for each Territory, and these documents have been placed in alphabetical order of their authors' names, or of their places of residence in the case of witnesses who wished to remain anonymous.

8. The date and place of any particular piece of oral evidence may be discovered by reference to the beginning of each section. In the case of written memoranda, the date and place of origin has usually been given at the end of each item. Where no date appears, it signifies that the evidence was either undated when received, or that it was submitted on the same day as the oral evidence given by the same witness. Broadly, written documents are reproduced in the same form in which they were received without alteration as to content or spelling. In a few cases, however, corrections have been made at the specific request of witnesses.

In giving their evidence the Chiefs were assisted by an interpreter, the Rev. Somkenci. The Chiefs began their evidence by reading a Memorandum to the Commission which was in the following terms:—

"We submit that the concept of Federation is a noble one, and many clear minded people, black and white in this country, still want Federation of The Rhodesias and Nyasaland to go forward.

Good Results

We have seen good results of Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland two big dams have been built namely: Kariba and Kyle, good public roads, big hospitals and clinics have been built and the University of Rhodesia and Nyasaland has been built for black and white people, also industries have been expanded since the birth of Federation.

Federation has failed on partnership because of bad Constitution and Franchise, the Constitution is so bad in such a way that it becomes very difficult for an African to go into Federal Parliament and yet it is easy for a European to go into Federal Parliament. An African has got to rely on a European so as to enter into Federal Parliament, and yet a European does not rely on an African. The African nationalist has gained more support from the masses of the African people because of the bad Constitution and franchise of our Federal Government.

The Federal vote is in fact almost exclusively white. The biggest stumbling block in the Federal progress is the franchise—the right to vote. The franchise is so unfair to the African that if it is not modified there can be no thought of the African any compromising on this point with the present franchise.

Every Federal candidate for Parliament has to rely entirely on the European vote.

Let us scrap out the present franchise Act of the Federation and replace it with the common voter's roll with the means of qualifications reduced for Africans to register as voters. This does not mean to say the African people should outnumber Europeans on the roll. All we want is that black and white must rely on each other for support.

High Officers in the Federal Government speak of Dominion Status for the Federal Government by 1960. This has frightened Africans more than anything, the African has seen what is happening in the Union of South Africa. The Parliament is for Europeans only now the same thing can happen here too.

At this stage, we do not find it necessarily good to have Dominion status. For instance there is no guarantee that the whites here will maintain supremacy for all time if the British Government pulls out from Federation, we may find even these four African Members of the Parliament removed from Federal Parliament.

Let us give Federation another trial under a new constitution based on what we have said before. That the franchise must be prepared by the British Government in co-operation with the peoples of this country. It can be a good thing for the British Government to look very closely into the things for which the Federal Government has been severely criticised.

The two races black and white must have proper understanding and proper partnership. There is more room for black and white if they can only understand each other in this part of the world.

Ways and means must be found to persuade the Southern Rhodesia Government to reconsider her Native Policy. With a view to changing it, such as Land Apportionment Act.

The best way of showing the Africans that the Governments concerned with Central Africa really want Africans to work hand in hand with Europeans and give the same rights and privileges to all peoples who are citizens of this country.

Voters must enjoy the same rights and privileges irrespective of race. We have a hope that our Senior British Government will solve our problems in Central Africa".

Asked if they had anything to add to the memorandum Chief Kayisa stated that if the Federation was to progress in the way they wished it would be advisable for African education to become a Federal function because the Territorial Government faced great difficulty in getting the necessary finance. Much of what the Africans had at the moment had been provided by themselves in that they had built schools and bought books notwithstanding the fact that school fees were paid by the parents. In addition the salaries of teachers were very low, and unfortunately their services were being lost as they tended to drift into industry.

Chief Mayinga added that the Africans had not so far seen a great deal that Federation had done for them, although they were quite satisfied that it was the best thing for everyone that it should go forward. He thought that the African might well fall between the two stools of the Federal and Territorial Governments, and this was why it was necessary to get certain functions such as education taken over in toto by one or the other Government.

Chief Mzimuni said that there were no Africans in the Territorial House of Assembly, and in the result, although African matters were a Territorial affair there was no one there to look after the African interests properly. The Europeans in the House did not know the needs of the indigenous people as well as they should.

Chief Banko commented that the black population in the country surpassed the white by millions, and it was essential for something to be done to increase the land available to Africans. Through Federation friendship between the races should flow and the people of the two main races should do everything they could to work hand in hand. He thought that it would be better if the Federation took over all the functions. As it was operating through two Governments there seemed often to be a tendency to "pass the buck" from the Territorial Government to the Federal one and vice versa.

Chief Mabigwa suggested that when Federation was brought into operation it was rather like a cow feeding two calves, the Territorial calf and the Federal calf. He felt that the position had been reached now that there was only one calf sucking and this was not the Territorial calf. African agriculture which was Territorial was not progressing as much as it should for want of funds. Added to this was the question of the poor soils in the African areas and the circumstance that the Africans had been confined to forest areas which were fit only for wild animals, and where cattle simply could not do well. The people also suffered from being great distances from the centre of affairs. Although he supported the concept of Federation he thought that as it was operating at the moment it was rather one-sided. Virtually all the benefits were going to the European. After all, what kept a person alive but a full stomach? This could not be achieved from areas of poor soil and areas which would not carry sufficient livestock. When Federation came he thought that such difficulties would have been adjusted and anomalies removed. An instance of these was that frequently, although there was only the division of a fence, Africans were not allowed to send their cattle to graze on unoccupied European land next door. He repeated that the Southern Rhodesia calf had gone very hungry. The Africans had thought that with the coming of Federation large unoccupied tracts of land could be made available for grazing purposes. In this year of drought very limited numbers of cattle were grazing on the otherwise unoccupied land whereas next door hundreds were dying.

There was a general complaint from the Chiefs that Africans were not allowed to buy European land, and they felt that in fact partnership was not being practised. Happiness was something that should be bestowed on everyone and not only on the European. Likewise when the laws of the country were being made they felt that the true representatives of the people should be there and the Territorial Parliament should be made up after the fashion of the Monckton Commission on which they were very happy to see a number of African Commissioners. The voting strength of the population should be roughly 50/50 as between the European and African while two African representatives in the Federal House was anything but sufficient. It was unfortunate that Federation had not served to bring about a consolidation of friendship between the races; rather, enemies in the shape of nationalist Africans had been made. The European was not practising partnership as he should, and the Chiefs thought that with the African having virtually no voice in the scheme of things fewer Africans were now supporting Federation. In their view there was no reason at all for the European to be afraid of the situation.

The Chiefs thought that the Land Apportionment Act had halted African progress, and this had certainly had a bearing on the franchise. With the high franchise qualifications applying very few Africans could get the vote, and in the result any Africans that were in the Federal House, or any that might go into the Territorial House would be elected on the vote of the European and not of the African. They thought that the Africans who were supposed to represent African interests identified themselves rather more closely with European than with African interests, because those Africans who were in the Federal House had not been voted into it by their own people. Had it been otherwise they would owe a greater responsibility to the African part of the electorate.

In regard to qualifications the Chiefs thought that the majority of intelligent people should come on to a common roll provided they were able to fill in the application form and had passed Standard V or VI. As far as African women were concerned they should only be allowed on to the roll if they had the necessary qualifications in their own right. The Land Apportionment Act had had the effect of limiting Africans from qualifying for the vote, and, after all, the wealth of the majority of rural Africans lay in cattle. They considered that given a reasonable franchise the African voter would cast his vote for the best man whether he be white or black and not on a racial basis. They were not so much concerned about qualifications provided the electorate was, as they had suggested earlier, based on approximate equality of numbers on the roll. The important thing was that candidates, and elected members more particularly, should be dependent on voters from both the main sections of the community. They felt that the candidates themselves should have completed satisfactorily their secondary education, and at the same time, regard should be had to their good character. The witnesses were prepared to see an income qualification introduced, but merely as an alternative to an academic qualification.

In answering questions, the Chiefs added some new points and reiterated others. They stressed that they wanted to be able to buy land in the European area, and therefore with limitations they thought that the European should equally be able to buy land in the African areas. They certainly did not intend that the Land Apportionment Act should be scrapped altogether because even now they found that certain European areas themselves, for example, Queen's Park, were too full. It was rather to amendments of the Act in respect of the rural areas that they were looking, and there they saw no reason why a European should not purchase a farm in the Native Purchase Area or an African in the European area. It was true that not many Africans had the resources to effect such a purchase but they wanted them to have the opportunity to be able to acquire such land. Virtually no Africans had farms which were worthy of the name and most of them had only small holdings. Necessarily such a transaction would only apply if the African had the means and the European was willing to sell. There was no point at all in these transactions being extended to the Native Reserves which were already overcrowded. They were thinking more of the large tracts of land owned but not occupied by Europeans and big land holding companies. Some of these farms indeed had been unoccupied for years.

They wanted education to become a Federal function because they had seen so much being done for European education by the Federal Government, while comparatively little had been done in the rural areas for native education by the Territorial Government. Most of the latter action had been confined to the urban centres. The Federal Government was in a much better position to provide the necessary finance. Altogether it was a bigger body, and if a unitary form of government could be developed here the cost of administration or overheads must be lowered. As they put it "the work of one man cannot be compared to the work of three men when put together".

In reply to a question Chief Banko said that they would like to be given more powers, for their authority had been taken over by the Native Agriculture Department. This Department now allocated people to new sites without reference to the Chiefs; the Chiefs now only tried civil cases; they had lost the arbitration powers they once had, and no longer had any power to deal with criminal cases.

A Government demonstrator stationed in an area was given land, and yet local people were not given land. There was no reason why the demonstrator should not do his demonstration work on the lands of the people whom he was teaching. Chief Mzimuni did not share this opinion and considered that the people should profit from the example of the work on the demonstrator's holding.

In the Land Husbandry Act mention was made of the Native Commissioner, the Land Development Officer and the Agricultural Demonstrator; but the Chief was not mentioned anywhere. In the Native Councils Act the people who had the most power were the Councillors, not the Chiefs.

Formerly Chiefs issued certificates for marriage and would also adjudicate in a domestic quarrel between a man and his wife. They were small things, but the Chiefs should be able to do them.

The Government paid the Chiefs from £10 upwards, but they were still unable to become registered voters. If the Chiefs could not vote for parliamentary candidates, where was their authority?

The Chiefs were not particularly concerned about the pass laws, but they were worried by the fact that urbanised Africans were regarded as aliens because when they left town to go to the reserve they had to have a special pass. Again, a person who was employed could not live in his place of employment without special written permission. The Chiefs had no objection to registration or identification certificates. An African could be stopped anywhere by a policeman and asked for his pass.

The Chiefs said they wanted Federation to stay; they did not want to be mixed up with the Union of South Africa and the discriminatory laws which existed there.

8TH APRIL 1960

Oral Evidence

CHIEF MDADAKAYAMA MPINI of the Nata Reserve

Nata Reserve is one of the largest Reserves in Southern Rhodesia—about 10,000 people.

The Chief wished to say how the Africans lived in the Reserves. They were too crowded, and yet there were Crown Lands round about them. Government claimed the Crown Lands, forgetting that the people were too crowded in the Reserves. They wanted Government to increase the land for them, since their stock had no place to graze.

In reply to questions the Chief made the following further points:—

(1) He could not tell if there had been any change since Federation. His people had little knowledge about Federation. They had thought that it would mean that white and black would mix together, but that had not happened. He had never seen a white man give an African "some water to drink" (meaning special friendly assistance).

(2) He would like to participate in elections, and felt that he could do so with the advice of his people.

(3) He himself did not fully understand about Federation, and it had never been explained to his people.

(4) There were no members of the African Congress in the Nata Reserve; there was one in the neighbouring Crown Land.

C. MALIKONGWA

The witness was Secretary of the District Council, but he said that he was speaking in his personal capacity.

He considered that since the creation of the Federal Government the borrowing powers of the three Governments had obviously been increased. He favoured Federation also because industries had been set up in the Federation which had employed African labour.

Under the operation of the Land Husbandry Act in Southern Rhodesia, Africans were to be removed from their lands. But more industries and commerce would assimilate them and give employment. This was another reason why he favoured Federation.

The Federation should continue, although at the next Constitutional Review he would like some changes to be made. The reservations in the Southern Rhodesian Constitution should be upheld however, particularly the reserved powers for the United Kingdom. His reason was that, while there was a very liberal government in power now, in time a reactionary party might come into power, which might legislate to the detriment of the Africans without the possibility of appeal. For these reasons he thought that the reservations in the Constitution should remain for all time.

On the franchise there were at present the A and B rolls (Federal). He thought there should be only one common roll. The A roll was predominantly European, and the B roll predominantly African. This was not consonant with the conception of partnership. The qualifications for the franchise should be made more suitable for the Africans, and the division between the A and B rolls should be abolished. The qualification should be education based on Standard VI: this was because the franchise should only be given to reasonable people. It would be wrong to give a child a sharp knife. The income level for the franchise should be about £500 per annum, or alternatively the possession of property valued at £500.

In speaking of education, he opposed the administrative division between the Federal and Territorial Governments. There should be one form of education only for all races. Adult Africans and Europeans met at the university level. There should be one system for all, and it should be Federal. At present the African education system suffered from lack of funds. He did not favour multi-racial education, but there should be the same standards for all.

There should be more Cabinet posts in the Federal Government so that there would be in fact posts for Africans, but posts given on merit and not on colour.

In reply to questions, Mr. Malikongwa made the following additional points:—

(1) He favoured the Land Husbandry Act, although the Africans were losing their land in consequence of it. But he did not approve when Africans were allotted worse land than Europeans. He agreed with the process by which land was going into the hands of fewer Africans.

(2) On the Franchise he would not like people who were rich, such as farmers, but were not Standard VI, to have the vote. He realised that many Chiefs and traders did not achieve Standard VI. On the question whether such people should have the vote, it depended on the degree of their responsibility.

Even some Chiefs, although well off, did not really know how to exercise the vote.

(3) He was expressing his own views, and did not know whether they were those of other Africans since he did not discuss them with other Africans. He did not belong to any political party.

(4) He was puzzled to see how, on his recommendations four Africans in the Federal Assembly could be elected on the common roll without in fact being elected by a majority of Europeans. But he viewed this in the light of the fact that in the long-distant future Africans were bound to dominate the roll.

J. MASOLA

The witness was a business man and a general dealer of Plumtree.

He had a few comments to make on what changes might help Federation to continue. He thought Federation advantageous since small countries such as Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland could not stand by themselves, while if combined they would form a strong country. Under the Federation they had got clinics in the Reserves, and High Schools had been built in the towns. But the Government had forgotten to build schools in the Reserves. For that reason people in the Reserves did not feel the presence of the Federation.

There should be only one Government and it should be the Federal Government. He would do away with the Territorial Governments, they only caused confusion to people. He wanted union between all the Territories and a single Government. Then the Federal Government would be able to take an interest in the Africans and forget about colour. While the colour bar continued there could be no peace and good understanding in the country, and the division of tribal groups would flourish.

In the Reserves they had found that people only got a small amount of land. There were Crown Lands available suitable for Africans for settlements. This would help to break up the undue compactness in the Reserves.

If the Federal Government had thought earlier about doing away with the colour bar, there would be no trouble. Jobs could be given to people, without regard to colour.

In reply to questions Mr. Masola made the following further points:—

(1) On the colour bar, when Africans had developed to the standards of the whites, they should be accepted, and not set apart, as they were in hotels and cinemas. Civilised and good mannered Africans should be able to mix with Europeans. It was possible for a man to be uneducated, yet "civilised".

(2) He had been to Northern Rhodesia, and had found that people there wanted to keep their tribal laws and stay under their Chiefs.

(3) If hotels were freed from the colour bar, he did not believe that large numbers of Africans would want to crowd into them.

(4) He did not see great harm in the Land Apportionment Act itself, but he objected to Africans being given land which was too poor. He was not in favour of whites and blacks being on the same land.

BULAWAYO

9TH APRIL 1960

Memorandum

UNITED FEDERAL PARTY, WESTERN COMMONAGE AFRICAN BRANCH

B. Matawele—Chairman

Federation Principle.—Federation as an idea has been recognised for centuries as an essential feature of economics, political and social development of any country. The United Kingdom, the United States of America, Australia, Russia, and Canada are old examples. Recently there have been more Federations and Unions. In the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland these effects of combining the resources of the three territories of the Federation have been remarkable in the first six years.

Changes which the Federation brought about:—

ment, more job opportunities in Government and private enterprises, African participation in State Lotteries, non-racial University College, non-racial franchise system, long leases for Africans in urban areas, now also freehold tenure in some areas, and a greatly increased acceleration of economics and social development in both urban and rural areas, are all changes which Federation brought to at least Southern Rhodesia. There has also been a definite change in the attitude of both Europeans and Africans towards one another.

Improvements which could enhance Federation.—The continuation of working together by both races until a mutual understanding is brought about. Africans be given opportunities to learn jobs, etc., so that his product can be increased and thus improve his standard of living. Closer voluntary association between Europeans and Africans. Unnecessary racial discrimination and segregation in public places such as hotels, churches, cinemas and restaurants and other public places be abolished.

All the education in Southern Rhodesia be under the control of the Federal Government, and compulsion of all children's school attendance be introduced. Greater financial and other assistance ought to be given to Africans in order to bring them to European standards of education, training, and living. The African wage structure should be more realistic and just, and bear better relation with the Europeans.

Bulawayo

Oral Evidence

UNITED FEDERAL PARTY, WESTERN COMMONAGE AFRICAN BRANCH

Representatives : B. Matawele—Chairman
T. Chigumira—Vice-Chairman
E. Mboba—Committee Member

The witnesses who, had submitted a memorandum, stated that they had 25 members in their Branch, all in one part of Bulawayo. Mr. Matawele stated that he was a caterer in the township, Mr. Chigumira that he was a general dealer and Mr. Mboba that he ran a dry canteen (small groceries and minerals).

The witnesses did not wish to elaborate their memorandum; but in answer to questions they made the following points:—

(1) Racial discrimination in the Federation was diminishing very, very slowly. They were not satisfied, but matters were improving at any rate in some centres. For instance at some railway stations there was an improvement, though at others there was not. At present they saw mutual fears: the Europeans thought the Africans inferior and Africans thought the Europeans superior. But in some places the two were beginning to have a better relationship, and this improvement had taken place since Federation. Some courtesy was now being extended to Africans, at any rate in some places, where Europeans and Africans could meet one another socially. It was important that in the Federal Constitution there were African Members of Parliament to represent their views; but they would like the number of African representatives to increase. At present the views of Africans from only a very few centres were represented in Parliament.

(2) In the Southern Rhodesian Parliament there were no African representatives. The European representatives did not fully understand the needs and concerns of the Africans.

(3) As to the franchise, they were looking to the Government to relax the laws so that more Africans could become voters. On the voting side representation of Africans was very low. They would like the qualifications for voting to be lowered. Those who understood about voting, did not fail to register themselves as voters. It was only the uneducated who failed to register themselves. Very few accepted the Congress view point which was adverse to registration at all.

(4) At present there were too few opportunities open to Africans. If more education could be given to Africans, it would give them a chance to take over more jobs.

(5) The witness knew a number of African carpenters, plumbers and other tradesmen who could not at present get apprenticeships. They would take such apprenticeships if available, and would stick to them. Certain categories of work were forbidden to Africans even in the locations. In the locations Africans should have more opportunities for jobs such as superintendents, since African superintendents would understand the needs of Africans. Such opportunities were now being given to Africans in the Post Offices. Africans could work as bricklayers in the Municipality of Bulawayo [not in Salisbury] but there were complaints from the European bricklayers about this.

(6) On wages, Africans were now looking forward to better living and accommodation. Present wages were not enough. If wages were improved it would help the Africans. There was a basic wage, fixed by the Government, 30s. a week for unskilled labour. Poverty was a problem for Africans, coupled with the lack of knowledge of family planning, so that many had 6 or 8 children whom they had to educate and feed.

(7) As to developments in the rural areas, they knew of a few places where Africans had the chance of owning their own land. This was the responsibility of the Territorial Government.

(8) In education, European education was far more advanced. African education was Territorial. They would like equality of treatment, and African education to be Federal, on the same basis as European. All their friends felt the same way. They would also like agriculture to be Federal. They felt that the Territorial Government had been leaving the African behind.

(9) Questioned as to whether they preferred the Federal or the Territorial Government, they said that they would prefer the Federal, for at any rate one reason, because under that Government they had Africans representing Africans, whereas in the Southern Rhodesian Government they had only Europeans representing Africans.

(10) As for the Territorial franchise, qualifications for the vote should be lowered, so as to get more Africans on to the roll. The Africans were only just now beginning to understand politics, and to know how the Europeans lived.

(11) On racial discrimination, it was not so much the business of the Government to remove it; but it was up to the public to do so. Europeans, Asians and Africans alike must continue to work to remove it. The Government should legislate, however, about discrimination in hotels, restaurants, cafes, cinemas, public conveniences and buses, and possibly also libraries. Conditions in these were not yet satisfactory, and should be dealt with by Government through legislation. The poverty of Africans would prevent them from abusing any facilities thus given.

(12) The witnesses stated that they read books, but not for pleasure. There was a library in their location and also an African bookshop.

(13) Questioned on the Land Apportionment Act, they said that they wanted the same privileges as Europeans had in respect of the purchase of land. At present they paid rents all their lives. They would like to be able to buy freeholds. It would also be proper for the Government to set aside an urban area as a place for all races to buy their houses and shops, altogether. They had no idea as to whether or not a standard should be applied.

(14) Questioned as to the reason why Africans did not register as voters—in the past Africans had had no votes, and had thought of votes as something to do with Europeans. Only recently had they come to understand how voting worked. Many could not write, so for them and others with little education the qualifications were too high. It was only now that the Africans were beginning to understand what was happening. Some thought it was useless to exercise the vote, since the Members of Parliament who were elected would only go their own way. In most cases the Territorial qualifications were too high. If a man qualified by income then he was not sufficiently educated or else it was the other way around. Mr. Matawele and Mr. Mboba were both registered voters, but only on the lower roll. They thought the qualifications should be lowered. Perhaps it could be sufficient if a man could read or write in English. But a voter ought to know what he was doing.

Memorandum

SOUTHERN RHODESIA ASIAN ORGANISATION

N. V. Desa—Chairman

P. R. Vaghmaria—Hon. Secretary

As the representative body of the Asian Community of Southern Rhodesia, we submit for your consideration and report, this Memorandum, embodying the disabilities—legal, social and otherwise—adversely affecting the Asian Community living in Southern Rhodesia.

We appreciate the appointment of the Monckton Commission to inquire into, and report upon, the working of the Constitution of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, and wish to place before you the disabilities faced by the Asian Community. We wish to make it clear that we do not ask for any special or exclusive privileges, but wish it to be known that the fundamental rights should be enjoyed and extended to all the inhabitants of the Federation, and we hope the Commission will urge the Federal Government to implement a non-racial policy, and recommend that the Federal Constitution be in consonance with that Policy.

We now enumerate the following for your information:—

(1) Minority :

The Asian Community is in the minority, forming .2% of the total population of Southern Rhodesia and about the same of the total population of the Federation. Asians here have their roots deeply embedded in this country and are Southern Rhodesian Citizens. About 85% are Southern Rhodesians by birth, and know India only in its geographical sense. They owe their loyalty and allegiance to this country. Their contribution to the development of Southern Rhodesia could have been much more, had they been given equality of opportunity in this country.

In spite of their undivided loyalty, Asians are discriminated against by the Government and Local Authorities in the political, economic and social spheres, publicly as well as privately. Our main complaint against the Government and Local Authorities is the practice of racial discrimination based on colour which is the basis of our difficulties. "Partnership" has an empty meaning so long as the Administering Authorities fail to completely eradicate all traces of colour-bar, and practices determined by racial discrimination. It is our view that the Government of the country must itself have a positive policy, and give the lead. It should not remain unconcerned at racially discriminatory practices that lead to racial prejudice and hatred. The Government could, if it is determined to remove racial discrimination, do so by passing legislation and making it an offence for hotels, restaurants, cinemas or shops and public places to operate a colour-bar. It could also set an example by announcing that it will not itself countenance or practise racial discrimination or aid or abet such practice in any form or guise. If this was done it would tremendously strengthen racial harmony and trust in the Government.

(2) Citizenship and Immigration :

(a) Our great difficulty is in regard to immigration. We have neither asked nor advocated for free and unrestricted immigration from any country, but we have always urged for selective immigration. Since the promulgation of the Federal Immigration Act in November, 1954, no Asian is permitted to settle in the Federation, except the wives and children of domiciled residents. Yet all other sections are allowed free entry, and it has been our bewilderment to see that enemy aliens are allowed in the Federation on a quota basis, whereas Asians who are British Subjects are excluded.

The Immigration Act does not explicitly state that Asians would not be allowed into the Federation, but Part I Section 5(1)(a) of the Act gives powers to the Minister to prohibit Asians as a race on economic grounds or on account of standard or habits of life to be undesirable immigrants or to be unsuited to the requirements of the Federation. There is no appeal against refusal in terms of this Section, which is specifically and invariably used to exclude Asians. At present only wives, and children under eighteen, of domiciled Asian residents are allowed.

Aged dependants (Father or Mother) of domiciled Asian residents are allowed for settlement in the Federation only after exhaustive inquiry and on guarantee that they will not be a burden to the state and that they have absolutely no one in the home country to care for them. These impositions are for Asians only.

In spite of assurances by the Minister in the Federal Parliament that Asian teachers and preachers would be allowed, such persons who are needed in Government Schools, and also for religious and cultural education in private institutions, very few Asian teachers and preachers from outside the Federation are allowed. The very few who may be allowed are permitted conditionally, whereas no restriction is placed for recruitment of teachers or preachers for other sections. Asian teachers and preachers, where permitted, can not come with their families. They have to come alone, serve for a continuous period of four years and then only are they regraded as domiciled and permitted to call their families to join them. These stringent restrictions are not applied in case of teachers and preachers for other sections of the population. Large numbers of European teachers are recruited from overseas in spite of the large European population in the country, and the Asian Community of Southern Rhodesia, and the Federation, should have the same right in this matter.

Asian visitors coming to Southern Rhodesia, and to the Federation, are made to sign a Prohibited Immigrant Declaration. It is understood that visitors do not come to settle, and are allowed in on temporary visiting permits. So why should there be this humiliating formality for Asians?

A domiciled Asian resident, wanting to have temporary replacement in his place during his absence from the country, has much difficulty with the Immigration Department. If the temporary replacement asked for is a male, then his family will not be allowed to accompany him. If the temporary replacement asked for happens to be a female, permission is usually refused; and if permission is given, she has to submit to a medical examination first on entry, and thereafter every two or three months to satisfy the Immigration Authorities that she is not pregnant. This practice is not only humiliating but inhuman.

The Immigration Department can demand high deposits from Asians on temporary visiting permits, in addition to making them sign the Prohibited Immigrant Declaration. This is done in spite of them being in possession of return tickets, and the guarantee stood by local Asian residents.

(b) Asian women born in this country but married to persons outside the Federation, cannot come to settle permanently in the country of their birth with their husbands. We feel that this is a grave injustice to persons born in the country, and irrespective of their financial interest in the country they should be allowed to settle here.

(c) Some of these difficulties may seem to be apparent to Europeans as well, but they can overcome them because of free European immigration.

(d) Children of parents domiciled in the Federation must return to the country before attaining the age of eighteen in order to acquire domiciliary rights and citizenship. A child under eighteen, whose parents are deceased but who were domiciled here before, cannot enter the Federation. This, to the best of our knowledge, is not applicable to Europeans here and therefore is unjust.

(e) An Asian child — (born outside the Federation, say in India, and whose parents are or were domiciled inhabitants of the Federation, and the child also is a domiciled resident of the Federation) wishing to study, or studying, overseas in India has to break his schooling and undergo much expense to come every time to the Federation to renew his/her domiciliary rights every two or three years. This is an unnecessary hardship and formality imposed upon Asians. We suggest that a certificate from the head or principal of the institution concerned should be accepted as sufficient evidence that the child or youth concerned is still schooling, and therefore exchange of correspondence should be enough to renew the domiciliary rights of citizenship until the person concerned completes his/her education.

(f) If an Asian marries outside the Federation, for example in India, there is much formality that he has to comply with before his wife is admitted into the Federation. Whereas a Marriage Certificate suffices in the case of the European, much detail and enquiries are asked for, with the result that there is long delay before the Asian can bring his wife here. It is suggested that a Marriage Certificate and a photograph of the bride concerned, certified by a Magistrate in India, should be accepted as sufficient proof for admission into the Federation.

Recruitment of Trained Teachers :

It is a fact that some of the present staff serving Asian schools are not fully qualified. We would suggest recruitment of qualified teachers from elsewhere. It has also been our experience that when the Government Education Department appoints an Asian teacher, the Government Immigration Department does not permit him entry into the colony.

(3) Education :

(i) Teachers Pay

Asian teachers do not receive the same pay as European teachers, although a small proportion have been given promotion to Branch I. This inequality of pay should be removed.

(ii) It is heartening to know that admission is now given to Asian and Coloured students in the Technical schools that exist in Bulawayo and Salisbury, and that Asian and Coloured teacher trainees will receive the same training along with the European teacher trainees at the proposed teacher training college which will be built in Bulawayo in a few years' time. However, it is felt that there should be more High Schools as those that exist at Bulawayo and Salisbury are already overcrowded. There should be High Schools at Umtali and Gwelo too, and equipment and facilities should be on par with those existing at European schools.

(4) Hospitalisation :

It has apparently become a settled policy of the Authorities in the colony to discriminate against Asians on the question of Hospital Services, and that this is very evident in all the centres in the Colony needs no emphasis. The Asian and Coloured Hospitals are far from satisfactory in situation, equipment and furniture. The medical personnel is limited and consequently the services on the whole are inadequate, inferior and neglected. This is further aggravated by the sad neglect of maternity cases, for they are all accommodated in the same wards as for other patients, as private wards and maternity wards are not available in most centres. T.B. patients, instead of being isolated, occupy the front verandah of the hospital in Bulawayo in all kinds of weather. We also understand that the Princess Margaret Hospital has turned down a number of applicants desirous of taking the Nursing Profession. At present the hospital is staffed by "VAD" personnel whose conditions of employment and remuneration are not at all encouraging. Moreover, there are no recreational facilities for the nurses working at the Bulawayo Memorial Hospital, and this is true of other centres as well.

Nervous Disorders Hospital :

Asians and Coloureds are only treated as out-patients, and are not admitted as patients.

Ingutsheni Mental Hospital :

At this hospital Coloureds and Asian patients are not graded according to their degree of mental derangement. The Government had promised to establish a block three years ago, so as to ease the position but so far nothing has materialised, the position is deteriorating. The Hospital Advisory Boards should have on it Asian and Coloured members. Generally in all the centres the Ambulance facilities provided are based on discriminatory basis. This practice should be stopped, and the first free ambulance should be made available for casualties and patients.

(5) Military Training :

Asians have to undergo compulsory military training in the same way as other sections of the population. However, their training is restricted to the Transport Corps, and they are not allowed nor given training in other branches of defence such as the Air Force, Engineering Corps, Combat Force, etc. Not only that, but their pay and other conditions are far below that of the Europeans and they cannot rise above the rank of N.C.O. Sergeant.

Asians have to perform all the duties of a citizen, but they are denied the rights and equal opportunities, and are grossly discriminated against. Where there is conscription we consider it wrong for the Government to discriminate racially in training, and in conditions of pay etc. Asian personnel must be afforded the opportunity of being trained as Commissioned officers on the same lines as the Europeans.

(6) Police Force :

At the present moment the Police Force is confined only to Europeans and Africans. Advertisements appearing in the press specifically ask applicants of pure European descent only to apply. The Police Force must be open to suitable young members of the Asian Community.

(7) Civil Service :

(a) Apart from the teaching field, and perhaps a few other jobs, Asians do not occupy positions of respect and trust in the Civil Service. Asians performing duties as Matrons, Secretaries and Caretakers have few chances of being placed in a branch where their pay would be satisfactory. For such persons there is no incentive, nor opening.

(b) Asians are not promoted on the same basis as Europeans to Branch I. Any European is promoted to Branch I automatically whereas an Asian has to depend on the success of an interview with the Commission.

(c) Asian Civil Servants render the same service under the same Administrative Authority and yet are subject to discrimination in salary and other benefits connected with the service, which can not bear any justification for its imposition.

(8) Discriminatory Practices :

(a) Firearms

Any European has the right to purchase and own firearms of any description without restrictions for purposes of recreation and protection. On the contrary, Asians are prohibited from possessing firearms except under very special circumstances. It is difficult to understand why there should be any discrimination in the issue of firearms. Asians should be given the right of owning and possessing firearms for pleasure or protection on the same basis as the Europeans.

(b) Liquor

Whilst we appreciate the relaxation of restrictions as far as the Liquor Laws are concerned, we wish to deplore the fact that Hotels continue to operate the colour-bar. A few hotels provide separate drinking facilities for Asians and Coloureds. This is wrong, and perpetuates racial discrimination instead of lessening it.

(c) Land Apportionment Act :

(i) In the allocation of Municipal land for public purchase, Asians are debarred from the ballot. Practically all the choice areas are closed to them because of the inclusion of restrictive clauses in the title deeds of the properties. If we are considered, as we are led to believe under the Land Apportionment Act to be equal to Europeans with regard to ownership and acquisition of land, we fail to see why there should be areas set aside for occupation of any particular group by enactment or by any other measure. The question of residence and occupation should be a purely personal matter and areas of occupation trade and residence must be purely voluntary and without sanction by any statutory enactment.

(ii) Closed Mining Areas debar Asians, simply on grounds of colour, from establishing business concerns.

(iii) The purpose of the restrictive clause in the title deeds of properties is to debar Asians from owning and occupying land or property in the per-urban and residential areas. This sort of racial discrimination is being practised by many Europeans who introduce anti-Asian clauses into the deeds of the properties, making it virtually impracticable for Asians to purchase or occupy these properties. This is done with the approval of the Government.

An example of the type of restrictive clause inserted in title deed of stands on the establishment of township is usually gazetted after approval by the Government Minister in the following manner:—

Southern Rhodesia Government Notice No. 580 of 1959 ACT 19/45, ACT 54/54, ACT 16/56, ACT 17/57, ACT 7/58, ACT 56/59.

Establishment of Township: Christon Bank Township 6

It is hereby notified that in terms of Subsection (7) of Section 54 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1945 as amended, that the Minister of Local Government has approved the establishment of the township Christon Bank Township 6 of Subdivision A of Christon Bank, held under Certificate of Township Title No. 6260/59, situate in the District of Salisbury, upon the following conditions:—

In these conditions any reference to:—

(i) "the Act" means the Town and Country Planning Act 1945 as amended;

"Neither the said stand nor any portion thereof shall be transferred, alienated, let, or in any other manner assigned or disposed of to any person not being a person wholly of European descent, or to any Company wherein the controlling interest is held by persons not wholly of European descent nor shall such a person be allowed to occupy or reside on the said stand or any portion thereof, save in the course of his or her bona fide employment as a servant of the owner or occupier thereof performing whole time duties upon or about the said stand".

(d) Admission to Hotels, Restaurants and Cinemas :

Hotels, Restaurants, and most Cinemas too, are the exclusive preserve of the Europeans in this country, and the right of admission is reserved by the concerns invariably to exclude Asians while there is no statutory authority to empower the management of these concerns to impose such restrictions. Nothing less than racial prejudice in this connection has been the cause of much inconvenience and displeasure to well meaning and responsible Asian travellers, tourists, and respectable residents. Many examples can be given of Indian business men and tourists who were told NO by hotel management because of their colour and race.

(e) Right of Admission Reserved :

Unfortunately this right is misused in this country. Under this notice the management disallows Asians on grounds of colour, whereas the notice is meant to prohibit entry of improperly dressed, drunken, or disorderly persons, not people who are reasonably attired and well behaved.

(f) Buses :

In the Omnibus Transport Service, which is a monopoly in certain centres, available for passengers to and from per-urban and suburban centres on various routes, the Non-European seating accommodation, is a specially limited, reserved rear portion of the buses. We submit that there should be different classes of seating according to fares payable.

(g) Municipal Swimming Baths :

Swimming bath is provided in every civic centre of the country. As these are built by the respective Municipalities it is only natural to expect that they are provided from Ratepayers' funds. However, Asians are prohibited from these baths on racial grounds, regardless of their legitimate claims as ratepayers. Here again the Government has given powers to the Municipalities and Town Management Boards to exclude non-whites.

(h) City Hall :

The Bulawayo City Council hires the City Hall to Asians and Coloureds but the discriminatory policy of the Council still remains steadfast. One of the conditions of the hire of the Hall by Europeans is that the seating accommodation for Asians and Coloureds is limited to not more than four rows at the back of the Hall, and the Council reserves the right to withdraw or amend this facility at any time without assigning any reason. The position is anomalous because at Political Meetings and Exhibitions Asians are permitted to sit wherever they wish to. In view of this restrictive regulation, European organisers are compelled to hold shows exclusively for Europeans.

(i) Sports Grounds :

At recreation grounds, leased by the Municipalities to European clubs, there is discrimination in the allocation of seats and at entrances, when Asian spectators attend during national and local sports meetings. They may enter the grounds only through a special separate gate, and may be seated only in a special area reserved for them and the Coloureds, and may not sit in juxtaposition with the European spectators.

(j) Public Conveniences: Baths and Lavatories :

The few public conveniences that are scattered in the Municipal centres are exclusively for Europeans. No provision is made for Asians and Coloureds in this matter.

(k) Public Library :

Asians in Bulawayo are not accepted as subscribing members of the Bulawayo Public Library, although they are allowed the use of the Reading Room.

(l) Angling :

The Angling Societies of the country exclude Asians from membership.

(m) Automobile Association :

The A.A. accepts Asians for membership on restrictive basis. Asians are not provided the same facilities such as hotel accommodation etc. which are provided to European members.

(n) Railways :

The Railway Booking Office always demands the identity of Asian callers on the 'phone. No matter how early the booking is made, Asians are invariably placed next to the engine. Even Asians travelling First Class are placed next to the engine. Apart from this, husband and wives are also separated. Owing to limited Second Class seats a lot of inconvenience of this nature has to be faced.

(o) Travel to the Union :

Asians are not granted permission by the Union of South Africa for visit to that country. Numerous applications, some on compassionate grounds, have also been turned down. It appears that the Federal Government is prepared to face the affronts made on Asians who are citizens of the Federation. Representations should be made by the Federal Government to the Union Government authorities to see that Asians are treated on par with other citizens. (This treatment is only meted out to Asians.)

(9) Fundamental Rights :

The racial discrimination, disabilities and indignities suffered by the Asians as stated in this memorandum come in the way of the Federation's growth, and development of common loyalty to the concept of the Federation based on the philosophy of partnership. These racial discrimination and disabilities corrode from within the soul of the Federation based on partnership. Thus the only way to prevent this weakening of the concept of the Federation based on partnership is to enshrine, in any future revision of the Constitution, provisions which make it impossible for anybody to practise racial discrimination. This can be done by incorporating the Fundamental Rights of the citizen in the revised Constitution of the Federation and providing therein that every citizen will have the right through due process of law, that the rights are not violated, and that any legislation—Territorial or Federal—in violation of these Fundamental Rights will be ultra vires the Constitution. These Fundamental Rights of the citizens of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland should be:—

The Federal Government shall not make any law which takes away or abridges the Fundamental Rights and any law made in contravention of the fundamental rights, should to the extent of the contravention, be void.

"Law" should mean to include any Ordinance, order, bye-law, rule, regulation, notification, custom or usage having the force of law.

(1) Right to Equality :

(a) The Federal Government shall not deny to any person equality before the law or the equal protection of the laws within the Federation.

(b) The Government shall not discriminate against any citizen on grounds only of religion, race, colour, sex, place of birth or any of them.

(c) No citizen shall on grounds of religion, race, colour, sex, place of birth or any of them be subject to any disability, liability, restriction or condition with regard to:—

(i) access to shop, public restaurants, hotels and places of public entertainment; or

(ii) the use of public conveniences, baths, roads and places of public resort maintained or subsidised wholly or partly out of Government or local Authorities funds, or dedicated to the use of the general public.

(d) There shall be equality of opportunity for all citizens in matters relating to employment or appointment to any office under the Government.

(e) No citizen shall, on grounds only of religion, race, colour, sex, descent, place of birth, residence or any of them, be ineligible for or discriminated against in respect of any employment or office under the Government.

(2) Right to Freedom :

(a) All citizens shall have the right to:—

(i) freedom of speech and expression,

(ii) assemble peacefully and without arms,

(iii) form associations or unions,

(iv) move freely through the Federation,

(v) reside and settle in any part of the Federation,

(vi) acquire, hold and dispose of property, and

(vii) practise any profession, or carry on any occupation, trade or business.

(b) No person shall be convicted of any offence except for violation of a law in force at the time of the commission of the Act charged as an offence, nor be subjected to a penalty greater than that which might have been inflicted under the law in force at the time of the commission of the offence.

(c) No person shall be prosecuted and punished for the same offence more than once.

(d) No person accused of any offence shall be compelled to be a witness against himself.

(e) No person shall be deprived of his life or personal liberty except according to procedure established by law.

(f) No person who is arrested shall be detained in custody without being informed of the grounds for such arrest nor shall he be denied the right to consult, and to be defended by, a legal practitioner of his choice.

(g) Every person who is arrested and detained in custody shall be produced before the nearest magistrate within a period of twenty-four hours of such arrest excluding the time necessary for the journey from the place of arrest to the court of the magistrate and no such person shall be detained in custody beyond the said period without the authority of a magistrate.

(h) When any person is detained in pursuance of an order made under any law providing for preventive detention, the authority making the order shall communicate to such person the grounds on which the order has been made and shall afford him the earliest opportunity of making a representation against the order.

(3) Right Against Exploitation :

(a) Traffic in human beings and other similar forms of forced labour shall be prohibited and any contravention of this provision shall be an offence punishable in accordance with law.

(b) No child below the age of fourteen years shall be employed to work in any factory, mine, household or engaged in any other hazardous employment.

(c) Nothing in this article shall prevent the Government from imposing compulsory service for public purposes, and in imposing such service the Government shall not make any discrimination on grounds only of religion, race, colour, or class or any of them.

(4) Right to Freedom of Religion :

Subject to public order, morality and health and to the other fundamental rights, all persons shall be equally entitled to freedom of conscience and the right freely to profess, practise and propagate religion.

(5) Cultural and Educational Rights :

(a) Any section of the citizens residing in the Federation or any part thereof having a distinct language, script or culture of its own shall have the right to conserve the same.

(b) No citizen shall be denied admission into any educational institution maintained by the Government or receiving aid out of Government or Local Authority funds on grounds only of religion, race, colour, language or any of them.

(c) All minorities, whether based on race, religion or language, shall have the right to establish and administer educational institutions of their choice.

(d) The Government shall not, in granting aid to educational institutions, discriminate against any educational institution on the ground that it is under the management of a minority, whether based on race, religion, or language, and it shall not discriminate in granting permission to suitable and qualified persons to come into the Federation to manage and run such educational institutions.

(6) Right to Property :

- (a) No person shall be deprived of his property save by authority of law.
- (b) No property, movable or immovable, including any interest in, or in any company owing any commercial or industrial undertaking shall be taken possession of or acquired for public purposes under any law authorising the taking of such possession or such acquisition, unless the law provides for compensation for the property taken possession of or acquired and either fixes the amount of the compensation, or specifies the principles on which and the manner in which, the compensation is to be determined and given.
- (c) No citizen shall be discriminated against by insertion of restrictive clauses in title deeds from acquiring, possessing and occupying property.

(7) Right to Constitutional Remedies :

- (a) The right to move the Supreme Court by appropriate proceedings for the enforcement of the rights conferred by the Constitution shall be guaranteed.
- (b) The Supreme Court shall have the power to issue directions or orders or writs, including writs in the nature of habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto and certiorari, whichever may be appropriate for the enforcement of any of the rights conferred by the Constitution.

Conclusion :

We have tried summarily to give some idea of racial discrimination, against Asians. Quite often discrimination is publicly practised without legal sanction. The Government and Local Authorities practise racial discrimination, and give approval to it in various ways. It must be understood and realised that Asians have a background of civilization and culture which makes them useful citizens. Our plea is that all forms of racial discrimination should be abolished. Furthermore, every domiciled inhabitant irrespective of his race, colour or creed should be given equal opportunity for livelihood and advancement in all spheres—public or private—whether under control of the Government, Local Authorities or others. We are convinced that racial discrimination and prejudice breeds frustration and disaffection, and therefore, the Government should set the example by doing away with all racially discriminating legislation, and accord the same rights and opportunities as are enjoyed by the Europeans. We hope the Monckton Commission will note the indignities and humiliation suffered by the Asians in Southern Rhodesia and the Federation, and recommend to the Authorities concerned the need to do away with colour-bar and racial discrimination and to embody the Fundamental Rights in the Constitution before the conference for the review of the Constitution takes place.

Oral Evidence

SOUTHERN RHODESIAN ASIAN ORGANISATION

Represented by Mr. Vaghmaria and Mr. Anand.

Mr. Vaghmaria stated that the association he represented comprised 13 "centre" organisations throughout Southern Rhodesia.

The representatives said that their memorandum dealt very largely with discriminatory practices in force in the Territory and they considered there had been very few improvements in the last few years and whatever had been done in the right direction had been achieved very slowly indeed. Hotels were always a difficulty as far as the Asian people were concerned, and they also instanced that the City Council until two years ago were not prepared to hire their halls to the Asian community. The position, however, they stated, was satisfactory now; but until then they had found that Asians and Coloureds were always restricted to the last few rows in the hall. Another matter that concerned them a very great deal was that of the pay of Asian and Coloured teachers. This was below European rates, and in addition one found that members of these communities were not accepted for residence at the Heany Training College where they were still not allowed to mix and had to take their meals separately. They said that even in the new college which was planned to be opened within the next year or two different blocks had been erected for different racial groups. This sort of thing ran entirely counter to any idea of partnership.

The representatives considered that the question of the Federal Government franchise was a very controversial matter; but they took the view that the largest number of people possible should be on the voters' roll. This roll should be a common roll for all and there should not be separate rolls embracing other qualifications. They thought that a sound basis for the common roll was a literacy qualification, because if property and income qualifications were insisted on many educated and responsible people would be deprived of the vote. They suggested that even in England the literacy test was not very high. Asked whether, notwithstanding this, they would insist on higher qualifications for parliamentary candidate, the witness stated that while they were not prepared to subscribe to this idea the position nevertheless was that in practice the candidates for parliament would have a higher qualification.

They were satisfied that the Federation from the economic angle was something that should continue; but it was important that commercial and industrial developments should keep abreast with political ones. Their memorandum, they said, was based on the premise that the Federation would continue. The improved constitutional change they recommended had been covered by their memorandum, and their main proposal was that there should be a Bill of Rights, for if people were not prepared to heed public opinion, legislation was the only thing left to ensure the avoidance of discriminatory practices.

Questioned on the siting of the Capital cities, the witnesses stated that they did not mind if the Federal Capital remained in Salisbury but it was undesirable that both Capitals should be in the same city, and they thought that the Territorial Capital should be moved to Bulawayo.

On the question of Asian education, Mr. Vaghmaria stated that there had been no marked improvement in Southern Rhodesia; but notwithstanding this he would wish for Asian education to continue under the aegis of the Federal Government. He felt, however, that, even so, much more could be done for the children in the Asian and Coloured communities. They thought that the ideal would be for young children of the various races to be started together at the primary stage for it was only something like this that would yield a basis of substance on which friendship between the races could in the future be developed. They considered that the difficulties in primary schools were probably overrated but they thought that the children of the various race groups should come together at that stage notwithstanding the initial language difficulty. This was something they were certain would soon be overcome by the children themselves.

On immigration matters, Mr. Vaghmaria stated that there were numerous cases of Asians being prevented from entering the Federation, whereas before 1953 there had virtually been free entry to Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland. Recently in Northern Rhodesia an Indian industrialist who was prepared to spend £50,000 in the Lusaka area starting an industry was refused permission to enter the country.

In answer to a question the witnesses stated that neither of them employed Coloured labour, and this was a situation that was fairly general. In their experience, Coloured people in general went for, what they termed, an artisan type of job.

Memorandum

BULAWAYO BRITISH INDIAN ASSOCIATION

A. S. Petker—Chairman.

I. E. Khalpey—Hon. Secretary.

1. As the official organisation representing the political interests of the Asian Community of Bulawayo, we submit for your consideration, this Memorandum embodying recommendations for Constitutional changes in the light of experiences by members of the Asian Community.

2. It is not the purpose of this Memorandum to detail every instance of the numerous disabilities experienced by members of the Asian Community in their day to day existence in the Federation. The evidence in support of these disabilities is substantially very heavy. In the main, the problems revolve primarily on colour discrimination and its various modifications. Our recommendations will therefore be substantiated by generalised illustrations of these disabilities.

Fundamental Human Rights: The Basis

3. It is our opinion that the basic approach to the problems faced by the under-privileged, and particularly the minority communities in the Federation, is one of fundamental human rights. The constant denial of amenities and privileges enjoyed by the European Communities is a pivotal factor in the social, political and legal disabilities that are faced by our community. As a minority race, it is abundantly clear that no amelioration can be brought about unless constitutional safeguards are assured to every citizen of the Federation, irrespective of race, colour, or creed.

4. The position of the minority communities in the political, economic and social life in a heterogeneous population such as is resident in the Federation, is vulnerable. The Bulawayo British Indian Association considers it imperative to provide certain basic constitutional safeguards for all citizens. The safeguards envisaged should take the form of fundamental human rights, enshrined in the Constitution of the Federation. Such a Bill of Rights would, we feel, put to rest all minority fears of discrimination and foster the necessary confidence in as much as judicial remedies may be invoked when basic human rights (as embodied in the U.N. Declaration of Human Rights) are denied to them.

5. The trend towards constitutional safeguards of this nature is evident in many recently promulgated constitutions of countries that have heterogeneous populations.

6. The present constitution of the Federation is void in so far as the guarantee of such rights to its citizens is concerned. The singular reference to the guarantee of a right appears to be with regard to the Federal Public Service, where in Article 40, Sub-Section 2, it is laid down that no person will be ineligible for employment on grounds of race alone. However, the subsequent Section 3, in our opinion, has a nullifying effect on this provision when it states that "In determining the suitability of any person for any employment in the Federal Public Service, regard may be had to the circumstances of the locality in which that person would be employed". This restrictive section is capable of being interpreted in a manner detrimental to the general eligibility for employment in the Service.

7. In view of this inadequacy and lack of general guarantees of impartiality, we recommend on behalf of our Association, the insertion in the revised Constitution of the Federation, a Bill of Rights or a chapter on Fundamental Human Rights on the following suggested lines:—

Prohibition of Discrimination, and Equality For All

8. The bulk of the population in the Federation is denied access to places of public entertainment, cinemas, public restaurants, hotels, public conveniences, and other organised institutions. Discrimination is practised on grounds of colour and race, and the Asians therefore fall into the category of the population to whom these rights are so denied. The desire of the Government not to interfere in the affairs of private enterprises has brought about a situation whereby phrases and terms such as "Right of Admission Reserved" find a general abuse based on colour and race instead of on decorum, propriety and behaviour. The mis-use of this phrase by European establishments to exclude all non-Europeans without exception, brings about considerable hardships when even important dignitaries on private and personal visits are not spared the humiliation of being denied hotel accommodation and access to places of recreation and entertainment purely on grounds of race and colour.

9. The Constitution must therefore guarantee that no person shall be denied access to shops, public entertainment, public restaurants, hotels and other organised institutions on grounds of race, colour and creed. The State shall not deny to any person equality before the law or the equal protection of the laws.

Equality of Opportunity in Public Employment

10. With the exception of the medical and teaching professions, entry into other departments of Public Service is, in practice, virtually barred to Asians. It may appear that in theory an Asian (and non-Europeans generally) would be entitled to apply, but selections are never made for Federal Service Appointments in Southern Rhodesia. Asians are generally selected to serve in Nyasaland where there exists a larger Asian population. Asian teachers are appointed to serve only in Asian and Coloured Schools, and non-European doctors in non-European Hospitals. It is our considered opinion that the Constitution should provide for the initial appointment of representatives from each race on the membership and constitution of the Body of the Public Service Commission itself.

11. In matters of private employment, qualified Asians have found it impossible to enter the engineering and the legal (Attorneys) professions, purely on considerations of colour and race.

12. It is our opinion that the Government should render every assistance to persons suffering such disabilities by exercising and exercising the necessary pressure and influence to make the initial entry of a few such persons possible.

Right to Certain Freedoms

13. Although certain freedoms are granted in practice, we strongly feel that the Constitution should be more specific about the freedoms that a man is entitled to enjoy in a country of his birth and adoption. The freedom to acquire hold and dispose of property has also been made difficult due to European objections to the purchase of properties by members of the Asian Community. There have been inevitable demonstrations of intolerance and protestations at the acquisition of properties in portions where normally only Europeans would monopolise. Many Asians have been ejected from areas which have been occupied by them for several generations. This ejection has resulted from the proclamation by the Town Planning Authorities of such portions as European residential areas. It may be noted that for purposes of the Land Apportionment Act, Asians are defined and deemed to be Europeans.

14. We therefore recommend that among other freedoms the Constitution should guarantee:

- (a) freedom of speech and expression;
- (b) freedom to assemble peacefully and without arms;
- (c) freedom to form associations and unions;
- (d) freedom to move freely throughout the territories comprising the Federation, and to reside and settle in any part of the Federation;
- (e) freedom to acquire, hold and dispose of property, and
- (f) freedom to practise any profession, or to carry on any occupation, trade or business.

Right to Freedom of Religion

15. It may appear that such a right is implied and therefore need not be enshrined in a Constitution. However, in view of the fact that there exists a multi-religious community in the Federation, it does seem highly essential to protect and accord the same facilities to persons professing, practising, and administering different religious faiths.

Protection Against Arrest and Detention

16. In order to ensure that all persons are protected equally by law and exploitation to be prevented, the Constitution must guarantee that no person shall be deprived of his life or personal liberty except according to procedure established by law. Furthermore, it is essential that no person be victimised by the State, and therefore no person who is arrested shall be detained in custody without being informed, as soon as possible, of the grounds of such arrest, nor shall he be denied the right to consult, and be defended by a legal practitioner of his choice. Every person shall be guaranteed the right of Habeas Corpus.

Educational Rights

17. Educational facilities at the primary and secondary level are far from adequate and satisfactory for Asians. Every year it is experienced that a large number of students keen on pursuing higher education at the secondary level are forcibly precluded from education because of lack of accommodation at the few secondary schools that are available for Asians and Coloureds in the larger centres of the Federation. Hostel and Boarding facilities are poor, even in the larger centres. Students hailing from rural areas and from the smaller centres and towns are often without boarding and lodging facilities and in most cases have to fend for themselves. It is our recommendation that no citizen should be denied admission into any educational institution maintained by the State or receiving aid out of State funds, on grounds only of race, religion, language or colour, or any of them.

Constitutional Remedies

18. Constitutional safeguards and guarantees without the Constitutional right to move the Supreme Court by appropriate proceedings for the enforcement of the rights conferred by this Bill, would make this Chapter virtually a dead letter. It is our considered opinion that this last guarantee is absolutely essential to make this chapter operative, without which it would appear that the inclusion of these guarantees in the Constitution are merely an appeasement for the under-privileged communities of the Federation. The Supreme Court of the land must have the power to issue directions, orders or writs, including writs in the nature of Habeas Corpus, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto and certiorari, whichever may be appropriate for the enforcement of any of the rights conferred by this Bill. The rights guaranteed by this Constitution must not be abridged in any way.

Conclusion

19. In conclusion, we would only wish to assert that the hopes and aspirations of a people are embodied in the Constitution which it gives to its country. Despite suffering numerous disabilities and humiliation, the Asian community of the Federation has always been a loyal, law abiding, non-violent and peace loving community, contributing immensely to its industrial, commercial and economic development.

20. Our roots are deeply embedded in this country and our hopes and future lie in the nature of the Constitution that will be given to the Federation. We feel confident, that in its recommendations, the Monckton Commission will ensure traditions of British justice and fair play will not be overlooked, and that the future citizens of the Federation will have a sheet anchor to cling to in the Constitution of their country.

Oral Evidence

BULAWAYO BRITISH INDIAN ASSOCIATION

Representatives: I. K. Khalpey—Hon. Secretary.

K. N. Rana—Vice-Chairman.

In reply to questions, and speaking in turn, the witnesses made the following points:—

(1) With reference to paragraph 13 of the memorandum "Many Asians have been ejected from areas which have been occupied by them for several generations", Mr. Rana had personal experience of this. There was an area a mile away from the hotel, to the east of Bulawayo, which used to be Commonage Land (i.e. not in the Municipality). Portions of it had been brought into the Municipality. In that area, had previously lived a number of Coloureds and Asians. The Municipality might have chosen that area deliberately, or it might have been an accident. But the Town Planning Authorities had then allocated that area for residential parts and called it Paddonhurst. This land had previously been or leasehold to Asians, but the buildings were their own. Asians had lived there for generations. At the time of the regrading of the land they had asked for the opportunity to buy stands there to build their houses. The local Town Planning Authority had refused, and made it a European area. The Asians did not want priority, but they wanted equality and the right to buy land. All the land there was non-African under the Land Apportionment Act, and this made the matter worse. (There was some discussion of the implication of this to clarify the extent to which the Town Planning Authority could go beyond the intention of the Land Apportionment Act.) Asians then had difficulty in buying their houses elsewhere. This was illustrated by some cuttings shown to the Commissioners. Areas which had been set aside for Asians were unsuitable, with no services, such as light and water, and in isolation. The Asians also regarded the allotment of such areas as segregation. They agreed that quite satisfactory compensation had been given for their "eviction".

(2) Mr. Rana had first come to Bulawayo, as a child of one, 50 years ago. When the Asians had first come to the country, there were no such barriers or difficulties. As time went on people seemed to have been doing worse rather than better. They felt that the Asians had had a raw deal. They objected firstly to the principle of segregation, and secondly, to the allocation of unsuitable, unserviced, areas. This was particularly hard on the poorer Asians who were forced to live in tenements, etc., at Hyde Park and Trenance outside the Commonage. Conditions in these places were shocking and they were living mixed up with Africans. The Asians should be allowed to buy houses in the residential areas according to their means. The European fear of overcrowding of Asian houses had no foundation, since the Asians had greatly advanced in wealth and in other ways. At Paddonhurst the building cost was £3,500 (which Mr. Rana himself had offered to pay).

(3) There were 18,000 Indians altogether in Bulawayo. The Bulawayo British Indian Association had been accepted as the official body to represent them.

(4) Reference was made to the list of "freedoms" in paragraph 14 of the memorandum — (a) to (f) — and Commissioners enquired as to the extent to which the freedoms mentioned did not at present exist. The witnesses explained that they did not mean to imply that all these freedoms did not exist at present. They were generalisations. Further their recommendations were not necessarily for the Asian community alone but for all communities. The freedom (d) (freedom of movement within the Federation) had been restored to Asians after three years of negotiation with the Government. Freedom (e), to acquire property, existed in theory, but was not permitted in practice, in the manner just explained. It was also curtailed in practice by the restrictive clauses in title deeds. A particular example was given of a recent government notice relating to a new "European" suburb of Bulawayo which indicated that properties could not be sold or leased "to any person not wholly of European descent". The witnesses understood that such restrictive clauses were not of full legal validity, but in fact solicitors behaved as if they were, and their point was that the Government appeared to approve of such restrictive titles (the matter is set out in greater detail in the section on the "Land Apportionment Act" of the memorandum presented by the Southern Rhodesian Asian Organisation, see p . . .).

(f) "Freedom to practice any profession etc.". There was a kind of professional ring, notably in the solicitors' profession. It was agreed that this was not specifically related to colour. Mr. Khalpey had wanted to get into Articles and had tried 56 firms in Southern Rhodesia without success. He had not a hope of getting into the profession. The solicitors' firms were exclusively European. He agreed that this was strictly nothing to do with the Government, but was managed by the Southern Rhodesian Law Society. Some of the solicitors in question had candidly given their reasons, which were fear of competition, particularly if an Indian lawyer became available to serve the illiterate mercantile community of Bulawayo. It was a trade protection bar. Mr. Khalpey had also found it impossible to get qualifications as a solicitor outside Southern Rhodesia and then to return to take up practice.

(5) On the colour bar, and with particular reference to the last sentence of paragraph 17 of their memorandum, there was a lack of High School facilities for Asians. There was no reason why there should be separate schools. This idea was not consistent with the concept of partnership. Those who could not get into existing Asian schools should be permitted to enter European schools. Asians who came from rural areas were particularly affected by the shortage of hostel accommodation.

(6) On colour bar generally there had not been much real improvement since Federation. In Bulawayo only the Hotel "Vic" had become multi-racial recently. Even now there were separate bars in the hotels for Asians. The position needed clarification. Formerly only Asians with diplomatic immunity had been admitted. Twenty or thirty years ago there had not been this colour bar in respect of hotels. They did not think it had come up from South Africa, but had been imposed by the European business people. It had started in one hotel, and then in one restaurant and so it progressed as more superior establishments had been set up. There was no real discrimination against Asians among the ordinary trading people with whom they did business.

(7) There was discrimination in cinemas; in many they were not allowed in at all. In another they were confined to a dirty pen at the back. They agreed that it might not be the responsibility of the Southern Rhodesian Government, but that Government gave no lead in doing anything about it.

(8) Questioned as to their view of Federation, they said that it should continue to exist if certain basic human rights were guaranteed to all. But if those basic rights were denied then it was unfair to associate Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, where greater privileges were enjoyed, with Southern Rhodesia. They agreed that the inclusion of these basic rights in the constitution was no guarantee that they would be given but it would be possible to move the Supreme Court in respect of those rights. The inclusion of a Bill of Rights in the Constitution was based on the precedents of the Indian Constitution (a complete chapter) and the American Constitution.

(9) With reference to Article 40, sub-section 2 of the Federal Constitution (mentioned in paragraph 6 of their memorandum) they thought that the Board of the Public Service Commission should be inter-racial as an interim or transitional measure. The Board, as at present constituted, overlooked certain conditions, and they, therefore, wanted racial representation on it so that it could act as a tribunal. There were a considerable number of matriculated Asians, but they were only employed in the Government. There was only one Asian doctor who was employed in Nyasaland. Mr. Khalpey himself had applied for a post in the Postal Services, and had been informed that he could only be so employed if he went to Nyasaland, although he knew there were vacancies in Bulawayo.

(10) The Military Training Corps was in theory non-racial; but Asians were restricted to the Transport Corps, and messing arrangements were separate. Further, there was no promotion for Asians beyond the rank of Sergeant. This discrimination cut through the whole basis of loyalty and discipline so essential in military service.

P. HLAZO

Economic, Political, and Social Advantages of the Federal Set-up

1. Economic Advantages:

- (a) The bigger the country is, wider is the field of its natural resources and greater is the variety — in its potential wealth.
- (b) Our Federal set-up increases our man power labour source, i.e. the harnessing of the combined population of the Federal territories to work for the common good of the whole.
- (c) The Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland is a factor of great interest to the outside world and encourages immigration from older and higher industrialised countries — this encourages technical skill into the country as well as influencing internal technical organisation and skill, with a view to the rapid expansion of internal industries.
- (d) The combined population of the Federation is an economical internal asset by way of a home front market which is an incentive to competitive spirit, without which progress is impossible. The Federal industrial enterprise is encouraged and achieved by investments from abroad.

2. Political Advantages:

- (a) The keystone of the Federal political set-up is the constitutional policy of partnership on which rests our franchise common roll, as opposed to the Union of South Africa's political line up whose obnoxious foundation is apartheid.
- (b) The partnership policy is the main hope of the African aborigines. For the assessment of human values on their merits, regardless of race, colour or creed. In fact, partnership is British justice and fair play incarnate.

3. Social Advantages:

- (a) Naturally partnership breeds social integration which in itself is a spiritual amen of Christian ethics and God's human values, i.e. that all men are equal before the eyes of God. This unchangeable dictum is daily being forced before the notice of humanity — in things man tries to avert every day — disease and death together form the common lot of man and no colour bar can reverse this order.
- (b) Social partnership is the most influential factor which alone can completely break down centuries of social barriers detrimental to black and white harmony in our Federal set-up. Social partnership is the key hope of a multiracial society. It is in social partnership where the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland can find a strong weapon to conquer centuries of social prejudice. Without the implementation of social partnership, the constitutional policy of partnership becomes a mockery both internally and externally and this leaves the edifice of partnership policy without a roof.

4. Economical Difficulties:

- (a) The Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland is comparatively speaking a very young country. Although the country is young, it is rich in man power and natural resources.
- (b) The Federation lacks money and skill to exploit all its resources for the good of the common whole. For this disadvantage the Federation has to look for investment from abroad for its programme and plans of development. This is true of both the spiritual and material progress of the country.
- (c) Spiritually, the Federation stands in need of men of integrity who will not be swayed about by racial prejudice from either the white nationalism or the black nationalism. Politics cannot achieve this goal without the Holy Spirit — it is feared the political world despises Him — it is equally feared that the political world is playing with fire without Him.

5. Political Partnership :

This is a thorny Federal issue for the following reasons:—

- (a) The two main Federal partners are of two distinct descent. Their common ground is the human family and the Christian Church. Basically in these two characteristics, the two main groups have one firm ground on which they stand on equal terms. Humanity is one, for mind and soul and spirit are the common make-up of all man. The Church has no distinction in her message for humanity — all have sinned and become short of the glory of God — there is one salvation for each and all of the human race. This is not of course politics but a reality. This is a great difficulty in that politics do not moralise. Politicians concern themselves with material progress even if the progress envisaged is devoid of spiritual growth — hence the line up in White Nationalism, and in Black Nationalism. Consequently upon this line of thought, we see opposite camps snarling at each other. This takes all the ground underneath the policy of partnership.
 - (b) The white group claims a two thousand years evolution of civilisation in thought, word and deeds. The black is a partner who is emerging from the primitive stage, as such, he is not expected to ask for a share on equal terms on economical, political and social standard of the higher civilisation. On the other hand, the black partner claims that civilisation is the heritage of humanity as the light from the sun is the source of light and warmth for all.
 - (c) The white partner insists that the Government must remain in responsible civilised hands for the foreseeable future. Here the black partner is perplexed in that the English standard dictionary fails to define a civilised person, e.g. If Nehru or Khwame Kruma or any of the leaders of non-white independent states were to visit the Federation, the question of where they would be accommodated would hit the headlines of our Press. The fear being the reaction of the general white public in according such personalities the same status as a man with a white skin, consequently when such personalities visit the Federation special arrangements have to be made because in the normal running of things men with black skins are not accepted in the white social structure.
 - (d) An African aborigine born and bred in London, educated in Eton or Harrow and thereafter graduates in honours either in Cambridge or Oxford, eventually lands in Africa of his forefathers, the first clash he experiences is a higher definition of European civilisation as understood by the white partner. A black skinned man may be acceptably civilised for the European social structure in Europe but he is not good enough according to the standard set by the white partner on the spot.
 - (e) The Fear complex. From time immemorial numbers have been used as a determining factor in the assessment of human objectives. Kings and emperors depended on the sheer weight of numbers to gain their objectives in the battlefields. Before the days of mechanisation, industrial development depended on the numerical strength of the hands employed. Even in these days of mechanisation, the available human power in industry is still a factor to reckon with. Naturally, in a multiracial society the influence of the two main groups is not evenly balanced, the governing group is inclined to marshal its strength for self defence because the law of the world is founded on self preservation. This is contrary to the Christian faith which is founded on the moral law of aggression against self and powers of darkness. The governing minority in our society, although wishing to do good, has in it an influential element which seeks to maintain an exclusive privilege for the white minority. This element finds its expression in the slogan of the Government must remain in the hands of civilised people for the foreseeable future. It is needless to point out that the foreseeable future has no specific day on which the bells will be rung for the majority partner to take a full share in the government of the country.
- ##### 6. The Franchise :
- (a) The African partner believes in one man, one vote. He further maintains that the means qualification is deliberately arranged to check his numbers so that in the foreseeable future he may never gain a parliamentary majority.

- (b) The present line up, as evidence by the Southern Rhodesia Association, is in the African mind, a white determination for a European supremacy for all time. The Dominion Party's policy is an historical pointer to what is happening south of the Limpopo.
- (c) The African feels that there should be a general policy regarding the franchise throughout the territories which come within the orbit of British influence. That the means qualification be altered in order to meet people whose income is lower than that of the average European but otherwise intelligent enough to exercise his vote. The idea that the average African is not in a position to exercise his vote with intelligence is a myth in the light of what is taking place in the Union of South Africa. Furthermore, centuries of civilisation are not the criterion on which to judge a people's intelligence in this regard. This argument is supported by the Hitler regime and the communistic block. To throw more light in this connection, mention may be made of the Old Cape liberal policy—here the franchise was never abused by the African but it was the European who used his vote against the Africans in 1936, when the House of Assembly in Cape Town obtained the two-thirds majority.

7. The Department of Justice:

- (a) In the dispensation of justice the African feels there is something that leaves much to be desired. He (the African) feels his life is cheaper than that of his white partner. The search for a murderer who has murdered an African or committed sexual crime against an African woman is comparatively speaking always lukewarm. Whereas if capital crime or rape is committed against a person of white skin, the law will leave no stone unturned in order to bring the culprit to justice. In a case like this, the police will use all available means, e.g. police spot-planes, even the army joins in the search.

8. Native Administration :

- (a) In Southern Rhodesia there is a department exclusively set up to administer native affairs. The feeling now in the emerging African is that this department has served its useful purpose of taming the African barbarian. Furthermore, this department has done the African commendable service, especially in the rural areas. Along this good work, this department has carried out a policy of intimidation in its general attitude and dealings with the African. The 'Nkosi' myth has been over-emphasised by this department.
- (b) Recently, the report of the select committee on public accounts has revealed that this famous department is now on the verge of collapsing — it has grown too big to weld it together. In fact, in the African mind, this department has become a government within a government. Ugly flaws of this department have been brought to light. It is now publicly acknowledged that the work of this department is not only inefficient but has criminal characteristic of thieving. It is worthy of note that these ugly characteristics are not attributed to the African staff of this department. It is the white skinned partner who is the sufferer in this case. Let the following scriptural quotation suffice in this connection: "Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and, behold, a beam is in thine own eye? Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye, and shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye".
- (c) In a multi-racial society, there should be one department in the nature of the department in question but with this difference, that it may not be exclusively for Africans only.

9. Solution :

- (a) First and foremost, the Federation as a machinery of Government and the policy of partnership should by all means be helped to remain intact.
- (b) In order to enable the Federal machinery to work smoothly, the root cause of its instability should be the first concern of our parliamentary surgery. Let the knife of the surgeon cut out the root cause of our parliamentary disease. What is it? It is the colour bar. But the colour bar is not in our statute books in the sense of the Union of South Africa.

Here in the Federation, it is the general public opinion of the governing group which is pushing the ship of state to the bottom of the sea.

- (c) If we are to produce good leaders let us be careful in working out the policy of integration. The first start should be the church and the school. Let us do away with black congregations and white congregations. Let those who feel they would benefit by attending an English service make their own choice and vice versa.
- (d) Let there be one department of public education for all. School doors should be opened to all children irrespective of race, colour or creed. Thus and thus only will suspicion and prejudice be removed from our multi-racial society.

10. Economics :

The question of low and high economical standards can only be corrected by the removal of social barriers. The complete removal of these barriers will be a natural process of self-sorting.

- (a) The Land Apportionment Act. This Act is now obsolete in the light of the present trend of events in the Federation. The constant mention of it in our parliamentary debates in order to meet the emerging Africans in hotels and residential areas is a clear indication that the time has now arrived to revise the Federal set up without the influence of racial grouping but on a sincere multi-racial readjustment for the equilibrium of the whole.
- (b) True enough, the Land Apportionment Act is a protective measure in so far as the economical disparity of the two main communities of the Federation leaves a yawning gulf between the two main races. But if we are to solve our problems, the first essential is to get away from thinking in terms of race. Our aim and purpose should be to create an African people composed of a white pattern and a black pattern. The white pattern should stop to refer to Europe as "at home", rather use the country of origin instead. The black pattern should stop to refer to the white pattern as a European. Instead a new designation should be coined, namely the white African. The smaller minorities who are neither white nor black should be contented with the designation African. Those whites and Indians whose intention is to spend the last days of their lives in their countries of origin should be admitted here on temporary permits of long terms of stay according to their wish.
- (c) The contention that the disappearance of the Land Apportionment Act from our statute book would mean the buying out of the African from the land is a greedy vision. In a family there may possibly be four healthy strong children out of ten. It does not follow that the strong ones may look with contempt and greed on the six not very healthy brothers and sisters. On the contrary, if the family follows Christian ethics and principles it is the duty of the healthier ones to seek to cure the cause of weakness in their group. Sincere multi-racial co-operation will go a long way to cure our multi-racial weakness.

11. The Commissioners :

- (a) The personnel of the Monckton Commission is implored to recommend suitable workable terms on which the ills of our Federal set-up may be cured and thus bring stability to the country and so encourage investment from abroad.
- (b) Lastly, but not the least, the British way of life into which we have been born and brought up must be encouraged to continue in our Federal set-up.

12. Further Light :

For further light, I beg to draw the attention of the commissioners to the Summary of this evidence; especially on the following points:—

1. Progress since Federation.
2. Close contacts of the races.
3. How to improve the Department of Native Affairs.
4. The removal of the remaining reservations in our Constitution.

Supplementary MemorandumP. HLAZO

Born March 1899, Tegwani Mission, Plumtree.
Educated St. Mathews College and Lovedale College.

Teachers — qualified. Taught for 25 years in Matabeland, Southern Rhodesia.

It is my desire as an old inhabitant of this country to contribute towards the development of the Federation and its peoples, both economically, socially and practically.

I therefore submit this abridged report, after which I would appreciate the opportunity to enlarge upon my evidence and my reasons for the continuance and the development of the Federation and its peoples.

SummaryA. Progress since Federation:—

(a) Prior to Federation heavy equipment for road construction was exclusively preserved for Europeans only, but since Federation more and more Africans find employment in this field, and European employees do not suffer for it as in the same field avenues of employment in clerical work expand and thus more Europeans find employment.

(b) The Federal Government is responsible for Income Tax which is spread throughout the Federal Territories on agreed percentage, thus a marked improvement in the harnessing of man power throughout the Federation is noticeable. This is more marked and conspicuous in Nyasaland. For Nyasaland as a result of Federation wages and salaries have risen out of proportion compared to pre-Federation days. Today in Nyasaland health and education are receiving the attention which before Federation it was impossible to give solely for money reasons. Of the three Federal territories Nyasaland ought to feel most grateful for the birth of a Federal Government which embraces her.

B. Close contacts of the races:—

(a) During the seven years of Federation contacts between the European and the African (outside the level of employer and employee) have improved beyond recognition. The general attitude of the European in the street toward the African is now promising for a change for the better.

(b) The Federation, as a new big field for outside investment, the eyes of the world have been attracted to it. Consequent upon this, men of the academic field are crossing the colour-line in order to contact the African in order to learn his soul. Thus friendly relations on a higher level have been developed between the races.

C. How to improve the Department of Native Affairs:—

(a) If there is need to keep this Department in being, it is feared that nothing short of a drastic surgery operation can improve it.

(b) The Head of the Native Affairs admits that his Department has grown too big to wield it together. This admission came as no surprise to the African who has been feeling for many years that the Department exclusively for African Affairs was a Government within a Government. This cannot be over-emphasised — a pity of it is that those who have never been governed by a Government within a Government cannot comprehend and so appreciate the significance of the need for a change or overhauling in this Department.

(c) It is a matter for great congratulation that Native Education and Native Labour Administration are now State Departments independent of Native Affairs as a Department. When the above two Departments were removed from the hands of the Native Commissioners, the Department of Native Affairs felt grieved, as one shorn of one's empire.

(d) Criminal cases should be removed completely from the hands of the Native Commissioners.

(e) Native Agriculture should be linked up with European Agriculture. After all, this is a field for experts for which Native Commissioners have no qualifications.

(f) The dipping of African cattle should be the entire concern of the Veterinary Department.

(g) The collection of Tax should be a matter for the Treasury.

(h) Surveying should be a concern of the Department of Land and Agriculture.

D. The removal of the remaining reservations in our Constitution:—

For the following reasons these reservations should go:—

(a) Whitehall is 6,000 miles away. A Government in the able hands on the spot cannot go ahead with plans and programme of development. The reservations are a stumbling-block to progress.

(b) When the black partner attains a majority in Parliament will hate these reservations.

(c) No repetition of the Union of South Africa here because the free world public opinion is one against any form of injustice.

N.B. In conclusion, if the Commissioners desire oral evidence to support my paper, I am willing to appear in person.
Bembezi.

Oral EvidenceP. HLAZO

Mr. Hlazo had submitted a memorandum to which he had added a summary of certain important points as a supplementary paper. He said that he felt that the Native Affairs Department had reached a stage where it should be trimmed to leave all criminal cases to be dealt with by the District Courts' magistrates. Today it was much too big a Department and should be re-organised.

In the rural areas, the Department, through its officers, maintained an archaic and intimidatory attitude. This was evidenced by Africans having to sit outside the offices, squat on the floor, and by their being kept waiting all day. This whole attitude exemplified a somewhat callous approach to their work. Into the bargain, the witness said that the Department was inefficient in that from time to time moneys were stolen or otherwise lost in the Department.

On the question of franchise, Mr. Hlazo said that he certainly believed in universal adult suffrage or "one man, one vote". In his view, no partnership between the races existed because as far as the Africans were concerned, there was a very limited franchise and in consequence very few African voters. He said that the qualifications were too high. His view was that in no sense did he necessarily wish to see an African majority but rather that white and black voters, as the electorate, should be able to return to Parliament a candidate of any colour.

The witness went on to say that the main trouble in Southern Rhodesia today was the colour bar although this perhaps had served one useful purpose in bringing Africans together. It was essential that the colour bar should be broken down as soon as possible. He conceded that in this direction there had been improvements in the last few days. One of the matters that struck him very forcibly was the question of education. This he was satisfied should be under one Government with multi-racial schools. He thought there might be friction to start with but he felt satisfied there would soon be an improvement in the relations between children and parents.

As to his reference earlier that criminal cases could all be dealt with by magistrates, he agreed that this presented difficulties in rural areas. He had no complaints against Native Commissioners and their judicial functions, and he regarded the majority of them as good assistant magistrates.

He heard that in Nyasaland African Chiefs tried criminal cases according to native law and that they dealt with matters such as petty thefts and matrimonial disputes. He was not satisfied, however, that it would be politic to give African Chiefs the power to try criminal cases because he thought that the standard of their education generally was too low. In any event, native Chiefs often tended to be biased, and he thought that women in disputes were likely to be prejudiced if their cases were tried by Chiefs.

Mr. Hlazo thought that agriculture should all be under one Government as he had recommended education should be, whether that Government was Territorial or Federal. He did not consider it right that Native Commissioners should be directing agriculture in the African areas. Allied to this question was the ever present problem of land as far as the African was concerned. He thought that the time had arrived for things to be arranged so that all land could be thrown open by repealing the Land Apportionment Act. He agreed that in such case there would be a danger of African land being bought up by others in a better position to provide the necessary cash. But his view was that suspicions flowed from divisions between the races, and the remedy lay in letting the people do all they could to come together. He stated that at present nationalism was growing very fast among the Africans even in the rural areas.

On the question of the constitution, Mr. Hlazo recommended that the remaining reservations in the Territorial Constitution should be removed. Existing as they did today meant that there had to be constant reference to the United Kingdom Government where all along the local Government had the necessary knowledge to deal with the problem on the spot. While he could cite no concrete example of these reservations preventing progress, he considered it was a question of principle. Even if there was an African Government in Southern Rhodesia, he felt there would be no need to refer matters to the United Kingdom. It was the people on the spot who should decide matters, and this would have the result of avoiding a good deal of waste of time. He was inclined to agree that in any new Constitution the minorities would probably require some sort of protection for the time being.

Making what he termed practical suggestions as to a solution of the troubles, Mr. Hlazo said that the repeal of the Land Apportionment Act would provide a reasonable working basis for the future. Likewise he thought the Ministries of Education and Agriculture should be under one Government, although he had no preference as to whether this should be Territorial or Federal. He said that when he had stated earlier he advocated a franchise on the basis of "one man, one vote", he meant that the vote should not be bestowed indiscriminately, but it should be conferred on people with some satisfactory qualifications. He certainly never intended that one man should have one vote because if he had, the European in this country would be swamped, and it was never his view that the European should be eliminated from the political or economic life of Southern Rhodesia.

E. B. MHAMBI

I Edward Ren Mhambi was born on the 9th. February 1930, in Salisbury. I did my primary education at Usher Institution in Matabeleland, after which I obtained my Cambridge School Certificate at Goromzi Secondary School in 1950. In 1951 and 1952 I worked as a Welfare Assistant on the Railways stationed in Bulawayo. From 1953 to 1957 I worked as a Clerk for Amalgamated Auctioneers in Bulawayo, and since then I have been a Storekeeper in the Gwanda Reserve.

It is therefore my wish that I should give evidence before the Commission, and I am basing my facts mostly on Rural Areas. It should be understood that people in rural areas are less educated than those who live in towns, and that at times these town people have given wrong influences on country people about Federation. But I personally feel that Federation has done quite a lot of good in rural areas as it has done in urban areas, although I realise that some matters are Territorial but could not have come about without Federation.

I have seen a big improvement in Race Relations in the last few years in the country, such as the good treatment given to Africans by Officials of the African Department and many other Europeans who have dealings out in the country and Mines. A thing we did not experience in the early forties. We have had decent Clinics opened up in remote areas such as the Avoca Clinic in Filabusi thus enabling people to get treatment right at home instead of going to big Hospitals in towns hundreds of miles away from their homes. We have had certain places opened to the African public, and still think that more such places will be opened to everybody by the Government in the near future. Great change in the treatment of African prisoners in Her Majesty's Prisons has been noted by country people. Councils have been formed in the Reserves which enable Africans to have a word in their local Government, and can have matters discussed friendly with their District Commissioners. Land Development Officers both black and white have been appointed in the Reserves to improve African farming. Good houses are being built in the Reserves. Roads and bridges have been built to make communication easy in the remote areas.

I do feel that we should have industries brought into the Reserves — say have factories built in certain parts of the Reserves, and these would be of great help to local people. Also I feel big entertainment centres should be built for country people, and they be encouraged to take part in sports by the Government. For all the facts and opinions I have submitted to the Commission being views of the rural African, I would therefore not recommend whatsoever the breaking up of the Federation.

It is my own evidence, and I would appreciate an opportunity to give verbal evidence to the Commission when it visits Gwanda.

Oral Evidence

E. B. MHAMBI

(Storekeeper, Gwanda Reserve).

Mr. Mhambi said that over the past five or six years he had seen much improvement in the attitude of Native Commissioners and Land Development Officers in their approach to Africans. In addition there had been very considerable satisfaction to the African population in the opening up of roads and the building of bridges which had allowed a much more satisfactory flow of transport. The erection of clinics in the districts had also been very helpful for now it meant that in most cases it was no longer necessary for Africans to come into the larger towns for medical treatment. He realised that some of the matters to which he referred were Territorial functions, but he felt that the achievements could not have been effected without Federation. He also said that there had been a great improvement in race relations generally. It was not so many years ago that Native Commissioners' messengers had compelled Africans to take their hats off while they were still miles away from the office. Now the position was entirely different; they felt they were able to approach the Native Commissioner freely, they were attended to quickly and equally they were able to get back to their homes and on to their jobs with a minimum waste of time.

It was pointed out to Mr. Mhambi that in evidence earlier in the day a witness had said precisely the opposite. His reply was that if there were ten people before you you obviously had to wait and, for example, he had to wait today, but that was no fault of the authorities or in this instance of the Commission. Because of numbers the witness stated that the position was possibly worse in town but even in the country today when there were lots of people they were definitely not made to sit on the floor.

Mr. Mhambi did criticise the lack of sports and entertainment and what he termed other social welfare facilities. These should be provided and generally encouraged. Furthermore, he hoped that it would be possible for factories and industries to extend their activities into the more remote areas in order to give Africans employment nearer their homes. Many would not come to the larger towns and this sort of thing would provide a satisfactory avenue of employment.

The witness said that he was interested in politics and that he and his wife, who was a nurse, were both voters and he a member of the United Federal Party. He considered that the franchise was a little too high but he pleaded that it should not be brought too low. He thought that Standard VIII, that is the junior certificate, would be a satisfactory qualification, even if the prospective voter did not have any property, but provided he had an income of £120. per annum. In lieu of the Standard VIII qualification he would be prepared to see primary education plus two years post-primary. He stated that it was true that there were many persons qualified to be on the voters' roll who had not registered. He understood that the Central Africa Party was encouraging people to get on the roll, but added that there had not been much encouragement prior to the last election. To make the African vote effective he thought it would be too early even with normal encouragement were an election held this or next year.

As a person interested in politics he read the "Bulawayo Chronicle", all the African papers, "The Citizen" and certain South African papers. He never missed the "Bulawayo Chronicle" or the "African Daily News".

In answer to a question Mr. Mhambi stated that in his view African nationalism was not growing very fast in the reserves where the position was very different from the towns. His view was that things should be allowed to evolve slowly; but it was important that pin pricks such as liquor restrictions, admission to cinemas and the classification of all Africans for censorship purposes with children under the age of fourteen should be removed as soon as possible. In these directions he thought it would be very helpful indeed if there were suitable direct African representation in the Southern Rhodesia Parliament with things as they were at the moment. On the other hand, he was very much in favour of Federation, and indeed he often felt that all functions of government should be Federal.

On the question of Native Councillors he thought that these people were doing valuable work; but one frequently came across the situation where the Chiefs and Councillors did not agree and this was understandable because some of the Chiefs were really not educated at all. The Chiefs, on the other hand, had the feeling that the Councillors were usurping their powers. The witness did not agree that the Chiefs should be accorded further powers at this stage. It would be much better if their present authority was first consolidated by education and other means. He said that in some areas the Councils had made very little progress. The Councils were responsible for financial matters, administration and planning with the Chief and Native Commissioner occupying the position of leaders of the Councils, but on the whole they had very few executive powers at the moment. He thought that the Chairman should not be the Native Commissioner, but that he should be a person elected from the Councillors with the Native Commissioner holding a watching and advisory brief. The Chief likewise should not be the Chairman unless his own merits dictated his election.

On being asked as to whether the Chief should be given power to try criminal cases Mr. Mhambi stated that he did not think this would be wise. For one thing most of the Chiefs had not sufficient education to try criminal cases, although he saw no particular reason why they should not deal with minor matters such as infringements under the Land Husbandry Act and the like. Otherwise it was enough that they should have authority to try civil matters between the Africans.

In regard to the Land Apportionment Act the witness stated that he was not satisfied with the way in which it was being implemented and he wondered why steps should not be taken to open up the areas in the towns for full competition between all the communities. It was true that the Land Apportionment Act had had the effect of protecting the African's interest in the rural area and he thought that in the African's own interests the European and Asian should continue to be kept out of the reserves. Were this not done he was certain that Asians would tend to swamp the reserves with their stores.

On the pass laws the witness confirmed that it was necessary for African males to carry a registration certificate or "situpa". His main objection to the carrying of these passes was that they evidenced discrimination between the races. He did not object at all to the identity portion of the certificate but he considered that the portion dealing with employment should be eliminated. Indeed he thought the purely identity certificates that were available to certain Africans and which carried a photograph of the bearer were an entirely satisfactory form of document. He mentioned that he himself had applied for one of these identity certificates which was granted on certain qualifications such as being a Chief or a headman, having the Cambridge examination or having been five years in business. He thought the categories were too restrictive but at the same time he simply could not understand why a headman, often a man of no education whatsoever, should ipso facto be entitled to these certificates. Mr. Mhambi stated that the application of the pass laws in Southern Rhodesia was not severe. He understood that in the Union of South Africa one was liable at any moment with a policeman at every corner to be taken in for not having one's certificate; but here the registration certificates were asked for by the police about once a year and this served a very good purpose because it enabled the loafers and criminals to be rounded up. Finally, Mr. Mhambi stated that he thought the town passes which were necessary when an African got a job in town served a useful purpose particularly because before they were issued an applicant had to have a thorough medical examination.

On being questioned further Mr. Mhambi said he could not say why comparatively few Africans were coming forward to give evidence. It had been widely known when the Commission was coming to Bulawayo, and there had certainly been no intimidation. Contrary to popular thought, the rural African discussed the Federation and politics generally to a very considerable extent. In his area round Gwanda there was virtually no Congress activity and the United Democratic Party had made no attempts to get supporters among the people there.

Memorandum (i)

F. E. B. FRIPP

Tanganyika to Limpopo

1. This was the principal area of Africa where penetration from the coast was possible, taking place for two thousand years or more.

Why? Is of course the first question.

2. The answer is simple. The means to hand of this early period were limited. Indian ocean travel by Arab dhows was simple, governed by the trade winds coming down with one. Six months later blown back by the reversal in direction of the trade wind. This regular alteration of winds is due to whether the sun is north or south of the equator. When the sun is on the equator the winds are erratic. Occasionally the trade winds partially fail. Then little or no rain, so famine in that area.

3. Why, North of Mombassa to Aden, little or no penetration. Apart from the coast line more or less inhospitable semi desert, for two hundred miles or more.

4. What of the Southern limit. This is about Sofala. Only the daring owners of dhows, reach here, as South of here Trade winds fail, also can strand a dhow for nine months. The importance of this, that East Africa was penetrated from Mombassa to Sofala. What was the reason for this penetration. In the main two commodities, slaves and ivory, gold probably filtered out spasmodically over many centuries. Of the first two there was a good supply. If it could be taken.

5. Sixty years ago the writer met two who had twenty years before taken part, not for slaves, but ivory and cattle. The system being simplicity and successful was more than probable the one that went back untold years.

6. This area of Africa was up to the writer's time occupied by a large number of differing tribes of Bantu stock, none of formidable numbers. Traditions of African empires could only have been originated where providence produced a phenomenal individual who could create by force a kingdom, also hold — it died with him.

7. Into this area came the Arab invaders from their dhows. They did not come in large forces but as far more formidably armed bodies than the local tribes, but would have been impotent against a generally hostile countryside. But the Arab leaders made use of the hostility between the local tribes by bargaining with a local chief that if he organised that chiefs raid on his neighbours supporting it by his powerfully armed party success was certain.

8. Of the spoil, the local chief, winner in the contest wanted neither the slaves or ivory and to great a hoard of ivory was dangerous, but coveted all the livestock, not much use to the Arab. The slaves carried the ivory to the dhows at the coast. These Arab slavers were feared so their passage to the coast was not interfered with, no tribe knowing when they would require their help against a neighbour, though every African hated the Arab.

9. This system of existence in this area bad though it was, held no hope of alteration, till the British Navy policed the Indian Ocean, halting and searching dhows, made this traffic not worth while.

10. This outline of a long history of this part of Africa seems essential. As to the African with their history handed down orally a headman, must have created in their mentality a sort of fatalism.

11. Without wishing in any way to decry Livingstone, his wanderings in this part of Africa was possible. He wanted nothing, could help to cure illness and did so. His outcry against slavery left the Arabs cold, as he would do nothing effective against them his destruction by them certain to be reported by the natives to the coast, so just left alone, or even helped with supplies, Livingstone was probably regarded as fey, he wanted nothing but a little food and gave help in sickness so could go to many parts, not everywhere at all times. His personal servants or followers took care he did not go where it was unwise, as their existence was at stake.

12. All the African chiefs had witch doctors in their entourage, the most important part. Nothing could be done without them. The comparative mentality between Chief and witch doctor determined the way things went. War or peace, drought, flood, or malefactors, the witch doctors omens or pronouncements were an absolute necessity. So the relative ability of Chief or witch doctor was a big factor.

13. To come down to the European entry on this complex Lobengula successor to Mazilikaze entered on a country devastated by his father (a refugee with his impi from Zululand) who yearly sent his young men raiding. To become a warrior and a man he had to have killed. So from the Limpopo to the Zambesi was heavily depopulated in what was known as Matabeleland and Mashonaland.

14. So the British South Africa Company came into an area with a fraction of its former population. What was the African like when the European came. He was of course completely ignorant of his ways in every form and had to learn how to train oxen, inspan them in a wagon, also learn to drive it. This 70 years ago.

15. As the African progresses in civilisation the more quick witted learned to read and write at a mission station. Why? You cannot blame him. He had learnt from the African brought up from the Cape Colony, that if you wanted for any reason to leave any employment at a moment's notice, your registration certificate — a mysterious document but obligatory — had to be endorsed by the employer, as to how long you would work for, also for what wages. In this a protection to African work could become intolerable at short notice to the African, after the first novelty. So to just sit in the sun only became imperative. This could be done by giving the Cape African a shilling from your wages. He could write, and forging your employer's signature, sometimes well, or badly; if the latter, it being done after sundown, there was a plausible reason perhaps.

16. The easily earned wealth was attractive to the Rhodesian African, so it was little trouble to become a convert, if this valuable knowledge could be taught to one. So the Africans at Mission Schools were not often as the missionary hoped. You can hardly blame either. One had no standards. How could he. The Missionary full of hope and goodwill over estimated his convert.

17. Now the next stage. When a sufficient writer, one could write a note for a bottle of Cape Brandy, forging the signature of a local European who sent his houseboy with a note and cash for the bottle. As there was a big thirst for the white man's prohibited spirits, often a pound was the price for such a letter, coming down with more numerous writers.

18. With the African it was impossible to consider perjury in any court proceedings.

19. The African view of the answer to any question was a question of policy. To say to those in authority what he thought would please. If it incriminated anyone. He was not there so he knew nothing. When confronted, would glibly say some other tale expecting it to be taken for granted his first reply was untrue with his second tale quite likely improbable and so on indefinitely. The African view also ineradicable. Why should I tell the truth. I might let myself in for trouble.

20. A large number of Africans have a wonderfully retentive memory, being able to quote even chapters of a text book so being able to pass exams where quoting text books will do.

21. The average African is a happy-go-lucky individual prone to laughter. Being the survival of the fittest, he is tough in many ways, but mentally he would just take his blanket go out into the bush and die if the witch doctor so decreed. This up to the time of industrial development in the towns. Thus only since 1946 before that the Africans in town locations was not large as now. How the African will respond to modern industrialisation is perhaps a problem not easily solved. Certainly not by decrees from Whitehall. But with the quality of the Europeans in the area, with the extent of industrialisation with its rate of expansion. If this is fast enough it may keep pace with the very rapid increase of African population. A set back in the expansion of industry, population will overtake the demand for labour, with perhaps a lowering of wages leading to trouble.

22. As to the African with some education who aspires to political leadership his inheritance of domination by the witch doctor a very potent factor up to less than 30 years ago, must be a big influence on the would be African politician. Another characteristic is to make inordinate demands that he really never expects fulfilled but as a means of obtaining the utmost he can.

23. In the emergence of nationalism in its very different forms even in Western Europe, but far more so elsewhere as in these countries where a new dominant section have to all intents enslaved the majority under an iron rule where no democratic opposition party can exist but is ruthlessly exterminated. This is so much akin to tribal domination that experiments in political freedom with a backward race, who could not tolerate an opposition in the political sphere, would end in disaster.

24. Where what is regarded as a progressive democratic state exists, there are two or more political parties, who can argue out their destiny, are, or can be put temporarily in power by the general electorate, who by common will would not tolerate one party murdering the others. Where such has occurred, by domination of military forces to uphold one political party indefinitely no freedom can exist.

25. Here in the Federation if the African had political power with complete control of police and military forces there could be no other end but complete disaster.

26. A satisfactory democratic state is of necessity a matter of slow growth over the centuries. As an experiment an entirely elected set of politicians of local Africans, entirely financed by themselves, but with no powers could criticise the Government in power, formulate their policy. The actual Government could print their Hansard if no more voluminous. This would be necessary as loquacity would tend to thousands of pages.

27. The numbers of Africans with a university education is practically negligible here. The more or less self appointed African leaders come from the rank and file not from the Chiefs, headmen, and elders of tribes, so there is a clash between them. But if there is a demand for more of anything both wait to see if success takes place. If so the waiting party wades in for their share.

28. Should the troubles in Nyasaland not have been firmly handled at once, indecision would have brought in many more rapidly if there was loot to be obtained unchecked. The African respects force only, so if it is only used promptly, with moderation, 90% of the Africans are quite satisfied.

29. To my mind the test for self government is for two or more political parties to be able to argue out matters without the majority party murdering opponents or of penalising them. By this standard the African in the Federation has by no means arrived at this stage.

30. It is also necessary to analyse the Federation area in its economy. As this was an outcome of the Union of South Africa also in many ways similar, its outline ought to be included, with some comparison to West Africa, also largely Bantu which is rapidly becoming self governing.

31. From the Congo to the Cape this part of Africa is mostly high table land in consequence its river drainage systems with no possibility of navigable rivers the rainfall being largely heavy storms the discharge of such rainfall is rapid on the steep grade of the rivers in consequence soil erosion is rapid and severe. The result is no deposit of soil worthwhile, it can be compared to the erosion of the Abyssinian mountain plateau with its ground up soil taken to the Nile Delta. So Southern Africa is very low on the worlds list of agricultural areas. Had it been high, the population would have been like India or China an impossibility here.

32. Africa south of the Congo was worthless for trade, so neglected, till diamonds, then gold, finally base minerals, uranium, manganese, copper, etc. This caused the rise of Southern Africa with a very low African population.

33. The exploitation of great mineral wealth under conditions far beyond the capacity of Bantu to work, has been responsible for the rise to prominence here, with the ample employment for the African, also feeding him, has resulted in the remarkable rise in the population of Bantu.

34. Take the conditions of West Africa. For some centuries there has been an ever increasing trade in cocoa, palm oil, ground nuts and other vegetable products. All produced by the African.

35. European intervention here has been official to maintain order. Latterly by the latest scientific methods to eradicate disease, also improve vegetable exports. Europeans in this area were essentially traders, exporters of very considerable value, all produced by the African. Now the officials who kept order with those being scientists who stimulated output and instituted better methods are going. Traders only remain. For fifty years Africans from West Africa have been trained in ever increasing numbers in Universities. It remains to be seen what they can make of their country politically and commercial output. Miss Huxley's book 'Four Guineas' is not very certain of the outcome. Here in Southern Africa, where at the base of the economy is mineral wealth, employing vast capital, and technical work, no Bantu has ever tackled any of the chemical side.

36. In a sentence. Southern Africa immense mineral wealth. West Africa great tropical vegetable wealth produced by the African unaided.

Memorandum (ii)

F. E. B. FRIPP

To possibly help the Nyasaland impasse may the following suggestion be of any use. It could only come from the Commissioners and the Governor of Nyasaland it would be completely suspect from a Federal source even Federal members of the Commission as it contains an element of idealism.

The only outside contribution would be a widespread record of appreciation of the fact of the generally greater ability of Nyasaland migratory labour. (This I can personally vouch for over more than thirty years).

Would the Governor of Nyasaland and the Commission put forward to the African leaders of Nyasaland for their consideration the outstanding fact that the ability of their people in competition with other African races is high and in this their greatest asset lies, as up to the present time no important mineral wealth has been found in Nyasaland.

The greater ability of the Nyasaland African as artisan, rising to technician would be the largest field.

If Nyasaland leaders could take this view while urging still more and more efficiency to their people so that they held the position of head of the skilled and kept there, they would hold a position in the Federation of envy to others.

If in the Federation the financial and educational aid would one feels sure be forthcoming. By leaving the Federation such help could hardly be expected, or even if proficient have rights here, becoming aliens, with S. Africa their best market. I feel sure the Nyasaland African could do it if he has the chance to learn and be a steady worker. But will their political leaders favour this opportunity or frantically strive for personal powers and position at whatever cost to their people?

Oral Evidence

F. E. B. FRIPP

The witness had submitted two memoranda. He said that he was close on 85, and that therefore it made no difference to him if his views were published. He had been in the country since the end of 1895. He had presented his first memorandum because he considered that an outline of origins was necessary.

He invited the Commission to consider the population of Southern Rhodesia. Msiklikazi and Lobengula had practically decimated the local population. When the Europeans came in they had to introduce labour. The Matabele were only interested in fighting and cattle. So a certain number of Africans came up from the Cape. Old maps showed "special Fingo location north of Bulawayo". Very large numbers were also brought in from Portuguese East Africa and Nyasaland. The native population of Southern Rhodesia had thus been derived from neighbouring areas and from the Cape. They were not a homogeneous native race.

He considered that the record of Southern Rhodesia had been fairly good. There had always been in every British colony of which he knew disappointment over the slowness of the Colonial Office in understanding what was really happening on the spot. He, and his wife, who knew many of the heads of the Colonial Office, considered that they did not know local conditions, and that they did not know whom to trust. He had, therefore been struck by the delay and difference of opinion between the Colonial Office and the local people. His experience of this dated back for 40 years. He thought that the record of Southern Rhodesia taken all round had been very fair. If Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia could be more or less incorporated into Southern Rhodesia it would be best for all. Southern Rhodesia had had to look to Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland controlled by the Colonial Office, each with its own Governor. He would like there to be one Government, and not four. It would be a better Government, with representatives of all parts sitting together, and not three Territorial Assemblies and a Federal Assembly. But Southern Rhodesia should have the greater representation on a population basis. He wanted a complete union, on the model of South Africa, where before union there had always been trouble between the Governments; it had been the same in Australia. This union would make a far better buffer against South Africa. The Dutch view (viz in South Africa) was mistaken. The Dutch had made the same mistakes in the East in Indonesia. The Dutch were not quite suited for colonisation. Thus he wanted the constitutional pattern of South Africa, but not its racial policy. He had known old Voortrekkers, who simply handed out the Bible and regarded Africans as the children of Ham.

In reply to questions Mr. Fripp made the following further points:—

(1) He would like the franchise to be as high as possible. Of the Africans, 1% would represent 10,000 in 1,000,000 or 70,000 in the native population of 7,000,000. But there were not 70,000 Africans with the Higher School Certificate standard. It had to be remembered also that the Africans with knowledge handed down orally had acquired a wonderful memory; and hence could gain success in examinations based on text books. He admitted that not a very high percentage of Europeans would pass the same test. But Europeans had lived longer with the constitutional governments. Also the temperament of the African was different. It was oriental. He would ask ten times the price which he would be ultimately willing to accept.

(2) He would give greater representation to Southern Rhodesia because its population had the most experience of government. He was taking the Europeans as representing the population because so far the Europeans had been the government. They had not ill-treated the natives. They were quite different from South Africa.

(3) Referring to the statement in paragraph 28 of his first memorandum "The African respects force only, so if it is only used promptly, with moderation, 90% of the Africans are quite satisfied". He wanted to clarify this. The bulk of the Africans, if they got fair conditions of employment, wages, living conditions and security, did not want disturbances. But there were some who did not want to work and were quite liable to break the law, because they wanted easy living at some one else's expense. Some others wanted to control the rest through intimidation. This was true of whites and native races alike. It was only a small percentage, say 2%, who were willing to go to the extremes, through intimidation. This happened at home, amongst the labour: a few tried to dominate the many.

(4) The Commission should remember that every African of 30 years of age or more had grown up with the witch doctor as a regular part of kraal life. Looking at West Africa, and especially Ghana, he saw it drifting back to autocracy. But Ghana and West Africa could not really be compared with Central Africa. To have a comfortable population with easy living, depended on what they could produce. In West Africa the agriculture of the country was in the hands of the African population. In South Africa there were high altitudes and uncertain rainfall, inevitably causing erosion. In the West the African rivers were navigable, with no rapid drainage and consequently no loss of soil. Without its minerals Southern Rhodesia would be useless. The parts which carried a large population could grow quite a lot of food, and there the population had increased up to the food capacity of its people. When he had first come out to South Africa, he had found the African population round the coast with better agriculture than at present. African races did not dig wells and were therefore unable to support themselves in dry areas.

(5) The African was far more dependent on the European, his knowledge, skill and capital than the reverse. He agreed that the Africans claim to equality, if the African could come up to the standards required, was fully acceptable. He also agreed that the Africans had a right to be in Rhodesia, just as any Europeans who had come in. Nevertheless most of the Africans had come into the country since its occupation. But in respect of voting he felt that the educational standard was essential.

(6) One trouble was that the Africans had not yet really experienced the conditions of the European working class. He had not heard yet of any Africans taking a five year apprenticeship course in any trade: they wanted to gain the status in a trade in five minutes. He considered that the discipline of a five years apprenticeship would be of great value.

E. F. ROBERTS

Mr. Roberts stated he was 64 years of age and that during his lifetime he had been in most of the Services. He had come to Africa in 1922, and to Southern Rhodesia four years later. He was a smallworker miner and latterly a production engineer. At the moment, he was living in Bulawayo.

Mr. Roberts stated that he was strongly opposed to Federation in the first instance on the grounds that before it was introduced no "reconnaissance" had been made. Now, however, he firmly believed that the Federation should carry on notwithstanding the lack of planning originally. He held the view that against the heavy odds that this lack of planning created, the Federation had met with some success.

The trouble in this part of the world, Mr. Roberts stated, had arisen very largely through newspapers. He himself had seen the ridiculous exaggerations which newspapers were prepared to print or for that matter the depths they were prepared to sink to. He thought that it was important that a complete survey of the Federation should be made now which would embrace a study of the whole of the Federation's problems. On amendments to the Constitution, the witness said that he would not be prepared to say a word until he had made and studied the survey he referred to. This would take time but he was quit: unable to see any quick changes on the immediate horizon. In any event, quick changes always tended to make the races upset one another. He thought that the Federation should be given time and went on to say that this time could be attained because of the not altogether unsatisfactory relations that existed between white and black in the country. He said that in labour relations he had never encountered any problems.

P. T. MPEDZISI

Mr. Mpedzisi said that he was born in Southern Rhodesia and had been employed for some years as an agricultural demonstrator in the Native Reserves. For the past five years he had been employed by Rhodesia Railways as a social welfare supervisor.

He saw Federation as a baby growing up; like other babies it had a number of disabilities and also some advantages. The advantages were improvements in hospital services, clinics, roads and bridges, and better methods of farming. In addition a good start had been made on education services. In the urban districts the municipalities were making good homes and were providing sports and recreation for the people.

The disadvantages were considerable, however. Although propaganda had said how good Federation would be, it was like a baby paralysed in one leg and arm. Africans were denied by the white population what they had expected from Federation. For fifty years Europeans had said that Africans were not mature. It was difficult to believe that they would ever admit that Africans were mature. A great many insulting words and phrases were used. For example, his wife resented being addressed as "Mammy". He himself was often called "boy" even though he could not believe that he looked like a boy. Africans only seemed to be respected when the people knew who they were—even Members of Parliament were insulted by being addressed in derogatory terms.

Like other people, Africans wanted good homes. Unfortunately, the wage structure was at present so worked that Africans could not develop themselves. For example, on the railways, much better paid than many other industries, average wages amounted to £6.10s. a month, plus £1 rent allowance. Often rent came to £1. 10s. or more, and if an African wanted to enter a house ownership scheme he had to pay £3. 11s. 3d. a month for a house worth about £300.

In the rural areas, too, Africans suffered from grave disabilities. Often the soils were not good and it was difficult for a man to earn enough to support his wife and family on a plot of perhaps six acres holding perhaps six cattle. Sometimes they lived next to Europeans having thousands of acres to themselves with many head of cattle. It was unfair that Africans should only be permitted to hold a limited number of cattle when there were perhaps many acres of European land which was not fully used.

There was discrimination against African advancement in both the Police and Native Affairs Department. In the Police, an African constable wore the same uniform of khaki shorts and tunic all the year round. Europeans had summer and winter uniforms. An African constable might work for twenty years without getting the pay and advantages of the youngest European constable. For instance, he probably still had to make his round on a bicycle whereas the European constable was given a motor cycle.

In the Native Affairs Department he had not heard of an African being appointed Assistant Native Commissioner; so far as he knew there was none in higher ranks than senior clerk/interpreter. Nor had he heard of an African typist. In the Railways African Affairs Department, an African senior clerk did all the writing in connection with issuing passes, preparing records, etc.; the white man merely put his signature on the bottom of what the African had done. In the whole railways administration jobs were mainly divided between white jobs and black jobs. Often Italian and Portuguese immigrants who could hardly write came in to supervise African track gangers of considerable experience.

In many countries there were agitators. But it was necessary to enquire what made them nationalistic. In Southern Rhodesia it was the disabilities which he had mentioned. There were still many detainees locked in cells so that they could not answer back. The colour bar caused people to lose interest and confidence—they were tired of promises which did not mature. Such promises impaired the relationship between white and black people. Nevertheless, there were not many Africans who wanted to get rid of all the Europeans—they had lived together as children. The difficulty was that Europeans sometimes forgot how much they had learned from Africans.

In answer to questions, the witness made the following further points:—

- (a) It was not always true that Africans found it difficult to control or supervise other Africans. There were many cases of African headmasters who had no difficulty in controlling staffs of perhaps 15, together with 800 children.
- (b) It was true that wages had to be related to productivity and that African productivity was not always as high as European. Nevertheless, there were many cases where this was not the case where African productivity was very good.
- (c) It was difficult to make laws to force people to act in a particular way, e.g. to abolish the colour bar. But there was a need to convince the ordinary European in the street to use common sense in race relations, and the Government and prominent citizens should take a lead.

(d) Not all Africans wanted to see the end of Federation. Many preferred the devil they knew. There was the additional point that if Southern Rhodesia turned towards the Union of South Africa, this would really frighten the Africans in the Federation.

(e) It was essential that Africans should be better represented in both the Federal and Territorial Parliaments. It was not adequate that Africans should be represented in Parliament by a European. Although it was not necessarily desirable to go straight to an African majority, African representation should bear some relation to the populations of the Territories concerned.

W. KANUKAI

Mr. Kanukai said that he was born and bred in Southern Rhodesia. He was a salesman. What he said was his own personal view.

Big economic strides had been made in Southern Rhodesia since Federation. Africans were better off now than they had ever been under the Territorial Governments. Federation was a benefit to all the people as long as the declared policy of partnership was implemented. This was not being done at the present time.

The best way to improve the position would be to amend the franchise laws to include more Africans. The witness wanted a vote himself, but was unable to obtain it because he could not at present reach the means qualification. He did not advocate 'one man, one vote'. A reasonable standard of education (say, Standard IV or VI), coupled with a certain means test, would be suitable. The important thing was to bring more people onto the voters' rolls.

In answer to questions, Mr. Kanukai made the following further points:—

- (a) It was true that some people did not trouble to get themselves registered as voters; against these, there were many who would like to vote if they could reach the desired qualification. He himself had passed Standard VII and was studying privately for Standard VIII. He was 23 years of age.
- (b) On the implementation of partnership he thought that places of entertainment should be open to all races. Discrimination in post offices had recently ceased, though some post offices in rural districts still maintained separate counters.
- (c) There should be some Africans representing African interests in the Southern Rhodesia Parliament. It was wrong to have Europeans representing Africans, since they could not know the needs of Africans as well as Africans did.

W. DAVIES

Mr. Davies said that he had come to Southern Rhodesia in 1900 and had at one time been an active member, with his brother, of the Southern Rhodesia Labour Party.

Mr. Davies made the following points:—

- (a) Immigrants from South Africa had always outnumbered those from the United Kingdom. If there were at any time a referendum on the subject of incorporation in the Union, the population of direct British descent would always be outnumbered by those of South African origin.
- (b) The average Southern Rhodesia Africans did not understand what Federation was. But they did not want to lose United Kingdom protection, which they felt protected them from the local Governments and from possible incorporation in the Union of South Africa. For this reason the United Kingdom Government must never abandon its right to veto anti-native legislation, as had happened in the Union.
- (c) The advancement made by Africans in the past fifty years had been a very great credit to the British administration.
- (d) The witness did not exclude all political advancement for Africans in Southern Rhodesia; the important thing was that they should not dominate the Europeans. The cost of maintaining security in Nyasaland as a direct result of Dr. Banda's activities had amounted to over £1 million.
- (e) The danger was that Britain would try to advance the African too quickly and too far. 'One man, one vote' was out of the question because it would swamp the European.
- (f) If there was any external interference with the status of Southern Rhodesia, Southern Rhodesia would seek incorporation in the Union of South Africa.

Addendum to oral evidence

W. DAVIES

I forward a few notes which I trust may contribute to the evidence I gave on Saturday. There may be one or two points which may interest you; if so, that is all I ask.

I am sure that nothing but good will result from your visit.

Memorandum

Two reports, the Devlin and Beadle, offer interesting conclusions on the Nyasaland trouble. The latter has the advantage of being compiled by two gentlemen with the advantage of having long and frequent experience of trying criminal cases, in which Africans have been involved, and comparison of the two leaves no room for doubt that the conclusions arrived at, particularly in connection with Dr. Banda, are correct and fair. This person's conduct since release has confirmed this, and the end of the report amply justifies the conclusions arrived at. This man, after many years absence, returns to Nyasaland, unable to speak the native language, and sows the seeds of discord and lawlessness, involving loss of life and costing the country millions. His future is now being shaped by a visit to America where he will gather fresh ideas to create further trouble. In my humble opinion he will probably be declared a prohibited immigrant.

I wrote the following in an article five years ago—"Northern Rhodesia is the weak link in Federation and needs careful watching". This was based by the fact that on the Copper Belt by far the greater number of residents are from South Africa, here for the express purpose of creating trouble. This territory is next on the list and unrest there is acute. Here in Southern Rhodesia the same sinister influence is at work but with little hope of success, and events in South Africa will to some extent neutralise further efforts, but the position will want careful watching. The Press is run by a South African monopoly. Our Broadcasting Studio is full of South Africans. Sport is influenced by South Africans. One recent incident only at a Scout Rally held about twelve months ago. His Excellency, the Governor Vice-Admiral Sir William Powlett took the salute. Die Stem, the South African National Anthem, was sung followed by The Queen. Sir William said "I like Die Stem but we have one national anthem here, The Queen". He refused rightly to salute the other. He had spent some years in charge of Simons Town Dockyard. Last year I returned from a holiday at Capetown and in the compartment was an eminently respectable Scot who was told on leaving the Dockyard on its being taken over by South Africa "We have got you out of the Dockyard, now we'll get you out of Simons Town". The present trouble there will I feel sure prevent them doing so, and I have no fear for the future.

You will, I am sure, realise from the above that we are faced by difficulties created firstly by South Africa, secondly, by internal political influence, and thirdly, by unrest created by this and Banda's hostility.

Set off against this is the evidence surrounding you of the beneficial influence of less than 100 years of British influence. This has been to the advantage of the entire population, native and white. The two great cities you visit here are examples of such progress that are without doubt unequalled in British Colonial history. The benefits have been of inestimable value to the Natives in rescuing them from a condition of ignorance, insecurity, inter-tribal warfare, superstition and hopelessness. In the nearly fifty years of residence I have seen progress in all directions. When I arrived in 1911, I saw a ramshackle collection of tin houses, poor natives badly clothed, housed in huts of grass, with no religious or medical services, no schools, no hospitals.

In this period we have visibly improved the Native status and we have every reason to be proud of our achievements. Egypt with 5,000 years of their civilization can show nothing compared with it.

Yet there are those who now desire to take over the work and they are utterly incompetent to do so. In my residence in Rhodesia I have never met one Native who has complained of their social condition and are contented with their condition.

One is justified in asking "What defence could the 8 million Natives offer if Russia steps in, what could they do in advancing the Federation, what steps could they take to meet the growing population of Nyasaland, with a population of 3 million in a Territory of 49,000 square miles, compared with Northern Rhodesia's and Southern Rhodesia's 150,000 square miles?" 12,000 square miles of Nyasaland is water, so that Northern Rhodesia must be prepared to provide land in the foreseeable future for Nyasaland Native occupation from its 287,000 square miles. You will have met Sir M. Lewanika, son of a fine ruler, who would I think be prepared to consider this. If not, there is now in progress a reclamation scheme in progress in Northern Rhodesia offering vast possibilities.

This leads to a very interesting event which occurred during Mr. Macmillan's visit. At Peretsburg, near the Rhodesian border, he was appointed Head Chief of Natives. This is an honour never before bestowed, and in my opinion offers a definite opportunity for further consideration. The Governor-General of South Africa is appointed to this position but not by the Chiefs, and he would not receive any attention if he went amongst them. The underlying motives inspiring Mr. Macmillan's choice are first and foremost that he came from the Queen, secondly, his personality. He did a lot of good by his visit. To meet the Natives say in Bechuana-land, seeing Chiefs from all parts of the Union and Federation, would do good. The cost would not be prohibitive, probably £1,000 per annum, and it would mean that Native Chiefs from all parts of Southern Africa, Basutos, Zulus, from whom in my opinion a very large percentage of our Natives in the Federation fled after the Chaka events of, I believe, about 1830 when he ordered them to destroy their cattle and constitute the present mixture of Native races in the Federation whose arrival gives them a period of say 60 years before the advent of White settlers. At that time it is interesting to read that the capital of the Basuto race was Zeerust, Pretoria, the capital of the Matabele (vide "The Far Interior" by Tabler, published by Balkeme, 1955). For what it is worth I give it as my opinion that the Matabele are most typical of the Zulus, Mashonas of the Basutos, but their characteristics have been profoundly affected by the influence of children and prisoners captured by them in their migration. One peculiar fact is that their name for the Victoria Falls is pure Hebrew "Msiogatunva, the smoke that thunders". I have seen many proofs of the maintenance of Biblical ceremonies amongst them, and there are words used "Bona Sacca" which are found in Latin. The Basutos also have many of the old Testament practices such as not muzzling the Ox that treadeth the corn.

Finally, I believe that the percentage of educated amongst the various tribes embraced in Federation to be 50 per cent in Southern Rhodesia, 30 per cent in Northern Rhodesia, 10 per cent in Nyasaland, and having regard to the franchise in Britain not being granted until about 1864 when Mr. Gladstone laid down the salient qualifications as being (in addition to property qualifications) "self-command, patience under suffering, regard for authority, ability to read and write, and not a natural right but a privilege to be earned". In a recent publication "Modern forms of Government" (Michael Stewart), he gives the following—"An abundance of people with education and sense at all its levels and a general willingness amongst all its people to understand and co-operate with each other". Very different is the claim of Mr. Nathan Shamayarma at Salisbury speaking at the University to which neither he nor any of our educated Africans have contributed a penny. "Whites have the right to say as equal citizens whose property would be respected by Government (Black)". We have only his word for it. Here are a few examples of things I have seen.

This I did not see but the information was given by a Chemist who knew the facts. Shortly before my arrival at Capetown in 1900 an epidemic of small pox struck the coloured district of Capetown. White nurses risked life in their ministry to those affected.

It was compulsory to hang carbolised sheets at the doors. When a death occurred the sheets were taken down and the sheets used were hung at the doors, thus exposing the devoted women to the dread disease. The following I personally saw. In 1906 the railway to and from Capetown ran along the beach. The fare was 3d. return, and the coloured servants of Sea Point in their hundreds availed themselves on Sundays of this service and would stand in groups on Monument Station for the return journey. When the train was shunted in they would scatter and each would go into a carriage, and laugh at Europeans wishing to travel in compartments apart from the coloured. This apartheid is still prevalent. On another occasion I travelled in a bus with a Major wearing the King's uniform. We sat on the seat near the door when a Coloured woman entered and said "Move up you white bastards, my tickey (3d.) is as good as yours".

About 1905 I attended a meeting of St. Mary's (English) Church at Woodstock which provided sick and unemployment benefits to its Coloured members, removed all white officers from office and voted in Coloureds to replace them.

The progress of the Federation for the six years it has existed is remarkable and in my humble opinion the extension of the franchise should not be effected for many years. The African population has advanced in the period I have lived in Rhodesia to a remarkable extent, as you will have realised in your visits to the various institutions you have and will see during the remainder of your stay, and I have no doubt of the beneficial results of your deliberations.

I sincerely believe that Federation is but the first step towards a future of unlimited opportunities. As an instance we must have an outlet to the sea. We cannot exist as a landlocked country; this is vital. Other possibilities present themselves which will profoundly affect our future and that of Britain.

BULAWAYO

11TH APRIL 1960

Memorandum

BULAWAYO CITY COUNCIL.

Part I

African Affairs

1. It is commonly asserted that one of the reasons for African hostility from Northern Rhodesia and especially Nyasaland to the Federation is the fear that the association of their countries with Southern Rhodesia in a Federation will lead to the spread of Southern Rhodesian practices to the two Northern Territories. More specifically, they fear the introduction of the Southern Rhodesian Pass Laws and Land Apportionment Laws. Doubtless the Commission will be investigating the accuracy of these reports and the validity of these fears.

2. It is hoped that the Commission will be able to assure itself and perhaps the Northern Territories that these fears are unfounded on two grounds.

3. One is strictly constitutional, in that these are Territorial matters which are entirely within the control of the Territorial Governments, which will eventually be autonomous and in respect of which there will be adequate representation.

4. The other is that these laws are not designedly inimical to African interests. They arise from sociological necessity, and will pass—and, in fact, are passing—as that necessity disappears. In Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland the same situation either does not arise, or in so far as it does, is being dealt with in the same way, though somewhat disguised.

5. It would not be appropriate for a Local Authority to undertake the defence of national policy. But the Bulawayo City Council, which is intimately concerned with the realities of the situation, feels that certain facts should be brought to the Commission's attention in the hope that its dispassionate understanding will enable it to dispel some of the doubts and fears which misunderstanding, misrepresentation and perhaps earlier experience may have created. These facts are dealt with under the following headings:—

- (1) The City's Housing, Health and Welfare Services;
- (2) The application of the discriminatory laws referred to above and their modification;
- (3) African participation in local affairs.

(1) Housing, Health and Welfare:

6. The stereotype of the Rhodesian "settler" is often that of a pith helmeted, whisky drinking, sjambok swinging, sunburnt white man, who imperiously dominates naked or poverty stricken black savages, and pays little attention to their spiritual or physical needs. It is hoped that the Commission will tour Bulawayo to see for themselves how far removed this is from actuality. In fact, such a visit, to which should be devoted at least one day, is essential to proper appreciation of the facts.

7. The Bulawayo City Council has made enormous efforts to provide African housing, health and welfare services. Indeed, these are second to none in Africa, in quality and quantity.

8. Prior to the last War, Bulawayo, like most Rhodesian towns, was a small backwater, where little happened. African schools and health services were in their infancy, and dependent entirely on Missions and private welfare agencies, the great majority of the local Africans were migrant males who left their families in the country, and very few had any intention of settling permanently in town or forming an integral part of the urban community. The War stimulated enormous growth of industry, and radically altered the picture. The working population trebled itself in 15 years from 21,000 males in 1940 to 63,000 in 1956, and brought in its train many problems of the industrial revolution that have been encountered elsewhere.

9. The most urgent of these was the need for housing. The following figures show how energetically this was tackled:

	Single Men	Single Women	Family
Built prior to 1949 (July)	10,400	61	1,854
Built 1949 - 1959	14,814	72	7,634
		(+ 600 (Railways))
Actually under Construction
- 1960 (February)	1,326	—	340
Planned to start 1960	3,000	—	3,000

10. The present backlog is approximately 5,000 houses for families, and replacement of unsatisfactory accommodation occupied by an equal number of single men, and this, it is hoped, will be largely resolved in the next two or three years.

11. The provision of amenities of all kinds has proceeded pari passu. Hospitals, clinics, clubrooms, halls, playing fields and swimming baths have been built by the Council—(schools are provided by the Government). The programme of development is not complete—no programme ever is in a rapidly developing country—but it is keeping pace with, and in some ways is even slightly ahead of needs. In the field of education, for instance, the position has been reached where every Bulawayo African child of school-going age can find a place in school. If it is realised that all this has been built up from scratch, with practically no preliminary development in the way of long established basic services or traditional skills, training and knowledge, the magnitude of what is being done would be the better appreciated. Details of the amounts spent on health, welfare and recreation are given below:

Year	Health	Recreation/ Welfare	Total
1950	15,573	24,833	40,406
1951	17,797	36,886	54,683
1952	44,337	41,873	86,210
1953	35,295	48,257	83,552
1954	21,075	61,225	82,300
1955	21,492	62,829	84,321
1956	23,237	79,940	103,177
1957	35,764	90,972	126,736
1958	67,681	121,986	189,667
1959	71,359	185,602	256,961
Planned for 1960	121,874	247,859	369,733
Total:	475,484	1,002,262	1,477,746

12. The quality and variety of the social services provided have been steadily improving to keep pace with the increasing African differentiation and sophistication. A generation ago there was scarcely an African in the town who thought of it as home, or who was not content with the same simple amenities he had been used to in the country—and there was scarcely a teacher, minister, professional or businessman of more than rudimentary education and experience. Now there are thousands who will live nowhere else, hundreds with secondary or higher education, and scores with overseas experience or four figure incomes. To meet their needs, better homes and services are provided, and they have opportunities to develop their own interests as their taste and pocket dictate.

(2) Discriminatory Laws:

13. All the above has been done on a segregated basis. Is that very terrible? Before condemning this outright, as is so often done, perhaps the Commission will pause to look at it in perspective and weigh the pros as well as the cons.

14. Racial segregation is a form of social operation which is a universal aspect of community life. Presumably as such it is acceptable, and that it only becomes damnable when it becomes discriminatory in the sense of being a differentiating measure that is imposed unfavourably by one party on the other. If this postulate is agreed, the system of residential segregation can be defended on the grounds that it enabled like to live with like, and has prevented friction between the races. The facts are that Africans and Europeans had very different ways of life and standards, and that undue juxtaposition did lead to conflict and irritation. Moreover, the statutory provision whereby local authorities were made responsible for African housing has helped enormously to alleviate and prevent the slums that have been created by private exploitation and public neglect in so many countries, Africa not excluded.

15. It should, indeed, never be forgotten that the Land Apportionment Act which creates residential segregation was originally introduced with the approval of African and European liberal opinion alike, and the endorsement of a Labour Government in the United Kingdom. Its original objects were to prevent racial friction, and to prevent Africans being tempted to dispose of their land to Europeans, as many were doing.

16. To these two benefits, a third may now be added, Increasing economic development and education are opening up new opportunities for Africans in trade and the enjoyment of higher standards of living. Segregation gives them the advantage of protection—African businessmen can, and now do, acquire experience and capital in the African areas that would be denied to all but a tiny few exceptionally gifted traders if they were in open competition with non-Africans. There is scarcely a single African who would like to see the restriction on non-African trade in the African townships removed.

17. So, too, though perhaps to a less degree, the development of home ownership has been fostered by African schemes being separate from European schemes, as they have been subsidised in various ways and protected from expensive competition for land. But these very developments are now outmoding the Act as it stands. The Bulawayo City Council itself has for several years advocated the granting of freehold rights to Africans in the urban townships. (It is understood that the necessary amendments to the Act will soon be promulgated).

18. Other modifications to the Act have been proposed, such as the removal of all race restrictions to the occupation or ownership of land in central City areas zoned for residential and business purposes. But this leads into the realm of political speculation. The essential point which the Bulawayo City Council wishes to make is that differential legislation such as the Land Apportionment Act is not necessarily inimical to African interests, and that it—and the political bona fides of Rhodesia—should be judged in the social context of the Act, by the effects it has had and is having on African interests, by the reasons for its introduction and by current attitudes towards its modification.

19. The same considerations apply to the Pass Laws—they have been represented as shackles on African movement, designed to curtail African liberty and development. Undoubtedly, there was an element of control in their introduction—but this was not confined to Southern Rhodesia. Similar restrictions on movement are to be found in some shape or other in pretty well every African Territory. Besides this there are administrative reasons which necessitated the introduction of some sort of identity document.

20. With industrialisation and the townward drift of the rural population, the system also provides a useful check on the undue accumulation of idle and unemployed in the towns. This has had several advantages to all sections of the community, and has contributed to the creation of a more stable community than has occurred in many other Territories, who have been plagued by large numbers of lawless, rootless, young men.

21. But in spite of its advantages, this system, too, is getting out of date, and its modification is being actively considered at the moment. Some changes are suggested by the African Urban Affairs Commission, 1958. Others put forward by some Local Authorities include the total abolition of passes and their replacement by local Employment Bureaux.

(3) African Participation in Local Affairs:

22. Here, too, the time perspective will help in assessing the merits of the present system and trends.

23. The first suggestion that African opinion should be formally consulted was made in 1930. This was implemented 10 years later when Bulawayo voluntarily set up the first Advisory Board in the country. In 1946 legislation was introduced making them compulsory for every Municipal African Township. Their success has varied with the calibre of candidates offering themselves for election. In Bulawayo they have played a valuable part in the administration of local affairs and proved a useful training ground for African leadership.

24. This aspect of African Affairs has also been affected by the general advance of the country, and has also been examined by the Urban African Affairs Commission. It is generally accepted that Africans must participate to a far greater extent in the administration of local affairs, whether their own or that of the town generally, but opinions differ as to how this should be done. The problem is just another aspect of the difficulty of reconciling African political aspirations with European apprehensions of the possible consequences of too rapid political advancement. In this country the apparent conflict is more intractable than in other African Territories such as Nigeria and Sierra Leone because of the vital part Europeans have played in its economic development. The need for continued rapid economic and industrial development is as urgent here as there—perhaps even more vital, because any check in the present high level will be the more sharply felt—and the satisfaction of this need depends very largely on continued European enterprise until African technical skill and knowledge have been further advanced. And this in turn depends on restored confidence and stability. It is no solution simply to ignore European fears and turn the country—or the city—over to a thin cream of African politicians—partly because the cream is so very thin there will be a far greater retrogression here than in West Africa, and partly because the overt conflict it would provoke would do untold harm.

25. The answer seems to lie in acceptance of the fact that democracy is a political system that cannot be transplanted fully grown from one environment to another, but is a plant of slow growth whose final flowering depends on careful culture and the appropriate conditions. Local Government in Southern Rhodesia may not be fully democratic but it is moving in the right direction and is providing a practical and satisfactory answer to present needs.

Part II

The Siting of the Federal and Southern Rhodesia Territorial Capitals

26. One of the major considerations which gave rise to the decisions to site both the Southern Rhodesia Territorial Capital and the Federal Capital in Salisbury was the—in our view—erroneous opinion held by many of those whose evidence was given considerable weight, namely that in a comparatively short time Territorial and Federal Governments would cease to have independent existence. In addition considerable attention was paid to the evidence of Civil Servants who, living as they already were in Salisbury, could hardly have been expected to be entirely disinterested.

27. We think, also, that far too little consideration was given to fundamental issues and too much to superficial appearances and alleged financial expediency, as a result of which a decision was taken which, we believe, has had very serious disadvantages. Apart from the undue centralisation of functions, which would be a bad thing in any country, the identification of the Federal and Southern Rhodesia Territorial Governments in the minds of the people of the Federation, and in particular the Africans in the two Northern Territories, or at the very least the feeling that the Southern Rhodesia Government has a big pull with the Federal Government due to the contiguity of their Administrations, is a most unfortunate consequence.

28. We believe that a considerable amount of ill-feeling has, rightly or wrongly, been aroused because of the situation outlined. We believe also that, had there been less loose thinking about the comparative permanence of the Federal concept, the matter would have been approached with greater wisdom.

29. We feel, therefore, that in the interests of the Federation, which cannot afford to permit the persistence of factors that exacerbate disruptive tendencies, the question of the geographical relationship between the two Capital seats should be reviewed. In most countries, where a similar problem existed—though never, we suggest, so serious a one—it has been solved by siting the Federal Capital, or its equivalent, in some place with no great localised attachments and sometimes with no previous existence. At the very least, the two Capitals should be separated by a considerable distance, which symbolises a freedom from the possibility of undue influence, whether such influence is a matter of fact or not.

30. It may well be that there are grounds for retaining Salisbury as the Federal Capital since the Federation would thereby present a more substantial and dignified front in external affairs. If so, then the Territorial Capital should be sited elsewhere. In making this suggestion, we do not wish to urge a case for siting it in Bulawayo. It is not our desire to discuss the advantages or disadvantages of various centres, or suggest which Capital should be moved, but merely to urge that the question be seriously reviewed for the sake of the future of the Federation.

31. The advantages that we believe would accrue from the separation of the Capitals are as follows:—

- (1) The allaying of suspicion—particularly in the Northern Territories—arising from the possibility of a too close liaison at Cabinet, Ministerial and Senior Civil Service levels between the Federal Government and the Southern Rhodesian Territorial Government.
- (2) The clarification in the minds of the people of Southern Rhodesia of the fact that the Federal Government is not merely an appendage of their own Territorial Government.
- (3) The spreading of resources which, if permitted to continue concentrating in one place, will weaken the economy of the country.
- (4) The recruitment of the strong public spirit and responsibility that exists amongst people in other parts of Southern Rhodesia who have become frustrated through the exclusive dominance of the people in one centre.

- (5) An improvement in the efficiency and distribution of various public services. Inevitably, the centre in which the ultimate authority resides receives the greatest consideration. At least two centres in Southern Rhodesia, instead of one only, will thus benefit and, with them, the country as a whole. Recent events have emphasised how significant this factor is.
- (6) At least a partial elimination of the grounds for a feeling of bitterness, which we believe pervades the whole Federation, outside of Salisbury, and which is derived from the multiplication of controls emanating from that City

Part III

Health Services

32. Despite the fact that "Health" (other than Silicosis in Northern Rhodesia) is item 64 on the Concurrent List, the Federal Government has assumed responsibility for the provision of both curative and preventive medical services in the Federation. Without in any way adversely criticising the Federal Ministry of Health, the Bulawayo City Council feels that this has proved a mistake in practice because of the urgent necessity of meeting the increasing demands from all sections of the community for the provision of curative services, including hospitals. Council feels that undue emphasis has, of necessity, had to be placed on the provision of such curative services to the detriment of the provision of preventive medical services—which, being less urgent, have of necessity had to take second place.

33. This undesirable trend would, in the opinion of the Council, be most easily halted and corrected if the Federation responsibility for the provision of hospital and curative services was transferred to the Territorial Governments. The primary function of a Federal Ministry of Health, which should continue to exist, in the opinion of the Council, should be to provide preventive medical services and to encourage Local Authorities, by technical service and financial support, in the provision of these services. The Federal Ministry of Health should also be responsible for the administration of legislation dealing with environmental and preventive medical services, including international sanitary regulations.

34. It is felt that the responsibility for the provision and carrying out of planned schemes of preventive medicine, such for example, schemes of Tuberculosis control and immunisation campaigns, could best be delegated to Local Authorities, wherever these exist—and this is more particularly important in the case of the African people. It should be remembered that in Rhodesia the Africans' contact with civilisation is limited to a couple of generations and that, generally speaking, the African people are emerging from a primitive, rural existence into an industrial, urbanised community. It is felt to be essential, therefore, that the African people themselves should be closely associated with the provision of these particular medical services, in order that they may appreciate their value and make the fullest possible use of them.

35. For the information of the Commission, similar responsibilities exist in the Union of South Africa, where the Central Government Health Department is responsible for preventive medical services as well as the provision of mental and leprosy hospitals—whereas the Provincial Governments are responsible for curative methods, including the provision of hospitals.

THE CITY COUNCIL OF BULAWAYO

- Represented by: The Mayor (Councillor S. H. Millar)
The Deputy Mayor (Councillor Mrs. M. Brett)
Councillor J. G. Pain
Mr. E. S. White
Dr. E. J. Watson
Dr. E. H. Ashton

CHAIRMAN: Q. You suggest that there would be advantages in separating the Federal capital from the Territorial capital of the colony. This has come before us a number of times. Is it the Council's view that a separation of the two capitals would do something to remove some of the psychological fears which appear to upset the Northern Territories? — A. We are quite emphatic on that: we are not parochial in this matter. We do not mind where it goes, but feel categorically that it is in the interests of the Federation that one or other of the capitals should be removed from Salisbury. In view of the apprehension with which the Northern Territories, and perhaps Southern Rhodesia also, view this question of close liaison by having the two capitals in Salisbury, it would be much better to have them separated, even at this stage.

Q. Dealing with African affairs, you have set out what has been done by the City authority and, in paragraph 17, you draw attention to the fact that for many years the Bulawayo City Council has advocated granting freehold rights in the urban townships. You would hope to be authorised to do that? — A. It would be true to say that Bulawayo was probably the first municipality to implement the principal of paragraph 17: in fact before that we were the first ones to introduce the 9 year leasehold, and when house ownership for the Africans was suggested loans were given to them to enable them to build their own homes on the land. We have in fact been given certain ground for freehold title.

Q. You also advocate bringing more Africans into active municipal life? — A. The system in existence at present is that there are African Advisory Boards, and in the past they were purely advisory, as such; but we feel it would be in our interests and those of the Africans if they were allowed to decide what should be done, and to give them certain extra powers to enable them to implement that aspect. We have a councillor as chairman of each advisory board, of which there are 6 or 7. Though it would be better for a councillor to continue as the chairman, we think it would be better if, instead of being merely advisory, they should perhaps be given greater authority to do these things, and that would enable them to be tutored later on to play a much greater part in the administration of their own areas—to levy certain rates and collect monies and spend them.

Q. What is the view of the Council as to how the Land Apportionment Act has worked? — A. That is tied up with the question of freehold title. We have to apply to the Government for an amendment of the Land Apportionment Act: if that were done there would be no difficulty. We feel in some cases it would be to the benefit of both parties.

Q. Would you like to see the health services in the hands of the Territorial Government? — A. Yes. The Deputy Mayor has been concerned with the health service for some time, and will amplify that point. — (DEPUTY MAYOR): Since our memorandum was written the report of the Morton Commission of Enquiry has come out, and there on page 8 it is quite clear that that Commission do not feel the health services should be split in the way we have suggested. They are very emphatic about that, and there is another point—that since Federation the definition of what health is has been very vague and very little legislation has been passed on health matters at all. They recommend that the whole constitutional question of health should be gone into carefully. We feel ourselves that a certain amount of division between the Federal and Territorial Governments would be good, because the Territories vary very widely in their requirements. In view of the Morton Commission's recommendations it seems unlikely that what we have advocated would come about, but there have only been two Acts changed since the Federal Government took over—health and food control, including the manufacture of food, for instance is completely inadequate. That Act has not been altered at all, except that the drugs side has been taken out. But there is no control on this sort of thing, and there are a number of other points in the way of preventive health legislation which have not been dealt with. It seems the whole question has been held up because of the difficulty of definition as between the Territorial and Federal Governments.

Q. Does the Council wish to modify its suggestion? — A. I think the Council would prefer to leave it standing, but obviously it is very difficult.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: As regards African Advisory Boards, we have been told that Africans are reluctant to take part in that kind of work; and it has been suggested that this is to a great extent due to the fact that they have not got effective power, apart from advisory functions. Could you tell us whether there is that reluctance to a noticeable degree, and also whether you think that would be diminished if they had more say in what was done? — A. (MAYOR): We can only speak from Bulawayo's point of view and, as a member of some years on the City Council, that reluctance has not been apparent to me, or to us as a Council. If there has been any difficulty it has been due to the short period which they can serve as members of the Advisory Board—two years. It means they have to seek re-election within a short period. But I can definitely say there has been no reluctance at all.

Q. We have been given some rather striking statistics of the places open for them to come in and help, and there are extraordinarily few Africans who are willing to come in on the basis of advisory functions. — A. (DR. ASHTON): Our experience would not support that at all. The standard of the person who comes forward has been good on the whole. We have been handicapped in the past by an unofficial ban by the Education Department on teachers taking part, which removed the main educative group of people. That ban seems to have been recently removed, because only this year a headmaster of one of the schools came on. But the calibre of persons coming forward has been good, and in some cases excellent. That is on the candidates' side. A number of organisations have put up candidates and in some cases that has tended to limit competition, because those who have not a big organisation behind them have been reluctant to stand, and for that reason there have been cases where there was no contest. There have been few cases, other than where a board member has established himself as a leader of the people, where there has been no contest. My memory goes back 11 years, and we have never had occasion here to use the power whereby the Government can nominate members. There have always been candidates here.

Q. You think there is something more attractive in your way of doing things than there is at other places? There is nothing special about your machinery? — A. No, the machinery is common throughout the Territory. I think Bulawayo started some years before it was required to have Advisory Boards — that was on a voluntary basis. Possibly, Bulawayo has tended to do two things to a greater degree than other centres; and that is first to encourage married housing, which means you have a more stable group. I have figures here showing the percentage of polls, showing the difference between the single men's area and the married men's area. In the locations last year the poll in the single men's area was 1.7% and in the adjoining area, which is entirely married, it was 28%. That compares favourably with ordinary municipal elections. The other point is that the Council has made a deliberate point of encouraging the Board to play its part fully, and stand by their recommendations. It is very rarely that a recommendation by the board has not been accepted, and that has helped to build up a feeling that what the Board members say, goes.

MR. CHIRWA: Does the Council feel that it is better that, instead of having Advisory Boards, the Africans should participate on the City Council, and if so, what are the difficulties in the way of doing that? If the present legislation is not adequate, can the Council put forward any suggestions to bring this into being? — A. (DEPUTY MAYOR): It is difficult to say what the Council would feel about the question of direct representation of Africans on the City Council, as it exists at present. The question has never really been raised in that form. You are no doubt aware that the Municipal Association of Southern Rhodesia in February 1959 drew up a memorandum to the Government on the question of greater participation, and they reached the conclusion that, for the time being at any rate, it was better to develop the Advisory Boards as suggested. There are a number of legal points needed to bring in direct participation and until the question of freehold title is clearer it is a difficult problem. I feel that European opinion has not reached the stage where it has seriously considered the question of Africans as City Councillors, but things are moving so fast that it is possible to foresee it. In Southern Rhodesia the system of Advisory Boards has worked so well that so far as I know there has been no definite approach on this matter.

SIR CHARLES ARDEN-CLARKE: In paragraph 21, on pass laws, you say this system is becoming out of date. Has the Council formulated the changes it would like to see? A. (MAYOR): That is another matter which the Bulawayo City Council is about to consider, in conjunction with the Municipal Association. It would be true to say that we feel that there are a number of passes which could well be done without. I am not suggesting they are irksome, but in some cases they are not adhered to. For instance we have an employer's registration pass, a pass to seek work, a visitor's pass, and so on. We have considered the proposal of having the registration certificate, the 'situpa' as being the one certificate which is necessary. Some modification of it may well take place. We have recommended to the Municipal Association the total abolition of those passes I have mentioned.

MR. ROBINSON: Could you explain to us the value of the registration certificate — why do you feel it is necessary to continue it? — A. To some extent it is rather like a European passport. It gives all the details and is an identification certificate. We think that should continue, but it should be sufficient by itself.

MR. CRAWLEY: A European does not need a passport in his own country. I do not quite see the need for this. — A.

At present we get Africans from Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland. We have migrant labour, and they come to Salisbury and Umtali seeking work. There needs to be some means of identification.

Q. Even for inhabitants of Southern Rhodesia?—A. I think so.

MR. MOLSON: You suggest that the Land Apportionment Act is becoming out of date now. I understand a municipality is not free to allow Africans to acquire freehold land within the municipality; that is covered by the Act. Will you tell us what modifications you have in mind and whether you have made representations to the government about it? — A. So far we have merely been thinking aloud in Committee. We feel the time has come when there can be an extension of the trading areas which are available both to Europeans and Africans. The Land Apportionment Act has been of great advantage to the African in his own areas where it has prevented competition with more experienced and more monied traders. We would like to see areas set aside as a sort of free for all.

MR. ELLMAN BROWN: Would you advocate that in these housing areas the time has arisen where you would allow European trading to come in as competition? — A. Definitely not. The Advisory Boards are very firm on that. There was an example last week when there were applications for two funeral parlours and it was suggested they should go to European firms. The Advisory Board were dead against it, and we take a great deal of notice of them, so we agreed to their proposal that it should not be allowed.

MR. MOLSON: In paragraph 17 you mention the granting of freehold rights to Africans in urban townships. Is it the area where the Europeans own land? — A. No, it is the African areas where there are Advisory Boards. There is a home ownership scheme. We have also passed a Council resolution, and it is Council policy to grant freehold titles in those areas. It would need an amendment to the Act to do it in the African area.

Q. Have you had any reply from the Government? — A. Just a letter to say they are considering the matter.

MR. MCCLELAND: In paragraph 16 you say that increasing economic development and education have opened up new opportunities for Africans in trade. Educationists say that one of their big difficulties with graduates from secondary school is to find them occupations in commerce. On the other hand you suggest the opportunities are in fact there, but we have heard that they are not. A. In South Africa there are certain avenues of employment, a number of types of factories who employ a lot of types of people, but we have not developed to that extent in Southern Rhodesia, although Bulawayo is considered to be quite an industrial town. We absorb African graduates in our own African Administration Department of the Council.

Q. You are absorbing all graduates? — A. We have not experienced any difficulty in placing graduates in Bulawayo: it is rather the up and coming secondary school children now leaving—the type who leaves at standard VII or VIII or even lower.

Q. Those are finding difficulty? — A. Actually, you are linking it with Land Apportionment: paragraph 16 refers to that.

Q. I see. Now in paragraph 31 you say that other parts of Southern Rhodesia have become frustrated through the exclusive dominance of the people in one centre. — A. The territorial capital? All the legislation is concentrated in Salisbury, both Federal and Territorial: It is the feeling that everything emanates from there that makes people feel frustrated. If they were separated it would be better. As it is people get the feeling that there are private meetings at night—calling on one's next door neighbour, as it were.

LORD CRATHORNE: As regards the Asian community we understand they were removed from the area of the Commonage and sent to an area where there are no amenities and no water. — A. (MR. WHITE): The Commonage was an area developed in the early days: it has become almost a slum area, and gradual clearance of the area has taken place over the years. Owing to the expansion of the city and the laying out of further sites, we have planned a very fine area for these people, but there has been resistance from the community themselves in going to the area, because they said it was segregation. There was a clause in the agreement of sale which said this area could only be used for Indian occupation. They took strong exception to that clause; some years ago the Council decided to withdraw it, and discussions have since taken place to encourage them to go to that area. The Council has promised to develop it, but these people have not come forward themselves in sufficient numbers to enable suitable services to be provided, which is quite an economic exercise, I have myself had discussions to try to encourage some enthusiasm so that we can get on with the work.

Q. It is a local problem which people will eventually sort out? — A. Yes.

MR. MENZIES: We were told by an Asian that he occupied a good site in one of the areas here, and was quite prepared to put up a residence which would comply with any minimum specification required—in other words, a £3,000-5,000 house, to live there. He asked only for the opportunity of buying that allotment where he was. It seems to highlight the point of discrimination set out in the memorandum. This is a matter, I understand, within the jurisdiction of the municipality and it does not touch the Land Apportionment Act at all. Is it the policy of the Council that an Asian who has the means to erect a proper residence within a residential area shall not be allowed there because he is an Asian and not a European? — A. (MAYOR): I do not think that is quite the position. Where Asians have the money there is nothing to stop them buying property in a European area. An Asian has quite recently bought a £5,000-6,000 house five houses from where I live. The Land Apportionment Act does not affect them. They own considerable property in the European area, blocks of flats, etc., which they occupy.

SIR VICTOR ROBINSON: When you cut up a new piece of commonage, do you put a restrictive clause in the title saying the land cannot be alienated to Asians or other non-Africans? — A. It is illegal to do so. If a man can buy, he buys.

MR. CRAWLEY: You imply that segregation has been for the benefit of all races. Do you suggest that it is welcomed or liked by the Africans and Asians? — A. I think it is true to say the Africans themselves are getting somewhat concerned about it, and the Coloured community too. They feel they are likely to get people unsuitable in their particular areas rather than that the European feels it would be unsuitable to have these people living next door to him. Dr. Ashton might be able to elucidate further, but we have a Coloured community housing area, and they are concerned about some of the types of people who are going to live in their areas. The size of the Asian community in Bulawayo is about 18,000.

PROFESSOR CREIGHTON: In paragraph 1 you refer to the apprehension of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland on the spread of the Southern Rhodesian pass laws; then in paragraph 19, you proceed in general to justify the existence of them. You say you prefer to see them abolished with the exception of a certificate of registration. Do you not feel that might properly be amended or altered? As it stands at present I believe on the left-hand side there is a list of various information—the kind of thing you would find in a passport in Western Europe or North America. On the right-hand side is a list of occupations, with the salaries obtained in each case. It has been represented to us that this is a disadvantage to the holder, in that it possibly prevents him from receiving increments or increases which he might get on the grounds of experience. Do you feel it would be more effective if that side of the pass were eliminated? — A. If commercial employment progresses to the stage of having fixed types of jobs with fixed rates of pay, it may well be so; but so many indicate they were receiving pay considerably in excess of what appears on the 'situpa' in any case, that it is not a disadvantage. The employer, if a man is worth so much, will offer him so much. I have not yet come across cases where it has worked to the detriment of the holder of the certificate. Already there is a minimum in many cases which can be paid. I do not think it matters very much whether this information is removed or not.

Q. Would the European community contemplate a common certificate for all citizens of Southern Rhodesia, in order to remove this element of discrimination? — A. I do not know about that. This is political. The major difficulty is perhaps the question that the European is easily identifiable as regards place and type of employment, whereas there are so many Africans that whereas one has perhaps learnt to identify European faces it is a little more difficult for people to recognise African faces. I do not really know.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: You said you did not know of any respect in which this was a detriment to the African. Can you suggest any respect in which it is an advantage to him? — A. Well, it is easily identifiable that this particular man has been with an employer for five or ten years and, due to adversity, has had to leave. In cases of that nature I think one would take cognisance of that and probably pay him the same money as he had been receiving.

MR. ELLMAN BROWN: Is it not law that an employer must write down the salary that has been paid to the individual in the firm's contract? If the African is not receiving that he has the right to sue for it. It is a contract. — A. Yes, that is so.

SIR CHARLES ARDEN-CLARKE: Can we go back to Mr. Crawley's question as to whether the Africans like segregation? — A. (DR. ASHTON): One could generalise and say that by and large the position of like living with like has been accepted, and therefore Africans live with Africans and white with whites. There are practical advantages, in the way of special housing schemes and sheltered trading rights for Africans, and so on; but there is now a feeling amongst Africans, of wealth, and particularly of education and standing, that there should be an opportunity of moving up and living with others, whatever their race, of similar education and interests. It applies to a very small group at present, but it does apply and the best way is to start off with the neutral area referred to by the Council. It would not meet with any general support: there would be just a very few who might use the generalisation to cover this point, and who feel that the African areas should be protected by stopping others coming in. This is all we argue.

MR. CRAWLEY: Is the Council generally in favour of reducing racial discrimination? — A. (MAYOR): Very definitely. We are now contemplating a Club for the far western areas of the city which is almost completed now, which we hope will be a multi-racial club. We are encouraging multi-racialism, and the Uganda multi-racial side is coming down to play soccer in May: they will play against multi-racial sides here. Generally the Council are alive to the importance of improving race relations by gradually breaking down segregation.

MR. ROBINSON: Dr. Ashton has had experience in African administration both in the Union of South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. Would he like to comment on some evidence that has been given to us in the Northern Territories that an association with Southern Rhodesia is objected to because the colour bar policies, as practised here, are identical with those in the Union? I would like to know, purely on this question of the colour bar and discrimination, whether he would subscribe to this view, and whether he has noticed, in the 11 years he has been in Bulawayo, any relaxation of the colour bar, and what his views for the future are on this matter? — A. (DR. ASHTON): The colour bar takes a large number of forms. In certain obvious ways there has been less colour bar in the Union than here, going into shops, for instance, the use of lifts, and so on. There certainly was more of that here 11 years ago than there was in Johannesburg, but there has been a very marked relaxation, even in those particular things. You will still see buildings in Bulawayo where Africans are not allowed in the lifts, or shops where Africans are not welcomed as customers, and what was the usual thing and very often brought up—which I personally never saw—of Africans being served through a hole in the corner: but those are fading away quite rapidly. An African in the Eastern District said some years ago—what many Africans say—there was no colour bar in South Africa. On enquiry it turned out he meant that wages were higher down there. That was true, of course, but it was truer than it is now, because wages in Southern Rhodesia are picking up. Wages are still higher in the South, but there has been a definite increase here. In other ways the position is quite different. In the Union of South Africa there has been a considerable tightening up on the whole question of pass laws. They are very much more strictly administered and very much wider in their scope and there is a much greater control of freedom of movement. The trend in South Africa is towards more control whereas in Southern Rhodesia it has been in the opposite direction. Take education. In the Union there were two or three multi-racial universities. That is now being prevented. The trend in the Union is for them to be much more strongly administered and much more concentrated, whereas the trend here is towards relaxation. Since I came here I have noticed a considerable relaxation both in administration of certain laws and, above all, in the attitude towards the laws—for instance, multi-racial sports or clubs would be banned in the Union. Welfare activities of various sorts have to be run entirely on an all-African basis in South Africa, under government white supervision, but with no voluntary association. The white churches are being removed in many cases out of African areas. I can give you many examples of how trends in the two countries are moving in opposite directions.

LORD CRATHORNE: He says here the trend is relaxed. Would he advocate the getting rid of the whole show by legislation or do you think it is better to go on as you are? To give a concrete example of things like multi-racial cinemas, should you go on like this or do you think it is better to let the trend continue and eventually get it done? — A. The trend is continuing. The question whether you can do it by legislation is an extremely difficult one. I have myself got fairly strong views on that. I do not think you can legislate that a man must do something. I think you can legislate that he must not do so and I think in that way legislation can help considerably. I do not know if that answers your question.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: Would you say that the relaxation is taking place more as a result of pressure from Africans or as a result of some voluntary act by Europeans or both? — A. I would say it is a matter of both and I think the situation generally is changing. The situation that requires many of these restrictions and forms of discrimination is changing. World opinion is changing, the situation in Africa is changing. I think people here are realising for these reasons there must be a change as well. All sorts of factors come into it. Here in Southern Rhodesia there is perhaps not so much direct pressure on the African side but there are all these indirect pressures.

Q. Do you think that the view of your Council that there should be relaxation is one that is widely held? You do not regard yourselves as rather unusual in having that view? — A. (CLR. MILLAR): I think we ought to leave the Commission to decide that, Sir.

MR. CHIRWA: The Council in paragraph 1 has referred to some of the objections which Africans in Nyasaland in particular have to the Federation and they cite Pass Laws as one of them and the Land Apportionment Laws. Does not the Council think that as long as the pass laws exist there is bound to be continued opposition from the Africans in those Territories, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, and that if the people are anxious for co-operation with those Territories they should abolish those laws so that those people's fears may be allayed instead of there being constant friction between those people? — A. With due respect to the questioner I submit that is a political question as such and if the Commission are not aware of it, we have no politics in our local administration in any way. We have agreed to the abolition, as I have already indicated, as far as Bulawayo is concerned and with due deference I submit that is a political question a bit outside our sphere.

CHAIRMAN: Most of the questions put to you have a political tint. — A. We have agreed to it as far as Bulawayo is concerned.

Q. You are in favour of getting rid of it all? — A. Yes.

Memorandum

THE NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL COUNCIL OF THE ENGINEERING INDUSTRY

25th January 1960

Bulawayo

Dear Sir,

The National Industrial Council of the Engineering Industry in Southern Rhodesia is a body constituted to operate in terms of the Industrial Conciliation Act within the engineering industry, and its authority is naturally confined to Southern Rhodesia and to that industry. The Council has, however, been established for seventeen years, and during that time it has acquired wide experience in the working of the Colony's industrial conciliation system. Its members have always believed that in exercising the functions entrusted to them they have a wider responsibility than mere concerns with the affairs of their own industry and that decisions on these affairs must be related to the national interests as a whole.

Consequently the Council has always concerned itself with the development of labour legislation and matters subsidiary thereto; in so concerning itself it has never believed that it is exceeding the functions intended of it, or that it is interfering in matters outside its authority. In fact it believes that it is in duty bound to interest itself in all matters that affect industrial legislation as a whole, and that by virtue of its interest and experience in these affairs it can offer a valuable contribution to any deliberations on this subject.

Since the Federation was formed the interests of the constituent Territories have necessarily converged, and, as labour legislation is a subject specifically touched upon in the Federal Constitution, the Council believes that the Monckton Commission, preparing the way for a review of the Constitution, would wish to study authoritative evidence on the subject.

For that purpose, this memorandum has been prepared and is hereby submitted to the Commission; and the suggestions contained in the Summary in the final section are the considered opinions of this Council. Should the Commission desire that the contents of this memorandum be amplified, the undersigned is authorized to give verbal evidence to the Commission on behalf of the Council.

Yours faithfully,
P. B. GIBBS, M.I., Prod.E.
General Secretary.

Labour Relations in Central Africa A Survey of the Legislation Operating in the Territories of the Federation

Introduction

1. It is in the field of labour relations in industry that the most positive steps can be taken towards fulfilment of those aims which are set out in the preamble to the Federal Constitution—partnership and co-operation between all the inhabitants of the Federation. When people are brought together in their daily work any differences which arise between them are caused by positive factors and not by negative prejudices. The differences resolve themselves into differences of human relationship and are no longer concerned with race, and they must be reconciled, otherwise the daily lives could not go on.

2. Consequently the legislation by which labour relations are guided plays a supremely important role in the affairs of the Federation, and it is the intention of this memorandum to review this legislation as it now stands and to study the effect of its working.

3. The authors of the Federal Constitution specifically delegated labour legislation to the Territorial Governments—almost more emphatically than they delegated other functions by inclusion in, or exclusion from the Federal and Concurrent Lists of governmental powers—by introducing a separate clause in the body of the Constitution, Article 30, reading:—

(1) Save as provided in paragraph (2) of this Article,* the Federal Legislature shall not have powers to make any laws with respect to—

- (a) trade unions and other like associations; or,
- (b) the settlements of disputes between employers and employees, or between employees, being disputes connected with the employment or non-employment, or with the terms of employment or conditions of labour, of any persons.

(*Note. Paragraph (2) of this article deals with matters concerning Federal civil servants and is irrelevant to the subject of this memorandum.)

4. It should be noted that in the White Paper outlining the Draft Federal Scheme (Command Paper 8573) issued by the Conference held in London in 1952 to consider proposals for federation, the following note qualified the Conference's recommendation that the power to make laws relating to trade unions and industrial conciliation should remain Territorial:—

“This is necessary as an interim measure in view of the differences which exist at present between the Territories in laws relating to trade unions and industrial conciliation”.

5. It is clear, then, that the Conference hoped that development would be towards removal of the differences, so that, after an interim period, labour legislation would become a Federal responsibility, and it is the purpose of this memorandum to examine whether this hope has any likelihood of fulfilment in the present circumstances. The purpose is—

- (i) to examine the differences, both in their substance and in their effect;
- (ii) to consider whether it is in the interests of the Federation, and of the individual Territories, that the differences should be removed or that they should remain;
- (iii) if it is concluded that the differences should be removed, to consider whether,
 - (a) the system at present in force in one Territory should be adopted by the others; or,
 - (b) a hybrid system should be devised;
- (iv) if it is concluded that the differences cannot be removed, to consider whether any constitutional steps are necessary to prevent their further divergence.

The System in Southern Rhodesia

6. In Southern Rhodesia the system is now based on the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1959, which applies industrial conciliation—previously confined, so far as employees were concerned, to non-Africans—to all employers and employees irrespective of race.

7. This system is aimed at the prevention and settlement of disputes between employers and employees, the emphasis being in that order; that is to say, the system is designed primarily to provide machinery for negotiation of conditions of employment so as to prevent disputes from arising, and secondly to provide machinery for settling disputes if they do arise.

8. The kernel of the system is the Industrial Council, consisting of representatives elected by registered employers' organizations and trade unions, set up spontaneously by individual industries, who can make agreements on conditions of employment, which agreements are given the force of law; non-observance of an agreement thereby becoming a criminal offence. But the Act is at pains to ensure that before decisions of an Industrial Council are made binding on an entire industry, the parties to that Council are fully representative of the employers and employees in the industry concerned; and much of the machinery of the Act is directed to this end.

9. It is recognized that the parties to any Industrial Council cannot be compelled always to agree, but if, in an industry where an Industrial Council has been set up, agreement is not reached—that is to say, a dispute has arisen—the conciliation and arbitration machinery provided by the Act must be used before a party resorts to a strike or lock-out; and, unless such machinery has been used, participation in a strike or lock-out is a criminal offence.

10. For the most satisfactory functioning of these Industrial Councils it is an inherent feature of the system that trade unions and employers' organizations (and hereinafter in this memorandum the term "trade union" includes also employers' organizations unless specifically stated otherwise) must be registered for specific interests, and that not more than one trade union may be registered for any one interest in any one area. It has been alleged that this limitation possibly contravenes the International Labour Office Convention 87 on the Freedom of Association and the Right to Organize. It is suggested here that even if this limitation does contravene the Convention technically, it nevertheless does not, in effect, deprive those concerned of the benefits which are the aims of the Convention.

11. On the other hand there is a further limitation imposed by the Act which might well be considered as contravening the principle of freedom of association. The Act lays down that membership of a trade union must be limited to workers in one particular industry. (Exemption from this provision is, however, given to trade unions registered before the Act came into force.) This means that association of workers is narrowly restricted and workers in a specific occupation who are employed in different industries are not permitted to associate together in any aspect of the industrial conciliation system.

12. The Industrial Conciliation Act also provides for Industrial Boards or Conciliation Boards in industries where no Industrial Council has been registered.

13. An Industrial Board, nominated by the Minister of Labour, is intended to recommend conditions of employment within an industry where the employees, or the employers, have not organized to the extent of setting up an Industrial Council. A Board consists of persons chosen by the Minister with due regard to the interests of employers and employees in the industry concerned, and the Minister has power to appoint a limited number of other persons. Again, in this instance, the primary aim is the prevention of disputes by determining conditions of employment before disputes arise. The Industrial Board is purely advisory to the Minister, who may make regulations (based in practice on the Board's recommendations) laying down conditions of employment within the industry; and contravention of those regulations is a criminal offence. If an Industrial Board has been set up in an industry it is also a criminal offence to participate in a strike or lock-out in that industry unless the dispute has been referred to the Board.

14. A Conciliation Board, appointed by the employers and employees in an industry—or, in default, by the Minister—is intended to settle a dispute that has already arisen in an industry, where there is no Industrial Council. If the Conciliation Board fails to settle the dispute, then the arbitration machinery provided for an Industrial Council in the same situation may be invoked. In the circumstances in which a Conciliation Board can be set up, it is a criminal offence to participate in a strike or lock-out unless the Conciliation Board machinery has been used.

15. Thus, the right to strike or lock-out is not entirely removed; but it is circumscribed by the obligation to make full use of the appropriate conciliation machinery—involving an Industrial Council, an Industrial Board or a Conciliation Board—before participation in a strike or lock-out is legal.

The System in Northern Rhodesia

16. The Northern Rhodesian system is based on the system in the United Kingdom, which is one of collective bargaining resting on the principle of mutual consent, without the necessity of legal enforcement, and the machinery for settling disputes depends on the loyal acceptance by both sides of the decisions reached. The acceptance is purely voluntary and depends solely on the sense of moral obligation.

17. The Trades Unions and Trades Disputes Ordinance (Cap. 25) regularizes the formation of, and requires the registration of trade unions and employers' organizations, but the Ordinance lays down nothing whatsoever concerning the constitution, machinery or procedure by which these bodies shall conduct their negotiations or come to their agreements. A trade union is not required to register for any specific interest and there is no limitation to the number of trade unions that may be registered with any particular object, or in any particular industry, nor is there any requirement that membership shall be confined to a particular industry. On the other hand, there is no restriction to the limitations which a trade union may impose, by its constitution, on the persons whom it will admit to membership; thus each trade union may, and in fact does in practice, restrict its membership to a particular race.

18. These trade unions and employers' organizations are encouraged to form between them, on any basis on which they may care to decide, Joint Industrial Councils for negotiating conditions of employment. These Joint Industrial Councils have no statutory foundation, although any agreements to which they come may be made legally binding, not only to the parties to the Joint Industrial Council but also to all other employers and employees in the industry to which the agreement is intended to apply.

19. The part of the Trade Unions and Trade Disputes Ordinance concerned with disputes has no reference to the manner in which disputes shall be handled, but merely provides protection in law in certain circumstances for persons concerned in strikes and lock-outs.

20. The handling of disputes is primarily covered by the Industrial Conciliation Ordinance (Cap. 26); in fact, this ordinance is intended for this purpose only and makes no pretence to serve towards the prevention of disputes. Moreover there is no compulsion to use the provisions of the Ordinance in the event of a dispute, nor can it be used until any other machinery, which may be operating in the industry in which the dispute has arisen, has been used to the full. It is when the parties, who may or may not have formed a Joint Industrial Council, are unable to resolve a dispute that they may apply to the Government for the conciliation and arbitration machinery provided by the Industrial Conciliation Ordinance to be set in motion.

21. If conciliation and arbitration fail the Government may appoint a Board of Inquiry, whose report may be released for general publication in the hope that the weight of public opinion will induce the parties to accept the Board's recommendations. But there is no compulsion for anyone to accept the findings of conciliators, arbitrators or Boards of Inquiry, and, except in the case of those engaged on essential services, it is quite legal to reject the findings and to participate in a strike or lock-out.

22. The Government has certain powers under the Minimum Wages, Wage Councils and Conditions of Employment Ordinance (Cap. 190). These powers correspond to the Southern Rhodesian Government's powers to set up an Industrial Board when no adequate machinery for industrial conciliation exists in a particular industry. In that event the Northern Rhodesian Government can set up a Wage Council to which it makes its own appointments consisting of equal numbers of persons representing employers and employees in the industry concerned, together with three independent members, one of whom becomes the chairman of the Council. The determination of conditions of employment in the industry is the agreed decision arrived at between employer and employee representatives, to whom the voting on the matter is at first restricted. If, however, agreement between these representatives cannot be reached, the independent members, acting virtually as arbitrators, make the decision, which becomes the decision of the Council and may be made legally binding on all engaged in the industry. That is to say, in contradistinction to the Industrial Boards in Southern Rhodesia, the Wage Councils in Northern Rhodesia determine the conditions of employment in their industries and do not merely recommend to the Government.

23. The Ordinance also provides for Minimum Wage Boards which the Government may set up in particular industries; these consist of a chairman appointed by the Government, an equal number of representatives of employers and employees in the industry, and one employer and one employee from outside the industry. A decision of the Board is by a majority of members, the chairman having a casting vote; that is to say, a situation may arise where he acts as a sole arbitrator; and, like the decisions of a Wage Council, the decisions of a Minimum Wage Board may be made binding on all in the industry.

The Situation in Nyasaland

24. Because labour in Nyasaland is chiefly employed in agricultural undertakings (to which sphere of employment, incidentally, the industrial conciliation system even in Southern Rhodesia does not apply) and is scattered in comparatively small concentrations over large areas, it has not yet been found necessary to introduce specific legislation for the settlement of industrial disputes. There are provisions for Wage Councils and Wages Advisory Boards, whose constitution and functions would be very much on the same lines as their counterparts in Northern Rhodesia.

Summary of Systems

25. In practice, therefore, there are two systems operating in the Federation, whose differing principles may be summarized as follows:—

- (i) The Southern Rhodesian system of industrial conciliation has been fully formalized by legislation, so that the steps to be taken in the conduct of negotiations in both the prevention and settlement of disputes must follow a prescribed routine, and each constituent part of the negotiating and conciliation machinery is given a statutory pattern and is backed by the force of law.
- (ii) The Northern Rhodesian (and embryonic Nyasaland) system is primarily intended to leave the pattern of negotiating machinery entirely to the discretion of those desiring to take part in it in individual industries; and formal agreements between the parties to the negotiations may be concluded although these may not necessarily be given the force of law to prevent their contravention.

The Effects of the Two Systems

26. Those operating the particular system in each territory claim that theirs is the superior system and that the other has important shortcomings.

- (a) In Southern Rhodesia it is popular to criticize the Northern Rhodesian system by inferring that, like the system in the United Kingdom, it has encouraged, particularly during the post-war years, a series of often irresponsible strikes; and that where the provisions of the Industrial Conciliation Act in Southern Rhodesia (so far, confined to non-Africans) have been observed, the Colony has been entirely free of strikes, or even of any serious disputes, during a period of extensive development. (It must be remembered that the Rhodesia Railways fall outside the scope of the Industrial Act, and the subject of their labour legislation will be referred to later in this memorandum.)
- (b) In Northern Rhodesia the formal provisions of the Southern Rhodesian Industrial Conciliation Act are looked on as restrictive and contrary to the principles of the freedom of the individual to participate in collective bargaining.

27. Each of the Territories answers the other's criticism as emphatically as the criticism has been made. In Northern Rhodesia they maintain that the mining industry (in which all the disputes and strikes have taken place) is an industry in which special factors and circumstances prevail, and that throughout the world, even in countries where compulsory arbitration systems apply, strikes on mines have been generally on a higher proportional scale than in other industries and that the Northern Rhodesian record is comparatively good. (In contradiction of this claim, we are bound to point to the mining industry in South Africa which has been remarkably free from labour troubles since the introduction of the Union's Industrial Conciliation Act.)

28. Answering Northern Rhodesia's criticism of the compulsive nature of Southern Rhodesia's Industrial Conciliation Act, those who have for many years now enjoyed the benefits of the system in Southern Rhodesia are inclined to reply that in practice the element of compulsion (which, in respect of the process of negotiation between employers and employees is only a compulsion to follow certain procedures, and has no influence at all on the negotiations) is salutary, and is just as important for the protection and benefit of the individual, say, company legislation.

29. Thus, each Territory operating its own system is the defender of that system and would be strongly averse to changing it for the other.

30. The truth is, probably, that the circumstances in each Territory are different, and the differing systems have suited each set of circumstances; the appropriate system having, quite fortuitously and without deliberate intent, been applied to the set of circumstances to which it is better suited.

31. In Southern Rhodesia, industry to which the system applies (apart from the Rhodesia Railways with which we will deal separately) is divided into comparatively small establishments, and labour within an industry moves regularly between the establishments. Consequently it is to the advantage of all concerned (employers and employees alike) that conditions of employment shall have some uniformity within the industry. In these circumstances shop-floor negotiations in individual establishments would be valueless; in fact, they would be disadvantageous to all parties. And if, therefore, negotiations are to be conducted, the outcome of which will affect a large number of individual establishments, it is essential to have the pattern of these negotiations and the safeguards against misuse of the system properly laid down by legislation. Any looseness of procedure in these circumstances would lead to chaos.

32. Moreover, Southern Rhodesia has been developing its secondary industries on a considerable scale for some years, and consequently in the non-African spheres employers and employees are already fairly widely organised. In Northern Rhodesia, so far, the only effectively organised industry, both in respect of employers and employees, is the mining industry; and that industry is organised to a high degree. Thus, the bulk of labour organisation in Northern Rhodesia is contained in one industry—an industry which is not, as in Southern Rhodesia, spread over a multiplicity of employers, but is confined to two employers who, for purposes of labour negotiations, act as one unit in the Chamber of Mines.

33. The Northern Rhodesian legislation, by remaining silent on the constitution and procedure of negotiating machinery, permits the mining industry to set up its own system of collective bargaining; and there is, in fact, a Joint Industrial Council (with no statutory authority) to which the Chamber of Mines and the Northern Rhodesian Mine-workers Union are the parties. Until comparatively recently the constitution of the Joint Industrial Council laid down no procedure for arbitration in the event of a dispute; now, following advice given by United Kingdom advisers, brought out after the 1958 strike, an arbitration procedure has been mutually accepted although there is, of course, still no force of law to compel the procedure to be followed by either side.

34. In this connection it should be recorded that both parties, the Chamber of Mines and the Mineworkers Union, are perfectly satisfied with the situation; in fact they both contend that they would never accept any system of compulsory arbitration enforced by legislation. If the parties are considering only their own interests this attitude is understandable, but it does tend to ignore that there is also a public interest—which is not confined to Northern Rhodesia—which can be vitally affected by a refusal of the parties to accept any system designed to compel every reasonable step to be taken before strike or lock-out action is resorted to. The attitude on the Copperbelt today is that the effects of the 1958 strike had such a salutary effect on the mineworkers that in future the arbitration machinery they have contrived will always be used to the full, and consequently compulsion will be unnecessary. That may be a reliable short-term prediction, but memories can be short too, and it hardly seems justifiable to assume that without the force of law to prevent it, a strike causing damage to the Federation's economy will never again be called.

The Effect on the African

35. The matter that is of the greatest importance to all concerned with labour legislation in the Federation is, of course, its impact on the advancement of the African. And here it is possible that the divergence between the systems will not, in practice, cause much difference in their effects.

36. In Southern Rhodesia, the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1959, has removed all distinctions of race, and it does, in fact, prohibit the exclusion of any person from membership of a trade union on the grounds of race. Instead, it insists that a trade union which desires to negotiate through an Industrial Council shall be fully representative of the interests of the workers on whose behalf it claims to negotiate. But so long as workers with different interests (for example, skilled workers in an industry on the one hand, and unskilled workers in the same industry on the other) are workers of different races, as they are in most cases at present, the trade unions registered for those different interests can, and in fact are likely to, consist of members of different races.

37. In Northern Rhodesia there is no legislation prescribing the constitution of the trade unions, so a union is quite free to restrict its members to a particular race if it so desires. In actual fact the Northern Rhodesian Mineworkers' Union restricts its membership to those performing scheduled work, with no reference to race. At present all the scheduled work is done by Europeans, and the Africans doing the unscheduled work belong to the African Mineworkers' Union.

38. Thus, so long as the workers are in separate categories they are likely to belong to separate unions—which, in actual practice, are racial—under both systems. When the races start to overlap in Southern Rhodesia (that is to say, when African workers enter the higher categories which are at present the exclusive field of non-Africans) because the law will require that there cannot be more than one, non-racial union in those higher categories, the African, if he wishes representation, will have to join that union—which, of course, in practice will be the European union that has already been registered for those categories. That situation is coming very near, as Africans are already entering what have been traditionally non-African spheres. It is, of course, impossible to predict whether in these circumstances the Africans will consent to join the unions already established by Europeans, and the consensus of responsible African opinion is that they will be reluctant to do so.

39. In Northern Rhodesia there will be no legal compulsion for the Northern Rhodesian Mineworkers' Union to accept Africans if, as is generally expected, developments in the comparatively near future lead Africans into jobs which are included in the Union's scheduled work. But the formal agreement between the Mineworkers' Union and the Chamber of Mines (that is, the Joint Industrial Council agreement) lays down a closed shop, and every person performing scheduled work must be a member of the Union. But it has to be repeated that there is no legal sanction that can prevent the Mineworkers' Union or the Chamber of Mines from breaking the agreement; and moreover, because the African Mineworkers' Union is so strong (more than 20,000 members) and is well organized, the comparatively few Africans who might qualify for scheduled work would be unlikely to throw in their lot, on an impotent minority basis, with the 10,000 strong European union.

Other Industry in Northern Rhodesia

40. In the foregoing, the situation in Northern Rhodesia has been mainly related to the mining industry which, as previously stated, exists in particular circumstances such as do not prevail among industries in Southern Rhodesia. Nor do those circumstances prevail elsewhere in Northern Rhodesia.

41. At present, other industry in Northern Rhodesia is comparatively unorganized; but in some instances it is now reaching a scale where organization is essential. The problem that faces those concerned in Northern Rhodesia is whether, when they are organized and ready to embark on collective bargaining in earnest, they will be served best by the loose system which happens to suit the highly concentrated mining industry, or whether some more formalized system would not, by very reason of the regularity of its machinery, more satisfactorily meet the scattered conditions which do not apply to the mines.

42. It is reasonable to expect that when secondary industry becomes established and starts to expand in Northern Rhodesia, as it certainly must in the very near future, contacts between the two Territories in all matters connected with industry will progressively increase; and the efficient operation of industry in both Territories will be either assisted or hampered according to the degree of uniformity of their respective labour legislations. Already—although admittedly only on a small and comparatively unimportant scale—the temporary transfer of labour from Southern Rhodesia to Northern Rhodesia by contractors carrying out work in the Northern Territory, causes considerable anomalies due to the inapplicability, during the period of transfer, of the conditions of service under which the labour is normally employed. But as industry in Northern Rhodesia expands, such interchange will increase and will operate in both directions; in fact, the interests of employers and employees in both Territories will become common and the need for uniformity in labour legislation will soon become apparent.

Legislation for the Rhodesia Railways

43. The labour force of the Rhodesia Railways, both European and African, approximates in size the force of the mining industry in Northern Rhodesia, and the legislation that applies to it in both Territories is basically the Southern Rhodesian industrial conciliation system as practised before the new Industrial Conciliation Act came into force. That is to say, the European workers negotiate separately with the Railway Administration through an Industrial Council whose constitution and procedure are prescribed by law; the Council consists of representatives of the Administration and elected representatives of the registered European trade unions; their agreements can be given the force of law (although, so far, this provision has never been effective as the agreements have not been published in the Government Gazette as the law requires that they shall be) and strike or lock-out action becomes criminal in the same circumstances as under the Industrial Conciliation Act.

44. The African workers have contact with the Railway Administration through what is known as a Special Industrial Council, whose employee members are not elected but are appointed by the Minister. The Special Industrial Council has no negotiating powers but provides a forum for discussion, between the Administration and the African employees, of conditions of service, which, after such discussion, are laid down by the Minister. The Special Industrial Council corresponds, in effect if not in constitution, to the Native Labour Boards which operated in industry before they were superseded by the Industrial Boards set up by the new Industrial Conciliation Act.

45. Although the Railways operate throughout the Federation, and are in effect a Federal undertaking under the authority of the Federal Minister of Transport, their enabling legislation is Territorial, identical instruments having been enacted in each Territory—the Railways Acts in Southern Rhodesia and the Railways Ordinance in Northern Rhodesia. The legislation covering industrial conciliation is contained in the Second Schedule to both the Act and the Ordinance, and consequently, in the case of the Railways, the labour legislation is common to the two Territories.

46. Thus, an industry which corresponds closely to the mining industry in Northern Rhodesia—that is to say, in the field of labour relations the employers are a single entity, and the employees are numerous and highly organised—is operating under Southern Rhodesia's formal, legalised industrial conciliation system, in contradistinction to the informal system used by the mines.

Effect of the Railway Legislation

47. As mentioned above the labour legislation for the Railways is basically the Southern Rhodesian system as it was before the non-racial principles of the new Industrial Conciliation Act were introduced. Consequently the machinery for determining conditions of employment, and for settling disputes, is divided into two distinct racial compartments—the negotiating machinery of the Industrial Council for the Europeans, and the merely consultative machinery of the Special Industrial Council for the Africans. These separate machines have served well enough so long as the Europeans and Africans have been performing distinctly separate work. But now that the principle of African advancement into hitherto exclusive European spheres has been accepted, the machinery is obviously inappropriate and much of the tangle into which the negotiations on this issue have been tied is due to this factor, because there is no common negotiating body on which workers of both races who will now be doing the same work can be represented.

48. It seems clear that had the non-racial principles of Southern Rhodesia's new Industrial Conciliation Act been introduced into the Railways labour legislation, the machinery for proper negotiation of the African advancement issue by all parties concerned would have been available and much of the impasse would not have arisen. Admittedly, as previously suggested in this memorandum, the Africans would have hesitated to join the Europeans for reasons of suspicion, but the implications of the issue must necessarily have drawn the workers of both races together in time, and, if the machinery were there to encourage it, a coming together would have been more likely to transpire. As it is, the situation corresponds to the position of the respective mineworkers' unions in Northern Rhodesia, with this difference—that whereas there is no legal obstacle in Northern Rhodesia to an ultimate fusion of the two unions, the present Railways legislation positively prevents it.

Summary

49. To return to the purpose of this memorandum, as set out in the Introduction, the following comments are offered on the respective intentions:—

- (i) To examine the differences both in their substance and in their effect.

The differences between the systems, of labour legislation in the Territories are considerable in substance, but, except where an outdated system is used on the Railways, are unlikely in the long run to have a great deal of difference in effect.

- (ii) To consider whether it is in the interests of the Federation, and of the individual Territories, that the differences should be removed or that they should remain.

50. It is obvious that if the Federation is to progress and the objective set out in the preamble to the Federal Constitution of "partnership and co-operation between all the inhabitants of the Federation" (and this must surely imply partnership between Territories as much as between races) is to be achieved, any advance towards that aim must be handicapped by lack of uniformity in labour legislation. It may be that this is not an aspect of immediate concern; but if the rate of industrial development in all the Territories is to be of any consequence, it is an aspect that will grow into one of considerable importance.

- (iii) If it is concluded that the differences should be removed, to consider whether,
- the system at present in force in one Territory should be adopted by the others; or
 - a hybrid system should be devised.

51. It is further obvious that opinion in each of the two Territories, Southern and Northern Rhodesia, is considerably strong and that each Territory would discountenance adoption of the other Territory's system in place of its own. For that reason any suggestion of attempting to impose one of the existing systems as a universal system is quite fruitless; nor would it, at the present stage, have any justification. Nor would it seem practicable to develop a hybrid system, using some features of each, because the basic principles—the one built on legalised machinery, and the other on informal, voluntary procedure—are so divergent.

- (iv) If it is concluded that the differences cannot be removed, to consider whether any constitutional steps are necessary to prevent their further divergence.

52. At the present stage—when there is strong public opinion in the Northern Territories, even among the Europeans, against giving the Federal Government more powers, and even in favour of removing some it already had—it would clearly be inopportune politically to suggest that Article 30 of the Constitution should be deleted and that labour legislation should be placed even on the Concurrent List. On the other hand it would seem to be an admission that the Territories are not expected to come closer together in this important aspect of human relations if Article 30 is left to stand as it is, because in that case the divergent lines on which the systems in the Territories are now developing must necessarily continue to run farther apart.

53. Taking all the points contained in this memorandum into consideration, it is suggested that Article 30 should be amended so that the power to enact labour legislation remains for the time being with the Territorial Governments, but may be transferred to the Federal Government when, but only when, the Territorial Governments concur.

54. The real purpose of such an amendment would be to imply that the Federal Government has a responsibility to endeavour to achieve ultimate uniformity. As the Article is phrased at present the implication is that the Federal Government must keep its hands off labour legislation. It is known that there is an inter-governmental committee, consisting of representatives of the three Territorial Governments, which acts as a basis of live co-operation between them—that is to say, between the Governments. And it is assumed that this committee is constantly striving towards uniformity by the exchange of information and ideas. But labour relations are not the function of government (even the formalised Southern Rhodesian system recognises this and leaves organised industry to settle its own problems) and any positive steps towards achieving uniformity, or even reconciliation of different systems, must rest with the people and organisations who are concerned.

55. If, therefore, the provision as suggested were written into the Constitution, the Federal Government's interest in labour legislation would be established and it would have justification for entering the field, at first on a purely informal basis, by setting up some form of standing commission, representative of industry and labour in their widest sense, which would enable the problem of achieving ultimate uniformity to be kept constantly under review, not by Government departments, but by the people who are actually concerned.

56. Unless something is done on these lines it is clear that the separation of labour legislation by Territories will be perpetuated and it is suggested that this would certainly hinder attainment of the main objects of Federation.

Oral Evidence

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL COUNCIL OF THE ENGINEERING INDUSTRY

Represented by P. G. Gibbs, General Secretary

Q. You are, I think, the General Secretary of the National Industrial Council of the Engineering Industry here?—A.. Yes, Sir.

Q. In the memorandum you submitted to us on behalf of the Council you have drawn attention to the distinctions between the system which applies in relation to industrial disputes and the prevention of them and the settlement of them in Southern Rhodesia as compared with Northern Rhodesia and, as I understand it, putting it quite shortly, in Southern Rhodesia under the Act of 1959 you have compulsory arbitration, if necessary, on lines which, am I right, are more like those of the Union of South Africa. With your Union, in fact, the two sides represent the whole of the industry for the purposes of negotiation? This contrasts with the position in Northern Rhodesia where they have adopted more the U.K. system where there are negotiations but no compulsory arbitration?—A. Yes.

Q. The Unions also include members of any race; they all belong to the Union.—A. Yes.

Q. To take the biggest industry there, the mining industry, there are two distinct Unions very far apart, the European one and the African one and, as you point out, there will be the greatest objection in the two Territories to adopting, at any rate at the moment, the system of the other, that is right, is it?—A. Yes, Sir.

Q. So that you conclude that whereas in Article 30 of the Constitution, the Federal Legislature should not have powers to make laws in respect of trade unions and the settlement of disputes between employers and employees etc., it would not be appropriate to get rid of that as an interim measure but you would like to see some other words included which would make it possible with the assent of the Territorial Government for a transfer of power to the Federal Legislature at a later stage?—A. Yes.

Q. Does that fairly summarise your points?—A. Yes.

Q. You quite agree there is no question of making any transfer at the moment; it would not be possible, would it, with regard to Northern Rhodesia?—A. No, Sir. Do you wish me to comment on that?

Q. Yes.—A. I think probably that I should make it quite clear from the start that the Council did not see any particular reason or there did not appear to be any particular immediate reason why there should be some alteration to what is in the Federal Constitution but the Council did feel that as the Federal Constitution was being reviewed it was an opportunity in which the whole situation should be thoroughly investigated to see whether there should be any alteration. As the situation is at the moment the present arrangements are working out perfectly satisfactorily because, as you have yourself pointed out, Sir, we have said that neither Territory would wish to give up its own system for that which obtains in the other. But there is, of course, the situation that has arisen over the Railways which does suggest that the subject should come under review now because although the impasse that has come about in the Railways negotiations is basically, of course, due to other than legislative causes the fact that there is a division of the system used makes it no more easy for these other difficulties to be overcome, to put it at the lowest. In fact it does probably present some sort of obstacle to people getting down to it and making decisions.

You are quite right, Sir, when you said that we have pointed out that as things are at the moment the respective systems of each country are working well but the situation in Northern Rhodesia is likely to change for the reason that at the moment industry of any scale in Northern Rhodesia is confined to the one industry in which the employers as such operate as a single entity, whereas it is accepted that developments in Northern Rhodesia will be on the lines of development in Southern Rhodesia when one will get industries that consist of a number of employers instead of just one unit and we do consider that when that situation arises Northern Rhodesia will find that the advantages which we experience from the working of the system in Southern Rhodesia would not be unattractive to them.

Q. As I understand it, you would not suggest any alteration in the Constitution except one which would require the assent of the Territories concerned?—A. Yes. Our reason is this, Sir, that we feel that if the Federal Constitution remains as it is then the door is always shut to any coming together of the two Territories in so far as labour legislation is concerned; they must always be separate. But we feel that the Constitution should be amended so that the door was ready to be opened if somebody wanted to do something.

MR. ELLMAN BROWN: When you say the door is open, would you do it through Federal legislation?—A. We suggested here . . .

CHAIRMAN: Paragraph 53 of the memorandum.—A. That is right. "It is suggested that Article 30 should be amended so that the power to enact labour legislation remains for the time being with the Territorial Governments, but may be transferred to the Federal Government when, but only when, the Territorial Governments concur". It is more than the ethical effect of that, that is to say, it provides for the practical opportunity. We go on to say in paragraph 54 "The real purpose of such an amendment would be to imply that the Federal Government has a responsibility to endeavour to achieve ultimate uniformity" whereas so long as it remains as it is, it is nobody's responsibility that ultimate uniformity should be achieved.

MR. MENZIES: Your real point, I suppose, is you do not want to leave it merely to an amendment of the Constitution which is available even now by adopting the procedure laid down which requires a certain statutory majority? You want to see it written into Article 30 so that there is an implied moral obligation at some time to take it over?—A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When you say when the Territories agree, you mean a simple majority there?—A. I am afraid I do not know much about the Constitutional implications there. It is merely this that if it were written into the Federal Constitution then there would be an obligation on the Federal Government to give consideration to this. At the moment you have this sort of situation, for instance. The Railways is a Federal organisation yet the Federal Minister responsible must keep completely out of any discussions on what is one of the most important matters in regard to the running of his particular portfolio, the labour which is running the Railways.

CHAIRMAN: I was only going to suggest to you that if we adopted what you put forward in paragraph 53 there would not be any moral obligation on anyone to do anything, would there, because you say it would remain with the Territorial Government but it may be transferred to the Federal Government when, but only when, the Territorial Governments concur?—A. No, Sir. I do not know the way that the Federal Government's mind works. It does suggest to me that the Federal Government, particularly in the present instance with the difficulty over the Railways, would say we must consider if we should take the initiative now by getting the two Territorial Governments together and trying to bring them to our suggestion that we should adopt some Federal system. Then, provided we can get the two Territorial Governments to agree that we adopt a Federal system, then we can adopt it, but at the moment the Federal Constitution virtually says to the Federal Government you must lay off this.

CHAIRMAN: As Mr. Menzies was suggesting, if the Territorial Governments and the Federal Government wanted the change they could do it by an amendment under Article 30 of the Constitution.

SIR VICTOR ROBINSON: Who are the people who are parties to your Industrial Council of the Engineering Industry?—A. We have three Employers' Associations—Engineering Employers' Association; they are regional—Bulawayo, Salisbury and Midlands—and we have three trade unions.

Q. Which are?—A. Amalgamated Engineering Union, South Africa Boilermakers' Society and the Rhodesian Engineering Union.

Q. They are the employees?—A. Yes.

Q. With this new Industrial Conciliation Act which has just come in I take it at the present time there is not a single African on the employees' side?—A. No. Up to 1st January this year the Industrial Conciliation Act specifically excluded the African in the definition of employee. From the beginning of this year the new Act has come into force. Would you like me to expand this?

CHAIRMAN: Yes.—A. This Engineering Industrial Council now has an agreement which runs to the end of this year in terms of the old Act. Any new agreement it comes to will be in terms of the new Act so if the terms of that agreement are to be applicable to employees in the industry irrespective of their race the trade unions must be representative of all those employees before an agreement can be made binding. So trade unions in our industry at this moment are faced with the situation and I understand that they are working on this situation to draw in not only the African employees, but to draw all employees into their membership, otherwise they will not be representative of the employees of the industry but they cannot come into the agreement which expires at the end of the year.

SIR VICTOR ROBINSON: They are working to get the Africans into the union which was in the past wholly European?—A. That is right.

Q. You as a Council have nothing to do with that Conciliation Act?—A. No, Sir. The Industrial Conciliation Act excludes from its operations statutory commissions and the Railways have a similar piece of legislation which is the Second Schedule to the Railway Act but this should outmode the Industrial Conciliation Act.

Q. The point is this: you as a Council are very jealous of interfering in the affairs of the Railways because you feel that the Federal Government whose creature the Railways are has no say whatever in the rates and wages or anything else. In other words Southern Rhodesia and Northern Rhodesia can tomorrow say that every African on the Railways shall get £50 a month and the Federal Government want us to find the money, is that the point?—A. No, Sir, we are not asking the Federal Government to do anything at all.

Q. You are sorry for them?—A. In the first place in regard to this question of interference, might I just read this introduction. I do not think it is included on the copies of the memorandum we sent; it was included in the letter which went to the Commission and I have an idea from what Sir Victor has said that it is possible that he misunderstands the situation.

Q. I was trying to get at what your worries were about Railways.—A. "The National Industrial Council of the Engineering Industry in Southern Rhodesia is a body constituted to operate in terms of the Industrial Conciliation Act within the engineering industry, and its authority is naturally confined to Southern Rhodesia and to that authority. The Council, has, however, been established for seventeen years. and during that time it has acquired wide experience in the working of the Colony's industrial conciliation system. Its members have always believed that in exercising the functions entrusted to them they have a wider responsibility than mere concern with the affairs of their own industry and that decisions on these affairs must be related to the national interests as a whole".

Consequently it is for that reason the Council has come along and put those proposals forward. I do not want to give the impression that we are interfering in something which is not our concern.

The other point is the suggestion that the decision about wages should be put in the hands of the Federal Government. That is not the effect of industrial conciliation at all. The whole purpose of industrial conciliation is that it shall be home rule for industry and that each industry and that those who are engaged in the industry and employees should meet round the table and come to decisions between them. We are not trying to suggest that it should be written into the Federal Constitution that the Federal Council should lay down wages and rates for industry.

MR. A. E. P. ROBINSON: In view of the very special position of the Railways and the statutory bodies generally would you contemplate a constitutional arrangement whereby the Territorial Governments were responsible for labour legislation in Southern Rhodesia and Northern Rhodesia as they are now but that the Federal Government might be responsible for labour legislation in respect of Federal statutory bodies such as the Railways, Airways, Federal Power Board and other similar institutions?—A. We believe, Sir, that most satisfactory arrangements would be for labour legislation to be a Federal Government responsibility and, of course, it is merely enabling legislation that is required in any case.

Q. You make that point quite clearly. Would you as an interim or any other sort of measure regard it as helpful if the Federal Government were empowered to pass legislation in respect of labour matters affecting statutory bodies?—A. Yes, I think it would be a great advantage in the present circumstances.

PROFESSOR JACK: Could I ask you three questions? The first is purely one of your text in paragraph 6 where you refer to the Act of 1959 as applying irrespective of race which I think is a correct statement. In paragraph 26(a) you talk about the Industrial Conciliation Act; then in brackets—so far confined to non-Africans—is not that an error?—A. Yes. Let me put it this way. In Paragraph 26(a) what I really meant was that so far it has only been applied to non-Africans. There is not a single agreement yet in force under the new Act.

Q. The correct legal statement is as in paragraph 6.—A. Yes.

Q. The second point I wanted to ask you is this: although labour legislation is a Territorial function there is provision for liaison in the three Territories, of an Inter-Territorial Consultative Committee on Labour whose terms of reference include this in the first part, "To explore and report on the possibility of uniformity of labour legislation within the Federation". Have you any knowledge or experience of the working of that Inter-Territorial Committee?—A. What knowledge I have is very secondhand. I have discussed the matter with members of the Committee from both Northern Rhodesia and Southern Rhodesia and I understand that they do, before any matter of labour legislation goes before either the Southern Rhodesia House or Northern Rhodesia House, consult about it

Q. Is the Committee composed solely of officials in Government?—A. Yes.

Q. There is no consultation with Employers' Associations?—A. No, Sir, they are entirely Government servants.

Q. Do you think it would be a good thing if employers and trade unions were members of that liaison committee?—A. I do not know whether it could possibly work. In fact, you will see that is really what we have said in paragraph 54 at the end of the third paragraph. "But labour relations are not the function of government (even the formalized Southern Rhodesian system recognises this and leaves organised industry to settle its own problems) and any positive steps towards achieving uniformity, or even reconciliation, of different systems, must rest with the people and organisations who are concerned."

If, therefore, the provision as suggested were written into the Constitution, the Federal Government's interest in labour legislation would be established and it would have justification for entering the field, at first on a purely informal basis, by setting up some form of standing commission, representative of industry and labour in their widest sense, which would enable the problem of achieving ultimate uniformity to be kept constantly under review, not by Government departments, but by the people who are actually concerned".

In other words we have said there that is what we do want.

Q. The third question does not arise from your memorandum, but have you any knowledge of the Industrial Courts Act, 1919, in the United Kingdom?—A. No.

PROFESSOR JACK: I will not put my question to you then.

MR. CHIRWA: In paragraph 38 you say: "It is, of course, impossible to predict whether in these circumstances the Africans will consent to join the unions already established by Europeans, and the consensus of responsible African opinion is that they will be reluctant to do so". Reading from the papers and having had discussions with Africans, naturally I do have the fears of the Africans at the moment that if they did join these European unions under the new legislation the possibility is that they would not be leaders in these unions and the leadership would be confined to Europeans. Do you think that is a possibility?—A. Let me say this. I know what the Southern Rhodesian Government wishes the approach to be and that is that the control of trade unions should be in accordance with the skills of the people who are the members and that whereas there would be some qualifying of the vote in trade union affairs this should be qualified by the skills of the different members, that is to say, that the fully skilled men would have a greater say in the affairs of the union than the unskilled men. They would balance the votes accordingly but they would have to be in the trade that put proposals forward and, of course, it is an accepted practice in trade unions that these would have to be absolutely fair and not based on an endeavour to counteract an overwhelming number of unskilled workers in relation to the skilled workers.

Q. Do you think that this present legislation will work to the advantage of the Africans? Will the Europeans who also will be the leaders of the union take up the African causes as if they were Africans themselves?—A. I think that one has got to say quite frankly that there is bound at first to be some prejudice. The racial prejudice is there and you are not going to get rid of a racial prejudice just because you have passed an Act in which race is not supposed to enter. But I think that the very fact that the situation has been set up whereby Africans and all races in fact shall be in the same union must lead to the disappearance of racial prejudices because the members of the union whoever they are will come to recognise that actually all workers, whatever race they are, have a common interest. If they are in separate unions they are not so likely to come to the conclusion that they have a common interest but if they are in the same trade union and that trade union is negotiating with employers then my opinion is that the realisation that they are workers and not people of different races and that those workers have common interests, is likely to come about very much better than if the trade unions were separate racial trade unions.

Q. Has your Council started thinking of taking Africans into responsible jobs, that is to say, are you prepared to have African apprentices in the engineering industry?—A. The question of the introduction of apprentices is covered, of course, by the separate legislation of the Apprentices' Act but the answer to anybody who asks us whether an industry is prepared to have African apprentices boils itself down to the individual employers; is he prepared to have him and that is where the bottleneck is and is likely to be for some time; is the individual employer prepared to take an African apprentice on? So far as the engineering industry is concerned there are qualifications laid down for apprenticeships. They are not very serious qualifications. They are Standard VII and Standard VII in English and Arithmetic and that is all. In theory if an African presents himself with those qualifications and he has found an employer who is prepared to engage him as an apprentice he can become an apprentice.

Q. In practice?—A. In practice it will depend on whether the employer will take him.

Q. What do you think is likely to be the attitude of the employers in this matter?—A. I know a number of employers who would be quite prepared to do it.

MR. CRAWLEY: Are there any African apprentices?—A. In the engineering industry, no.

Q. Could I just ask you for some elucidation of these words appearing in paragraph 11—"Membership of a trade union must be limited to workers in one particular industry". Does that mean an electrician who works on a bridge is a member of your union and one who works in a power station is not?—A. The division of industries has always been a very tricky question because it is very difficult indeed to get a definition of industry that has an absolutely straight abiding line. It is always very ragged but we will put it his way. You can have a tradesman who is a fitter and turner who is working in the motor industry and in terms of the new Act he has got to be a member of a different union from a fitter and turner who is working in the engineering industry which is separate.

MR. MENZIES: They are not craft unions, they are industrial?—A. They have been in the past in the Amalgamated Engineering Union. Now there is provision in the new Act which has allowed those unions already registered in more than one industry to be registered. The Amalgamated Engineering Union in this country was previously registered in a number of industries and would still register its members in those industries. Any new unions, and this will, of course, particularly apply to those new unions which are likely to be formed very shortly now by Africans, will have to be in one industry. I will mention the example of where this will emphasise the situation, that is lorry drivers. The heavy vehicle driving has been virtually taken over by the African in this country and if they wished to form a union those lorry drivers who were driving lorries for employers engaged in the engineering industry would not be able to be in the same union as those lorry drivers who were employed by employers who were in the cement industry.

MR. CRAWLEY: Who decides where the engineering industry begins and ends?—A. A Council which is formed by the trade unions and employers' associations applies for registration in that particular industry which its parties represent but it is going to be difficult to interpret this Act because it is merely laid down in the new Act—it was not in the old Act—that a trade union may only be registered in one industry and, of course, that decision will be in the hands of the registrar or minister and he is going to have to make some fairly arbitrary decisions.

PROFESSOR JACK: There is no definition of what an industry is?—A. No.

CHAIRMAN: It may be a problem of demarcation?—A. Yes, a chalk line.

MR. CHIRWA: Suppose an African was an apprentice and he qualified, would your Council have any objection to that man receiving the same pay as a European?—A. The Council would have very serious objection if he did not. Of course, up till now, the Council agreements have been in the terms of the old Act. The Council has had no jurisdiction over the African but from now on when the new agreement comes in it will apply to all workers irrespective of race.

CHAIRMAN: I wanted to ask you one other thing about the Railways. You have a Railway running through two Territories and they have their different Governments and industrial legislation. Do you find the people in the Railways transfer to other industries from time to time, and the reverse?—A. Not on any scale.

Q. So it would not be an awkward problem if they left the industry; they might lose superannuation or other benefits?—A. No, Sir.

Q. Very few transfer?—A. That is right.

CHAIRMAN: Thank you very much for giving us this help. If I may say so, it has been particularly interesting to me.—A. Thank you, Sir.

Additional Memorandum
NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE ENGINEERING INDUSTRY

Bulawayo,
13th April 1960.

Dear Lord Monckton,

It has occurred to me that your Commission would be interested in a recent paper that I prepared on the subject of African participation in industry.

I enclose a copy, and have a supply available of further copies should you think that your members would like to see them.

Yours sincerely,
(Signed) P. G. Gibbs.

Fragmentation and the Rate for the Job

The process of advancement of the African in industry has already been set in motion and has been going on for a number of years. So the problem is not, as is so often implied, merely whether advancement should be embarked upon but, rather, whether the process should or should not be stopped, and if it is not to be stopped, at what pace and in what manner it should be continued.

First, it is essential to look at the historical background of the present situation. When Europeans first came to this part of Africa seventy years ago they found the country peopled by a race whom the march of civilisation had passed entirely by. The Europeans took on their own shoulders the task of developing the country, and all that the Africans could contribute at first was their manual labour. Due to their lack of any civilisation at all the Africans were incapable at the time of acquiring even the most elementary skills, and being primitive people they were satisfied with a primitive standard of living.

Gradually they learnt the elementary skills—some of them even acquired a smattering of education—so that in time they were able to do a little more than mere labouring, and although their work was still menial they began to take on tasks requiring at least an elementary aptitude. But their economic level, based on the standards that had been established when they were still but primitive labourers—and that is what the majority of them still were—remained virtually as it had been from the time the Europeans had first come. This was the state of affairs that persisted up to the time of the second World War.

What had happened, in effect, was that the comprehensive range of industrial and commercial labour, stretching from the most highly skilled work at the top to completely unskilled labouring at the bottom—which range is normally classified in levels of skill in a series of reasonably uniform steps—was divided in the first instance into two entirely separate groups. The upper group, comprising work carried out by Europeans, stretched from the skilled jobs at the top of the range down to jobs of comparatively little intrinsic skill—jobs which were, however, beyond the capacity of the primitive, uneducated African, as he then almost universally was. The lower group comprised work, involving even less or no skill at all, which the African was able to do, which was comparatively limited in extent but varied nevertheless in the degree of competence it required.

In an integrated society the whole range covered by both groups would have been carried out by workers living on one economic standard, and the difference between the wages paid to those at the top and the bottom of the range would have remained within the standard. Consequently, the extent of that difference would have been relatively narrow and would have been limited by two factors—the maximum economic value in the labour market of the most skilled workers at the top, and the minimum subsistence needs, within the same economic standard, of the unskilled labourers at the bottom. However, by dividing the whole range into two separate groups, each on a separate economic standard—one a standard of civilised living, the other a standard of primitive existence—the difference between the wages at the top and bottom limits of the range was tremendously increased. In fact, as the two groups had no common factors influencing the fixing of wages, there was no relationship between them whatever.

And even within the groups the normal pattern of wage relationship was lost. Taking the lower group first, there was at the time almost no differentiation at all in the wages paid for the different jobs. Every African was virtually paid the same minimum subsistence wage, on his own economic standard, irrespective of the form of labour he was performing, or of the degree of aptitude or physical effort involved. Usually, the only differentiation was made in relation to length of service, and the ingredients of the job were hardly taken into account.

In the upper group there was some differentiation in wages based on the relative skills of the jobs concerned, but, for reasons which are explained in the next paragraph, the difference between the wages for the most skilled work in that upper group, and the wages for the least skilled work in the same group, was not as wide as it would necessarily have been in an integrated society with all the workers on one economic standard.

Each industry, and each unit in industry, has a certain amount of money to spread over its payments to workers in wages. Even though there may be controversy on how that amount should be determined, or what factors should influence it, it is nevertheless a determinable amount. If, from that amount, all the workers in both groups were to be paid on the same economic standard—as is an integrated society—there would clearly be less of the whole amount for distribution among the workers in the upper group than there would be if those in the lower group were to be paid on a different and much lower economic standard. There is, in fact, a cake of a determinate size to be shared throughout the industry, and if the lower group is given a disproportionately small slice of the cake, there is a correspondingly disproportionately large slice left for the upper group. So the effect of spreading the amount available for wages over two groups on different economic standards has been to inflate the wages of the upper group, and particularly for the lower classifications in that group, to higher levels than they would have reached if the classifications in the lower group had been paid on the same economic standard.

In the decade following the Second World War, the rate of industrial expansion in the Rhodesias, in relation to the previous economic growth of the country, was tremendous, and the demand for labour at any level far outpaced the supply. Inevitably, where it was practicable to employ an African to meet a particular demand, this was done. Naturally there was a limit to the skill that could be expected of an African at this stage, and there were also certain legal and sociological restrictions to the spheres of his employment. (I include among the “legal restrictions” industrial agreements which fixed wages on the European economic standard and thereby, by reason of the racial structure of our society, automatically excluded the employment of Africans even though they imposed no theoretical colour bar.)

But a fair number of Africans had now received some primary and, in a limited number of instances, secondary education; and, whether educated or not, those in the towns had been in contact with industrial practices for some time, so—where legal or sociological restrictions were not applied—they were able to embark upon work which may have involved comparatively little intrinsic skill, but nevertheless had previously been reserved for the Europeans in the upper group. And, in those years following the second World War, there was arising throughout the world an ever-growing demand for emancipation of the backward races—a demand which was bound to have the effect of accelerating any process that might be set in motion by purely local circumstances.

So, as a result of this process of evolution, where there has been no legal or sociological bar to prevent the African from doing so, he has already advanced to undertake work which has traditionally been included among the lower classifications in the upper group—and for which wages were previously paid on the higher, European economic standard—while he himself is still receiving wages on his lower economic standard. At the same time, in those industries or commercial undertakings where a legal or sociological bar to the employment of Africans has been and is still operating, the same or similar work is being carried out by Europeans, at rates of wages based on their higher economic standard.

Consequently, if the expression “the rate for the job” is understood to mean the rate of wages for a particular job which has been established by custom there have already been established two rates for the job in certain classes of work.

The Bogey of “Fragmentation”

The jobs which have been referred to in the foregoing—that is to say, those jobs in the lower classifications of the upper group which in some instances are now being done by Africans—have generally been jobs requiring no specialised skill or training. Their performance requires common sense, aptitude, little more than an elementary education, a reasonable sense of responsibility, and not much else. Examples are: motor-vehicle driving, straightforward stores supervision, simple clerical work.

There is, however, a second category of semi-skilled work which is also already being done by Africans, the demand for which has arisen from the expansion of industrialisation locally and will increase as industry develops. This is what is known as "fragmentation" of skilled work; that is to say, the performance of individual operations which in the past have been carried out by skilled workers as part of their overall range of work. This development, in the breaking down of skilled work into comparatively simple operations, is one that has come about whenever there has been industrial, and even commercial, expansion even in integrated societies, and the problem that it presents is not basically one of race, although it is complicated in this country by the dual economic standards on which the workers are at present living.

Qualifications for skilled labour imply a knowledge, backed by experience, which enables the worker to carry out all the multifarious individual operations that go to make up the full compass of his occupation. This is true of a journeyman practising a recognised skilled trade, such as a fitter and turner or a compositor, or a worker engaged in an occupation requiring long training and experience, such as a railway guard. The essence of his skill is his versatility; and it is his length of training and variety of experience that establishes his value to his employer and entitles him to a high rate of wages.

But at the same time each individual operation, of those which combine to make up the skilled worker's whole occupation, can, in a number of instances, be learnt in a relatively short period of training, by a worker without the ability or qualifications needed to master the whole range of the occupation—provided that the particular operation is uncomplicated by association with another operation. Moreover, it is fundamentally uneconomic to employ skilled workers, able to undertake any operation within the wide compass of their calling, on the repetition of individual operations. Nor does a fully skilled worker wish to be so restricted in the practice of the occupation for which he has been trained.

In the early stages of industrial development, when industry is mainly engaged in "jobbing" as distinct from quantitative production, the only workers needed are the all-round, versatile, skilled tradesmen and the entirely unskilled labourers. When quantitative production is embarked upon the skilled worker is still needed, but for other purposes; not for the production of the actual goods themselves—as in the times of jobbing—but for supervisory and technical services. In fact, the establishment of manufacturing industries, wherein the productive labour force is confined to semi-skilled and unskilled workers each carrying out one individual operation only, creates employment for skilled workers that would not otherwise exist—both within the manufacturing industries themselves, and also in the ancillary jobbing industries which profit from the development and maintenance work that arises.

This breaking down of skilled occupations to simple operations is the process of "fragmentation", and instead of reducing the demand for skilled workers, as is so often implied, it actually increases it. The effect of fragmentation is fully analogous to that of mechanisation, and although mechanisation when first introduced was feared by the workers to imply a reduction in the demand for labour, time has indisputably proved that the opposite has been the result. Mechanisation increases productivity; and increased productivity, by reducing cost of production, widens markets.

In integrated societies, with all workers on the same economic standard, fragmentation has had the same effect as mechanisation. More goods have been produced at lower prices, markets have widened and demand has been increased, and employment for all classes of labour has been swollen. The clearest proof of this truth can be seen in the motor-car manufacturing industry. Forty years ago, before Henry Ford introduced mass production to the world, every motor-car was virtually built by hand by skilled workers. The result was that cars cost so much that only very rich people could afford them. As the skilled processes in their production were progressively broken down into operations—which, with each step in fragmentation, required less skill to perform—so the prices of the products progressively fell (relative to the value of money) and where motor-cars were turned out only in dozens they now roll off production lines in tens of thousands. In fact, if the principles of mechanisation and fragmentation had been rejected—as workers throughout industrial history have always fought to reject them—millions of workers of all classes would have been denied employment over the years. This principle is not confined to industrial manufacturing processes; it applies in all spheres of employment, and mechanisation or fragmentation of commercial work has the same effect of increasing productivity, with its consequent increase in overall demand for labour.

Antagonism of workers to threats of mechanisation or fragmentation, even though it is unjustified, is understandable enough. That the skilled worker will not suffer by the introduction of either process always seems to him to be a gamble, and he not unreasonably sees himself as the pawn that is to be sacrificed if the gamble does not come off. But the gamble always does come off, because in truth it is no gamble at all. It is, rather, a deliberate and essential measure in the pursuit of economic expansion and national prosperity, and never in history have workers of any class obtained anything but eventual and lasting good from it.

A Common Economic Standard

In a number of instances where fragmentation of skilled work has already been effected in this country the individual operations are being done by Africans, and so the wages paid to those performing them have been related to the lower, African economic standard. In other instances, where Coloured labour has been employed, wages have been paid on a level between the general rates paid on the European and African standards; and in a few instances European operatives have been employed and have usually been paid rates of wages not much less than those ruling for skilled workers. That is to say, the rate for the job applied to individual "fragmented" operations has in every case been determined arbitrarily, according to the economic standard of the race of the worker performing it, and has had little connection with the value of the operation relative to the skill involved.

This local process of fragmentation, and the method of determining wages, which has been effected only over the last few years, has tied yet another knot in the tangle of dual economies which even previously had made our situation so different from that in an integrated society. In an integrated society the wages paid to workers carrying out fragmented operations naturally bear a fairly close relation to those paid to the fully skilled workers whose occupation has been broken down, because all are living on the same economic standard (That situation applies, in fact, in this country in those instances where the fragmented jobs are being done by Europeans.) But, if we compare the overall picture of our present situation with that of an integrated society, we find that not only have European workers been carrying out for many years comparatively unskilled—but traditionally European—jobs for relatively high wages, but also that African workers are now carrying out fragmented jobs—involving narrow but nevertheless definite skills—for relatively low wages. Or, to put it the other way round, in an integrated society the workers doing those particular jobs which are being done here by Europeans would be paid relatively less, and the workers doing those jobs being done here by Africans would be paid relatively more.

If, therefore, the objective is to determine rates of wages in relation to the skill, or other appropriate factors, involved in the job, and irrespective of the race of the worker performing it, the present structure that has been built up so arbitrarily must be entirely disregarded. At the same time it has to be recognised that if such a non-racial approach is to be adopted, consideration of separate economies cannot enter the calculations. The whole range of industrial and commercial labour, from the highest skilled worker to the labourer, must be integrated on one economic standard.

A non-racial approach—and that is the professed intention of those who use the slogan "the rate for the job"—implies, by definition, a common economic standard for all workers and a wage structure classified in levels of skill in a series of generally uniform steps. In determining this structure it is reasonable enough to take the standard of wages established for a European skilled worker as the datum line to which other rates can be related. (It has been suggested earlier in this paper that the whole of the scale of wages in the upper, European group has been inflated by the operation of the dual economies—thanks to the disproportionately large slice of cake enjoyed by that group—but most of that inflation has occurred in the lower levels of the group and the wages at the top have been least affected.) But that is as far as the "rate for the job" as a principle can be applied—not because of political considerations, but because of inexorable economic laws. In the context of a unified standard of economy, the rates for all other jobs must be relative—in accordance with their degree of skill—to the wages for fully skilled work. Up to the present they have been based on no such relation, so there is nothing either logical or equitable in persisting that they shall remain "the rates for the jobs". This does not mean that most of the present rates in the higher categories will not remain on their present level, but if they do remain there, it will be solely on their merits and not for the sake of satisfying a shibboleth.

The process of unifying, within the Federation, the economic standards of the races, and of establishing rates of wages on their proper relative levels within one standard, would normally be one of gradual evolution—which, incidentally, like the very process of African advancement has already started. But because of the sociological aspects of the African advancement problem the process of economic evolution is not being given a chance to operate naturally. During the decade following the second World War it operated automatically enough, and in actual fact both the European and the African profited handsomely from it. But from the point of view of the European extremist, who fears African advancement, it has operated too fast, while from the point of view of the average African, who feels frustrated, it has operated far too slowly. So now we are experiencing a clash between these view points, and neither side is prepared to leave economic evolution to work out its own salvation.

Achieving the Common Standard

There can be only one way out; to accept that the workers in industry and commerce must, within a measurable period of time, be integrated on one economic standard—that is to say, the economic standard of the urban African must be raised to that level where he is on the same basis as the European, so that he may be in a position to enjoy the normal amenities of civilised society at his particular social level within that society. When that has been achieved, rates of wages can be determined, as they should be, by the relative values of the jobs. This will mean that the difference between the wages of the most skilled worker and the least skilled labourer will be circumscribed by the two limiting economic factors—the maximum economic value of the skilled worker and the minimum subsistence needs of the labourer, both being on the same economic standard. As a result, the range of wages will be severely narrowed down from the tremendous differential that exists today.

If that objective is accepted, two decisions have to be made in order to implement it. The first is, what period is to be set by the end of which the single economic standard is to be achieved? And the second, How is the adjustment from the dual standards to be made?

In deciding on an arbitrary period within which to raise the economic standard of the African to the European level, there is one particular aspect that has to be considered. That is the case of the European with a low standard of ability who up to now has found a place in the upper group of workers solely on account of his race, and has consequently enjoyed wages at a level above that to which his relative ability entitles him. In an integrated society his natural level would be considerably lower. But the whole object of integration will be to encompass all wage rates, including those of the lowest paid labourer, within one economic standard wherein all workers can enjoy the normal amenities of civilised society. Consequently although the unskilled European will be paid, not in accordance with his race, but in accordance with his ability—so that the rate of wages for the job he is able to do may be lower than that which Europeans with the same limited abilities have enjoyed in the past—his standard of living will not be depressed below the levels of civilised society.

But, having established over the years, as we have, a tradition of protection for the less able European, it would not be practicable to remove it instantaneously, despite that ultimately it must be removed. And it is that period, over which it would be just and reasonable to remove such racial protection, that should be set as the period during which a single economic standard for all workers is to be achieved.

If that period is set at ten years—it should certainly not be more although it might be unreasonable to set it at less—it would mean that the next generations of European school-children, that is to say those entering junior school within the next few years and thereafter, would know that when they leave school they will have to stand entirely on their own merits in direct competition with school-leavers of other races. They will have to do that in any case, but it is better that we should ensure that whatever work they find themselves fitted to do—be it entirely unskilled—will be paid for at wages within the economic standard of a civilised society, and that we will not be creating a race of "poor whites".

Therefore it is necessary now, at this moment, to set down clearly what is to be the detailed wage structure in each individual branch of industry and commerce in ten years' time (based on present monetary standards but subject, of course, to adjustment to conform to fluctuations in the value of the pound)—classified in levels of skill in a series of generally uniform steps, on the basis of a single economic standard for all workers. It would not be unreasonable to require by law that from now on every industrial agreement, or employment regulation, or any form of instrument of wage determination, besides laying down its current scale of wages on present standards, must set out a parallel scale based on a unitary economic standard, and must provide for the method by which adjustment from one scale to the other shall be made in the ten year period.

That would be an honest method of fixing "the rate for the job"; by establishing a rate based, not on an arbitrary consideration of race, but on the relative worth of the job on a common economic standard, and insisting thereafter that that is the rate to be paid irrespective of who is doing the job. Until that is done the slogan "the rate for the job" will remain, as I have called it, merely a shibboleth.

Memorandum

A. D. H. LLOYD

(Graduate in History and Political Science. Former Southern Rhodesian Member of Parliament. Temporarily Minister of Justice, Internal Affairs and Labour, Southern Rhodesia, 1958.)

A. Bearing in mind the terms of reference of the Commission, the following memorandum constitutes an attempt to analyse the situation in the Federation in general and in Southern Rhodesia in particular during the years 1953 to 1959.

B. The Political Sphere

1. In the campaign which preceded the referendum on the draft proposals for federation its protagonists were, in the light of after events, at variance in their interpretation of the proposals. The majority sought closer association (a unitary state being denied to them) for two reasons; to secure for the rapidly expanding secondary industry of Southern Rhodesia, stimulated by the War, the bulwark of taxative revenue from the copper mines of Northern Rhodesia and, secondly, to prevent the creation of Black independent states in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland. The minority now out of parliamentary life in Southern Rhodesia, advocated acceptance of the draft federal constitution (and, in particular, of its preamble) as a means of achieving a non-racial society through partnership of the races. It was essential in their view to secure the confidence of the African people in all three territories in the good faith and impartiality of the Federal Government so as to enable its subjects, when they so desired, "to go forward with confidence towards the attainment of full membership of the Commonwealth". The acceptance of the Federal Constitution represented a solemn obligation by the Federal Government to continue the policy of trusteeship of the African people.

2. The antagonists of the draft scheme for federation composed of avowed White supremacists, advocated a policy of European entrenchment. In the event there proved to be close identity of interest between the majority of the protagonists and of the antagonists.

3. There are now four fundamental reasons why the progress of the Federation towards advancement of its constitutional status envisaged in Article 99 of the Constitution has been halted. They are:—

(i) The association of two dependent protectorates with a semi-sovereign self-governing territory in a federation was a constitutional anachronism. The Federal Government based upon a virtually exclusive and relatively small White electorate governed a federal state (the ultimate sovereignty of which lay in the hands of the British Parliament) composed of a people which was, in the main, opposed to closer association of the territories.

(ii) The Federal Government, electorally dependent upon the White population, identified its interests with its electorate. It inevitably became a government with "partnership on its lips and apartheid in its heart", compelled to service the prejudices of the narrowly-based electorate.

(iii) Although the legal and administrative machinery of federation was set up swiftly and efficiently, in the field of human relationships in the new State, the confidence of the majority of the inhabitants was not fostered and secured by impartial administration. The development of federal patriotism as distinct from racial nationalism was neglected.

(iv) In these circumstances, the spread of pan-African nationalism from West to East Africa and thence through the Congo received no check in the existence of a government in the Federation securely based on the confidence and good will of its subjects.

4. The basic reasons for these post-federal developments are set out in Leys: "European Government in Southern Rhodesia" (Oxford Press).

5. The predominant pre-occupation of the Federal and Southern Rhodesian Governments with the interests of the White electorate led to the banishment of liberal elements (the minority of the protagonists of the Federal scheme) from the governing party in 1958. Their subsequent political banishment by the electorate in the Southern Rhodesian general election of June, 1958, destroyed the belief of the African people that a non-racial policy of partnership could be achieved. The governing party, shed of the advocates of such a policy and of a widely based franchise, was returned to power. Liberalism being eclipsed, the way was open to the growth of African nationalism. The inception of the Special Vote recommended by the Tredgold Commission on the Franchise, subsequently nullified by stringent conditions of registration imposed by subsidiary legislation to the Electoral Act of Southern Rhodesia, did not secure a more widely-based franchise. The electoral voice was still overwhelmingly that of the European section of the population. The Federal franchise also was designed to prevent an adequate broadening of the electoral will. Government remained, and still remains, narrowly based upon a predominantly White electorate.

6. The rejection of liberalism based on the fulfilment of the fundamental concepts of the Federal Constitution in combination with the economic and social conditions of the territories, in particular of Nyasaland, led to the most unfortunate results. The African people, despairing of the development of liberal government, could only turn to their nationalists.

7. Federal and Southern Rhodesian Government leaders, conscious of their lack of sovereign and independent power imposed by the provisions of the Federal and Southern Rhodesian Constitutions and needful of such power to withstand the growth of African nationalism, began a federal-wide campaign for the early grant of dominion status. African nationalism in Nyasaland reacted sharply to this demand fearing, rightly or wrongly, the imposition of Southern Rhodesian discriminatory practices in Nyasaland. Dr. Banda was called from Britain to lead an African National Congress, strengthened and unified by the cry for dominion status. Thus, as Sir John Moffat has said: "Dr. Banda did not create the crisis, the crisis created Dr. Banda". Having fanned the fire of militant nationalism, it was quenched by the Southern Rhodesian Government (so closely identified with the Federal Government in the all-embracing governing party) which declared a state of emergency and introduced preventive detention legislation.

8. The history of the years 1953 to 1959, when objectively written, may well record that due to their electoral systems the Governments of the Federation and of Southern Rhodesia were gravely out of touch with the African people during these years, so important to the new State. For example, since February, 1958, it has become virtually impossible for members of Parliament (other than nationalist) to hold peaceful meetings with Africans in the rural and urban areas of Southern Rhodesia. This has been due to the resentment created by the detentions of the Emergency. Only members of the electorally rejected liberal group have any real and peaceful contact with the African population as a whole.

9. It would be quite untrue to suggest that there are not genuine liberal elements in the governing party. Liberal measures have been introduced, unfortunately under pressure and as a matter of political expediency. The voice of these liberal members has been nullified by the reactionary measures with which they have allowed themselves to be identified. The institution of sincerely progressive measures, following the destruction of the confidence of the African people in governmental intention to implement partnership, is regarded as a victory for nationalism rather than as a sign of genuine liberal tendency.

10. The detention without trial of African nationalist leaders in February, 1959, was a grave error of political judgment, especially in Southern Rhodesia. There the African National Congress was ill-led and without much cohesive organisation. In the van of its leadership were some men of criminal record or tendencies. Others were genuinely and sincerely disturbed by political and economic frustration; by the often unsympathetic (though technically excellent) administration of the Native Land Husbandry Act; by the failure to abolish irritating discriminatory practices and legislation; by the rigid colour bar in industry. The evidence laid before the Detention Tribunal in 1959, following the Emergency, if released to the Commission, would, it is believed, substantiate each one of the submissions just made.

C. The Economic and Social Spheres

1. Since 1940, relatively speaking, a great industrial revolution had developed in Southern Rhodesia. One hundred thousand rural Africans, constituting in the main a primitive peasantry, had migrated from the rural areas to the urban centres seeking work in the new factories and workshops which sprang up during and after the War. This industrial development led to the unprecedented post-War immigration of White artisans, clerical workers and business executives. Fragmentation of skilled trades to suit the ability of the African migrants greatly increased industrial potential. The familiar pattern of an industrially developing country followed, bringing in its train all the problems of industrialism and, in particular, the problems of housing, recreation, social adjustments and of employer-employee relationships. Strikes occurred caused by inadequate wages, poor conditions of employment and of housing. Labour Boards were set up, conditions of employment laid down and minimum wages established. But the fundamental problems of the breakdown of the industrial colour bar; of legalised trade-unionism; security of tenure in housing and urban and rural land ownership; and extension of the franchise, were only slowly and hesitantly recognised and partially tackled.

2. It is to be remembered, however, that an indictment of governmental action in the Federation in the years 1953 to 1959 would be unfair unless the difficulties of government were exemplified. The inception of Federation placed a great burden upon the European population of the three territories in 1953. It was essential to procure from a population of 250,000 Europeans, at a time when educational facilities for Africans had not, as yet, produced many African leaders and administrators of calibre, a cadre of trained and capable men to compose the parliaments, governments, public services and commercial and industrial enterprises of the new State. There was a genuine and sincere desire to extend educational facilities for Africans on the part of Government, such desire being frustrated by lack of finance. The Commission may find that an essential to the success of the federal system of government in Central Africa was lacking in view of the relatively small numbers of the population capable of manning its institutions.

3. Despite this great handicap which contributed to the difficulties of government in Southern Rhodesia and throughout the Federation during the years 1953 to 1959 (and indeed since the grant of self-government in 1924 in the former territory), the usurpation of the rule of law during the emergency was unwarranted. It was apparent early in 1958 that a few irresponsible, even criminal, advocates of violence amongst African nationalist leaders would have to be punished. It was said by Government during the Emergency that legislation adequate to secure their punishment was lacking. Even if this be correct, the Southern Rhodesian Government had adequate time after the election of June, 1958, to introduce the necessary legislation. It failed to do so, possibly because its all-White parliament was so out of touch with the African people. Ultimately in February, 1959, it detained without trial a number of persons of whom the majority were innocent of subversive activity, who were members of the African National Congress which they had joined, in default of other action, in order to secure redress of legitimate grievances. The only reasonable explanation of the detention of innocent men, who had to be released soon afterwards for lack of evidence and sound reason for their detention, lies in Government's ignorance of the legitimate desires and aspirations and of the grievances and hardships of the African people, unrepresented electorally in Parliament. Consultation of Government with liberal leaders outside Parliament, once the decision to intern was taken, would have resulted in the numbers of those detained being greatly lessened. Thus the dangerous effects of a mistaken policy would have been limited, because liberal leaders had a considerable understanding and knowledge of the situation among Africans.

D. Future Constitutional Advancement of the Federation

1. Despite all that has been said in criticism of governmental administration, particularly in Southern Rhodesia, since the advent of federation, the existing confused situation is remediable. European and African, Asian and Coloured leaders of liberal thought in all three territories who hold the confidence and loyalty of their people believe that a truly liberal and non-racial policy of their people can yet succeed in the Federation. The essential requisite to success is the broadening of the franchise on a reasonably qualitative basis until the effects of universal education to a compulsory age of sixteen years are experienced. Secondly, it is essential to abolish all discriminatory practices based upon colour. There are a number of trained and capable men and women of the races other than European unable to develop their ability and to satisfy their legitimate aspirations within the social, economic and political fabric of the Federation, and particularly in Southern Rhodesia, because they are frustrated by discriminatory practices and legislation, based on grounds of race. For example, approximately fifteen thousand Africans recruited to the armed forces in all three territories during the War some of whom fought in West and East Africa, Burma and Malaya, have in many cases been unable to find suitable employment since 1945. There are many thousands of Africans and lesser numbers of Asians and Coloured people anxious, indeed eager, to co-operate with the European population, recognising the achievements of European settlement as being in the interests of all the inhabitants of the Federation. They are anxious to participate and work within the political and economic framework of Federation. This good-will can yet be retained by adoption of a sincerely progressive policy of non-racialism in the Federal State. It will be destroyed by agreement with the insistent demand for dominion status, before the confidence of a majority of the people in the Federation in the sincerity and good intentions of its governments is secured.

2. It is essential, therefore, that independence of all three territories, whose governments are based upon a representative franchise, be secured before dominion status is granted to the Federation. Constitutionally the tendency, so marked since 1953, to strengthen the Federal Government at the expense of the territories by the surrender of territorial powers has been a grave mistake. This tendency arose from the desire to hasten the advent of unitary government in the desire to achieve federal independence. Moreover, the juxtaposition of the Federal and Southern Rhodesian Governments in one capital city was mistaken. The decision to site them together awakened and fostered suspicion in the Northern Territories of Southern Rhodesian intentions to spread that country's policies throughout the Federation. These suspicions were exasperated by persistent Federal and Southern Rhodesian demands for dominion status as soon as possible, unaccompanied by an amelioration of racial discrimination in the most powerful of the three territories.

3. The present situation in Nyasaland demands early planning for self-government in that territory despite its political immaturity and its lack of economic resources. Its very poverty has accentuated the strength of the nationalistic movement which now can only be satisfied, without a struggle of attrition, by radical constitutional changes. The greatest task before the 1960 Conference will be to secure self-government of Nyasaland within the Federation. Much will depend on the Nyasa leaders and a conciliatory attitude by the Federal Government in negotiation of the spheres of government to be allocated to the latter. Entrenchment in the Constitution of provisions to safeguard minority rights and generous grants-in-aid by the Federal and British Government to the new self-governing territory are necessary. It has so often been said that Nyasaland is the Ireland of Central Africa that a warning not to repeat the mistakes of the Irish Treaty of 1922 is scarcely necessary. In it no provisions were made to secure the rights of the Protestant minority, while the Treaty as a whole contained many seeds of future dispute between Great Britain and the Irish state.

4. Fulfilment of Southern Rhodesia's independence in 1960 and that of Northern Rhodesia, after a period of adjustment not exceeding ten years, may well create the confidence necessary in the Territories to ensure the continuance of a prosperous multi-racial Federation.

A. D. H. LLOYD

Q. I do not know if first, you would like to add anything to what is in your memorandum or whether we could proceed to ask you some questions in expansion of it? — A. No, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to add anything. I thought I would be submitting myself for questioning on any point in the memorandum.

Q. We will then proceed on that basis. In the latter part of your memorandum you have said that despite all that has happened you think that the existing situation is remediable, that there are a great many people of all communities who believe that even now a truly liberal and non-racial policy can succeed in the Federation, but you say there are certain essential things that have got to happen if it is to succeed. — A. Yes.

Q. You have suggested, first of all, a reasonable qualitative franchise; secondly, discriminatory practices based on colour have got to disappear, and you also say, I think in effect, that all this talk about dominion status has got to cease until all three Territories have become independent, and I would like to ask you a question on this last point in regard to dominion status. You said that it is essential that independence of the three Territories whose governments are based on representative franchise be secured before dominion status is granted to the Federation. Do you regard it as essential that all three Territories should achieve complete independence before there was dominion status in the Federal field or would you think that if certain elements of subordination had for purely Territorial reasons to be retained in one Territory or another, but that there would be a government nevertheless which was truly representative, that one would still have to hold up the demand for dominion status until there was complete and utter independence in all three units? — A. I would not like to be dogmatic on that question, but it seems to me that the failure of Federation, if it can be said to have failed, and certainly the presence of this Commission in the country, is due to the fact that you had the association in a federation of one state which relatively speaking was very powerful with two dependent governments and because of that fact I think very considerable suspicion was aroused at the intentions of Southern Rhodesia, both vis-a-vis the Federal Government and in relation to the Northern Territories. I believe, as I have said in another part of the memorandum, the juxtaposition of the two capitals fostered that suspicion; and I believe, and I do not want to suggest that all the ability lies in Southern Rhodesia, but I believe the preponderance of ability and political experience in Southern Rhodesia as compared with that in the Northern Territories, particularly political ability in relation to self-government, because Southern Rhodesia virtually has self-government, all combine to bring about a state of affairs in the Federation which would not have existed had Federation been brought about between three independent Territories. Therefore, in answering your question as directly as I can, I would say that until the Northern Territories have reached the stage of self-governing independence, and can stand on their own feet as against the more powerful Southern Rhodesia, it is desirable that dominion status should not be granted.

Q. May I ask you another question in the same field. Would you regard it as desirable or necessary that all three Territories should attain complete independence at the same time or would you see any objection to one Territory or another Territory going ahead in advance of the others to that final stage? — A. I do not think it would be necessary for them to achieve it at the same time. I think in relation to the three territories of which we are speaking, from the actual ability to achieve self-government on the basis of the ability of its population from an educational point of view at any rate, Northern Rhodesia would probably achieve self-government before Nyasaland. That is having regard to the confines of your question.

Q. I had one or two smaller questions to obtain some clarification of what you have said. In section B paragraph 10 you speak of the unsympathetic though technically excellent administration of the Native Land Husbandry Act. Would you expand on that? Why do you regard it as having been unsympathetically administered? — A. Yes. The Native Land Husbandry Act was to be put into force on the five year plan and both from the financial and the timing points of view, the plan was, for want of a better term, tight. The conception of the plan was excellent, the regeneration of the land in the native territories, and there is not the slightest doubt that Government and its officers—I speak of Land Development Officers and other such officials concerned with the implementation of the plan—were prompted by the highest motives; but I think very often it was impossible to get the personnel who had sufficient knowledge of, in some areas, the backward people with whom they were dealing, and that, in consequence, in the enthusiasm of their desire to regenerate the areas the aspect of human relationship was overlooked. For instance in de-stocking very often I think a plan was set for a particular area which from the technical point of view was perfectly correct, but the implementation of de-stocking was very often unsympathetic having regard to the lack of understanding of the technical aspects by the people in respect of whom the plan was being carried out. In other words, you had a first class scientific plan being implemented among a people who were not capable of understanding it, and I think in the technical enthusiasm a great deal was lost or, rather, not sufficient regard was placed upon the whole question of human relationships. I think that the Native Commissioners who were in overall charge of the implementation of the plan in their districts were very often, through overwork—we know recently that the Department was under-staffed and it was said by the Chief Native Commissioner and Secretary for Native Affairs, to be breaking down—the Native Commissioners themselves who could have supplied the cushioning between the technical application and the necessity to have regard to the human relationships side, were often too busy to do it so there was no court of appeal, so to speak, where decisions as to de-stocking or decisions as to the amount of work which was to be done in the particular areas could be reviewed. There were, of course, Native Commissioners who were perhaps more sympathetic than others. There were Native Commissioners who have perhaps realised that liberal tendencies required a change from old views, but I think all these things built up over a period of time. That is what I meant by saying that the technically excellent plan nevertheless led to grave dissatisfaction which was a field for nationalists to feed upon, and they did so.

Q. There are plenty of examples of the technical enthusiasm around this room. — A. Yes, I must say it has been a wonderful achievement in increasing production and so on. But, of course, there was one thing I would add, Mr. Chairman, if I might, which is that there was also too little land. There was far too little land to apply this Act to and the land upon which it was being applied was in many cases in a very sorry state, and in order to achieve the excellent objectives in the Native Land Husbandry Act, Government should have allocated whilst the Land Apportionment Act remained at least two million acres which would have alleviated the necessity for drastic de-stocking.

Q. Can that land be found now? — A. That land I think could be found, but it brings me to a much wider field and that is, of course, the belief that it will ultimately be necessary to repeal the Land Apportionment Act, and make a free market in land; but certainly I think the Government must regard it as feasible, because I conducted the case of a number of Africans living on a European farm who wished to buy a farm from the owner, and I made the same suggestion to the Select Committee, that two million acres should be transferred now from the European area to the Native area and it was subsequently, I understand, very sympathetically received.

MR. WOODROW CROSS: Are all the two million acres unoccupied European land? — A. Yes. I did not bring with me but you will find in 1957, I think it was, the Report of the Select Committee on Development of Unimproved Land of the Southern Rhodesia Parliament [Annexed hereto] which made the point that it was quite wrong for a small section of the population to retain a huge area of the land of the colony unless it was fully developing it. We made various suggestions which, to save time I would refer this Advisory Commission to. We wanted a land authority. Difficulties were that we were dealing with a Federal subject in a Territorial house, but quite clearly the evidence put before us established that the amount of undeveloped and under-developed land available in the Colony would have supplied far more than the two million acres which at that very moment was required to implement the Native Land Husbandry Act without injustice.

PROFESSOR CREIGHTON: That is not land which has not been granted, it is still Crown land? — A. That is actually land in the European area.

Q. It is granted, but it is undeveloped or under-developed and therefore in your view might be recalled or confiscated on those grounds? — A. Yes. I speak subject to correction but I do not think there is sufficient Crown land to satisfy the urgent requirements for the implementation of the recommendations of the Select Committee.

CHAIRMAN: That would have to be obtained by purchase? — A. That would have to be obtained by purchase.

MR. GONDWE: Is it already leasehold?

CHAIRMAN: It is freehold land. — A. It is freehold.

MR. GONDWE: All of it, 48 million acres? — A. Yes. We did make, in regard to that question, recommendations that Government should develop a system of tenancy of land which would enable African farmers to take up European owned land as tenants under tenancy agreements which would provide for the proper care of the land.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: That would not be a question of confiscation; it would be a question of forced use of the land? — A. Yes. It would virtually mean the repeal of the Land Apportionment Act.

MRS. HUXLEY: Can I ask if you want to repeal the Land Apportionment Act, if you want to repeal the whole thing, so that the African areas would be a free market for land? — A. Ultimately but under the Constitution the Reserves, of course, are dealt with by a Board.

Q. So you would only repeal that side of it relating to the European areas? — A. Yes.

MR. GONDWE: Do you think that would be fair on Europeans? — A. I do not think so, I do not regard it as an actual immediate policy because I think the situation which gave rise to certain serious consequences in the colony arose because of the immediate lack of, say, two million acres. But I think as an ultimate policy, and by ultimate I mean, because it is difficult to put a limitation of time, ten years or so, it will be possible to create a free market in land in the Colony; and I think it will bring about great prosperity because we have master farmers being trained annually who have not got the land, and I am quite sure that if the Commission were to take evidence as to the number of Africans wishing to purchase in the Native Purchase Area it would find that there is still a long waiting list and these are men who are trained in agriculture. They are men such as I had, an African sergeant in the police, who retired the other day. He came to me over a year ago but he said he was number 220 on the list to obtain a farm in the Native Purchase Area, and he was a man who had had twenty years' service in the police.

MR. WOODROW CROSS: What is the hitch there? — A. Lack of land.

Q. I do not understand lack of land. We have maps showing 8 million acres transferred. — A. I must be wrong. It certainly is a hitch, possibly on the survey side.

MR. JUSTICE BEADLE: Lack of surveyors, not adequate surveys. 18,000 farms not surveyed yet. — A. Yes.

Q. But they have not had the full staff to survey them. — A. Yes. I have been out of touch since February, 1958, with the actual records of the land allocated but I believe lack of survey was one of the problems.

CHAIRMAN: You say if the Land Apportionment Act was repealed the Native Reserves would still be secured to the Africans by the existence of the Board? — A. Yes, the Reserves could not be opened to European occupation.

Q. What would be the position of the Native Purchase Areas? — A. The Native Purchase Areas would probably also have to be reserved for some time. The main object of the repeal would be to create a free market in land outside the Reserves and outside the existing Native Areas.

Q. In the 48 million acres of land which is under European ownership? — A. Yes. I cannot say I am satisfied because it would be foolish to be so dogmatic, but I believe if undeveloped and under-developed land in the European area was made available for African ownership that there would be a big increase in agriculture output accompanied, as I hope it would be, by a considerable increase in wages in industry which would provide the market.

Q. What would be the effect on land values? — A. I think land values would rise, but I am not an economist.

MRS. HUXLEY: You think the Africans have the capital at present to purchase land in the European areas at European prices? — A. Not at present.

Q. And develop them as they would have to be developed? — A. No, they have not the capital. It would be necessary for Government to use the African Land Bank on the same lines as the Land Bank at present established for Europeans. I am not sure whether the present Land Bank does make loans to Africans.

Q. That would envisage a very considerable allocation of capital to develop this? — A. It would envisage a very considerable grant of money.

MR. WOODROW CROSS: Even the Land Bank at present does not advance money for the purchase of land. I understand. — A. On that point I am not sure, Sir, but certainly it would be necessary. The question put to me was whether there are sufficient funds in African hands at present. I would say not judging from the income tax returns which were given in the paper the other day, there can only be possibly 500 Africans in the whole of Southern Rhodesia who would have sufficient liquid capital to purchase any quantity of land.

CHAIRMAN: There might be Africans who would not be able to give the usual security demanded by the Land Bank? — A. That is so. I feel that a policy such as this would create so much goodwill and this, with a corresponding policy of training in industry for increased production leading to increased earnings, ultimately would lead to the position where, as in the European economy, land could be purchased by those who own sufficient or have obtained sufficient resources from business enterprise or employment.

Q. To turn to another point arising from your memorandum, in section D, paragraph 1, where you talk about discriminatory practices and legislation you say: "For example, approximately 15,000 Africans recruited to the armed forces in all three Territories during the War, some of whom fought in West and East Africa, Burma and Malaya, have in many cases been unable to find suitable employment since 1945." Why do you cite that as an example of discriminatory practice? — A. I think you are quite right, Mr. Chairman, in saying that it should not be cited as a discriminatory practice. What I mean to convey there, now that you have pointed it out to me, is that owing to the colour bar in industry, the difficulty of obtaining land that we have just discussed, the African's inability to enter the Civil Service prior to the Federal Government's decision against racialism, owing to these difficulties many thousands of Africans, and the figure of 15,000 was given to me and I believe it to be correct although I cannot substantiate it, particularly in regard to Nyasaland, returned from the War and were demobilised. They had received a training in the War which fitted them for something which was a great deal better than they could have hoped for when they went into the army. They had given good service to the State and many of those men were unable to find a niche in the economic life of the Colony, or indeed the social life of it. I think the Devlin Commission Report instances that. I am not sure of this fact but I believe that many of the agitators, as they were termed, and the preachers of violence were men who had returned from the armed forces, and who had not been satisfied legitimately in their aspirations in the life of the country to which they had returned.

MR. ROBINSON: You talk about the period from 1945, that was eight years prior to Federation. Would you not agree that just after the War the economic capacity of the three Territories to absorb these large numbers of returning servicemen was very much restricted? — A. It was Mr. Chairman. It was restricted I would say until 1950, but I do think that greater opportunities could have been made for recruitment to the public services, for instance. I think more could have been absorbed there. What I term the industrial revolution really began round about 1945 and unless or until its effects were felt they could not have been absorbed at any fast pace, I agree with that.

CHAIRMAN: May I go on to one point. You talk about the mistake made in regard to the juxtaposition of the Federal and Southern Rhodesia Governments in the same capital city. Would you give us your view as to whether it would be sufficient if the Southern Rhodesia capital was removed and the Federal capital remained in Salisbury? — A. Yes, it would. I stressed the point of what I term the constitutional precedent in other countries before Mr. Menzies, that is, the removal of the capital in order to avoid the suspicion which is fostered between the Territories that with a Territorial and the Federal Government being in the same capital city, they are hand in glove. That was particularly important here because one political party enveloped the three Parliaments and the Government of the Federation as well. It was particularly important, therefore, that the Territorial Government should be removed from the Federal capital site. I think that as a result of the failure to reach a decision in principle to separate them, it may have been difficult economically to do so, had immediate political repercussions which have been most unfortunate.

MR. WOODROW CROSS: Would you not suggest that the Federal capital should be removed rather than the Territorial capital? — A. I think possibly that may well be true. The point I make is that the two should not be in the one centre.

CHAIRMAN: You think Salisbury might by now have become so identified with Southern Rhodesia policies that even if the Territorial capital was removed the fact that the Federal capital remained in Salisbury, the Northern Territories might still think it was identified closely with policies of Southern Rhodesia? — A. There is a danger of that, but I feel that Salisbury is so obviously geographically and from every other point of view the suitable centre for the Federation that it would be quite unwise and possibly impractical to remove it now, but I think it would still be wise, and an earnest of the two Governments not to appear to be hand in glove against the other two, to remove the Southern Rhodesia capital. It was done in Australia, we know, and it was done in Canada.

CHAIRMAN: It has just been done in Malaya. — A. Quite so.

MR. ROBINSON: You could not think of places to which it might be removed? — A. I was thinking of Gwelo though as a Bulawayan I have a certain amount of bias. I feel Gwelo would be a suitable central place in the Colony.

MR. GONDWE: Elsewhere people have expressed the desire that it should be the Federal capital which should go elsewhere because in the Northern Territories especially when they see that the Federal capital is in Salisbury, that is, in Southern Rhodesia, they feel that the policies of the Federal Government are influenced by the Southern Rhodesia Government and they feel that it would be much better if the Federal capital were sited elsewhere. — A. I think there is a great deal to be said for that point of view because Southern Rhodesia is the most powerful of the three Territories; in what I call a constitutional anachronism it would have been wise to have sited the Federal capital in one of the Northern Territories; but I am afraid that the existing position is such that, with the development of Salisbury — it is now the international airways centre and it has a very heavy investment of capital — it may be extremely difficult to come to that decision. I have no doubt that the wise decision would have been as it has been put to me, to have sited the Federal capital in one of the Northern Territories because they were the weaker Territories, certainly politically.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: Can I ask your help on a matter which has not been mentioned yet, but which I think we will all agree is very important. Under Section D, paragraph 3, you mention the problem of the 1960 Conference and you then go on after having referred to the importance of the attitude of the Nyasa leaders and a conciliatory attitude by the Federal Government, to refer to the entrenchment in the Constitution of safeguards and so forth and you there give, although I know you would not agree it to be an exact parallel, you do give the example of the past experience in Ireland. Would you just enlarge on that a little bit for us? — A. Yes, Mr. Chairman. In answer to Sir Lionel's question the tragedy of Ireland which, of course, is written in over 200 years of history, was the attempt to suppress a nationalist movement which could not be done. The tragedy was that the attempt to do it persisted for so long, and had the British Government at the time of Lord Balfour perhaps granted self-government there is little doubt that Ireland would have fought on the British side certainly in the Second World War and the bitterness which was engendered as a result of the failure to face facts ultimately led to Ireland being outside the Commonwealth. But the extraordinary thing is that the greatest nationalist of all, a man who actually symbolised nationalism in this century, Mr. De Valera, would have remained within the Commonwealth. It was his political opponents who for political expediency cut the painter. Mr. De Valera would have remained in the Commonwealth under external association. The parallel I draw is this: that I do not believe from Lord Lugard's time Nyasaland has been a disturbed country, and I do not believe that it is possible to retain Nyasaland in its present position unless concessions are made. I appreciate the anxieties not to make concessions to persons who are not able to take over government, who are not sufficiently trained, who have not sufficient administrators and so on; but I am quite convinced that an attempt to retain Nyasaland within the Federation must lead to what I term a struggle of attrition, and I believe it would be much better fairly soon to recognise that Nyasaland can possibly only be retained in the Federation on the basis that Mr. De Valera would have remained within the Empire, that is, had conciliatory gestures been made somewhere else.

MR. GONDWE: What do you suggest there? — A. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that it will be necessary at a very early date to bring about self-government in Nyasaland. I believe that it will be necessary for an interim period to take place as in the Congo. We know what is happening there; training of ministers is taking place under a sort of condominium at the moment and it may be necessary to operate on that basis, but at any rate I think it is essential to satisfy Nyasaland now that it is not the intention of the British Government to allow the Federal Government to impose Southern Rhodesian policies on Nyasaland. I am not suggesting that it is the intention of the Federal Government to impose those policies, but I say it is the firmly held belief in Nyasaland that the intention is that Southern Rhodesia wishes to impose discriminatory legislation in Nyasaland and will do so if she gets dominion status in 1960.

MR. ROBINSON: What would happen if those terms were unacceptable to the nationalist leaders and they demanded complete independence now? — A. I am satisfied it should not be given.

Q. Would not that lead to attrition? — A. I do not think so. I have personally spoken with Dr. Banda. He has acted most unfortunately lately, but I am satisfied that just as the Irish leaders had started off with guns in their hands, and ended up as reasonably good ministers of state after a short period, so Dr. Banda—or whoever it is—will ultimately see the benefits, in the not too distant future, of remaining in the Federation. I may be unduly optimistic, but I believe that the announcement of self-government for Nyasaland within the Federation, dependent on the spheres of government retained by the Federal Government, would bring about a much improved situation from the point of view of preventing secession.

PROFESSOR CREIGHTON: Under Section D, paragraph 2 you refer to the tendency to strengthen the Federal Government at the expense of the territories . . . etc. as having been a grave mistake. I assume that refers to developments since 1953 and not the Constitution itself and its distribution of powers? — A. The leader of my own party in the S. Rhodesia Parliament in 1954/58 was one who advocated unitary government almost before the ink was dry on the signatures; and the general desire at that time, despite warnings, was to bring about unitary government by transferring as many functions to the Federal Government as possible. It was largely brought about by the unfortunate allocation of Federal revenues under the Apportionment Commission's work. Southern Rhodesia had not sufficient Federal revenue, particularly from income tax, to carry on efficiently a number of spheres of government which had been allocated to her under the Constitution; and the tendency was to pass over as quickly as possible functions which remained in the Concurrent List. There was a definite desire from 1954/58—which is supported by the Hansards of both Federal and Territorial Parliaments—to hand over spheres of government; but more recently that desire has changed.

Q. Were any functions transferred as a result of that desire? — A. Yes, some that were on the Concurrent List. I have not a copy of the Constitution with me, but births and deaths and agriculture—that was the main thing—and national parks. Health, of course, was taken over: that is on the Concurrent List.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: In fairness to you, you speak of the tendency; and that included what was proposed and urged by people in public speeches, and so forth? — A. Mainly, I am referring to that, yes. Agriculture did go over: it may well have been that although some functions did not go over the desire to take them over was there until, I should say, 1957.

PROFESSOR CREIGHTON: Do you think the tendency should properly be the other way? — A. Yes, because it is particularly essential where you have one political party—I am not speaking from a party political point of view—blanketing the whole of the Government's activities, you are inclined to get lethargy and complacency in such a situation. It is important that the territory should be strong.

Q. It has happened in other federations, you know, that sometimes nearly all the governments are of the same strength. Do you not think, in theory or practice, that there are better reasons for transferring functions than simply that? — A. Probably Mr. Menzies would be the person to deal with this but I understand there have been labour governments in the States, and when that has been so in one or more of the States in Australia there has been great prosperity.

Q. Would you like more transfers of powers to the Federal Government? — A. I would: agriculture particularly. It is illogical to separate African and European agriculture. I believe a changeover might make it impossible: health also.

CHAIRMAN: What about education? — A. Yes, the desire of Africans has been to have education Federal on the ground that there were greater funds for education available from Federal sources. The main spheres of government should be defence, external affairs, emigration, law, posts and telegraphs, income tax, and other such items.

PROFESSOR CREIGHTON: Under Section D, paragraph 1, you say "The essential requisite to success is the broadening of the franchise on a reasonably qualitative basis until the effects of universal education to a compulsory age of 16 years are experienced." Would you enlarge on that? — A. The demand for franchise stretches from universal to a reasonably qualitative basis. The latter is one, I think, which has some regard to the output of the average individual in this country. For instance we have policemen, nurses, bus drivers, etc., people doing comparable work which attracts a wage of one-fifth of what it would be in Great Britain. Such persons should be enfranchised. I have the latest figures on the franchise, as no doubt you all have. These are up to the end of February, 1960: on the Federal roll there are 65,000 Europeans—in round figures—and 1,330 Africans. On the special roll there are 1092 Africans in the Federal sphere. In Southern Rhodesia on the general roll there are 64,961 Europeans and 2,198 Africans. Government is on a very narrow basis, and until that basis is broadened considerably, it will not be a government based on the goodwill of the people which I think is essential. The qualifications I suggest for the common roll commence at £10 per month, plus 10 years' education. That is not unreasonable. In Britain you have compulsory education, I believe, to the age of 15 or 16 which ensures that. Also £500 in property. The special qualifications in Southern Rhodesia are £250 for two years, or two years' secondary education and £120 per annum for two years. I would term that a reasonably qualitative franchise. I also feel there must be a qualitative franchise until such time as there is universal education in this country with a compulsory leaving age of 16 years. That would provide a safeguard which, in the intermediate period, needs a qualitative franchise.

MR. GONDWE: We have been told that when it comes to Africans becoming voters there is a limit: they cannot go beyond 20% of the electorate. Is that right? — A. Yes. I was a member of the parliament which passed that 20% limitation, 1 in 6 on the general roll. I do not think that was a recommendation of the Tredgold Commission on the franchise.

MR. JUSTICE BEADLE: They recommended not more than half the votes in any one constituency, which was actually more restrictive. — A. That is so; I am anxious to avoid party politics, but that limitation was imposed by parliament.

I disagreed with it: a common roll on the qualitative franchise is the correct method.

Q. Under Section B, paragraph 5 you refer to the inception of the Special Vote recommended by the Tredgold Commission on the Franchise, subsequently nullified by stringent conditions of registration. — A. That is another matter. The first time the special vote was brought in would have resulted, we believed, in some 10,000-15,000 Africans being brought on to the common roll. The fact that there are only 2,198 on the common roll in Southern Rhodesia indicates that there is something preventing them from enrolling. Two things could have done it. The first was that African extremist organisations recommended people not to go on the roll—I know that in fact happened, but subsequently the effect was nullified by the detentions. The second thing is fear. I have a reference here which I think will give my point of view. The Commission may not be aware of the type of form which must be filled in, which I suggest is a very stringent one. [Forms passed to Chairman]. In addition, that form must be filled in before a registering officer—he is defined in the Act—either a magistrate or one of his officials, a policeman above the rank of sergeant or a native commissioner. Very often those wishing to enroll had to travel great distances—no doubt the Commission appreciates the force of that, following their own travels. Also, the Africans, particularly after the detentions, did not like going to the police station: not that the police are unfair to them, in fact they have been one of the greatest forces in good relationships in this country—but they did not like going to the police station because they might be asked whether they had paid their taxes or asked to show their passes which perhaps had not been renewed. There was also the fact that this form had to be filled in in the presence of the official. You will see from my memorandum that I have made the point that the European in this country was stretched to the utmost in the administration which had to be set up under Federation, and these officials just had not the time patiently to wait and watch these men filling in the form in their presence. Native commissioners had far too much to do and so had the police. Consequently, I believe that the difficulties introduced by the regulations prevented registration on a large scale.

MR. GONDWE: I thought this applied to all races? — A. Yes it does; but naturally it applies most heavily to the Africans.

MR. ROBINSON: Let us assume that all you have advocated comes about, as the result of the Constitutional Review, quite rapidly—grounds for racial discrimination removed by and large, the Land Apportionment Act changed, a widening of the franchise—I am sure you would agree that would have the effect quite soon of giving Africans a majority in the Southern Rhodesia and Federal Parliaments. Supposing all that was to be presented to the country now as a set of recommendations, supported by this Commission and by the governments at the Review, do you think that European political opinion in Southern Rhodesia would abide by any such recommendations? Secondly, do you think the Westminster pattern of parliamentary democracy, which would give an African majority quite rapidly under your proposals, is the sort of constitutional arrangement which will, with certainty, abolish racial discrimination or, shall we say, avoid the substitution of black domination for white domination in this country? Have you considered that? — A. I have; and dealing with the first part of the question as to whether European opinion would accept the recommendations as proposed, I find it difficult to answer. I believe that, as a result of the failure to implement the many things of which I have spoken in my memorandum, European opinion has hardened: it may be that for that reason the recommendations on these lines would not be accepted. On the other hand, failure to adopt a more liberal approach from the time of Federation onwards and the impact of very recent events in South Africa may well make even the most hardened European realise that he has to alter his attitude considerably; and that may lead to acceptance of the proposals. Dealing with the second part of the question, I believe that government on the lines of a Western Europe democracy is suitable for a multi-racial community. It is the most suitable government I can think of. If the much-abused word "colonialism" is regarded as the system of government, I fear it is outmoded now. There have been tremendous advances since the last world war—the Atlantic Charter, the great pace of things and the opening up of new methods of disseminating news.

Q. Would you contemplate any checks and balances to make possible many of the proposals you have put to us? — A. One check and balance is the qualitative franchise. That is very desirable. To introduce universal suffrage, for instance—and this also bears on the question—would almost certainly lead to the last stage being worse than the first, because you have so many people in Southern Rhodesia and in the Northern Territories who are absolutely primitive still. My philosophy is summed up in this: that you cannot continue to govern peaceably a country unless you base your government as broadly as possible and unless you win the goodwill of your people. I believe that by the abolition of racial discrimination and discriminatory practices, by the sincere implementation of what we term partnership, and by dealing with economic, social and political affairs in this country in such a way that a man, no matter who he may be, can develop his ability to the fullest, this country, as a multi-racial state, has a great future.

CHAIRMAN: Going back to the franchise, on the level you proposed, would you apply the same qualifications to your candidates for election? For instance, a nurse may be good in the hospital, but may not be so good in parliament. — A. That is not a matter to which I have given deep thought. I know that in the Federal Electoral Act specific qualifications are laid down for candidates; and I think it is advisable. It is desirable that their qualifications should be higher than those for the franchise itself. It is very important to have a common roll, because then you have Members of Parliament who appeal to their constituents on a non-racial basis. If you have two rolls, general and special, as I believe you have in the Federal Roll at present, then you are liable to have an appeal to members of parliament on a racial basis; and that must be avoided at all costs.

JOINT ADVISORY BOARDS OF THE AFRICAN TOWNSHIPS OF FEDERATION

1. The main question occupying the minds of leading Africans in Southern Rhodesia is whether the Federation should continue as it is, or in some other form, or whether it should be broken up altogether. It is true there are numerous Federations which exist throughout the free world, and possibly within the Eastern block. An examination of countries or states which have federated reveals that almost all have encountered considerable birth pangs, due to suspicion or covetousness between states, or simply antagonism between the member units. Other reasons for withholding public support has been the delay in the implementation of the promises held out as an inducement for the marriage of the units. This can be lack of capital, failure to bring about material advantages such as improved living conditions, or other reasons. In the case of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland it has been the failure of the Federal Government to implement promises that racial discrimination will disappear. The point is made here that most anti-Federal propagandists stem from the Northern Territories, and very little has been said about the views of the Southern Rhodesia Africans.

2. It is agreed that the unification of Territories can mean immense economic benefits, and other advantages are evident.

3. We would say that Federation should continue, but whether in the existing form, or with other modifications, is a matter of opinion. It seems to us that the economic advantages will only accrue with the establishment of large industries. We are aware that a number of these, such as motor-car manufacturing industries, will only appear on the scene when such industries' commodities can be sold locally. Internal markets are essential, and this can only be done by a general rise in the standard of living. It is therefore evident that a pre-requisite for the success of Federation is an improvement in earned income to a point commensurate with a civilised standard of living. This is necessary—in fact, vital—if the confidence of the people is to be held and developed. Siting of Capital

4. It is essential to remove the Federal Capital to prevent the identification of Southern Rhodesia with Federal activity, and we believe that this would ensure that there is a similar separation of Southern Rhodesia to Federal authority as is the case with the Northern Territories. We would support the removal of the Federal capital to Northern Rhodesia, but we appreciate that it may be economically impossible to achieve such a removal, and therefore feel that, in such economic circumstances, the Southern Rhodesia territorial capital should be re-sited to ameliorate the suspicion directed towards Salisbury. Concurrent Legislative List

5. Several of the powers laid out in this list are worthy of comment.

6. Section 45: Deportation: It seems to us that this question should remain on the concurrent list. Our reasons for believing this is to prevent any possibility (which might arise if deportations were controlled on a Territorial basis) of retaliatory measures being taken between the two Territories. Such a position could arise, and would be catastrophic if European—African retaliation was practised. It seems that deportation, apart from the barring of normal criminals, has been worked on a predominantly political basis, and we submit that this is a cause of deep anti-Federal feeling. For instance, many Africans have been deported or removed from one Territory to another within the Federation, but the African public is well aware that no European has yet been removed on the same basis. We would also point out that Europeans have made near seditious statements without deportation or restriction, and this factor is often commented upon by Africans. Generally, we believe that deportation should remain on the concurrent list, but the discriminatory application of this section of the law should be examined by a commission composed of equal numbers of Africans and Europeans.

Section 47: Control of the Voluntary Movement of Persons between Territories:

7. Basically, we believe that complete freedom of movement between the Territories of a Federation is a right available to all the inhabitants, as is presently the case with Asians and Europeans. We further feel, however, that some control is necessary due to the fact that economic prohibition can be justified to prevent large masses of people flooding the labour markets of certain cities or areas. Nevertheless, there is at present discrimination between the races on movement control, and this discrimination must be removed; some restrictions should remain—such as economic safeguards—but they should be on a fully non-racial basis.

8. Section 60: Prisons: This section is now under Federal control, and we would point out that during the Emergency persons were admitted to Federal prisons as a result of action taken by a Territorial Government. This analogy resulted in public accusation that the cause of the Emergency was Federal, and we believe that a little more foresight could have prevented this. We suggest that prisons are to hold persons committed for crimes, or awaiting trial, and should not, in any circumstances, be used for political prisoners. There seems no reason why, in the event of Emergency conditions, the Government should not have erected Detention Camps for the political prisoners detained in February 1959. Political detentions may be in conflict with the law.

9. Section 54: Health: The Local Authorities and Territorial Governments, prior to Federation, provided adequate health services for all the people. The present Federal control of Health is an extremely large organisation which cannot provide all the services on a local basis, both rural and urban, on a scale hitherto enjoyed under Territorial control. It is no argument to suggest that certain large hospitals and clinics which have been completed since Federation indicate improved conditions, as most of these projects were planned before 1952. We believe that Health should be handed over to the Territorial Governments.

10. Education: At present African education is handled on a Territorial basis, and all other races on a Federal basis. All education should be under the control of either Territorial or Federal Governments. It would be unwise to place it under Federal control because there would be undoubtedly strong objections from the Northern Territories. We think, therefore, that this should be Territorial.

11. Dr. Banda: The Africans of Southern Rhodesia agree with Nyasaland Africans on the necessity for the immediate release of Dr. Banda, and also for the release of the Southern Rhodesia detainees. These continued detentions have taken on an anti-Federation flavour, and the supposition that trouble would ensue upon their release is without any considered reason.

12. Nyasaland is becoming embittered through the detention of Banda and others, and the people feel that the Federal Government is directly responsible, together with Sir R. Armitage, for this state of affairs.

13. We feel that if as seems inevitable, Nyasaland obtains independence, their anti-Federation attitude will continue, and the longer Banda is detained, the deeper the resentment will plunge. There is a possibility that they might link up with Tanganyika, and a further possibility is that capital might come in from the United States and/or Soviet Russia, or both. Such a situation could result in infiltration of Communist ideas into Northern Rhodesia and Southern Rhodesia, and this, of course, is dangerous to the state. A similar position exists in relation to the Southern Rhodesia detainees—the longer these men are detained, the deeper the public's resentment will go.

14. Secession of States: The Federal Prime Minister has frequently stated that the Federation cannot be dissolved. It seems to us that in certain circumstances, and as a matter of practical politics, it might be necessary to see that Nyasaland does secede, and if that is so there is also the possibility of the secession of either of the other two Territories. The statements of both Sir Roy Welensky and Sir Edgar Whitehead on this subject, are vague and frequently ill-considered.

Sir Edgar, for instance, has publicly stated that he would like the reservations removed from the Constitution. If this power to veto discriminatory legislation is removed, surely this is an indication that discrimination is being practised? Sir Edgar has not mentioned any substitute safeguards, and so the people generally have not been assured of a positive place in the Federation. We would like to consider the possibility of embodying legislation in the Constitution which would prohibit discrimination between the races. It seems to us that the Preamble to the Constitution which has directly stated that Federation would conduce to co-operation between the inhabitants, can be disputed under the present set-up. If anti-discriminatory legislation is passed there seems to be no reason why we could not follow the methods practised in the United States and test discriminatory measures in the Federal Courts.

Native Passes Act—its implications and bearing upon attitudes to Federation:

15. Ordinance 15 of 1913 initiated legislation which required Africans to carry documents establishing their identity and occupations, district of origin, and other details. Later amendments required details of employment to be entered by employers, and included duration of employment, wages paid and so on. Section 20 of the Native Passes Act makes it an offence for any person to employ "any native who is not in possession of a Certificate", and effectively prevents any African from entering employment unless he complies with the Act. The end result of Section 14, which requires employment details to be entered, is that the life of the holder is laid bare for any employer to scrutinise; very little opportunity exists, in practice, for the holder to graduate from one type of employment to another, and consequently little chance to improve his wages; the phrase "once a labourer, always a labourer" is effectively illustrated here. There are many instances of the humiliation suffered by Africans—even elected members of the Federal Assembly—when "passes" are demanded at the state Post Offices; is there any logical reason why Africans should be discriminated against in procuring their registered mail from Government offices. This pernicious regulation must be abandoned immediately. The carrying of "passes" is probably the most reprehensible of all the discriminatory legislation enforced in Southern Rhodesia, and we recommend that the present system be abolished and a more enlightened approach instituted.

16. We have no wish to proffer destructive criticism only. We recognise that in most countries there are occasions when citizens are called upon to identify themselves, and so we recommend that some type of identification, perhaps broadly similar to the present "Identity Card", be issued to the citizens of the Federation on a non-racial basis. There is no reason why a numbered card could not be cross-indexed to the confidential information and history of an individual which must obviously be retained by the state.

17. Tax: It is obvious that the state cannot function unless the citizens contribute a pro-rata share of their earned income towards the maintenance and development of the state. This contribution falls, broadly, within two fields; direct and indirect taxation. It must be accepted that Africans contribute fully to the latter. The former is computed, in most enlightened countries, upon the income earned by the individual. As the Commission is undoubtedly aware, this formula does not apply in the Federation. We would draw the Commissions' attention to only one factor. An African can be unemployed, through no fault of his own, for six months of the year and still be compelled to meet the full annual Native Tax; not so with the European, however, who contributes according to wages earned during the year. We recognise that the country could not afford to lose the amount of approximately one million pounds collected annually from Africans, and we therefore recommend that the primary taxable amount of income for all persons, be lowered to a point commensurate with an increase in income tax which would offset the loss of native tax revenue. In this way the more highly paid Africans would contribute to direct taxation and relieve the persons existing below the poverty datum line of the crisis which confronts them annually.

18. Land Apportionment Act. All land in Southern Rhodesia is classified into five areas, and the most prominent of these are the European and Native areas. Of these two areas, further sub-classification has taken place from time to time such as the Native Purchase Areas and Special Native Areas. Provision has been made for assignment of land in the "Unassigned Area" to the "European", "Native Purchase", "Special Native", or "Forest" areas, providing the approval of the Secretary of State is obtained. This Board considers that there is an urgent need for the acreage to be increased in the native reserves, and submits that such assignation of land should be considered as a national necessity comparable to the appropriation of land for the Kariba Hydro-electric scheme, and so could be assigned as outlined above or possibly from the undetermined area. The question of grazing land for Native cattle is a vast problem which cannot be considered in a brief memorandum, but we would submit to the Commission our belief that the success of Federation is largely dependent upon an acceptance of the African reliance upon traditional cattle wealth. The present drought has increased the problems and Africans feel that the Land Husbandry Act is restrictive in that only the persons stabilised upon the land may acquire title. It is agreed that the results of part-time farming may have an undesirable effect upon the family life such as the maintenance of several homes, impermanent marriage unions in two areas and so on, but we feel that this break with tradition is untimely and restrictive as it severs the urban African from his birthright of land. European farmers own large tracts of land in Southern Rhodesia, yet cases arise where they receive preferential treatment; a recent instance occurred in the Sanzukwe Special Native Area when a European farmer was given permission to graze cattle despite the fact that adjoining African farmers were in severe trouble!

19. The urban question is quite as bad. The Land Apportionment Act effectively prevents or circumscribes social intercourse between the races, and this lack of contact is a deterrent to the understanding and mutual confidence which is vital to the success of the Federation. Europeans who enter the African townships—even during the day—are halted and questioned by the State police, and it is an offence for a European to visit the townships at night without a reasonable excuse. Similarly, although the African may be abroad in the "white" area until midnight, there are other sanctions such as the pass laws which dissuade him. How then, are the races to achieve contact? Government have made minor inroads by the concessions to the University College, an advocates' chambers, the Capricorn Society, several hotels, and recently the site of the Central Africa Trade Fair. These, we consider, are minimum concessions granted to create an illusion that the preamble to the Constitution is being implemented.

20. We will be referred to, and we do concede, the fact that the Act provides protection for the African in trading rights and acquisition of land. The wealthier European citizens of the Federation are debarred from bidding for land on an unequal basis, and the sophisticated and experienced Asian/European traders are precluded from competition in the native areas. This protection is just and should continue for some time. On the debit side, there are an increasing number of cultured Africans who are sharing in the public life of the country and these men are completely disbarred from purchasing homes in the better-class districts and mingling with their social equals. The tenor of European opinion supports a complete division of African/European contact, and we believe that this is largely due to ignorance of the social and other achievements of the middle and upper class African. The majority of Europeans have no knowledge of Africans other than as servants, and so are incapable of viewing the African as a partner or fellow citizen; if this attitude continues it will be impossible to achieve the ends of Federation. Africans have been accused of ingratitude, laziness and greed. We submit, in all sincerity, that only a patient and industrious people could have suffered daily humiliations and abuse without retaliation, or contributed with their physical ability and skill to the successful industry and commerce which now thrives in the Federation. Could all these successful projects have been achieved without positive contribution from the Africans? We, the Africans, know and are proud of the extent of our contribution and of the justice of the claim for a fair share of land and privileges for every citizen of the Federation.

21. We categorically refute the current assumption that urban land depreciates upon the arrival of non-whites in a particular area; experience in Salisbury has shown that this is not the case!

22. To sum up, we recommend the retention of most existing land separation both in rural and urban areas, but urge

(a) that more land be set aside for African use in the rural areas, and

(b) the erection of special areas in the towns to which any persons, regardless of race, might obtain title.

The proscription of the African National Congress

23. To date, no specific reasons have been advanced by the Government for the proscription of the Southern Rhodesia African National Congress, and the indefinite detention of its leaders and supporters. Apart from rumours from the Native Department that Congress was engaged in seditious activities, and that it was encouraging all the people to disobey the laws of the country, the real reason for the Government's very shocking action still remains a mystery.

24. It is quite in order to mention here that the very

Native Department which recommended the proscription of Congress and the detention of its leaders, has been found by a recent Select Committee to be inefficient, dishonest and, therefore, unreliable.

25. We can say nothing here except to emphasise how discriminatory this action was in that all European political parties, no matter how extreme have, up to now, never been proscribed or interfered with. We therefore arrive at the one and only conclusion that the proscription of Congress and the indefinite detention of its leaders, crowned by the creation of the Preventive Detention Act, were all designed purely to stop the African people from voicing their grievances against the unjust and discriminatory laws of this country.

26. The whole world today is attacking South Africa for its racial policies. We would like to draw the attention of the world to the fact that Southern Rhodesia has set a shining discriminatory example even to South Africa by proscribing Congress, because South Africa is following behind Southern Rhodesia on exactly the same lines—hence the belief in the North that Southern Rhodesia's policies are just as bad, if not worse, than those of South Africa.

27. The proscription of both Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland African Congresses in Southern Rhodesia is a spur to Northern Africans' objection to any form of association with Southern Rhodesia, and under the present circumstances, we feel this objection is justified.

28. We are not aware of the reason why these innocent people were ever detained, let alone their continued unnecessary indefinite detention. All we say now is that these people, who have been made to suffer so much for no earthly reason, except to lead and to belong to the Southern Rhodesia African National Congress, must all be released without further delay. Further we submit that on their release, all detainees must receive full compensation for the untold suffering they have been forced to put up with. If these people have committed any offences, let them be brought before the courts of law immediately to prove their innocence or otherwise.

29. The current assumption that the release of these people would be a danger to the state is both unfounded, false and misleading. In fact the continued detention of these people is a danger to the state because of the bitter feelings of the African people against the detention of their innocent people, and is bound to explode in the not too distant future, with very grave consequences which the Government will have to accept.

30. The continued detention of these people will widen the gap between the Africans and Europeans of this country, and also between the Northern Africans and Southern Rhodesia Government, which is a danger to the Federation as a whole. It is our submission that the continued detention of these people is a mockery of British democracy and a symbol of African oppression and servitude in Southern Rhodesia. These people must all be released now or appear in courts of law.

Franchise:

31. The purpose of the Constitution is to provide a framework within which the peoples of the three territories will live harmoniously together and contribute to the state. The ideals of democracy presuppose that such contribution entitles the contributor to a voice in the Government of its own territory and in the Federal Government. We believe, however, that an illiterate person is not qualified to exercise his voice and cannot be enfranchised until his judgment and reason are sufficiently mature. We have attempted, therefore, to examine the franchise commissions of other countries and particularly that of the Mother Country, Great Britain, in relation to our own, and it seems that some basis or standard of literacy must be decided upon.

32. Many adult persons both African and European, are fully literate without having received the benefit of education. Others are not and we agree that some test must be applied to determine the ability of the individual.

33. We accept the following qualifications as laid down in the Southern Rhodesian Electoral Acts of 1951:—

- (a) be not less than 21 years of age.
- (b) be a citizen of the Federation; or, in the case of the Federal Rolls, a British Protectorate person;
- (c) have not less than two years residence in the Federation and three months in the electoral district;
- (d) be capable of filling in the necessary application forms in the presence of a Registering Officer.

34. We do not agree with (vii) or (viii) of the table of Educational and means qualification for the Southern Rhodesia Voters Roll, and we propose the following:—

	Income (Per annum for two previous years). Not less than:	Immovable Property (Registered at Deeds or Native Land Office) Not less than:	Education
(i)	£120	—	Primary
(ii)	£240	—	Adequate knowledge of English only.
(iii)	—	£500	4 years secondary.
(iv)	—	£1000	Primary
(v)	—	£1500	Adequate knowledge of English only.

35. The remaining categories (vii and viii) would fall away and the 20% restriction of low category votes must be excised completely as we are aware that this provision of 20% restriction was to ensure the continued dominance of the European electorate and is therefore discriminatory.

36. We believe that if Governments—both Federal and Territorial—accepted the proposals outlined above, the African people would show an adult awareness of the positive contribution which they would then be responsible for. One further point causes some concern in the urban areas. The Act prescribes certain persons as registering officers and includes Native Commissioners, Assistant Native Commissioners, and European members of the British South Africa Police of or above the rank of Sergeants. In the view of the Africans, these persons rank in stature—or below—with the township administrators or Superintendents and we are aware that the public have more confidence in the Superintendents. In these circumstances we recommend that urban township Superintendents be appointed Commissioners of Oaths and thus qualify as Registering Officers for particular townships.

37. In conclusion, and briefly, we feel that Federation can work providing the ideals enshrined in the preamble are implemented; that positive efforts are made to allow the peoples of the territories to have an equitable voice in the Government of the country, and that the concept of partnership be positively applied by an immediate rescindment of all the discriminatory legislation which presently provides an impenetrable racial barrier both socially and economically.

JOINT ADVISORY BOARDS OF THE BULAWAYO AFRICAN TOWNSHIPS*

CHAIRMAN: We are grateful for your memorandum. In your first paragraph you speak of the main question occupying the minds of leading Africans here—the future of Federation. You say there has been failure to implement promises of the Federal Government that racial discrimination will disappear. Would you like to add something about racial discrimination? —A. (MR. NGCEBETSHA): We consider that Federation should be continued but that in its present form it is not functioning properly, mainly because those in power are not, in our humble opinion, doing all they can to see that Federation is implemented in every respect. We think the Europeans want to maintain white supremacy, although they say they do not—especially the party in power (without saying anything about the Dominion Party which is out and out segregated).

* A statement signed by 141 residents and ratepayers of the Bulawayo African Townships was received on 10th April, 1960, in the following terms:—

“We, the undersigned Residents and Rate Payers of the Bulawayo African Township hereby petition The Monckton Commission so as to make it abundantly clear that the evidence that will be lead by the Joint Advisory Boards is a decision entirely their own and should not be interpreted as evidence submitted on behalf of those they represent.

We, further wish to state that the Joint Advisory Boards on no occasion consulted the people it represents, and therefore your Commission should take cognisance of this fact”.

gatory)—that is the United Federal Party, to which some of us belong. They are not entirely sincere in carrying out the aims of partnership as originally stated.

Q. You mention the changing of the capital, either the Federal or the Territorial, to Northern Rhodesia. Do you attach importance to that?—A. (MR. BANGO): Africans feel that the monopoly of Federation is in S. Rhodesia, and as long as the capital is in S. Rhodesia the native policy in S. Rhodesia will be a difficulty. If the capital had been placed in Lusaka or Blantyre in the first place, it would have been clearer to the minds of Africans that Federation was going well.—(MR. PATSIKA): Africans in Nyasaland are opposed to Federation because they feel S. Rhodesia policy is discriminatory: the placing of the capital there intensifies their feeling.—(MR. NGCEBETSHA): Even if you feel it is not economically feasible for the capital to be transferred to one of the northern Territories, we feel there should be a separation of the two capitals, even if one is left in Salisbury.

Q. You regard the policy of Southern Rhodesia as discriminatory?—A. (MR. ZIYAMBI): Very much so. Africans are in the majority in Southern Rhodesia—2½ million as against 250,000 for Europeans; yet the Legislative Assembly is all white. That in itself is discrimination, and we, as Africans in Southern Rhodesia, do not feel secure because we have no representatives in Parliament. When discriminatory legislation is passed there is no opposition: both Government and Opposition agree when it comes to Africans, since we are not represented. In the Northern Rhodesia Legislative Assembly there are Africans, though they are not a majority, who can speak for Africans. Also, this is the first time I have been inside the Hotel Victoria, and it is the last time; because immediately I go out I shall not be allowed again within the hotel doors.

Q. I take the point, but I believe and hope that it will remain multi-racial.—A. That is good news. Some of us feel it is only temporary while you are here, and immediately you go it will be the end of everything. Nobody is unhappy about social segregation: that exists everywhere among African and European communities alike. What we do not like is segregation purely on grounds of colour. For instance, I am able to speak to you in your language, which is not my own; and the importance you attach to me now because I am here to speak to you is not attached to me anywhere outside here. I am regarded as a political agitator or something. All Africans who speak for their race outside are branded as agitators and extremists, but you will find among the Europeans some who are even more extreme.

Q. You tell us of the changes you would like to see in particular functions. Will you tell us about the two important ones you would like to see made Territorial?—A. There are bound to be suspicions as long as the same things for two sections of people in the same country are retained by different powers. Africans want to be educated as good as Europeans. If this country is committed to a policy of partnership, it should mean that all human beings are equal. We do not mind whether education is Federal or Territorial as long as it is both in the same hands. However, we would prefer it to be Territorial.

Q. On secession, in paragraph 14, you quote some observations of Sir Roy Welensky and Sir Edgar Whitehead.—A. We would like to make it clear that if Africans in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland do not want Federation it must be broken. Nothing can succeed through force. There are economic advantages to Federation, and we are trying to convince Europeans, who are the main stumbling block to Federation, to afford Africans the same opportunities. Federation must be on a basis of equal partnership. The Federal Prime Minister has frequently stated that Federation cannot be broken. I think that is not true. It is like the Minister in church when he marries two people—he says they can only be divorced by death—but you will find a lot of divorces taking place. The Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia himself says the Africans in the North are unreasonable because they want to leave Federation, yet he has laid down conditions under which he will accept Federation, otherwise he says Southern Rhodesia will secede. In this way I see no difference between Sir Edgar Whitehead and perhaps Dr. Banda in Nyasaland.—(MR. NGCEBETSHA): The term secession is not in the minds of Southern Rhodesian Africans, but it may be planted there if the trend of events continues. We know Nyasaland talks particularly of secession, and there are good reasons. They want self-government and independence; and who in this house can say he does not want those things, be he white or black? We concede that although the people of Nyasaland may not be able to get self-government in the immediate future, that is their objective. I submit that those in power in Central Africa should go out of their way to try and make these people feel at home in Federation in persuading them to stay inside it, through their acts and their speeches. In Southern Rhodesia, if Federation is broken up, we fear that the Europeans will begin to look south and join South Africa. When they do that and there is a government which is more or less, if not quite, the same as in South Africa, the plight of Africans will be very frightful indeed. So we wish Federation to stay and work for the benefit of all.

Q. In paragraph 18 on the Land Apportionment Act, you consider there is an urgent need for the acreage to be increased in the native reserves, and you go on to deal with what you feel is the restrictive character of the Land Husbandry Act. Would you like to add anything?—A. (MR. ZIYAMBI): No, the position as we see it is as we have put it here.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: On paragraph 15, would you say how you think the Native Passes Act should be amended?—A. Passes as they are now as purely discriminatory. My pass gives name, place of birth and headman, and has places where employers fill in the particulars of my job, the date signed on, the rate of pay and when I was discharged. The passes are a big handicap: you get educated Africans leaving school and going to work in the town. They cannot get a suitable job, because they have not worked before. Often they will get a job as a messenger because there are no clerical jobs, and then they get a minimum of 30/- a week. That is endorsed on the certificate, and in the next job such an African applies for he will only get that rate of pay, because that is what he had before. The 'situpa' lays bare everything. We feel that passes should be the same throughout Southern Rhodesia, with the same sort of identity for everyone. Why cannot I have just a card with my name on it and nothing more, so that I can convince my next employer I am competent and capable of earning a wage, without necessarily saying how much I was getting before and what I was doing?

Q. It has been suggested that the entry on those cards is a benefit to the Africans.—A. Whatever you may have been told, it is not: it is a disadvantage.

MR. MOLSON: How many passes are there?—A. There are about three different kinds, but they all come out from the main one, the situpa. After one is signed on by an employer, he sends the pass to a department in town, and we get a town pass. There is a self-employment certificate, given to those who are not directly employed by anybody and have a business. There are visiting passes. When you go from one place to another, your employer has to certify that he employs you. It is a pass to let the authorities know where you are going. When you get to another town, if you want to go to the African township you have to get permission from the local superintendent and he gives you another pass. There is also a pass to seek employment.

MR. CHIRWA: You have a night pass too?—A. Yes. You must have one if you are crossing town here after a certain time, otherwise you get arrested, unless there are certain circumstances.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: None of you have your situpas with you, but if you went for a new job you would have to produce it?—A. They are not useful at all. The town pass shows the necessary information, transferred from the situpa. When you leave employment you are not allowed to carry it; it is sent back to the African Administration, and the employer tells them you are no longer employed by him. I work on the Railways and have a completely different pass. Here it is, if you would like to see it (handed to Chairman). It contains no information at all.

MR. MOLSON: This is the type of pass you suggest might be substituted. Is it sufficient for you to carry that pass?—A. Yes, that is my town pass.

Q. Is it sufficient for all the purposes covered by the other passes?—A. For the purpose of moving up and down in town, it is enough because my situpa is with my employers' office. He gives me this pass, and when I show it, people know I am employed by the railways.

MR. ROBINSON: Has there been any recent relaxation of the pass laws—is there any class of person who is exempt?—A. Lately the Government has recommended what they call an identity card, but to qualify for it a person has to be highly educated, just as for qualifying for the vote. You have to be a matriculant and earn more than £10 a month. There are so many conditions that we feel it is almost impossible to get one. We want such an identification card given to everyone, irrespective of whether they went to school or not.

PROFESSOR CREIGHTON: It has been said to us that these things are in fact a protection for the African in that it constitutes a species of contract as between him and his employer, which he can produce in case the employer attempts to pay him a wage for which he had not originally contracted.—A. That might be said in support of the town pass, which is a result of employment. We are mainly against the situpa because it contains all the information about your employment and pay. For instance, you might have been employed and then discharged, say after two months, for any reason. You apply to another employer and he sees this and says, "I would have taken you on, but I think you are irresponsible because you were only in the last job for two months".—(MR. BANGO): The complaint is that when an employer sees what pay you have received from the last job, however competent you are, he will not give you any more. The situpa is such a disadvantage that it will always keep down the wages of that African individual.

MR. CHIRWA: It has been put to us that Africans in this country accept racial discrimination, and that they are happy because they have their own African townships, distinct from places where Europeans, Asians and Coloureds live.—A. That is not correct at all, Residential areas came into being as a result of the enforcement of the Land Apportionment Act, and that is discriminatory to a large extent. Africans, for their advantage or not, must stay in their own areas and conduct their own affairs in those areas. The same is true of Asians and Coloureds. Europeans, as far as possible, want to stay by themselves in their own areas and have objected to Africans staying in their midst. It is simply not true that Africans are happy to be separated in their own areas.

MR. CROSS: Summing up in paragraph 22(b), you urge special areas to which any persons, regardless of race, might obtain title.—A. It is actually the Europeans who do not mix with the Africans, because the Land Apportionment Act was one of the earliest legislations: maybe it should go out of order if we are going to get any form of partnership. Africans who have developed to a certain standard of ability and education would like the opportunity of mixing with men of other races, black or white, of that standard, and do not want different residential areas. If an area was set aside in which all races could live if they wished, Mr. Black and Mr. White could live side by side. It will not get us anywhere to always keep the Africans and Europeans by themselves.—(MR. ZIYAMBI): Animals of the same colour always keep together in groups and the same is true of human beings. We do not mean to force Africans and Europeans to live together, but only that there should be some places where those of different races who want to be together should be able to do so. There must be no restriction to keep them apart, but there should be no restriction to make them live together.

SIR CHARLES ARDEN-CLARKE: In paragraph 18 you refer to the African reliance upon the traditional cattle wealth. I understand that is measured by quantity and not quality—a man with 15 scrub cattle is regarded as wealthier than one who has 10 good cattle.—A. This again comes from the Land Apportionment Act. The allocation of land in Southern Rhodesia is different. Some Africans in the reserves are given no more than 6-8 acres of land to cultivate. I do not know how a man can make a living out of that, but they manage. The only wealth of the African is cattle. We appreciate the difficulties about land, but you cannot keep many head of cattle in a small area. The whole thing centres on the allocation of land. People would be able to keep more cattle if they could be given, say, 20 acres. The African feels the allocation is discriminatory. Some Europeans have thousands and thousands of acres, while he is busy doing something in town. We want land to be allocated to all sections of the community.

Q. You would have no objection to a limitation on the number of cattle put on a certain area?—A. No, we appreciate the difficulties.

SIR DONALD MACGILLIVRAY: You wish to provide opportunities for people to live together if they wish. Would you apply the same to education? You would not oblige children of different races to go to the same schools, but you would provide schools to which parents of all communities could send their children if they wanted?—A. We advocate that point because it is not long since the Europeans came into this country, yet the greatest difficulty is lack of understanding of each other. The only way to understand each other is to live together, and if our children go to school in the same classroom they will learn to live together.

MR. GONDWE: Do you believe in multi-racial education?—A. Very much so.

Q. At what stage would you like to see that start?—A. In the beginning there is the language difficulty, but where students get to a certain level where they can understand English as a common language, then they should go to the same school. When an African gets to secondary school level, for instance, he understands English and can be taught in the medium of that language.

SIR DONALD MACGILLIVRAY: Would you apply multiracial education compulsorily?—A. There would be an explosion from the European point of view, not African. We do not believe in forcing things: they should be voluntary, but we feel the European is reluctant to give way. He feels the African is much below him and the time has not yet come for him to be considered as a human being. We wish to provide opportunities for multi-racial education, that is all.

DR. SHEPHERD: In paragraph 19 you seem to suggest that Europeans should be allowed to go into African townships at night without reasonable excuse.—A. That is very discriminatory, we feel. Here we are talking about visiting in different communities, not living together. A European who wishes to visit friends in an African township has to see the superintendent to seek permission, and there is a time limit. Even if you have not finished your discussions then, you have to leave. That restriction on social intercourse is unnecessary. I do not see why a European should be stopped from visiting an African township, or why I should not be allowed to go to a European home and live there.—(MR. NGCEBETSHA): We do not wish, of course, that Europeans of undesirable character should be free to come to visit African townships.

MR. CROSS: How are you going to differentiate between the desirable and the undesirable? How are you going to exclude some and not others?—A. (MR. ZIYAMBI): It would be easy to tell, I think. A European and his wife and child, who came to visit a friend in such a township would be desirable, but if there was a European just walking around aimlessly, he obviously would not want to see anybody, or to pay a visit. His presence there is bound to be suspicious. An undesirable person is always noticed because of frequenting places of bad repute. For instance, there are places such as shebeens. Usually only bad people go there, and a European of good reputation would not be found there. It is the low type of European who goes to a place like that.—(MR. PATSIKA): Two Europeans were convicted in the courts about 4-5 months ago. I was actually present when they were in the location, shouting they were friends of the Africans and would not like to see interfered with by the police.—(MR. much as possible. One was whistling and the other singing and they were half-naked. A large crowd gathered and the police came and took them away. Those are the type of Europeans not wanted in the African areas. They are easily distinguished, and even Africans themselves will tell the police about them. But we have Europeans coming into the locations on business; they interview people, and we like their help; also the doctors. You can call a doctor any time from town and he will come. Those are the types of Europeans we would not like to see interfered with by the police.—(MR. BANGO): There was the case of an African businessman who advertised his business and got a lot of European customers. When they were seen outside his shop they were questioned by the police, and now that man is facing a charge of trying to bring Europeans into the area. In Bulawayo a lot of Africans come to town to buy in the shops there. Why cannot the people go and buy from the shops of African businessmen—why cannot we visit each other for business and social purposes?

PROFESSOR CREIGHTON: In paragraph 22(a) you urge that more land should be set aside for African use in rural areas. We have been told that in August, 1941, there were approximately 18,609,000 acres of unassigned land. That has disappeared: it is now nil. Where would you get the additional land to be set aside for African use?—A. We recognise that most of the Africans who have been moved from European land during the last 5-6 years have been moved under special provisions to other areas which were unassigned, but there still remain large tracts of land adjacent to the African areas in the rural areas. This land might be unassigned or Crown land. Africans need more land, and the land which they see there cannot be used for them—it may be kept for game or for the permanent use of the European community. Even during this drought, Africans cannot move their cattle to that land which they see adjacent; but Mr. Smith, who perhaps comes from town and has a ranch of so many thousand acres is given that land to graze his cattle on. This causes ill-feeling, particularly the fact that the land is near to the African land and far away from the European land.

MR. HADLOW: We are told that many Africans who could be on the voters' roll do not bother to register, and furthermore those who are on the roll do not bother to vote.—A. (MR. PATSIKA): Because of the legislation enacted, limiting the African vote to 20% on the whole vote, most Africans, whether qualified to vote or not, did not see the need to vote because they knew if they made up the number beyond that, the Europeans would still be in the majority so their votes would not count anything at all. The franchise is discriminatory: Europeans do not want large numbers of Africans on the roll because they would soon be in the majority. The Government has made these franchise laws in such a way that Africans who would like to be voters are discouraged. Even though some Africans own businesses and could qualify because of property, they have not enough education. There are quite a lot who could fill up forms without being aided. (MR. ZIYAMBI): There is a belief that half a loaf is better than nothing. I believe so. If you have half a loaf at least you eat it. This is hardly the question when it comes to some quarters because there is a belief if Africans are given that bit, why do they take advantage. The Africans have qualifications in themselves which are very high so that only a few qualify. The position today is that if all these Africans who qualify, the lowest qualifications are two years secondary education after Standard VI and an income of £120 a year. If about 20% of the total number of voters in Southern Rhodesia is reached by those Africans who are registered under this qualification then nobody else can register; I do not know if you are aware of that. The whole thing is so restricted that much as we would like to be voters we find it is useless because if we register only the first lucky few up to 20% can register. Still there are some who can qualify but they will not register because the government will not be the government that the African likes because the qualifications are so high that only a few Africans can reach them and their voice will not be heard. What we are striving for is a lowering of the qualifications so a great number could register.

MR. CHIRWA: You have stated that the Africans have no representation in the Territorial Legislature. Suppose you were asked to say what representation you would like to have, what would you suggest?—A. I will put two proposals. Either that the franchise qualifications are lowered: we know the Africans are in the majority. If there were a majority of Africans on the voters' roll I would not mind myself seeing a hundred per cent European Legislature, because I would know they are truly representative of the people because they will have been elected by the Africans. The other alternative could be that the whole thing be purely on racial lines. You could say 50% must be Africans and 50% must be Europeans in the Legislative Assembly. I think that would cause friction but the main thing is that the franchise qualifications must be lowered so that the majority of the people in this country would be the majority on the voters' rolls. If they voted for "Mr. Smith" then there is "Mr. Smith" in the House. I would not mind because I would know they have been elected by the people. All members are elected now by the Europeans—we do not elect anybody.

Q. Suppose on the last thesis that the majority were Africans. Is it unlikely that they would vote for Europeans?—A. If it is unlikely they vote for Africans why not let the Africans run the country if they are representatives of the people? Unfortunately the Africans fear the Europeans, but if such a European is a man who has the interests of both European and African at heart I see no reason why he should not be in Parliament. But the position is that the majority must make the decision.

MR. ELLMAN BROWN: I would like to go back to paragraph 22(b), where you recommend erection of special areas in the towns to which any person regardless of race might obtain title. I think you will agree that the development of the housing under home ownership in the last five years is beginning to give the Africans a sense of owning fixed property. The second stage was to increase the value of that particular house. There are here in Bulawayo houses of £750 and more but no laws to get the right type of people in the right areas. The next stage was to develop a housing area of minimum £1,500 which I think you all agreed to. I think you will agree that the difficulty is that there are only something like 69 Africans in Bulawayo who can afford to buy houses in an area which is in excess of £1,500 or more. If you are going to have another area where there are Europeans in your area you will have a minimum restriction of £2,500. I think you will agree that the economics of building a town with all its essential services is very expensive at the present moment, but I think that (b) is well within the aims and objects of the Government. I have had discussions with the Minister of Housing and he tells me that is his policy. Has he discussed it with you?—A. (MR. NGCEBETSHA): He discussed it with the residents of another area, it actually does not affect us in the municipal area.

Q. The same will be applicable wherever those townships are erected.—A. (MR. ZIYAMBI): We are very grateful for the steps being taken by the Government, but the main thing is there must be a certain area where people who want to live together should live together. Even if there are no Africans who can qualify it must be open. It is the restriction that we want to move.

Q. I agree the principle of it, but it is the application of the services in a small area to begin with.—A. (MR. BANGO): If you have visited Mpopoma Africans have put up houses just as good as others but because those Africans have put up those expensive houses—£6,000, £7,000—on ground which is not their own freehold, we want to work out a channel whereby freehold should be extended to Africans. At the present moment we buy houses but not on our own ground.—(MR. ZIYAMBI): May I give an example. Of late an Indian bought a house somewhere in the European settlement. There was a very loud protest from the Europeans, they did not want this Indian there. If my information is not wrong, he was a very rich Indian businessman; but because he was Indian they did not want him there.

MR. ROBINSON: You have told us and I personally have listened with very great interest to various suggestions which you have made about how an improved situation could be brought about in Southern Rhodesia in terms of race relations. What I would like to know from you is whether you feel there has been any improvement over the last seven years, any relaxation of these bars and discriminatory practices of which you have talked? Are you fairly hopeful or not about the continuing course of events in this regard?—A. (MR. NGCEBETSHA): Yes. There is no question about it. The trend is in the right direction. There are Europeans who are trying to improve things and nobody can deny, even we here cannot deny, the fact that, although the progress in that direction is very slow, it is there all the same. (MR. ZIYAMBI): My friends here has indicated that there are steps being taken to meet the African, but the steps that are being taken are so few that almost they are unnoticeable. I am looking at the question of the employment, especially in the Civil Service. We have African doctors who are employed on exactly the same business as Europeans. But you find in the same country, some spheres of employment where people do the same work with the same qualifications but at different centres so whichever way you look at it I do not think the whole thing is being done sincerely. It is being done in this way because the Government knows there are African doctors who are just as good as Europeans. But there are many more Africans who are educated who want to be considered as good as Europeans from all points of view except the colour, but they are not being met because the majority of Africans are considered semi-illiterate or not civilised. I also have in mind the removal of discrimination in public places like Post Offices; such things should have happened years ago, but just why the Government did not want to do it, I do not know. The Government is very reluctant to do such things. We are quite aware they are taking steps but they are doing so little so slowly that we do not notice it.

(MR. PATSIKA): In my own view the Government is taking these steps knowing full well what is coming. It seems to me that if the Government was not working towards getting full rights for the Federation as such, perhaps no steps would have been taken such as have been taken in the Post Offices, hotels, that have been talked about so much. We would like to see our Government and the Government of the Federation as a whole doing certain things for the African people in the Federation with the idea of not having to be pushed behind or wanting to gain something or to gain favour from overseas. It would be something initiated by the Government itself. There are quite a number of things they are promising to do. All these things are being done in preparation for this conference we are having here today. Once perhaps they achieve what they want—dominion status—they will stop all these things, they will do nothing. So it will take other conferences again to try to bring these things about. We do not like to see such things happening all the years of our lives.

MR. MOLSON: Do you feel it possible to draw any distinction between the Federal Government and the Government of Southern Rhodesia? Do you feel either that the Federal Government is more liberal in this matter and is trying to make more rapid progress than the Government of Southern Rhodesia; or do you feel that they are very much the same; or do you feel that the Government of Southern Rhodesia is more progressive in these things than the Federal Government?—(MR. NGCEBETSHA): Speaking for myself I think Sir Edgar Whitehead and Sir Roy Welensky are as brothers. What one does, the other also does exactly the same way. They are political brothers in their thinking. My friends has put it nicely in saying all that is being done is being done with some ulterior motive and that is in preparation for the 1960 Review which is just in the offing now. We are being alarmed now by the utterances of the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia in particular when he speaks of secession and thereby more or less supports Dr. Banda in Nyasaland when Dr. Banda speaks of secession. It makes us feel that the people of Southern Rhodesia brought about Federation with ulterior motives to advantage themselves at the expense of non-Europeans in view of the fact that there is a possibility of Africans getting some advantage out of Federation which according to their way of thinking might be detrimental to their interests. Then Sir Edgar Whitehead turns round and says there will be secession if these conditions are not fulfilled, conditions which are acceptable to the white community. That is why we say we are alarmed at the trend of events as we see them now through the utterances of Sir Roy Welensky and particularly Sir Edgar Whitehead when they go so far as even to ask for the removal of the enfranchised clauses, clauses which were never used, never applied. We do not know what is up his sleeve or what is the motive behind it. We are alarmed, ladies and gentlemen.

CHAIRMAN: Gentlemen, we are grateful and not alarmed by the help you have given us—A. We are not alarmed at you, gentlemen, but we hope you will interpret our spirit correctly.

Q. I think we have.—A. We are not representative of our own personal views in this matter. We have insisted that we see you although there was some pressure elsewhere that we should not come. We did not want to say unpleasant things against our Government but we wanted to tell you the facts as we see them.

Q. You have done it with great discretion, if I may say so.

MR. MOLSON: What exactly are the Joint Advisory Boards, how many people do you speak for?—A. (MR. ZIYAMBI): It is all the African townships of Bulawayo. Each township has an advisory board. Just before we go I am a bit discouraged because there is something that I thought you were going to cross-examine us on, that is a cause of great anxiety amongst the Africans, that is on the Constitution of the African National Congress. I am not asking you, Mr. Chairman, to deal with that now, but I would just like to add that we put it here. It is a matter that is burning our hearts. I should also like to congratulate the British Government on freeing Dr. Banda. We are very happy indeed and I feel the same spirit will be adhered to throughout, that all detainees will be released in good time.

CHAIRMAN: Thank you very much.

H. A. MORESBY-WHITE

The witness's parents had come to the country in 1890. His father had fought in the Matabele Rebellion. He himself was a farmer and businessman.

In his fifty years of life he claimed to have got to know the Africans as well as they knew themselves. In his younger days he had eaten and drunk with them, and slept side by side with them around the camp fires. Now he employed them. According to their creed, some Africans wanted to lie and deceive the Europeans and would stop at nothing to gain their ends. They would merely go their own way and were completely heartless about it. He was speaking of the educated few who came from the missions, and who felt they were not given sufficient opportunities. He could not understand the African's demand for equality, when he would not give equality to his own wife: he treated her as a black slave, simply someone to bear his children, and he would sell his own children for gain. Did Africans expect the Europeans to live in their way? Africans frequently accosted women openly in the streets. If the Africans had equality, they would behave in just the same way with white women, and this would lead to bloodshed immediately. He mentioned a figure of 90% of Africans having V.D., and refusing treatment. Were the Europeans to share a social life with such people? He related an anecdote in his recent experience about the murderous behaviour of Africans when thwarted; and gave other examples. If you gave an African your finger he would take your hand. An African would just take what he wanted, not what he had worked for.

Even the educated Africans would not eat out of the same pot as their own wives. They had no respect for women at all; their wives just walked behind them carrying the loads.

He was not trying to condemn all Africans, but only those Africans who had been to the missions. Those who lived in the country and on the farms were a respectable lot. He could make friends with them, more than with many Europeans; they were the older type of Africans. He said that you must always keep a promise which you made to an African.

He recommended that the Commission, although he knew it was difficult, should spend eighteen months in the country in various different positions in life.

He agreed that racial discrimination should continue in Southern Rhodesia to the same extent as in South Africa.

In reply to questions the witness made the following further points:—

- (1) Only a handful of Africans had reached "part education" which had taken the British a thousand years to gain. Such people could not be given equality with the whites. But they should be given opportunities. The Africans must prove themselves, and not gain their ends just by sheer numbers and intimidation.
- (2) Most of the educated Africans, he did not say all, were only out for their own gain. He was speaking of those he had met and those about whom he had read in the Press, such as Dr. Banda. He felt that the Africans were trying to force themselves into the Europeans' homes. When they went to college they seemed to get an inferiority complex.
- (3) He agreed that the educated Africans, who became liars, had been given European education; but he still blamed them. They felt that they were being ill-treated if they were not given top jobs after they had reached Standard VII.
- (4) He had been against Federation, but was not prepared to work for it.
- (5) He felt that a tremendous amount had been done for the Africans. But everything must go forward in the country.
- (6) He was not so sure about keeping Nyasaland in the Federation.
- (7) He felt that the political development in Northern Rhodesia had been right, over the years, and that Africans ought to be given the same opportunities in Southern Rhodesia.
- (8) The British Government was trying to hand over to Africans too quickly. Africans should first earn their advancement. But the Southern Rhodesian and Federal Governments attitude might lead to over-rapid African advancement. Nevertheless he would agree to having Africans in the Southern Rhodesian Parliament immediately, but not an African majority.
- (9) If there was an African majority in Northern Rhodesia, he would want to break up the Federation immediately.

Memorandum

1. We have pleasure in submitting the following memorandum with the hope that the recommendations contained therein will receive your sympathetic consideration and also help in formulating a Constitution that will meet with the approval and recognise the aspirations of the majority of the inhabitants of the Federation.

Observations on Terms of Reference

2. We wish to emphasise at the outset that this memorandum is submitted under protest because of the restrictive terms of reference which do not allow for alternate suggestions to Federation or a possible recommendation for its dismemberment.

3. This we feel is objectionable and unrealistic considering the views of many inhabitants of the Federation who were and are still vehemently opposed to the idea of Federation.

4. That the Commission should sit at a time when the true representatives of the large majority of the people are detained without trial is we consider yet another unfortunate aspect of the Inquiry.

5. Finally we strongly believe, with due respect to all the Commissioners, that the composition of the Commission is not fully representative and therefore far from satisfies those who would have normally given evidence before the Commission.

6. Bearing in mind the aforesaid we are compelled to suggest the best means for enduring Federation. If Federation is to continue, concrete proof must be given to the African people that the principles contained in the Preamble are in fact to be implemented; that economic, political and social advancement will go hand in hand for all the inhabitants.

Scope of Memorandum

7. This memorandum will therefore
 - (a) suggest constitutional changes,
 - (b) advocate the broadening of franchise laws and
 - (c) recommend for the inclusion of a Bill of Rights in the Constitution.

Constitutional Proposals

8. Whilst there may still be reason for continued association between Northern Rhodesia and Southern Rhodesia with uncorruptible safeguards, we are of the firm opinion that Nyasaland should be free to reconsider its continued membership of the Federation immediately by a referendum based on Universal Adult Suffrage. Taking into consideration the composition of population and such other factors it is our belief that Nyasaland's political evolution should be more akin to that of Tanganyika. Having made clear our views on this vital question we offer our comments on the Revision of the Constitution. In doing so we shall bear in mind the terms of reference of the Monckton Commission, which precludes consideration of any dissolution or withdrawal of a territory from the Federation.

9. The Preamble to the Constitution states that the Federation is "the rightful home of all lawful inhabitants thereof, whatever their origin". If that is so it is incomprehensible why "control of voluntary movement of persons between territories" is allowed to be a subject on the Concurrent Legislative List. Immediately after Federation, legislation was passed by the Southern Rhodesia Legislative Assembly to exclude all Asians residing in the northern territories from entry into Southern Rhodesia. This disability was removed only last year as the talks for the review of the Constitution were nearing. Mr. Patrick Matimba, "a lawful inhabitant" of the Federation was released from detention on condition that he left the Federation. We believe that stringent provisions must be put into the Constitution so that the right of free movement within the Federation is not denied to any inhabitants on grounds of race or political affiliation. We also believe that the territories should have no right to legislate on this subject.

Composition of Legislature

10. The composition of the Federal Legislature has been a matter of much concern to us. In view of the fact that immigrant populations in the three territories vary considerably in numbers and taking into consideration the political history of the three territories we have come to the conclusion that the method of election of members from Nyasaland will have to be different from that of Northern Rhodesia and Southern Rhodesia in the interest of political stability. We suggest that the Federal Legislature should consist of 60 seats: 25 of its members to be elected from Southern Rhodesia by a system of qualitative franchise (as advocated in paragraph number 44). 20 members to be elected from Northern Rhodesia on the same basis. 15 members to be elected from Nyasaland by Universal Adult Suffrage. We wish to emphasise that if all Nyasa goodwill can be regained it will be by nothing short of Universal Adult Suffrage. With the system suggested above the need for an African Affairs Board falls away.

11. You will have noticed that the ratio of representation for each territory differs from the present. We feel it is a gross injustice to the northern territories that nearly 50% of the seats—29 out of 59—be allotted to Southern Rhodesia. Northern with the Copperbelt is not only the economic backbone of the country but is also the largest in area. We have given Nyasaland 15 seats—only a quarter of the total—because though it is the territory with the largest population, it is small in area and as yet undeveloped. Southern Rhodesia has been given the largest numbers of seats—25—in order to appease its comparatively large European population and because it is the most well developed territory. We stand for the ultimate goal of "one man, one vote" based on Universal Adult Suffrage but we appreciate that if such a viewpoint is advocated at the present stage the Commission is likely to dismiss it as an extremist suggestion (see paragraphs 43 and 45).

Super-Flaw

12. At this stage we wish to point out a super-flaw in the present Constitution. Elections could be manipulated in such a way that within the course of two general elections there would be not a single African Member of Parliament. We refer to Article 9(2) of the Constitution. If at the next elections four African candidates are elected from each territory from its general constituencies, at the subsequent elections the "elected African members" and "specially elected African members" can be done away with, without any guarantee that the four Africans elected at the previous elections from general constituencies will be re-elected. We make bold to say that without doubt this is one of the most fraudulent political stratagem designed to hoodwink the African population.

13. We also draw your attention to the last sentence of Article 2(2) of the Constitution which provides "that the question whether or not the Governor-General has in any matter complied with any such instructions" (those from Her Majesty) "shall not be enquired into any court". Already Southern Rhodesia has a local man as Governor. In future the Federation may also have a local man as Governor-General. That he would give unbiased interpretation to such instructions is not assured. In the event of such instructions being improperly carried out, there can be no recourse to law under the present constitution.

Special Constitutional Courts

14. There should, we feel, also be provision for a special court to deal with Constitutional matters, the judges for which should be recruited from outside the country—as past events have shown that justice is a rare commodity for people whose political affiliations are not to the liking of those that govern. There should be appeal from such a court to the Privy Council or to the International Court at the Hague.

Future Status of The Federation

15. The Preamble to the Constitution states that the Federation may attain full membership of the Commonwealth when the "inhabitants so desire". We would like this assurance to be fortified by a machinery of Referendum taken on the basis of Universal Adult Suffrage. The granting of Dominion Status should be postponed until such time that the majority of the inhabitants of the Federation desire such a change.

Bill of Rights

16. The present Constitution of the Federation is void in so far as guarantees of fundamental rights to its citizens is concerned. In view of this omission, we strongly recommend for the insertion in the revised Constitution, a Bill of Rights or a Chapter on the following lines:—

17. Right to Equality

- (a) The State shall not deny to any person the law or the equal protection of the laws.
- (b) 1. Prohibition of Discrimination. The State shall not discriminate against any citizen on grounds only of religion, race, sex, place of birth or any of them.
2. No citizen shall on grounds only of race, religion, sex, place of birth or any of them be subject to any disability, liability, restriction or condition with regard to:—
 - (a) Access to shops, restaurants, hotels and places of public entertainment or
 - (b) the use of roads and places of public resort maintained wholly or partly out of State funds or dedicated to the use of the general public. It would be necessary to define certain universal phrases, which, because of lack of legal definitions in this country, find a general abuse based on colour. Illustration: "Right of Admission Reserved". This phrase is being misconstrued by European establishments to exclude non-Europeans.

18. Equality of Opportunity in Matters of Public Employment: No citizen shall, on grounds only of race, religion, sex, place of birth or any of them, be ineligible for, or be discriminated against in respect of any employment or office under the State. The singular reference to a guarantee of such a right seems to be with regard to the Federal Public Service, wherein Article 40, Sub-section 2, it is laid down that no person will be ineligible for employment on grounds of race alone. However, the subsequent section 3, in our opinion, has a nullifying effect of this provision when it states that "In determining the suitability of any person for any employment in the Federal Public Service, regard may be had to the circumstances of the locality in which that person would be employed". This restrictive section is capable of being interpreted in a manner detrimental to a general eligibility for employment in the Service.

19. Right to Freedom:

- (1) All citizens shall have the right—
 - (a) to freedom of speech and expression;
 - (b) to assemble peacefully and without arms;
 - (c) to form associations and unions;
 - (d) to move freely throughout the territories comprising the Federation.
 - (e) to reside and settle in any part of the territories of the Federation.
 - (f) to acquire, hold and dispose of land and property, and
 - (g) to practice any profession, or to carry on any occupation trade or business.

20. Right to Freedom of Religion;

Subject to public order, morality and health, all persons are equally entitled to freedom of conscience and the right freely to profess, practise and propagate religion and to establish, manage and administer charitable and educational institutions.

21. Protection against Arrest and Detention

- (a) No person shall be deprived of his life or personal liberty except according to procedure established by law.
- (b) No person who is arrested shall be detained in custody without being informed, as soon as may be, of the grounds of such arrest, nor shall he be denied the right to consult and be defended by a legal practitioner of his choice.
- (c) Every person who is arrested and detained in custody shall be produced before the nearest magistrate within a period of twenty-four hours of such arrest and no such person shall be detained in custody beyond the said period without the authority of a magistrate.

22. Educational Rights:

No citizen shall be denied admission into any educational institution maintained by the State or receiving aid out of State funds, on grounds only of race, religion, language or any of them.

23. Right to Constitutional Remedies:

- (a) The right to move the Supreme Court by appropriate proceedings for the enforcement of the rights conferred by this Bill is guaranteed.
- (b) The Supreme Court of the land shall have the power to issue directions or orders or writs, including writs in the nature of habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto and certiorari, whichever may be appropriate for the enforcement of any of the rights conferred by this Bill.
- (c) The rights guaranteed by this Constitution shall not be suspended or abridged in any way.

Franchise

24. The following quoted from the Preamble of the Constitution of the Federation has a direct bearing on the mandate of the Commission. The Federation (to quote its preamble) was designed to "... conduce to the security, advancement and welfare of all ... inhabitants ...". We therefore wish to recommend for your consideration, franchise proposals which conform to the spirit and the letter of "partnership and co-operation", and which will help to direct the nation's course along the road to democracy.

25. It is extremely difficult to conceive of a system for the just representation of the people of the Federation on any other lines than a democratic one. And with this in view we submit

- (a) that democratic government is the only form of government compatible with the needs of all the inhabitants of the Federation, and
- (b) that the widest possible franchise is the very basis of democratic government.

26. Much has been said about the "democratic" feature of the national life in the Federation, but the truth is that the franchise laws, though apparently democratic in form, are in practice restrictive, unjust and undemocratic, and quite out of keeping with the policy of "partnership and co-operation".

27. In the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland political power is confined to a numerically small minority who seem determined to prevent ever having a parliament with a majority of black members, however civilised and whatever stringent tests they may have passed.

28. There can be no question, we submit, of the minority continuing to live, even in the foreseeable future, as a privileged class by means of a manipulated franchise, an industrial, economic and social Colour Bar and the various other stratagems designed to preserve the status quo.

29. The present system of government in the Federation cannot be termed honestly government by the people and it is our belief that for the ruler as well as the ruled it is the very negation of living.

30. This system we feel has been instrumental in preventing the development of a Rhodesian loyalty, instead of which we have today literally two nations one white, one black, with all the danger inherent in such a situation when they are separated by a considerable economic gulf.

31. It is precisely because the majority of the people are disfranchised that their needs do not receive the attention they otherwise would. This is not a situation unique to the Federation. It is one which has prevailed in every "civilised" country of the world. A comparison of the period of Industrial Revolution and the present period in the Rhodesias will prove conclusively that this was true of Britain as well. It is well known that the widening of franchise in Britain averted revolution, led to great improvements in the living conditions of the mass of the people, and united the "two nations" into one.

32. The "two" nations exist in the Federation as they did in Britain, one the rich, one the poor, and the added factors of different colour, language and ethnic background make the likelihood of eventual collision, even greater than that of the England of 1848. The one advantage is that our politicians can learn from history. To avert such a collision the granting of a wide franchise is the only solution.

33. Failure to make the African "part of the democratic system" in the Federation is, we feel, the prime cause of the ever growing unrest. The risk of a restricted franchise is greater than the risk involved in widening it.

34. Article 21 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights deals with the basis of democratic government:

"The will of the people (irrespective of race, colour etc.—Art. 2(1) shall be the basis of the authority of government; this will shall be expressed in periodic and genuine elections which shall be by universal and equal suffrage and shall be held by secret vote or by equivalent free voting procedures".

35. It is our considered opinion that the commission should indicate its belief in a democratic government which can and must prevail in a multi-racial society, as the only form of government which will ensure the implementation of partnership and the building of a united nation in the Federation. And since Universal Adult Suffrage is absolutely basic to a democratic state, its attainment should be the ultimate goal of the Federation.

36. One often hears the question:

Can the African understand democracy which is essentially the Whiteman's way of government? Did the African have any democracy before the coming of the Whiteman to Africa? Ndabaningi Sithole's book on "African Nationalism" (page 86) makes the following observation:

"Those of us who have lived in Africa know the African people are democratic to a point of inaction. Things are never settled until everyone has had something to say. African councils allow the free expression of all shades of opinions. Any man has full right to express his mind on public questions. Even those in authority will always consult public opinion: 'Batini abantu?' (Ndebele, Southern Rhodesia) means 'What do the people say?' 'Nxa abantu bevuma, kulungile' means 'If people agree that is alright'. The people—the common people—are the basis of all properly constituted authority".

37. There is no reason to believe that the African would be less capable of understanding the rudiments of government than the English labourer, Indian villager or Ghana tribesman.

38. The differences in education, intelligence, moral responsibility and political understanding between members of any Western electorate can be and usually are great but no one thinks of denying these people the vote for fear they may use it unwisely. The Africans are citizens of this country and have accepted and are striving within their limited means to attain standards of Western civilisation. The question for the Federation is not "which of our people are civilised?", since no standards of selection really exist. The only answer to this can be that we are and propose to become more so.

39. The fundamental need of the large majority of the population is simple economic security. In so far as they feel a challenge to their economic security from people of another race they will think and act racially. The way to ease racial feeling lies in creating economic conditions which provide security regardless of race.

40. Those who are against Universal Adult Suffrage will only find themselves in agreement with the following quaint quarter:

"We must also note that Engels quite definitely regarded Universal Suffrage as a means of bourgeois domination". (V. I. Lenin, in "The State and Revolution").

41. The fear of African susceptibility to the influence of 'demagogues' is an argument advanced against extending the franchise. But demagoguery breeds in hopelessness. The increasing social chaos, the falling standards of living, the lack of political expression and economic opportunity of Germany and Italy in the 1920's gave rise to the rule of two of the world's worst demagogues in highly civilised countries. The bulk of any people are capable under normal conditions, to judge wisdom, integrity and honesty of purpose in a candidate for election. The danger of Africans being swayed by and electing 'demagogues' may be present but it is smaller now than perhaps it ever will be again, if exasperation, hopelessness, and racial animosity were to set in, as undoubtedly they will if the status quo is maintained.

42. In considering the effects of the above recommendation, the first point is that any government in Africa proclaiming its belief in democracy by the introduction of a wide franchise in a multi-racial state would immediately gain the goodwill and respect of the mass of the people. This in itself would, as nothing else, tend to consolidate its position. Conversely, the forces giving rise to African nationalism would receive the greatest set-back. The people would look to European leadership, civilised leadership, with the new knowledge that partnership meant what it said after all, and their vote would undoubtedly go to the party which practically demonstrated its belief in democracy. A further point is that the responsible elements among the African leaders would be the first to recognise the tremendous step forward towards democracy, that the granting of a wider franchise, leading ultimately to Universal Adult Suffrage would represent. The result—the practical result—then, would not be the overnight establishment of an all-black parliament, mob rule and the end of the Whiteman as the advocates of White Supremacy would predict, but rather the development of a government with multi-racial support, enjoying the good-will necessary to develop a pattern of life in Central Africa which would be an example to the rest of the Colonial world.

43. We are fully conscious of the fact that it may not be practicable to introduce Universal Adult Suffrage immediately. That it will take time to build up the necessary political institutions, to overcome prejudice and to allow time for public opinion to adjust itself, so that Suffrage may be introduced without the dangers inherent in too sudden a change. But we must declare our intention to do so at the opportune moment unequivocally and stick to it unswervingly; and as a demonstration of our sincerity and because it is an immediate political necessity ask for the extension of the present franchise laws immediately.

44. The present B roll which in actual fact is designed for Africans, and is restrictive in as far as election of candidates is concerned should be abolished. As a reasonable compromise between the existing franchise laws and the objective of Universal Adult Suffrage we propose the following qualifications:—

- (a) that the applicant is over 21 years of age and is able to fill in the requisite forms in English or any indigenous language;
- (b) (1) that he (or she) has passed Standard VI education or
- (2) has £250 worth of property (property held in Native Reserves to count) or
- (3) is receiving an income of a cash value (including allowances) amounting to £120 per year.
- (c) that he is resident in the Federation for not less than 12 months.

These franchise qualifications should not be hampered by any citizenship laws.

45. We realise the implementation of such a programme would need a great deal of courage and faith on the part of the government as well as the present electorate. But we also believe that in the display of such courage and faith lies the only hope for the future of a young, vigorous and growing country. It is a positive policy to unite the people of the Federation into one, sharing common loyalties and common interests.

46. Conclusion.

We earnestly believe that the immediate and sincere implementation, on the lines suggestion in this memorandum will undoubtedly bring untold good to all the inhabitants of the Federation. On the other hand the rejection of the views expressed will only lead to the eventual break up of the Central African Federation.

Much will depend on the course the politicians of this country will chalk out. And much more still the sincerity of purpose in implementing a policy aimed at creating a harmonious society based on:—

- (a) Equality of opportunity for all.
- (b) Privileges at present enjoyed by the few to be extended to every citizen.
- (c) Guarantee of Civil Liberties and an independent Judiciary to safeguard personal freedom against abuse of power, either by the State or any Organisation.

Supplementary Memorandum

AN ASIAN GROUP OF BULAWAYO

We wish to bring to your notice a little-known fact embodied in the present Constitution of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

Article 9 of the Constitution provides for a Legislature of 59 members composed of five (four?) categories:—

Category	S.R.	N.R.	Ny.
1 Elected Members	24	14	6
2 Elected African Members	4	2	2
3 Sp. Elected African Members	—	2	2
4 Sp. Elected European Members for Afr. interests	1	—	—
5 Sp. Appointed European Members for Afr. interests	—	1	1

“Elected Members” are those elected by voters on the Common Voters’ Roll, which is predominantly white. Up to now no African has been returned an “Elected Member”.

2. “Elected African Members” are those elected by voters on a common voters’ roll for seats reserved for Africans only. All Africans returned to Parliament in such a way have been members of predominantly white parties.

3. “Specially Elected African Members” are those elected in a manner prescribed by the Governors of the respective territories.

4. “Specially Elected European Member” from S. Rhodesia is also elected by voters on the common roll.

5. The “Specially Appointed European Members” are appointed by the Governors of the respective territories.

Now Article 9(2) provides that if an African is elected as an “Elected Member” (Category 1) at any election at the subsequent elections one seat of an “Elected African Member” will be reduced from that territory and one seat of “Elected Members” increased. This has been designed to keep constant the number of Africans in Parliament. Thus if four Africans are elected as Elected Members (category 1), at the subsequent election all four seats for Elected African Members (category 2) will be done away with. Thus elections can be manipulated in such a way that within the course of two elections there can be no Africans sitting in the Federal Legislature. We give an example to illustrate the point:— Let us assume an Election takes place in November 1960 and at that election the United Federal Party and the Dominion Party come to a mutual agreement to put up four African candidates in each territory to contest seats agreed to by them. Since the electorate is predominantly European and supporters of these two parties, they will naturally vote as their parties want them to. We will therefore have four Africans elected from each territory. Thus there will be in Parliament twelve Africans as “elected members” (Category 1) and twelve Africans from categories (2) and (3)—24 members in all—no doubt an impressive number by present standards.

Now, the constitution comes in. Because 12 Africans were elected as “elected members” (category 1) at the 1960 elections Article 9(2) of the constitution provides that the seats for “elected members” be increased by that number by reducing seats for categories 2, 3 and 4 (i.e. seats reserved for Africans). So at the 1965 elections the Federal Legislature may be composed in the following manner:—

Elected Members	28	18	10

Now suddenly the U.F.P. and the Dominion Party may decide to withdraw from their previous agreement and put up European candidates for all seats. We will thus find that the 1965 Parliament will consist of European members only. If such a situation arises, there is nothing in the constitution which guarantees that the seats in categories 2, 3 and 4 (reserved for Africans) will be restored.

The above example is hypothetical. The dates are more so because the Federation is not likely to achieve Dominion status by then. And, as long as Dominion status is not attained our white rulers are unlikely to play any such tricks. Once Dominion status is achieved, however we feel that such a situation can arise. Nothing that has happened in the past has given us confidence in the integrity of local politicians. We therefore appeal to those who wish to see progress in the Federation to use their influence in order to remedy this grave flaw in the constitution. The clauses which we referred to ~~above~~ were introduced into the constitution only a year or two ago. We cannot for one moment believe that the architects of these amendments are ignorant of their long-term prospects. We hope that the British people at a time when "they've never had it so good" will not abdicate their responsibilities towards a people facing their darkest hour—the 7,000,000 Africans of Central Africa.

Oral Evidence

AN ASIAN GROUP OF BULAWAYO

Representatives: N. B. Mooney

S. K. Naik

D. N. Desai

The Group had presented two memoranda. Their Supplementary paper was read during the course of their oral evidence (see paragraph 17 below).

Mr. Desai stated that the Group had come before the Commission as individuals, although they were all members of the Asian community, which numbered 18,000 in Bulawayo. He wished to start by reiterating certain points made at the beginning of their memorandum. "To protest against the composition of the Commission; to protest against the Commission sitting at a time when numerous leaders were in detention; and to protest at the Commission sitting in a hotel where discrimination had been permitted, and many of the Asian leaders had been insulted in the past. He also stated that although the hotel had become multi-racial, discrimination still existed in separate bar facilities for Asians and coloureds.

In reply to questions on the memorandum, Mr. Desai and the other two witnesses made the following points:—

(1) On the first sentence of paragraph 8. He was asked whether a referendum in Nyasaland on Universal Adult Suffrage would not be affected by intimidation, they said that they thought there was no intimidation. Intimidation was only exercised by those who held power, that is the Government. They had not been to Nyasaland recently.

(2) On paragraph 10: the suggestion that the 16 members of the Federal Assembly should be elected from Nyasaland by Universal Adult Suffrage. They suggested this because Nyasaland Africans were politically more conscious, and they thought that the Nyasaland Africans would be satisfied with nothing less than Universal Adult Suffrage to ensure the stability of the Federation, so the grant of Universal Adult Suffrage was still only a compromise. They considered it would be feasible to grant it at the present time.

(3) Comparing paragraph 24 on the franchise and the statement in paragraph 43 that it would not be practicable to introduce Universal Adult Suffrage immediately, they stated that the latter was their considered view. If Universal Adult Suffrage were introduced immediately it would win over the Africans, but they knew that the whites would resist it. They then referred to the Southern Rhodesian Prime Minister having talked of secession at a time when the Monckton Commission was already sitting.

(4) On paragraph 44, details of a suggested franchise. All these related to the Federal franchise. They wanted to eliminate the B Roll because they felt that there could not be two classes of citizens; either all should enjoy the same degree of citizenship, or have none at all. They felt that there should not have been a B Roll from the beginning, and on their proposals the need for a B Roll fell away.

(5) Asked why many Africans, entitled to do so, did not register for the vote; they said that they felt that very few Africans could in fact qualify; the economic position of Africans was very poor, they were paid £7 10s per month in contrast to the high wages of Europeans. In Nyasaland they were totally opposed to joining the voters' roll because they thought they would have no effect if they did so.

(6) On paragraph 44 (b)(i); women should have the vote as well as men. They thought that African men would also agree to this, and that in fact African women were the more politically conscious. The income of the husband should count as the wife's income.

(7) Questioned as to whether this should apply to all three wives of a polygamist marriage, they said that it was a pity that the Government should allow three wives to be kept; it was not democratic. If the system allowed for three wives, then all three should have the vote. Unmarried African women, if qualified, should also have the vote.

(8) An educational Standard VI should qualify without any means or income qualification at all. "Property held in Native Reserves" meant that this should also be a qualification as well as property held elsewhere.

(9) The qualification of £120 per annum need not be held for 2 years before registration, but merely at the time of registration.

(10) The reference at the end of paragraph 44 to "citizenship laws" meant that if merely the word "citizen" were employed in the statute, then the legislation relating to citizenship might be made too difficult for many to meet, thus affecting the franchise; for example it might be prescribed that the form had to be filled in in the English language.

(11) They had not worked out how many people would be enfranchised on these qualifications. They would be satisfied with the qualifications which they suggested. They were expressing their own personal views, and were not speaking on behalf of all Asians, and definitely not on behalf of all Africans.

(12) The reference in the first sentence of paragraph 8 to "uncorruptible safe-guards" meant that the safe-guards should be left with the Crown, meaning the British Government, exercising those powers from the Colonial Office or the Commonwealth Relations Office. Such an office should continue to control the Federation. They realised that this might not now affect Southern Rhodesia.

(13) Paragraph 19 (g) in the past they had found that Indian young people, although qualified, had not been allowed to enter professions. The Indians were described as "a nation of shop keepers" but when for example one of their sons tried to become qualified as a solicitor he was prevented by the "trade ring". Another Indian, qualified as an engineer, had been unable to get employment in Southern Rhodesia and had had to go elsewhere. The provision for this freedom (i.e. freedom to enter into professional business) should be embodied in a Bill of Rights for all, not merely for Asians. As in America, it was the duty of the Government to break up all monopolies.

(14) Nyasaland should evolve in the same way as in Tanganyika, although the witnesses were aware that Tanganyika had not yet achieved Universal Adult Suffrage. If Nyasaland had to remain in the Federation, then nothing short of Universal Adult Suffrage would suffice there. The difference between Nyasaland and Tanganyika was that the latter was free, and not afraid of anyone.

(15) Paragraph 22. This paragraph implied that they were in favour of multi-racial schools. They believed that they could have only one nation in the Federation, and that the idea must be inculcated from the beginning.

(16) Paragraph 14. The reason why they thought that judges should be brought from outside the country was that they felt that judges from this country did not give fair treatment; they cited the Beadle Tribunal as an example.

(17) On paragraph 12, the "Super-Flaw" in the Federal Constitution, relating to Article 9 (ii), they stated that they had not taken any legal opinion, and supported their view by reading out a special statement, (See Supplementary Memorandum). They refused to admit that the provisions of Article 9 (i) were legitimate as designed to see that at least some Africans could get into the Federal Assembly.

(18) Paragraph 15; last sentence. If the other proposals in their memorandum were carried out, they felt that Dominion status would be good for the country. Their views generally, they admitted, were based on suspicion. They had seen what had happened in South Africa, and they had no reason to think that the white people in the Federation were any different.

(19) They were questioned as to whether Southern Rhodesia would be prepared to stay on in the Federation on the basis which they had proposed; and whether they would prefer to have the Dominion Party in Power. They stated that they preferred the Dominion Party to the United Federal Party, believing that the latter had not a straight policy and they preferred to deal with the devil in his own clothing. A change of heart was needed in the Federation, and it would have to be on the part of the Europeans, because they hold the power. They knew they would not get this from the Dominion Party, but they did not get it from the United Federal Party either.

(20) Paragraph 19 (e) (f). They were asked whether the suggested freedoms should include universal rights to settlement in Native Reserves and Native Trust Land. They replied that they could not overlook that certain lands needed to be reserved for Africans. If those lands were opened up there might be large scale purchase, leading in the end to the Africans being landless. They, therefore, thought that certain lands should be set aside and reserved for Africans. But the Crown should not permit the selling of any land on speculation, without full development clauses; and if these were not carried out the land should be confiscated.

(21) Paragraph 8. Asked again why they thought the special position should be accorded to Nyasaland, they replied that many white people thought Nyasaland should be free. But if the same idea were applied in Northern Rhodesia there might be disturbances between the whites and the blacks.

(22) Paragraph 2. If the terms of reference of the Commission had been other than they are, they said that they would have advocated a different course. They felt that Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland should never have been federated with Southern Rhodesia, and they would have said that the position should revert to what it was before Federation. But they had had to assume that nothing was permitted in evidence except what related to the continuance of Federation; they wanted the Federation to continue if, but only if, the proposals which they made were accepted.

Some Comments on African Development

1. In 1896 when the European population of the Matabeleland portion of Southern Rhodesia was probably below four figures, the Matabele developed the idea that the loss of cattle from Rinderpest was caused by the white man, and turned on the Europeans, particularly on outlying farms and mines. There was heavy slaughtering.

2. The local defence was inadequate to cope, and Rhodes, at Capetown, decided to come up to face the rebels. His position at the moment was unfortunate. Because of his association with the Jameson Raid in December 1895 he had lost status. He was no longer Prime Minister of the Cape Colony, nor was he Chairman of the British South Africa Company, which, through his enthusiasm a few years earlier had, with the approval of Lobengula, the Matabele chieftain, secured a Charter over what has become Southern Rhodesia.

3. In time contact was made with the Africans, through the medium of a white man acquainted with the language, and Rhodes spent six weeks in the Matopo Hills (a visit today would clearly indicate what that would have meant in the 90's without its present roads). From time to time there were talks with the ringleaders who would disappear and then come again and again until, finally, they came and declared in their own language "La hla nkonko" (We lay down our spears).

4. From then onwards, in spite of the horrible slaughtering, the Europeans and Africans lived in peace and concord for over 57 years until that unfortunate, because it was premature, and quite inappropriate word "partnership" appeared in the preamble of the Federal Act.

5. It was Rhodes who coined the dictum "Equal rights for all civilised people", and in keeping with that in 1903 (this was during the period of the Charter which did not cease until 1923 when self-government was granted) the African in Southern Rhodesia was given the right to vote on the same terms as European—the terms at that time being:

£150 property, and the ability to fill in an "Application to Vote" form.

6. After fifty years, out of an African population in Southern Rhodesia of about two millions, only 400 had either attached sufficient importance to the value of the vote as a step towards democracy, or had reached the qualifications, and that was the state of things at the time of Federation in 1953.

7. Of necessity there had to be some sort of registration. Even Europeans find themselves registered in some form or other, either as voters or as municipal or government taxpayers. This registration is relatively easy; but in the case of the African, up to the present the vast majority have been unable to say who they were or where they came from, other than in their own language, and their abodes might be many miles away. Hence at the first opportunity their registration at the office of a Native Commissioner takes the form of a pass, which saves a lot of trouble to all concerned.

8. That very brief outline of the relations between the African and the European in Southern Rhodesia is of an importance that cannot be overstressed because in Northern Rhodesia, under the direct control of the British Government, through a Legislative Council, relations between European and Africans were somewhat different. It is true that one found Africans employed in Government offices, if that can be accepted as a sign of advancement. To that extent they may be said to be ahead of similar Africans in Southern Rhodesia, but all the time they were only "protected person", and up to 1948 had no sort of representation in the Legislative Council, and yet today the people of Great Britain are calling for universal suffrage amongst all Federal Africans, quite regardless of the utter inability of the greater portion of Africans to know what it means. Bechuanaland does not come into the present subject, but it is another instance of direct control from Great Britain. Was there ever a country so completely void of any sort of encouragement to the African after over sixty years of British rule? Was there ever a country so completely dead? From this it may be gathered that I ask myself: "How can the people of Great Britain be accepted as a guide to us in the development of the African?"

9. To the extent that the right to vote is fundamental to "partnership", partnership prevailed in Southern Rhodesia for 50 years, during which time the African was gradually evolving from a savage into a civilised being. The progress has necessarily been slow. He had no written language. It was the European missionary who began by framing the phonetic sound of an African word into English symbols, just simple words used by the African, and ultimately, by perseverance there were sufficient words to form a dictionary. Indeed it was necessary for the African to be taught to read English before he could read his own language in the written words the European had prepared for him. As a matter of fact there are twenty or more spoken languages amongst Africans, for many of which, if not all, there are dictionaries. This is of interest in that it indicates that although all of them are black, all Africans are not of one tribe and do not necessarily think alike on any subject.

10. What was actually developing in Southern Rhodesia was a form of "guardianship", which is still in progress, but being pushed aside by an elaboration of the word "partnership". Just as a European child, under guardianship, develops into a self-supporting man, so here and there have we seen a few Africans rise above their fellows, but that has not made all Africans self-supporting. There are millions requiring the attention of the last 50 years to be continued, and I suggest that the African will be a better fellow if evolution is allowed to develop gradually, and that the system that prevailed in Southern Rhodesia for over fifty years should be extended to Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland and become a common policy under the Federal Government. As the African advances so he will take his place in the life and activities of the population, and anything in the shape of force will be eliminated.

In brief, "time" will do the "cementing".

Oral Evidence

W. B. DAWSON

Mr. Dawson said that he was born in Port Elizabeth in 1882, and that he had spent over 50 years in the Union and the last 26 years in Southern Rhodesia. Altogether he had served the railways in the Union of South Africa and Rhodesia for a period of 50 years, and his beat extended from Beira to the Congo border, and it included the railway road services routes as well. In the circumstances he had virtually covered the two Rhodesias from end to end.

He stated that he did not wish to expand his memorandum beyond saying that he continued to be very worried about miscegenation; for he believed that the white person in Southern Rhodesia should have respect for his colour, and he thought it was most important that mixed racial strains should not develop in the Federation.

In response to a question Mr. Dawson stated that his reference in paragraph 7 of his memorandum was purely in relation to registration as a means of identification; it was not related to registration as a voter. On the latter, however, the witness commented that the failure by the African to register as a voter when he was entitled to do so arose primarily from ignorance. Many people tended to ignore the fact that it was only now that the African was emerging. It was true that educational facilities for Africans had been somewhat primitive until the last 8 or 10 years, but nevertheless the African had been entitled to register as a voter since as far back as 1903. After all, he commented, it was only a very short while ago that many of them were able to write their own names in their own language, let alone write and understand English.

Mr. Dawson said that in his view the idea of partnership between the races was premature. He much preferred a concept of guardianship, because the vast majority of Africans were still in the process of evolving. While he was perfectly happy to assist Africans in any way that he could, Mr Dawson said he was not willing to enter into partnership, so to speak, with those who remained ignorant.

S. J. M. MOYO

Autobiographical Note

I, Siminya John Makalisa Moyo, was born on the 12th of November 1920 at a little village in the Filabusi District.

My early schooldays were at a kraal school and I later came to Bulawayo, Usher Salvation Army Mission School and ended my school days at Domboshawa Government School near Salisbury. I left school after a third year Post VI in Community Work, and was immediately employed by the S.R. Government as a Community Demonstrator in January 1943. From March 1952 I worked as a Mobile Cinema Commentator and left on the 1st of December 1952 to join Rhodesia Railways as Recorder/Interpreter.

In 1955 I decided to pursue further studies and passed my Junior Certificate in 1956.

I have held executive positions in the Domboshawa School Disciplinary Committee, Railway African Football Association (Bulawayo) Mpopoma Ratepayers' Association (Bulawayo), Railway Township Advisory Committee (Bulawayo), African National Congress (Bulawayo) and Railway African Workers' Union. (I am President General now of that Union).

Introduction

Failure by the Federal Government to Win African Confidence in its Own Departments and Industries

It is generally accepted that the accelerated development of industries was evident immediately after the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland came into being.

While it may be difficult for one to attempt to prove that without Federation we could not have had the same progress, one may at least claim wonderful progress in providing public services where the Federal Government was responsible. The Medical Department is one where the public has seen not only new hospitals and clinics in the last four or five years but has also seen very much better facilities in both old and new hospitals and clinics. The post offices have also been improved and new ones built and for the public this Department has removed colour bar and all the counters.

In the Railways an attempt is being made at removing social colour bar for the passengers, and one may say that but for minor incidents by members of the public resenting each other this Department is doing its best to please everybody. Employees to these Departments

While the Federal Government is not expected to dictate what policy to be followed by industries in order to make partnership a reality it is expected that where it is responsible like the departments mentioned above it would endeavour to apply its policy truly. But unfortunately the Federal Government has failed badly just in these very departments.

In the post offices we believe that where duties were the same the remunerations should be the same. We have African Postmasters whose wages the Minister responsible would not like to compare with their workmates of the other colour.

In the Railways the position is even more revealing in that in this department an African Union has been struggling for the last six years trying to break an industrial colour bar which appears to have the blessing of the Federal Government. (See footnote)

A Pledge to Employees

As I intend to deal in detail about this industry—Rhodesia Railways—may I now introduce its earlier history when at the time a Commission (Railway Commission) in 1947 went into details about the pledges before its purchase.

The then Secretary of State for the Colonies had this to say:—

"It will be the policy of the Commission (that is the Commission of Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia and Bechuanaland Protectorate) to promote the Welfare and advancement of the African employees of the Rhodesia Railways, both by progressively improving their conditions of service, health, housing and feeding, etc. by securing for them opportunities of employment in more responsible work as and when they are qualified to undertake such work. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom has a special responsibility in regard to African labour both in Northern Rhodesia and in the Bechuanaland Protectorate. In measures which it takes for the advancement of African labour the Commission will, of course, be required to take into account the interest of all other employees of the Railways and to consult closely on these questions with representatives of European and also African employees. In this connection the Commission will give facilities and encouragement for any steps which the African employees may take towards the formation of a Trade Union or Unions."

It was as a result of trying to fulfil this requirement that consultations between the Railway Administration and the three Unions (Rhodesia Railway Workers' Union, the Amalgamated Engineering Union and the Railway African Workers' Union) resulted in the appointment of a one man Commission—Mr. Farrar—to investigate and report on:—

(a) what jobs were being reserved to Europeans in the Railways but were done by Africans outside the Railway industry;

(b) to what extent jobs reserved to Europeans in the Railway industry are in fact being done by Africans, etc.

This reporter recommended at least 25 jobs now reserved for Europeans to be open to all and later representatives from the Railway Administration, Rhodesia Railways Workers' Union, Amalgamated Engineering Union and Railway African Workers' Union met and adopted the report in principle on 23rd August, 1956.

For some reason or other nothing was done about putting what was accepted into a reality until in 1957 when the Railway Administration produced a scheme showing a transitional period of sixteen years before an African could reach just the minimum of a European's rate of pay. This was not acceptable to both European Unions and the African Union.

At this stage the three Unions met and drew up their own scheme and submitted same to the Railway Administration for transmission to the Higher Authority. This scheme envisaged a transitional period of only seven years in which the African advanced would reach the minimum European's pay in any Grade.

Although there was constant reminder from the Railway African Workers' Union, the Higher Authority did nothing about this matter till the middle of 1959, when the Minister again came with another scheme which was rejected outright by the two European Unions. At this meeting, for the first time, the African Union learnt that the other two Unions were no longer willing to be a party to the 7 year scheme.

As the African Union was still willing to negotiate with the Railway Administration a Special Joint Industrial Council sat in Bulawayo and devised what is generally known as the "White Paper" which was subject to ratification or rejection by the National Industrial Council and in spite of the Administration's promise to Railway African Workers' Union to take this scheme to National Industrial Council that has not been done, but instead have entered into another agreement between the European Unions based on the rate for the job scheme. After this agreement between the Railway Administration and the Railway African Workers' Union, the Federal Trades Union Congress demanded to see Sir Roy Welensky the Federal Prime Minister and Sir Edgar Whitehead the Southern Rhodesia Prime Minister and meetings took place in Salisbury on the 6th October, 1959.

At both these meetings the Railway African Workers' Union was allowed to send observers and in spite of Sir Roy's suggestion that the two Railway European Unions go to National Industrial Council on the White Paper they chose not only to refuse to do but in fact forced the Higher Authority to accept another scheme based on what we may choose to call European Rate for the Job. This scheme was later taken to National Industrial Council and was accepted with very minor amendments. (The African Council is totally opposed to this scheme).

There is no doubt that a practical demonstration of industrial partnership to the 23,000 Africans employed by the Government controlled undertaking could have made a tremendous impression upon the whole African population. The lead which it would give to industry generally would set a pattern for the whole country and be a very positive step in bridging the yawning gap between European and African economic standards. Despite constant profession that this is Government's intention the African, particularly those who are Railway employees, can be forgiven for lack of confidence when their average wage is still only £6:18:6 per month and the 8,000 European railwaymen have a total income of over seven times that of the 23,000 Africans.

Whilst progress for Africans is slowly coming about in the higher grades in other Government departments, the field is mainly clerical or professional. Here is the Railway undertaking as the largest single industrial employer in the country, Government has failed to gain the African's confidence because of its half-hearted attempts to implement practical partnership and until it is willing to forfeit the support of some section of the European electorate, by a more forthright implementation of its policy then the confidence of the African generally can never be won.

Footnote: Whilst discussions are still going on which may eventually lead to positive African advancement there is no doubt that Government has been prepared to let the matter drift rather than upset European Trade Unions by pursuing an active policy of partnership.

Oral Evidence

S. J. M. MOYO

Mr. Moyo stressed that although he was an official of the Railway African Workers' Union, he was giving this evidence and he had submitted his memorandum entirely in his personal capacity.

He said that one matter he would like to add to his memorandum was that as he understood the position in the Ministry of Health, where qualifications were otherwise the same, African nursing sisters had to undergo a two years' probation service in addition. This was something that was not demanded of the European nursing sisters. He also wanted to mention that he understood that African Postmasters were not on the same salary grade as European Postmasters and generally they were placed in a lower branch. Mr. Moyo also referred to the industrial colour bar on the railways. It was a matter to be dealt with by the Federal Government and unfortunately they tended to let the matter drift. It had been canvassed in the Federal Parliament and the Chairman of the African Affairs Board had been asked to take it up from time to time but they seemed to be getting nowhere.

He mentioned that when his memorandum was drafted negotiations had been referred to the Ministers of Labour of the two Territorial Governments. Subsequently the National Industrial Council had decided to postpone the matter for two months in order to sound members of the Northern Rhodesia Railways Workers Union. In the meantime the Ministers had proposed another scheme which was one based broadly on the rate for the job, and they had made other concrete suggestions, one of which was for some sort of round table conference embracing the Government, the administration and the European and African Unions. The witness said that the Ministers had indicated that if no agreement was reached by 2nd May they would refer the matter to an Industrial Council.

On the question of the rate for the job Mr. Moyo stated that if a true rate was to be applied all the jobs on the Railways would have to be re-rated. At the moment, as far as he could see, it was necessary that some of the jobs should be under-rated and others over-rated. In principle the African was prepared to accept this basis provided the rating was properly done. Fragmentation of jobs had been suggested in the Minister's recent proposal, but he was a bit sceptical of this. Nevertheless he preferred the Minister's proposals to those of the National Industrial Council.

His Union had not given evidence to the Commission because their doing so was opposed by some members of the Executive who were affiliated to political parties who generally opposed any approach to the Monckton Commission. Furthermore, his Union was affiliated to Trade Union Councils in Northern and Southern Rhodesia, and these had voted against the giving of evidence. Added to this was the idea that the Governments had ignored the findings of the Devlin Commission while the Beadle Tribunal was something that had been created to counteract the Devlin findings. This last mentioned circumstance had a very big bearing on the attitude of Africans. Indeed, some of them wondered, if the recommendations of the Monckton Commission were not well received whether another Commission would follow the present one.

On the franchise Mr. Moyo stated that although the Southern Rhodesia franchise had certain bad features it did represent a step forward. His big complaint was against the Federal electoral legislation. For there one found that the European could elect Africans yet the reverse did not apply in respect of the "B" roll. This posed a situation that the African representatives in the Federal House were not in truth such for, having been elected by their European voter, they naturally took the view that they owed their allegiance to him. He thought that the financial qualifications could very well be lowered and enquired why a person who had his primary education and £300 income should not be registered as a voter on the ordinary roll. He thought that if the Federal franchise had something like this it would be a perfectly feasible proposition to eliminate the lower roll altogether. One found the situation was that many voters, particularly African ones, could get on to the "B" roll, but only comparatively few were admitted to the common roll. The "B" roll was essentially discriminatory, and it tended to make the persons on that roll second-class citizens. He would be quite happy if the Federal roll were altered by reducing the educational qualification to Standard VI, i.e. a primary education.

Mr. Moyo said that in his view while a good deal of improvement could be expected from the Federation it was certainly something which must not be broken up unless something better was substituted for it. He considered that it had brought great advantages to Africans in this part of the world for without Federation the Southern Rhodesia Africans would have been gravely disadvantaged and now that it had been achieved the ties with the north must be kept and even tightened. Notwithstanding his sympathy with Africans in the north he thought that they had a rather circumscribed outlook, and had overlooked the wider and more important issues flowing from Federation. He definitely supported the idea of this or some other form of closer association, and he deprecated any suggestion that parts of Northern Rhodesia should be dismembered from the Federation.

He was quite certain that without Federation, Africans' political rights would not have improved nearly as much as they had done. His view was that the Federation should have another five or six years during which the northern Territories should get self-government after which the aim should be to go for dominion status.

He thought that there should be certain changes in the Constitution and cited the following as cases in point. In Southern Rhodesia as far as the Railways were concerned there was a divided authority. The Railways as such were a Federal function while labour was a Territorial function and this resulted in a constant "passing of the buck". He considered that full control of the Railways including labour should go to the Federal Government, as should all education and all agriculture. He went so far as to say he had seen vast improvements since Federation had come into being and went on to say that he saw no evidence of the Territorial Government here refusing to advance matters; their trouble was that their development plans had been seriously curtailed by lack of finance. He did not think that if Federation endured more attention would be paid to the Europeans than to the Africans. Other advantages he had seen were that there were more clinics in the reserves; and if education were removed into the Federal sphere he had no doubt that educational facilities in the rural areas would similarly be improved. He was quite satisfied with the bona fides of the Federal Government. He agreed that his argument was primarily financial, and that if it were pushed to the extreme the tendency would be towards the creation of a unitary state.

On the pass laws Mr. Moyo stated that he sympathised to some extent with the Northern Rhodesia Africans' detestation of Federation which arose partly from the thought that the pass laws in force in Southern Rhodesia would be brought into operation in the northern Territories. He went on to say, however, that the relaxations of these pass laws in Southern Rhodesia recently should not be overlooked, and they certainly represented a considerable advance since the inception of Federation. It was true that an ideal situation had not yet been reached but the position was very much better. It was possible that this improvement was due to influence flowing from the Federal Government and the northern Governments. The pass laws could be relaxed more but there should still be some form of certificate of identity. If one had such a certificate carrying a photograph it would be very much better than the tax receipt used for identification purposes in Nyasaland. But this certificate of identity, should only be called for when necessary and never arbitrarily.

THE SANDWICH CLUB OF BULAWAYO

This memorandum does not express the opinions of a body of experts. It may, with more truth, be said to express a consensus of the considered opinions of a group of citizens represented in this instance by thirty members of the Sandwich Club.

The Sandwich Club

1. The Club has been in existence for eighteen years.
2. Membership is open to all races and is entirely personal. Members represent only themselves.
3. There is no Constitution or subscription. The Club meets at lunchtime every Thursday and members attend as and when they can.
4. The Club comprises men from all walks of life. The average attendance per meeting over the past few years has been approximately 30.
5. The purpose of the Club is to enable members to examine and discuss affairs of local, national and international interests in an endeavour to clarify their own minds on such subjects.
6. Speakers of all races, and of all shades of opinion, have addressed the Club over the years. Members' opinions vary as much as do those of the speakers.

7. The debates of the Club are neither recorded nor reported: all discussions are accepted as confidential.

1953 — the campaign for Federation

Prior to the Referendum of 1953, a detailed and exhaustive study of the proposals was made by the Club. Every publication available was studied and many students of the subject, both for and against, addressed the Club. The proposals were analysed and examined from the standpoints of politics, strategy, economics and social developments.

The Club came to the conclusion that the proposal to form the Federation was sound and should be supported: this, despite the diversity in political outlook amongst members.

To this end, the Club took an active part in the campaign which preceded the Referendum. By means of public debates addresses and participation in Brains Trusts, the Club made it clear that it was in full support of the proposals. Members believe that their work in this field made some small contribution to the results recorded in the Bulawayo area.

1953 to 1959 — the years of testing

During this period, the membership of the Club has grown considerably. Study of all aspects of changes within the Federation has continued. It is noticeable that the great growth in tolerance which has occurred throughout the country has made itself felt within the Club. There can be no doubt that worthwhile achievements have been made in many of the fields envisaged by the architects of Federation. From personal experience and observation, members of the Club know that this is so.

The Club has recently reviewed the opinions expressed by members in 1953, and the standpoint which the Club, as a body, adopted at that time. The conclusion now arrived at is that, though the Federation, so far, is by no means perfect, there is no reason whatever to change the views expressed by the Club in 1953.

The signatories to this Memorandum, therefore, re-affirm that they believe the wellbeing of all the people in the Territories comprising the Federation can be best served by a well-constituted and smooth-working federal form of government.

We realise that seven years is all too short a time to achieve a faultless machine of State along these lines, and to this end, will, later in this Memorandum, venture to suggest a few points which may be of help in improving that machine.

We believe that the experiment being conducted in the Federation is unique, in that the object is a multi-racial State with equal opportunities for all; this is to be achieved in a situation which contains two main races which are, in the mass of each, centuries apart in standards of civilisation, culture and ways of life and thought. And with the further complication that the higher standards are the heritage of the small minority of the combined population. The successful outcome of this great social experiment will be the antithesis of the destructive maxim of "Divide and Rule" and may rather be expressed by a concept of "Integrate and Rule with the consent of the Ruled".

The Problem

We realise that legislation can play only a limited role in achieving the success of the experiment; and may even, in fact, operate adversely against that success. We believe that the major contribution lies in a rapid and large-scale change in the personal attitudes of members of each race towards members of other races, but especially between the two main racial groups of European and African. The great stumbling block is in the attitudes expressed by the ill-informed; and the greater the lack of information and the degree of misinformation, the greater the harm of the attitudes expressed. Without question, this applies to all races, and is a point of great convenience to demagogues.

Urgency

We feel it is vitally important that steps be taken to restore public confidence within the Federation, to put an end to the social, economic and political uncertainty which exists and to restore the good name of the Federation overseas—and to do these things without delay.

Proposals

Having studied much of the information affecting this matter and in an endeavour to be of practical assistance, we suggest that consideration be given to the following points:—

1. Education

We are faced not only with a multi-racial population but also with a multi-tribal one. Europeans know all too little about Africans, and vice versa; equally, many Africans know very little about other Africans due to differences in language and customs.

- (a) A definite policy of "know thy neighbour better" should be undertaken, and we suggest exchanges of students, teachers and leaders in all fields, particularly educational and cultural. This policy could be aided by an introduction in European schools to the early history of the Territories in the Federation, and customs of the inhabitants thereof, with a view to putting in correct perspective the history of this part of Africa.
- (b) Secondary education for Africans should be a responsibility of the Federal Government, and the aim should be to integrate all secondary education as soon as practicable, the ultimate aim being the integration of the whole of the educational system and administration on a non-racial basis.

2. Industrial Development

A definite programme of large-scale industrial development, sponsored and financed by the Government of the United Kingdom in consort with the Government of the Federation, should be undertaken. We do not feel that the social aspect of racial integration can be solved by the mere application of economic measures, but believe that the expenditure necessary to carry out much of the work required in the social field is beyond the present resources of the Federation itself. Economic development is required to increase the wealth of the country for these reasons.

3. Whatever can be done to direct a large portion of such industrial development towards the two northern Territories should be done. It is in the north that the gap between the "Haves" and the "Have-nots" is greatest.
4. African agriculture should be made a responsibility of the Federal Government as soon as possible, with the aim of integrating the whole of the agricultural administration on a non-racial basis.
5. Legislation should prohibit the colour bar in hotels, restaurants and all places of entertainment.
6. The acceptance of a formula which relates a progressive removal of discriminatory legislation to degrees of civilisation.
7. Pass laws should be repealed and replaced by total population registration.
8. The Federal Government should have the power to review Territorial legislation of a nature discriminatory to any racial group, prior to reference to the British Government.
9. Better machinery of propaganda (if necessary, a Ministry) should be created to "sell" Federation both within and outside the country.
10. The earning potential and the productive output of the lower income groups should be increased deliberately and as swiftly as possible. A start should be made with the totally unrealistic statutory wage minima.
11. Government-subsidised (if necessary) multi-racial youth hostels should be set up in places of interest such as Zimbabwe, Wanki Game Reserve, Kariba and the Victoria Falls.

Africa is on the march. The Belgian Congo and Nigeria will achieve full independence this year. Tanganyika will achieve self-government and before long Kenya must do likewise. To Africa north of the Federation freedom has come with frightening speed. It is our earnest hope that evolution in this part of Africa will be orderly and peaceful, to enable all who have made their homes here to live alongside each other in harmony and share the benefits of a multi-racial society. But time is running out fast.

We feel that up to a point far beyond the scope of our present contemplation it is desirable to form states of such size in area and population as to make it possible, within reason, to become self-supporting. We submit that the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland can hope to go a long way towards attaining this idea, whereas its three constituent territories, separately, cannot.

We therefore affirm our faith in a Federation based on the two governing conceptions—the doctrine of equal rights for every civilised man, and the progressive integration of the African in the structure of Western civilisation.

Obviously no group of thinking people will hold unanimous opinions on such a controversial subject as this. The foregoing, therefore, represents the viewpoint of thirty members of the Club.

Bulawayo

Oral Evidence

THE SANDWICH CLUB OF BULAWAYO

Representatives:

E. A. Cordell (employed on the railways)
H. Bayar (a businessman)

C. G. Hodgson (formerly an estate agent, now in a secretarial post)

The Sandwich Club had produced a memorandum.

The Club existed in Bulawayo only, was non-political, and unlike Rotary had no ideals. It was simply a meeting place for the exchange of views. It had no political aims. It was a very loose association with an average attendance of about 30. Africans had attended the Club on occasions, but came rarely because of transport difficulties.

The witnesses had nothing to add to their memorandum. It was merely a reaffirmation of their faith in Federation, of which they were very much in favour, and they were anxious to help to make it work.

In answer to questions, speaking according to their own subjects (and sometimes disagreeing with each other), these witnesses made the following points:—

(1) In their memorandum, under Proposals, point 1: Education: they were keen on the exchange of both students and teachers. They felt that they did not really know who their neighbours were, and that this was a handicap to the working of partnership. Although children of the age of three had no colour consciousness, nevertheless they thought that integration of education would best come at the secondary level because of language difficulties.

(2) Under Proposals, point 4—African Agriculture: it was desirable that this should be made a Federal subject from the economic point of view. They were thinking mainly of Southern Rhodesia. African farmers objected to being dealt with by a separate (Territorial) department. Even though such a change might be opposed in the northern Territories, they would still recommend it having recollection of the initial opposition in Southern Rhodesia to the Land Husbandry Act which had proved beneficial.

(3) Mr. Bayar had visited Nyasaland three weeks ago. He had gained there a very different picture from that painted by the Press and Radio. He felt that there was a basis of co-operation there. He had talked with 30 or 40 people, but in the towns. The majority of people there merely wanted peace and to be able to foster prosperity.

(4) The witnesses thought that liberal thinking had definitely spread in the Federation as a whole in recent years. But it had been held up during the last twelve months because of the emergency. This had caused a hardening, for example, among the rank and file of railwaymen. It was not so much that the trend towards liberalism had gone back, but it had ceased for a time to go forward, and despite this people were realising that they could not go on as they had done in the past. The reaction to recent events in South Africa was on the whole one of thankfulness, bringing the realisation that success now depended on the working out of partnership in Central Africa.

(5) The views of the three witnesses on the Federal franchise differed. Mr. Cordell was not in favour of lowering it, Mr. Bayar held the views of the Central African Party (i.e. in favour of a lowering of the franchise), and Mr. Hodgson was in favour of the principal of "one man, one vote", but thought it impracticable at present.

(6) Under Proposals, point 5: Mr. Bayar was a member of the Bulawayo Theatre Club which had removed the colour bar 2½ years ago—by 89 positive votes with 2 abstentions. This had proved a complete success so far as European feeling was concerned, but no success at all in the sense that Asians and Africans did not in fact support the Club. They were all in favour of legislation in respect of hotels and restaurants, and thought that the trade themselves were likely to ask for it. Similarly, in entertainment and sport they saw no reason why the colour bar should not be removed, and it had been already to some extent in sport, they drew a distinction between the colour bar and the social bar, and pointed out that the latter existed within the races themselves. They were emphatic that legislation was needed to start the removal of discrimination, and they were convinced that such removal would not be abused.

(7) Under Proposals, point 10: All three were agreed that the present minimum wages were much too low. The country was in fact depriving itself of the purchasing power of 9½ million people. To live on 30/- a week was quite impossible. Mr. Bayar had worked out the principal on the basis of the price of a pair of khaki trousers. If the minimum wage of 30/- were to be put up to 57/6d., it would raise the price of those trousers from 10/2d. to 10/11d.; but at the same time it would create a number of entirely new purchasers and would tend to create an internal boom. There was some discussion on this point related to the fact that the raising of the minimum wage almost exactly two years ago from 20/- to 30/- had been the immediate cause of unemployment in Salisbury and Bulawayo. It was therefore agreed that increases in wages should be based on increases in productivity, but the three witnesses still held that they should not start the process from such a totally uneconomic minimum level. They thought that increases in wages might cause unemployment at first, but that the increases in economic activity would soon absorb the unemployed again.

(8) The witnesses said that the Government was not yet teaching any native language in the European schools.

(9) In relation to the colour bar, they agreed that amendment of the Land Husbandry Act would be necessary.

(10) Questioned as to the effect on Europeans of recent events in the north, they thought that they had had a certain influence in the hardening of opinion, but they did not think that similar events in the south would have a similar effect.

(11) On Proposals, point 6—The "formula": they were speaking generally, and had been attempting a formula themselves. They realised that some discriminatory legislation had originally been protective. But as Africans advanced such legislation should be progressively removed, and it seemed wrong to have "blanket" legislation covering all Africans at whatever stage of advancement. The formula to which they looked would therefore be one of the progressive removal of discriminatory laws. For example, the pass laws should be modified. At present about seven different passes were required. It was apparent however that these laws were gently applied by the Police. But there were other discriminations also to be removed. As to the pass laws they thought that the system should be compulsory registration for all, as had been done in the Congo.

(12) On Proposals, point 9: one had to be careful about Ministries of Propaganda. Nevertheless, there was a great degree of ignorance about Federation. The Europeans had done too little to "sell" themselves and their own ideas. More propaganda would help the multi-racial society to exist. They did not believe that only an African could explain matters to Africans. It would be worth the Government's while to create a team of people who were able to write and put things across. But they had observed that the publications of the Institute of African Affairs were more effective than those of the Government. The target of such propaganda should definitely include Europeans as well as Africans.

(13) They thought that the Europeans in Southern Rhodesia were already reconciled to the idea of an African majority in Nyasaland, and also of an enhanced number of African representatives in the Legislature in Northern Rhodesia.

(14) They thought that many thinking people of all races realised that "Balkanisation" was bound to lead to poverty and lower average incomes all round; and the best hope was in Federation with intensive industrialisation.

(15) Mr. Hodgson thought that a parallel might be drawn between British Guiana and Nyasaland.

SIR HENRY LOW

It is interesting to note at the outset that the Matabele, the warlike tribe which entered Southern Rhodesia somewhere about 1838-1840 only preceded the Pioneer Column by a matter of some fifty years. The Matabele had sustained serious reverses in battles with the Voortrekkers and Dingaan's Zulu warriors. The Matabele are an offshoot of the Zulu nation and it is thought by some that the Angoni, another warlike tribe, of Nyasaland were also probably of Zulu descent, but this seems to be wrong. It is more likely that they were of Swazi origin, but both they and the Angonis left Natal about the same time and the Angonis joined up with another column of their own tribe which came into Nyasaland from further north about the same time.

In 1891 the British Government, which had not yet occupied any part of what is now Northern Rhodesia, but merely claimed that that territory fell within its sphere of influence, probably under the Berlin Act of 1885, agreed to allow the British South Africa Company to extend its so described sphere of operations over the territory north of the Zambesi and south of the territory of the sphere of the Congo Free State and the German sphere similarly claimed. This document (see paper Africa No. 2 (1895) presented to the British Parliament February 1895 containing agreement of 1891) also provided that the administration of the British South Africa Company should be subordinate to the British Commissioner for Nyasaland. That provision seems almost farcical, because there was literally no means of communication with either north-western Rhodesia or north-eastern Rhodesia, except by a few bridle paths on the latter's common boundary with Nyasaland. There were certainly no roads, railways, telegraphs or other communications in what is now Northern Rhodesia. Moreover, it should be mentioned that the control by the British Government through the Administrator of Nyasaland, shadowy as it was and is described in the 1891 paper, was not held long as it was later abandoned to the British South Africa Company (see page 264 "Beginning of Nyasaland" by H. A. Hanna). This situation continued until the British South Africa Company surrendered the administration of Northern Rhodesia when Southern Rhodesia secured the right of self-government. Up to that time the development of Northern Rhodesia had been due to the British South Africa Company and the people of Rhodesia, and the development that has since taken place has not been due to Colonial Office Rule, but by the efforts of private enterprise since those days.

We hear a great deal to-day of the sacred duty imposed upon the British Government because the Africans in Northern Rhodesia are under their protection, but, until the British South Africa Company surrendered their right of administration to the British Government and Southern Rhodesia obtained self government, the British Government had not been asked by any of the African tribes to give protection, nor had it annexed Northern Rhodesia at any time.

While I am on this subject, may I refer to a criticism levelled against Rhodesians on the ground that they adopt too much a paternal attitude in their relations with Africans. For those who have knowledge of Africans it is no unusual thing for an African to appeal to a European as his father. In fact, he usually prefaces what he is going to say by announcing that the hearer is his father and must therefore help him. I think his readiness to come to the European for help of any kind strongly suggests his recognition that he owes his advancement to the European. If anyone is paternal, I think our own flesh and blood in the United Kingdom adopt that paternal attitude towards the Rhodesians, apparently claiming that they know more than we do, who have had a lifetime of experience amongst the African people.

Most people outside Africa seem to imagine that the African in the mass is fit to take part in a democracy. Those who have studied the matter believe that it is only through a process of gradualness that the African people begin to understand what democracy means. We, in Southern Rhodesia, inherited the Common Law of the Cape Colony and the Cape Legislation that was then in existence and applicable at the time of the Matabele War. Cecil Rhodes at that time established the claim that there should be equal rights for all civilized men in Southern Rhodesia. This was reflected in the Franchise Laws of the old Cape Colony which, broadly speaking, accepted that the qualifications for a voter to prove that he was a civilized man were as follows:

1. A standard of Literacy.
2. Citizenship of the Colony.
3. A minimum amount of income or a minimum value of property owned by him.

The money or property qualification requirement was meant to ensure that the prospective voter had made good use of his education. At the time of the union of what are now the four provinces of South Africa, special provisions were inserted in the South Africa Act to protect the rights then enjoyed by Bantu and coloured persons. A two-thirds majority was required before any such rights could be taken away, but, alas, they were taken away by using means which were never contemplated by those who framed the Act of Union. Southern Rhodesia has retained the policy advanced by Cecil Rhodes of equal rights for every civilized man.

I am inclined to agree with General Smuts that "the test for any human society in the last resort is—what is its human attitude. Is there kindness, helpfulness, consideration of others, the stretching out of the helping hand to those who cannot help themselves? I know how some people, some thinkers have derided and sneered at the Christian religion because it is a religion which looks at the underdog, the weak ones, the failures; and Nietzsche and others have called it a wealthy religion. Call it by whatever name you like but there is no doubt that the final test of civilization is its attitude to human problems. Social service and the spirit in which it is carried on is a much surer indication of the measure of the civilization we have attained than all the material triumph of science". I know that by and large the Africans are poor, but I have experienced very little help from them towards any outside their family circle or for any cause which deals with real, but to them abstract, problems.

The present wave of African Nationalism, urged on by opinions from outside Africa, has the claim of "one man one vote". As has been said, the African in the mass knows nothing of the working of a democracy. He has been accustomed to the despotism of a king or chief assisted at the ruler's discretion by his sub-chiefs or headmen. It is true that up to the present a considerable number of Africans have become de-tribalised. This is only partly true, as the majority of the Africans who come to work in the white man's industries and other employment leave wives and children in their homes, to which they return for periods of indolence following a period of industry.

It must be remembered, too, that the African lived a communal type of life. Anything owned by the group or possessed by any one, was looked upon as the property of each and every member of that group. That fundamental custom of communal right makes it very difficult for the African to be responsible for financial affairs and even the finance of a football club or the like is not considered secure as a rule unless it is in the hands of a European treasurer. I venture to predict that when our Africans become politicians and statesmen, it will only be by many trials and errors that they will learn how to conduct the financial cares of any government. It must also be borne in mind that even the educated African finds it difficult to forget about the belief in witchcraft which he acquires from birth and from time to time educated men have been under the belief in this if some domestic trouble occurs. The first of such may be ascribed as due to chance, but after a second or third occurrence the person concerned very readily comes to the conclusion that a spell is being put upon him by some adversary who is assisted by the strong medicine of some witchdoctor.

We, in Southern Rhodesia, took a very wise step when at a very early stage in our Responsible Government our statesmen decided to appoint a commission to decide what provision should be made for the future land requirements of the Africans in the Colony. This was no doubt inspired by the knowledge that great trouble had arisen in other countries owing to the fact that most of the Crown Land had been disposed of before the necessity for safeguarding the needs of the African peoples was realised.

We see what is happening in the Gold Coast. It is interesting to note that the great mass of the Africans have no part in the Government and are carried away by the eloquence of the professional politicians, who may not always be worthy of their support. Once a leader comes into power, the temptation to become a dictator will become irresistible. It is interesting to note that the percentage of literacy in Ghana is, I am assured, only about 11½% of the population, so that in effect the people are ruled by that small minority. Today in Southern Rhodesia we claim that we are educating 80% of the children coming on each year, a figure that is unsurpassed in any other part of the continent. Industry has developed in Southern Rhodesia in a manner that has outstripped the other two territories in the Federation and this is due to the enterprise of the European population and the willing assistance of the African people, not only in Southern Rhodesia, but also those who come into Southern Rhodesia from the other two territories in order to earn money which will enable them to enjoy periods of indolence in their own homes.

The Federation has suffered for over a year from the fact that our affairs have become the sport of party politics in the United Kingdom and it is not surprising that feelings of uncertainty have arisen and not only amongst the Africans, but amongst the Europeans as well. In this connection I cannot urge too strongly that the Police Force of the Federation should be made a department of the Federal Government and not of the Territorial Government. As things are now, if the police force of a territory is inadequate almost inevitably at any outbreak of violence and contempt of law and order a military force has to be used for the suppression of violence and interference with law and order. A military force is not intended for such a purpose and the police force requires special training for the handling of mob law and rioting of any kind. I think it was a mistake that police force work had to be done by the military authorities and that the police of one territory was not sufficient to prevent violence and contempt of law.

I strongly recommend that the political advancement of the African should only be conceded as a privilege that is earned by the advancement of the African. If the power of voting is handed over to the Africans in the mass I am convinced that before long states governed in that way will come under the despotism of some dictator and the change to communism will be an easy and rapid affair.

If too much of an advance is conceded today, it will almost seem to be like the rewarding of the African people for preceding acts of violence and contempt of law and order which were shown particularly in the territory of Nyasaland. In saying this I fully recognise that advance is necessary as it is earned and that too slow a pace will be as wrong as too fast a pace.

As far as Nyasaland is concerned, I think it is pathetic to suggest that this country is strong enough to stand by itself from the economic point of view. To-day its very limited economy is preserved by the individual Africans selling their labour to Northern Rhodesia, to Southern Rhodesia, to the mines of the Transvaal and other places and if she were to stand on her own without the assistance of the Federal Revenue her economic plight might well become pitiful.

It is easy to condemn what has been done thus far, but I am quite certain in my own mind that no part of the Colonial Office territory in Africa can produce a record in the advancement of the African in any way comparable with what has been achieved in Southern Rhodesia since it achieved Responsible Government. It is difficult to understand how a government six thousand miles away from the scene of operations can really give attention to any marked degree towards the development of the natural resources of a country or the advancement of the people in it. To-day it almost looks to the average Rhodesian that we are under not only a review of the Constitution, but also we are up for trial for some unknown offence conceived in the minds of politicians in the United Kingdom. One has only to go a few miles south to see the neglected Colonial Office territory of British Bechuanaland to realise that to a very great extent, advancement of the African is left to their own devices or to the kindness of the missionary bodies who are interested in their welfare.

I would urge therefore that any change should not be one of a revolutionary, but evolutionary, kind and that the process of attainment to full stature should be a gradual one and not conceded precipitately, which might well be looked on as having been obtained by violence and contempt of law.

Much has been said about a wind blowing through the continent of Africa. I cannot help thinking that a great deal of the wind comes from our own British people, the people of America, the feelings expressed by the American Negro people and Americans in a wider sense. Americans and Russians speak with contempt of our British Imperialism and Colonialism, so that I often wonder whether the British people are now ashamed of having founded an empire, which has enabled people who might not have been able to protect themselves to advance along a path which would otherwise have been denied to them.

It is curious that this criticism by Russian leaders of British Imperialism and Colonialism should be advanced at a time when the Russian people have penetrated into a greater portion of territory not their own than has been experienced in the past in any similar short period of time to that which has elapsed since the close of the Second World War and have dominated the people belonging to such territory and deprived them of their liberty.

This outside criticism has undoubtedly urged African people to adopt a show of force which may well be disastrous to themselves.

I should perhaps have mentioned that I have no ill-feeling towards our African people. I think of three faithful servants in particular, who have served me faithfully and well for periods of some twenty to thirty years each. I think I could claim to have been the one to suggest the start of the first African Welfare Society in Rhodesia, namely that of the Bulawayo Native Welfare Society as it was called in those days. At that time, some thirty-five years ago, the only body that spoke for the African people was the Missionary Committee of the various churches which met infrequently about once a year. It was thought to overstate the claim of the Africans. Memory was still fresh as to the atrocities of the Matabele Rebellion. This contact with the African through African Welfare Societies grew throughout Southern Rhodesia and to-day there are some eighteen constituent societies. I am a past President of the Federation of those societies and the present Vice President of the Federation of those societies.

It is interesting to record that the first constitution of an African (then Native) Welfare Society provided that the Society should take no part in political questions and that as far as possible the Society should support the Government of the day as far as conscience permitted. This feature is still contained in the Constitution of to-day.

I have also had experience of our African people as Chairman of the Matabeleland Native Labour Board which fixed rates of wages and other emoluments and which settled labour disputes and whenever necessary I have acted as an arbitrator and for years as Chairman of the National Labour Board.

I should add that apart from having supported the setting up of the Federation of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland I have abstained from taking a part in politics. My chief reason for supporting Federation was the fact that it seemed the only way of ensuring for Northern Rhodesia the same right to govern itself in the same way as Southern Rhodesia has done. Supplementary Memorandum

The views I have expressed are my own—I do not, for instance speak for the Rhodesian Institute of African Affairs—the federal body embracing the individual societies.

Professor Jack's Commission, which undertook the economic survey of Nyasaland at the request of the Federal and Nyasaland Governments, demonstrates how little has been done as compared with Southern Rhodesia in training agricultural African demonstrators who teach their fellow Africans good husbandry. I venture to think the bauxite deposits might have been opened up long ago if they had happened to be in Southern Rhodesia.

I don't believe in a policy that will last for all time. I believe in doing the right thing from day to day. I believe the political advancement like any other advancement must first be earned by experience, and privileges come when responsibilities are undertaken.

Those who look too far ahead are afraid what will happen if the Africans attain to a majority of voters on the voters' roll. I don't think an insufferable difficulty would inevitably occur. The Europeans as now might not be counted neither might the Africans, and in any case by that time, as in other countries, the Africans would realise as many do today that they cannot do without the European in politics as in other concerns.

Even if the division is on racial lines, safeguards can be embodied in a constitution to protect the rights of a minority and the franchise. (Quote Czech provisions in favour of German minority.) This might well tame to some extent any tyranny by the majority.

I believe in the middle of the road policy—neither too fast ahead of what the African has earned or what the European would reasonably concede.

There are some things I personally would not object to at the present time, although it might well make the working of the Federal Parliament more trying. I would like to see the African members coming from Southern Rhodesia elected by the African voters on the Common Roll and the European members to represent native interests by the voters on the Common Roll as at present that is European and African. I think this change might result in more Africans who have the qualifications of a voter to apply, as I am convinced that quite a number of Africans have no interest in the matter. I believe that the number of Africans so elected should in time be reduced as time goes on and they manage to elect representatives themselves.

I do not think that in our Territory the representatives should be nominated by any political party or body.

12th April 1960

Oral Evidence

SIR HENRY LOW

Sir Henry Low stated that he was only expressing his own views and that he had no association with any political party. He then read out his main memorandum and followed this by speaking from a supplementary statement which is reproduced above. In doing this he stated emphatically that the report of Professor Jack on the Economy of Nyasaland was the best evidence before the Commission on that subject.

In reply to questions Sir Henry Low made the following points:—

(1) On federalising the Police Force. Even though there was lack of confidence in the northern Territories in the Federal Government, he believed that it would be timely to do this. There was a general contempt of the Federation, aggravated by the Emergency, out of which they had not yet passed. If it were known that there was a single Police Force ready it would be a warning to evil-doers.

(2) On the composition of the Federal Assembly, he thought it would be contentious to give equal representation to the Territories. Taking in particular Nyasaland, it was not economically equal to the other Territories, nor in respect of the number of civilised Africans. He himself was a regular reader of Federal and Territorial Hansards, and he thought that the African representatives behaved in a manner such as to exhaust the patience of the European Members of Parliament and in particular the Speaker, who had frequently to reprove them for senseless interruptions.

(3) On the present Federal franchise he was inclined to think that the income qualification had been placed rather too high, although the previous level of the Southern Rhodesian income qualification had to be taken into account, together with monetary devaluations. Nevertheless he thought the Federal franchise qualifications should be higher than the Territorial franchise, which had been recently reduced. When it came to voting the African was doing something outside his own boundaries. He thought that something in the nature of an aristocracy should be the aim, and believed that the system of government nomination had tended to produce the best people, on the other hand, there was the inclination to call such people just "stooges".

(4) He realised that although there were income advantages for Nyasaland in remaining in the Federation, there were African objections there to political associations. He thought that these objections existed now, but had not been there from the beginning. But he also thought that the Colonial Office officials had not put the case properly to the Nyasaland Africans, indeed that they had not even explained the scheme. He thought that if only the British Government would for once take a strong line (viz. as to keeping Nyasaland in the Federation) it would be best for all. If Nyasaland were given a government of its own, it would prove an easy prey to Communism, because they would have to seek for money. The British people talked much of their trusteeship, but why did they not exercise it? They had done nothing in Nyasaland over a long period, for example they had done little in agricultural development.

(5) He did not think that Africans even today knew what freedom meant. The expression "fight for freedom" meant for them literally picking up weapons and fighting. Development should come to the extent that Africans themselves earned it. He did not think they had yet earned their political development in Nyasaland. Education there had been lacking before the federal purse had been opened to them. The Africans there were like children growing up, who would take their places in the future.

(6) It was put to Sir Henry Low that in Northern Rhodesia the Police Force was associated with the Government, which was in turn associated with the Queen; and that that might prove an objection to federalising the Police. He replied that divided control had occasioned much of the trouble in the Federation. He admitted that the conception of the Queen, a figure six thousand miles away, was a wonderful one, and that the Africans might think that it was better than anything that could be produced locally. But it was the existence of this right of appeal which made the man on the spot always appear to be wrong. It was natural for undeveloped people to cherish this rather false idea of the Queen.

(7) With reference to the last paragraph of his main memorandum, he thought definitely that Northern Rhodesia ought to govern itself in the same way as Southern Rhodesia. But that when the time came, the door should be left open for Nyasaland to be linked with Northern Rhodesia and Southern Rhodesia. It was still premature for Nyasaland to attempt to stand on its own feet. For Nyasaland there should be an halting period. It would be a very momentous decision for Nyasaland if the Commission would recommend its secession. He was sure they would not do it. But he would not like to see Northern Rhodesia delayed in getting to the same stage of self-government as Southern Rhodesia. He agreed that in Northern Rhodesia Europeans would be largely in power at first, but on a common roll with Africans. There was today a bigger population of civilised Europeans in Northern Rhodesia, than there had been in Southern Rhodesia in 1923. He referred to the fact that Southern Rhodesia's record had been unbeaten in the Empire.

(8) He thought that Africans who elected their own Members to the Federal Parliament should do this on the existing (A Roll) franchise. He realised that this would constitute a very small electorate. Even so there was quite a considerable group of Africans with considerable incomes, some paying income tax, but some not. He would not be appalled if the electorate was very small.

(9) Questioned again on his proposals for a Federal Police Force, he agreed that a modification in the form of having an Inspector General at the Federal level over the Territorial Police, would be better than nothing; but training should be on a uniform basis. Police were trained carefully to regard shooting as the very last resort. It was wrong if the Police had to give way to the Military, and created a very difficult position and terrible responsibility for young men, as had been seen in the operations in Nyasaland. If such young men could have been trained as Police, they would have been able to employ other tactics.

(10) He did not believe in the attitude that there could not be a black majority for two thousand years. But on the other hand the Africans were not going to advance immediately. The Africans would suffer immediately if the Europeans were to withdraw, both in the industrial sphere and in other ways. But by the time the African achieved legislative control, he would have learned sense.

(11) The Bill of Rights was a treasured possession in America, and with it, the Africans would learn respect for the Constitution if they themselves had to work it. He objected to the rush to promote Africans unduly quickly.

(12) Nyasaland should be governed as an African State, and if the Imperial Government would not take it on, Southern Rhodesia should do so. He admitted that this might lead the country into the dangers of the South African position, but he hoped not for the same reasons. Southern Rhodesia had kept its tradition from the old liberal Cape Colony. There were two native policies in South Africa, that of the Voortrekkers and that of the Cape Colony. The Voortrekkers had had to fight for their lives; they were a primitive Christian people, to whom the Old Testament was law, and who regarded the Africans as the children of Ham. This clash of opinion existed to the present day. He referred to his own personal experience of the old strong liberal trend towards the coloured man. This tolerant policy had also been followed in Southern Rhodesia. If in the end it led to a black majority, and the Africans did not learn how to use it, then the Europeans must suffer as well as the Africans. In racial relations, people had to do right as they saw it from day to day.

L. A. LEVY

The witness was a Lithuanian by birth. He had lived in Rhodesia since 28th February, 1924, and had started life as a Government Clerk, and had now become Chairman of the Portland Cement Company. He also had large rural interests in ranching, and interests in Nyasaland. He was a Commissioner in the Cold Storage Commission and also in the Nyasaland Government Loan and Development Committee.

Mr. Levy was aware of the terms of reference of the Commission, but thought that the political matters had to be considered from the economic point of view. They had to deal in the Federation with a very fine type of people, particularly the Africans. He knew them well, having been twice nominated to carry out drought relief and famine relief, in the course of which he had dealt with 40,000 African families in all parts of Southern Rhodesia. He was acquainted with many different tribes. He had never had a law suit with an African. His own trend of thought was in the direction of simple legislation, and towards the development of transportation.

He urged the Commission to visit his establishment where 2,000 people were employed and where there was good sanitation and medical attention for the workers.

He claimed to have established several industries in the Federation, particularly ones of benefit to Africans in the sphere of animal husbandry. He had initiated the supply of meat to the United Kingdom in 1928.

He thought that Southern Rhodesia had gained sufficient responsibility to be allowed to administer itself, just as much as any other mature nation. The Southern Rhodesian Government had never exercised powers in an unacceptable manner.

He spoke of his experience in Nyasaland where some years ago he had realised the extreme malnutrition of the African labourers, and their inability in consequence to do a full day's work. He had resolved to remedy this, and flown in meat and better food to the country, and helped to organise the cold storage in Nyasaland. He had also been influenced in this endeavour by the filthy and inhumane conditions which he had found in the abattoirs.

He had realised the existence of many difficulties in Nyasaland. He did not think that rulers 6,000 miles away could fully appreciate them. Reservations in the Constitution were of no value. If people wanted to treat their neighbours aright it was necessary first to look at the economy. It was also necessary to look at the interpretation of partnership. He reckoned that he himself had 9,000 partners, to whom he had given good service and honest accounting. He realised that the Africans had helped him to get to his present position. He had raised Africans on the average from 15/- a month to £40 a month. He had helped them to take over European positions. Perhaps the fact that he came from a persecuted country had helped him to take a sympathetic attitude. He had also been an original investor in the copper mines in Northern Rhodesia.

In reply to questions, Mr. Levy made the following points:—

(1) Referring to the attitude to Federation in the north, 98% of the people did not know anything at all about Federation.

(2) He had travelled extensively in Nyasaland, and his candid opinion was that it was necessary to start there economically and to forget the neglected past. If the people could see a good economical future they would be reassured on the political side.

(3) During the riots in Nyasaland he had controlled his own work people simply by asking them what they wanted. He would not object to going into the middle of a riot in Blantyre with his own workpeople and simply listen to them talk to the other people.

(4) He spoke of the excellent conditions in the Liebegs factory in Southern Rhodesia, adjacent to one of his own businesses.

(5) He spoke of the excellent record of all Southern Rhodesian Governments, especially that of Sir G. Huggins whom he regarded as a genius.

(6) Mr. Levy said that in his view Nyasaland was really a wealthy country: it was like an infant left in its cradle without a layette. He described the variety of its scenery and climate, and depth of its soil, and the potentiality of its Lake. The present position was not the fault of the Africans, but of neglect by the Administration relying on 2½ years' work in the country with six months' leave. This was a disaster. Nyasaland had never really been governed, but had just been managed on a caretaker basis. He considered that there were opportunities for industry, canning, timber, and other things. But it was first necessary to get rid of two monopolies—that in the electricity supply, and that of the Railway. There were also unnecessary restrictions on the purchase of land. The whole difficulty was due to the bad policy of the Imperial Government even to the extent of permitting congested and empty areas side by side. If the same opportunities could be given to Europeans in Nyasaland as had been given in Southern Rhodesia, the same situation as in Southern Rhodesia would be produced.

(7) He considered the reservations in the Southern Rhodesian Constitution as redundant and too old. He spoke of Southern Rhodesia because he was best acquainted with it.

(8) He employed directly or indirectly 2,500 employees. Only 2% of them would qualify for the present franchise. He gave particulars of the wages which he paid in Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland. He considered that he "went with the times". He would agree to the lowering of the franchise, but with reservations: but at any rate there should be a start in doing so.

(9) He definitely considered that control and direction by Government in Nyasaland was seriously lacking.

(10) On the economy of Nyasaland he considered that the best evidence was the Jack Report.

(11) Nyasaland had just been left behind in development, and he considered it to be 50 years behind the times.

(12) Although he paid only £5 per month on the average to his Nyasaland employees he agreed that it would be economically possible to pay more.

G. W. D. KIDD

Mr. Kidd stated that he had come to Southern Rhodesia in 1911 and that he had been here ever since. At any early stage he had recruited labour for the old Rhodesia Native Labour Bureau and had gone to Wankie in 1920 where he had been Compound Manager for thirty years. For the last eight years he had been the Labour Adviser to the Chamber of Mines and he had also been a member of seven or eight Native Labour Boards. His whole career had been bound up with African affairs.

In Mr. Kidd's view the problem of Africa was almost entirely an economic one. He thought that the development of Southern Rhodesia was proceeding along the right lines because it was inducing a sense of responsibility on the part of emergent Africans. These people needed a stake in the country in order to develop their roots, and this was being given to them through the medium of the Land Apportionment and Native Land Husbandry Acts and through the home ownership schemes that were being developed in various townships throughout the country. Hitherto the African's stake had been a communal one; it was essential that it should be individual.

The Africans' demand for leadership and political rights was also basically economic. Indeed, the Malawi Congress Party's own policy statement had strongly emphasised this very point. In his dealings with Africans over many years, but more particularly in recent years he had endeavoured to increase their wages. He thought that this was necessary even before productivity was increased. Later after a certain stage had been reached it would be necessary for this process to be reversed; in other words, it could only be increased productivity that would merit an increased wage. In his view the African wage was far too low to support himself and the increased wage to which he referred would give results only in the productivity of labour. He thought that malnutrition which flowed from these low wages was a very serious factor.

Politically Mr. Kidd was inclined to think that the African was not ready for full participation in politics and indeed there was nothing in the past or in the present to justify his taking over the government of the country. The African was a person who had traditionally opposed any change in land culture and husbandry, and it was obvious that before being given the fullest political rights he must show much greater enlightenment. Certain of these difficulties were being overcome demonstrably by the application of the Land Husbandry Act. He thought that in the short time this legislation had been in operation a tremendous amount had been achieved. Before this Act had been brought into force much of the native areas was in a terrible state. As he had said earlier the aim of the Government was to give the African an essential stake in the country, and this would enable him to participate in politics to a greater degree but the witness was satisfied that at this point of time the African was not ready to take over control. On the other hand, any who were ready should have all the necessary political opportunities. The witness's own basic and deep conviction was that Christianity and democracy were ideals which were not suited to the African.

On the question of land Mr. Kidd said he was doubtful if all the surplus indigenous population could be absorbed in industry. The African population was increasing at the rate of 3 per cent, per annum, which meant it would double itself in twenty-three years. In consequence a tremendous land problem was facing the country. He himself was in favour of intense propaganda among the Africans for planned families. Mr. Kidd went further and said that it would perhaps be necessary to repatriate the non-Southern Rhodesia African; even now non-Federation Africans were being kept out of the urban areas where previously they had come to seek work.

The witness said that in 1953 he personally opposed Federation because he thought that the impact of Colonial Office rule on the new Federation might tend to make the African run before he could walk, and one sensed evidence of this in adjoining countries at this stage. Now, however, on economic grounds at least, he fully supported the concept of Federation, particularly from the point of view of Nyasaland. He considered it would be political suicide for Nyasaland to break away from the Federation because the country could not always rely on external financial assistance.

Mr. Kidd also referred to racial segregation which he said derived primarily from the European in face of the fear of numbers and also on social grounds. As far as the Europeans were concerned there was a general lack of affinity; but the development of the African middle-class was allowing a greater coming together on grounds of common interest. He thought that the University of Rhodesia and Nyasaland was an excellent, albeit limited, example of this.

In regard to the pass laws the witness stated that in urban areas these were in reality falling away because they could neither be administered nor enforced. He much preferred the idea that identity certificates which would be something like a passport should be issued to everyone, although it was not so necessary for a European to have these. Nevertheless as with driving licences, for example, there should be no discrimination. He certainly objected to the complete abolition of any registration or identification certificates, because some sort of control was still necessary as there were so many people who could neither read nor write. He did not think that the tax receipt which he understood was utilised as a means of identification in Nyasaland was sufficient. The carrying of an identity certificate, preferably one bearing a photograph, created no hardship on anyone, and he personally was quite prepared to be obliged to carry such a certificate.

Mr. Kidd invited the attention of members of the Commission to a Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara (C.C.T.A.) publication entitled "The Home Factors of Productivity in Africa". He added that unfortunately the publication did not seem to give the answer!

A. MAZIBISA

Mr. Mazibisa said that he was born near Bulawayo and had come to live in the town in 1928. He was now a general dealer and an urbanised African. Previously he had been a commercial traveller. Mr. Mazibisa said he was satisfied that Federation was something worthwhile, but at the same time he thought it was perhaps unfortunate for the Africans in the north who were in protectorate countries. On the other hand he considered that if the two northern Territories obtained self-government Federation would unquestionably be a most satisfactory form of government for all three Territories.

Mr. Mazibisa said that during the last six or seven years he had seen no great changes, and for example, Africans were still required to carry town and travelling passes. When Federation was brought in many Africans, he said, thought they would be free from this sort of thing, but perhaps this end had not been achieved because Federation had still to be "confirmed". What was rather remarkable, however, was that even the Federal M.P.s did not know whether the restrictions will be removed if and when that stage in the life of the Federation is reached.

The witness complained about the lack of information as to what the Federal Government was doing although generally the people were in the picture as far as the Federal Government's actions were concerned. Many functions of Government had gone Federal, but he and others were at a loss to know why African Affairs and African Education, for example, should have remained Territorial. The witness also objected that when compared with the position of Europeans, Asians and Coloureds, one found that Africans were not being compulsorily trained as soldiers. His people had certainly never refused to go into training; but equally they had never been asked or required to do so. This was not a trivial matter for defence training was something essentially in the interests of the Commonwealth as a whole.

On the question of education Mr. Mazibisa considered that most Africans thought that Native Education should be a Federal function just as European Education was. It was important, however, that the syllabus should not be of lower standard than that applying to European children. This appeared to him to be the practice now, and he asked how could the Africans be the equal of the Europeans if this sort of thing were allowed to continue. He stated that although he was probably not badly educated he would have the greatest difficulty in obtaining a proper appreciation of many of the matters that were discussed in Parliament were he asked to stand as a candidate. How then could the country progress if the same standards were not applied to European and African children in the educational sphere? At the same time Mr. Mazibisa said that he did not want to see multi-racial education introduced.

When asked about partnership the witness stated that there might be a good deal in this if the Commission, for example, got to the bottom of the meaning of the very word partnership. He stated that when in 1953 it was first introduced to the Africans it had meant much to them, but unfortunately up till now they had not seen it brought to fruition. As an analogy Mr. Mazibisa said that he and his people were happy under the rule of Britain because previously the Africans could not voice any sort of criticism when they were ruled by their own King Lobengula. Similarly his own father had owned four slaves. Although these slaves were quite possibly superior in many ways to him, they certainly could not take any action against him, although he was a child, if he offended them. In his view the same position obtained in the country today where you found even small boys of 10 years regarding all Africans as second class citizens. This sort of thing he laid at the door of the Government.

Although it was possibly to the detriment of the northern Territories Mr. Mazibisa stated that he had voted for and had encouraged others to vote for Federation. It was something worthwhile and because of this it should not be scrapped.

Nevertheless he thought there were many improvements that still had to be effected.

The witness criticised the franchise law and said that years ago the Territorial franchise was better than it was today when it was very low. The Territorial qualifications had been raised, and subsequent to Federation the qualifications needed to get on the Federal roll were higher still. The witness stated that he did not think that as many as 50 Africans in Southern Rhodesia were getting £40 a month and that the average wage was no more than £20 a month. He thought that if all adults got the franchise things would begin to sort themselves out with the Europeans starting to recognise the Africans as citizens and counting on their votes. He thought that quite sufficient qualifications were an ability to complete the application form and to have an income of not less than £180 per annum. Candidates for election need not necessarily have any better qualifications, but what was important was that the standard of African education should be raised very quickly.

Finally, on the question of wages Mr. Mazibisa complained that Europeans and Africans with the same qualifications never got the same emoluments. The reason for this was not even necessarily related to the difference of colour; rather the wage differential was related to the assumed standards of living of the white and the black worker.

A. ZWAMBILA

Introducing himself Mr. Zwambila said that he was an ordinary man in the street who had passed his Cambridge Examination, and his occupation was that of a book-keeper. He had been in Bulawayo for the last nine years, and he had no political affiliations.

Mr. Zwambila began his evidence by deprecating the discriminatory practices that were exercised against Africans, and he instanced that at one stage in his career he had been working for an employer at a salary of £22.10.0 a month, yet when he left he was replaced by two European girls who between them drew no less than £85 a month. On another occasion he was employed as a book-keeper to a firm at a salary of £30 a month. He was given an assistant in the shape of a European girl whose salary was no less than £50 a month. To him these examples were abundantly illustrative of the type of discrimination between black and white that was practised in the country.

Another and perhaps even more important illustration was that of the ban on nationalist associations. Certain of the European associations or parties were quite as nationalistic in their outlook as were the avowedly nationalist associations; but what he could not fathom was why such European associations or parties were not frowned upon when those organised by the Africans were. To him the obvious course of action was that both should be stopped. Here he referred to the Beadle Tribunal which as far as he could judge had been set up to justify the Government's actions in prescribing certain parties and detaining nationalists. It would obviously have been of much greater value if the Tribunal's task had been to probe the causes of nationalism.

Mr. Zwambila said he felt that the franchise in Southern Rhodesia should be based primarily on a literacy test, and for this Standard VIII would represent a fair although arbitrary dividing line. With a franchise based as broadly as this members of Parliament or prospective members would be made to realise that they were representing both sections of the community, and not only the European because they would then be dependent on the African vote as well as that of the European.

Mr. Zwambila went on to say that the African people in Nyasaland were afraid of what they termed the Southern Rhodesian racial policies. If these policies could be eliminated, or shown to have been eliminated, the fear he referred to could be avoided, and the witness said he felt that the Nyasaland African would think again before demanding the dismemberment of the Federation. What was important was that practical steps should be taken now to convince the Africans in the north that they had nothing to fear from Southern Rhodesian policies, but these practical steps would entail not only that of removing all signs of discrimination here, but also the getting across to the northern Africans by means of true propaganda the Federal case. He made the point that no real effort had so far been made to put partnership into operation even as between the three Territories, Southern Rhodesia having for all practical purposes taken the lion's share of everything.

On being questioned about the discriminatory practices in Southern Rhodesia Mr. Zwambila said that these were not ending. Indeed, evidence that they were increasing and likely to increase further lay in the fact that 48% of the electorate which was primarily white had voted for the nationalistic Dominion Party in the General Election in 1958. He thought that the chance of Southern Rhodesia abandoning its racial policies was remote but he was aware of relaxations in both the Territorial and Federal spheres. The Governments were perhaps trying to do something about these matters but their actions were not voluntary but rather the result of outside pressures.

On being questioned about the Land Apportionment Act the witness suggested that the European business and commercial areas should be opened up immediately to all races. He thought, however, that it would be unwise to open up the business stands, which were leasehold, in the African areas. As far as the present European residential areas were concerned, these again should be opened up and if this were done, it was obvious that any African taking over a property in such an area would have to be made to retain proper civilized standards. Mr. Zwambila said that he had not thought of the idea of stripping the Federation down to largely economic functions. Were this done the Federation would lose important ties. The country must have time for a change in heart on the part of the European to take place. The African in the community was not recognised as a brother or a friend, and this was the very antithesis of partnership. He thought that the chances against Southern Rhodesia's abandoning its racial policy were rather high.

The Central Africa Party might be able to realise the ambitions of the Africans; but he doubted if it would ever come to power. The witness thought that the policy of the United Federal Party in theory at any rate was not bad, but as far as many Africans were concerned, there would have to be a practical implementation of this policy if the Government Party was to retain support.

M. MKASE

accompanied by Mr. Zulu

Mr. Mkase said that both he and Mr. Zulu lived in Bulawayo. He was a bookkeeper and Mr. Zulu was a clerk.

Their view was that Federation would never work and that any pretensions that it could do so would make the British Government a laughing stock of the world.

The whole future of Southern Rhodesia and the Federation depended on a change of heart taking place among the people who ran the country and whose present tendencies were entirely in line with the Union of South Africa. Before the Union was formed, Africans had not been represented at the Treaty of Vereeniging between Britain and the Boers. Consequently the Union Government did not represent the majority of the people of South Africa.

In 1953 the British Government had imposed Federation for a trial period of seven years, even though Africans were against it. These seven years were now passed, and efforts were being made to keep Federation in being at the wishes of the European minority. The policy of partnership had never been put into operation, nor was it likely to be. It was a beautiful-sounding theory but impracticable because of the different social background between the races. Consequently the present Federation must be broken up; when the independent Governments had been given a chance to think about their future, they might decide to come together voluntarily.

Africans were not satisfied with the Government of Southern Rhodesia, but even if Africans in Southern Rhodesia were lost as a result, it was better that two-thirds of the Africans of the Federation should move out of Federation.

What had happened in the Federation was the result of normal human behaviour. If one person had advantages he wanted to keep them and to take everything for himself. The past seven years should have been long enough to show whether Europeans were willing to give up their advantages. Admittedly partnership involved something of a revolution, but more progress should have been made in the time available.

In the circumstances, Africans should be allowed to form a government since this alone could maintain a government just to all; Europeans could not maintain such a Government. The only way to achieve this within the Federation would be by lowering the franchise. This would bring an African government into power but would never be permitted by the Federal Government.

Memorandum

THE ACTION GROUP

Federation

Should the Federation continue? Yes, in some form or other.

Reasons:

(a) Federations elsewhere have been a success—there is no inherent reason why the same should not apply to Central Africa. So every effort should be made to continue it until experience shows it really cannot work. It should be borne in mind that the formation of an organisation such as a Federation always has teething troubles which may last for a considerable time, e.g. the United States where opposition to the Federation cropped up from time to time for nearly 100 years, ultimately culminating in the Civil War; in Nigeria considerable efforts have been necessary and will be needed to keep the three regions together in a Federal unity, so the present opposition to Federation in some areas after only seven years is not necessarily evidence that the idea is unworkable.

(b) The secession of Nyasaland would almost certainly accentuate demands for the secession of Northern Rhodesia. This would be a disastrous setback for the concept of multiracialism, and would provoke a reaction among the Europeans of Southern Rhodesia, perhaps even to the point of joining the Union of South Africa. Far more reactionary policies could be expected to the detriment of the African population of Southern Rhodesia. It is probable, too, that in Northern Rhodesia there would be an African reaction against European inhabitants of that Territory. It is, therefore, in the interests of all inhabitants of Central Africa that Federation should prove successful.

(c) Unification between small territories is desirable for the sake of economic development, creation of markets, etc. This applies strongly to the Territories of Central Africa as in other parts. All the arguments in favour of Federations elsewhere apply equally well here.

(d) A Federation offers a flexible form of association which opens the way to other areas joining it. A successful Central African Federation could form the nucleus of a yet wider grouping, which would include neighbouring territories such as Bechuanaland, Tanganyika and possibly other East African Territories.

(e) On the assumption that the creation of a multi-racial state is desirable, a Federation offers the best means of achieving this as the division of sovereignty or power between the Central Government and the Territories can in itself be a factor operating against the domination of the one race by the other.

The Factor

The Federation's life of seven years is far too short a period to judge its potentialities, and the possibilities of its ultimate success. The present opposition to it is due to many factors. Every effort should, therefore, be made to deal with these and to give it a further substantial period of trial.

Reasons for Lack of General Acceptance of the Federation

(1) Many Africans, particularly in the Northern Territories, did not want Federation originally as they feared:—

- (a) European domination;
- (b) Delay in their own political advancement.

These fears appear to some to have been realised by the attempts of the Federal Government to interfere with and water down constitutional changes in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, by the prescription of various African National Congresses, and detention of African leaders, and the promulgation of stricter laws than existed before Federation.

(2) Insufficient effort has been made to overcome the foregoing objections, and to win Africans' acceptance, and create a Central African loyalty.

(3) Many Europeans in both Northern Rhodesia and Southern Rhodesia have been opposed to African advancement and, in the opinion of many Africans, Federal structure has been used to oppose it.

(4) The pooling of resources of the various Territories has meant that the richer have contributed to the poorer and so have not had as much money to spend on their own development as they might have had if they had remained alone. This factor was worsened by the copper slump. This applies particularly to Northern Rhodesia.

(5) Many Europeans have not yet adjusted their thinking to the elimination of white privilege that is being brought about by African advancement that is taking place throughout Africa, and by the growing world impatience with racist practices. Nor have they fully come to accept the need for multiracialism or the removal of racial discrimination. They tend to blame Federation for creating this new situation.

(6) Many Europeans, particularly Civil Servants, in the Northern Territories, have personal antipathies to Southern Rhodesia and to the Federation based on several factors.

They have not attempted to hide their attitude and this has not been without its effect on African attitudes.

(7) Central Africa has not been free to work out its problems in se'clusion and without external interference as was given to earlier Federations. Instead, it has been subjected to a wide range of outside influence which has, directly or indirectly, aggravated anti-Federal forces and dissident elements, or has increased the tempo of change, far beyond what it was in other countries and almost beyond the human capacity of those who have to change to make the change.

(8) Many African leaders are opposed to Federation because it thwarts their personal political ambitions.

Advantages of Federation

Federation has already had tangible advantages:

(1) There has been some release of liberalism among Europeans of Southern Rhodesia and elsewhere, this is shown in the present trend of legislation, the removal of discriminatory legislation, and in the advance of Africans in many spheres, particularly economic and political.

(2) Injection of capital. This was particularly noticeable in the years immediately following Federation, until the credit squeeze, the slump in copper and perhaps the 1959 Emergencies.

(3) Active development of the infra-structure of the three Territories, e.g. improvement of roads and communications, and the construction of capital projects such as the Kariba Hydro Electric Scheme, and the creation of the Federal Bank.

(4) There has been some experience in multiracialism, e.g. in the Federal House, improved contacts between the races and in creating awareness of the need for removal of many racial barriers, and of the possibilities of partnership.

Future Policy

If the mistakes of the past can be avoided, the future development of the Federation should be satisfactory. The most important single change needed is a change of attitude among many African and European leaders, for unless people accept Federation and intend to make it work, nothing else will make it succeed. The need is perhaps greatest on the European side, not so much in respect of support of the Federation as in understanding that it can only succeed if Africans also support it and that they cannot be expected to do so unless they can see it is to their advantage. Every effort must be made to ensure that genuine African leadership has a recognised and honourable place in the Federal structure, but extremist minority opinion should not be permitted to dictate decisions. The needed change in attitude presupposes a real acceptance of the concept of partnership and a conscious determined effort to bring the races together and to create a feeling of oneness and of a warmer loyalty to Central Africa. This change can only be made by individuals themselves.

But it might be facilitated by (a) providing better safeguards than exist at present against racial discrimination and domination, so that tensions are reduced; (b) modifying the present constitutional machine so that the consequences of ill-advised action by individuals can be reduced.

With this end in view the following proposals are made:

1. Withholding of full Federal Independence

The British Government should not grant independence to the Federal Government until all its constituent Territories have full internal self government, and their Governments are agreeable Federal independence. This should help reduce present African fears and tensions.

This proposal means that the United Kingdom Government (1) should not withdraw its right of veto—for though unlikely now to be used, this right does create a brake on ill-considered legislation and its presence is a sort of symbol which is probably important to the Northern Territories, (2) should not relinquish its right to be consulted on, and to approve of, any constitutional change.

2. Political Advancement of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland

It should be made clear that a truly independent Federation cannot be achieved until all its constituents are autonomous.

The progressive political evolution of the two Northern Territories should be programmed. In each area the Government should become increasingly representative, i.e. the numbers of elected members should be increased and the number of nominated members reduced. This would lead on to responsible self-government. This means the gradual withdrawal of metropolitan government power over Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland until the same position is reached as in Southern Rhodesia. It is inevitable that Africans will ultimately have complete control of the Nyasaland Government and predominant, if not entire, control of the Northern Rhodesia Government. The Federal Government should be meticulous in not interfering with this development.

3. Decentralisation

One of the principle objects of the Federation is economic, i.e. the creation of the widest possible common market, all facilities for economic expansion, development of industry, etc., etc. At the same time the aspirations of all the Territories to govern themselves in as full and complete a manner as possible are recognised. When the Federation was brought into being, efforts were made to produce as close a union as possible; in other words, to take as much power as possible out of the hands of the Territorial Governments. What many people had in mind was an evolution of this constitution to the point where all functions of Government became vested in the Central Government and a unitary state achieved.

Since the Federation has been in existence, it has become abundantly clear that the unitary system of Government is unsuitable as well as unacceptable to a large proportion of its inhabitants. The process of increasing the powers of the Federal Government at the expense of the Territories must be arrested, and to some extent even reversed. The concept of the concurrent list should be abandoned, and any further transfer to the Federal Government of Territorial powers, except with the Territories' unanimous consent, should be prevented. Those powers which the Federal Government has already assumed from the concurrent list should be allowed to remain except in regard to health. Here, health services, including hospitals and clinics, should revert to Territorial Governments.

At the same time certain functions should be restored to the Territories. The reasons for this course are:—

- (a) That the Territorial Governments would be given more to do and would therefore gain prestige;
- (b) That the more overpowering influence of the Central Government would be reduced;
- (c) That the Southern Rhodesian Government would be given more varied functions than it has at present and would thus be able to avoid its present pre-occupation with African affairs which has had unfortunate political consequences.

Three functions which should be re-allocated to the Territories are Health, as indicated above, Agriculture and Education. Apart from the foregoing, a reason for recommending that agriculture and education should return to the Territories is that these subjects should not be divided on a racial basis, as is required by the present Constitution, and the way should be opened for them to become integrated services.

Special safeguards may be needed in Northern Rhodesia to overcome European fears that their educational and agricultural interests might be neglected or adversely affected if and when, as is probable, Northern Rhodesia has a predominantly African Government. This need should be borne in mind when consideration is given to the protection of the minority interests, such as set out in Section 5 and in a separate paper on the revision of Territorial boundaries.

At the same time, control of certain operations should cease to be vested solely in the Federal Government, e.g. Railways, the Power Board, Agricultural and Dairy Marketing Boards, and should be allocated to Statutory Boards or Commissions whose composition should be determined either jointly by the Federal and Territorial Governments or by the Senate if composed of nominees of Territorial Governments as suggested in Section 5(a).

In order to avoid the expense and confusion that would be created if the defederalisation of the above services were regarded as constituting 'abolition of office', the existing employees of such services should continue to enjoy Federal service conditions, and should be seconded to the Territories for service.

The existing financial formula (Section 80) would have to be revised.

4. Siting of Capitals

The question of having both the Southern Rhodesia and Federal Capital in Salisbury should be reviewed. Their juxtaposition has helped develop the myth that Southern Rhodesia and the Whites are dominating Federal Government. The Federal Government should be removed out of Southern Rhodesia.

5. Safeguarding Minority Rights

Almost every section of the Federal community is afraid that its rights may at some time be ignored or abused by some other section. Hitherto these fears have been mainly expressed by Africans in the Northern Territories vis-a-vis White Rhodesians. Europeans have not been so worried because they have been in the dominant position, but now that this is being challenged some of them too are becoming fearful.

The position is the same with other groups, e.g. Asians in Nyasaland.

The African Affairs Board, in spite of doing some good work, has been ineffective in preventing discriminatory legislation, which is scarcely surprising as it was powerless to enforce its decision. It should be abolished and replaced by something which:

- (a) can enforce its decisions, or bring effective pressure to bear on the legislature;
- (b) will protect any and every minority group;
- (c) is effective in each Territory, as well as in the Federal sphere;
- (d) will not be thwarted by unilateral action of those who happen to have political power.

The following devices working in unison may meet this need:

- (a) Federal Senate;
- (b) Bill of Rights;
- (c) Control over the Federal Government's power to appoint the Federal judiciary.

(a) Federal Senate

The basic purpose of the Senate should be (1) to counter-balance the Federal Government and the Legislative Assembly or Lower House. This means it must not be a creature of the Federal Government or of the same electorate as returns that Government; (2) to act as a brake on discriminatory legislation; (3) to represent Territorial points of view or other points of view that are not represented in the Federal Lower House.

Its functions should, therefore, be:

- (1) To consider all Federal legislation and have the power to veto discriminatory legislation and any change in the constitution;
- (2) to approve the appointment of judges to the Federal Courts;
- (3) to approve the creation of, and appointments to, statutory bodies affecting more than one Territory, e.g. Power Board, Railway Board, Marketing Control Board, Federal Reserve Bank;
- (4) to approve the allocation of loan monies, and the periodic revision of the financial formula for apportionment of funds between the Federal and Territorial Governments.

To achieve this purpose:

- (a) The composition of the Senate must be such that it balances the Lower House—i.e., if there is a European majority in the Lower House, the Senate must have a non-European majority, and vice versa;
- (b) There should be equal representation of the three Territories;
- (c) The number of members should be kept small and entrenched (shortage of manpower and funds).

There are various ways of achieving this object.

One simple one would be for each Territorial Government to nominate two or three members. One or more of them could be members of the Territorial Governments: this arrangement would contribute considerably towards the effective carrying out of the 3rd and 4th functions referred to above. If provision was made for the Cabinet members to have alternates, a degree of flexibility would be introduced which would enhance the value of this arrangement.

A more complex way of creating the Senate would be the following:

- (i) The number of senators shall be 15.
- (ii) Six shall be African, six shall be non-African, and the remaining three shall be African or non-African, according to whether the majority in the Lower House is African or non-African respectively;
- (iii) Of the six non-African, three shall be from Southern Rhodesia, two from Northern Rhodesia and one from Nyasaland. Of the six African, one from Southern Rhodesia, two from Northern Rhodesia and three from Nyasaland. On the remaining three (all being either African or non-African as the case may be) one from each Territory.
- (iv) All senators to be elected on the basis of the respective Territorial Franchise, but non-African Senators would be elected only by African voters and African Senators elected only by non-African voters. (Elections, of course, would have to take place after the Lower House Election, because only then would the composition be known.)

Eligibility for nomination for the Senate would be subject to all existing conditions for nomination to the Federal House, but in addition would require five years continuous residence in the Federation.

(b) Bill of Rights

A Bill of Rights needs no elaboration. Where it forms a constitutional safeguard for minorities in other parts of the Commonwealth it has apparently been found desirable that any amendment to such a Bill be made only by a special majority. In the case of the Federation an amendment of this type might be passed only with the consent of a two thirds majority of all three Territorial Houses and of the Federal House, sitting separately. Even if consent by all Legislative Assemblies were not considered necessary, it would certainly have to be a Constitutional Amendment requiring the approval of the Senate. A Bill of Rights of this kind would safeguard the Civil Rights of all the inhabitants of the Federation, regardless of race, colour or creed.

It is urged that the "Bill of Rights" should not consist of pious resolutions that clutter up so many modern constitutions or are included in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, e.g. "All beings are endowed with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood". "No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation. Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks". "Everyone, without any discrimination, has the right to equal pay for equal work". Such provisions are difficult to enforce and this difficulty may cause them to suffer the same fate as the African Affairs Board with consequent disillusionment and frustration.

A better formula to guard against discrimination is that adopted by the United States which quite briefly and definitely prohibits certain things. For instance, the 14th Amendment of the United States Constitution provides inter alia that "no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privilege or immunities of citizens of the United States"—a provision which has enabled the Courts to check a wide field of discriminatory practices. So, too, many American States have introduced anti-discriminatory legislation of different kinds. Such as the New York law against discrimination in employment (March 12th, 1945), e.g.:-

" . . . It shall be an unlawful employment practice: 1. For an employer, because of the race, creed, colour or national origin of any individual, to refuse to hire or employ or to bar or to discharge from employment such individual or to discriminate against such individual in compensation or in terms, conditions or privileges of employment . . ."

(c) Federal Courts

Confidence and loyalty to the Federation would be fostered almost in proportion to the degree to which the belief can be substantiated that the political, social and economic advance can be secured by constitutional means. This will be encouraged by substituting judicial action for political as much as possible, partly because of the generally high prestige of the judiciary and partly because issues are handled less emotionally and more calmly, rationally and soundly in court than in Parliament.

As questions of racial discrimination are the most explosive in a multi-racial country, a great deal depends upon the impartial and effective application of the non-discrimination provisions of the constitution recommended above. This, in turn, depends upon a strong impartial Judiciary. It is, therefore, essential that the appointment of judges should be as far removed as possible from politics. It should not be left to the unfettered hands of the Federal Government.

In addition to the usual safeguards dealing with tenure, removal from office and salary, an additional way of meeting this requirement would be to subject any appointment to the approval of the Senate as defined in Section (a) above, or of the three Territorial Governments. Either would ensure that the proposed judge would command a wide measure of support and respect.

An effort should be made to appoint some African judges as soon as possible, probably from outside the Federation, in the absence of any suitably senior Federal African candidates. Such judges, as in the case of European judges, should be chosen only from those at the top of their profession.

Appendix I

Franchise:

The franchise has been one of the most disturbing problems in the Federation and the creation of the present Federal franchise has been a major cause of hostility in the Federation. It would be an enormous advantage if this issue were removed from the Federal sphere. This could be done by simply accepting for Federal election the franchise laws applicable to each Territory—Federal members from Northern Rhodesia would be returned on the Northern Rhodesia Franchise, from Southern Rhodesia on the Southern Rhodesia laws, and from Nyasaland on the Nyasaland ones.

This has several advantages, besides removing the acrimony of this issue from the Federal sphere to the Territorial:

- (1) Territorial differences can be retained and reconciled with the need to return Federal representatives;
- (2) Invidious comparisons between Federal and Territorial are avoided;
- (3) Duplication between Territorial and Federal will be avoided.

The lack of uniformity in the Federal field need be no disadvantage, nor need the discrepancies between certain Territories matter very much in the case of individuals moving from one Territory to another.

The allocation of Federal seats should be made not on Territorial population but on financial or economic grounds such as taxable income or volume of production.

It may be suggested that this loss of control of the Federal franchise would be unacceptable to the Federal Parliament. This need not necessarily be so if it is considered that it is not necessarily the qualification level of the franchise which determines the standard of Government, but rather the standard of those elected to Parliament. It is believed that a more rigorous qualification for Parliamentary candidates would be the best possible safeguard that "civilised standards" are maintained.

Under a system such as that proposed above, that the Federal Franchise be based upon the three Territorial Franchises, the Federal House would retain the power to legislate upon the qualifications of candidates in the Federal sphere.

If such a far reaching change cannot be made acceptable to the parties concerned it is still recommended that some attention must be given to broadening the Federal Franchise.

Because of the great importance which African leadership places upon political advancement, there is little doubt that the existing dual roll franchise is regarded as a hindrance, and the feature which it possesses of providing a steady increase in the numbers of those winning the franchise thus producing elected African parliamentarians who will replace the present nominated ones, is held in suspicion. At best they do not believe that it will produce the results they desire within the foreseeable future.

The removal of the African Affairs Board will deprive those specially elected Africans of their special responsibilities and detract to a large extent from their intended usefulness. Although it could be held that the same safeguard would then be provided by the Senate there would be many who would interpret the remaining role of those nominated or elected to the Federal House to serve African interests as mere "stooges" to the predominantly European Federal electorate. The inevitability of electing the Senate on a racial basis should provide the opportunity to discontinue special representation for African interests in the Federal House. Despite the creation of the Senate, African leadership would no doubt translate this discontinuance as an attempt to whittle away their political representation. Whilst this may not be so there is every justification for exchanging this loss of representation in one direction (which they have constantly maintained to be ineffectual) for a greater degree of representation in another manner.

This, it is proposed, could be achieved by a broadening of the Federal franchise on similar lines to Southern Rhodesia.

If specially elected members were withdrawn from the Federal House there would be nothing upon which the "B" Roll Voters could exercise their votes. The loss of the dual Roll could only simplify the franchise although the adherence to a qualitative franchise is considered essential.

The broadening is suggested on the basis of deliberately enfranchising a controlled number of those who would not ordinarily qualify for the "A" Roll.

- (a) as a frank compensation to the African community for the loss of its Special Representatives and
- (b) to bring on the roll those whose age or position, attained in circumstances bearing little relationship to present day conditions, warranted their consideration as responsible voters despite their non-compliance with the franchise qualification in respect of income;

- (c) to retain as voters those already on the "B" Roll at the time of the change, so that no one be disenfranchised.

The same safeguard could exist in Southern Rhodesia, providing for the extraordinary enfranchisement to end when a certain number or proportion of voters had been reached. Some redelimitation might be justified in order to provide an early opportunity for African candidates to be elected, but it is not the intention to create constituencies which are wholly African or European.

Appendix II

Revision of Territorial Boundaries

On the assumption that homogeneity makes for stability, consideration should be given to the question of revising some of the Territorial boundaries to make such Territories more homogeneous from both social and economic points of view. Nyasaland has acquired a certain unity so far as its African population is concerned, and has so small a European population that any revision would be both impracticable and unnecessary. Southern Rhodesia has also acquired some Territorial coherence, but though its European population is comparatively large, its dispersal throughout the country makes any division on a social basis impracticable. The Territory's economic development, including lines of communication also favour its continuance as a unit.

Northern Rhodesia is, however, differently situated. Barotse-land on the West and Bembaland on the East form compact groups from social, economic and political points of view. They are separable from the central line-of-rail area which is more cosmopolitan, contains most of the white population and forms a fairly clearly demarcated economic unit.

The division of Northern Rhodesia into these three regions would have considerable advantages:

- (a) European fear of African domination would be considerably reduced as the disparity in numbers would be lessened with the separation of the East and West areas;
- (b) The Government of the Central area would have a better chance of being really multi-racial whereas that of the East and West areas would naturally be entirely African without any possible hurt to any non-African interests;
- (c) each area would be able to experiment with a franchise and type of Government best suited to its needs;
- (d) if the kind of Senate suggested earlier, composed of representatives of each Territory is accepted, the protection of African interests would be further assured as three of five States would be completely African. This would reduce pressure for undue African representation in the two other Territories and on the Federal Government.

This proposal might lead to some additional expense through the overheads of Government, but this would be a small price to pay for the additional stability it might give.

There might also be some complexity in the allocation of funds, but this would be soluble if this subject comes within the purview of the Senate as suggested earlier.

Oral Evidence

THE ACTION GROUP

Representatives: Mr. P. H. Agar

Mr. A. J. L. Lewis

Mr. Lewis said that the Action Group had been formed about 20 years previously by a number of business and professional men who were interested in the future of their country. Subsequently the Group had joined the United Federal Party, but two years ago they had cut themselves away and become fully independent. Their views were usually of a liberal nature varying from the centre to the left, and their meetings were usually attended by 12 to 20 people.

The Action Group encouraged their members to go into active politics, but the experience of the Group was that when they arrived in Parliament they usually lost touch with the Group.

Mr. Agar said that from the time of the Southern Rhodesia referendum on Federation it was generally believed that Federation would retard African advancement in the Northern Territories. Federation had pleased Europeans but had had the opposite effect on Africans. This had led to extreme courses of action in Northern Rhodesia. In the last few months, Europeans as well as Africans had felt disillusioned. Misunderstandings of terms in current use had led each community to misunderstand its own position and that of the other. He hoped that the Monckton Commission would enable an unambiguous statement to be made on matters such as "partnership", so that no one should be misled in future. It was essential to introduce an atmosphere of realism.

In answer to questions, the witnesses made the following further points:—

- (a) Federation had led to overcentralisation. Many Europeans hoped that it was a step towards a unitary government. It must be made clear that it was no such thing, even though by amalgamation some economy of government would be achieved.
- (b) Much illwill was generated by the failure to implement partnership. The extreme African felt that partnership meant full equality tomorrow; the extreme European intended that it should never mean equality.
- (c) The necessary change of heart could come only from close contact between the races. So long as people were misled about the intentions of the other race, there was no inducement for such contact to be made. It was a normal human reaction to find that things which were believed to be unpalatable were really perfectly tolerable in the light of experience.
- (d) The stage was not set in Southern Rhodesia to allow Africans to play a part in political life, but to achieve this they must be encouraged to register as voters.
- (e) It was essential that the Commission should give an unambiguous interpretation of the phrase "when those inhabitants so desire" in the Preamble to the Constitution. Any grant of immediate self-government to the Federation would violently increase the fears of the Africans.
- (f) It was desirable that Federal elections should be held on the franchises applicable in each of the three Territories. At present Southern Rhodesia was hogging too much of the Federal Government; this applied, for example, in relation to the distribution of seats in the Assembly and the siting of the Federal capital. So far as the latter was concerned, the expenditure of moving to Warren Hills would be almost as great as going to Northern Rhodesia.
- (g) The programme of constitutional advancement in the two Northern Territories should be made clear. Progress should depend on the availability of suitable people to form Governments, but it was reasonable to assume that independence would be achieved earlier in Nyasaland than in Northern Rhodesia.
- (h) Secession would have very unfortunate effects for the Federation as a whole and also for Nyasaland. The present overriding need was for a period of stable government in which capital could be attracted to the Federation.
- (i) It was difficult to insist on parity of representation for Europeans and Africans in the Federal Assembly or in the Federal Cabinet. The first requirement for Cabinet Ministers was high quality. The emphasis should not be on colour, though the number of Africans in the Assembly should be increased without delay. The sooner the Assembly departed from the idea of racial representation, the better.
- (k) It was impossible to abolish the social colour bar by legislation; the background against which it existed could, however, be removed, if the Government made clear that this was their aim. Meanwhile the Government should legislate to eliminate the statutory colour bar wherever it occurred.
- (l) It was desirable to set up a senate to act as a watchdog against discrimination. It was likely that a similar party distribution would exist in the senate as in the upper house, though the racial bias should be in the opposite direction.
- (m) There had been a recent swing of opinion against Federation in Southern Rhodesia due to worries about the trend of events. There were fears of all kinds of possibilities many of which were not likely to be realised, but this led to an atmosphere of nervousness and uncertainty.

Salisbury

Memorandum

REVEREND O. SOMKENCE

For several reasons, it would appear as though the Federal Government Constitution is a complicated one and the 1960 Review Conference will be expected to make some modifications.

For our own and our children's future, Federation should be made to work. For the African people in Southern Rhodesia Federation has brought political and economic benefits.

Among many other things; the position of the three territories which form the Federation. There will always be some difficulties on the working of the Federation, since the three territories are at different stages of constitutional development. A man from Self-Governing Colony of Southern Rhodesia going to the two Protectorates of the North, he finds that there is vast difference from what he is accustomed to, those from the northern Protectorates find the same when they come to Southern Rhodesia. It would help if the Commission Review should get some ways to solve such problems. Cabinet

This bound to create suspicion in the minds of the African people, and will always be unacceptable to the majority of the Africans, that a Cabinet of 10 Ministers who are all Europeans, and that could not be taken as a Cabinet in a multiracial state. If the Cabinet could be increased let us say to 20 and quarter of that should be African Ministers, so that alone shows that the difference is between the territories and such a thing gives people more ground to complain. Furthermore, it is very difficult to start anything from the top instead of starting from the bottom. Before anything was done to try to get Africans into the Territorial Parliament, an opportunity was made into the Federal Parliament which was a step high. For quite a long time before the Federation came into existence in both Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia they had African members in their Legislative Councils, while Southern Rhodesia had none.

In the Federal Assembly: we take the 7 million Africans who are represented by 15 men and yet 300,000 Europeans are represented by 44 men. Under these circumstances, Africans will always view Federation with suspicion. Election of Members of Parliament

It is not clear in the minds of the people as to how these members are chosen, because at present African members are endorsed by the parties which means if the Party is satisfied about that particular candidate he goes to Parliament as long as the Party has endorsed him. When it comes to vote, they are elected by more Europeans than Africans, some cases these members do not have the confidence of the Africans. If such things are reviewed, that would put the Federation in a better footing.

Franchise

The franchise should be broadened and liberal enough so that many Africans get on the voters roll. It is a fact that there are Africans who would qualify for the franchise but do not bother about registering themselves. No trouble has been taken to find out the reason why these people are not interested.

Are the present Africans capable of explaining to non-voters why is it necessary to become a voter. Although I have been a voter since 1928 I cannot be in a position to explain to others the necessity of becoming a voter, because the only time when one knows that he is a voter, is during the time of the election, after that everybody is on the same level.

(1) You might be exempted by a certain act of Parliament from carrying numerous passes.

(2) You might be in possession of an Identity Card.

(3) You might be a voter, but when certain legislations are passed by the House of Assembly to apply to Africans the very Government you took the trouble of putting it into power, it forgets you as soon as it gets into power. If a non-voter says to a voter what advantages do you have which I do not have there is no answer. These might appear to be minor matters, but they have a great effect in the life of the people, because it is where one feels very strongly that discrimination is at its high level.

Qualifications

There are two problems involved (a) academic standard with low income (b) high income with no academic standard. A man with high standard of education cannot be a voter because of his low income. A man with high income who cannot write and read cannot qualify as a voter, because it is stated that he should fill the application forms unassisted. If the Federation is to be of any value to the African people of this country, the Africans are expecting to see that all these complications based on colour should be removed.

Federal and Territorial Governments

This is another puzzling point, because at present all what concerns Africans is in hands of the Territorial Government and therefore one finds himself unable to see what is in the Federal because all what belongs to him is Territorial. Let us take Education. The European Education is Federal, whereas the African Education is Territorial. If the Federation has come to stay, for how long is the country going to keep on having all these divisions. When the Federation came we expected to see some new changes in the whole system, but as long as we still have so many Governments, it appears as though it will take a long time before we could have the changes we expected.

What is the point of having what is known as the African Education from Sub A to Standard II. We might say there is a bit which might call it African: but from Standard III-VI the children are preparing for Secondary work where they will be writing the same examination as the children of the other races. If the Education becomes Federal, there will be more benefits.

It is true that the Territorial Government votes for large sums of money for African Education, but it should be remembered that again large sums of that money is spent on the Administration as the Department of African Education has a big European staff if the African Education becomes Federal, the Africans could point at some thing done by the Federation.

Avenues of Employment

Where things are Territorial, the chances of an African are very narrow, as it is now, there is no African in the offices of the Education Department. Since the Postal Services have become Federal the progress of the Africans is seen there, and for that Branch the Federal Government should be complimented, and more chances are also beginning to come in the Health and Medical Department.

The Differences

The three territories are governed in three different ways: in the northern territories there are African Courts, known as the Native Authority Courts, where as in the South you do not see anything like that, so all these differences bring some problem in the minds of the African people, and due to those differences some people are still at a loss to see as to what the Federation is aiming at, and it is still needed to show that the Federation is to the good of everybody.

To make the Federation for the good of all races racial discrimination should be moved and all men be taken according to the standard of their culture, with no racial bar. The Federation should go very deeply on the questions of racial bar, and yet other people enjoy every privilege even if their standard of living is low, but since their colour happen to be light, everything is made easy for them. As citizens, African people should also be given their share.

Oral Evidence

REVEREND O. SOMKENCE

Mr. Somkence said that he had nothing to add to his written memorandum, but that he would be pleased to answer questions from the members of the Commission.

In reply to questions he made the following points:—

(a) The lack of African representation in the Federal Assembly and more particularly in the Southern Rhodesia Parliament was a matter of concern to all Africans. So far as the Territorial part of it was concerned, it might be acceptable to start with say ten African seats.

(b) At the present time Africans for the Federal Parliament were elected mainly by Europeans. This meant that they did not always have the confidence of Africans.

(c) The present system whereby African members had to be endorsed by the political parties represented discrimination. African members should be free to be nominated in the same way as European member who did not have to have any special endorsement.

(d) With regard to the franchise, any persons who paid income tax should be qualified for the vote even if he could not fill in his form unaided. Property and education should be alternative qualifications and not combined qualifications for the vote.

(e) Education should be unified under the Federal Government. At the present time Europeans were singled out to be given special free education by the Federal Government.

(f) In Southern Rhodesia, matters like education which affect the daily lives of the African people should not be left to the Territorial Government, since the Southern Rhodesia Government was less liberal in its attitude than the Federal Government. For this reason Labour should become a Federal subject. By keeping such matters under the Territorial Governments, African advancement was limited. An example of this was the employment of Africans in the Federal Civil Service, whereas they could not yet be employed in the Southern Rhodesia Civil Service.

W. DALYS

Mr. Dalys said that he was a Canadian citizen, and until 1956 had been serving in the NATO Northern Group. He had no connection with any political party, and had been brought up in the liberal tradition in Canada. His work had taken him to Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland where he had friends among all races.

The attitude of the European in the Federation was widely resented by members of the other races. Partnership, which had been held out as an inducement to Federation, had not been offered on terms of full equality; it was a partnership in which the caucasian tended to remain the senior partner, leaving the African, for the time being at least, as the hewer of wood and drawer of water. Coloured girls were often forced to engage in prostitution; most of them had had children by Europeans who had avoided the obligation to look after them, and they were themselves the result of illicit unions between African women and European men. It was inevitable that women who were only able to earn £2.10s. to £3 a week by legitimate means should to supplement their earnings by prostitution.

The Indian community suffered from similar disabilities. Often they found Portuguese or Italian immigrants of exactly the same shade of colour as themselves being offered jobs at far better wages. In spite of the Indian tradition of army service, Indians were unable to rise to commissioned rank in the Federal armed forces.

In reply to questions, Mr. Dalys made the following further points:—

- (a) He had had experience of labourers working for the same firm in very similar jobs, one of whom was drawing 32s. 6d. a week and the other £39 a week. This difference was almost wholly attributable to the colour of their skins. Although the expenses of the European were somewhat greater, they were in fact very comparable with that of the African or Coloured worker. Such treatment was designed to make Africans feel inferior.
- (b) He himself would not advocate "one man, one vote". Even in the United States, he thought that negroes should have been given longer to achieve full voting rights. There was a tendency for Africans to vote on the opposite side from the white man as a matter of principle.
- (c) Communism had made little impact in the Federation. Africans might be conscious of events in Hungary, Poland or Tibet, but they were more deeply concerned with the conditions in their own towns and on their own buses and railways.
- (d) Africans from the Northern Territories did not want any form of association with Southern Rhodesia, which they tended to equate with the Union of South Africa.
- (e) Africans had no quarrel with the Commonwealth connection, even though they did not want the Federation to go forward to full Dominion status.
- (f) He hoped that the Commission would be able to recommend payment of the rate for the job, and at the same time ensure that a proportion of African labourers were employed in any jobs for which they could qualify themselves. It was significant that when the rate for the job was paid, as to African doctors, Europeans seemed willing to accept them.

Addendum to oral evidence

W. DALYS

Further to my oral evidence given before the aforementioned commission on Tuesday, 12th of April, 1960, I wish you to place before your members of the commission, the attached document of further proposals for their kind consideration. (See Annexure below).

With reference to proposal number six in the above-mentioned document, I would like to point out that this School of Democracy could be run on the same lines of the School of Democracy which was established by the British Government at Wilton Park in Great Britain to instruct and re-educate German prisoners of war before their repatriation to Germany.

From personal experience and observations, this was a great success. The number of prisoners who undertook this course of study are to-day, leaders in public life in Western Germany.

Further, I would like to stress the fact that, in my oral evidence, I mentioned that, those Africans with whom I came into contact through my residence in the three territories of the Federation, I found an overwhelmingly number of them in favour of independence for Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland should the Federation breakup. This should also apply equally to Southern Rhodesia. By granting independence to these three territories of the Federation, there will be no need or valid reason for the British Government to retain any power of veto on legislations enacted in the respective legislative assemblies of the three territories. The Bill of Rights (see proposal number one) will protect the minority as well as the majority groups equally.

Nevertheless, the proposed Bill of Rights will have to be laid down in a definite form because, one has merely to recollect as to what happened to the Entrenched Clauses in the South African Constitution, which were abolished by "packing" the Senate with the Governments special nominees.

Trusting your fullest considerations will be given to the attached proposals as well as the contents of this letter.

Bulawayo
3rd May 1960.

Oral Evidence

DR. E. M. B. WEST

Dr. West said that he was a member of the Rhodesian Institute of African Affairs but that he would be expressing no opinions but his own. He had been a medical officer under the Government of Southern Rhodesia and subsequently for the Rhodesia Railways.

Dr. West drew attention to the following published books and papers:—

- (i) "His Own Oppressor" by B. J. Paver (1959) on the development of the African press.
- (ii) "The Report of the Southern Rhodesia Franchise Commission 1957" lines 96 to 222.
- (iii) Lord Milverton's statement in the House of Lords in July 1955 on the Colonial Territories 1954-55. (Cmd.9489).
- (iv) Lord Milverton's article in "Optima" October 1955.

Dr. West gave a resumé of the history of the Federation since the two British South Africa Company Charters of 1890 and 1893. All development in the Federal area had resulted from British policy and The Queen's jurisdiction had run in Northern Rhodesia since the treaty with Lewanika in 1893 long before the boundaries of the present Territory had been defined. Nevertheless, developments had taken place entirely as a result of the efforts of the local settlers who were beginning to feel that the French were not so wrong when they referred to "Albion perlide". When Colonial Office officials took over from the Charter Company, they tended to regard themselves as tourists with no roots in the country. He did not wish to be derogatory to individuals, but he was very critical of Colonial Office policy. There were limitations on the idea of Government by remote control at a distance of 6,000 miles. The conditions of public servants in Southern Rhodesia were totally different. Individuals in Southern Rhodesia were there for the whole of their lives.

He had the impression that Northern Rhodesia officials had been against any form of association from the start. At the time of the Bledisloe Royal Commission on amalgamation, Northern Rhodesian officials had been opposed to the idea of amalgamation and they had been equally opposed in 1953. Unfortunately, the Federal Constitution was very difficult to understand and this had led to the Federal Government being blamed for many of the things done since 1953 which in many cases were not within their field of responsibility.

The situation was further complicated by two Departments in London—the Commonwealth Relations Office and the Colonial Office—both operating in that part of the world. The whole of the Federation should come under one Department—the Commonwealth Relations Office. This did not imply that H.M.G. should withdraw from control over the two Northern Territories.

The events of 1960 had had a most disturbing effect on the Federation. The Prime Minister's tour, followed by visits from Lord Home and Mr. Macleod, had led to doubts in the minds of all communities.

Aristotle had said that philosophy and politics were not for children. Mr. West appreciated that Africans had to be brought more and more into the political, economic and social life of the country and he supported the principle of government by and for the people. Nevertheless, this did not mean that people who were still equivalent to children should be given full power and control over their own affairs immediately. Universal franchise in the United Kingdom had not initially been applicable to women and the position in the Federation was very similar to that in the United Kingdom in 1910.

Turning to the franchise, Dr. West said that a great deal more information was required about what had already been and what should be done. The spoken word was still the most important means of communication to the Africans. At the present time ignorance about Government measures was abysmal among both Africans and Europeans. Africans needed personal contact to explain what was being done about housing, security, etc.

In reply to questions Dr. West made the following further points:—

(a) In recruiting Civil Servants from the Northern Territories there was no need to limit recruitment to the area of the Federation. But if Civil Servants were recruited from overseas they should make their homes in the country.

(b) The present division of powers led to great confusion. For example, Labour was a Territorial subject but Railways were Federal. Thus there were two unions with a single National Advisory Council dealing with two Territorial Departments both with separate Labour laws. Similar conditions applied to agriculture, education, etc., and in these fields it would be wiser to increase the authority and skill of the Territorial Governments. Justice was Territorial, but Prisons were Federal. The Federal Government had no power to recruit and train police forces: these should perhaps be Federal.

(c) There was a great need for better work to be done by the press and politicians, who should give a lead to the people. Anything new tended to be abhorrent until it was fully understood.

(d) The future of Federation depended on the continued inflow of capital from the United Kingdom and elsewhere. This depended on confidence and confidence could not be achieved without some degree of certainty for the future. People were looking to the Review Conference to provide this.

BULAWAYO

13TH APRIL 1960

THE UNITED FEDERAL PARTY—SOUTHERN RHODESIA DIVISION.

Memorandum

1. Independence in the Federal Sphere

This Memorandum is founded on the following views, namely:—

(a) That there is being established in Central Africa a community comprising Europeans, Asians, Coloureds, Europeans and Africans all of whom belong to Central Africa, are rightly determined to remain there and must be permitted to do so, free from fear.

(b) That it is essential to devise safeguards in the Federal Sphere of Government to ensure that no voting minority will suffer as the result of the enactment of unfair legislation on racial grounds. It is this understandable mutual fear which constitutes the chief bar to the confident and fruitful co-operation of races that all reasonable people wish to see.

(c) That it is necessary, in order to further the interests of the whole of the community of Central Africa, that the Federation be built free from outside interference, particularly with a view to removing the understandable fears in the minds of the African people and of the European people, to which reference is made above.

(d) That it is in the interests of all the people living in Central Africa that Federation shall remain; it must be permitted to go forward and continue the undoubted progress and development so far in its short life achieved; it cannot stand still—it must either go forward or go backward; to go forward it must have independence within its own sphere of government.

(e) That, whether or not the territories move a step further towards full responsible government within the Federation as a result of the 1960 talks, there is every reason why limitations on the sovereignty of the Federal Government within its own Sphere of Government would be removed. The Federation has made remarkable progress under sound and stable government and the limitations on the Federal Government should now be removed to create the conditions in which further progress can take place.

(f) That, in the opinion of this Division, it is not within the terms of reference of the Commission to consider the break up of the Federation. In support of this contention we mention that the Constitution of the Federation clearly does not contemplate that the Federation shall be broken up; furthermore that at the time the Constitution was agreed, the possibility of the Federation being broken up was not contemplated; indeed such action was specifically not intended and in this connection attention is drawn to the remarks of the then Colonial Secretary (Mr. Oliver Lyttleton) in the House of Commons during the debate in that House on the proposed Constitution.

It all comes back to whether there is a right of secession under the present scheme. My advice is that there is not. There is no federation of which I as a layman and my advisers with expert knowledge can think in which there is a right of secession as such There is no right of secession under the scheme; indeed if there were, I think that it would be thoroughly retrograde because for example the Federation would be unable to raise money if it could be broken up by the one sided action of any of the 3 states which comprise it. I think that it is correct to say that in theory the House of Commons could dissolve the Federation but when we have subscribed to a scheme in which the powers of the Federal Government are laid down such an action would be highly improper, so though in theory the right exists it is impracticable in this case”.

Mr. Lyttleton said:

At the last conference we found that the view was widely held that there should be another conference of all 5 Governments and review the working of the Constitution not earlier than the seventh or later than the tenth year from when it comes into force. We have acted accordingly and incorporated these ideas in the scheme. I emphasise that this conference is not to decide whether Federation has succeeded or failed or whether it should be abolished or discontinued. Nothing of the sort; it is a conference to make such alterations in the detailed working of the Constitution as experience of its work has shown to be necessary during this decade, the first decade of its life”.

(g) That it would be unrealistic for this Division of the Party to submit any proposal which is likely to be unacceptable to the electorate of Southern Rhodesia.

(h) That it is the clear and unequivocal intention of the United Federal Party to continue to pursue its policy of partnership and of seeking to remove anomalies and unnecessary discriminations.

2 Record of Achievement

(a) In Southern Rhodesia

As this evidence is being submitted by the Southern Rhodesia Division of the United Federal Party, it is appropriate to draw attention to the progress that has been achieved in Southern Rhodesia on behalf of all its inhabitants but particularly the non-Europeans. It must be borne in mind that this progress has been brought about by a responsible Government of Europeans elected mainly by Europeans who have over a period encouraged the development of the non-European community and, virtually, entirely and alone, have financed such development from their own pockets in one way and another. All this has been achieved without any such restrictive and limiting device as an African Affairs Board. The only limitation upon the Southern Rhodesian Government is the Governor's power to reserve legislation and there is no recorded instance of the United Kingdom Government objecting to Legislation passed by the Southern Rhodesia House.

It is submitted that the progress that has been made in regard to the development of the non-European communities of Southern Rhodesia is substantial when it is remembered that the financial resources available to Southern Rhodesia have been extremely limited. The fact is that there is not now, and there has not been in the past, adequate finance available to undertake all that the Party would like to achieve for the advancement of the African people. To illustrate the point, we draw attention to the fact that in order to provide education for the African people to the same standards as is provided for the European people of the Colony, would cost approximately £20,000,000 per annum which equals the total present annual revenue of the Colony. Likewise, there is available in the Zambesi valley an excellent site for the construction of a dam from which it would be possible to irrigate 400,000 acres of good arable land upon which Africans could be permanently settled. The estimate cost of such a scheme is £80,000,000, which is quite beyond the financial resources of the Colony at the present time.

Turning now to the progress that has been achieved in Southern Rhodesia, at the outset we remark that in 1901 the African population of Southern Rhodesia was rising towards half a million—by 1959 it was estimated to be 2,670,000. This is a noteworthy indication of the benefit of the civilising influences that have been brought to this part of Africa. The cessation of tribal warfare, the relief of famine, the institution of health services and the improved conditions of living of the majority of the African people in the Colony have been mainly responsible for this great increase in the numbers of the indigenous African inhabitants. Set out below is further information relative to certain aspects only, showing the extent to which the interests of the indigenous people have been advanced.

(i) African Education: African education is entirely a Territorial responsibility. It is suggested that the record of the self-governing colony of Southern Rhodesia in this regard is not surpassed by the record of any other state in Africa.

The first Education Ordinance of Southern Rhodesia was enacted in 1897; this provided for financial assistance to Mission Schools subject to the Schools complying with certain conditions. The progressive amount of this assistance together with the increasing number of schools and pupils is shown in the following table:

Year	Government Grant — £	Number of Grant Earning Schools	Number of Pupils
1901	133	3	265
1920	9,467	750	43,094
1940	72,655	1,393	111,686
1950	527,088	2,232	232,689
1953	636,964	2,348	269,958
1956	1,265,565	2,604	360,641
1958	1,657,068	2,746	417,594

It must be borne in mind that up to 20 years ago Africans were not interested in education. The big problem was to induce parents to allow their children to attend school, parents preferring to keep the children at home to help with the household work, herding the cattle or hoeing the lands. It is only since the war that the African has shown any real and substantial interest in education.

The Colony is endeavouring to provide every child with the opportunity of some education as a basis for possible further training. A comparison of the numbers and distribution of the pupils by classes in African schools for the years 1947, 1957 and 1959 is given below:

Class	Year 1947	Year 1957	Year 1959
	Number of Pupils	Number of Pupils	Number of Pupils
Sub “A”	81,821	124,954	114,571

The present position in Southern Rhodesia is that 80% of the African children are getting a basic primary education, and concurrently with this, a small but increasing number are able to progress to secondary, technical and industrial schools.

At the beginning of this year (1960) there opened in Bulawayo an African Technical Teacher Training School to train African teachers in technical subjects so as to provide staff for new African technical schools to be opened up in the future.

The Federation came into being at the end of 1953. Since then the financial vote of the Southern Rhodesia Government for Native Education has increased more than three-fold, the enrolment of pupils nearly doubled and the number of teachers increased by more than a half. The increased tempo of development of African Education in Southern Rhodesia since Federation is the direct result of increased finance being available in consequence of the establishment of Federation. The overall progress for the 30 years 1929 - 1959 is shown in the following table:

Year	Total Sum Voted £	Grants-in-Aid £	Gov. Mission	Schools	Enrolment	Teachers
1939	102,106	70,000	2	1,333	106,755	2,422

We in turn now, because we consider it to be relevant, to make a comparison between Southern Rhodesia and the two other Territories of the Federation, African Education in the latter being the responsibility of the British Government. The following tables show the comparison between Nyasaland and Southern Rhodesia on a percentage basis of African children enrolled at school in relation to the total African population of the two territories.

	Nyasaland			Southern Rhodesia
	A	B		C	D
	Total African Population	No. of African children enrolled at school	B as a percentage of A	Total African population	No. of African children enrolled at school	D as a percentage of C
1953	2,420,000	220,119	9.1%	2,210,000	269,964	12.2%
1954	2,470,000	239,918	9.7%	2,270,000	313,403	13.8%
1955	2,530,000	246,153	9.7%	2,340,000	342,403	14.6%
1956	2,580,000	261,116	10.1%	2,420,000	382,484	15.8%
1957	2,630,000	265,678	10.1%	2,480,000	412,860	16.7%
1958				2,550,000	449,177	17.6%
1959				2,630,000	467,567	17.8%

If Nyasaland had made the progress of Southern Rhodesia in this subject the number of African children enrolled at schools in that territory in 1957 would have been greater by 173,216.

The increase since Federation and the proportion of African children enrolled at school shown as a percentage of the children of schoolgoing age are:

	1953	1958	Est. Percentage
Southern Rhodesia	269,964	449,177	80
Northern Rhodesia	154,000	232,000	60
Nyasaland	220,119	270,882	50
Federation	664,083	952,059	64

The Southern Rhodesian figure of 80% of African children of school age actually at school is greater than that of any other country in Africa, including Ghana.

The percentage increases in the enrolment of African school pupils since Federation is:

Southern Rhodesia	66.5%
Northern Rhodesia	50.6%
Nyasaland	23.1%

(ii) Land: The African has for centuries lived under a tribal subsistence economy and has a deep attachment to the land. There had always been an area of land for each family although not necessarily a permanent site. When lands became worked out and infertile, whole villages or kraals would move. This system could only continue while the population was small and the figure remained more or less constant. One of the difficulties facing authority today is how Africans can be brought to realise that land does not increase in size as may a population.

At the time of arrival of Europeans in 1890 the Africans were grouped in isolated tribal areas but there were vast tracts of uninhabited land. The first step to protect tribal areas was taken in 1895 when certain two Reserves were set aside. In 1902, 21 million acres of land were assigned for native reserves. By 1920 it was estimated that the African population was 762,000 and that the land then available was approximately 132 acres per family. Within two years of becoming a self-governing colony, the government appointed a commission in 1925 to investigate the question of availability of land and this commission recommended that sufficient land for the foreseeable future should be set aside for the sole use of the African indigenous population. Following this recommendation in 1930 the then government introduced the Land Apportionment Act of 1930 and therein the principle of dividing the land between the Africans and Europeans became law. The Land Apportionment Act of 1941 added a further 21,000,000 acres to the area allocated to Africans including Native Purchase Areas.

The Land Apportionment Act was introduced to protect the interests of the African as it was realised at that time that no single African had sufficient money then to purchase land and that if the indigenous African population were not protected, all land in the Colony outside the Native Reserves would soon fall into European hands through purchase. Had the Land Apportionment Acts not been passed there is little doubt that today (in fact many years ago) there would not have been any land available for the African people, it all being in the hands of the Europeans. These Acts were aimed originally to meet the situation in the rural areas. With the passing of the years and the growth and development of the urban areas, they have been amended from time to time to meet these changed conditions. Certain anomalies still remain and it is the intention of the Party to press for their removal. An example is the recent proposal to grant freehold title to Africans in certain urban areas.

(iii) Native Agriculture: Native Agriculture is a territorial matter and the responsibility of the Territorial Government. The nature of the climate in Southern Rhodesia with its long drawn out dry season lasting some seven months, baking sun, high winds, and then heavy tropical rain storms provides all the conditions for erosion of the soil. Any land which is not protected and covered by vegetation is exceedingly liable to be eroded by wind and rain. Where there is a degree of slope this is greatly accentuated. The denuding of forests on hills and slopes speeds the process.

At the time Europeans first entered Southern Rhodesia, African agriculture was still following its immemorial practice of half clearing a patch of land, cutting down or burning the trees, leaving the stumps in the ground, scratching the surface of the land with a hoe, planting and using the area year after year for crops until the fertility of the soil became exhausted. When crops failed the people moved to a new area leaving the old area to be cured by Nature.

The pressure on the land has now become so great that it is not possible for every African living and those yet to be born to have his own piece of land. The fact became apparent to the Government some years ago and resulted in the promulgation of the Native Land Husbandry Act of 1951. Broadly the object of this Statute is to introduce a system of tenure of arable land thus departing from the traditional communal system and enabling real land husbandry to be installed and developed. Attention is drawn to the fact that under the communal system, half the male population at any one time was away from the Native Reserves leaving the wives and children to attend a few cattle and scratch a subsistence from the tribal plot.

In 1947 the Native Reserves and Native areas totalled just over 30,000,000 acres of land. Those Africans who had adopted these methods of farming over a number of years were given certificates as Master Farmers which became highly prized awards. By the end of 1950 there were 1665 Master Farmers and 3,287 plot holders who had increased their yields from an average of 1.5 bags of maize per acre to 7.9 bags per acre (a bag of shelled maize weighs 203 lbs. gross). Today there are 6,500 Master Farmers.

In 1955 the Southern Rhodesia Government decided to speed up the implementation of the Act under a five year plan and the work is now well under way. The amount spent during the years 1956 to 1959 on this is approximately £6,600,000. Of the over 30,000,000 acres comprising the Native Reserves and special Native areas, it is planned to complete the implementation of the Act in respect of 26,019,362 acres by the end of the current year (1960).

When the work is completed and the Act fully implemented the effect on the African rural economy will be profound. It is expected that crop outputs will increase by 50% within five years and that the total cash value of annual African agricultural output will increase from £10,000,000 to £17,400,000 within eight years. The actual cash income from the sale of surplus produce is expected to increase from £3,500,000 to £11,000,000 after eight years.

(iv) African Employment: The estimated total indigenous population of the Colony in 1901 was 467,000. By 1921 this had grown to 778,000 and in the 1956 Census it was estimated at 2,219,997. With the five-fold increase in the population in just over 50 years, a sufficiency of land no longer exists and the way of life of the African is changing. His growing contacts with civilisation together with education are creating in him a greater desire for those things which can only be obtained in a money economy. In addition, the implementing of the Native Land Husbandry Act will greatly extend the money economy throughout the rural areas. It will augment the flow of indigenous Africans to the urban areas which may make the stream of non-indigenous workers an embarrassment. The following table indicates the number of employed Africans in Southern Rhodesia over the last 35 years and indirectly illustrates the progressive development of the Colony:

Africans in Employment
Year	Indigenous	Non-Indigenous	Total
1936	107,581	144,901	252,482
1941	131,404	168,106	299,510
1946	160,932	202,412	363,344

The African will be found in a wide variety of manufacturing industries, e.g. textile and clothing, plastics, agricultural implements, brushwork, metalwork, furniture and radio. He has shown his ability to acquire skill of a specialised nature. In heavy engineering industry he can be seen operating machines, including heavy earth moving machinery. In the motor trade he undertakes all varieties of work except the highly skilled. He drives the heaviest of transport vehicles. Government and Municipalities employ Africans in an expanding range of work—as policemen, postmen, postal clerks and telephone operators and linesmen, microscopists, meteorological observers, teachers and welfare probation officers, agricultural demonstrators and in other spheres. He is being given opportunities to participate more fully in the commercial and industrial life of the country. An apprenticeship Act has been introduced to permit a non-racial apprenticeship and a new non-racial Workmen's Compensation Act has been adopted. The re-organisation of employer/labour relationship on a non-racial basis and the creation of non-racial trade unions have been provided for in the new Industrial Conciliation Act. The response of commercial and industrial firms to evolution of the African in these fields has been substantial and, for example, there are Africans in some Southern Rhodesian engineering firms who are already able to earn the same wage as Europeans. We set out below a comparative table of Africans in employment in the three territories comprising the Federation:

	European Population	African Population	Africans in employment 1956 (latest figures available)	Wages earned by Africans in 1956 £ms.	Wages earned by Africans in 1958 £ms.
S. Rhodesia	207,000	2,550,000	609,953	38.8	49.5
N. Rhodesia	72,000	2,220,000	263,132	24.5	26.4
+ About 210,000 additional Nyasaland Africans are in employment outside Nyasaland.

The foregoing record of achievement in Southern Rhodesia is put forward with all due modesty in the realisation that the progress made has undoubtedly been to the advantage of the community as a whole. The significance of the record of Southern Rhodesia, as has been stated earlier in this Memorandum, is that it has been achieved by a responsible Government elected by a predominantly European electorate without virtually any constitutional limitations such as are presently imposed upon the Federal Government in its sphere of government. It is the sincere belief of this Division of the United Federal Party that given the same opportunity free of restrictions the Federal Government will achieve for the whole of its community a rate of progress in excess of that achieved in Southern Rhodesia by virtue of the fact that the resources—mineral, agricultural, labour, financial—available to that Government are so very much greater than the resources available to the Southern Rhodesian Government.

The Division is also firmly of the view that the Government of the people of the Federation must reside in Central Africa and must be carried out by people who know conditions applicable to the country.

(b) In the Federation

Since Federation

- (i) The Federal Government has shown itself to be responsible and stable.
- (ii) A locally-based public service has been successfully established similar to the locally-based public service of Southern Rhodesia where the nature of that service has contributed so greatly to stability and to progress. There is every reason therefore to anticipate from the Federal public service as now constituted a contribution similar to the contribution made by the public service of Southern Rhodesia which by all standards has been remarkable.
- (iii) The financial stability of the Federation has been demonstrated and a sophisticated money market has been developed to attract and employ long and short-term capital. The creation of this market, in effect a microcosm of the London money market, in the space of a few years is all the more remarkable in that it places the Federation ahead of some older overseas countries in this respect. The financing of the Kariba scheme was made possible by Federation as was much of the major development which has attracted overseas capital.
- (iv) Advances in the constitutional status of the two Northern territories have been made since 1953; these in themselves reflect favourably the progress of the Federation.
- (v) The interests of Africans and other non-Europeans have been safeguarded and advanced not because of the actions of pressure groups of one sort and another but because it has been the policy of the Government to do so.

3. Federation — Future Development

Having regard to this record of achievement both in Southern Rhodesia and in the Federation it is desirable to consider again the reasons for the establishment of the Federation in 1953.

In the report made by the Conference on Federation held in London in January, 1953, the following passage appears:—

“Closer political association between the three Central African Territories is essential if they are to develop their resources to the full and reach their proper stature in the world. Individually, the Territories are vulnerable. Their individual economies are ill-balanced and ill-equipped to withstand the strong economic pressures of a changing world. Of the three Territories only Southern Rhodesia has any significant secondary industries. Northern Rhodesia is very largely dependent on her copper industry, which provides over four-fifths of her exports. Nyasaland, an agricultural community, has to rely too much on a few primary products such as tobacco, tea and cotton and cannot develop herself unaided. The economies of the three Territories are largely complementary; their closer association is essential if they are to achieve the economic and social development of which they are together capable. All this is common knowledge and common ground. How is it to be achieved? It has been suggested that this could be done by consultative machinery; but the hard experience of the last few years, acquired through the working of the Central African Council, has conclusively disproved this. With the greatest goodwill between the Territories it has been found impossible by such methods alone to secure a harmonious and effective programme of economic development of the whole area. No one of these Territories can be expected to subordinate its own interests to those of another Territory for which it has no responsibility and with which it is not politically associated. Competing local demands for labour and scarce materials hamper the wider development of the Central African economy. Enterprises which would serve each and all the Territories cannot be undertaken because common policy cannot be made effective in action.

Development of the largely untapped resources of this potentially wealthy area demands the combined efforts of the three Territories acting together. The right thing must be done in the right place. There are railways to be built; there are rivers to be harnessed; power must be developed to meet the needs of industry; food production must be expanded to meet the ever-growing needs of a steadily increasing population. Such development requires expenditure of capital and material resources on a large scale. Only a well-balanced and co-ordinated economic unit would be able to attract development capital from outside on a scale necessary to realise the full potentialities of all three Territories. All the inhabitants of the three Territories would benefit if an effective central authority could take major economic decisions in the interests of the whole area."

What has become quite clear since Federation to those who had the responsibility of carrying on the Government is the need for extremely vigorous economic development and industrialisation to take care of the rapid increase in population which is occurring. During the first five years of Federation 264,000 additional Africans entered the money economy but more than 400,000 (which is still the great majority of the African people) had to be absorbed into the subsistence economy. The subsistence economy is tolerable only when there is adequate land and the people have not yet started to appreciate modern civilisation; but this is no longer true of Nyasaland where the available land is all taken up with very minor exceptions nor is it true of Southern Rhodesia where pressure on the land is making itself felt. It is quite clear that in the next five years it would be intolerable for over 400,000 people to be added again to the subsistence economy, and therefore there is a clear problem of so speeding up development that at least 600,000 persons within the Federation can be absorbed into the money economy in the next five years with an increasing tempo thereafter. If this is not done the effect would inevitably be a steadily falling standard of life as the subsistence available becomes less adequate, amounting in some cases to definite undernourishment and near starvation. Very much worse would be the case if some of the opponents of Federation had their way and were able to break up the Federation, because then inevitably the tempo of industrial development would be slowed down. Southern Rhodesia as the largest employer of workers from Nyasaland and to a lesser extent from Northern Rhodesia would inevitably be compelled to give the first priority to their own workers and very large numbers of Nyasas and Northern Rhodesians would have to be returned across the Zambesi to search for a place in the subsistence economy of those two territories.

Looking ahead for as short a period as 20 years complete disaster would without doubt fall on the people of Nyasaland, and there would be very little hope of rapid progress for the people of any of the three territories. Southern Rhodesia would be the best placed as half her current labour force comes from outside her borders and by discriminating against those who are not Southern Rhodesians there would be more chance for a steady advance for her own people. But both the northern territories would suffer heavily; Nyasaland much more than Northern Rhodesia.

The material resources of the three territories are certainly complementary. The very valuable copper mines of Northern Rhodesia are the greatest single economic asset of the present time in the Federation, but development in other directions has not been overlooked. Southern Rhodesia has the most diversified economy and is the most advanced industrially. With the increasing purchasing power of the African people there is every reason to hope that further progress will be made at a rapid pace; especially now that the shortage of transport facilities on the Railways has been overcome and an adequate supply of electricity has been guaranteed by the Kariba scheme. The natural resources are so great that, but for racial strife, it is quite clear that marrying with ample supply of African labour (which is anxious to advance and improve itself) and with the further development of the African into skilled workers and owners of businesses, that there is every prospect that a country can be built up comparable with the industrialised nations of Western Europe or North America. This can be done without any requirement lacking other than the ability of the people of the Federation to work together in amity for a common cause.

The United Federal Party have therefore set themselves the task of endeavouring to build up such a society to provide the facilities for training the African to higher levels and admitting him as he reaches the necessary standard to all the advantages that the European has built for himself over the last 70 years in Central Africa.

4. The Limitations on the Sovereignty of the Federal Government.

The constitutional status of the Federation is lagging behind the economic and material advances it has made under sound and stable Government. The grant of further constitutional advance for the Federation will increase confidence and create the ability to make even greater progress. The limitations on the sovereignty of the Federal Government will be well known to the Commission and it is therefore not proposed to tabulate them here. It is the submission of this Division of the Party that all those restrictions should be removed in the interests of the whole of the people of the Federation.

It is fully appreciated that some other form of safeguard to those safeguards presently existing and in the hands of people outside the Federation, namely the British Government, must be devised. The limitations which at present exist are aimed to safeguard in effect the African people of the Federation and there are various provisions listed in the Constitution as to how these safeguards shall be implemented. As has been stated earlier in this Memorandum the safeguards that must now be devised are such as will give confidence to all sections of the community for the future and must be safeguards not directed to the interests of one section only. They must therefore be limitations which are exercised and implemented by controls operated in the Federation and they must be such as will operate fairly and reasonably for all sections of the community.

The safeguards now to be designed must be such that they do not derogate from the sovereignty of the Federal Government but nevertheless ensure that they are genuine and real safeguards. Furthermore they must also be firmly entrenched and if possible free from party political pressure. In the eyes of all the inhabitants of the Federation and particularly in the eyes of the less advanced inhabitants, the safeguards must be seen to be effective and to this end they must not fail simply because they are not capable of operation in a country which has relatively few people of the calibre which any such safeguards will require.

5 Proposed Constitutional Safeguards to be substituted for Present restrictions.

We have considered in great detail the problem of alternative constitutional safeguards to be established and there appear to us to be various constitutional ways of achieving what is required including a Bill of Rights, a Council of State and a Senate or Second Chamber as is contemplated in Article 97(5) of the present Constitution.

The establishment of a Senate appears to us to be the most satisfactory of these methods. But there are a number of alternative forms of Senate or Second Chamber. For this reason we feel it preferable to state the considerations we regard as important without attempting to give precise shape to the Senate.

- (a) It is essential that the body should be an elected one. We believe there might be advantage in using an electoral college (or colleges) rather than the ordinary voters roll.
- (b) The Senate should comprise representatives of all races in the Federation but the number of non-Europeans should not exceed that of Europeans. We believe that the Senate should be frankly racial in concept as the concentration of racial representation in the safeguarding body allows for the rest of the legislature desirably to be non-racial.
- (c) Each Territory should return an equal number of senators.
- (d) Members of the Senate should have high qualifications; we suggest the qualifications for membership of the Federal Assembly; in addition a Senator shall be 35 years of age or more and have resided in the Federation for a continuous period of not less than 5 years preceding nomination.
- (e) Elections for the Senate should take place simultaneously with General Elections for the Federal Assembly.
- (f) The number of Senators should be laid down in the Constitution and not easily capable of change. The numbers returned by each Territory and the ratio of Europeans to non-Europeans should likewise be written into the Constitution and those provisions made even more difficult to change.
- (g) The Senate should be a reviewing Chamber for all legislation, other than money bills.
- (h) In respect of non-discriminatory measures it should have the power to refer back for amendment and if need be to delay such legislation.
- (i) In respect of discriminatory measures it should have the further power to hold back legislation until the next General Election, so as to give the electorate the opportunity of expressing its wishes.
- (j) Subsidiary legislation of a discriminatory nature also should be reviewed by the Senate.
- (k) Determination whether discriminatory or not should be carried out by a Select Committee composed of equal numbers of the two Houses, and of an equal number of Europeans and non-Europeans.

(l) A special majority of the Senate might be necessary to approve any change to the Constitution.

(m) The number of Senators should be kept low say 18 or 24.

6 The Federal Franchise

We uphold the present franchise system and in particular the present qualitative principle which underlies it. We reject adult suffrage or "one man, one vote" as being inimical to the creation of a stable multi-racial democracy in the Federation however appropriate it may seem in other African territories which are homogeneous.

We believe it important to restate the arguments in favour of a qualitative franchise to demonstrate its essential application to the needs of the Federation.

Great play is made of some of the modern shibboleths—terms such as democracy, self-determination and adult suffrage. These are often discussed in the abstract and justified as eternal and immutable truths. Once accepted as inviolable principles, they are then deemed to be not merely desirable but essential in themselves without any regard for the circumstances in which they are to operate or the purpose which they are designed to attain. The truth is, of course, that these are not ends in themselves—they are means; means towards ensuring just, incorruptible, responsible government so that those who are governed are governed fairly. The theory is that nothing could be fairer than all of the governed having a say in the choice of government, but that theory rests upon the assumption that the voters would have the capacity to weigh up the relative merits not merely of candidates but also of political policies and, having formed a conclusion by rational process, to exercise the vote with reason, judgment and public spirit in the best interest of themselves and the community as a whole, including future generations.

In a homogeneous Society it is easy to see that the franchise should not pass to certain people unable to exercise their votes in the manner indicated—young persons below whatever is deemed to be a suitable age of discernment, the mentally retarded, certain criminals and so on. Such people are excluded solely because of their lack of capacity to exercise the vote with reason, judgment and public spirit. Here in the Federation, even the most ardent advocate of adult suffrage would boggle at a proposal that all African women should be entitled to vote, because of their especially backward state. It becomes clear then that universal adult suffrage is not an immutable principle: the vote is not a right which may be claimed indiscriminately, but a skill available to those who are capable of using with care what could otherwise be a dangerous instrument.

To argue by analogy that, because adult suffrage has been introduced or is about to be introduced to certain other states in Africa, it could and should be introduced in the Federation is dangerous, for the circumstances are quite different. Those other states are more homogeneous in their population. In those states there are virtually no Europeans with any roots in or any real attachment to the country. It is not their home. But here in the Federation we have a fairly large body of Europeans who are not here on a tour of duty as part of their careers but who are born here, who live and work here, who, having no other, regard it as home. They have built up the existing standards of Western civilisation, and they and their standards would be imperilled if government were not retained in civilised and responsible hands. No one can yet say with certainty that the granting of full adult franchise in other parts of Africa (and even in some parts of Asia) has been successful. Those experiments may succeed, of course, but so far the signs have almost invariably pointed away from democracy, towards oligarchy.

Universal adult suffrage has succeeded in the United Kingdom because it was achieved after some centuries of political evolution during which democratic ideals were assimilated. Here the indigenous people have no such background. In Northern Rhodesia they were denied the vote because they were British Protected Persons instead of British Subjects, whilst in Nyasaland there had been no elections at all until Federation. To endanger the structure which is being built in the Federation towards democracy by departing from the present qualitative franchise, or by lowering the qualifications, would be the gravest folly.

One of the chief purposes of Government in the Federation is to maintain the standards of Western Civilisation. There should be no question of lowering any standards to a mean level nor would it be in the interests of any section of the population to do so. Without doubt the best path for all races including the Africans is a continual upward progression until full democratic institutions are enjoyed in harmony by a single community which would consist only incidentally of persons of different races and colour.

For these reasons the franchise in the Federation is on a qualitative basis, the qualifications being designed to ensure that those who vote whatever their race are likely to be able to do so with responsibility. This should lead to Party divisions according to political and economic policies and not according to race. Universal suffrage or a significant lowering of franchise qualifications would lead speedily and inevitably to a form of despotism; the present franchise system will lead more slowly but more certainly to democracy.

7. Redistribution of Functions

We have not concerned ourselves with the possibility of functions being redistributed as between the Federal and Territorial governments as any proposals are dependent upon the constitutional changes which may arise from the 1960 talks. We trust that we shall have the opportunity in due course to put forward our views in this respect but, in relation to the present case, we submit that any basic change in the distribution of functions or any different approach to the question of functions could so alter the conditions upon which Southern Rhodesia, by referendum, agreed to Federation that a further referendum would be required.

8. Conclusion

The people of this country have been led to believe that a substantial constitutional advance can be expected in 1960.

The underlying reasons for the federation of the three territories were mainly of an economic and material nature. That these reasons were valid has been proved by the progress achieved since Federation. But economic development cannot flourish in an atmosphere of uncertainty and the Federation cannot afford a further twilight period before it attains independence. We have committed ourselves to Federation and believe that for all the inhabitants of the Federation it has proved to be the right course. The further development of our multi-racial community requires that the promises of constitutional advance upon which Federation was accepted, should now be fulfilled.

The considerations which pertained in 1953 and which resulted in the establishment of the Federation still apply, and more strongly now than before. It has generally been believed that the Federation was set up in 1953 as a permanent institution. On this clear and distinct understanding investors both within and without the Federation, have invested substantial sums of money; at this stage to disregard those sincere and fully justified beliefs will in our view be a betrayal of the trust placed in the Federation.

There is one further point which this Division of the United Federal Party considers must be strongly emphasised. Whatever decision is to be made in regard to the review of the Federal Constitution must be final.

There is at the present time a lack of confidence in the future of the Federation; people in the country are uneasy and restless and are wondering what their futures here are; numbers are considering whether to give up their homes and their interests here and move to other parts of the Commonwealth. Investors from outside the Federation are withholding their decisions to invest their capital in the immense potential of the Federation. It is vital in our view in the interests of all the people of the Country that the maximum amount of capital should be invested here backed by the knowledge, skill, experience, ability and energy of great numbers of Europeans. It is the European and his capital which, with the labour provided by the indigenous people, has developed Southern Rhodesia and enabled the people in Southern Rhodesia to progress and improve the standard of living and the conditions of the indigenous People. In our view this same approach can and will develop the whole of the Federation to the great benefit of all the people living there.

As the result of uncertainty confidence is lacking both within and outside the Country. Never again must the Federation be subjected to the stresses and strains presently being experienced; whatever decision is taken as to the future of the Federation and of the three territories comprising it, must be final.

As you know, we represent the Southern Rhodesia Division of the United Federal Party and our purpose is to support the case for independence in the Federal sphere that has been submitted by the Federal Standing Committee of the Party.

The United Federal Party is a liberal and progressive party: it is the majority party in the four legislative assemblies in the Federation, and we believe that shows the electorate here to be also liberal and progressive. The preamble to the Constitution contains three objectives: first to conduce to the security and advancement of all the inhabitants. Secondly, to foster partnership and co-operation: and thirdly to achieve a state in which the Federation could go forward as a full member of the Commonwealth. They all find place in the principles and policies of the Party, although we believe by far the most important is that relating to partnership and co-operation. The most obvious fact concerning Central Africa is that it is a multi-racial state; and our purpose must be to achieve a condition in which all can live here in harmony and with human dignity.

We believe the purpose of government is to achieve a good life, for all and not just for some. We utterly reject the extreme views of apartheid and white domination, and equally the extremist African nationalist views, which might lead to black domination. Because of that we must reject any suggestion of dividing the Federation into areas of domination, either white or black; and though our method of achieving a state in which all can live together in amity is perhaps a little slower than some others, it is undoubtedly the soundest.

Because of the differences in the cultural levels and traditional backgrounds of the nations, we must admit in frankness that full partnership has not yet been achieved, but we regard it as something which is capable of progressive attainment the whole time. We believe the country is advancing along that path. When one looks back, one sees that quite rapid progress has been achieved in quite a short time. We believe that speed will mount as progress continues. It would be tragic if the tempo was made too rapid; it would outstrip not only European opinion but perhaps African capacity, and that would be a grave setback, in our view, to the whole people of the country. It would be equally tragic if progress was too slow. We believe it is fundamental to life here that we should achieve a proper multi-racial state at the earliest possible time. In fact, the object is not really to achieve a multi-racial state so much as a non-racial state.

In doing this we believe that high standards must be maintained and that it would not be in the true interests of any of the races if, by speeding up the progress too much, standards were lowered. It is best to build upwards rather than come down to a mean—for all people, including the African people. This is demonstrated in our attitude towards the franchise. We have a system of qualitative franchise. It is our conviction that the maintenance of fairly high standards in the franchise is a thorough safeguard for all inhabitants in their progress towards a civilised and responsible state.

The biggest barrier we face is the constitutional reservations and the Colonial Office influence, which exists particularly in the northern Territories. It is one of the unhappy features of this country that there has been—originally perhaps not deliberately—an enticement to the indigenous people to look to governments and even to political parties outside our boundaries for protection. That is the word commonly used, and it connotes protection against something, some eventuality or some persons; and that has a gravely deleterious effect on local government and on the attitude of the indigenous people towards it. It is an invitation not to recognise or trust local governments and local inhabitants.

We believe that militates greatly against the success of government, against our ideal of partnership, and in fact against the success of the Federation as a whole. It is a cause of division amongst us and one of the main reasons why we believe it is necessary to achieve a greater constitutional independence in the Federation.

We hold the view, in contrast, that our record here demonstrates amply that there is capacity for government here, in the best of parliamentary traditions—good government in the interests of all, and government that will lead to peace and harmony and to the progress which we so desperately need in an undeveloped country.

The terms of reference of the Commission speak of considering a constitutional programme and framework best suited to promote those objects in the Constitution including the preamble. Perhaps a word here about the framework and programme might be appropriate. Although we of the Southern Rhodesian Division have studiously refrained from interference in the position of the northern Territories, they are part of the framework, and I will touch briefly on that, if I may.

We see the immediate constitutional future in this fashion:

there should be in Northern Rhodesia a major step forward towards responsible self-government along the lines of the 1923 constitutional position in Southern Rhodesia. In Nyasaland there is also the necessity to make a major step forward; but there is there a very much greater difficulty because there are all too few people from whom to draw the necessary political leaders and administrators. So we see there a somewhat unique type of constitution which would permit of an elected assembly, also on a fairly high franchise qualification, but of such a fashion that the elected assembly would almost undoubtedly have an African majority; and correctly so. In our submission there would be an executive body, nominated, consisting partly of officials, partly of African members and partly of non-African members: it would be the executive council which would introduce legislation to be debated by the assembly. We think something on those lines would permit a constitutional step forward to be taken by Nyasaland.

As regards Southern Rhodesia, the Southern Rhodesia Prime Minister is going to the United Kingdom in the next few days to discuss the constitutional position of Southern Rhodesia; but in any case it is already a largely self-governing Territory, and if the three Territories were to achieve in the near future something on the lines we indicate, we believe the Federal state could go forward to independence within the Federal sphere. That falls short of full membership of the Commonwealth, but it would be a major step forward. We believe it is necessary that step should take place now and there must be safeguards. There can be no surrender of Colonial Office or United Kingdom powers other than to some recognised and worthwhile form of safeguard here. They would vary with each Territory. We in Southern Rhodesia like the idea of a Senate.

In the Federal sphere, three proposals have been put forward: a Senate or Constitutional Council or a Bill of Rights. We think this step should be achieved almost immediately—early in 1961, we hope—and that within a very few years there may be such further constitutional advances in the northern Territories that it would enable the Federation to achieve the status of full membership of the Commonwealth. It is essential these things be achieved now.

It is not merely that as far as Southern Rhodesia is concerned there is a long and, we think, noble history of self-government; it is not merely that the removal of restrictions has been long accepted and there would be frustration if that were not achieved; it is not merely that the people here would be bitterly disappointed to see self-government granted to other territories in Africa deemed here to be less worthy of self-determination and yet that state being withheld from us here. It is not even that these things militate against our material progress. Material progress is important if we are to have a happy and contented population—there must be income and employment for all—but it is even more important than that. Unless the forward step is taken soon we cannot see the possibility of a great improvement in race relations.

That is the main reason. We believe with the utmost earnestness that a true state of racial harmony here means partnership and progressive advancement of all races, but that cannot be achieved as long as there is the enticement to people to look elsewhere for some functions of government or some form of protection.

We think it is important that once this period is over there should not be set down another date for a further review. Obviously there will have to be further reviews, as we achieve continual constitutional progress, but to set down a specific review or a date is unsettling because countries like ours need capital and development, and there is a natural reluctance on the part of investors, who have perhaps the whole world at their disposal, to make investments in a country in which the constitutional future is uncertain. The African population is growing at an enormous rate. We must be able to plan for their future now.

Also where there is a period of review set down, that is preceded by a period of political uncertainty. It is the ideal climate for those who are disgruntled or ambitious, or for any other reason, valid or otherwise, to start up clamour and agitation. So prior to any review, as now prior to the 1960 Review, we have great uncertainty in human affairs, great political machinations, great shouting and clamour: so we plead that after this we might enter a settled period, if at all possible.

We have spoken of constitutional positions, and put in memoranda, but we would like to say one final thing—that although these safeguards are necessary, and indeed we welcome them, in the ultimate analysis the operation of any constitution depends on the character of the people involved. The British constitution is something that is so amorphous that if it were not for the character of the people involved it could hardly exist, and could not be transplanted to some different background. Here, what will be important in the end will be not only the type of constitution but the character of the people.

In all sincerity, we believe there is a record in this country to show that there is a character here—and not merely character but the will and the desire and intention—to make this a happy country for all concerned. We submit there is the character and the potential here to achieve that.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: You say your second objective is the most essential, that is fostering partnership and co-operation and you wish to follow the democratic traditions of parliamentary government. I am sure you will agree that is essentially dependent on popular support: that must be the basis of the system. Therefore it follows that the ideals and benefits of Federation must be got across to the people and they must feel confidence in them. That involves a psychological factor to a very great degree. It is not enough to speak of the economic benefits: you must also be able to feel that the people have confidence in the political aspect. Would it be unfair to say that, so far as your party is concerned, so far it has not really done anything effective to achieve the psychological climate that is required, and that there is nothing in your memorandum which deals with that, so that it may be said you have adopted an attitude of complacency towards that subject? — A. I had hoped that my introductory remarks would have shown that we are very much alive to that. Race relations are the most important of our objectives, and I think it is correct to say that the fuller memorandum submitted by our Federal Standing Committee deals extensively with this very point. It is not correct to say the Party has not made strides to achieve acceptance of the Federal ideal or acceptance of partnership. We face a difficulty in that the main objection to these ideals lies in the northern Territories. The reason for that difference between Southern Rhodesia and the northern Territories is the very thing I touched upon—in Southern Rhodesia there has been responsible government for many years, and it is looked upon with respect as the Government of the country. Respect has been gained because it has a good record of achievement and because it is held in that regard there has been no tendency on the part of people in Southern Rhodesia to be enticed to look to governments outside our borders. But the people in the north have been subjected to that pressure, and as long as they are virtually told—though not in these words—“You need an external government to act as your protectors” it naturally causes people to think they must be protected against the local government and local inhabitants. I do not wish to go into political controversy; but one could say that view has been voiced by some of the political people in Britain in both parties, and it is very difficult for us to combat. Given freedom from that, we believe we can slowly retrieve that position. You must have heard elsewhere that when Federation was about to be introduced there was a sudden cessation of advice from government officials in Nyasaland and people there, which created initial suspicion. That, coupled with other factors of that kind, has helped to make the situation difficult. — (MR. CURRIE): There is a further point. We have reason to believe that there has been active sabotage on the part of certain Colonial servants in the north: whether that belief is justified or not, it appears to be based on sound fact. The criticism made a moment ago is true to a certain extent: perhaps the Party has not done all it might, but it has tried to do quite a lot. It should be borne in mind that the Party faces great difficulty when the people who are administering the African people in the north are persuading those same African people, who believe in their Colonial servants, against Federation. The onus placed upon us here is considerable. I am wondering whether the point which has been made, and accepted, applies to the same extent to Southern Rhodesia.

Q. The difficulty about that is that you are proceeding with Federal policy on the basis that you are going to deal with all the Territories, so you cannot very well say, “No it is all right in Southern Rhodesia”. — A. No, I do not say that. It is probably better in Southern Rhodesia.

Q. You have, quite justifiably, referred to the difficulties sometimes created by utterances of people in other places, though they are anxious to help; but do you not think they are not always helped by what is said by leading politicians here? — A. I agree.

— A. (MR. HOVE): One important fact regarding the question of whether the Party has done the best it could have done to win the Africans on to its side, is that we believe that British democracy is a model we must live up to: we will not use force: we will not intimidate anybody into accepting our viewpoint. But we are dealing with forces who do not uphold the principles of British democracy, and they use intimidation. I suppose the average person knows in his heart of hearts that this Federation is the very best thing we could have in this country and in the other Territories, but is not always able to say so. The Commission must have come across such views or such instances in the northern Territories. How does an outside observer, who does not know intimately what is happening here, get the right impression that there are in fact the majority of people in the Federation who agree that Federation, in its present model, is the best we can hope for?

MR. CRAWLEY: It is remarkable to me that in this memorandum which claims an extension of Federal powers, there is no mention at all of the opposition to Federation. Does that in fact mean that you consider the opposition negligible?

— (MR. CLARKE): No, Sir. One must remember it was written for and on behalf of the Southern Rhodesian wing of the Party, and the opposition to Federation comes mainly from the other Territories, and we had no desire to impinge on their field. In the Federal memorandum you will find there is a whole section on African opposition. There is no desire on the part of the Party to avoid the subject of opposition at all.

Q. Yet your memorandum in fact asks for considerable extensions of Federal power. Are you assuming from Southern Rhodesia that you would have the co-operation of the African people in the north in your demands? — A. No, we have made no attempt whatsoever to conceal the fact that there is this opposition in the north. Our task, as we see it having acquired the means of doing it, is to win over that opinion. We believe that cannot be done whilst we are hamstrung as we are at present.

MR. MENZIES: When this proposal for the Constitutional Review in the future is put over, are we to understand it is merely a Southern Rhodesian idea, or do you speak for the Federal body? You surely have some common policy with regard to constitutional amendment. — A. Indeed, Sir. We are in entire harmony with the Parties (U.F.P.) in the north.

Q. You propose that the protectorate status should continue in Nyasaland because of the particular circumstances there, I take it? And you propose responsible government for Northern Rhodesia on the model of what was adopted in 1923 here. In Nyasaland you propose there should be the type of legislature which does not represent responsible government or Cabinet responsibility? — A. No.

Q. So is it to be still worked on a protectorate basis, maturing into representative government? — A. We think there should be a constitutional council there which would act in regard to discriminatory legislation, if any; and should also render advice to the Governor in certain directions, for instance in regard to the executive council. We saw this as a transient step from the present position to true representative government. To go from one to the other without an intermediate step is too much. We have tried to put to the Commission what we regard as a reasonable intermediate step—it is not regarded as ideal.

Q. Does it postulate complete severance from the Colonial Office? — A. Not entirely, because there would still be a Colonial Office government. The Executive Council would consist partly of officials. It is a hybrid scheme.

Q. So that the House of Commons would still have a field of attack within the Federation—that is more than a possibility? — A. Much would depend on how the thing was written: I have only given the broadest outline. If possible, we should like to see a greater removal from that influence but we recognise we cannot take too radical a step all at once. We would prefer the Constitutional Council, the Governor and the Executive Council to be as far from the House of Commons or Colonial Office interference as is possible to achieve in the intermediate stage.

Q. You say “free from restrictions in the Federal sphere”. What are these effective restrictions you suffer from? How in fact have these operated against the Federation? — A. In reality, because of the Convention which exists, and the declaration of 1957, there have been no instances of United Kingdom veto or of United Kingdom initiating legislation, but as long as those reservations remain there is no doubt that the Federation as a whole has a subordinate status. We see that status being removed elsewhere, and we naturally hope that what is said in the Preamble, which envisages that the Federation can go forward to full membership of the Commonwealth, will be achieved.

Q. It is essentially a matter of prestige? — A. Not essentially, because as long as those reservations are there they can be exercised.

Q. But in fact they would not be, and never are? — A. But they could be, and there could be a change of government. It was openly stated by the opposition party in Britain that if they won the election they would revoke that declaration of 1957, with the intention of being able to utilise those powers if they wished. We do not find that acceptable. In short, we cannot have the future of this country and all that goes with it dependent upon an election in the United Kingdom. — (MR. CURRIE): Perhaps the very fact that those restriction exist creates, particularly in the minds of African people in the Northern Territories, the thought that the British Government is behind them, shall we say, and they can appeal to them to look after them. Unless and until we can establish independence here and build a nation, we will never really make much progress. I recently had the great good fortune to visit Australia and was greatly impressed with what I saw—more than anything else by the great loyalty of all the people to Australia. Whether people were Hollanders, Hungarians or Germans, they were now Australians first and foremost. Australia is completely independent and utterly loyal to the Queen, but with the first loyalty to Australia. I believe we could do the same thing here. The fact that some are white and some are not does not affect the issue.

MR. MOLSON: Sir Edgar Whitehead, in addition to being Prime Minister, is your leader. Can we take it this memorandum does represent his views as leader of your Party? — A. Yes.

Q. In that case, how do you reconcile with your memorandum what he said at his press conference on January 29th—in answer to a question you will remember he said, “I am very anxious to avoid such a break-up (of the Federation) but there is a length beyond which I am not prepared to go. I was fighting all this year to continue the Federation because I believe it is right, but there are certain lengths beyond which I am not prepared to go”. One of the grounds on which he was not prepared to remain in the Federation was if the Governments of the northern Territories were operated on a nationalist basis by African nationalists. If the United Federation Party in Southern Rhodesia claim the right of Southern Rhodesia no longer to remain within the Federation if advances were made in the two northern Territories, how does that accord with your view, expressed in paragraph (4) of your Memorandum, that the Constitution of the Federation clearly does not contemplate that the Federation shall be broken up, and the view expressed by the leader of your Party that in the general Review of the Constitution this year the question of loosening or breaking up the Federation is not to be included? — A.

MR. CLARK: Two things arise out of that. Firstly there is a slight difference between what Sir Edgar said and the question Mr. Molson asked. Sir Edgar said he could not accept the situation in which there was an African nationalist government in both northern Territories. Mr. Molson asked how we could square Southern Rhodesia's position of secession if advances were made in the northern Territories. Those are two quite different things. We want to see constitutional advance in the northern Territories, but we do not believe that nationalist governments there would be an advance at all: in fact there would be a deplorable situation for everyone, and we would like to take this opportunity of expressing our attitude towards nationalist governments. We believe nationalist African governments in the northern Territories would lead inevitably and speedily to a situation of complete anarchy; whatever moderation there might be in beginning would be swept aside by the extreme elements, and the African people would not then achieve a state of democracy, the right to vote and to elect their government, the right to anything; they would achieve a state of abject subjection. That is our attitude and that is why Sir Edgar Whitehead stated the position so firmly. We fully recognise that the Federal concept does not envisage the break-up of the Federation. We want Federation retained, so that it can go forward, but we believe that if there were African nationalist groups controlling the northern Territories, that would in fact end Federation. For one thing, they would not stay in it, and they would conduct affairs in a manner quite unacceptable to the Southern Rhodesian Division, and Sir Edgar Whitehead felt compelled to underline that point.

CHAIRMAN: Could I put it this way—there are certain circumstances, as I understand that speech, in which the Southern Rhodesian Government would feel able to leave Federation: there are no circumstances in which they contemplate that the other two Territories should take the same action? — A. It might be expressed that way. We want to see Federation succeed.

MR. MOLSON: The point is that the whole argument that was put forward in the first section of the Memorandum submitted by your national organisation and the argument put forward in the first part paragraph (f) of your memorandum is that there is no power to do so. Surely you would agree what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander? You are saying that if the proposals that are adopted for constitutional advance in the two northern Territories are not acceptable to you in Southern Rhodesia, that gives you the right to go out. If you claim that right, if the advances sought by you are not acceptable to the two northern Territories, they are equally entitled to go out. — A. No, it was not that. Sir Edgar Whitehead did not speak of advances but of nationalist governments in the northern Territories; and to paraphrase what he was saying was that if there were African nationalist governments in the northern Territories, in fact Federation would not exist. The African nationalists have themselves given all the evidence that anyone could wish for that.

CHAIRMAN: But that is not what he said. He said there were circumstances under which Southern Rhodesia would say, “We want to go out of Federation”. Now is it right to say that this is a solution which is not available to the other Territories? — A. (MR. CURRIE): I think Sir Edgar was being realistic. He believes wholeheartedly in the maintenance of Federation; but it is also a fact, regardless of what this Party or the present Government thinks, that the voter of Southern Rhodesia may have the final say in this. If there are nationalist governments in the northern Territories, the voter of Southern Rhodesia may remove the existing Government and substitute another one.

MR. HABANYAMA: Have they the right to do this? — A. I do not think there is any question of having a right.

MR. CRAWLEY: Supposing the Dominion Party won the next election down here, would it not be likely for the northern Territories to consider that, as there was an extremist Government down here, they could secede? — A. I think that would be reasonable. We consider that Federation should continue in the interest of all the people, but there are circumstances both in the northern Territories and in the southern Territory which may ultimately bring about a break-up. — A. (MR. CLARKE): I do not know that we should too readily accept the view that the Dominion Party in Southern Rhodesia would be an extremist party. We have to remember they are an opposition party.

Q. You seem, if I may say so, to be putting yourself as arbiters as to what is or is not extremist; but if, in the view of the northern Territories, an extremist Government came to power down here, they would have the right to secede—you concede that? — A. I would rather not deal with it on the basis of the Dominion Party, but that obviously must apply.

MR. ROBINSON: Great importance is being attached to this statement of Sir Edgar Whitehead, for obvious reasons; and I would like to know what you mean by nationalist government. We are playing with a lot of terms in this discussion and not getting complete clarity. By nationalist government do you mean a complete hand-over to a form of dictatorship, without any restrictions or safeguards or constitutional arrangements for the future, or do you mean that the African National Congress might fairly win the government of the country on a constitutional basis laid down? — A. We mean the former of those, because most of the statements that have been made so far by the leaders of those organisations have been extremist statements. We have not seen coming from those bodies anything that reasonably resembles a proper party policy for the administration of the country or any of the multifarious responsibilities of government. So we can only conclude that the intention is much more closely allied to a sort of anarchy than a form of democratic government.

Q. And have you in mind that if the United Kingdom do permit such a rapid hand-over it is possible that Sir Edgar Whitehead, in making that speech, contemplated that it would be an acceptance of the extremist demands for secession and thereby might have caused him to sound a warning in the other direction. — A. That is exactly what he meant.

Q. And do you think that speech in any way affects the overall policy of your Party to maintain the Federation in being along the lines you have told us, of bringing those other Territories up to responsible government? — A. Not in the least. Sir Edgar himself (and Sir Roy Welensky) has since that time publicly and repeatedly spoken of his desire for the Federation to continue.

MR. MOLSON: That is why he said the other day that if African nationalists took over the northern Territories he thought it would be almost impossible for you to remain in the Federation. In view of what you have just said about the unreasonable attitude of the African politicians in Northern Rhodesia, how is it you are recommending that a constitution should be introduced in Northern Rhodesia similar to that which was introduced in Southern Rhodesia in 1923? — A. (MR. HOVE): I think it is important to recognise that when Sir Edgar Whitehead made that statement he had in mind certain suggestions that were very common in the United Kingdom and in the Federation: there was a very strong outcry for one man, one vote. As a party, we feel that this means only one thing, that with intimidation and unscrupulous methods, e.g. committing arson on innocent people, they could force the masses very much against their will, so that people would not be allowed to exercise their own free will. It is under those circumstances that Sir Edgar Whitehead said what he did. The position is quite clear to a person who lives in the Federation. The leaders of most of our articulate African organisations have said there is not a good word to say in favour of the Europeans, nor have they recognised a single thing the Europeans have done. Is the European to remain in this country once they are installed in power? They say "No", judging them by everything they have said from time to time. As we see it, if the United Kingdom Government said, "Have it your own way: one man, one vote", they would say tomorrow, "Out with the Europeans!" Even then, we feel that Europeans would not suffer as much as the Africans would if the Europeans left this country. — A. (MR. CLARK): I would just like to add that there are thousands of Africans within the Federation in the Northern Territories who are desperately keen that there should be no nationalist governments there. When Sir Edgar was speaking, he had all this in mind and also that it is, in our view, not even in the interests of the African people that there should be this nationalist government. Mr. Molson mentioned the 1923 Southern Rhodesia Constitution being given to Northern Rhodesia. This is not what we suggest: it is a 1923-type Southern Rhodesia Constitution, but the exact details of what was the situation in 1923 transplanted. We use the term "1923-type constitution" as a short colloquial reference: in other words, we would like to see in Northern Rhodesia responsible government based on traditional parliamentary lines, with a Government and an Opposition, Cabinet and Prime Minister, and responsible to the electorate. But of course there has been a certain change over the years and we believe that should be based on the type of franchise qualification which now exists. I want to make that clear. We see no inconsistency in it at all.

PROFESSOR CREIGHTON: I should like to ask Mr. Clark one or two questions about the proposals which are made in Section 5 for the establishment of a Senate. As I understand it this Senate is formed for the purpose purely, I think, of preventing discriminatory legislation, is that correct? — A. Yes, that is correct.

Q. I am sure we are all interested in possible alternative safeguards for those you propose to do away with but I cannot help wondering whether this body will serve the purpose you have in mind for it. That is why I want to ask certain questions. There are, of course, other Upper Houses or Senates in other countries in the world which have in part as their original purpose the defence of minority or territorial rights, and I think on the whole one could say that those second chambers are not conspicuously successful in defence of those minority or territorial rights, and I think although there would be inevitably a difference of opinion about this, that one of the reasons for this failure is the pressures which are characteristic of Parliamentary Government on the Westminster idea, that is to say, the pressures of Government and party organisation to ensure the passage of legislation, and I am wondering how you think your new senate or Upper House would be immune from those political pressures, particularly when as in Section (a) you say quite definitely that you want it to be an elected house? — A. The Federal Standing Committee of the United Federal Party does not take quite the same rigid view about the Senate as the Southern Rhodesian wing does. It is only fair to let it be known that the Federal Standing Committee has put forward three alternative proposals and is prepared to discuss all three of them. We in Southern Rhodesia have indicated that we favour the Senate but we recognise very consciously the dangers about which Professor Creighton has spoken. We do want to have the Senate free from those political pressures. Firstly we believe that the body should be elected really to obviate the situation where a nominated body had some form of authority or restriction over an elected body. If we are working our way steadily towards democracy that is perhaps a side step or a step in the wrong direction, and we do not want to have a nominated body exercising those pressures over an elected body. But we did want to remove the election of the Senate from the realm of party politics and that is why we have suggested that there would be advantage in using an electoral college or colleges. We do not come forward with a cut and dried plan but we suggest this, that there be established an electoral college or colleges and they would elect the Senate from persons who put forward their names as willing to be considered. Those persons themselves, we would like to introduce an element of elder statesmen about them, and we suggest their qualifications should be somewhat more stringent than the qualifications for ordinary Members of Parliament, but the bodies who would serve as electoral colleges would not in any sense be political bodies. There are a range of bodies representing all races, Chambers of Commerce and African organisations of different kinds who could be incorporated into an electoral college scheme and these are in no sense political bodies. They would in this scheme here elect the Senate. It might not be entirely free from political pressure. One recognises that there might be but it is an honest and sincere attempt to get away from political fervour.

Q. The electoral colleges would be appointed? — A. Yes. They would have to be appointed again as far as possible in some impartial manner to ensure that they were, and safeguards to this extent would have to be written into the Constitution, of course, to ensure that the bodies chosen to make up the electoral colleges were truly representative. That is, representative of the people in their various fields of endeavour and their various activities, not political parties.

Q. They would have to be appointed by the Governor-General in Council but not with free discretion? — A. (MR. CURRIE): No, Sir. What we had in mind was appointment by a body similar to the Delimitation Commission presided over by a Judge of the Supreme Court.

Q. That is not clear in your Memorandum. — A. No, it is not, Sir. — (MR. CLARK): We had not gone into detail. We had thought of that sort of safeguard.

Q. In (g) in Section 5: "The Senate should be a reviewing Chamber for all legislation, other than money bills". That in itself would constitute quite a serious limitation on the Senate's capacity to safeguard against discriminatory legislation, would it not? — A. We do not think so, Sir. I think there is constitutional precedent for excluding money bills. I take it the point is exclusion of money matters?

Q. Yes. — A. I think there is precedent for exclusion of financial matters.

Q. There is a lot of precedent for that but it is a question how far that would weaken the safeguard against discriminatory legislation? — A. (MR. HOVE): The point here is that no details have been finalised. This Commission after assessing the pros and cons of every one of the proposals put forward to act as a constitutional safeguard, it was thought, would recommend one that is best suited to them, but we did go into various types. Bills of Rights, for instance. We found it is weaker than the Senate of the type we recommend here. After all, you take a country like the United States: you learn of, this week that they passed a Bill of Rights. Actually history would show that they had the first Bill of Rights 100 years ago, it has not achieved very much.

Q. We are interested in your proposals and all I am doing is just attempting to discuss them and their merits and see if there are weaknesses and perhaps they can be corrected. — A. (MR. EWING): We do not claim in any sense that this is a perfect scheme. I do not think it is likely that discriminatory legislation would be affected by any financial measures. I imagine the thought in your mind is that there might be a tax imposed on Africans but not on Europeans. All we can say in this particular regard is the trend in every case in regard to legislation in this part of the world is away in every case from discriminatory legislation. People have become conscious of the undesirability of discriminatory legislation and I think it is agreed so far as examples in other parts of the world are concerned that where a second chamber has a right to veto or turn down financial legislation it has caused tremendous trouble with the Lower House. It may not be a racial or discriminatory issue at all. I think the experience of other countries has shown it can be an extremely difficult power to grant to the upper chamber. I merely say that in general outline but I think it is important to stress we do not regard this as a cut and dried scheme. We are perfectly flexible in our approach to it and in many ways we look to the Commission, with some of the wealth and experience and interests here, to try and find a solution for it.

Q. I am not picking holes, I am inviting you to make the best defence you can. In relation to Section 5 (k) "Determination whether discriminatory or not should be carried out by a Select Committee composed of equal numbers of the two Houses, and of an equal number of Europeans and non-Europeans". That is to say the Senate or Upper House could not act in rejecting discriminatory legislation until it had been agreed to be discriminatory legislation by a committee of two Houses, is that correct? — A. (MR. CLARK): We thought that some machinery should be provided where all legislation would go to the Senate. Some machinery should be provided to determine in the event of dispute whether it was discriminatory or not. That could be referred to the Courts or there could be some other machinery. We thought that a simple and reasonable first step would be to provide that it could be referred to a Select Committee consisting of equal numbers of both Houses and equal numbers of the races so that there could be no complaint. We felt that would be an easy way of determining whether a measure was discriminatory or not. However, as Mr. Ewing has said, none of this is firm and final. We had hoped that the Commission might be able to put out suggestions which would be superior to this. We do not stick rigidly to this. It was put in to round it off, to show we recognise there might be a necessity for somebody to say this is discriminatory or not.

Q. I do suggest this might be another way in which, in fact, partly pressure might be exercised to ensure the passage without consideration of certain measures. — A. I think in that event some other thing should be tried. It is not the intention that this proposal of this Select Committee should form a wrong means of entry of party political pressure at all and I think the point made is a sound one.

MR. MENZIES: I would like to say my colleague has raised questions that have been uppermost in my mind on this proposal but there is one, I think, that should be pointed out. It is only to direct your attention to it, that your proposal makes this a reviewing chamber for all legislation and then you have on the different franchise different choice, you have a senate which has all the power of a reviewing chamber and it seems to me that you are just inviting trouble there unless you have, which you have not got here, what you find in Section 57 of the Australian Constitution, that is a provision that where there is a conflict between the Houses a certain procedure has to be followed otherwise you will stultify most of your legislation when it gets into a differently chosen second chamber of a different complexion. — A. I think that is absolutely right.

MR. JUSTICE BEADLE: You seem to suggest in your Memorandum a Bill of Rights as a possible alternative to a second chamber. Have you considered the possibility of having both? It seems to me you can define certain matters within your Bill of Rights which would be proper matters for the Court to decide and you could put in your Bill of Rights many things that might remove fears. For instance, there is a very definite fear in the north that land tenure in the northern Territories might be interfered with by the Federal Government. Could you not put in your Bill of Rights that the Federal Government will have no power whatever to interfere with land tenure and if legislation was passed which would interfere with land tenure that would be a matter for the Courts to decide, and it is a matter the Courts could well decide and they could act in the same way as the Federal Supreme Court does in the United States and simply rule the legislation to be ultra vires the Constitution. Would you consider it possible to have a Bill of Rights incorporated into the Constitution which was including money matters which might allay fears on both sides but matters which could be left to the Courts to decide and leave matters such as where a Bill discriminates to the disadvantage of a race, which is a political rather than a legal matter, to be decided by the Upper Chamber? — A. Yes. The answer to that question is yes. Our approach to these safeguards is this. We do not mind how rigid the safeguards are to prevent discriminatory legislation. We have no intention of going ahead on discriminatory legislation other than—and I must say here so as not to overplay the thing—we do believe that certain discriminatory legislation is still necessary. Discriminatory legislation, that is, which discriminates in favour of the African people, but apart from that in general terms we do not mind how rigid the safeguards may be to prevent discriminatory legislation, we are not afraid of rigid safeguards of that kind because we have no intention whatever of this country proceeding along the lines that there will be enacted discriminatory legislation and so I would find, I am sure we would all find, Mr. Justice Beadle's suggestion highly acceptable. We did not think ourselves that a Bill of Rights in itself without anything else was an adequate safeguard and if it is desired we could elaborate why we did not think so. There are valid reasons why we feel it was not an adequate safeguard in itself. But a combination of the two might be ideal.

Q. One further point. You have suggested that money bills should not go to the Second Chamber at all but the difficult point is money bills might discriminate. Could you not provide if the money bill does discriminate it comes outside the ordinary run of money bills, then it would go to the Senate just the same as any other discriminatory measures? Is there any reason why you should not do that and your Select Committee should review money bills as it would review other Bills and decide whether a money bill does discriminate, to make it quite clear that there would be no discrimination in money bills which would not go through the normal procedure in the Senate? You would agree, with that? — A. Yes, Sir. Obviously what one wants to avoid is the possibility of a budget being introduced which would be upset by what Mr. Justice Beadle has outlined just now. That would be perfectly acceptable.

MR. CHIRWA: From what I have gathered from Mr. Clark it is quite obvious, I think, to many of us that what the Southern Rhodesia Branch of the United Federal Party intends that the people in Southern Rhodesia should have is the right to determine their own future, that is to say, if as long as Federation is acceptable, as long as the terms of Federation are acceptable to Southern Rhodesia, Federation must continue, but if the terms of Federation are not acceptable to them, they must break it up. On the other hand, the U.F.P. do not want to give to Africans in the Northern Territories the same right as they themselves have. Do you not think then that the Africans are right in thinking that what the Europeans want in Southern Rhodesia is to have the power and the African in the Northern Territories must not have power? How is it that if you are democratic as you profess to be you can decide yourselves as to the type of government which you must have and at the same time deny the Africans in the Northern Territories the right to decide for themselves? Can you explain that? — A. I do not see that there is the denial. We have mentioned that we believe that in Northern Rhodesia there should be a representative form of government with an elected Parliament, Governing party and Opposition. I do not see there is any denial of access of the African people to full participation in that. We do believe in a qualitative franchise for reasons which we can advance if necessary but the purpose of the qualification is not in any sense to exclude Africans or any race at all; and so we see right away that the African people in the northern Territories can play an absolutely full role in the situation. We envisage, and you may remember, Sir, that when I spoke of the situation in Nyasaland I spoke of an elected assembly in which the African population have a majority, so I cannot accept the suggestion that we wish to exclude the Africans in the northern Territories from having any political rights.

Q. Would you say that if the Africans in the northern Territories do not want Federation they would have the right to leave it as much as if the people of Southern Rhodesia did not want Federation they would have the same right? — A. (MR. CURRIE): I think there may be a misunderstanding here. We, the Southern Rhodesia branch of the Party, do not claim any rights at all. We say and we believe absolutely sincerely that it is in the interests of all the people of the Federation that Federation shall continue. We may be wrong in that view but that is our sincere belief. I can well understand when Mr. Chirwa says that the Africans in the Northern Territories think that the Europeans in Southern Rhodesia want it all their own way. I can understand that, but the point I am trying to make is this: so far as we here are concerned that is not so. Having said that I come back to what I said earlier. I think one must be realistic. Just as if there was a nationalistic government in one of the northern Territories a nationalistic government would inevitably opt out of the Federation. The fact is that the same applies to Southern Rhodesia. With all the goodwill in the world the voter in Southern Rhodesia has a considerable say. Our representations here are sincerely in the belief that Federation is in the interests of everyone.

SIR. LIONEL HEALD: Supposing there was a proposal made that the Constitution should contain provision for a future right to secede. Would you think that that should be put in or not put in or if it was put in should it be limited to any one of the three or should it apply to them all? — A. Sir, I think that would break Federation from the start.

Q. I am not suggesting it is a good thing or a bad thing but if it was in would you want it limited to Southern Rhodesia? — A. No, if it was put in it must obviously apply to everyone but I would like to make the point which I am sure you will appreciate that investment-wise . . .

Q. I was not on that. — A. Quite.

MR. TAYLOR: Do Mr. Clark and his colleagues still maintain the views expressed in Section 1 (f) of their memorandum? Has anything been said in the course of this morning's deliberations which have caused them to change their minds about the validity of what they say there and what they quote there? You quote Mr. Oliver Lyttelton saying "My advice is that there is not". Do you accept that advice? — A. (MR. CLARK): Yes.

Q. Would you go from that point one stage further? Would you agree that when Sir Edgar Whitehead made his threat of secession in January last in point of fact he was threatening to do something which he had no right or ability to do? — A. (MR. EWING): I think there has been a lot of questioning on Sir Edgar Whitehead's statement. I think one must recognise and be frank that there are certain circumstances in which whether there is a right to secede or not, the Federation could not possibly survive and I think that was the underlying basis behind Sir Edgar's statement. I think, being frank, we must accept that circumstances could arise in which there were two hostile African Nationalistic Governments who were determined at all costs to secede or break up Federation. I do not think it is fair for us to say you can hold Federation together by force of arms. I do not think that is anybody's function. I think one must view Sir Edgar's statement in that light, that there could arise certain circumstances, not that Southern Rhodesia might wish to secede, but circumstances were such that it was impossible to continue Federation.

CHAIRMAN: The question was if he was threatening to secede, he had no right to do it. — A. I agree entirely with that.

SIR DONALD MACGILLIVRAY: You have not concerned yourself in the memorandum with re-distribution of functions between Territorial and Federal Governments except to say you submit any basic change in the distribution of functions or any different approach to the question of functions could so alter the conditions upon which Southern Rhodesia, by referendum, agreed to Federation that a further referendum would be required. Would that be a further referendum on the question of whether there should be Federation or not or simply a referendum on the matter of re-distribution of functions? — A. (MR. CLARK): Just the latter, Sir.

Q. Would you then contemplate that in such circumstances there would also be a referendum in each of the other Territories? — A. Yes, certainly. May I just say, Sir, I would look upon this as unfortunate if there were. I think that basically we agree with the present distribution of functions with certain changes that we might want to suggest. We have not brought it into the argument here because functions are likely to be related to what emerges as a Constitutional set up after all this is over. But we have no violent or radical changes that we would like to suggest. By and large we are happy with them and it would be necessary to go to the lengths that have been described only if the changes were violent or radical and only if they were coupled with some sort of constitutional framework that caused us anxiety about that transfer of functions. I think it is highly unlikely. I think it is a hypothetical thing more than reality.

Q. But you contemplate the possibility? — A. There might be the circumstance.

Q. If there were a referendum in the other Territories who would participate in that referendum? — A. The voters.

Q. In Nyasaland this new lot of voters who might put in a majority of Africans in the Legislature? — A. Yes.

Q. You would not like to guess what might be the outcome of a referendum? — A. Seeing it is a hypothetical thing I would not like to guess the answer.

MR. MOLSON: Are you seriously suggesting in regard to Northern Rhodesia in the case of a referendum or in the case of the new Constitution which you have been suggesting for Northern Rhodesia that there should be no alteration in the franchise and that 68 per cent of the voters should continue to be European? Should such a small minority have an influence? — A. I think the fact that 68 per cent of the voters are European is really coincidental. This highlights our attitude towards the franchise.

Q. I think it does and perhaps we should deal with that. — A. We look at it from two points of view. Firstly, we do not hold the view that franchise is an inalienable human right, that it is an end in itself. We believe in all countries there is some qualification to the franchise, even if it is an age qualification, but there is some qualification and the reason for that is this: that the vote is a most potent thing. We regard it as being something that should be exercised by those persons who are capable of doing so with a great deal of discernment. They should be able not merely to judge between rival candidates. They should see the Parties behind the candidates, the policies that are in those Parties and where they are likely to lead. They should have some conception of all that. The vote is not really so much an individual matter as virtually a public trust because it affects not merely the voter himself directly and individually, but it affects his compatriots and it affects the years that are to come and the generations that are still to follow, so that it must not be exercised lightly. It must be exercised with proper discernment and with public spirit and we believe therefore, that there must be some qualification to ensure that it is not used other than in that fashion. At the present moment there are many people who, lacking the education and other foundation, are prey to pressures of all kinds and in reality would not be free to exercise a vote without duress, who are unable to perhaps resist duress, are unable to assess accurately the issues that are involved. They are much more likely to exercise the vote either under duress or for tribal reasons or for all sorts of reasons other than the correct ones. We can divorce the exercise of the vote from the effects of its exercise, and we have seen so many parts of the world where there has been a broadening of the franchise to embrace people who are not yet ready for it, most deplorable situations result. We have seen, in fact, they have lost the right to vote, they have not acquired democracy, they have lost it. That has been going on, that has been the progression all over the place. I think if we take the Sudan as an example where there was a cry of 'one man, one vote,' it did not extend to women, there was a qualification right away, where there was the cry of 'one man, one vote,' there is now a military dictatorship, the people do not have a vote at all. So we cannot divorce the consequences of voting from the right to vote. For these reasons we believe that the qualifications should be high. They should try to retain the voting right in the hands of people who can do so with responsibility. That is not—and we must emphasise this—racial argument, it is not racial discrimination at all. We think it is essential in the interest of all races, including the African, that it should be so because if it is otherwise then there will be dire consequences. In this method of ours the African people and the country as a whole will go forward under a proper democratic system and true democracy is pretty rare in the world as it is. It does not flourish everywhere, it is a very perishable plant, it is very fragile, and we are progressing towards it, true, a little bit more slowly than in the Sudan and other territories, but we shall get there and all the races shall get there and they will all, as they come to be fully responsible, acquire the vote and that, Sir, we submit in absolute sincerity is an essential precaution of the African; and if it were otherwise they would not achieve democracy, they would achieve a state of suppression. That is our attitude to the franchise.

LORD CRATHORNE: Mr. Clark, I wondered if you would agree that one of the major factors which has resulted in such a large measure of lack of confidence in Federation is race discrimination in Southern Rhodesia? Do your colleagues agree with that? — A. (MR. CURRIE): As a fact I would agree that is correct.

Q. I think it would be very helpful to us if you could tell us what are your views, the Southern Rhodesia Branch of the United Federal Party, what your policy is to deal with that particular point? — A. (MR. EWING): This is a very complex subject and with your permission I would like to deal with this fairly fully because it does require a brief analysis of the Land Apportionment Act and our general attitude towards it.

I shall try to deal with the Land Apportionment Act in so far as that is one criticism that is levelled in this part of the world as an example of discrimination and perhaps give you the background. I think perhaps I should deal with some of the statements that are made and some of them have some justification, we admit, but some of them suffer from certain misconceptions.

First of all, we have the frequently expressed opinion that it is not fair for the Europeans to have 48 million acres while the Africans only have 42 million acres. If one embarks on an arithmetical exercise, relating to the total acreage of the country and the total population, then I would agree that it is not fair for Europeans to have 48 million acres and Africans to have 42 million acres. But nevertheless one cannot possibly ignore the tremendous economic contribution that is made to the country by European agriculture. I would first of all point out that, generally speaking, all European land is paid for and bought by Europeans whereas most African land is given free with the exception of course, of the Native Purchase Areas. Secondly, there has been tremendous private capital investment in European farms and the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia, speaking at the University College last month, estimated this at upwards of £200m. The annual contribution to the gross domestic production of Southern Rhodesia from European agriculture last year was £52.8m. and of that, of course, tobacco has produced nearly £28m. of vital exports. Finally I would mention with regard to the essential need to keep European farms going that they do create employment for some 230,000 African people. I think when one analyses the Land Apportionment Act it is essential to emphasise that since the early days of the Colony's history the African's land rights have always been respected and protected. But also it is important to point out that since 1914 it has been recognised that not every single unborn African has an indefeasible right to occupy land. One of the arguments that is used against the Land Apportionment Act is that in the early days of the Colony an African was permitted to buy land anywhere. This is perfectly true and it was the advent of the Morris Carter Commission and the Land Apportionment Act which followed the Report of that Commission which removed the African's right to purchase land in any part of the country. But whether or not this right was a valuable one is somewhat disputable when one considers the circumstances of the time. At the time that the Morris Carter Commission sat the position was that Europeans had purchased 31 million acres of this country whereas the African population for obvious reasons because of their poor standard of living had purchased only 45,000 acres. Whether or not the Morris Carter Commission was correct in its suggested apportionment of the land between the races I do not think is the major issue. At that time it was felt that the proper attitude should be to reserve land for both races to make sure that at any rate the African side would not be completely purchased by Europeans. Morris Carter suggested that the European area should be 49.1 million acres and the African area should be 28.6 million acres. The balance of the land was reserved for future determination. At that time there was some uncertainty as to whether the African would need more land or whether there might be a huge amount of European immigration, and that land was reserved for decision at a future date. The position is now since 1959 that all this remaining unassigned land has been now completely assigned to one race or the other. It is interesting to note the steady trend in land assigned for native occupation since the Land Apportionment Act of 1930. The European area has decreased in size from 49.1 million acres in 1930 to 47.9 million in 1959. In 1930 African land totalled only 28.6 million acres. By 1953 it had increased to 30.6 million and by 1959 the final assessment was made of 42 million acres to African people.

I would like to just make the point that on no occasion have the European people attempted to diminish or reduce the amount of land held by Africans. In fact it is clear that the trend is in exactly the reverse direction. As population pressures have been felt more and more land has been allocated to the African population. I would also like to point out that this is by no means regarded as a final settlement in as much as I myself have been serving on a Parliamentary Select Committee since 1958, and one of the main aspects of our terms of reference is to make recommendations as to the further land requirements of Africans living in certain areas of this colony. It would be, of course, quite improper for me to attempt to prejudge the decision of that Committee, but I merely point this out as a matter of general interest.

There is little doubt about it that the major bone of contention in so far as the Land Apportionment Act is concerned in the rural areas is the fact that there are 8 or 10 million acres of land reserved for the European population which is unalienated and unoccupied. Quite naturally the African population looks to those areas. "Why is it that this land is being reserved for Europeans and we have land hunger and land starvation?" I will be the first to admit there is a great deal of merit in this argument, but before I examine this in some detail I would like to try and give some outline picture of the conditions in African areas before the advent of the Act.

The position of the shifting cultivation was quite adequate for subsistence while the population numbers were small. When an area become eroded or denuded of its fertility then the population would move on and nature would restore the balance. But as thinking advanced and as population numbers grew, there were quite a number of unpleasant aspects of the communal system, one of which I think I should point out, and that was the impact on the social life of the African. More and more one found the development that the husband would leave his wife and children in the reserves and go to seek part-time urban employment or work on a European farm. This, of course, led to complete failure to advance in either native agriculture or in industry because nobody was a permanent worker in either field. The Land Husbandry Act which is perhaps the main effort of the Southern Rhodesia Government with regard to the native areas at the moment aims specifically at giving security of tenure to the African on the land. This, of course, must have a powerful social and economic impact on the African population because now for the first time there is security of tenure and incentive to improve a particular piece of land.

To go back to the contentious 8 or 10 million acres, the main difficulty in general facing the Government in regard to development of the native areas is the delicate question of priorities of the limited capital funds that are available to Government on this account.

First of all I must point out that the implementation of the Land Husbandry Act which we think is extremely important is taking the majority of our funds. Secondly, I wish to stress that already far too high a proportion of our capital funds is being spent on reclamation work, reclaiming some of the eroded soils due to the communal system of the past. But it seems vital to us now that we have to shift emphasis from the welfare of the land to the welfare of the people living on the land. It is an old statement, but worth repeating, that people are more important than land. I think it is fair to say that this is fully recognised by the Southern Rhodesia Government. It seems, therefore, infinitely preferable at this moment to divert major portions of our limited capital funds into channels which can be expected to bring immediate and tangible benefits to the African in rural areas in regard specifically to the need to enable technical services to extend and improve technical efficiency to increase crop yields. In fact put more cash into the rural African's pockets; loans for fencing, etc.; to complete the Husbandry Act we have to find money for loans for fertilisers.

It seems to me when you talk in terms of 8 or 10 million acres although I fully recognise the attitude of the African's particular regard, it is very debatable whether we should not rather put our available funds into developing the potential of the existing areas rather than dissipating on a new area of land and merely creating some of the troubles of the past.

I would like just to be a little more specific on that because I do not think I have made it clear. This 8 or 10 million acres is, generally speaking, very poor land. I think that is certain otherwise it would have been fully occupied many years ago. A great deal of it is in devastated, flat country, quite a lot in marginal rainfall areas and generally speaking it is of doubtful agricultural value. That does not mean if we did have the capital we could not make it pay and could not settle a lot of people in that part of the country. But it does seem to me that we cannot seriously suggest we should spend £10 or £20 million developing 8 or 10 million acres of new land when the net result of that is that we will move people who are living on subsistence economy. All we will have achieved is the doubtful security of moving people who are already poor to a new area where they can merely enjoy poverty in different surroundings. I want to stress the fact that we do not look on this in any other sense but that it is a problem of what is the best possible way in which we can spend our capital in the native areas.

So it would seem important with regard to the contentious 8 or 10 million acres, if we can achieve it, that this land should be left for future population expansion until such time as we have the capital funds to make proper development in this particular area.

In the meantime our major purpose must be to increase productivity, in fact to get cash into the African's pocket. There is very little doubt about it, that the African potential is there. Already master farmers have had the advantage of some instruction in agriculture and are producing three or four times the yield of the average farmer. For several years the demonstration boys in the reserves have been producing from seven or eight times the average yield of the ordinary farmer.

I would like to conclude by making one or two general observations about the Land Apportionment Act, not only from the rural aspect but also from the urban aspect because I may have created certain impressions in my remarks that I would like to clarify.

First of all I think I am quite correct in saying that there is an ever decreasing number of people in Southern Rhodesia who believe there is any intrinsic merit whatsoever in creating artificial divisions of land according to the races of the people concerned.

The original reasons for that aspect of the Land Apportionment Act in the rural areas have largely fallen away. The reasons given by the Morris Carter Commission were that European farmers resented the idea of adjacent African farmers because of the dangers of cattle disease being spread, crop disease and matters of stock theft. This has largely disappeared today. Nevertheless although we must recognise that the Land Apportionment Act has served an invaluable purpose in one sense at any rate and that is to protect the African's land against European purchase, without the Land Apportionment Act or some similar device there is little doubt about it that by today the African would probably own perhaps 10 per cent of the land in this country.

Until such time as we can really satisfy ourselves that the African will not be the loser I think the Land Apportionment Act, in so far as it appertains to the rural areas, will have to remain, because in my respectful submission I would suggest, even though today we want to throw land purchase open to people of all races, I think the African would be the major loser. It is therefore clear, I imagine, why we intend to devote the major portion of our efforts to increasing the cash economy of the African in the rural areas because if we can do that you can then put the African into a financial position where he can and will wish to buy land on equal terms with everybody else throughout the country, and as and when we reach that position we fully recognise that these artificial barriers will have to disappear.

With regard to the urban aspect of the Land Apportionment Act we fully recognise that this affords the greatest source of frustration to the African people with particular regard to matters such as restaurants, cinemas and the like. There are also other difficulties with regard to the urban areas. It is not uncommon to hear African businessmen in Salisbury asking why is it that they cannot trade in the centre of Salisbury. I have a lot of sympathy with this view but it is extremely difficult to break down the Land Apportionment Act in one direction alone. By its very nature it precludes Africans from trading in the European area and, of course, Europeans from trading in the African area. It would seem to me illogical in the extreme to suggest that the African businessman must have protection in his own suburbs but at the same time he should be allowed to freely compete in the European areas. I am quite certain that, rightly or wrongly, one would have tremendous pressure from the European traders who would immediately ask for the right to open up businesses in the African areas and, of course, the Asian community as well.

It is one of the most important things which we have got to achieve in this country—the establishment of a solid middle-class. While certain of the protective aspects of the Land Apportionment Act remain there is little doubt about it that the middle-class African is rapidly emerging at any rate in the urban areas. I would suggest if we throw him into the open field of free and open competition in the field of trade and business then I think we might well stultify our efforts in this regard in one fell swoop, and hold back African progress in this regard for perhaps ten or twenty years.

I think the Land Apportionment Act has been described by some people, and I do not think generally speaking many people believe that this is something which will remain for ever, as the cornerstone of our existence. I think it is very important to stress the trend of amendments to the Land Apportionment Act especially since it was consolidated. Since 1941, I think I am correct in saying, it has been amended on twelve occasions. I do not propose to outline all the amendments because I do not have them here, but I would like to indicate the general things which have been done in amendment.

The first one is the amendment to permit the multi-racial University College of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, that has such an important part to play in race relations, to establish multi-racial hotels, such as the hotel in which you are staying in at the moment, and of course, there is another one in Salisbury. Again on the same trend, last year during the same session of this Southern Rhodesia Parliament a Select Committee published a report with regard to the tenure of Africans in the urban areas. This Select Committee unanimously suggested and proposed that Africans should have the right to freehold tenure in the urban areas. Now it is important to point out that this Select Committee is naturally composed of members of the Dominion Party as well as the United Federal Party. I think it must be recognised that this is a full recognition of the fact that the African in the future will become and has become a permanent urban dweller, and as such must have the right to purchase land freehold in the country just as any other person, and I would suggest that this represents a major breakthrough against reactionary thinking with regard to the Land Apportionment Act in so far as it obtains in the urban areas.

We can only point the trend in this regard. We admit freely and frankly that a great deal remains to be done. But we submit that the trend of legislation with regard to the Land Apportionment Act is as clear as can be expected. I would further state that even if we had the disaster of a reactionary government in Southern Rhodesia these trends have gone so far that it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, for anyone else to reverse these trends at this stage of our development.

We realise, as I have said before, that much remains to be done but we believe it can and will be done stage by stage and if possible without friction between races, so that we can remove these artificial barriers that exist and so ultimately we can reach a stage where every man in this country is judged entirely on his merit; his ability, his character and not on the colour of his skin. That, of course, is what we mean by partnership, and every single trend in Southern Rhodesia in the field of legislation is pointing towards this goal, which I think we are likely to achieve rather quicker than some people expect.

CHAIRMAN: Thank you very much. The question which has been left unanswered is to tell us something about the two Acts. — A. The other question—how Southern Rhodesia is facing up to the question of discriminatory legislation. It will take some time but I would like just briefly to outline measures that have recently been taken by the Southern Rhodesia Government to remove discrimination, is that the point?

Q. Yes. — A. I will run through the list fairly quickly. Of course there has been the outstanding advance in African education. That again is a recognition of the fact that people have every desire to advance the African, and bring him on to his full capabilities. The recent series of industrial legislation, I refer to the Apprenticeship Act, Industrial Conciliation Act and Workmen's Compensation Act, again represent a major break through with regard to those two sections to the aspect of race where friction is most likely to occur; it is in the lower strata of European society that friction against the African workman does come up.

Q. I appreciate those Acts have been passed, but are there African apprentices who have been able to take advantage of the Apprenticeship Act? — A. I think it is correct to say these measures have only recently been promulgated, and the Government is having a tremendous drive now to establish technical education and facilities for apprentices to enter into all fields of industry. I think Mr. Currie may be able to help on this one. I think it is true to say already there are several African apprentices in different industries at this moment.

Other minor details, but they were nevertheless matters which required attention, is the decision to permit Africans to bet in lotteries and horse races. I have already referred to the establishment of multi-racial hotels, freehold tenure in the urban areas is again a major break through and finally, although this has not yet been implemented, though I understand the exercise has been under way for at least a year now, there has been a decision of the Southern Rhodesia Parliament which incidentally included one or two Opposition Members voting for the Government, that we must admit non-Europeans to the Civil Service.

Finally with regard to discrimination against people who are not Africans, and we must face the fact that this exists, there has been the position that the Southern Rhodesia Government repealed the inter-Territorial Movement of Persons Act which applied particularly against the Asian community from the Northern Territories coming down to Southern Rhodesia.

Apart from legislation I think it is important to recognise that the general trend today is in every way towards a recognition of multi-racial society, but quite naturally there are reactionary people, there always will be in any society, who will resist to the last this sort of thing, but it is our opinion that they are in the minority and an ever diminishing minority.

We have examples such as the Repertory Theatre in Salisbury, suggesting they should have multi-racial audiences, although Salisbury City Council has rather confused the issue in that regard. We have university freedom, multi-racial discussion groups today, none of which I would suggest were even thought of as being possible some ten years ago. We do not wish to try to give a false impression in this regard; but wherever you go in this country you will find Europeans inviting Africans into their homes. We can only indicate a general trend, and the trend is away from separate development and the recognition of the fact that two races in this country have got to and in fact will learn to get on together.

(MR. CURRIE): I wonder if I might just add to that. One other aspect of our problems last year was the unanimous vote of the Southern Rhodesia Select Committee which was set up to enquire into the disabilities of the EuroAfrican, Coloured and Asian people; it was, I repeat, a unanimous vote of the House to enquire into and recommend how their disabilities could be removed. That Select Committee has not reported, it is still sitting; it confirms Mr. Ewing's points.

MR. GONDWE: On the subject of political advancement in the northern Territories, especially Nyasaland, you seem to envisage in your memorandum that you would like to see an advanced Constitution in Nyasaland whereby more Africans would be brought into the Legislature. Do you envisage a representative Legislature which would be mainly nominated? — A. (MR. CLARKE): For the Executive Council we did envisage a nominated body including some officials.

Q. What about the Legislature? — A. The Assembly, we had thought, should be an elected body. We are not in a very happy position to give you detailed recommendations in regard to Nyasaland which is another Territory. We of Southern Rhodesia are, strictly speaking, minding our own business in Territorial affairs; but as it is part of the country we have, of course, given a little thought to it, and we envisage an elected Assembly but a nominated Executive, the Executive to consist of officials and non-officials of the two major races, Africans and Europeans, and the legislation would be initiated by the Executive Council. We thought, admittedly, as I said earlier on, it was a hybrid scheme, an intermediate step but a considerable advance on the present. We must remember that there is really no tradition for elections and that sort of thing in Nyasaland. Until Federation, which was really only a few years ago, there had never been any elections in Nyasaland of any kind, and it is for reasons of that sort that we believe the intermediate step has a place in the framework, in the scheme of things.

Q. I think, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Clark is aware that the Africans in Nyasaland would like to see an elected body? — A. Yes.

Q. And for that matter I would go back to the point, his fear that eventually there might be what they call a nationalistic government. My question was, if it is going to be an elected body what would be there to prevent nationalists standing for election and thereby bring about a nationalistic government? — A. Nothing, Sir. They would be quite entitled to stand for election, the same as anyone else. We would hope to see, for reasons which I have given, a franchise with some fairly reasonably high qualifications in it, and we hope also that we could achieve this system of an elected Assembly and the nominated Executive body. We think that that would be the means of bringing the African people into the elaborate machinery of democracy, and it would serve as the training and the tiding over step to the time when they could be further advanced; and as evidence of the goodwill there we instance that if they participate fully in a rather more advanced democratic system in Northern Rhodesia, then Nyasaland would take a step towards that day which would bring an ability to conduct elections, to have Africans as voters and elected members; and yet it would retain some element of safeguard against complete run away to a form of extremism that we believe would not be in the interests of the African people.

Q. You would like to see a nominated Executive Council. Do you envisage members of the Executive Council coming from outside the legislature or from within it? — A. From outside the Assembly. We are not in a very good position to deal with the case of Nyasaland: we have brought it in more or less incidentally. We had envisaged the Executive being nominated by the Governor, acting on advice of a constitutional council.

MR. HABANYAMA: In relation to the Land Apportionment Act we have been told that if there was no such Act the Africans would possibly remain with about 10% — A. Yes.

Q. I cannot understand why that should be, when there are still eight to ten million acres which belong to Europeans and are not used. — A. (MR. EWING): That is an interesting point which is often put to me. I have had the opportunity of checking this one for myself. The suggestion is also made that African land, apart from being less than the European land, comprises the worst land in the country. It is far from being the case that Africans would own perhaps 10% less than what they own today. It should be understood that the land which was originally settled on by Africans is the sand veldt type of soil, because it was easier for the Africans to till with their primitive agricultural implements; but I will challenge anyone to tell me that the African has nothing but the poorest sand veldt in the country. As a practical farmer myself, farming on just that type of soil, I would indicate there are tremendous advantages in that soil over the heavier contact soils that are admired by people from overseas. In times of drought the sand veldt has a far greater potential of recovery than any of these heavier clay soils. Equally, it is true that in times of excessive rainfall your crops are better. You have the advantage of extreme versatility in that you can grow food crops as well as the important cash crops like Turkish tobacco. There are also some magnificent black basalt soils in the whole of the native purchase area. Near the Portuguese border is some of the only soil in the country which can grow coffee, tea and various spices. This can only be a matter of personal opinion, but if the Land Apportionment Act were revoked tomorrow you would have a lot of land-hungry Europeans going up to the reserves, and I think a lot of African farmers would be prepared to sell to them. That is not in their interests; but had that limit not been placed by the Act, whatever its merits may be today, there is little doubt that many finance companies, apart from individual Europeans, would have bought the greatest proportion of this country as an investment only for the future.

Q. Is it not true, though, that cash crops have been introduced only recently, and when an African complains of shortage of land he means land which can grow maize? And he would not be blamed for that complaint. — A. I entirely agree with that suggestion. One of the difficulties we have in the Land Husbandry Act itself is that only 10% of the land is actually being put out to individual title. People will tell you they only have 8 acres, and it is perfectly true that a man may have an individual right to graze 5-6 cattle, which may take some 80-100 further acres. So if we had the money to consolidate farms the smallest African holding would be about 80-90 acres in the high rainfall areas, and in the low rainfall areas there are already holdings of 1,000 acres. We are not in any sense unsympathetic to that point of view.

Q. Are the United Federal Party aware that their attack on the United Kingdom Government, and also the political parties of that country is actually threatening not only the Africans of the Northern Territories but the Africans of this country? — A. (MR. CLARKE): That is a matter of political opinion. I do not hold that view.

Q. I understand in this country there are some reserve powers which the United Kingdom could use if it wanted to protect the Africans, and I am told these powers have not been used since this colony gained a responsible government; but nevertheless the United Federal Party advocate at the moment that those should be removed; and the Africans are disturbed because of that move. Is the Party aware of that? — A. (MR. HOVE): Very much so; but they are also aware that those Africans who feel the removal of those powers is against their interests hold that view because they are ignorant of the true facts. African progress over a number of years now has been slowed down to a certain extent by the existence of those powers and reservations. If a close study is made of why they should be removed it will be found that it is the African who is going to benefit more. For example in May, 1956, the Congress of the governing Party of the day in Southern Rhodesia in recognition of a request from their African members, passed a resolution that the definition of the indigenous people of Southern Rhodesia should be changed from "native" to "African". In talking of the Land Apportionment Act, Mr. Ewing said "native" several times. Talking legally and officially, we are natives here, because the Constitution says so. That resolution was accepted by Government: in fact I think it was passed unanimously in 1956. It has not been put into the Act, I understand, because the initiative must be taken by the United Kingdom Government; and where the Land Apportionment Act has been amended there has been some slowing down of progress. The Government here has not moved forward as quickly as they desired because the United Kingdom Government must take the initiative, and the negotiations prior to the introduction of a Bill in the House have been interfered with by this power of veto. — (MR. ETHERIDGE): It is important to think not merely of the removal of these restrictions, but to couple with them the fact that there is every intention, as shown in both the Southern Rhodesian document and the Federal document, to replace those by safeguards. Here we come back to Sir Lionel Heald's point about psychology. Mr. Menzies called it a question of prestige. It is much more than that—the belief we have that once there is a feeling on the part both of Europeans and Africans that government is centred in this country, with safeguards built into the constitution, and there is no question of outside control, we shall be able to go ahead much more firmly and speedily. I do not think there is any need for the African people in the Federation to be disturbed if they appreciate that no safeguard is going to be removed from one side that will not be replaced in another form by some form of internal restriction.

Q. The Constitution you would like to see in Northern Rhodesia, which would be similar to that of 1923 here — do you expect something like parity in the legislature of Northern Rhodesia, or a majority of one race or the other? — A. (MR. CLARK): We want to see an entire legislative assembly consisting of elected members, elected by responsible people: we say nothing about race or colour.

MR. KATILUNGU: Much has been said about the Africans in the Northern Territories looking to the United Kingdom for protection. Is it your present intention that you would wish to see a constitutional move that would completely cut these Africans off from that? — A. (MR. PILLAY): I think there is too much stress here, both in the country and in the Federation, on Africans and Europeans. People are inclined to forget that there are other minority groups. We would like to see a stable government in this country, dominated neither by Europeans nor Africans, but one that will ensure that all races are satisfactorily living here.

Q. I appreciate that, but we are bound to mention Africans and Europeans because of the situation we are in. Why do you advocate complete independence for the Federation? Do you not realise it would be dangerous at this stage of political development to cut off completely, as a result of that independence, the protected people from a normal method of approach to their protectors? — A. (MR. CLARK): Our ultimate objective is the attainment by the Federation of full membership of the Commonwealth, which indicates an entire, or very large, removal from United Kingdom influence; but it is not our suggestion that there should be an immediate or total removal. The 1923-type Constitution for Southern Rhodesia had reservations and restrictions. We think that should apply to Northern Rhodesia. Though it is not ideal, it is even possible to consider a constitutional arrangement in which the Federation will be a full member of the Commonwealth, but with the United Kingdom retaining some interest in the two Northern Territories, and even, perhaps, some interest in the Federal Constitution. Canada is an example of a country where there is retention by the United Kingdom Government of some measure of interest in its Constitution. We understand for instance, in Canada that constitutional amendments do not lie entirely within the prerogative of the Government of Canada. We are not proposing the utter and immediate severance, but the first steps towards full membership of the Commonwealth will certainly be a diminution of Colonial Office influence in these Territories and the creation here of safeguards, operated by all the people here, in place of that.

CHAIRMAN: Is it not a question of timing to some extent? — A. Yes, we believe the timing should be fairly speedy.

Q. But you have not overlooked the words in the Preamble—"When the inhabitants so desire"? — A. No, Sir, we have not overlooked that.

MR. HABANYAMA: Surely you are asking the British Government to handle an impossible situation, in that you want them not to interfere or to talk about the northern Territories; yet at the same time you would ask for a Constitution in which they would have an interest? How could that be? — A. Just the same as it has had an interest in Southern Rhodesia since 1923.

Q. But surely it could interfere with it? — A. We are confident that it would never be necessary, just as it has never been necessary in Southern Rhodesia.

MR. CHIRWA: When you say the Federation should have dominion status within the Commonwealth and the control must be in the hands of the people here, are you envisaging a Federal Government which has to be a majority, with say, at present the twelve African members; or are you thinking of a Federal Government in which you will have an African majority? Also, what is the provision for Africans to participate in the Constitution of Southern Rhodesia?—A. Taking the first point, we have not approached this from the standpoint of race at all. We are hoping to achieve here a non-racial community, and so the Federal Parliament, as we see it, will be elected by those people who qualify for admission to the voters' roll. It is likely that in the immediate future the people on the roll will result in the election to the Federal Assembly on a majority of Europeans; but it is inevitable that the situation will change. As people qualify for the franchise, there is no doubt whatsoever that the day will come when the majority will not be Europeans; but that can take place with no constitutional change at all. The potential is already there. When we talk of safeguards for racial groups in Senates, or whatever they are called, the safeguards set up must be such as to safeguard the groups which are today the political minorities, but in future those minorities may become of different races. There is an almost inevitable change of emphasis; but our approach is on the ground not of race but of quality and merit.

Q. But do you seriously believe, if you are talking to people who have any sense at all, that they could trust you when in Southern Rhodesia during the last six years you have never admitted a single African into your own Parliament?—A. There is no question of trust about it at all. There it is. They can qualify for admission to the voters' roll. I believe the African people will progress to that state. I believe in their progress: I do not know whether Mr. Chirwa shares this view.

MR. KATILUNGU: The educational qualifications of Africans in this country are higher as compared with the two northern Territories. Another snag is the economic qualification, because the economic standard of living of the African generally is very low. Would you agree that it was time the Government reviewed the question of minimum wage structure of the people, which is under the control of the legislature? — A. Undoubtedly this touches a major problem. Material matters are all-important, though we tend to talk here of racial and constitutional matters. One of the enormous problems of the Federation is the general standard of poverty. The people of this country are poor: this is an undeveloped region. We desperately need development and the capital for it. That is one reason why we want a settled constitutional future. Equally we need a situation in which the African comes more and more into playing a proper role as an employee at proper rates of pay, and so on. I entirely agree with the questioner. It is not a thing which can just be done easily as all that by legislation, unfortunately, because it is not possible to say whether you shall employ so-and-so whether you want to or not; but the whole trend of legislation, certainly in Southern Rhodesia, is in that direction. The recent amendment to the industrial Conciliation Act was for that very purpose. Without wanting to go into details, some of which are at present under discussion, there is an attempt now on the Railways for a proper advance for the African people. I think there is every evidence of goodwill on the part of the United Federal Party Government to achieve the very thing Mr. Katilungu wants.

Q. My last question, in your memorandum section 1(a) —(h) much has been said in regard to what must and what must not be done in the Constitutional Review, 1960. I would like to ask this question. Was Federation not established in 1953 as a matter of going through an experiment, and subject to review in any form whatsoever after seven or ten years? — A. (MR. CLARK): No, Sir, there was no experiment about it and the several utterances of Mr. Oliver Lyttelton make it absolutely clear that it was not at that time. Federation was based on several things. It is an economic unit. It is also, it is hoped, a human entity. In no sense is it an experiment, a temporary expedient that had been entered into with any suggestion that it should be a temporary expedient.

MR. CHIRWA: When you say you would like to have dominion status would you agree that before you get that the Africans, at least the majority of the people must give their consent, or, on the other hand, you do not mind whether the Africans agree to it or not, would you seek their consent or not? In other words, would you respect the Preamble to the Constitution? — A. Mr. Chairman, of course, our immediate request is not for what used to be called dominion status. Our immediate request is for independence in the Federal sphere and there is a difference. I do agree that we are obliged to respect the requirements of the Constitution.

Q. Is not that what you call technical independence which in other words would mean exactly the same as dominion status apart from prestige? — A. No, Sir, because if for no other reason the two northern Territories would not yet be at the stage of development that would enable the Federation to go forward to full membership of the Commonwealth. — (MR. CURRIE): One further point, I am not quite certain whether Mr. Chirwa is aware of the fact from a remark he made earlier that there is a common voters' roll in Southern Rhodesia and regardless of the colour of one's skin, if one has the qualifications you are entitled to go on that voters' roll. I accept entirely the point that hitherto no African has a voice in the Southern Rhodesian Parliament because the fact is, as yet, there have not been sufficient numbers of Africans on the voters' roll. I think it is fair to say in the not too distant future we will welcome the African in the Southern Rhodesian Parliament. There is a common voters' roll.

Q. What about the 20% limit? — A. (MR. CLARK): No, there is a common voters' roll and you might be interested to know that it is quite a feasible possibility right now without any Constitutional changes that there could be Africans elected to the Southern Rhodesian Parliament as ordinary Members of Parliament.

SIR DONALD MACGILLIVRAY: Has the United Federal Party put forward an African candidate? — A. No, not in the Southern Rhodesian sphere and not as an ordinary Member of Parliament, but we do have African Members of Parliament of the United Federal Party in the Federal House, especially elected African members. — (MR. ETHERIDGE): On the other hand there is a point that it is not worthwhile putting forward a candidate to lose a seat. There comes a time when one expects to win that seat. I think that time is coming. — (MR. HOVE): I think the question from Mr. Chirwa about the doubts arising in his mind is because there has been no African elected to the Southern Rhodesian House, that is not the responsibility of the European or of the United Federal Party only. It is known that for many years there have been far more Africans qualified to exercise the vote who have never bothered to ask for it. That position still exists today. There is no doubt that because of the siting of African townships here in the past and in the present an African could be returned to the Southern Rhodesia House without any doubt even though there might be three, four or five candidates standing. You get the area of Salisbury, Highfields and so on, predominantly African. No Delimitation Commission could avoid making that a constituency, but the Africans have not bothered to ask for the vote. I may say that in this particular area I have referred to, prior to the 1958 election, a number of Africans got together and said "Let us get everybody who is qualified and who is able to get on the voters' roll", and in two or three months they raised as many as 300 or 400. If that process had been going on for a long time there is no doubt during the last election an African would have been returned to the Southern Rhodesian Parliament.

CHAIRMAN: The fact remains that out of 68, 239 who are on the Southern Rhodesia roll, 64,453 are European. — A. What I am saying, Mr. Chairman, it is no use laying the blame on the doorstep of the European, the African is just as responsible for that state of affairs.

MR. KATILUNGU: We do understand perhaps up to a point that Africans have not come forward, those who have qualified who, in fact are very few. We do understand that in the northern Territories those people do not come forward because of their resentment against the constitution of the franchise. Would you tell us in your experience as an African Member of Parliament what is the main reason in Southern Rhodesia why Africans do not come forward regardless of being on the common voters' roll? — A. I think the answer is quite simple. Whilst it is true that there are many Africans who should be on the roll who are not there, this is not peculiar to them, there are many Europeans in this town and everywhere who are not on the voters' roll. In fact, I have been astounded to find the standing in the European society of some of those people not on the roll, but with the African you have an added reason that the election of Members of Parliament is not generally in his mind related to his welfare. That situation has changed now.

Q. Exactly. — A. I have no doubt myself that with the greater availability of education, which is not necessarily school education only, there will be very many more Africans on the voters' roll but the thing is the African has not been interested in civics. He has not related his 'pin pricks' to election of Members of Parliament. — (MR. CLARK): May I observe on this subject what is perhaps of interest, that is that in the Territories in which there was self-government here there has been a common voters' roll. In Northern Rhodesia up to the time of Federation there was a Colonial Office administered Territory. In fact, the African was excluded from the voters' roll. He was excluded because the qualifications provided that the only persons who could have access to the roll were British subjects and all the Africans were British protected persons. It is true they could apply to be British subjects under a certain formality and part of the formality was the payment of £5 and that was an effective deterrent. It was Federation that did away with that sort of thing and opened the voters' roll.

SIR DONALD MACGILLIVRAY: There are two common voters' rolls, the ordinary and the lower? — A. Correct.

Q. We have been told by Africans that the reason why many Africans have not registered is because they qualify only for the lower roll and they do not want to be on the second class roll. — A. (MR. HOVE): Yes, Sir, but surely that can be regarded as partly a good reason and partly as a mere excuse. If that is the reason today what was the reason for his not registering for the vote prior to 1958 when these two rolls became law? He has always had the right to vote in Southern Rhodesia and yet he did not come forward.

Q. You do not think this is a true reason? — A. It is an excuse. — (MR. CURRIE): I think I should make the point too that the same applies to the European, the Asiatic and the coloured person who equally does or does not go on the lower roll if his qualifications take him. It is not a thing that is confined to the Africans.

CHAIRMAN: You would agree with me in this that the distinction between the incomes of the African and the European is at least one element causing the roll to contain so many Europeans? — A. Yes, without any shadow of doubt that is so. — (MR. CLARKE): Do you want justification for it, Sir? We have explained why we believe that the vote should be retained in the hands of persons capable of exercising it. The next step is to find a method of determining that: a great many alternatives were thought of. It was suggested, for instance, that there should be an examining board. What we want to do roughly, as we all know, is to keep the vote in the hands of people who can exercise that discretion, public spirit and so on. But there are grave disadvantages with an examining board. I am not speaking with any authority about what happens in the Southern States of the United States of America; but common talk has it that where there is an examining board there they asked the candidate questions which, if he is a white man, will get him on, which if he is a negro will keep him off. There are those disadvantages. Whatever kind of approach there is some disadvantage. We do not suggest that our qualifications are ideal; but we finally adopted a thing which is absolutely automatic and therefore not subject to political manoeuvre. That was one point. The second point is as an automatic judgment of what a man has achieved in life you can find if you make a happy amalgamation of where he has got in his schooling and where he has got in his attainments in life, and the rough measure of where he has got in his life is the salary which he earns. It is not ideal, we do not suggest it is, but it does obviate some other disadvantages, and it does form something of a means of adjustment and it will remain such, and there will be greater and greater advantage to the indigenous people as they make progress.

HIS GRACE, THE ARCHBISHOP OF CENTRAL AFRICA
THE MOST REVEREND W. J. HUGHES

CHAIRMAN: You were good enough to write to me earlier on in our deliberations in February sending me a copy of a letter you had sent to Mr. Macmillan. He has also given me a copy and some of us have seen that letter and your chart of Thursday, 9th April last year which accompanied it. First of all, would you tell us how long you have been in Central Africa? — A. I have only been Archbishop for 3 years. I have been here seven years.

Q. You are also Bishop of the Diocese? — A. Yes, Matabeleland.

Q. Then you had experience, had you not, in the West Indies where Federation is also under way? — A. Yes, I was in some of the early discussions when Federation was being mooted there.

Q. You make in your letter to me two points which I would be grateful if you would make again to my colleagues. The first was in relation to what you said we ought to consider, what was said and done in 1953 as to the protected status of Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia and to be satisfied that the normal aspirations of self-government which existed under protectorate management were in no way impaired by the Federal Constitution. Would you develop that? — A. May I say first of all I am not a politician nor am I an economist and I do not really know that I have anything specially useful to contribute. But I do go about a great deal and come into contact with large numbers of people and the impression I got both in Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia after two or three quite fairish visits—three weeks, a month, and so on—was that rightly or wrongly they were under the impression that with the advent of Federation their normal aspirations would somehow just go by the board. It is a very real fear. The Prime Minister acknowledged the letter that I sent to him, and made it perfectly plain that that was not so, but what bothers me is that once ideas of this kind get in the mind of the people it is difficult to get them out. That was the first thing. I found it very strong and I did mention the point that I assumed that when the Federal Constitution was framed in 1953 all this was taken into account.

Q. Then you said you had a second and much more serious ground of objection—that Federation in the north, particularly Nyasaland, had a real fear that discriminatory legislation existing in Southern Rhodesia will by some means become applicable to Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland in due course. — A. My impression there is that that is much more deep seated than the other one. I think they are wrong unless there is any idea of making a unitary state, which I do not think is entertained for a moment.

Q. You did in the course of your letter draw attention to a number of pieces of what you regarded as discriminatory legislation. What had you in mind—the Land Apportionment Act? — A. Yes, that is only one.

Q. Is there anything you would like to say about that? — A. When I got here in 1953, having spent 20 years in the West Indies, the whole approach seemed to me to be so different and I could see no reason for it. As you know, in the West Indies it is not a question of only two races. Initially they start with six, and during the whole time I was there there was never, as far as I recollect, any legislation which was particularly applicable to a special group. The various component parts of the population were regarded as belonging to one community, and all the legislation applied to everybody alike. The one exception goes back to about 1902 when compulsory education was first introduced. It was in British Guiana, where I worked for 13 years. There was a large Indian population and they asked that the education legislation should not be applied to their girls. The Governor of the Colony, then Sir Frank Swettenham, issued a circular, which was known at the time as the Swettenham circular, which suspended the application of that piece of legislation to Indian girls. Oddly enough I was on a Commission in 1932 when the Indians themselves came and asked that that circular should be repealed, but that is the only thing that I can recall where something was done specifically only to one particular group.

The impression I get here is that there is certain legislation which seems to be more applicable to Africans than anybody else. We have a Native Education Department, Native Affairs Department and Native this and that, and to me that throws one section of the community into relief and assumes there is no other problem in relation to the other three. There is a native problem, so it is implied there is not an Indian one, there is not a coloured one, there is not a European one. I would say in fact the real problem is the European one.

Q. Would you develop that? — A. I think the root of all the trouble is fear, and that is very difficult to cope with. There is this tremendous fear that the European population and the coloured population and the Asian population will be swamped. There is fear on the other side that any chance of normal development or a proper share in the life of the community is going to be denied them and I think those fears are real.

Q. In the course of your letter you set out not only one but a great number of Acts which you know about here which in your view are discriminatory against the Africans? — A. Yes, I think so.

Q. You, of course, have experience of their reactions? — A. In my view it is much more marked in the townships than in the reserves. I go into the reserves a lot, we have large missions all over the place, and I am bound to say that in the whole seven years there, talking to people, I heard hardly anything said about Federation or Acts or anything at all. But a lot is said in the townships.

Q. Have you been conscious of any improvement over the last seven years in the discrimination? — A. Yes, I should say in the last eighteen months.

Q. What are the elements of discrimination of which you are most conscious now? — A. I think it is having to carry some sort of identification. I think that is the main one. If we all had to have an identification card it would not lead to bother.

CHAIRMAN: I am sure my colleagues would like to ask you some questions.

MR. WOODROW CROSS: In regard to the identification card regarded as being the greatest discrimination, in the Northern Territories it was not mentioned, as far as I can remember. Discrimination took more the form of allowing Africans into hotels and restaurants and railway train dining cars, that seemed to be more the problem there. The only difference I can see in the identity certificate is that—I am speaking of Northern Rhodesia—you have the name, village and so on, to identify the African concerned. You have on the inside an employment register, just stating period of employment, date of engagement, signature and date discharged. There is no mention of wages in it. In Southern Rhodesia that seems to be the only difference I can see, that wages are put in, to which people here object. They objected in Northern Rhodesia, but it was taken out and seemed a very simple thing to meet the wishes of the people. — A. I do not know that it is the mention of wages so much as the fact that because they belong to a particular group they must carry these things. Whereas the European can go about and does not have them. I think that is the fundamental thing.

MR. MENZIES: Would Your Grace indicate why the improvement you refer to has come about in the last eighteen months, and in what directions has it come? — A. I think myself that when the State of Emergency was declared it caused a tremendous shock. It certainly caused a shock here in Southern Rhodesia. For example, down in the big township no one had the slightest suspicion that anything was afoot and on the day after the Emergency was declared I was down there. The whole place was stunned. For instance, on Saturday afternoons you find men milling about in hundreds but they all seemed to be indoors. They were very shocked. I think that was true also in the minds of a good many European people. Certainly I got the shock of my life. But I did notice a very marked change in the shops. It is very difficult to pinpoint it, but I do myself feel that the atmosphere has changed.

Q. You feel on the European side the mood has become more liberal? — A. Yes.

Q. Has there been anything done to indicate that? — A. Notices have come down in post offices and on railway trains but let me say here that that had nothing whatever to do with the Emergency. I had a long conversation with the Prime Minister in January last year before the trouble started, and he told me that he intended removing these notices in post offices and in railway trains and he intended appointing Mr. Savanhu a junior minister. He proposed to do it when he had the results of the election in Northern Rhodesia. He finished the conversation by reminding me that a politician had to win an election. After the Emergency occurred, the feeling was that these things happened because of the trouble. It was a colossal blunder in timing. It is very difficult to pinpoint but I do believe there has been a change. I would go further. I am quite sure that there is a real and genuine abundance of goodwill and fair-mindedness in Southern Rhodesia. I am quite certain of that. I shall be very surprised indeed if good, sound, commonsense did not prevail. I am not a pessimist, far from it. I think on both wings you get a completely ex parte approach.

MR. CRAWLEY: Might I return to the pass laws and ask whether there is any good practical reason why passes should be carried? — A. I do not know. That is a thing I have never been able to discover. Trying to go back to the time of the occupation I suppose it was absolutely essential to try and have some means of identification, and I dare say while we have this system of migrant labour there must still be some need. But the thing that rather bothers me is that there seems to be an enormous reluctance to do anything about it. I know it has changed since I came here, but some of my clergy from time to time were stopped and asked for their passes. I do not see why they should be, but it is that sort of thing that causes ill-feeling.

Q. Do you find that the Africans here are generally in favour of Federation, or is there strong opposition? — A. I do not know at all. My own guess would be that compared with Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland the discussion here is almost negligible. I have got the impression that in Southern Rhodesia—Southern Rhodesian members will be able to correct me—since Federation came that the change has been so little except perhaps with regard to elections or something of that kind, that I think, by and large, nobody bothered very much about it.

SIR DONALD MACGILLIVRAY: In the list of legislative Acts which you cited in your letter as discriminatory measures you included the Native Land Husbandry Act. — A. I only included that because that is the impression the Africans have got. I am bound to say I am not so sure myself whether that is discriminatory; I should have thought it was much more protective, to prevent erosion and an endeavour to do good. Where I think the trouble may arise is in the application of it, because I do know it is a ground of very serious criticism on the part of Africans.

Q. Although it was designed specifically in their interests? — A. There is a good deal more behind that. Most of the land was over-stocked and there was a tremendous amount of difficulty created when they began to de-stock under Government powers. I do not know how long it has taken, but it has taken a long time to get into the minds of Africans that although they have fewer cattle numerically they now have better cattle than they had before. It is that kind of difficulty, as far as I can see, that any piece of legislation that deals with land or agriculture is at once viewed with suspicion.

MR. ROBINSON: Your Grace, we have heard from members of your church in Nyasaland that, in view of the expressed opposition by large numbers of Africans there to Federation, the doctrine of consent as far as the large mass of the people are concerned should apply. Do you feel with your responsibilities in that country that we should be guided by those numbers? Do you think there are sufficient people in Nyasaland who fully understand the implications of secession or of remaining in the Federation? What is your view of that with your experience? — A. As a principle, I do not believe you can ever retain people against their will. I think that is the principle, but I think it has to be an informed will, and I doubt whether it is. Personally I should be very sorry to see Federation going out. I am not an economist, but as I said I cannot myself see how on the economic side alone Nyasaland would be able to stand on its own feet without very heavy subsidy from someone. I should have thought it very much better it should be done here than that they should all the time have to go outside. I think it is a much more respectable thing to pay your own way from your own produce than to live on the dole from somebody else. The point you make is not a particularly easy one to answer.

MR. ELLMAN BROWN: Your Grace, would you say in Southern Rhodesia particularly that the development towards a more liberal attitude of all the races is moving fast enough? — A. I do not think it is. But there again that is another delicate subject. Quite frankly, I do not think it is, but on the other hand I am quite certain you cannot gallop.

Q. Would you recommend that we should bring in legislation against some of these discriminatory laws, particularly the colour bar, or would you feel that evolution would be the better way? — A. I can only take the line that we take in Church. We say definitely that every Church is open to everybody. We have no legislation of that kind. Indeed, in principle, we could not. What I am so afraid is that if you begin to legislate you throw the thing into relief and you raise hornet's nests. I should much prefer we should try and get at the fundamental common sense of people. I am sure legislation to say, for example, that every hotel is to be open to everybody would not work. You will always get the proprietors who say, "I have to reserve the right of admission no matter who it is". What is the legislation going to do? Is it going to take that away from him? Is it really wise to say by law we are going to make it impossible for you to exclude an Asiatic or a coloured person or an African. You may find you have to exclude him for some reason or other. I should hesitate myself about trying to legislate.

Q. Following on that, I gather that any suggestion of a Bill of Rights will really give no fundamental improvement in the attitude in trying to eliminate that fear? — A. I am not so sure. What I think is not made sufficiently plain is that it must be recognised that there are certain things which really should belong to human beings because they are human beings. Whether you are going to get that over in a Bill of Rights, I do not know. I came across a lady the other day very het up because she was paying her cook £10 a month. I told her she would not get one for £10 a month in England. She said she had not thought of that.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: Your Grace, a number of Africans have told us that when Federation came in they were told that there was to be such a thing as partnership. They found the word very difficult to understand, but when they made some enquiries about it it seemed to be a very attractive statement. They tell us that they do not think it has, in fact, come about. Have you heard that point of view? — A. I have, yes, because nobody has ever been able to say what is meant by partnership. I think it is a most stupid word, it has done more harm than good.

Q. Would you agree it follows from that that what you would like to see would be some practical measures taken to produce the reality of the thing rather than the word? — A. What I would like to see myself is all the people in the Federation regarded as one community, admittedly at different levels of development (which you get in any country, anyhow) and legislation which tried to put that right. I should like to see an end of the Native Affairs Department, an end of the Native Education Department, and instead of the Native Affairs Department develop some really sound, sensible local government. It means that in the reserves your population would be roughly a hundred per cent. African. It does not matter, it is part of the population. Why single it out to have a particular department looking after this and that particular group of people?

When I had been here eleven months I made a speech at a school. Federation had just come. I said now that Federation has come is it not time that we begin to think of all the people within the Federation as composing one community, at different levels of development admittedly, but nevertheless one community, and that the legislation applies to them as a community. This would mean certain things. It would mean the end of a Native Affairs Department and a Native Education Department. So long as that remained, one section is thrown into relief and it is assumed there is nothing of any importance concerning the other three. The one that is thrown into relief is always referred to as either "the native question" or "the native problem", which I think is a scandalous piece of terminology. You then make three assumptions. There is not an Asiatic problem, a coloured problem, or a European problem. Every one of those assumptions I challenge. In my view, the needs and potential of the coloured community here are out of all proportion to its numbers. I do not think it gets anything like the attention which it ought to get, and it will not if you are going to deal with the whole thing in a series of groups. Then I went on to illustrate what I meant by referring to the West Indies, where I had worked for twenty years, and that we had these different races, but never at any time was there an Indian Department, an African Department, a Chinese Department, a Portuguese Department. (I wish there had been a Portuguese Department because they really did want fixing. In the classification of population they were not even nominated as Europeans—it said "Europeans excluding Portuguese".) There was nothing of this kind, and it really has paid good dividends. The only snag was that initially in the West Indies the relations between the white and black folk started off as a slave relationship, owner and slave. Here it was something quite different; it was the result of conquest. But there is not much doubt in my mind that in the early years out here the people who came from West Africa were just as raw as the Africans in the bush who had known nothing but the bush for centuries.

MR. KATILUNGU: Your Grace, I would like to know what is your opinion regarding the expressed views by the Africans of the Northern Territories in regard to the association of Southern Rhodesia with the policy of discrimination that many of the policies applying in Southern Rhodesia will be extended to Northern Rhodesia. Whether these fears are unfounded or are based on gained experience and practical knowledge? — A. I cannot understand how they have got that notion. So long as the Territorial Governments govern, the Federal Government is prohibited from this sort of thing. For instance the legislation here in Southern Rhodesia, as far as I can see, could not by an Act of the Federal Government be made applicable to Northern Rhodesia or Nyasaland. But how you are going to get this fear out of their minds I do not know. I am just as puzzled as you are. I believe that fundamentally the thing is groundless, but I do not know how you are going to get it out of the minds of the people except by making an end to that kind of legislation in Southern Rhodesia.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: If the people in the Northern Territories hear people say that they want to have the independent powers of the Northern Territorial Governments removed, then that might be rather a different thing? — A. Oh, yes.

Q. And sometimes such statements have appeared in the Press and elsewhere. — A. That is so. But one point I tried to stress from time to time is that, if you are going to have a federation at all, then the constituent states must have their own powers. You federate, you do not set up a unitary government.

Q. Would it be unfair to say that very little attempt has been made to get that across? — A. You put your finger on the spot. One of my complaints is that I do think there has been a change lately. But by and large the members of Parliament, as far as I can see, have done little or nothing to get amongst the African and help the African to find his political feet.

LORD CRATHORNE: Do you find that, where the problem of Federation has been considered by the thinking Africans, very often they really look upon it as amalgamation, and that amalgamation brings in all other questions? Have you any advice you could give us as to how we could get that wrong interpretation of Federation removed from their minds? — A. I just do not know.

Q. It is definitely there? — A. I think there is a confusion even with some of the better informed Africans that Federation means amalgamation and means the loss of identity.

Q. That brings us on to Union, and Union brings us to South Africa; that is a real fear? — A. That is what I think.

MR. CHIRWA: I think you have said that you have been to Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland and then you had brief contacts with Africans; could you say that it is possible to retain Nyasaland within the Federation without causing much disturbance in that country? — A. That is not a question I could answer at all. On the face of it I think it is doubtful. But that, I think, depends on gentlemen like yourself.

Q. The leaders in Nyasaland have expressed their view quite clearly that they are not going to have Federation. Dr. Banda says if Federation goes on he would rather go to jail again. Certainly that is sufficient expression of opinion, is it not? — A. We have heard plenty of people speak like that in the past.

Q. But in the past it led to disturbances? — A. Of course.

Q. Do you not think that the motive of the Europeans in Southern Rhodesia is not really the Federation, but to dominate the Northern Territories? — A. I should say definitely no.

Q. Would you explain the reason why then, if the answer is no to that question, the Federal Prime Minister has insisted on getting dominion status? — A. Has he insisted?

Q. He did insist in the past, and in the paper this morning Mr. Julian Greenfield says there must be constitutional advance to get independence in those functions which are Federal which means the same thing as dominion status in another way. — A. I cannot see that dominion status would necessarily mean domination. Australia for example, or Canada, they are dominions, and there are states within the dominions. But I should be very surprised to hear an Australian say that the Federal Government of Australia dominates the Government of New South Wales or Victoria.

MR. MENZIES: If I am invited to reply I could say that as a consequence there is a constant source of conflict between the two. Whenever there is an invasion of state rights, the Commonwealth Parliament knows all about it. — A. There will be here. Unless I misunderstand Mr. Chirwa he says he thinks that the whole object of one day having a dominion here is that it can then dominate, it being dominated by Southern Rhodesia. But surely the Federal Parliament, if it is a proper Parliament, is a Federal Parliament; it is not Southern Rhodesian.

MR. CHIRWA: Perhaps I have over-simplified my question. — A. Not at all. I think you have shown to me what is in the mind of a good many Africans—that Federation to them means Southern Rhodesia. It does not mean anything of the sort.

Q. But is it not the fact that Southern Rhodesia has more members in the Federal Parliament and that it is Southern Rhodesia which does influence that Parliament and therefore that means domination of that country over the others? — A. That is true, you can argue that way if you like. The only way to deal with the situation is to see that the representation in the Federal Parliament is a fair representation relative to the populations of the constituent places.

MR. KATILUNGU: But would you be surprised to learn that even amongst Europeans the same opinions are held that the Federation means domination by Southern Rhodesia? — A. I am not surprised; I know it to be so. I have heard some of the less informed and wild Europeans, as I call them, say to me quite openly, "We want dominion status and when we have got it then we will do as we like". But I regard that as a very, very small fraction of people not worth bothering about.

Q. But is it necessary that such kind of opinion should prevail at this moment when the constitutional developments are being examined? — A. It should not. I do not think it does prevail. Is it not true that when you get this sort of situation, people who have got an intense idea one way or the other always tend to be much more vocal than anybody else.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: And the newspapers report them more than anybody else.

SIR VICTOR ROBINSON: I should just like to revert to the past. You mentioned the certificate of identity. But, of course, we know that there are four or five other passes, depending on whether a native is working or living in an area, he has to carry. You cannot live in a native township or location without some document from the superintendent of the location, that is right, is it not? — A. Yes.

Q. If you abolish that pass, might that not lead to an influx of Africans into the townships which would result in over-crowding, general nuisance? — A. They are getting an influx in spite of it. One of the acute problems is the whole question of education. A much more solid attempt is being made now to increase facilities beyond Standard III, but at the moment, in Southern Rhodesia as a whole, there are very few spots where a school goes up to Standard VI. They try all sorts of devices to get children to Bulawayo, Gwelo, all places where there is Standard VI and the overflow is accentuated very largely by children coming in in order to go to school.

Q. You have discussed matters with the Prime Minister? — A. Yes.

Q. That was, of course, Sir Roy Welensky? — A. Yes.

Q. I suppose you have also spoken to Sir Edgar Whitehead? — A. I have tried to. He is the mystery man of the piece. If you can get at him you will achieve something.

Q. You have never had an opportunity of discussing the necessity for the policy? — A. No. I think there is something much more fundamental. I noticed the other day a circular from the Native Education Office. They are getting very bothered about the age of children in school, and they will continue to be bothered until they introduce compulsory registration of births. Why you have not got it, I do not know. A boy comes along and you ask how old he is, and he says, "fourteen". He almost has a beard. You have no real means of checking the age. Even on the situpas I think the whole thing is very largely chaotic. While you have this constant industrialisation, constant demand for labour, you are going to have an influx. I would like to add on that point that the sooner it is possible for Africans in the townships to have freehold the better it is going to be. They own a house, but they can only lease the land.

MR. CRAWLEY: May I return to the hotels question. Is it not possible that it would be a good thing that hotel managers should have to justify an exclusion or be liable to be sued? — A. You really come back to the same point, I would be rather inclined to agree with you, but I do not quite see how you are going to do it.

Q. If there was a law and if they exclude someone unjustly they could be sued. — A. It would be a lovely time for the lawyers.

MR. JUSTICE BEADLE: Have you any views on the present franchise qualifications for either the Territorial or the Federal Assemblies? — A. I do not know. I do not know whether I have really given much thought to that at all. I am very dubious myself whether one man, one vote all over the world is the panacea. I suppose it has come to a point where it is quite impossible ever to go back, but I have a sneaking regard for the old Greek conception of the aristocracy of the intellect. Whatever standard you have I think it has to be applicable all round. What I think is not appreciated, certainly amongst some of the Africans, is that what we call a democratic system is quite the most difficult system to run because it does demand some real sense of responsibility on the part of the individual. I should be inclined offhand to leave the franchise qualifications as they are for the time being, but really push on with some educational advance.

MR. CHIRWA: May we get some views about multi-racial schools, whether the Church would support such a move? — A. I have got a girls' school in Bulawayo which has already admitted some Chinese, and is admitting an Indian girl this term. We have no regulation except that every application will be considered on its merit, namely the background of the child, the ability of the child to profit by the education given, and so on. I have got a meeting in a few minutes with the Rusape School Board which takes Peterhouse and so on. We have the same rule there. The only thing I would say is that you cannot force it, because you have another factor to consider. That is that children very often can be absolute beasts. We have to consider the particular child who comes in, boy or girl. In the West Indies, for example, in the schools there you find everybody. But it has taken a long time.

CHAIRMAN: Your Grace, we are extremely grateful to you for coming and seeing us this morning and helping us with your views. — A. Thank you.

Addendum to Oral Evidence

HIS GRACE THE ARCHBISHOP OF CENTRAL AFRICA

You very kindly said that you would permit me to write to you again in amplification of certain points which arose from my visit to the Commission.

I am grateful for the opportunity you have given to me, and there are two matters in particular, on which I would like to say something more.

1. Mr. Justice Beadle, you may remember, asked me had I any views on the question of the franchise, and in reply to that said that it was a subject to which I had given very little thought. That is true, odd as it may seem, but I believe there is a prior question, which if not dealt with soundly, will only make all questions of franchise seem "off beam", if not useless. I think it needs to be brought home to most people here that the whole Democratic system is quite the most difficult system of government to run, simply because it demands so high a sense of personal responsibility on the part of every member of the state. "Personal responsibility" does not just drop into human laps, it needs to be cultivated, and implies a good understanding of the claim which the individual makes upon society, and also of the claim which society makes upon him. In my view, therefore, much more serious attention must be paid to the question of African education, if the franchise question is ever to be satisfactorily settled. This does not mean that nothing can be done about the franchise until the education question has been disposed of. Rather, I am concerned to emphasise that to try to deal with the one without dealing with the other, will only increase confusion. At present, so far as

I know, the franchise qualifications are somewhat complicated, and perhaps the best immediate step would be to try to simplify them. The education question is of the utmost importance. In Southern Rhodesia, the Government is doing its best, I have no doubt, but I get the impression that instead of working for a sound and long term policy, its first and constant question is, How much can we afford? The result is that the present effort is designed to get as many African children as possible through school up to Standard III. The number of schools which go beyond that standard are far too few, with a resultant scramble for places: a scramble which intensifies the overcrowding problem in the townships. There is no compulsory education act, and all planning seems to me to be doomed to failure from the first, since there is no compulsory registration of African births. How can any Government plan the probable cost of education when it has no real knowledge of what the school intake is likely to be in any one year? I am not therefore surprised that its financial provisions are largely a question of hit and miss! I have a very real fear that unless the whole question of African education is taken in hand, the Government will find that it has, not an illiterate community, but an ignorant community on its hands which will always be a potential source of danger. Having begun a process of educating the African, it cannot stop now, and ought to press on with a well thought out scheme. Further, the longer it is delayed the more certain will it be that, all unwittingly no doubt, the Government will find that it has been pursuing a policy of "Bantu education", little different from that which obtains in the Union of South Africa under the recent legislation there. I believe that all this bears a very close relation to the franchise question, and it seems to me that the vital question for the Commission is how to deal with franchise among a community so poorly educated. Without knowing all the details, I would venture the suggestion that perhaps the best way is to make the present provisions as simple as possible, leave them as they are for a fixed period of years—though not too long—and deal with the educational problem. Does this sound fantastic? Or is it a fact that things have gone too far and too fast to apply anything which may be construed as a brake? I don't know.

2. One member of the Commission, whose name I cannot recall, asked me a question bearing on the principle of Government by consent. As a principle I accept it without reservation, for I am sure that in the long run a Government which does not so rest, is doomed to end. I think, for example, that the South African Government is fast reaching that position. But there is the question "what is meant by consent"? It is an important question. I suspect that in Nyasaland there is a "consensus" rather than a "consent" against Federation, which is not based on anything like adequate knowledge of what is involved. There are reasons for that state of affairs, and not least the really bad way in which the whole thing was handled at the start. I would say, and I think pretty confidently, that the consent needed is an "informed consent", and here my criticism of the politicians here is reinforced. They have lost seven years, during which they might have done untold good, had they got in among the Africans and lent a hand to enable him to find his political feet, and to sort out both fears and prejudices. They have done nothing of this, with the result that in Nyasaland we are up against an opposition the mass of which seems to me to be without any real "clue" what it is all about. I am not at all sure whether it is just here that the Commission runs up against one of its most difficult problems, i.e. how is Nyasaland to be brought back on to the right "beam", so that there can be some sensible discussion of the pros and cons of a Federal Constitution? In a less degree the same thing applies here in Southern Rhodesia. Bearing on what I have said, and about which I feel strongly, i.e. the failure of the local politicians to do anything to educate the Africans, it might be worth while making some enquiries whether it was a fact that political parties here had a private arrangement whereby they would not "go after" African support. If that is so, it reveals in startling clearness their total lack of political sense.

I am sorry to add to your labours, or by writing so much give a further handle to "Parkinson's Law" that paper breeds paper, but I do think that the matter of education in relation to the franchise is one of first importance, and also that it ought to be brought home to the Europeans that if the Africans refuse to "consent" to Federation it is largely because they are activated by fear, which the Europeans have done nothing to remove.

Oral Evidence
REV. M. WILLIAMS

The witness had spent fourteen years in Southern Rhodesia

(Matabeleland). For six years he was Minister at the David Livingstone Memorial Mission at Ntabasinduna. For eight years he was the European Presbyterian Minister in Bulawayo—the Presbyterian Church of South Africa, a multi-racial Church.

The Rev. M. Williams invited questions and in reply made the following points.

(1) He was in favour of Federation and of the very wonderful idea of partnership which went with it. He considered that the idea of partnership had been implemented to a large extent since 1953.

(2) His own congregation was on the whole pretty liberal. They understood Federation and partnership and what they involved. There were, of course, some extremists, some anti-African and some pro-African.

(3) There was also an African church in the Bulawayo location. But whenever an African came to his own Church he was warmly welcomed. Africans frequently came to funerals, baptisms, weddings and for special services. The Africans in the town ran their own Church for preference, and held their services in the vernacular. He himself did the European work in Bulawayo, but he often took services in the African Church.

(4) He considered that race relations had improved considerably during his period in Southern Rhodesia. There had been very great changes, and in particular a vast improvement in the education of Africans.

(5) He considered that the franchise qualifications should be made easier, and that increased numbers should be brought on to the rolls, both Federal and Territorial; but he admitted that he had not studied the details of the franchises.

(6) As to the colour bar, on the African viewpoint things had not moved fast enough, but on the other hand many Europeans thought they had moved too fast. He himself thought that things were moving along in a natural way. Africans were now asked to municipal receptions, received at Government House, and also received private invitations. Relaxations had been implemented in the Post Offices and in the Banks.

(7) He knew of the attitude of the Africans in the north to the Southern Rhodesian restrictive practices; but he thought that that attitude might be exaggerated. When he had first come to Southern Rhodesia a number of things had offended him as a Christian Minister, but now he had found things had improved and were certainly going the right way. There was the problem case of extremists on both sides. There were for example some pretty hopeless Europeans. Many of them came from the Union of South Africa, a low type of Afrikaner. Others had come from some poorer areas in the West, including Scotland. He thought that the attitude of these people was due to desire for self-protection. They had no idea of how to behave. On the other hand there were also extremist Africans. But generally, from his own experience; he would say that the Africans were very happy in Southern Rhodesia. He himself had spent eight happy years working in Bulawayo, with much co-operation. The Africans certainly appreciated that what was done was done for them, and that the missionaries were not merely the tools of the white people.

(8) The main reason for not having a single Church for Europeans and Africans in Bulawayo was the language problem, also to a great extent the accommodation problem. But the form of service and the form of Church government was identical; and at the higher levels of Church government, there were African and European Commissioners at the Presbyterians' General Assembly and so on, all on the same level. He personally would agree to a single Church in Bulawayo if the language difficulty could be overcome.

(9) The past law of the Land Apportionment Act did not cause special difficulties in respect of Church going and mutual visits. Fortunately the enforcement of these rules was not too strict. They did not constitute a major problem at the present time. But if the practices of the Union of South Africa were followed, in respect of these laws, it could lead to trouble. At present there was no difficulty, and he and his wife also found themselves able in perfect safety and freedom to visit the location. But he agreed technically that everyone was breaking the law.

(10) He would agree that legislation might help to quicken the pace of the removal of discrimination. But he did not consider legislation to be the real answer. What had happened had been a natural process of evolution, and he believed that things would continue to evolve in the right direction. Europeans generally, above the artisan class, now had liberal views. But European artisans were a problem, wherever they came from.

(11) He would not support Federation without partnership, and thought that the two were indubitably linked together. If partnership failed the Federation also failed. That did not mean to say that he thought there were not great advantages from the technical and cultural view in Federation provided that partnership were carried out.

(12) The Africans found it convenient to have their own Church in the location. They had their own African Minister. He certainly got less salary than an equivalent European but he got an adequate stipend and a free manse.

(13) He reiterated his belief in the evolution processes, and in the fact that Europeans were now adjusting themselves to the emerging Africans. When a man became educated and on the same cultural level the colour of his skin became a secondary consideration.

Memorandum

RHODESIAN ACADEMY OF MUSIC

A. R. Sibson—Chairman.

African and European Musical Culture in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland

As a result of the emergence of Africa from its long isolation from the rest of the world and of the growing impact of Western Civilization on the indigenous inhabitants of this continent, a considerable body of enlightened opinion is concerning itself with efforts to ensure that the worthwhile elements of African culture are not submerged in a flood of "culture", manufactured — often for purely commercial reasons — in other parts of the world.

In those countries of Africa where the white man, if present at all, is a temporary resident, there is much to be said for encouraging Africans to develop their music along purely indigenous lines, avoiding, as far as possible, any external influences that might be foreign to a society of their own making.

In countries like the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland and, particularly, in Southern Rhodesia, the permanent presence of a large white population makes it virtually impossible to keep the cultures in water-tight compartments and efforts to do so are likely to be doomed to failure. Indeed, it is questionable whether such efforts should be made, even if there was any hope of success, since the whole motive underlying the enormous political and sociological experiment which is beginning to gain momentum in the Federation, is one that visualises rapprochement between the races rather than the maintenance of rigid separation.

On the other hand, if the situation is left to solve itself, it seems inevitable that the poorer and simpler elements of Western music will gain the upper hand in the minds of Africans, since the serious pursuit of music-study is regarded as an expensive luxury even amongst Europeans, and it is unlikely that Africans, for many years to come, will be in an economic position to contemplate such study on their own initiative.

We believe that there is much that is fundamentally worthwhile in African indigenous music and that the study and practice of its particular idiom will open new avenues to European exponents and audiences. We believe, also, that there is much that is fundamentally worthwhile in Western music which will open new avenues for Africans and there is no more likely place in the world than the Federation for a truly new and significant art form to arise, deriving its inspiration from two diverse cultures and, at the same time, serving to provide another bridge between peoples whose experiment of living together is one of the most far-reaching and vital adventures of the present century.

In nearly all the branches of knowledge which have contributed to the building up of Western Civilisation, the African peoples are at the receiving end of the educational process and it would not be surprising if psychic tensions in both races resulted from this situation. In the art of music, however, Africans have something vital and original to contribute to the common pool, and the opportunity of doing so may well provide the substance for a lasting mutual respect and give Africans a greater confidence in their own inherent qualities.

The Rhodesian Academy of Music, in launching the project based on the foregoing considerations, is deeply conscious of the dimensions of the task. By itself, without financial backing and the advice and assistance of knowledgeable people who have made a special study of African music and without the support of Africans themselves, it will be able to achieve very little, but we have every reason to believe that all these will be forthcoming.

The purpose of this Memorandum is to acquaint those interested with the Scheme and seek such financial assistance for its achievement as they may be able to give, or such comments and criticisms that they may be able to offer, which will help to ensure that the work is carried out in the soundest possible manner.

Two appendices are attached, which elaborate respectively the main principles and a suggested programme of activity.

The work would begin initially in the Bulawayo African Townships, where negotiations are afoot for the necessary facilities. It is hoped that it will soon be possible for an advance to be made on a much wider front but there is much to be said for concentrating effort at the outset until experience has been gained which will stand in good stead for the future.

Appendix (I) The Approach to Music in the Federation.

Appendix (II) Draft programme for the development of Music in the Federation.

The Approach to Music in the Federation

The future of Music in Rhodesia poses the following questions, in respect of the widely differing cultures that the two principal races in the country have so far evolved:—

- (1) Are the two cultures, as they exist at the moment, to be individually fostered and developed to the exclusion of each other?
- (2) Is the more generally acceptable culture to be allowed to supersede the less acceptable one, so that the latter disappears?
- (3) Is an attempt to be made for each race to study the culture of the other, so that a sort of parallel development goes on, each respecting the other and — as far as possible — understanding, appreciating and practising the other?
- (4) Is the attempt referred to in (3) to be aimed, instead, at evolving a composite culture in which the best elements of both survive in an essentially Rhodesian art form?

We believe that (4) should be the ultimate aim, if a multi-racial community is going to be successful. Clearly demarcated differences of culture maintained racially have, we think, always led to a sharpening of the divisions between men. The numerous examples in recent years of failure in maintaining harmonious relations between different races in various parts of the world may well have been largely due to the failure to evolve — or even to contemplate — a common culture. Positive religious differences have frequently been an insurmountable barrier which has prevented progress being made but, in this respect, it is fortunate that extreme religious attachments are not so predominant in this part of the world.

Difference in cultural levels amongst people of the same race is, on the other hand, an understandable and probably inevitable circumstance and one that would be far less likely to create divisions.

In a highly organised art, like Music, the large mass of people are unlikely to be able to express themselves other than in the simplest forms — and these should be related to the living realities of their lives, if they are to have any validity. With changing environment, there are bound to arise new forms of artistic expression and these, to be genuine and significant, must grow from indigenous soil. Exponents of existing idioms must be encouraged to develop these idioms in the context of the new society in which they live, for otherwise something else will take their place; something which does not come spontaneously from the spirit and is, therefore, to some extent spurious. This is true of Europeans and Africans alike and the new environment in which they find themselves should lead to a mutual appreciation of each other's art and the assimilation of such new ideas as are thereby seen to be appropriate and worthwhile, until something in the nature of common idioms has been found.

The employment of new idioms may well have the effect of releasing a flood of creative energy and of spurring advanced composers to develop a style apparently removed in spirit and beyond the immediate appreciation of the general mass of the population. While this is not necessarily a bad thing in itself, the prime concern of the educational project that is envisaged is not with such advanced workers. It must have as its object the informing of ordinary people; and those composers will serve the project best who, while leading, keep close contact with those whose awareness they would stimulate.

African music depends a great deal upon rhythmic sophistication for its complexity. Harmonic erudition is not as significant as it is with Western music and absence of any notation has restricted the building up process which is common to all major cultures. Generally speaking, Africans have, if anything, a greater sense of intonation and rhythm within the confines of their own music than Europeans have within theirs and, if an appreciation of the subtleties of chromatic tone relations can be acquired by the former, while the latter are having their imaginations stirred by wider rhythmic possibilities, we may produce something in the Federation that will open the eyes of world.

But music must be written down. Recording is all very well but other people want to play new music before they will regard it as anything other than a novelty programme on the radio. The African must write it down himself in the international language of music. He must, also, be acquainted — just as musicians elsewhere are acquainted — with the work of others, if he is to enter a world community on equal terms and not remain merely a museum piece for the objective study of the musicologist and the sporadic curiosity of others. And it is not only the future leaders of artistic expression that require to become coherent and knowledgeable in musical matters. There must be a large body of performers and an even larger body of appreciative listeners, who have been schooled in the technique of music, to provide the necessary ground in which a culture can take hold, grow and, through critical evaluation, reach a significant maturity.

In any event, Africans should become increasingly competent in the practice of the arts, particularly if they are to lead others to an appreciation of their own forms of expression. A singer, for example, will not make much progress without intensive voice-production training. Nature has given people varying talents but none of them is adequate without nurture and development by well-proved methods that have grown up over the centuries in Western countries. The goal of Federal partnership is the acceptance of competence as the standard of the measurement of a man and this competence must cover all fields of human activity.

It is a simple fact of history that, through the ability to place ideas on permanent record, most of the world outside Africa south of the Sahara has for thousands of years been building up an enormous wealth of knowledge in the application of thought to matters of physical and aesthetic experience. This knowledge is already being made available to Africans in many other fields of activity. The adoption of techniques that have long proved their validity in the enhancement of competence will not stifle the essential creative spirit of the individual but, rather, will bring it to full flower and enable it to be expressed coherently for all the world to appreciate.

Above all, the competent use of a common musical medium — whatever thoughts are expressed through it — will do much to earn the mutual respect of peoples for each other, just as a similar undertaking in all the highest activities of man will sweep away barriers that purely material equality alone is likely to emphasise.

This is a gigantic undertaking. It is one that has frequently failed, even between peoples of the same colour. But it has got to succeed in this country, if there is to be any lasting happiness for its peoples. The proverbial good nature of the African and the increasing desire of the European to accept competence as the yardstick, are factors that entitle us to believe that, provided rapprochement is sought on all fronts of human activity, we may succeed in this vital experiment where others have failed.

Appendix II

Draft Programme for the Development of Music in the Federation

(1) At the outset, it is felt that the diatonic scale and its associated chromatic scale should be the basis of the music of the Federation. The point is of so fundamental a character that the reasons for advancing this view are dealt with as follows at some length :—

(i) Although truly indigenous African music employs other intervals than those of the diatonic scale, Africans themselves are already becoming more familiar with the latter as a result of the mass of imported records they listen to and of the Radio programmes and the various European performances that they hear. In addition, the activities of the Mission stations and African schools have, over the years, rightly or wrongly, implanted the diatonic scale in their minds. It is suggested that the majority of Africans, in Southern Rhodesia at any rate, now tend to sing in intervals that approach more closely to the diatonic than to any other scale.

- (ii) The chromatic scale offers greater possibilities of harmonic development than truly indigenous African scales, of which the most advanced is heptatonic, with no leading note in the usual meaning of that expression.
- (iii) Limiting Africans to indigenous scales, which many of them have largely forgotten and, in some cases, never known, might be resented by Africans who are anxious to express themselves fully and effectively. It might be regarded as a segregating measure, as indeed similar attempts in some parts of Africa have, it is believed, been regarded.
- (iv) The promotion and enshrinement of indigenous African scales will keep African music in a watertight compartment and prevent the development of a composite musical culture; for it is extremely unlikely that Europeans living in the country would accept a scale that they would regard as imposing limitations on aesthetic development.
- (v) There is nothing to stop the continuance, if it is desired, of particular instruments tuned to an indigenous scale for particular reasons, as in the case of the bagpipes in Scotland. No one, however, would suggest that Scotsmen should have all their music limited to the scale of the bagpipes.
- (vi) The existence of indigenous scales peculiar to the peasantry of a country or region is not uncommon but it does not normally become the basis for published national music. In Hungary, for example, Bartok has based much of his music on folk-song and drawn attention to the existence of non-diatonic scales. But his music is not written in the indigenous scales. Nor is it any less Hungarian on this account. It is also fairly certain that no Conservatoire or Academy of Music in Hungary teaches students in indigenous scales.
- (vii) The use of additional tones to the existing chromatic scale is another matter altogether and one that it would certainly not be wise to be dogmatic about. If musicians feel the need of even further complexity, then they are certainly entitled to obtain it.
- (viii) Music played on an indigenous scale would be unlikely to be played to any appreciable extent elsewhere and, whatever its quality, it would lose out in world appeal.

(2) Subject to the foregoing, it is then proposed that transcriptions into staff notation of the best extent recordings of appropriate African music should be made. By far the more important feature of this music is its rhythmic quality and the bending of the tones here and there to fit them to the diatonic scale will, it is felt, have less effect upon the essential idiom of the music than some may fear.

(3) Africans would be trained in the Theory of Music as applicable to staff notation and would be given aural training, together with instruction in vocal and instrumental technique, using as far as possible transcriptions of African music as the teaching material. They would not, however, be denied access to music of other parts of the world, although great care would be taken to ensure that a full knowledge of African music was obtained and a genuine respect for it encouraged.

(4) In particular, efforts would be made to encourage those already possessing a knowledge of the drums or the Marimba (xylophone) or similar instruments, to obtain a wider knowledge of music, so that their performance could be further enhanced and intelligently integrated with other instruments. The building of Marimbas tuned to the diatonic scale would be experimented with.

(5) As soon as a significant quantity of good African transcriptions was available, the European students of the Academy would be encouraged to include this music in their study. The use of the Marimba as an instrument in its own right, in percussion bands and in the orchestra, would be encouraged.

(6) African School bands based on the Drums, the Mbira and the Marimba, together with, say, flutes or recorders and singing would be encouraged. This work would largely be the responsibility of the African Schools themselves but courses for teachers would be provided by the Academy to ensure that their work was competently handled.

(7) Competent musicians of all races would be encouraged to transcribe or compose works for the foregoing combinations.

(8) Finally, the goal would be to develop, in as many students of all races as possible, the highest degree of musicianship, together with the emergence of a school of composition that will produce major works, in which the use of such African instruments as are original and worthwhile, in association with appropriate European instruments, will be encouraged.

The flute for example, is an instrument which is indigenous to Africa in a crude form. The advantages of the more highly developed European instrument would enable far greater opportunities for expression in the African idiom to be obtained.

There is, in the limit, no real reason in the long run why any instrument which an African musician wishes to use should not be available to him, if it helps him to express himself, and he should certainly not be denied access to it. Care, however, will be exercised to ensure that, in the whole process of musical education of Africans, the significant and worthwhile elements of African culture are maintained.

(9) A problem, for which there is at the moment no ready-made solution, will be the establishment of standards of measurement of competence in musical knowledge and performance. Up to the present time, music students in the Federation have had their work assessed by external examinations conducted by acknowledged authorities in Britain. While it is extremely wise for a young country to subject itself to an objective evaluation based on mature world standards, such a procedure would be obviously inappropriate in the present case. An acceptable level of scholarship is something which will have to evolve naturally and leading African musicians will be encouraged to play the principal part in bringing this about.

(10) The language problem is another difficulty. There is so many diverse tongues in use that it would be impracticable to do other than employ English as the principal medium for tuition, at least as far as the focal point of study is concerned. It is desirable for students to have attained already a reasonable standard of general education and many of them will, in fact, be teachers, so a knowledge of English can be taken for granted. Language is so much an integral part of singing, however, that as long as African languages continue to be generally employed, so long will serious account have to be taken of them. It will be essential for leading African musicians, as they emerge, to give their attention to this important matter. In the course of time, no doubt, the problem will solve itself, for it seems unlikely that a real partnership can be evolved if twenty or so different languages are going to persist throughout the country indefinitely.

THE RHODESIAN ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Representative: A. R. Sibson

Mr. Sibson said that he had come to Southern Rhodesia in 1936, and that he was the Bulawayo City Electrical Engineer. Apart from his profession he had always been connected with music, and it was his main interest. The Rhodesian Academy of Music which he was representing was an institution which was associated with the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music in London. It was recognised by the Federal Government who made grants to it, and it received other public support.

He had come forward to give evidence because he felt that much could be done between the races through the influence of music. He said that the Academy had non-European students, although only a few of them; but more recently it had recognised the need to go to the African and develop his musical education, combining this with the distinctive musical culture and musical idiom that the African had. The Academy realised that the work might have a considerable contribution to make to the social advantage of all the people, and they felt that in music the African probably had as much to contribute as the European. At the moment there was a cultural gap between the races; and in their view a cultural bridge was quite as necessary as the economic or political bridges.

The Academy had found that there was a need to get Africans to understand the fundamental elements of music, and of course other arts; and from there they thought that it was possible that something very great might develop. The Rhodesian Academy of Music was providing the vehicle for a rapprochement. At the moment they had 18 African students: all of whom were from Southern Rhodesia, but with experience gained they hoped to expand to Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland in due course. They also had Asian students, but the project was intended to develop the African idiom in the main. There was of course a preponderance of European students who numbered about 350, but the African students joined in the lectures and classes without any distinction at all. In addition members of the Academy taught music in the African High Schools. The project had really only just started, and at this stage they were unable to say how the building of the cultural bridge through music would progress. Mr. Sibson mentioned that the inspiration for this scheme had come to him through personal experience a few years ago when he met an African after a concert performance by the Hallé Orchestra which had come out to Rhodesia.

Mr. Sibson mentioned that similar experiments had been tried in other cultural fields, but it seemed to him that the efforts made had tended to be somewhat sporadic. Art and sculpture had been encouraged particularly by the Mission at Cyrene.

Memorandum

Mrs. M. B. HAYWARD

The women of the Federation are as closely concerned with the past, and future, of this their Homeland as are the men. From the time of the pioneers to to-day, women have literally shared the hardships, the dangers, the work, as well as the joys of achievement, with the men. To-day the women are worried, not because they have lost confidence in their leaders or the economic potentiality of the Federation, but because they have lost confidence in the restrictive powers of the Colonial Office and the United Kingdom Government.

The short history of the Federation gives ample proof that much more has been done in Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia for the benefit of the African than was done by the Colonial Office. The African can virtually be said to require protection from the neglect of the Colonial Office, and not from the Federal authorities, as can clearly be seen on a train journey from the Union of South Africa. In the Union and in the Federation, Africans do not come to the train begging the passengers for food, etc., as they do in the Bechuanaland Protectorate. However, it will take some time for the Federal Government to make up the leeway of the many years of neglect by the Colonial Office and, in the meantime, it is particularly galling to know that 6,000 miles away people who have done nothing for the Federation, may never have entered it or only paid it a fleeting visit, can overrule what we are doing.

The advance in prosperity, education, health and every aspect of life of every section of the community, is proof that the Federal Government is working on the right lines and should be sufficient guarantee that we are to be trusted to manage our own affairs.

No word infuriates the women of the Federation as much as the word "settler". There are many families in the Federation of the fourth generation, who surely cannot be called "settlers". Women are vitally interested in the future of the Federation because they look for stability for the coming generation. Many have helped to make the Federation what it is and want to be sure they are in a land where government is in the hands of responsible people; thanks largely to neglect by the Colonial Office, the bulk of the African people will not be competent to judge what is to their ultimate benefit for many years. They are an emerging people who are being helped in every possible way, but why should the destiny of the Federation wait for the generations which must pass before they are sufficiently capable of responsibly deciding what is best for them. When a firm of the standing of Dunlops states that investment in the Federation is being delayed because of political insecurity, can it be wondered at that the women are worried?

It is distressing to hear European women persuading their husbands to leave the Federation, not because they are afraid of the material, physical, or educational advancement of the African, but because they are afraid of the attitude of the United Kingdom Government in insisting that the African should be given authority, for which he is not ready, before the Federation gains independence.

Oral Evidence

Mrs. M. B. HAYWARD

Mrs. Hayward said that she had lived in Southern Rhodesia for nearly forty years. The main point that she wanted to raise with the Commission was the present restrictive powers of the United Kingdom Government.

When the African Affairs Board was incorporated in the Federal Parliament at the beginning of Federation in 1953, it was obvious that it could only work if it had the confidence of the Africans. The Africans had never been much in favour of the Board, and it was clear that the first time the Imperial Government turned down one of its recommendations the best way of establishing a body to look after African interests which would have the full confidence of the Africans was to set up a Second House or Senate with Africans as full members. The present feeling that they could appeal to the Imperial Government over the head of the Local Government was highly unsatisfactory. Speaking as an old stager in Southern Rhodesia, she felt that responsible government must be in the hands of the people living there.

There was a big distinction between the Executive Councils of the two Northern Territories and the members of parliament in Southern Rhodesia; the former had only obstructed what the Federal Government was trying to do. Most of the Africans were against Federation for selfish, personal reasons. She personally believed that Africans did not want either education or progress. Otherwise, why should they be destroying the schools? Their main aim seemed to be to keep their own people down. She personally was not anti-African; she was a member of the National Council of Women, an organisation which had many African branches, and which was doing very good work to which African women were responding splendidly. Her only concern was for the future stability of the country. Many Europeans felt that everything they had worked for could be destroyed if Government were handed over prematurely to irresponsible people. The fact that most Africans were at present irresponsible was not due to a racial difference but to a difference in their history. It was impossible to take people from the bottom of the social scale and put them at the top without any intermediate training.

In answer to questions, the witness said that she had complete confidence in the leaders of the country, but that they were leading with their hands tied. She thought that the present franchise was satisfactory. The Federation should be divorced, not from the United Kingdom Government, but from the present policy of the Colonial Office which exercised a stranglehold on the two Northern Territories. What was needed were steps leading to responsible Government in the two Northern Territories.

16TH APRIL 1960

R. A. BEATON

1. My name is Robert Alexander Beaton, and I am Chief Officer of African Affairs to the Municipality of Livingstone, where I have been in charge of the Department for nineteen years. I have passed both Lower and Higher Language examinations set by the Northern Rhodesia Government, in two of the four Official African languages spoken in Northern Rhodesia.

2. I should like to submit my evidence to the Commission because of the experience I have gained as an Administrator of African Affairs; evidence which may be of use to the Members of the Commission, to show why it is considered that the Africans are not yet ready to form a Government of their own.

3. Only about 60 years ago the Europeans first established settlements in the Territory, and, on their arrival, they found that the indigenous people had contributed nothing by way of tradition, culture or history to the country. Indeed, it was these early settlers and those who continued to follow, who put an end to the appalling conditions under which Africans then lived, suffering, as they did, from famine, disease, intertribal strife, superstition and extreme poverty.

4. Today, many of these people are becoming entirely urbanised and in the town one finds them living secure and peaceful lives now, enjoying all the mass of benefits brought to them by the whites. They live in permanent houses, complete with all modern services, and with efforts constantly being maintained to improve their conditions.

5. However, the very large mass of the population is not yet so advanced, and the numbers who have had the advantage of some education are not by any means in the majority and, those who can be classed as well educated, are very few indeed.

6. In my view few residents have the slightest knowledge of what is going on round about them, and care a great deal less.

7. So much talk, so common today, emanates from the self-seeking, so-called leaders of African political parties. Too frequently these men are unemployed agitators, hoping that one day they may individually gain power and wealth for themselves; and, I think, having listened to many such, that it is an honest statement when I claim they have not the real interest at heart of the people they harangue.

8. For the past three years elections have been held to find leaders among the residents in townships, as members of the Area Housing Boards, but so far the response has, at no time, been greater than a 10% poll, and even then the people claiming voting rights, have so obviously been put up to it. So far, about three women to one man have voted, and since the women are very much less educated, on the whole, than the men, it is quite obvious that, had they not been sent to vote, the poll would have been utterly farcical.

9. Africans, even those living in the towns and in constant contact with European influences, are still subject to strong beliefs in witchcraft, and few have learned to value the many benefits they have derived directly from the whites.

10. The veneer of civilisation is very thin still, and the behaviour of African men towards their women, the rough way they have with each other in using public transport, the stupid and wanton damage so often done to public buildings and amenities, are all an indication of the long way the masses still have to travel before they can be deemed civilised.

11. A few advanced Africans are undoubtedly carrying responsible work admirably, but, almost without exception, these men still lean heavily on the support afforded them, by their immediate superior white officers. They have not yet been tested under conditions where the decisions have to be made by themselves alone, and so implemented, especially where such decisions might clash with public opinion.

12. I feel it is not true to assume that the vocal few truly represent the masses or that the views they express are truly those of the ordinary man in the street. In some respects, I believe that there is a tendency amongst the educated to draw away from, and ahead of, their less fortunate fellows. Certainly, rarely will an advanced African reply in the vernacular if addressed in his own language.

13. The turn over in labour indicates serious instability and, this characteristic, coupled to the normal periodic return to rural areas, is another aspect not to be ignored.

14. The opinions expressed publicly by African Political Leaders are misleading, and, in my view, none of these have any knowledge of the huge responsibilities and work which would devolve on them were they given the opportunity to govern.

15. An interesting point is that in the towns is being evolved a completely new type of African, one born in the townships, and, as a result, one whose ties with the rural areas are being completely severed. There are persons who are vague as to their tribe and completely disinterested therein—persons who are accustomed from birth to the city lights and there can be no doubt that from this new product will be drawn the African leaders of tomorrow.

16. In conclusion I am sincerely convinced that the Africans in Northern Rhodesia are not yet, by any means, ready for self-government.

Livingstone
16th April 1960

Oral Evidence

R. A. BEATON

Mr. Beaton came from Livingstone, Northern Rhodesia. He explained that he would have given evidence in Livingstone when the Commission was there, but there had been some doubt at that time whether he could do so as an employee of the Municipality. He had lived in Livingstone since 1906 since his father had been one of the first immigrants there. He had been in charge of African Affairs in the Livingstone Muni-pality for a considerable time. He produced a brief memorandum, which was read by the Secretary.

In answer to questions, Mr. Beaton made the following points:—

(1) On local government elections (African), the contrasting situation in Bulawayo was pointed out. He replied that his evidence dealt simply with the small town of Livingstone, and his opinions were based on people he had met. Livingstone was perhaps a backwater of 28,000. But there was certainly no doubt of the lack of interest among Africans in municipal affairs. He knew this from his own position as Returning Officer. He had noticed that more women voted than men because they were sent to do so by the political leaders. Even at the third elections the poll had only been 10%.

(2) He agreed that events in the Belgian Congo and Tanganyika must have an effect on African political thought. The fact that an African was an African made no difference to his views. The Africans were given the opportunity to participate in municipal affairs, but did not avail themselves of it. He thought that the basic necessity lay in the education of Africans which they had not yet got.

(3) Mr. Beaton was referred to the agitation among Europeans in Northern Rhodesia for self-government. He thought that they meant self-government for all the people. He admitted that this would mean at present self-government for Europeans with a sprinkling of Africans, and this was because there were not at present enough Africans ready for government.

(4) He thought Federation had brought partnership, but it still constituted a great problem.

(5) Mr. Beaton was again referred to the contrast of experience in African Municipal Locations in Bulawayo. He said that in the original Locations in Livingstone, for lack of suitable men, they had had to have nominations. This was the proportion of swing from two elected and one nominated in each ward; at the earliest opportunity all three would be elected. But he agreed however that there was at present little responsibility in the posts. He pointed out that there were not many advanced people in Livingstone.

(6) He agreed that there were now a number of young Africans with no contact at all with the land, just as his own children were entirely ignorant of England.

(7) He thought that the African interest in the Area Advisory Boards was growing, and personally agreed that there should be an increase in the responsibility given to them, and that it might attract more interest if the Boards were given more power. His idea was that when there was a greater demand for that power by Africans they would get it; but there were not at present many advanced Africans to take a hand in it.

Memorandum

T. A. J. BRAITHWAITE*

1. True political advancement in the Federation must ultimately depend upon economic development. To this extent, political stability within the Federation hinges upon a continued industrial expansion. It is, therefore, necessary now to set a definite and stable course in the political field which will enable industrial and economic development to proceed and so to create the material background against which it will be possible to implement the policy of partnership.

2. It would be in the interest of further industrialisation in Southern Rhodesia, if there were some realignment of responsibility insofar as power was concerned, from the Federal to the Territorial Government.

3. Large employers of labour have a genuine sense of responsibility towards their African employees, which is demonstrated by their progressive attitude towards the advancement of Africans.

4. The labour force employed at Wankie is dissimilar to any other labour force in the Federation, but the trends at Wankie insofar as the administration of Africans is concerned probably compare with those of other large employers elsewhere in Southern Rhodesia.

5. African employees have demonstrated progressively, a more responsible approach to their employment during the past 10 years.

6. Considerable progress has been made by African employees towards more responsible employment during the past 10 years.

7. The development of a sense of responsibility by African employees has been disappointing when compared with their improved technical aptitude.

8. There are definite prospects for an increasing number of more advanced openings for Africans in industry but some degree of resistance to this trend will be experienced from European employees.

* This witness also gave evidence for the Chamber of Music of Rhodesia at Salisbury on the 3rd May, 1960.

9. There has been a marked advance in the standard of living of Africans employed in industry during the past 10 years, with particular reference, at Wankie, to:—

Housing
Feeding
Medical and Health Family Welfare
Education
Recreation
Trading
Youth
Religion
Tradition
Pensions.

10. There has been a marked advance in the wage levels of Africans in the past 10 years.

Wankie

16th April 1960

Oral Evidence

T. A. J. BRAITHWAITE

Mr. Braithwaite was General Manager of the Wankie Colliery. He presented a short memorandum.

Mr. Braithwaite stated that the Colliery employed 490 Europeans and 6,700 Africans at present. He had been General Manager for the last ten years. Previously he had made a study of the coal-mining industry in South Africa for 2½ years with Johannesburg as his centre. Before that he had spent nine months in making a study for improvements in the colliery at Enugu, Nigeria. He had been employed by Powell, Duffryn and Co. before and after World War II. He had started in that Company as a pupil and gone on to be a junior official. He had had experience in all British coalfields, and had spent nearly one year in Germany.

He said that he did not propose to attempt to substantiate the points in his paper, but instead invited questions, in reply to which he made the following points:—

(1) On point 8. He said there were only two trade unions in the mining industry in Southern Rhodesia, and both were represented at Wankie. Both were European; one represented the staff, while the other represented the daily paid employees as opposed to those on monthly salaries. From these two trade unions he expected to get resistance to the usurpation of European occupations by Africans. But that would be the consequence of the implementation of the new Apprenticeship Act. Occupations now European likely to be taken over by Africans might represent 100-150 jobs, and this represented 20% to 30% usurpation of the field.

(2) Mr. Braithwaite was also the President of the Chamber of Mines, and in that capacity was now working out a Grading Scheme for the mining industry. In that respect he would say that the approach of the trade unions was very reasonable. They seemed to recognise that the time had come for Africans to come into full indentures, and so into the trade. Resistance was therefore likely to come from individuals. Both the trade unions of which he spoke were entirely confined to Southern Rhodesia.

(3) The types of occupation likely to be taken over by Africans were junior supervisory positions, and in this regard he thought that even the post of European Miner might cease to exist. He also had in mind more senior clerical posts, and junior technical posts as, for example, in nursing and laboratory work. There would also be posts for junior chemists and in the artisan trades.

(4) Africans did already occupy supervisory posts underground. To illustrate this, he described generally the systems of underground working and control.

(5) On point 7. He included in the expression "sense of responsibility", honesty, diligence, ability to command respect and obedience from subordinates, loyalty to employers, and reliability with dependability. Africans had kept pace in all these qualities except the last—reliability with dependability. When junior European employees lapsed in these respects it would be for some considered reason. But if an African did something irrational it was very hard to find out why. This lack might prove to be a serious handicap. Asked to what he attributed this he said that six or seven years ago he would have put it down to lack of training. He would not now say that, and it was very difficult to understand the reason. There were of course exceptions. What he had said did not diminish the force of point 5 of the memorandum, that the Africans had in fact demonstrated progressively a more responsible approach. This was shown by the fact that today it was only necessary to move from initial employment or discharge 10% as compared with those who had to be moved or discharged ten years ago. Training had certainly helped in this process.

(6) On point 7—lack of development of a sense of responsibility among Africans affecting particularly those in the more advanced positions, where responsibility for other people came in. It was found that Africans would behave rationally for two or three years on end, and that then there would be a lapse with no logical reason given. This did not only apply to supervisory work, but to all Africans in more advanced positions.

(7) On point 2—responsibility for Power. Electricity was at present under the control of the Federal Electricity Board, which was in turn under the Federal Ministry of Power. Territorial Governments might want to boost power in certain areas. He would agree to generation and generation policy belonging to a central authority, but it should delegate to territorial authorities. Those territorial authorities would in turn carry out the policy and distribute the power entirely as the territory itself thought fit; in other words, the territory should have complete control of distribution and tariffs. He would like this system of delegation to be carried out more closely on the lines of commercial practice.

(8) On point 3. The minimum wage in the Colliery was £30.8 per month, to which must be added hidden emoluments which had been evaluated at £8.13.4 per month per head. These included food, valued at £3.5.0 per month (nearly half), supplementary feeding for children, hospitalisation, medical services both for workers and dependants as well, free quarters, recreation and welfare. The highest basic cash wage paid was £23.16.5 per month to senior driving instructors. He agreed that there were no Africans drawing the same wages as Europeans, and that the European minimum wage was £35 per month, to which also had to be added hidden emoluments; therefore the highest African wage was lower than the lowest European minimum. He would also mention the non-contributory pension scheme, or rather a scheme for gratuities, which was nevertheless paid periodically. He would also give a figure of £17.6.8 per month as the average of the highest wages paid per month during the current year. This derived from a fairly elaborate grading scheme dealing with earnings, and dependent on efficiency barriers. He envisaged in future the same rate of pay for doing the same job.

(9) He was then asked if, in that situation, such Africans would be able to join the European Mineworkers Club. He replied that this problem had not yet had to be faced, and he was not sure if it would be the wish of the Africans themselves. He was sure that there would be resistance from the Europeans; there might in fact be resistance from both sides. As employers, the Management would have at any rate to see that equally good facilities were made available. It might be possible, in time, to overcome the prejudice. He agreed that it was important to permit this to happen, but he foresaw difficulties.

(10) Asked how long it would take Africans to reach senior supervisory jobs, and on what qualifications, he said that previously he would have thought from seven to ten years. He could now see no reason why in time Africans should not come to the Shift Boss Grade. After that, the question of qualifications would arise. Asked in this connection if all Europeans had had prior training in their trades, he said that they had not, and that the Mine therefore ran a series of training schemes in the indentureship trades at their own technical training centre. Europeans also had to take correspondence courses and were assisted to get their necessary qualifications. The disabilities of Africans were mainly due to their low basic standard of education.

(11) The Colliery did not find it necessary to recruit Africans. They came to the Mine of their own accord. Thus, the Colliery had one of the most unsophisticated labour forces in the country. For example, the Africans at Wankie did not want to have anything to do with trade unions. On 1st January, 1960, the new Industrial Conciliation Act had come into force. In the Colliery there were six committees of Europeans and Africans constituted to discuss industrial problems. He had prepared and circulated an address to these committees on the operation of the new Act, and had sent to each observers from the European trade unions. But all but one of the committees had said that they wanted to have no participation. There was no demand at all for trade unionism. He attributed this to a lack of sophistication. The Africans said that they had seen the Copperbelt, and did not want to have the troubles they had there. He agreed that the attitude could be the result of fear of domination by the European trade union.

(12) Mr. Braithwaite was then questioned about the strike at the Wankie Colliery in 1954. He said that it had been organised by about ten Africans. The demand had been for £35 a month. The strike was 100% effective. There had been intimidation, and he was sure that its origin was political and not industrial: in fact it had taken place on the day of the first sitting of the Federal Parliament. The fact that troops had been moved to Wankie at that time was certainly not the reason for the indifference to trade unionism. Nor did the fact that 70% of the labour force came from north of the Zambesi have any bearing on this question.

(13) A few Africans in the Colliery had passed their general certificate matriculation examinations, but it was doubtful whether these included any one other than African school-teachers. The highest qualified clerks in employment were of Standard VI.

(14) On point 1, on the necessity "to set a definite and stable course in the political field", Mr. Braithwaite said he did not feel competent to answer the question "What course?" He thought there was need of a ten year plan to enable the country to get on with industrial development. Uncertain conditions politically were adverse to political development.

(15) If Federation were to be replaced by a looser association, there would be no great economic effects on an undertaking such as the Wankie Colliery. But he would not like to see any suggestion for a further review of the Constitution in any short period of time; that would only make capitalists continue to sit on the fence.

(16) Again on point 2, asked if he would like any other changes in the structure of functions, he said that he would like a review of the fiscal arrangements, but the Chamber of Mines would be giving evidence on this in Salisbury. He would definitely not wish Labour and Mines to become Federal subjects.

(17) With reference to the list of facilities for Africans in point 9, in the sphere of recreation the Management was trying to interest Africans in two forms of development; firstly, in their own cultures including such things as beadwork, basket work, modelling, painting on African lines; and secondly, in European-type recreational facilities such as soccer, tennis, similar games, ballroom dancing, athletics, and boxing. In the religious sphere, the Management tried to see that there were proper facilities; buildings were made available, and accommodation provided for Ministers of Religion.

(18) On education, he said that there was not at present adequate provision for all the children. Out of a total child population of about 4,000 they had provision for about 2,000 in the primary schools. The provision was however not so short as it appeared, because of a definite migration of labour. Even married people might not stay for more than five years. He thought that the demand was being met up to Standard III, and there were facilities for about 1,000 up to Standard VI. Education was organised under the Wankie Udenominational Schools Board, who controlled all education with the assistance of the Missions.

(19) As to feeding, the Colliery provided a fully balanced diet for all employees, male or female, of 60 dry ounces per diem. Women and children also got a basic ration with supplementary feeding for children.

(20) He considered that of the African labour force, not half of 1 per cent. were detribalised, although a higher proportion were "urbanised". He had found tribal allegiances to be very strong.

A. J. PALMER and
B. V. THOMAS

Mr. Palmer was a rigger in the Colliery and Mr. Thomas was an electrician. The former had come from Birmingham to the Federation in 1948; the latter had come from the Union of South Africa in 1950, and had now become a Rhodesian citizen. The former was not a member of a trade union; the latter was a member of the European Mineworkers Trade Union. These witnesses, whose general views agreed, made points in turn in answer to questions.

(1) Mr. Palmer had had his first contract in Northern Rhodesia in the Rhodesian Railways. He had at once been faced with the language difficulty. He had found people in the country who were not British, which he could not understand; some were definitely anti-British. This was at Broken Hill. He found that these people came from the Union of South Africa. He had been taught by them to look on the Africans as they did, but he could not approve of the methods which they used. He asserted that 90% of the white people in Northern Rhodesia came from South Africa. He had come to Wankie in 1950 to take up a job as Underground Handyman. He had then learnt the mine language, Chilapa lapa, and had begun to get some contact with Africans. He had found the same conditions as at Broken Hill with a large number of South Africans employed. But he did not feel the way they did. He thought Africans deserved to be treated as human beings. He had had no trouble with Africans himself, because he treated them respectfully.

(2) Mr. Thomas said that he had now accepted the Federation as his place of residence. Since leaving South Africa he had altered his ideas drastically. He definitely wanted the Federation to be upheld.

(3) For the vote, there should be an educational standard, regardless of means.

(4) It was essential that there should be co-operation between the races. It was the Europeans who would have to adjust their ideas. It was essential that the black man should have some influence on affairs.

(5) As to wages, if a man had the same qualifications he should have the same wages. There should be equal rights in this respect. Although the "rate for the job" should apply, the African should share in the high wages structure.

(6) Both agreed that the attitude towards Africans of Europeans had changed for the better.

(7) Questioned as to the Africans' attitude at Wankie towards trade unions, they said that they did not know if the Africans wanted a trade union or not. They thought that the Africans at Wankie were very well treated and happy.

(8) Both agreed that they themselves would agree to a suitable African being allowed to join the Wankie Mineworkers Club. But they agreed that if there was a ballot it would not succeed in favour of the African. There was still a strong prejudice. This prejudice was shared by both Englishmen and South Africans. They themselves were in the minority on this point. It was definitely a colour prejudice and it went back for 300 years.

(9) They agreed that much depended on the Europeans in the development of the country, and they still felt that the Africans needed to be guided; but at the same time the Europeans must be prepared to relinquish their prerogatives. There had already been concessions by Europeans to Africans in the sphere of government in the last five years. Southern Rhodesia at the moment was a little dormant in this respect.

(10) While they agreed that the gap in the wages structure needed to be bridged, it was only fair to point out that it might take three or four Africans to do the same job as one European could do, that this fact must have its effect on wages.

Memorandum

A. B. GREEN

(Administrator of Africans, Rhodesian Iron & Steel Company Limited, Redcliff)

Experience:

Having been intimately connected with the administering of Africans for over half a century I feel I have the qualifications necessary to express my views. I have come in personal contact with Africans in concerns—Mining and Industrial—which have employed from as few as 400 to a formidable 24,000. I have looked upon the very long experience as a life interest rather than just a job.

My experience of handling Africans covers all types, from the near primitive to the so-called sophisticated, and the significant fact that I have never had any disturbance nor any difficulty in obtaining an abundance of free and voluntary labour compels me to assume that I must have acquired the necessary qualifications—tolerance, respect and understanding as well as experience to justify submission of evidence.

African Character:

Certain characteristics, details of which follow, have manifested themselves, and in my opinion, are common to all tribes and types. The same characteristics are so deep-rooted that even when the African becomes detribalised, the same traits prevail. He is partisan to the extreme, will invariably keep to his own ethnic group, is ignorant, gullible, childish cunning, anxious to learn, lacks initiative which restricts his usefulness to work that is repetitive and mechanical. His sense of responsibility is extremely low, and he has an utter disregard for the status of his women. These are attributed to many factors:—

His history and tradition;

His kraal environment and upbringing;

His awe of his Chief;

Inhibition, because of inherent occultism, witchcraft and custom.

Attitude to Women and its Consequences:

From time immemorial the African woman has been, and is still looked upon as, the breeder and brewer, the fetcher and carrier—a mere nonentity. The significance of this issue is not generally appreciated. Its very existence has, nevertheless, contributed in such a marked degree to irresponsibility, immorality, idleness and poverty, and has been aggravated by the system known as Lobola.

Characteristics Elaborated:

Ignorant. This is exemplified by the African rarely knowing his age, and in any case, does not possess a birth certificate.

Partisan. Essentially of a tribal nature and origin. It is very rare for a member of a tribe to give evidence in a dispute against a fellow tribesman. It has taken many years of patient effort to influence this.

Gullible. Is easy prey, and will cheerfully submit to being ensnared by any "smart Alec". Despite inevitable losses in a scheme known as Holosana he persists in carrying on with the practice. Being "bitten" once does not necessarily mean the "twice shy" sequel. He will, to quote a colloquialism, "fall for anything". His being charitable by nature encourages abuse.

Anxious to Learn. He will travel long distances in order to attend school. This is partly due to his desire to learn because he is beginning to appreciate the necessity for his own survival, and also because being away at school relieves the parent of any responsibilities during his absence. There are, of course, noted exceptions to this, and details can be supplied. The tendency however, is for a lad to reach the point when, in his mind, the ability to address an envelope is sufficient to qualify him to be a clerk.

Initiative. This is a quality practically non-existent, and is attributed to kraal environment and immaturity.

Morality. Particularly low by any standards and is not likely to improve so long as women are not emancipated, and the Lobola system thoroughly overhauled. This, in it. wake, introduces the vice known as the mpota wife, illegitimacy and countless unwanted and neglected children.

Excitability. Africans are demonstrative to excess. No logical explanation of this is known to the writer. Unless curbed, they will work themselves into a frenzy. This suggests the close proximity to the primitive, and as such is perhaps a natural trait.

Responsibility. He is gradually acquiring the idea, but the process is remarkably slow. The same comment applies consequentially to thrift, aptitude and integrity, senses of values and dependence on superiors.

African Fitness for Government:

From my experience I believe that it will take a long time and much tolerance and patience, etc. before the African will be fit and able to administer his affairs generally, or participate in Government to any appreciable extent. The view that a person who is able to dig a cable trench is necessarily qualified to be classified as an Electrician, is farcical. The isolated few, who, by virtue of their being lionised and lauded by people not qualified to understand and appreciate thoroughly the position, however well meant, will bring about absolute chaos. From this outline, it is certain that until the gullible and ignorant mass have acquired the characteristics of civilised and educated people, their premature participation in democratic government: at all levels will inevitably lead to their exploitation or enslavement.

Conclusion:

In the interests of the African himself, it is essential that the power of government and administration be maintained in civilised hands until the African mass can be brought out of its primitive system of living, outlook and character. In the Constitutional framework and programme for the future this stage of the African should be taken into account as a fundamental factor.

Oral Evidence

A. B. GREEN

In amplifying his memorandum, Mr. Green briefly cited his experience: he started on the Rand in 1908 and had always been responsible for a large number of African employees. He wished to emphasise that his evidence was essentially his own and had nothing to do with the Rhodesian Iron and Steel Company, Ltd.

In elaborating his memorandum he referred to morality and the lobola system which is an amount of money that is paid by the son-in-law to the parent of the intended wife. His experience was that it caused a great deal of trouble and a tremendous amount of abuse. He thought it should be overhauled. He instanced a case where a man was called upon to pay £25; he had paid £20 and the balance was to be paid by the end of last year. The father-in-law said he did not want the balance although it had been tendered in December. The father-in-law preferred to have a bag of meal or something of that sort. Instead of paying £5, the man probably paid about £15 in excess of the £25 by bits and pieces. Until the lobola is complete, a woman is not the entire property of the husband. At the Steel Works under Mr. Green's jurisdiction there were about 850 Africans who were genuinely married and he thought about 80 per cent. of them had not completely paid their lobola, and in a number of cases they had as many as seven or eight children.

There was another point on the same subject, the fact that it is possible, though perhaps not common, for a person to pay so much for a woman he had never met. Under African customary law this woman had to marry this man whether she liked it or not. Mr. Green did not think this was conducive to happiness. At the Rhodesian Iron & Steel Company Ltd. there were married quarters which were given to married people who were required to furnish evidence to prove they were bona fide married; but he had a married couple there who had come from Angola where they do not worry about getting legally married. This person came to the mine fifteen years ago with this woman by whom he has had four children and they have lived there since. The woman cannot speak any other language but her own and there is little chance of her intermingling with others. Under the mpota system there were on the property 740 contracting boys; between them there were eighty "liaisoned" couples who had what is known as "mpota" wives. The "husbands" of these wives might be legitimately married elsewhere; their wives were not with them and they took upon themselves these women who were also there to cook. The result was that they had in this particular location about 260 children of whom not more than sixty were legitimate. In Mr. Green's opinion this mpota custom which was rife throughout the country was due to the non-emancipation of the women, and there was a tremendous amount to be done before the African was allowed to realise his responsibilities. It led on to a lack of morality, and the woman was just regarded as a nonentity and a chattel.

In answering a question of the practical problem of what the franchise should be, Mr. Green mentioned the institution in this country which looked after natural resources, that is rivers, forestry, minerals and the like. He considered that the African should come under that particular Board because economically at least the African was the most useful natural resource available. The witness referred to Professor Cowett who used the word "gradualism". He thought it very apt because in a matter of time the African would become more capable, but at the moment, probably no more than one in 100,000 was really capable of accepting the highest responsibility. The witness did not think he would advocate any radical change in either the Territorial or the Federal franchise, but he thought they might be more liberal. He did not think a change was necessary in the Territorial educational and financial qualifications, although he thought they might be eased as far as the Federal franchise was concerned.

The witness had no suggestions to offer for any changes in the Federal structure as a whole.

Mr. Green said he made a practice of having discussions with the more intelligent of his men, and they had recently had discussions on trade unionism and insurance. At the moment his African employees were not interested in a joint non-racial union. They were not capable of governing the country but they would be in time. In the witness's opinion the African was not inferior; he was merely immature.

Mr. Green did not consider that many Africans had reached a stage of political maturity that would make them capable of taking part in the government of the country. Even the very few who had reached that stage were not yet ready to play their part in the administration of the country. He did not consider that the Africans in the northern Territories were more mature than the Africans in this country, nor did he think those Africans in the northern Territories taking part in the government of the country were doing so successfully.

 - VIII. To require the Federal Legislature and Government to be located away from any Territorial seat of Government

A number of assertions of fact are not supported by chapter and verse or statistical proof for the sake of brevity. If any such statements are queried supporting data is willingly offered, either by written or verbal evidence.

A. The Objects Contained in the Constitution of 1953

1. The primary and overall object was to establish an economic and development union of the three territories, through a Federation immediately enjoying responsible government and leading to the attainment of full membership of the Commonwealth, as the best means of creating the prosperity upon which the advancement and welfare of all its people fundamentally depends and which is a necessary basis for the achievement of partnership and co-operation of races.

2. The second object was to meet initial difficulties and the many problems which would continue for some time. In the main these were dealt with by:—

- (a) Retaining control of the every day life of the African, his special rights, protections and local political progress in territorial hands as an assurance and safeguard and eliminating the stresses which would arise from uniformity where wide territorial differences obtain. (The notable exception is health which in Federal hands would better meet the low standards in the Northern Territories.)
 - (b) Preventing Federal differentiating legislation which would subject Africans to disabilities not imposed on other races.
 - (c) Placing control of some basic European services in Federal hands to eliminate European fears of lowering standards with the early or premature advent of African Territorial control in the Northern Territories and thereby to reduce European resistance to African political advancement.
3. The Third object was to provide a preliminary working period to assess the operation of government within the Federation under the allocation of functions set out and the safeguards provided.

B. Desirability of these Objects

The terms of reference indicate that the objects contained in the Constitution of 1953 are unchanged and not under review by the Commission. Discussion on the merit of these objects should not be necessary. Comment is included, however, in case the Commission gives consideration to the argument of some groups who seek to alter them and to counter these approaches to the problems facing the Federation.

The most serious attack on the objects of the Constitution of 1953 aims at ending the Federation as such by territorial secession (or at least conceding the right to secede) or realignment of different portions of it into separate racially dominated states.

Such arguments state or imply:—

- (a) That race security or progress must be sought in regional racial control and paramountcy.
- (b) A multiracial state fostering partnership and co-operation of the races is not practical and/or desirable.
- (c) Racial consideration should override the economic and development advantages of the Federal union of the Territories.
(It is significant to note that the economic and development advantages of a multiracial Federation are not seriously denied. Their importance is decried or ignored.)
- (d) African political emergence now to the extent of government by Africans is the decisive issue and is synonymous with freedom, democracy and progress.

Critical analysis shows these assertions to be false. Any proposal which results in reducing the Federal entity as an economic unit should be rejected for the following basic reasons:—

- (a) "Closer political association between the Central African Territories is essential if they are to develop their resources to the full and reach the proper stature in the world. Individually the Territories are vulnerable. Their individual economies are ill-balanced and ill-equipped to withstand the strong economic pressures of a changing world. Development of the largely untapped resources of this potentially wealthy area demands the combined efforts of the three territories acting together. The right thing must be done in the right place. There are railways to be built; there are rivers to be harnessed; power must be developed to meet the needs of industry; food production must be expanded to meet the ever growing needs of a steadily rising population. Such development requires expenditure of capital and material resources on a large scale. Only a well balanced and co-ordinated economic unit would be able to attract development capital from outside on a scale necessary to realise the full potentialities of all these three Territories. All the inhabitants of the three Territories would benefit if an effectual central authority could make economic decisions in the interests of the whole area".

This conclusion of the report by the Conference on Federation in January 1953 is as true today. The Kariba project apart from the general economic and industrial development of the Federation is vindication of it.

- (b) The core of the Central African problem is the dual need of raising living standards of the existing inhabitants and providing for the rapidly increasing population. The only answer lies in exploitation of the country's resources and on a large and rapid enough scale.

Historical example and universally accepted economic principles dictate that the three territories going it alone could not industrialise as effectively as they could jointly.

Having sponsored industrial development on the attraction of the broader security, market and financial stability of the Federation (and achieved an impressive result) scaling down the Federal entity in one form or another could well prove disastrous by the adverse effect on existing industry, investment and employment and by slowing or halting further industrialisation. Sacrificing industrial and economic progress in part or whole by "Balkanising" the Federation must therefore mean proportionate sacrifice of living standards, education and opportunity from the mass of people. This particularly applies to Nyasaland. Further the slower this social progress, the greater are the stresses on government and as the post war history of Africa and Asia has confirmed, democratic processes and promised freedom give way to increasing control and dictatorship in all spheres.

Adequate industrial and economic development must therefore be the prime consideration in reviewing the Constitution.

- (c) Accepting permanent Territorial realignments because of race politics is a blow to the Federal concept of building a multiracial society based on civilisation and merit instead of race. It in no way solves the problem of interracial association in areas where the different races are inevitably associated and to which they have each a rightful claim.

The demands and threats of colour nationalism should not determine the course to be followed because appeasement of these movements can only be met by total capitulation to its dictatorship.

If the significance of success of partnership as opposed to colour nationalism is continental, if not wider, then this departure from the 1953 constitutional ideal so early on, will be a serious far-reaching retrogression.

- (d) The Constitution of 1953 envisaged a permanent political association of the territories with review to modify detail for efficiency and decide stages of constitutional advance in the light of progress. It does not entertain dissolution, and this was endorsed by the Secretary of State at the time.

The preamble defines only one goal.

Conclusion

Dismemberment of the Federation in any form will not "conduce to the security, advancement and welfare of all their inhabitants", would not "foster partnership and co-operation between the inhabitants" and retracts from the recognition of the right to domicile of all lawful inhabitants.

The solution of the difficulties confronting the Federation must therefore be found within the framework of the Federal System established by the Constitution of 1953.

C. Constitutional Programme and Framework Best Suited to the Achievement of the Objects Contained in the Constitution of 1953 including the Preamble

The Constitutional programme and framework must:

- (a) primarily conduce to an increasing pace of industrial development and economic investment, because (as elaborated earlier) upon this fundamental factor the welfare, opportunity and progress of all the inhabitants depends; without it race harmony, co-operation and partnership would be impossible and extending the processes of democracy would be in danger.
- (b) They must provide an effective permanent guarantee to the African and non-European minority groups of basic rights and a growing opportunity to advance in all spheres commensurate with the economic progress of the country.
- (c) The confidence of the European must be retained in that his standards will not be lowered in that government will always be maintained in civilised hands.
- (d) It must establish the right of permanent domicile of all races and aim at a multiracial state where merit and not race or colour will be the yardstick.
- (e) It must allow for territorial differences of way of life, outlook and stage of development.

The Proposals to meet these requirements are:—

1. To entrench the politico-economic association of the Territories on a Federal basis.
2. To grant independence in the Federal and Southern Rhodesian spheres now and in the Northern Territories at the earliest possible stage.
3. To establish safeguards in place of United Kingdom powers and the African Affairs Board:—
 - (a) Federal Constitutional Amendment to be subject to Territorial Agreement.
 - (b) Constitutional principles of individual rights and restrictions and the broad basis of government throughout the Federation to be entrenched and subject to judicial interpretation.
 - (c) A Council of State to check racial discrimination in Federal Legislation. (A Federal Upper House for legislative review is rejected.)
4. To achieve a non-racial qualified franchise throughout the Federation and progressively to eliminate special racial representatives.
5. To establish a division of legislative functions which provides for entrenchments and methods of change.
6. To provide for African land protection and development.
7. To permit a joint Civil Service.
8. To require the Federal Legislature and Government to be located away from any Territorial seat of government.

I. Entrenching the Politico-economic Association of the Territories in a Federal System:

It is essential to put the Federation's existence beyond doubt because uncertainty of the measure of financial security, of the extent of the internal market, of government financial ability to secure stable progress and provide development needs, must inevitably retard capital investment and industrial enterprise. The pre-federation period of doubt as well as the present period of political uncertainty are reflected in slowing down of the investment rate. The process will be accentuated and be far more serious as the period of uncertainty is drawn out.

Amalgamation is neither feasible or desirable and has few protagonists, if any. A decision to revert to smaller territorial units or acknowledging or providing for the possibility, would undermine completely the essential confidence of the existing or potential investor and Central Africa would lose the industrial promise built up since 1953.

If the vital role of adequate material development of the territories is accepted by the Commission, then the absolute necessity of placing the permanence of the Federation beyond doubt constitutionally, must surely be met.

II. Independence in the Federal and Southern Rhodesia fields now and in the Protectorates as early as possible:

Historically it is the rule that greater and speedier development results from local control of affairs provided the national unit is economically viable. This is also the experience within the Federation itself—the contrast of Southern Rhodesia's development with that of the Northern Territories and the comparison of progress in all territories before and after the Federation. Limitation of local powers should not therefore be retained without serious cause.

It is accepted that these limitations exist for two reasons— inexperience or lack of tradition may result in unstable, inefficient or corrupt government or dictatorship and secondly, in a multiracial state the interests of various race groups may require protection.

The record of the Southern Rhodesian Government over 37 years and the Federal Government over the last 7 years disposes entirely of the need for outside control on the score of efficiency and ability, particularly when one considers the extent of experience and standards accepted elsewhere in Africa in granting self government. Racial safeguards are still necessary, perhaps for a long time, until nationhood and Federal tradition are a reality and racial fears dispelled.

Southern Rhodesia's status should influence the constitutional progress of the Federation as much as the Northern Territories. This thought is submerged by the problems of the latter. The alternative to Federation in 1953 for Southern Rhodesia was full self-government. After this additional period it is reasonable for Southern Rhodesia to expect local control of all matters of government affecting it. This entails unfettered Federal control of Southern Rhodesian affairs which fall within its scope as well as removal of the reservations in its own Constitution.

The remaining reservations on Federal sovereignty are therefore examined to ascertain to what extent they serve this purpose and what effective alternatives are available.

- (a) United Kingdom specific power of veto over all Federal legislation and the now theoretical reservation in the Colonial Laws Validity Act are therefore superfluous and the only valid veto is in respect of racially discriminatory legislation and for which alternate safeguards are proposed.
- (b) The United Kingdom's power to legislate for the Federation relinquished in April 1957 agreement should now be confirmed by statute.
- (c) United Kingdom control over all amendments to the Federal constitution is also superfluous, and only valid in respect of racial discrimination for which alternative devices are proposed.
- (d) The United Kingdom power to appoint a Governor-General is unnecessary.
- (e) The United Kingdom control over foreign affairs and the Federation's inability to appoint Ambassadors fall away.
- (f) If the foregoing restrictions in the Constitution are removed the African Affairs Board as presently constituted is redundant, and which in the consensus of opinion has proved to be an unsuitable body.
- (g) The use of the Privy Council as an appeal court should be subject to determination by the Federal Legislature only, except in so far as it may be necessary as long as the protectorate status of the Northern Territories continues.

Relinquishing External Control is therefore dependent on devising realistic race safeguards within the Federal framework.

III. Federal Safeguards Replacing United Kingdom's Powers and the African Board

The extent to which safeguards are required at the Federal level is much reduced by two factors.

The Federal Government being in the main confined to the overall economic control and development of the territories, its defence and external relations, has few responsibilities for or control over African rights, restrictions, protections or privileges, which power rests with the territories themselves. Therefore, the importance of African safeguards in the Federal sphere is small.

The record of government here, especially since Federation shows appreciable African progress. This applies particularly to education and health. In Southern Rhodesia advance has been greater than in the Colonial territories and other African states. Race discrimination has been eliminated progressively in sharp contrast to the policy of our Southern neighbour, although much remains to be done. (1) These trends do not preclude reaction but they have gone so far that reversal of policy would be extremely difficult, if not impossible.

(Note: (1) e.g. Since 1958 the Southern Rhodesia Legislature has replaced discrimination by non-racial legislation in respect of Workman's Compensation, Industrial Conciliation, Apprenticeship, Gambling and Lotteries, provided for Multi-racial Hotels, modified control of liquor and agreed to admit non-Europeans into the Public Service and to freehold title for Africans in European areas.)

The considerations upon which the proposed safeguards are based are as follows:

- (i) A Federal Association of States in itself provides a considerable constitutional protection as compared to the weakness in this respect of a unitary form of government where all power is singly controlled. The ease with which the coloured voters were disenfranchised in the Union of South Africa has undermined faith in constitutional safeguards. But, division of sovereignty in the Federal system entrenches safeguards effectively, change in these matters being conditional on agreement of all territorial legislatures.
- (ii) Protection of the individual and preservation of the desired form of Government can be enhanced by entrenched constitutional principles which are subject to judicial interpretation.
- (iii) Discrimination between the races however cannot be controlled by this means. It is also considered impracticable to lay down that change in discriminatory laws or regulations will be invalid unless the degree of the discrimination is thereby reduced. While the wide differences in culture, tradition, language and education, way of life and habitat exist differentiating on the grounds of race will inevitably continue and be necessary. How long this will be so in particular respects is the matter of opinion. The Territorial governments together provide a convenient and appropriate watch over discrimination between the races in Federal law and a check on its wisdoms and need. Proposals for this are elaborated below. Discrimination has a much greater application in Territorial law but this subject is not dealt with in this evidence as it is a Territorial constitutional problem.

It is therefore proposed that:

A. Amendments to the Federal Constitution should be subject to agreement of all Territorial Legislatures, but with additional special provisos in certain aspects (discussed in section v. para. (c) of the recommendations) except:

- (i) Those amendments which relate wholly to procedure in the Federal Assembly.
- (ii) Transfer of non-entrenched functions between the Federal Government and Territorial Governments (discussed in section v. para. (b)).
- (iii) Changes to the Federal Electoral Act except as it may effect the relative representation between the territories and if discrimination arises.

B. Constitutional Principles of Individual Rights and the Broad Basis of Government in the Federation be Entrenched:

Those proposals attempt to reflect realistically the present wide racial and cultural differences as well as the multiracial goal to which the Federation is committed.

- (i) The purpose of government shall be to secure national defence and domestic tranquility, to promote national prosperity and opportunity for all its people, to safeguard justice, to preserve and broaden the enjoyment of liberty and to seek racial harmony and international goodwill.
- (ii) Government shall be based upon a Legislature whose principal body shall be elected by civilised people, irrespective of race, origin or religion, a cabinet executive subject to the will of the Legislature, a civil service free from political control and selected only on competence, experience and suitability, and an independent judiciary. The application of this principle shall be limited only in so far and for so long as it is incompatible with protectorate status of any territory.
- (iii) No person shall be deprived of his life, personal liberty or property or punished save in accordance with the law. No citizen or protected person may be banished from the Federation.
- (iv) Every person shall enjoy freedom of movement, of speech, peaceful association and publication, of worship, occupation and the pursuit of knowledge, subject only to the requirements of national security; the punishment of offenders; the limitation of libel, intimidation, boycott or nuisance according to the law; and legal, private, communal, land apportionment or territorial restriction of entry.
- (v) Any law which summarily restricts any individual's rights or liberties on the grounds of national security or the maintenance of public order shall also provide for some form of judicial review, independent of the executive, of his or her complicity.
- (vi) Freedom to acquire, own or occupy property may be subject to existing land apportionment, or private title deed restriction only for so long as, in the opinion of the Territorial Governments, these serve a necessary protection of legitimate individual or group interests and in particular those of the African people; contribute to harmony; and do not impede national economic development. Expropriation or loss sustained by legal change in these matters shall be compensated.
- (vii) The boundaries of the Federation may be extended to include additional land or territories whose governments subscribe to the principle of this Constitution. No land may be ceded and no Territory of the Federation may cede from it.
- (viii) These principles may be modified only by agreement of the Legislatures of all the constituent Territories of the Federation and the confirmation of 75% of the members of the Federal Legislature.
- (ix) Interpretation of the Constitution shall be vested in the Judiciary.
- (x) These principles shall not invalidate or prohibit any law or instrument which has the force of law which has been operative immediately before the adoption of this Constitution or which has not been declared ultra-vires within one year of its enactment or promulgation.

Except in respect of Principle (ii) which specifically excludes differentiation on the grounds of race and religion, no instrument which has the force of law may be invalidated or prohibited for the sole reason that it differentiates on the grounds of race or religion provided that it has passed the special constitutional processes laid down in the Legislature concerned.

Objections to the proposals are answered briefly:

The impossibility of having a simple non-discriminatory clause in our circumstances is true, but this does not seriously detract from the value of the entrenched principles widely drawn up to meet our circumstances.

Limiting the period of objection to legislation will obviate the serious interference with government and the abuse which has occurred elsewhere.

It is alleged that providing Government with essential emergency powers to meet external threat or to prevent internal disorder renders an entrenched statement of liberties valueless. But, in contradiction, this may well be a compelling reason to define the limit to which government may go, the responsibility of the individual and the roles of the judiciary as has been incorporated in the Constitution of Malaya.

It is submitted that in spite of limitations this method has an important role in securing the rights of the individual and the proper conduct of government. Apart from contributing to African assurance in the immediate future, it is of greater importance in the long term protection and confidence of race minority groups when predominantly African Governments appear within the Federation.

C. A suitable body to check discriminatory legislation in the Federal field would be a Council of State consisting of the Executive Heads of the Territorial and Federal Governments or their deputies and the Chief Justice or his deputy acting as non-voting Chairman and adviser on legal matters.

Any Federal legislation or instrument which has the force of law considered discriminating by any Government within the Federation, may be referred to the "Council of State" provided this is done within six weeks after the Bill has been approved by the Federal Legislature.

Discrimination shall be defined as the imposition of liabilities and duties, rights and privileges unequally as between members of different races and religions in so far as the Legislature concerned is empowered to legislate for all races and which imposition would be detrimental to the interest of the members of one or other race or religion.

In the event of all Territorial members of the Council declaring a measure discriminatory, it shall be vetoed unless the Federal Legislature amends it as required by the Council.

In the event of equal disagreement in the Council the Bill shall be returned to the Federal Legislature for re-consideration and if not amended in the terms required, a 75% vote in favour shall be necessary before it has the force of law.

In the event of one member of the council recording dissent which in the opinion of the Chief Justice is not frivolous or irrelevant the Bill shall be returned to the Federal Legislature for reconsideration and if not amended to meet the objection a 60% vote in favour shall be necessary before it has the force of law.

A law or instrument which has the force of law which has been passed by the Council of State as non-discriminatory (as defined) or has been re-enacted by the required majority of the Federal Legislature may not be challenged in the Courts on the grounds of discrimination except in respect of the Principle (ii) of the Constitution.

The advantages of the proposals are:—

- (i) Full use is taken of the opportunity for safeguard provided by the Federal system.
- (ii) The Territorial Government concerned with the day-to-day affairs of the individual, particularly the African, is the appropriate and responsible body to watch over Federal legislation which differentiates between the races within its territory. This is an extension of the principles of territorial check on Federal power to amend the Constitution under Section 97 of the 1956 Constitution.
- (iii) This system will invoke an attitude of care on the part of the Federal Government and Legislature.
- (iv) Providing for consultation at the highest level in this manner it offers the opportunity to resolve any problem on the most responsible plane.
- (v) It avoids the serious disadvantages of a Federal Upper House enumerated below.

The proposal of a Federal Upper House whether it be a full Senate or smaller constitutional council as the alternative is rejected for the following reasons:—

- (a) The composition of a Senate provides serious difficulties. A Senate with representation based on race, elected or nominated, cuts across the whole basic concept of progressively eliminating the division of legislators on racial grounds which inevitably leads to an intense racial approach, in favour of merit and national policy being the measure. This view is clearly the motive in the Federal Constitutional Amendment and Electoral Acts of 1957. The experience of the Federal Parliament (including that of the African Affairs Board) already confirms the wisdom of this decision. The long term repercussions of departure from this principle outweigh any immediate advantage or convenience.
- (b) A Senate elected by electoral colleges will of necessity mainly consist of racial representation.
- (c) A Senate elected by the general electorate or Legislature may have an outlook approximating that of the Lower House and in practice becomes divided on the same political lines (as has occurred in Australia). Theoretically its protectionist role is suspect.

- (d) A nominated Senate, apart from becoming detached from the realities of politics thus losing its vitality presents the problem of who nominates it. Nomination by the Prime Minister or even the Legislature makes its race protectionist roll suspect. Nominated by the Governors or Governor-General may bring those personages into serious political controversy.
- (e) The composition and the powers of a Senate may be satisfactorily designed for present circumstances but obsolete even in the near future with the rapidity of change and adjustment between the races. This presents the problem of the constitutional power to alter or abolish it. This aspect makes it suspect as a constitutional instrument of race protection following the experience in the Union of South Africa where simple enlargement of the Senate in 1958 enabled the Government to abolish the coloured vote.
- (f) If the power of a senate is limited to the extent that it cannot seriously impede government, its value as a racial safeguard may be more nominal than real.
- (g) While delay and review is beneficial with much legislation it would least apply to the main Federal functions where racial matters are not concerned and where speed would be an advantage.
- (h) The prospect of eight legislative bodies in the Federation (six in the immediate future, two in the Federal field and two in Southern Rhodesia) seems out of all proportion to its population, development and size. The problem of finding individuals of high enough calibre from a small civilised population and the expense is not to be ignored. The electorate will take this view as they have widely questioned the need and cost of three Governors and one Governor-General.

Protection will be more realistically served by the composite arrangement of constitutional principles effectively entrenched in the Federal System, the procedure by which functions may be transferred between Governments and the Constitution changed and the use of a Council of State already outlined.

IV. A Non-Racial qualified Franchise throughout the Federation:

The control of franchise conditions should be vested in the Government to whom the particular franchise refers. However, all governments within the Federation must be constitutionally bound to provide for a qualified non-racial franchise where the standard of education and degree of interest will ensure elections free of force, intimidation and misrepresentation, government in responsible and civilised hands and the rights of opposition respected. The present special African representation in the Federal Legislature may be accepted as a maximum temporary provision as envisaged in the Federal Act.

This submission is made for the following reasons:

- (a) Unqualified adult suffrage in countries whose economy is unable to raise standards above a subsistence level, creates extreme pressures on government which result in a corresponding withering away of liberty and democratic processes, leading even to complete dictatorship. Parliamentary ritual may be retained but in reality it become a facade and the individual's influence in government disappears. This has been the experience of newly acquired independence in post-war Asia and Africa with rare exception. It is a fact which cannot be overstressed.

The success of Parliamentary democracy in Britain may well have been dependent on its franchise widening pari passu with its economic growth, in contrast to the history of European continental dictatorships.

- (b) In uncivilised and illiterate communities, gross misrepresentation, intimidation, fear and lack of appreciation of the issues at stake in a modern state make universal franchise not only a mockery but a dangerous weapon. The record of African nationalist movements in Central Africa is unfortunately bad in this respect and a clear warning of the danger. (e.g. vide "Devlin" Report July 1959 Paras. 40, 41 and 162 and Page 145 "Beadle" Report 1959 pages 15, 16 and 17.)

The African's tradition is one of witchcraft, superstition and absolutism in rule and obedience. Parliamentary democracy is a radical innovation and the traits necessary for its success quite foreign to him.

The subtle importance of accepting majority decision, tolerance of other views, community responsibility and ability to surrender authority voluntarily, have not been bred in him.

The vast majority of the African population have no conception of the involved framework of government and therefore lack political consciousness. The majority of detribalised Africans who could qualify for the vote and are urged to do so, remain aloof.

These deficiencies can only be filled by education, civilisation, example and tradition and these take time. The road to democracy must be kept open while these develop. It cannot be achieved by immediate universal suffrage which will be the first step to dictatorship thereby shutting the door completely.

- (c) Most Europeans consider that rapid extension of the Franchise by lowering or abolishing qualifications will be exploited to establish an African Nationalist Government which will destroy European standards in a levelling down process without benefit to the African masses. In fact the economic consequences of making domicile untenable for the majority of Europeans will cause a severe setback to African welfare and progress, unless bolstered by outside capital and other assistance.

The European's claim to safeguard his standards are as valid as the African claim to opportunity. Government by Africans in the modern sense is essentially untried and their history does not inspire any confidence. The outcome is so basic to European survival that the European is not prepared, nor can he be expected, to gamble wildly that an African Government under present circumstances will secure his interests.

The European has however clearly indicated in the Southern Rhodesian referendum of 1953 on Federation and subsequent general elections that he is fully prepared to accept civilised and responsible Africans into national political life on equal qualifications to himself. The tradition of multiracial democratic government will thus be built, going hand in hand with the national economic progress, the extension of education to all and the growth of an African middle class all to ensure a levelling up of standards and a non-racial political outlook.

There is no prospect of success in a harmonious multiracial state if the European case is ignored, and if there is a rapid transfer of power divorced from the rate of African progress in the other spheres.

- (d) The theoretical plea that unless the African has considerably more say in government his progress will be stultified and his opportunity limited is not an issue in the Federal sphere and holds little ground under our circumstances. In the main African opportunity lies in Territorial hands in its control of African education. In this essential respect Southern Rhodesia with its "European" Government has done more than the Colonial Territories or independent African States. Industrial development essentially the result of European enterprise and initiative, has provided employment opportunity for the African, also to a greater extent in Southern Rhodesia which is significantly now committed in law to a non-racial policy in the sphere of labour.

The Federal Government's direct control of African opportunity is limited to employment in its own civil service and undertakings. Indirectly by promoting the economic development of the Federation, the Federal Government has the key to opportunity for all races but this function is not dependent on the degree of African participation in government but the calibre of its administrators.

- (e) Distinction between the emergent African and the African mass. The problem of meeting the legitimate needs of the minority group of "emergent" African is quite different to that facing the mass of the African population. The intellectual faces the colour bar. The urban worker faces employment, housing and wage problems. The rural mass is hampered by ignorance, relative land shortage, communalism and a subsistence economy. It is a false assumption that the interests of these groups and the solutions of their problems are identical. In some important respects they clash. The nationalist emergent African automatically identifies his class with the majority groups politically by virtue of common racial origin. By this implication, we are led to assume that his class will be more inclined and able to solve the difficulties of the mass of people than a government based on a qualified franchise, which means European control for some time to come. But past experience here and recent events elsewhere in Africa suggest the contrary to be true.

- (f) The pattern of Franchise in the two Protectorate Territories has not yet been set on a non-racial civilised basis as it has in the Federal and Southern Rhodesian spheres. The great pressure from the small group of politically educated local Africans added by powerful forces elsewhere in Africa and overseas especially the United Kingdom could result for all practical purposes in a universal suffrage. Apart from the dangers of such a policy already outlined, the stresses within the Federation that would stem from extreme contrast of systems may be serious and should therefore be avoided. Continued indecision of what franchise system is to be followed in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland is undermining their stability and progress. Settling this matter is fundamental to the success of the Federation.

V. A system of Division of Legislative and Executive Functions providing for Entrenchments and Methods of Change:

In devising a permanent arrangement to meet the problems of the division of powers the following aspects should be taken into account:

- (a) As Federal independence in its own sphere is advocated the review should take full account of long term requirements.
- (b) Constitutional provisions are necessary to ensure that certain functions remain in particular spheres to secure the fullest economic development of the Federation or as racial group assurances or safeguards.
- (c) On the other hand reallocations of functions or adjustments in many subjects will be required from time to time to meet change of internal or world circumstances. For this purpose an easy procedure is necessary to overcome the resistance to change which is an adverse feature inherent in a Federal framework.
- (d) Federal functions should be restricted, apart from a few exceptions meeting overriding race consideration to those functions which serve the joint need. This will alleviate the fears that the pattern of life of one territory will be imposed on another. Even if this fear is groundless it is the prop for secession. It will also facilitate the entrance of new territories into it, a probability arising from the inevitable realignment and fragmentation of neighbouring areas in the rapid political evolution of Southern Africa.
- (e) Reallocation of a number of functions at this stage is necessary to bring about greater efficiency and smoother government. Some division of powers have not been in the best interests of administering services. Where there is different control of allied functions, conflict of policy and the extent of liaison necessary has made for unwieldy and retarded administration. This aspect is not pursued in detail as it primarily requires a comprehensive study by those who have administered the departments concerned.

On the basis of these factors the following general recommendations are submitted:—

- (a) Federal and Territorial exclusive lists are required covering only essential subjects which should be entrenched, i.e. where the possibility of transfer of a function exists it may not be transferred from one government to another without unanimous agreement between all four Legislatures including a two-thirds vote in favour in the Legislature yielding the responsibility.

Broadly the Federal entrenched list should include:

- (1) External Affairs in its entirety
- (2) Defence
- (3) Population Control, e.g. Immigration and Emigration into the Federation. Extradition and Federal Citizenship
- (4) Finance Control, Banking, Currency and Coinage. Capital Issues. Loans and their guarantees. Tax on Income, Profits and Goods Duties of Customs & Excise.
- (5) Trade Control—Imports and Exports into the Federation. Price of Goods. Weights & Measures and Standards. Copyrights and Patents.

- (6) Communications, Railways, Airways, Posts and Telegraphs.

- (7) The Judiciary in the Federal Sphere.

Broadly the Territorial entrenched list should include:

- (i) Justice, Crime and Order—Police, C.I.D. Courts, Prisons and Reformatories. Interterritorial movement of persons.
- (ii) Local Government and Licencing.
- (iii) Labour, Apprenticeship & Industrial Conciliation.
- (iv) Social Welfare.
- (v) Land and Land Apportionment.
- (vi) African Affairs except where specifically stipulated.

- (b) The remainder of Federal and Territorial exclusive subjects as well as the concurrent list, all determined after early review of the Federation's experience to date, should be freely interchangeable from one list to another by direct agreement between the Federal and Territorial Governments concerned.

- (c) Exceptions to this which require special consideration are non-African education, curative health services and agriculture. Those important services have been divided on racial lines or allotted because of race considerations. Education and curative health services are essentially regional or local in scope and are generally accepted as local, regional or provincial. Federal control of purely territorial or regional services is top heavy with superimposed superfluous Federal administration and accordingly is costly and unwieldy, remote and less efficient. It is for this reason that while their return to territorial hands must be possible, because of the racial group interests it should not take place without the concurrence of the communities affected by a referendum or should take place if the communities so petition the government concerned. Agriculture and its allied subjects are presently divided on a racial basis without territorial uniformity. Its final place is in the balance and is therefore included in this category of change and also subject to the desire or agreement of the communities affected.

- (d) If change is desired by a government in respect of a non-entrenched subject but no agreement is reached between the governments concerned the status quo should remain except that where all three territories are affected and their Legislatures endorse the request their joint decision should prevail over Federal objection.

- (e) Transfer of function from one government to another must entail financial adjustment of revenue allocation and loan debt responsibility on the basis of the average cost of administering it over a prescribed number of years and the value of the assets respectively. Details of those should be determined by agreement between the government concerned or failing agreement by an arbitrator appointed by the Federal Chief Justice or a Financial Review Body.

- (f) Transfer of a subject should be permissive from the Federal to the territorial sphere or vice versa to affect one or two territories only. Except in the case of entrenched subjects and provided the fiscal readjustment is carried out the negotiation and arrangements for the transfer should only be the concern of the government involved.

- (g) The provisions contained in Chapter 3 of the 1953 Constitution should continue as follows:—

Section 29(6) Regional application and variation of Federal Laws: Section 32(1) and 32(2) (a), (3) and (4)—delegation of power between governments to make laws; Section 34—application of certain Federal laws to the Territories subject to territorial declaration; Section 35(1), (2), (3), (4), (5)—Regulating the effect of Federal and Territorial laws on one another.

- (h) The processes for delegation and co-ordination of executive authority of the Federation and Territories contained in Chapters 41 and 42 should continue.

- (i) The system of taxation, revenue distribution and control of loans as provided for in the Constitution of 1953, which closely links the finances of the Federal and Territorial Governments should continue although detail adjustments are required. Periodic review of revenue allocations should continue as per Section 96 of the Constitution of 1953.

VI. African Land Protection and Development:

The combined effect of Territorial Land Laws, the restriction on the Federal Government through the division of legislative and executive powers and by Section 33 of the 1953 Constitution as well as the general fears of encroaching on African lands, perpetuates their primitive state.

Protection of African land against non-African exploitation will be necessary for indeterminate periods. But restrictions over such vast areas permanently entrenched will hamper development more and more as the population pressure grows and the need to utilise resources to the full will become more pressing. Primitive subsistence methods will need to give way to skill, efficiency and modern techniques if we are to raise national productivity and living standards. This change cannot be effective behind strict racial barriers. In the African areas of Nyasaland and Southern Rhodesia the stage has been reached where over population is forcing the breakdown of rural communalism and surplus population can only find an outlet in European industrial areas. In European areas the pressure of urban and industrial need is forcing land apportionment amendments to allow African ownership of property.

A "permanent" constitution which acknowledging the status quo protection must also provide for orderly change whereby race reservations can be modified to facilitate enterprise and investment.

Land control will remain a Territorial responsibility and giving effect to these principles is a Territorial constitutional problem. But unless development of African areas is given a place in finance planning at a Federal level and impediments are removed substantial progress will not be made.

It is therefore suggested that consideration be given to constitute an African Lands Development Council consisting of Federal and Territorial Ministerial representatives. Its function will be to consider territorial plans for a special development scheme in African Areas, decide priorities and make recommendations to the Loans Council for special capital funds as well as the amendment of restrictions necessary for the success of any scheme. The Loans Council should be required to consider these recommendations in the manner set out in Section 89 of the 1953 Constitution. African safeguard lies in the territorial control of any scheme and trustee or local community agreement to alienation of land and its compensation.

VII. A Joint Civil Service Permissive:

A Civil Service common to the four governments with uniform conditions and freely interchangeable is eminently desirable in the long term. Enforcing such a system at this stage will however fan the fear of Federal or inter-territorial interference. It is suggested that provision be made in the Constitution for any number of the governments to establish a joint Civil Service when they so wish and for any government standing aloof to join at any time.

Pending this eventuality it is important in the Northern Territories to replace the Colonial Service by a local Civil Service, thereby creating an entirely local outlook, interest and loyalty. The absence of this (inevitable in the present system) has aggravated the stress to which Federation has been subjected since its inauguration.

VIII. Requiring the Federal Legislature and Government to be located away from the Territorial Seat of Government:

The Constitution should stipulate that the Federal Government and Legislature may not be sited in the same urban centre as a Territorial Government and Legislature. The present situation of Salisbury's dual capital status should be terminated.

The principle reasons are summarised:—

- (a) Siting the Federal Capital in Salisbury creates the impression of over-emphasis of Southern Rhodesia's influence on Federal affairs, primarily because of juxtaposition of the two governments. Northern resentment and suspicion would fall away on separation of the two capitals. Removing the grounds for this feeling is important at this early formative stage in the life of the Federation.
- (b) Concentrating Federal and Southern Rhodesian central administration in Salisbury has set in train extreme centralisation of national activity in this area leading to unhealthy and ill-balance development and regional political power. Not the least of the many adverse consequences is the unmanageable rate of influx of African population (vide analysis and conclusions of the Federal Parliament's Select Committee on Decentralisation 1956 and Southern Rhodesia Parliament's Select Committee on Industrial Development and Distribution 1959).

The Territorial Government no doubt has priority of choice of its location. If it desires to remain in Salisbury, the Federal Government must move its domicile to another centre in Southern Rhodesia or in the Northern Territories.

March 1960

Oral Evidence

Dr. M. I. HIRSCH, M.P.

In amplifying his memorandum, Dr. Hirsch said that he was Union born, qualified before the war, served in the South African Forces in a medical capacity and came to Southern Rhodesia immediately after 1946. He had practised in Que Que since and had spent twelve years in local government, three of which he was Mayor, and at that stage he fought unsuccessfully a Federal by-election, but was subsequently elected to the Southern Rhodesia Assembly in 1958.

Dr. Hirsch said he had made a special point of proposing a Senate for the Federation and, as it was an unusual proposal, he wished to bring one point to the notice of the Commission, which was the great difference in the number of voters for parliamentary seats in Southern Rhodesia as compared with Nyasaland. If a Senate was envisaged there would no doubt be equal representation territorially. In Nyasaland there were 400 voters per seat; in Salisbury about 4,000. The gap was too big.

Another device which might overcome some of the difficulties as to how the Senate would be made up would be perhaps to adopt the racial partnership idea of the Senate whereby certain legislation in going through the Senate, affecting a particular race group, would have to have the agreement by that race before it became law. Unless the African members agreed, certain things would have to be referred back until, say, the next election. But the items affected would have to be specifically laid down otherwise on every subject you would find indirect reference to certain races affected and they would apply a veto. For example, on health, an African member in the Senate might say the rations in the hospitals were different for Africans and Europeans, and therefore they thought their position was prejudiced and must be changed.

On the question of money Bills, the witness said that the main concern of the Federal Government should be the economic development of the Federation. He did not consider it would be a serious objection to the Senate principle if it were used as a means of controlling possible discrimination, as the money provisions would not apply so largely in the Federal sphere, but they certainly would apply to a very great extent in the Territorial sphere.

Dr. Hirsch wished to stress that one could not get away from the gradual sorting out of the problems between the races in the day-to-day life of the Territories. There would be no need to carry that into the Federal sphere if one looked at the Federal Government as something developing into merely a controlling body which could not directly influence the day-to-day life of the people. In his opinion, the great idea behind Federation was to be able to take out all the non-controversial development as between the three Territories and put it under one head. If any racial issues were introduced into the Federal sphere as a permanent thing, even unwittingly, the witness was certain that they would be looked at only from the widest point of view as the Senate would only be concerned with broad development. There were other objections. Being a Federal set-up, arrangements had already been made for a division of sovereignty and it was quite different from the situation in the Union where all sovereignty was really vested in one government.

Another point on the Senate idea the witness favoured was the creation of an electoral college for elections to the Senate, in order to reduce any tendencies to race politics in the Senate.

The witness also wished to stress the need for changes in the division of functions. He emphasised that certain functions must be entrenched in the Federal list to make certain that the economic development of the Federation remained in Federal hands; equally on the Territorial side matters which are directly the concern of the individual—and particularly relationships between the races—should be entrenched in a Territorial list.

The witness considered that the Territorial list should include all social welfare matters. There were a lot of anomalies causing stresses between the Governments which should be removed; as an example, one found the National Parks of Southern Rhodesia and Tourism were Federal while the Game Reserves, which were intimately concerned with tourism and National Parks, were Territorial. Understandably, different views were held by the Governments and needless disharmony could and did result.

On the subject of interchangeability of functions between the Federal and Territorial Governments, the witness considered the subjects could be interchanged by direct agreement between the Governments concerned. There were certain items now in Federal hands which were put there for safeguards. European education was made Federal specifically to safeguard the European position or to keep the confidence of the Northern Territories. The curative medical services were local concerns, much more closely on a direct level with the people than the remote Federal concern which was top heavy. It was not very efficient because the Ministry was apt to consider something that happened in Southern Rhodesia could not be changed because of what might happen in Nyasaland. Such matters could well be returned to the Territories. The witness considered that if the Governments wished to make a change they should hold a referendum of the people which would create a lot of confidence at this stage to leave the way open to having a more logical division of functions than there was at present, considering it from a purely administrative point of view.

The witness recommended that health and non-African education should be Territorial functions in the long term, not necessarily immediately. There should be agreement by the race groups on a referendum before any change was made. The major section of Dr. Hirsch's recommendations dealt with safeguards which would replace the guarantees now held in U.K. hands because of its reserve authority. The witness understood it was very doubtful whether the powers held by the British Government had really any strength at all, apart from power in respect of Native legislation. It was more to establish a set-up which would give growing confidence to the race groups that their position, opportunities and standards were secure.

The witness said he would like to see included in the Constitution a Bill of Rights, but with one reservation, that the question of non-discrimination should not be included in the Bill of Rights except in respect of the vote. There was a great fear in having a Bill of Rights at all, because the feeling was that you could not have a single non-discriminatory clause in it. In the scheme presented, Dr. Hirsch said he had tried to emphasise that discrimination was an entirely different matter from a Bill of Rights. The Bill of Rights still laid down the fundamental rights of each individual in the Federation. The witness did not consider the Bill of Rights should replace the present African Affairs Board. Once you introduced the question of discrimination into a Bill of Rights, he said, you either made Government untenable or made the Bill of Rights nonsensical. If one went through the whole history of the civilization of Africans and Europeans, their differences were so tremendous that one inevitably must have discrimination until the population as a whole was far more homogeneous, and therefore whether a discrimination was wise or in the interests of one group or another, was a political decision and must remain a political decision; but there should be no discrimination in regard to the franchise.

Referring to his memorandum, section III C, the witness considered a suitable body to check discriminatory legislation in the Federal field would be a Council of State consisting of the Prime Minister of the Federal Government, the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia and the two Governors of the two Northern Territories. When they had Prime Ministers in the Northern Territories, they would take the place of the Governors. The witness did not think there need be any objection to a nominated Senate, nominated by the Governors or the Governor-General, nor that this would bring those personages into serious political controversy, particularly as the Governors in the two Northern Territories were virtually prime ministers, having overriding governmental functions as well. The prime ministers would be elected so there could not be any objection in their case. One could assume that the constitutional advance in the Northern Territories would come in reasonable time when they became self-governing colonies like Southern Rhodesia.

The witness thought a proposal, suggested by a member of the Commission, for the setting up of a separate Select Committee by the Federal Legislature would be less acceptable. Once one departed from the Council of State of the heads of Government, one was immediately up against the question of how many representatives there should be. A Council of State was the only system he could think of where the question of how many of each group should sit did not arise.

The witness wished to keep the reservation that if all the Territories should agree that a Bill was discriminatory, it was a political matter, not a judicial one. In the event of equal disagreement in the Council, a Bill would be returned to the Federal Legislature for reconsideration when, if not amended in the terms required, a 75 per cent. vote in favour would be necessary before it became law.

The witness considered that with the present make-up of the voting structure of the three Territories, with the special representatives, 75 per cent. would secure the position. The idea was that there would need to be at least one or two African votes in order to secure the 75 per cent. In the event of one member of the Council recording dissent which, in the opinion of the Chief Justice, was not frivolous or irrelevant, a Bill would be returned to the Federal Legislature for reconsideration. The witness did not take the point as to whether or not it was wise for a judge to rule on that question; but he said there was something like that in the present Constitution where the Governor considered a matter. He thought the judge should decide whether the dissent was frivolous or irrelevant; he was not asking him to make a decision whether the discrimination was wise or not. But he agreed it could be some person other than the Chief Justice.

Concerning the proposal for a Bill of Rights, in effect it would be written into the Bill of Rights that each Government had to have the absolute discretion as to whether it gave its own people a Bill of Rights or not. Any Bill of Rights must be non-racial, but each Government should have the right to qualify the details. The witness did not consider this would alarm the Africans. A government would have the absolute right to prevent persons from having any representation at all if it was a question as to whether they were civilized people. The Government was entitled in each case to say they did not think that anybody was civilized unless that person possessed certain qualifications. The African had nothing to fear because the time would come, whatever franchise rules applied, when more and more Africans must get onto the roll. In the witness's opinion, for a long time the franchise could not be high enough; this was not based on racialism but related to the stage of development.

Changes in the wage structure would occur as the country developed, and until economic development had reached the stage where every person in the Federation could enjoy a standard of living above a marginal level, one must avoid here what was happening in developing countries which had taken the cry of "one man, one vote" as the panacea to all their ills. The speed of the development would be determined by the African himself in the main. The witness agreed that as things were at the moment there was financial discrimination, but it was becoming less and there had been a very notable change since the war. There was in Southern Rhodesia the new Industrial Conciliation Act which, in due course, would have the effect of making the rate for the job apply throughout industry. That Bill had only become law since the 1st January, and there was still a lot of sorting out to be done as to what the rate was to be for each job. It would not involve much change for a long time. The witness agreed that at the moment the European trade unionists had a very large say in industrial policy; they would not all subscribe to having the same standards as the basis of entry into skilled jobs.

The witness agreed that it was a matter for serious consideration whether this would not have a bad psychological effect on the Africans, because although discrimination was not wanted, the franchise would be entrenched and it would take most Africans many years to reach the same standards. Dr. Hirsch said he believed there were many Africans who could be on the voters' roll and thought they did not go on because they lacked a political awareness and consciousness. The witness said he would hate to see a set-up whereunder they must have at least twenty Africans in Government. If, however, there were twenty Africans properly elected to Government, they would be developing their ability and they would represent also the measure of the advance of the general community. He would then be satisfied they must be in it; but once one started to pander to the thought that there should be so many Africans in Government in order to satisfy them now, there was no stopping it.

However, Dr. Hirsch said he attached importance to getting support for Federal principles, but he did not think that should be the overall determining factor. The great mass of the Africans just did not know what it was all about. He wanted to see the Africans progress, and he wanted them to be able to understand what they were doing.

On the subject of pass laws, the witness said they were too numerous and unsatisfactory, but some system of identification was necessary; African identification was far from being a simple matter.

Dr. Hirsch said that he would like to see Africans in the Southern Rhodesia Legislature, but not for the reason that we must simply give the African seats in the House. In the next election, with the numbers now coming on to the roll, it was likely one or two would be elected. The best way to achieve the election of Africans was to educate them as fast as we possibly could. One could not lay down a time factor for this. One must have economic development going forward together with African education, coupled with understanding of one another on the part of both the African and the European. It was very difficult to understand Federation, and difficult to explain it even to an intelligent African, unless he had basic education, and had witnessed Government in operation. The whole point was that all these things must grow together, namely, the understanding, the knowledge, the economics and the tradition of how the game is played. Concerning the point in Section IV (d) in the memorandum that unless the African had considerably more say in government, his progress would be stultified and his opportunity limited, and that it was not an issue in the Federal sphere and holds little ground under our circumstances, the witness agreed that it did tend to ignore the psychological aspect, and he stated that there was some emotional appeal. He knew quite a number of Africans who would not like to have an African ruling them at this stage because he would not be trusted. The witness believed the African would definitely progress and have a greater say in government, but this must come naturally. He was in no sense opposed to this being achieved at once provided it was on a basis of merit. As they got better education, gained more skill, got the higher jobs in industry and in the professions, in the activity of the country in every sphere, so tradition would grow.

Dr. Hirsch did not agree that the idea of the word "partnership" was a sort of psychological dream which meant something to the Africans which they expected but which did not materialise. There had been a lot of racial discrimination which had been done away with since 1958. The witness considered the bigger problem in Southern Rhodesia was that partnership was not a legislative difficulty; it was one of race relations generally. The big problem was in meeting the delay which pursued the educated African and professional man and that group which had no cultural link with the Europeans and therefore felt very frustrated and rejected. The African immediately turned his emotional frustration on to how he considered the Africans elsewhere were treated. There was nothing Government could do about that. The Party did do something about it at the Party congresses, and Africans took a full part in the activities of these congresses.

Dr. Hirsch wished to mention two other points, one of which worried him very much, but which was not within the Federal sphere. It was the effort to entrench African land laws for all time. He believed that was the worst thing that could happen to the African. The land should not be retained as a separate category. At the moment no African land could be alienated to a European or for any other development. This would obviously prevent capital and enterprise of any sort going into that land, and it must hold back the economic development of the country and of the African. He was not making any plea to remove the safeguards on African land entirely, but considered there should be some system laid down whereby African land as a development opportunity was brought into the general sphere of development. Dr. Hirsch was not prepared to comment on the African land situation in the Northern Territories.

The other point was the question of everything being centralized in Salisbury. He believed very strongly that politically and economically it was doing the Federation immense harm, and that this harm would grow.

These were factors which he considered detrimental to the Federation.

Oral Evidence

A EUROPEAN RESIDENT OF QUE QUE *

The witness said his family came out here as early as 1901; he arrived in this country forty years ago and had been in Que Que for that time.

The witness made a brief review of the history of Rhodesia, saying the beginnings of Southern Rhodesia and the beginnings of Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia were so different, one having been taken by force of arms by Cecil Rhodes, who handed out farms and mining concessions to Europeans, proving that it was Rhodes's intention that Europeans should stay in Southern Rhodesia. The Europeans held the freehold title to land and in addition they owned practically the whole of the city property. At the time, that Southern Rhodesia was occupied this country was comparatively empty, and it is absurd to say that the white man took the land from the black men. The European protected the local Bantu from their enemies, he did not take land away from them, but put them in reserves and looked after them.

In the case of Nyasaland, Sir Harry Johnston resisted Cecil Rhodes and his Chartered Company, the country became a protected Territory and it had become a territory where it was expected that the African would take over the government. As a result of the policy there they had no freehold title in Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia such as there was in Southern Rhodesia. There was a very much larger population in Nyasaland; they were in a more tropical area, and that is one of the reasons why slave trade decimated them to a great extent. Northern Rhodesia was much the same except that beginning in the 1920's, the Copperbelt discoveries complicated things a little. The problem facing the country today arose from the fact that in the North there were two very different types of states which had not politically advanced to the extent Southern Rhodesia had.

If one was going to have a Federation one had to have to have a Federal Government, and also a largely African electorate, said the Witness, who considered that the electorate in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland was 99 per cent. illiterate. In answer to a question later in his evidence, on the two types of qualifications for the franchise, he said he did not think that the financial one entered into it at all. He did not consider that there was one per cent. among the African population suitable for voting at the present time. Once there was good education, there would be no danger whatsoever in giving the vote.

It was quite impossible for the British Government to guarantee that an educated minority would be protected and that included educated Africans as well as educated Europeans.

An African electorate could undoubtedly dominate the Federal Parliament within five years, and this Parliament was bound to have very important functions but it would be functioning before the electorate had reached any sufficiently advanced stage of education.

At the moment there were a large number of discriminatory laws which covered a very wide range, and were entirely based on colour. There were agricultural products such as maize, tobacco, milk and grain of all descriptions which were all controlled for the European, but they were not controlled for the African. The African could sell tobacco and milk to each other without coming under the Act. It was a criminal offence not to pay the African his wages, but only a civil offence not to pay the European his.

There was the danger of the African leader who achieved power by means of the Westminster-type of democracy, which worked very well in England, abusing it. The witness said Africans were used to the power of the Chief, where might was right. They had not got beyond that stage yet, and if the Westminster-type of democracy were introduced they would be at each others' throats. He considered that one of the reasons Federation had come into being was because the African thought he was going to get more money from loans which were promised.

The witness said that in his view education would make all the children the same although it would take time; but that time had not yet arrived. He would like to see Southern Rhodesian African education increased but he did not see why they should have to contribute in any way to the education of the Nyasaland African. He considered that that should be the function of the Colonial Office. Additionally there was the factor of Christian tolerance. In his view the doctrine of Christian tolerance was the only one which was likely to save humanity from extinction, and until you had tolerance as well as education there would be a lot of trouble. There was also the danger of Communism, and there were already black States on the borders of the Federation.

The witness visualised Southern Rhodesia as a country of prosperity and security. The Africans would become voters as soon as they could and when they got to the same stage as Europeans they would want the same things and the Europeans were quite prepared to share the prosperity and wealth with Africans having parity with them in every way. He considered Native reserves should be under special laws for uneducated Africans, and educated Africans should not be allowed into those reserves in exactly the same way as Europeans were not allowed in there; these Africans should not be allowed to exploit the others.

On being asked if he had seen any economic progress in this country since Federation came into being, he said that the progress which had been seen was largely represented by a mushroom growth which had not done any good at all. True prosperity was really non-existent.

The witness said, in common with Dr. Banda, he was in favour of the most tenuous ties between Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, though for completely opposite reasons. The witness said he would like to see the present Federal Parliament broken up altogether, but he commented that that was not within the Commission's terms of reference. He considered the Federal Government would be a big bone of contention but there would need to be some tenuous tie between the three Territories on the economic side and for such things as policing.

MRS. L. MARASHA

Mrs. Marasha said the points she wished to bring up to the Commission concerned African accommodation in the African urban areas. The houses that were available were much too small for the people and these were the houses that were available for purchase by Africans. She said that they should have three bedrooms, a bathroom, a toilet room, garage and a yard because the Africans who had come to the urban areas had decided to make their lives in them and not return to the reserves, and accordingly proper accommodation was essential.

She said that urban Africans were prepared to pay for better housing, but she was unaware that the cost of a house such as the one she mentioned would be as much as £2,500 or a payment of £14 to £18 a month. It was mentioned to the witness by one of the Commissioners that through the building societies the Government was prepared to assist people who could afford the charges, and Mrs. Marasha stated that these were the people to whom she referred; they should be in a position to get a much better quality house than was available to them at the moment.

Another complaint that Mrs. Marasha brought before the Commission concerned the action by employers in dispensing with the services of married men and taking on single men instead. This caused great hardship not only to the head of the family but also to the wives and families as well. This was particularly so with the urbanised African because he had broken his ties with the villages and the reserves, and he had nowhere to go for this reason other than to seek fresh employment. The reason employers adopted this practice was that single men were cheaper to house. She thought it was necessary to make an enquiry into matters such as these.

Mrs. Marasha said that her husband was previously in the British South African Police where he had reached the rank of sergeant. He was now an interpreter in the Magistrates' Court.

CHIEF MALISHA AND HEADMEN SIHLAHLA AND SANENGETA

The Chief and Headmen mentioned were accompanied by 23 Headmen, Kraal heads and followers and they represented the Silobela Native Purchase Area. Opening his evidence, Chief Malisha said that the Africans were somewhat surprised at what was happening, particularly in regard to taxes which were constantly increasing and, as a result, it was difficult to make ends meet. The taxes etc. he referred to were poll tax, dog tax, school fees and dipping fees. Headman Sihlahla complained that there was no sign that the Commission, which they had heard of ages ago, had achieved anything so far. Afterwards it was explained to the Headman that the Commission was still engaged on its enquiries. The witness proceeded by saying that the people were disappointed that schools in the rural areas should cater for education to Standard VI only which in no sense provided a proper education; what they needed were secondary school facilities which would enable their children to go on to higher education.

The Headmen said that they had indeed heard of the Federation, and understood that its purpose was to bring together the two Rhodesias and Nyasaland and ensure a fair deal for all. As Headmen, however, they would say that Federation was not a particularly good thing for the Africans because they were unable to see what good had flowed from Federation for the benefit of Africans.

Headman Sanengeta criticized the application of the Land Husbandry Act, and said that there was not enough room for the grazing and kraaling of cattle because the Europeans had robbed the Africans and taken their lands. Water was another very serious problem in their area. He said that when the poll tax was raised from £1 to £2 they had been informed that the reason for the tax being raised was to provide better schools in the rural areas. They had seen little sign of this. They had a number of schools, some of which they had built themselves, but none had been built since the tax was doubled. He was aware, however, that some had been built in the urban areas and that teachers were being paid by the Government. The school fees that they paid, which amounted to 20/- per annum per child for Standards II and III, were appropriated for the payment of teachers' salaries.

Chief Malisha said that he had not heard of the Southern Rhodesia Government's education policy which was designed to get all children educated. He went on to say that in their area they wanted and had asked for a clinic to be built. This had not been done yet although the people did get medicine free of charge. In response to questions put by members of the Commission, the Chief stated that they had only learnt of the Commission within the last week through a messenger from the Native Affairs Department. Although they read newspapers they had seen no news of the Commission but some people had heard of it several months ago through the Native Commissioner who had told them that they could come to the Commission and give evidence. The Chief added that they had not really been taken by surprise the previous week, but the simple fact was that after the initial information the leaders of the people had not met again to consider their action.

The Chief said the people in his area were living happily and quietly, and they were not bothered by politics and there was no intimidation against their giving evidence to the Commission.

He went on to say that while there was no Native Council in his area, he acted with the advice of his Headmen and they had power to try civil cases such as those concerning seduction and adultery. Most of the other cases were referred to the ordinary courts.

He mentioned that the police were always very helpful.

In regard to the implementation of the Land Husbandry Act, the Chief said that the people were not happy about this legislation because under it they are obliged to make contour ridges and do other work connected with the farms. He said the people realised that these ridges prevented soil erosion but they were not always fully effective, particularly when there were very heavy rains. The agricultural demonstrators indicated to the people the land that should be ploughed each year and this was often not the land the people themselves wished to till and plant.

HEADMEN GWESELA, DUKU AND NTABENI OF THE JOMBE AREA

These Headmen were accompanied by 37 other Headmen, Kraal-heads and followers. [This group from the Jombe area come under the tribal authority of Chief Malisha, whose evidence is recorded above.]

Headman Gwesela stated that he and his people had lived in the Jombe area for the last 39 years and this area was on of Crown Land. Within the past few years there had been a lot of changes which had upset the people, such as the increase in taxes and various fees. They had asked for a Government school to be built, but this had never been attended to. The people were being moved from place to place and put on to poor lands. They found that they got poor prices for their crops and for their cattle with the result that they found it very difficult to come out. In the area they had small kraal schools but they wanted Government schools to Standard VI or Standard VIII. The kraal schools that they had had been built by themselves although the teachers were paid by the Government. They had also asked for a hospital, but none had been provided and the nearest hospital was 21 miles away; that was a mission hospital. If they wished to go to a Government hospital, they had to travel 36 miles to Que Que.

Headman Gwesela complained that there was very little water in the area to which they had been assigned. He said there were small rivers in the area but these dried up and they had to resort to wells. The distances the kraals were separated from water supplies varied from six to as much as ten miles. There were no dams or boreholes in the area. He and his people, that is about 1,200 taxpayers, were very concerned and wished for these things to be improved. Up to now, the Native Land Husbandry Act had not been applied to the area.

The Headmen explained that the duties of the Headmen were very light although they tried simple cases because the Chief was too far away. Their main aim was to help their people. Matters of interest or of dispute were originally referred to Kraal-heads, who, if necessary, would pass them on to the Headmen and, in turn, they would go to the Chief and through him to the Native Commissioner. The Chief in reality had no final authority.

Dealing in detail with the difficulties that had faced them since 1953, Headman Gwesela stated that the poll tax had been raised from £1 to £2, dipping fees from 1/- a year per beast to 2/- a year and dog tax from 5/- to 10/-. Maize was purchased by the Grain Marketing Board for 22/8d. a bag yet to buy a bag of meal cost the consumer something approaching 60/-.

On being questioned as to what bearing Federation had on these matters, Headman Gwesela asked if he could be told when it started. On being told it was in 1953, he said that the Africans had seen no good come from it. Subsequently, in answer to another question, the Headman said that he did not realise that all their complaints were within the Territorial sphere, except the hospitals. If that were the case, then the Territorial Government was not good for the African people, and accordingly they had not much to say about the Federal Government and, as far as they were concerned, it was quite possible that it might be something worth while. It was explained to the Headmen that all matters dealing with African affairs were within the Territorial sphere, and the witnesses indicated that they were unaware that Southern Rhodesia was spending three million pounds on African education or that the native tax element represented but one sixth of the total amount being spent on African education alone. The witnesses added that they would not mind increases in taxes if they were able to see results.

Headmen Duku and Ntabeni said they had little to add to what Headman Gwesela had said save to emphasize the extreme difficulties they were experiencing about getting their people educated.

The witnesses said that many people in their area read the newspapers. For themselves, they did not know where the two Governments sat nor who the leaders of these Governments were. A few of those present thought that both Governments operated from Salisbury, but the majority believed both the Federal and Territorial Governments sat in England.

NAGAMO NKALA

Headman of the Amaveni Township (population=3,000)

Mr. Nkala said that the Land Apportionment Act created many difficulties for the Africans and particularly for those people who were cut off from the reserves. There was no longer any place for the de-tribalised African in the reserves and, on his retirement, rents to be paid in the townships were too much for him to be able to afford. If, on retirement, a man still had children, as he often did, it might be very difficult for him to give his children a reasonable education.

Out in the rural areas where it was perhaps reasonable for the Land Apportionment Act still to be applied, Mr. Nkala considered that a man should be given sufficient land or communal grazing land which would enable him to increase his holding of cattle to 30 or 40 head. This was very important because in due time sales of these beasts would provide funds so necessary to enable youngsters to proceed to university or enjoy some other form of higher education.

He was convinced that Africans should be able to purchase land in the European area. What one found so often was that when Crown Land on which Africans squatted was handed over to the Europeans, the African squatters were moved to poor areas and, in the result, they obtained very little yield from their crops, and such cattle as they had usually died. The witness instanced that previously there had been 5000 Africans on the Rhodesdale estate. There were now about two Europeans there. This move, which took place between 1953 and 1955, was to a place called Nkana near Gokwe. Mr. Nkala said that, of course, if the Africans were to be allowed to purchase in the European areas, then the Europeans equally should be allowed to purchase in native areas. After all, African and European transport services operated largely on parallel lines in the reserve areas but the African transport operator was restricted from operating in European urban areas. Restrictions of this nature were often the cause of friction. Mr. Nkala said that just as the Land Apportionment Act operated against the African as far as providing the means of education of his children was concerned, so it operated against him in his desire to buy land in the European area. It was essential to have more cattle. The proceeds of these cattle would put the African in funds which would enable him to purchase land in the European area. The witness also complained that although more land was being reserved for the African, it was always poor sandveld. He was not aware that the biggest percentage of European land owned in the country was the so-called "bad" land or sandveld on which the best tobacco crops were grown. Mr. Nkala concluded his evidence by saying that he and all Africans wanted to have greater freedom of movement, not only in the Territory but in the Federation as a whole.

A. L. GWINDI

Mr. Gwindi said that he was a carpenter and had lived in Que Que for twelve years. He thought it was a nice attempt to have had Federation in practice for these years and he had personally seen the changes that had taken place, the privileges and advantages that had been brought about. He instanced health facilities which had been improved and the bigger hospitals which had built up the health services. He considered that Federation had helped his country to be richer than it was before, because overseas people were investing capital and taking a keen interest in the Federation and its aims. He mentioned the advantage of the Kariba Dam.

Mr. Gwindi thought the legislative powers were complicated for the average African to understand. There were some sections of the laws passed by the Territorial Government and other parts of the laws passed by the Federal Government. It was difficult for an ordinary man to find which section was effected by the Federal Government and which section by the Territorial Government. The witness considered that the Land Apportionment Act had prevented multi-racial schools from being built. He would have liked such schools, and university colleges, not only in Salisbury but further out so that all people might have that education. The witness agreed there was too much centralisation, European education was under one minister, whereas African primary education was under the African Affairs Department, while the minister for European education was a different man entirely from the man controlling African education. It made it difficult after primary education on one basis to go on to secondary education on an entirely different basis. Competence would differ according to the institution attended, so it would be better to have one syllabus for all schools of the same grade. Mr. Gwindi considered that a major problem was that there could not be multi-racial schools because African areas were confined by the Land Apportionment Act. He would like to see Education a Federal responsibility.

The witness said he also wished to see all the functions which were in the hands of the Territorial Government in Southern Rhodesia go to the Federal Government because he considered there was probably more confidence in overseas investment, and if all things were under the Federal Government there would be more advantages for the people living within the Federation. He did not know if the people in Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia would agree about that; it might be very difficult for them to agree because there were certain reserved rights in those countries.

Mr. Gwindi was not happy about the African Affairs Board because it functioned only in an advisory capacity, and he thought something should be substituted for it in the Federal Parliament. Its weakness lay in its being only advisory. He considered that there should be a second chamber with the right to deal with the Board's functions but having a final decision.

Mr. Gwindi said he was interested in politics but was still immature and would like to know more. He was a registered voter although he had not yet decided in which Party he would take an active part. He had an income of £370 per annum and was a common roll voter.

Memorandum

THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF WOMEN OF SOUTHERN RHODESIA—Mrs. D. Lawrence

As a strictly non-party, non-political organisation, the National Council of Women of Southern Rhodesia wishes to submit the following information, which we feel may be of interest to you.

The work that has been done by the N.C.W.S.R. during recent years is a sincere attempt to implement the policy of partnership. We have helped with the formation of non-European and Coloured Councils affiliated to our various branches with the same right of representation at meetings and the same voting powers at Conference.

Here are a few examples of what we have done in this connection, and we have made investigations into:—

1. The needs of African women and children in the urban areas.
2. The incidence of malnutrition amongst urban African school children.
3. African housing.
4. The working conditions of African domestics.
5. We have encouraged the growing of vegetables, and given classes in needlework, cooking, hygiene and child welfare etc.
6. We have helped found creches and day nurseries for African children.
7. Soup kitchens for under-nourished African children.
8. Organised annual competitions for gardening, needlework, home crafts etc.
9. We have introduced the use of dried milk into the diet of the African.

From the above you will see that we are making a sincere effort to lift the African woman from her backward state to enable her to take her place more fully along with her menfolk in a civilised community.

We have also been able to assist in the formation of Coloured and Indian Councils.

We are very proud of the fact that we are the only adult multi-racial organisation in Southern Rhodesia, and can claim to have the right to represent the opinion of women of all races.

As well as our work with the Coloured, Asian and African communities, we have presented evidence to Government Commissions, and have sent forward recommendations to Government on all matters concerning the welfare of the community with particular regard to women and children.

27th January 1960.

THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF WOMEN OF RHODESIA

Delegation: Mrs. W. Owen John—National President

Mrs. Schmulian—First Vice President

Mrs. D. Lawrence—Secretary

Mrs. Owen John said that she was speaking for the National Council of Women as a whole, the headquarters of which were in Gwelo. She understood that the Salisbury branch of the National Council of Women was submitting a separate memorandum which would represent only the views of the Salisbury members. The National Council of Women was the only adult multi-racial organisation in Southern Rhodesia and consisted of Asian, African and European branches, all having equal status. In the Gwelo area there was a European private membership of forty to fifty, and an African membership of about 105, many of whom lived in the Native Reserves. On a national basis there were a large number of affiliated organisations a list of which is attached in the Appendix to the memorandum (see p. . .). Although at the present time there were no mixed branches, it was normal for European members to attend meetings of the branches in the Reserve; in addition, African members attended the European branch for special occasions. The Annual National Congress of the Council was entirely multi-racial, and all members of whatever race attended the various functions (such as a sundowner) connected with the Congress.

The witnesses made the following additional points:—

- (a) One present difficulty was the fact that African women had been left far behind their male counterparts. More schools for African girls were urgently needed.
- (b) Culturally African women were so far behind that they were still thought of by their husbands as chattels. The result was that they were frequently left behind for long periods while their husbands went off to work in the cities, and there had been a great increase in prostitution as a result.
- (c) The Council of Women had found African women very keen to learn and most appreciative. When they had opened their branches at Senga village there had - been much malnutrition. But help had been given in infant welfare training and there had been a tremendous visible improvement over a period of years.

- (d) The National Council of Women had for some time had the idea of setting up a training college in Bulawayo in which African women could learn child care, welfare, cooking, hygiene, etc., which would qualify them for domestic service. Such training would enable their wages to be raised considerably.
- (e) The colour bar must continue to be broken down. This was something which the National Council of Women could not exert direct pressure to achieve, because this would be regarded as political. Nevertheless, they were able to do much by example and a number of African women had come to their houses for meetings of various kinds.
- (f) One of the main requirements was an improvement in basic common courtesy, particularly by the less educated Europeans. All the good work done by the Council of Women could be broken down by a few ill-chosen words by, for example, a post office counter clerk.
- (g) One practical effect of the colour bar in European shops was the fact that African women could not try on dresses or shoes. It was difficult to see how that they could be expected to buy them without trying them on.
- (h) African women were very keen on having the vote, though many had no ideas about politics whatsoever.

C. WILSON

A few ideas I would like to put to the Commission, if you consider it worthwhile, I would be willing to attend to give evidence, I have spent fifteen years as a Policeman and twenty five years small working and on Company mines in Southern Rhodesia. I have only just obtained the address and you will notice that this was written before Chief Mangwendi was moved from Office.

As a working man with over forty years experience working with Rural natives, I should like to put forward a few ideas on their behalf. These natives comprise about 75% of the total Native population of the Federation.

At no time do I believe they have ever been represented to Commissions of enquiry or to persons who claim to be working on their behalf.

Few, if any, know anything about Federation and are not in the least interested; they know nothing of the self-styled African leaders and the majority would never support them. Even Native Affairs Department Officials do not get their confidence, they are interviewed through Native interpreters and these make sure the answers given are in accordance with what that Official wants.

When I came to this country in 1919 I was stationed as a Police Trooper in the Melsetter Chipinga Area and for five years patrolled the Sabi Native Reserves. I vaccinated thousands of them and also at times issued Famine relief rations, I studied the language and had the confidence of the Chiefs and Headmen, I listened to their tales of tribal wars, raids by the Matabele and Gungunzana's Shangaens. These people who had never known security were now happy, free from fear and enjoyed full social security, at first they did not appreciate education for their children, as with the piccanins away at school, herding devolved on the women folk and the men had to cultivate the gardens. I remember in 1923 eleven mission schools being burned down in one night.

These people were happy to be ruled by the Whitemen and although numbers went to work on the mines in Johannesburg one never heard of subversive propaganda. Today, they have come a long way in education, and their outlook has broadened, they are pleased to take up the whiteman's method of agriculture and appreciate the benefits they derive from it, very few of them have ever heard of African Congress or its leaders. When told about them they express uneasiness and fear that should they be handed over to them they will experience the same kind of oppression their fathers were subjected to.

I recently completed two years prospecting and covered most parts of Rhodesia and part of Northern Rhodesia, I found the Rural African as always, quite a decent fellow, there was some grousing in the Mangwendi Reserve about the demands of Chief Mangwendi, he is I believe an educated man and will no doubt be presented to the Commission as a model Chief who has been given a good deal of power. Please try and remember Native civilization in this country does not go back to more than one generation.

The country was only occupied by Europeans 69 years ago and until very recently by only very very few of these. Those few Europeans did more for native advancement than has ever been done by any other Government or body of people anywhere else in the world.

We have a lot to be proud of and nothing to be ashamed of.

There have been no racial riots or uprisings in the Rural Areas. Those that have taken place in Urban Areas have mostly been directed against Welfare and educational centres.

This goes to show (in my opinion) that most native leaders do not want civilization or social advancement for the masses.

Native Pay: The subject of pay to Africans has received a lot of attention from Trade Union and Labour members in Britain how many realise that pay to the average African is just pocket money.

On all our mines and farms and in factories Native Employees draw rations for themselves, their wives and up to three children, the quality, variety and amount is governed by statute, most of the bigger Companies insist on their employees having a properly cooked meal per day.

Quarters are always free, so is fuel and light; clinics with native orderlies are provided and a qualified medical officer is subsidised to attend on call and at least on one day per week.

Recreation, this usually consists of Film shows, football and other games supervised and organised by Europeans, and free. As I have said, the native has come a long way in the past 40 years. The danger is pushing him along too quickly, he still hankers a little for the days when he could slaughter game indiscriminately and cut down trees when and where he fancied. He still has faith in the Europeans he grew up with and will eventually take his place as a full partner with them.

A word for the European. We did not leave all our human characteristics behind when we left the Old Country.

Gwelo,

28th December 1959.

C. WILSON

Mr. Wilson said that his objective in coming to give evidence to the Commission was to speak up for the native who was not represented in Parliament at the present time. He had known them for many years and had found them thoroughly decent people.

In answer to questions, the witness made the following additional points in amplification of his written memorandum:

- (a) Steps had been taken to advance the African in Southern Rhodesia at the rate they could best manage. The present franchise qualification was satisfactory; Africans should be allowed to take part in politics as they reached the required educational standard.
- (b) There were at present no leaders who could get the African people together; the result was that they were only united by itinerant agitators.
- (c) The Native Affairs Department wasted a lot of time on welfare schemes. It would have been much more useful if they organised courses in political matters—courses on civics, etc.
- (d) The British Government, and the Labour Party in particular, had delayed the evolution of the Federation. Southern Rhodesia and the Federation had never been given a square deal by the newspapers in Great Britain; as long ago as 1923, the Juvenile Employment Act, which regulated the conditions of employment of juveniles in industry, was branded by the United Kingdom press as "slavery in Southern Rhodesia".
- (e) It was essential for the European to keep his word in dealing with Africans. If, for example, Mr. Macleod had given Dr. Banda a promise with regard to the future of Nyasaland, it must be kept.

I. Preliminary

1. The purpose of this memorandum is to give to the Commission the wholly personal viewpoint of one who has been a resident of Southern Rhodesia since June 1910.

2. No one possessing a sense of goodwill would deny the inestimable benefits of a successful outcome of partnership in the Federation. But there are people who oppose it with hate and others who give it no chance at all. It would be unfair to blame the latter, for some of its problems will, for some years to come, seem well nigh impossible. It needs so much time and patience and, like a ship, its structure must be stout enough to weather dangerous storms. The endeavour is an act of faith by those who stay to make it and will go to the bottom with it, should it fail. They are entitled to demand a just but strong constitutional structure and to refuse the endeavour if that is not given to them. But when it is given and the endeavour continues, they are still entitled to expect the confidence and forebearing support of all who wish it well but watch its progress from a safe distance.

II. The Present Situation

3. In this section I give some personal impressions to show the background of the ideas that I offer, but those impressions, so far as they relate to areas north of the Federation, are only surmises.

(i) The African scene

4. Africa can be divided into three parts. The first is North Africa, so strategically important for so long in European affairs. There a very large portion has been returned to Arab control. The next part is between the Sahara and Rhodesia, where stretches are being hastily handed over to African control. The remainder reaching to Cape Agulhas is in European control, but the Federation may emerge from it as a fourth part under joint European and African control.

5. This broad picture, if accepted, suggests interesting problems of global strategy, one of which may well be just how much of Africa should, in the interests of western civilisation, legitimately and clearly retain the stamp of that civilisation. The inclusion of the emerging fourth part would imply the necessity for a constitutional structure directed to that aim.

6. In Africa south of the Sahara political solutions solve very little else. The climate of its equatorial area is too harsh, its deserts, diseases, and insect pests too widespread, its rainfall too heavy or too light, its rivers too rapid or too dry, its harbours and natural communications too few, its distances too great, and its natural resources too scattered, too inaccessible or too short lived. The sum of these obstacles creates abnormal development problems that can be solved only by a great variety of planned and co-ordinated schemes of unusual variety, size technicality and cost. For as far into the future as can be seen, either the western or the communist civilisations will have to supply the huge sums and innumerable technicians and administrative specialists required for the necessary schemes. If western civilisation leaves any vacuums, the controllers of the communist civilisation will hasten to fill them.

(ii) African Nationalism

7. Well-educated Africans, whether they really like democracy or not, do understand it. They are students of nature and fully conscious of the fact that a thousand sheep will follow one goat. When, therefore, they have political ambitions and confidence in their ability to sway the minds of less well-educated people whose mentality is, for them, an open book, they know very well that universal adult suffrage in a constituency where such people predominate is the perfect instrument for the realisation of their ambitions. Some of them, too, will not have failed to notice, admire and perhaps think of imitating the methods and spectacular successes of such people as Hitler, Mussolini, Stalin or Nasser.

8. But, whether dictatorships are imminent or not, the present manifestation of African nationalism is not new. It resembles that of the Ethiopian (so-called) movement in South Africa about the end of last century, which was organised from a base in America and sought, under cover of religion, to spread race hatred and the notion of Africa for Africans. The signs are not of an agreed plan to form a pan-African union but of personality cults having Africa for Africans as their idea but political domination by the cult through its leader as the target. I would be surprised to learn that, in the Federation, African nationalism is a growth with natural roots in the African masses. Many of them still think tribally, some are anti-European, others would like government to go on as usual but few would think nationally. In all circumstances, however, experiments in unbridled democracy will favour not democracy itself but African dictatorship.

(iii) African opinion in Federation

9. My experience (limited because I know none of the many Bantu vernaculars) in judicial matters and in public enquiries into African affairs indicates that the African is by nature evasive and tends to adapt his statements, views and actions to what he deems to be the needs of the occasion. This fickle but seldom vicious circumlocution is a probable inheritance from the recurring menaces of witchcraft, superstition and intrigue in tribal life. The tendency is probably neutralised by higher education, but it limits the value of estimates of the great mass of African opinion. Paradoxically the African is conservative in his manners and customs and has often been distrustful of measures meant for his benefit or protection, but where development is good the worth of so many of these measures has been so clearly proved that his suspicions are rapidly disappearing. A great many Africans are now conscious of and do appreciate the blessings of good government and the need of European guidance to maintain it.

10. Nevertheless extremists everywhere are not only notoriously better able than moderates to excite the masses, but they also can and do add to that advantage by the ruthless use of intimidation and misrepresentation; while moderates have nothing better than self-defence and appeals to reason.

11. I expect many African moderates to conceal their opinions or to dissemble until they know precisely how much protection they can ultimately expect. I have no proofs but I believe that the removal of the present uncertainty and the declaration of a firmly constituted but visibly just government will bring nothing but relief to most Africans.

(iv) Nyasaland

12. Nyasaland, in all its history, has had no unified government, save that supplied by Britain. Under her rule Nyasaland's limited natural resources and politically immature but growing population together provided a unity developing so slowly that, after sixty-five years, it was still in its infancy. Nyasaland's communities and those of parts of Northern Rhodesia are problem communities—assemblages not uncommon in Africa. They are subsistence level peoples with turbulent pasts in which they have treated each other atrociously. Their capacity to pay taxes is very small indeed and their respect for government, whether it be their own or foreign, is measured only by its strength and firmness. The problem of such communities can be faced with confidence when their country offers attraction for industrial development. They can then be absorbed into industry, their standards of living can be steadily raised and their education gradually improved, while their old influences recede and, in time, are forgotten. They cease to be abnormal. But, otherwise, these communities are still the poor at the gate of the richer world.

13. The Nyasalanders however had more than a turbulent past. They became the victims of Arab and European slave traders and themselves shamelessly joined in the trade and bartered the lives of their own kith and kin. They were stopped with difficulty by the British government less than 70 years ago and many thousands of them today will have heard the tales of their parents and grand-parents about those times, and may well still regard slavery as a very real bogey.

14. In 1953 the British government handed these unwanted poor to the Federation to be nurtured but, incredible as it may seem after so many years of care and protection, specially refrained from explaining beforehand the reasons for the change and the good intention of the new relation. The effect on naturally suspicious illiterate people suffering from a covert fear of slavery may be imagined.

III. The cause and effect of two wage structures

15. Africans, in their first contacts with modern industry, were more raw than the rawest recruit in the British army and, as production units in risky embryonic industries, were of very low value. Moreover their production capacity rose very slowly, partly because for many years most of them only worked intermittently, being well content to spend the remainder of their time following their usual pursuits at their homes in their reserves and elsewhere. There is, for what it may be worth, confirmation of the slowness of this rise in production capacity in statistical records showing the exceptionally low production capacity of Africans per man unit by world standards.

16. The original production structure in the Federal territories was therefore a small skilled and semi-skilled European group using and directing an unskilled African group in which low efficiency was compensated by high numbers. This abnormality was increased by the fact that European workers, by reason of climatic stresses, delegated to Africans routine jobs normally done by themselves or their apprentices. The unavoidable result of these circumstances was the establishment of two independent and widely different structures relating to wages and conditions of service.

17. Those two widely separated wage structures and wide cultural differences simultaneously created equally widely separated social economies. The picture we now have, therefore, is of a well-established European industrial wage and social economy structure widely separated from another equally well-established African industrial wage and social economy structure, upon both of which an industrial economy has been built and has reached in some areas a high stage of development.

18. A consequent aim of partnership is the closing of the gap between the European and African wage structures in a way that will not damage the industrial economy. That is a complicated problem requiring time and patience, but the neglect of one aspect of it is a bad fault in a European contribution to partnership that is otherwise immense. I will discuss this aspect in Section VII.

IV. The Problem of Repugnances

19. I adopt in relation to this subject three suppositions; first, that large communities are composed of or divide naturally into groups having different or conflicting origins, interests, social economies, points of view and affiliations from each and all of which spring repugnances or antipathies that may lead to disorder and from there to anarchy; secondly, that government has the duty to restrict the causes of repugnances, to co-ordinate interests and social economies and to avert and suppress disorder and anarchy; and, thirdly, that over-riding common interests are the most reliable unifying element in a State.

20. In homogeneous civilisations, the members of which have traditional common interests, the stock remedies that are generally successful are patience, toleration, an established common code of behaviour, a balanced economic wage system with a related system of social economies, various forms of voluntary segregation, seclusion and social sufficiency and the services of a competent police force. Members of such civilisation would tend to regard other remedies as unnecessary or even improper.

21. In the Federation the seeds of a sense of common interest, which the recent great progress ought to have fertilised, have been lost because the ground in the northern territories was not prepared beforehand. The preparation has now to be undertaken in the face of greater difficulties and the seeds replanted. Reverses are not an uncommon experience in Africa and are no cause for despair, but recovery from them does need time and patience.

22. In the meantime the stock remedies, while in no way less important, are inadequate, first, because the scope and virulence of repugnances and the risks of disorder are increased, in comparison with those in a homogeneous civilisation, by the physical and cultural differences between Europeans and Africans, by the wide gap between their respective social economies and by the fear which those Europeans, who rely on marginal employment, now have of losing the privilege which their European background has hitherto given them; and, secondly, because some of the stock remedies are apt to be frustrated by innate differences between the races in behaviour, sense of values, reasoning, language and general outlook and by the misunderstandings and misconceptions occasioned thereby. Additional safeguards must therefore be provided.

23. The land reservations made for the special protection of Africans many years ago, giving them exclusive communal use in some areas and right of purchase in others, are most valuable segregation measures that have reduced and will, for a long time, be needed to reduce the effect of the gap between the European and African social economies.

24. All governments in the Federation, therefore, should, as a necessary partnership measure, have constitutional discretion within their respective spheres to prescribe and maintain such methods and degrees of social and territorial segregation or exclusion as may, from time to time, be prudent in order to restrict repugnances and avert disorder.

V. The Significance of Partnership in the Constitution

25. The persistent controversy about the meaning of partnership and the abnormal risks of misunderstanding, that arise from a variety of languages, customs and modes of thought, make the clear significance of partnership in the Federation exceptionally important. In the preamble of the Constitution partnership is represented as if it were not a means, which it is, but an end and that fact has increased the confusion.

26. As no definition of purposes is given in the Southern Rhodesia constitution, I have taken the well-tested American definition as a model and submit for the Commission's consideration the following:

Whereas it is desirable to unite the inhabitants of all races and creeds, in a partnership resolved to promote the goodwill and good manners of the inhabitants each to every other, restrict all causes of repugnance, perfect its civilisation, safeguard the quality of its government by a common quality franchise, establish justice, ensure internal tranquillity and order, provide for the common defence, conserve and improve the soil and sources of water, eradicate insect pests and animal diseases, promote the general welfare and secure the blessings of liberty to the inhabitants and their posterity.

The purposes I have added seem to me fundamental or extremely important.

27. That definition provides a target with goodwill and good behaviour as the bull's eye; for partnership, although it is the contract, will itself be in full operation only when the existence of enough goodwill among the inhabitants is proved by an average pattern of behaviour favourable to the progress however gradual, of all the other purposes of the partnership.

28. Should a definition of this kind be adopted in the Federal constitution, its confirmation by reference in each territorial constitution would complete the conception.

VI. The Franchise

29. My view is that the franchise is a licence to perform a series of important public services and that its conditions should be determined by the application of certain principles to the particular circumstances of the community to be governed. It may, perhaps, be reasonable, in a community where the standards of education and sense of responsibility are generally high and comparatively uniform, to regard an age limit, which has the merit of simplicity and ease of administration, as a due compliance with the principles on which I rely. But I am firmly convinced, for reasons which I hope to make clear, that the use of an age limit only in the Federation would not merely fail to conform to those principles, but would also have disastrous consequences. I shall develop this theme in sub-sections (i) and (iii) of this Section.

(i) Principles of the franchise

30. Among the qualities required for reasonable skill in the art of modern civilised democratic government of a community of several million people are the ability and will, in relation to a wide variety of matters, to observe, analyse, initiate and plan and, in so doing, to co-operate both critically and constructively and with due respect and consideration for the propositions and criticisms of others. I used 136 words in an outline compilation of the wide variety of matters which, being so well known to your Commission, I omit.

31. The individuals who govern determine, by their own qualities, the quality of government and, in a democratic State, the electors select those individuals from among themselves. I believe that the requirements for a trustworthy selection are education, wisdom, honesty and sense of responsibility and, therefore, that the voter has to be a person of some stature to don his mantle of responsibility. Britain's standards of civilisation are as high and as nearly uniform as any in the world, her methods of government are rightly admired and her idol is universal adult suffrage. But do not some of her voters trail their mantles in the mud?

32. Society's basic purposes are stability and progress. Its main instruments for achieving those purposes are, first, government and secondly, the sciences, arts, crafts, industries and innumerable other services of public concern. Its basic purpose in respect of all these instruments is that their quality shall be as adequate for their purposes as is reasonably possible. And, in order to achieve that basic purpose, Society has, for long ages, standardised and improved the instruments by stipulating that the individuals responsible shall have prescribed qualifications. In respect of the application of that principle there is neither a distinction nor any valid reason for a distinction between the persons responsible respectively for public service in the art of government, the sciences, arts, crafts and the like. The neglect of the principle in respect of public services contributing to the art of government would be a neglect by Society of its own basic purpose. Due provision for the voter's competency for his task is therefore a basic principle of the franchise.

33. That principle may emotionally but cannot logically or ethically be supplanted by the notion: government by consent of the majority of the governed. The notion becomes intelligible only when it is paraphrased: government by consent (expressed by a specific public service) of the majority of those of the governed who are able to understand what they are consenting to. That notion restores the principle of competency.

(ii) Sense of responsibility

34. During an enquiry in 1944, the establishment of African co-operative societies in Southern Rhodesia was considered and responsible evidence was given of the failure of such societies in the Union of South Africa owing to the incapacity or dishonesty of the Africans in charge. In public enquiries subsequent to 1947 regarding African wages and conditions of service and African advancement in industry much evidence, some by personnel managers and others responsible for the organisation of large groups of African workers, was devoted to proof of alleged inherent African weaknesses which made them less responsible than the average European worker.

35. Some examples are: idling when not under supervision; constantly changing employment; harshness with machinery, ability to understand how but not why; disregard for or inability to foresee the consequences of their actions; as clerks untrustworthy with private information; as supervisors shirking their responsibilities and being influenced by trade union pressure.

36. Education in its lower standards was alleged to make no difference. Some employers declared that it decreased responsibility, proving perhaps that a little knowledge is dangerous. The evidence was generally responsible and does not conflict with probability.

37. For a person may show good sense of responsibility in one matter and none in another, because sense of responsibility in relation to a subject is ultimately controlled by the real extent of the participant's knowledge of and interest in all that concerns the subject.

38. Two features of European environment are competitive modern industry and democratic government, both highly developed. The first naturally arouses in Europeans a sense of vocation and the second a sense of modern political organisation and both arouse a sense of competitive efficiency. In the African environment work is not a blessing and sense of vocation is quite undeveloped. Their patriarchal type of government is rudimentary and has, for many years been subordinated to European government in which they have had little part. The African with little or no education consequently enters modern industry and takes his part in modern government with an imperceptible knowledge of and interest in either. I believe however that the handicap from which he suffers may be overcome by higher education provided it is followed by an appropriate career.

39. The inference is that in the case of a common quality franchise the average African voter will have less sense of responsibility than the average European voter unless the former has had a higher education and is in good employment.

(iii) Intimidation and misrepresentation

40. Of recent threats to justice and good government, the most alarming is the apparent ease and speed with which relatively small but ruthless groups have gained control of government in communities ostensibly following democratic methods. Intimidation, misrepresentation and fraudulent indoctrination run through the pattern of procedure like scarlet threads. Control is gained by them; criticism is made illegal by means of the control; legalised and cunning intimidation is then used and a silent community is too frightened to protest. The communist world's contempt for democracy completes this picture.

41. I draw the inference that, even in homogeneous and highly civilised communities having one common language, democracy is very vulnerable unless the electorate is neither malleable nor gullible nor ignorant. If that be so, then the need, in the Federation, to safeguard the democratic method by a competent electorate is much greater because its communities are unavoidably ill balanced and the African community converses in several vernaculars known to very few Europeans—a fact which provides exceptional opportunities for intimidation and other mischief. Expert evidence on matters of detection and prevention of improper activities would probably disclose other difficulties peculiar to the Federation. The dangers I have outlined are, by themselves, a conclusive reason for the through application of the principle of competency for the franchise.

(iv) The franchise qualifications

42. The franchise qualifications of Southern Rhodesia, being the outcome of a highly responsible and thorough investigation, provide a sound basis of political representation for the whole Federation. But, while agreeing with as many equivalents of an education standard as may be found appropriate, I disagree with more than one standard for one class of voter, because education is in a sphere of its own. Means tests can reasonably be variable in relation to an education test but not the latter in relation to the former.

43. Uniformity and therefore simultaneous constitutional protection of the education tests throughout the Federal and territorial governments is of the utmost importance. A lower test in any one territory of the Federation will weaken the principle of competency which is the cement in the foundation of partnership. A uniform education test should therefore now be agreed upon and constitutionally entrenched by all four legislatures with a provision that it cannot be altered except by the consent of all of them. Uniformity in the means tests is not of equal importance although as much of it as possible is desirable.

(v) Special representation of Africans

44. Special representation is unsound because it obstructs the growth of common interest. It is an expedient, like a baby's comforter, which gains a little present peace at the risk of a lot of wind and irritation later. Although Africa is a land where exceptional reasons are the rule, yet the reasons for watering down a just and sound principle, which the common quality franchise is, by means of a dubious expedient would have to be very exceptional. There are valuable ways of increasing African political representation in numbers and in quality, which I discuss in the next Section.

VII. Careers for Africans

(i) The Industrial colour bar

45. The widely separated wage structures and social economies referred to in Section III were in existence when the first trade unions were established in Southern Rhodesia. The European workers therefore who formed them were concerned only with their own classes of work and conditions of service. And in some trade unions the work included employment, for which "marginal work" is a convenient term, but for which Africans were not then obvious competitors. This marginal work was not classifiable as a skilled trade because relatively short learner courses were adequate, but in a society with a single wage structure it would provide several rungs in the wage ladder leading from unskilled labour to the skilled trades.

46. But the precise significance of marginal work in combining two wages systems at some future date seems to have been obscured by the use by the trade unions and the acceptance by the employers of a minimum but steadily rising European living standard as the yardstick for measuring the adequacy of all European wages. The ultimate result has been a European trade union privilege protecting those standards and operating as an industrial colour bar. This privilege has been as intractable as trade union privileges usually are.

47. The combination of this intractability with the necessity to balance any sudden rises in African rates of pay by increased production or other means was a problem to puzzle the devil. But in 1954 the European copper miners union did not agree to the principle of graduated African advancement in that industry and universal acceptance of the principle seemed assured. Yet nearly six years later the matter is not generally settled, primarily because of the absence of the necessary wage ladder between unskilled and skilled work. The accepted principle is therefore not being properly implemented.

48. The obstacles to a new but economic wage ladder are trade union's more or less universal principles usually termed "rate for the job", "equal pay for equal work" and "no fragmentation", which for lack of clear definition causes interminable wrangles about such clearly implicated issues of organisation and efficiency as division of work into two or more competency grades, jobs into two or more quality grades and personal operations generally into more economic or efficient units.

49. In the present instance the notion cannot be entirely dismissed that the deadlock is intended to sabotage or delay indefinitely the advancement principle. But if, as I hope, that be untrue the problem confronting your Commission is not the industrial colour bar but in regard to its aftermath means to end such deadlocks before they do irreparable damage.

50. I can think of no permanent solution except constitutional entrenchment in the Federation and in each of the three territories of a uniform provision changeable only with the consent of all four legislatures whereby, in case of failure of negotiation within a fixed time limit, each industry shall be required to accept the final decisions of a Federal Constitutional Board in respect of first, its work and job grading including alterations of work allocation commonly called fragmentation and secondly, wage margin formulas (but not the wage itself).

(ii) Importance of careers

51. Hitherto most of the responsible careers available for Africans have been among their own people. Responsible careers in a much wider field and extending particularly into the skilled trades now have an extraordinary importance for the success of partnership for many reasons, among which are:

- (a) a foundation for sense of vocation and pride in work;
- (b) basis for home life and right environment of children;
- (c) suitability for positions of higher responsibility;
- (d) the common ground and fraternity of shared skills;
- (e) a good standing among Europeans and Africans alike;
- (f) a stake in the State as constituted;
- (g) recognition of the relationship between work, production and wealth;
- (h) recognition of the political significance of the national economy and of the responsibilities of a citizen and voter;
- (i) an example to less enlightened compatriots;
- (j) to increase the size and improve the quality of the African electorate.

Finally there is a wider significance in the hope that, within a few years, enough Africans will qualify for the skilled trades and other responsible careers to sustain, by their goodwill, the progress of all the partnership purposes. I regard the common quality franchise and careers for Africans as inter-related and indispensable elements in the foundation of partnership.

VIII. The Protectorship Obligation

52. I suggest to your Commission, with respect, that protectorship is an inexact political institution derived from acceptance or assumption by the protector of such measure of the sovereignty of a native authority or group of native authorities as can be determined by examination of what has, subsequent to the acceptance or assumption and in fact, been done by the protector. Restoration of the sovereignty is usually in the discretion of the protector and, in some cases, the remnants or even the identity of the native authority's sovereignty may have been lost. Some protectorships were undoubtedly essential to prevent ruthless tribal warfare. This was so in Nyasaland and in parts of Northern Rhodesia where the slave trade, conducted largely by Africans against Africans was still serious less than seventy years ago. Substantially the protector's duty is to do what, in the current circumstances, is best for the protected population.

53. The British government, having decided in 1953 that its protectorates were "the rightful home of all lawful inhabitants . . . whatever their origin" and that association in the Federation was best for them, is now faced with the issue between partnership and Africa for Africans, which might have been prevented had the British government of 1952/3 displayed real enthusiasm for partnership. That issue cannot be compromised because the concepts are mutually destructive.

54. The British government, as protector, therefore now has only three alternatives: first, to declare unreservedly that Federal partnership is in the best interests of all members of the Federation and must be continued on prescribed conditions, or secondly, to take all or part of the protectorates out of the Federation or thirdly, to ask the Federation to carry on as at present and to wait for the Africans to change their minds about Africa for Africans. The last alternative immediately raises a factor, the uncertainty in regard to which has cast an unhappy shadow over the Federation from its inception.

55. That factor is the attitude of the British government to Africa for Africans. As an uninitiated observer of that attitude and of the attitude of a section of the people in Britain I hope I may be forgiven for thinking and, what is far more serious, for believing that most educated Africans are also being led to think that Whitehall has a display of beautifully tailored Westminster cut democratic suits lined with red white and blue UAS silk which, like all beautiful apparel, has a great appeal to beholders, many of whom of course covet one, whether it really suits their daily needs or not; and that Whitehall is supplying anyone, who asks for a suit, if his measurements seem right, although like any tailor Whitehall accepts no responsibility for the subsequent condition of the suit, which owing to its wearer's habits and pursuits may soon be stained with food, drink and dirt, creased, torn and badly patched—in fact unrecognisable.

56. Clothing conscious Africans in the Federation will not want an equally well tailored partnership suit lined with good quality linen while they believe that the UAS suit is still obtainable. They must be told quite plainly that the latter suit is not available and that they must continue to wear the partnership suit which is now being re-fitted. Clearly too the re-fitting should be done thoroughly and quickly. Wear keeps the moths away.

IX. Reactions

57. Your Commission will no doubt want to know what public reactions to expect in certain eventualities, for the effect, on a large scale, of the calling up of loans and the offer for sale of land, houses, stocks, debentures, and equity shares needs no description. I would expect such an occurrence in some eventualities, but people like myself, whose resources are almost entirely invested in the Federation, will not be willing to disclose their own intentions.

58. A most serious eventuality, however, would be a decision to introduce now or to promise to introduce at any future time, into any part of what is in future to be the partnership area, common franchise qualifications lower in any substantial degree than the qualifications of the existing Southern Rhodesia franchise. If the decision is made to give part of the existing partnership area at any time a different and lower qualification, save in moderation in the means test, that part should therefore be now excluded from the Federation. Nevertheless that exclusion would itself be a very unfortunate decision, because it is difficult to see any reason why any portion should be excluded from the Federation if the franchise qualifications are clearly just and it is vital to partnership to establish that justice.

59. In the last fifty years mortgage investment in town and suburban property has consistently been stable and satisfactory and public support of the recently established building societies has been excellent. Should the propriety of Federal and Territorial Government discretion in regard to land segregation measures be officially discredited, I would then expect public support of such forms of investment to be seriously affected.

W. A. GODLONTON

The witness made the following points in amplification of his written memorandum.

- (d) With regard to the franchise, it was necessary to face the implications of the principle of competency set out in paragraph 43 of the witness's memorandum. This would have the effect, inter alia, of giving lower African representation in Nyasaland in relation to the total size of the population.
- (b) The main qualification for the franchise should be education; the means test was added merely as an additional precaution. Unfortunately, there were few responsible leaders who would go out to the electorate to obtain votes by telling the truth. Agitators therefore had a natural advantage. The use of the franchise implied the consent of the governed, but it was difficult to regard the vote as implying consent if the voter did not know what was at stake.
- (c) It was true that some uneducated men might have more wisdom than young newly-qualified graduates. If equivalents could be devised to take the place of an educational qualification (e.g. qualification as a journeyman bricklayer), it would be useful to introduce such alternative qualifications.
- (d) The main need was for money to enable all that was necessary, including the building of many more schools. It was probably true to say that an extra £50 million a year could be spent most profitably. Southern Rhodesia had done marvels recently, but if more money could not be found the country was heading for anarchy.
- (e) With reference to paragraph 50 of the witness's memorandum, it might be necessary to entrench something in the nature of a Bill of Rights in the Constitution. Otherwise established European privileges might be found too hard to break.
- (f) On broad practical grounds, the witness said that he would prefer a unitary government to a Federation. He had not advocated this in his memorandum because it had been turned down flat by the United Kingdom Government in 1953. The present system was clumsy, but a special enquiry would have to be held before it could be changed into a unitary system.
- (g) Although it was true that there were no Africans in the Southern Rhodesia Parliament at the present time, the position was changing rapidly and it was likely that African M.P.s would take their place in the next few years. For many years Africans had not been interested in politics and it was difficult to change things overnight.

Memorandum

THE RHODESIAN BATA SHOE COMPANY LTD.

Dr. K. Fiksl—Managing Director

1. Introduction

The main purpose of this memorandum is to give the Members of the Commission visiting the Bata Shoe Company as full a picture as possible of the working conditions, earnings and social amenities of the Company's African labour force.

The writer, Konstantin Fiksl, D.Sc., Ing., Managing Director of the Company, hopes that the visiting members of the Commission, having been oriented in this way, may utilise the time occupied by their very brief visit to the factory more intensively, in looking for additional information of interest to individual members.

The Company is producing in Gwelo about 12,000 pairs of rubber and canvas shoes and about 5,000 pairs of leather shoes, per working day. All the leather required for this production is manufactured in the Company's own tannery, using hides from all three Federated Territories.

Reclaim rubber from rubber waste, mainly scrap tyres, is also being produced, as also is glue, manufactured from fleshings from the Company's own tannery.

70-75% of the shoes produced are consumed within the Federation, 25-30% are exported, mainly to the Union of South Africa.

On the Federal market about 40% are distributed by the Company's own chain of retail stores, and about 60% through wholesalers and independent retailers. The same retail prices to consumers are fixed throughout all the Company's shops in the whole of the Federation. Prices for wholesalers and retailers are so constructed as to give sufficient profit to those distributors, whilst retailing shoes at prices valid for the Company.

2. General

The Company at the moment employs 1407 Africans, of whom 1,300 work in the factory and 107 are employed in retail stores.

The breakdown in the factory is approximately as follows:

- 968 are Machine Operators on the production of leather and shoes.
- 54 are helpers to the European engineers and artisans employed in the maintenance of machinery.
- 37 are sweepers, lavatory cleaners and police, as well as Canteen employees.
- 38 are members of the building gang.
- 54 are employed in the office on clerical and other work.
- 103 work in the Materials and Ready Stock Rooms.
- 46 are Supervisors (generally called Boss-boys in this country).

1,300 Total number of Africans employed in the Factory.

107 are assistants and shoe repairers in the Company's 44 retail Stores throughout the Federation.

1,407 Total number of African employees in factory and retail shops.

In the factory the Company employs 115 Europeans and 9 Asians and Coloureds; Machine Operators are solely African.

Production is planned in exact tasks (plans) per day for each producing unit. If the statutory five plans have not been completed by any one unit by Friday evening (as sometimes happens), then the operators of that unit must work on Saturday for a few hours until the unfinished plan is completed. Weekday working hours are from 7-12 Noon and from 1.30-5 p.m.

The main work, that of Machine Operators, is repetitive work covering a very narrow sector of the manufacturing process. Each production unit (workshop) is designed for the daily production of 1,000 pairs of shoes in the Leather Shoe Factory and 2,000 pairs in the Rubber Factory. It is manned by 30 to 50 African operators (depending on the construction and number of operations on an individual line) and headed by one European foreman and two to three African sectional supervisors in the Leather Shoe Factory, but only one European foreman for four workshops in the Rubber Factory.

All our African operators have been engaged unskilled. The majority of them, when commencing work with us, not only had never seen a factory or any shoemaking machinery before, but often had never owned a pair of shoes in their lives. Only the minority can understand English, or read or write. Of the whole African labour force:

86% are Southern Rhodesians

4% are Northern Rhodesians

7% are from Nyasaland

3% are from adjoining territories.

3. Training and Productivity

Each new employee is attached for a month or two to an experienced operator and receives special attention from the sectional supervisor and the European foreman. During that initial period his work is purely a "breaking in" to the factory's routine and discipline and gaining his first experience in work on a certain machine. During that time, of course, he produces little useful work for the factory and spoils some material.

But in all fairness it must be said that new employees are, in the majority of cases, keen to learn and very handy. Very soon, they start delivering useful work to a small degree of productivity and this rises slowly but steadily up to a certain level—which I estimate to be about 60% of the average productivity level of a British operator in the United Kingdom—and there, as a rule, it stops.

There are, however, exceptions. We have perhaps about ten operators who are approaching the British level of productivity, if both are working under an incentive scheme.

In order to achieve this, the operators have to be under intensive control as far as quality and quantity of work is concerned, and this has to be very carefully planned and organised.

4. Initial Earnings and Continuous Service Incentives

When first engaged, the beginner receives an initial fixed wage in accordance with Government regulations (for Gwelo, this is £6 0s. 3d. per month). He is accommodated free of charge in our own African settlement near the factory. He can buy full food cards in our canteen for £1 14s. 6d., or lunch and dinner only for 18/- per month.

One of the greatest difficulties we have experienced with African labour has been its very high rate of fluctuation.

This was mainly due to the fact that men went unskilled from their native villages to seek for work, but only for ad hoc purposes: to buy a cow, a goat, a bicycle or to pay lobola for a new wife. Their roots were in their village, where their families lived, where they had their cattle and their gardens. As soon as they had succeeded in saving the amount they needed, they just went home, completely interrupting their industrial occupation. The small degree of training which they had received, they very soon forgot, and the next time they wanted to work they were just as much unskilled beginners as they had been the first time.

To make things still worse, for reasons which I presume were unknown even to themselves, they never came back to the industry in which they had worked previously, but always somewhere else.

On top of that, as soon as the rainy season began, up to 30% of the factory labour force went home to plough the lands and plant the maize.

Naturally, one could not have expected any workmanship or efficiency from such a labour force. The remedy was obvious:

1. To introduce an incentive scheme under which the African employee could, by means of acquiring skill in a certain occupation, earn more money. This would make a change of occupation a non-paying proposition.
2. To introduce special awards and incentives for long, uninterrupted service.

According to Government regulations, the worker receives: After 6 months' servance an additional 7/6 per month
After a further 6 months, an additional 7/6 do.
After another 6 months, an additional 7/6 do.

In addition, we introduced our own incentive scheme, namely:

After five years' continuous service, the African employee receives an additional 5/- per month, and after ten years he is presented with a special award—a nice chromium-plated bicycle—plus a further 10/- per month and after fifteen years he receives an increase of 15/- per month.

3. And the most effective remedy of all—to get them to Gwelo with their families. As soon as the family is taken away from their village and their fields, then it is dependent on the earner's income and he has to do his best to earn as much as possible. This, however, is a costly business. As a rule, Municipalities can only offer single accommodation, and to materialise this plan we had to build our own family houses. We selected a type of semi-detached house, where each accommodation consists of two rooms, kitchen and verandah. At present we accommodate 380 families in our settlement.

4. Finally, when the operator has been with the Company for six months (or less if he shows particularly promising progress), he is included in the Incentive Bonus Scheme.

5. Incentive Bonus Scheme

In principle, this operates mainly as a collective bonus for each production unit covering all operators working there. Individual operations are divided into groups, each group enjoying a particular bonus, graded according to the importance of the operation and the degree of skill demanded by it.

The administrative and economic life of the Company being divided into fortnights (13 fortnights per half year), both wages and incentive scheme are constructed for a fortnight and paid per fortnight. The structure of the scheme is as follows:

- (a) There are ten plans (on a daily basis) to be made and delivered to the Selling Department per fortnight.
- (b) The amount of bonus which it is intended to pay the operators for completing and delivering these ten plans is divided into three parts, due for payment at the completion of the last three plans.
- (c) Practically speaking, this means that the operator gets no bonus for completion of the first seven plans (which require no effort to complete).
- (d) Should the workshop complete only eight plans (in ten working days) then the operator will get only one-third of the bonus allotted. If nine plans are delivered, he will get two-thirds of his bonus (for the 8th and 9th plans). If ten plans are delivered (as actually happens in about 97% fortnights) he gets the full bonus. If the workshop delivers eleven plans (on rare occasions this happens as well), then the operator gets four-thirds of his intended bonus.
- (e) So far the bonus achieved by individuals has been only the result of the collective efforts of the whole workshop manpower. This effort, however, is not produced by every member of that workshop in the same degree—some operators are better so far as quality and quantity of their work is concerned, some are worse and only dragged up to the mean average by the efforts of the better operators.

- (f) We therefore felt it advisable to try and encourage individual effort, and in this connection introduced an additional valuation of individual work by means of a "pointing" system recorded on an individual pointing card for each employee.

This is made out each fortnight for every employee, by the European foreman of each workshop (sample enclosed). We tried to arrange the pointing system in such a way that it is mainly the actual production figures involved (and only to a lesser degree the personal opinion of the foreman) that are taken into consideration for the final classification.

- (g) On an average, operators achieve about 80% of the 100 possible points. This, of course, would decrease the earnings of the operators. Working on this average, they would only gain $0.97 \times 0.80 = 0.776$ of the original bonus.
- (h) To compensate for this and to give some general rise in income, we increased the original bonus rate to nearly double when we introduced this pointing system. Accordingly, they actually earn about 150% of the original bonus, or more.
- (i) We are somewhat disappointed with the result of this effort to increase the efficiency of individuals by increasing the bonus and adopting a pointing system. It gives us the impression that the income level previously achieved by our African employees has satisfied their demands so far, and the chance of additional earnings through higher effort towards efficiency does not hold sufficient appeal for them. We hope, however, that this is only a temporary phenomenon.

All these arrangements certainly helped, as the following figures illustrate.

- In 1952 the fluctation was 85%
- In 1954 the fluctation was 57.4%
- In 1956 the fluctation was 55.75%
- In 1958 the fluctation was 41.51%
- In 1959 the fluctation was 28.7%

This increased stability contributed considerably to the increased productivity and raised quality of work.

6. Average Earnings

The average aggregate earnings per month can be expressed as follows:

Description	Operator			Clerk			Supervisor
	£	0	3	£	0	3	£	0	3
1. Initial fixed wage ...	6	0	3	6	0	3	6	0	3
2. Long service incentive (Govt. regulations)	1	2	9	1	2	9	1	2	9
3. Company's long service incent. ...				5	0		15	0
4. Productivity incent. bonus ...	1	13	6	4	10	3	9	19	9
Total av. cash earnings ...	8	16	8	11	18	3	17	17	8
Free accommodation
5. Value of house ...	2	0	0	3	0	0	3	0	0
6. Electricity, water sanitation ...	1	0	0	2	0	0	2	0	0
Aggregate average earnings ...	£11	16	8	£16	18	3	£22	17	8

7. "Cheap Labour"

There is a contention in certain spheres abroad that Federal Industry is benefitting from "cheap labour". When considering this question, one must bear the following in mind:

- (a) The productivity obtained from this labour (as explained in Section 3) is much lower than that of United Kingdom or Central European labour.
- (b) The level of their workmanship is also rather low, which reduces the selling value of the product through its reduced attractiveness.
- (c) The lower productivity of labour makes the cost of depreciation on buildings, machinery and equipment per produced unit much higher, than if correct productivity were achieved.

To illustrate this, let us assume that the amount of depreciation of a factory per year is £100,000 (24,000,000 pence) and that it has a production capacity of 4,000,000 pairs of shoes per year if labour achieves full productivity. In that case, the cost of depreciation per pair of shoes would be sixpence. If, however, labour reaches only 60% of possible productivity, only 2,400,000 pairs of shoes in the same factory will be fabricated per year, and the cost of depreciation per pair will rise to tenpence per pair.

- (d) In addition, a higher number of employees with 60% productivity (as against a theoretical number with an assumed 100% productivity) will necessitate higher expenses for accommodation and social amenities.

In other words, for the same volume of production, the accommodation and social amenities for 600 men with 100% productivity would cost only 60% of the sum required for those amenities for 1,000 men with 60% productivity.

- (e) Further, lower productivity labour causes much higher capital investment. The explanation is the same as under (c) and (d), namely that if the assumed cost of a plant for 60% productive labour was £1,000,000, then only a £600,000 plant would be necessary for labour with full productivity for the same production capacity—a capital saving of £400,000.

- (f) And finally, the producer can hope to sell to the lower income group (such as the low productivity operator) fewer ready goods and those only in the cheaper lines, on which he cannot make as much profit as on higher priced goods.

It is therefore apparent that for a fully equipped modern factory the supposed advantages of "Cheap Labour" in this country are very doubtful and Rhodesian Industrialists in general would, I am sure, prefer to pay more for higher productivity rather than less for labour with lower productivity.

8. Abilities and Mentality

Our experience shows that in general African operators like the permanent repetitive work as offered in our factory, where they work in reasonable premises, with good light and ventilation and in clean tidy surroundings. Apparently they do not get tired of this repetitive work and do it willingly and with comparative ease. They definitely dislike being changed from one task to another during a day's work: we have had many cases where the employee has flatly refused to make such a change, even under threat of dismissal.

In general, they try as much as they can to avoid taking responsibility. It seems that responsibility tires them mentally and apparently they feel happier without it.

The better educated Africans, almost without exception, look for clerical work in the first place—in my opinion, quite wrongly. As explained in the beginning of this memorandum, we have quite a number of African technical supervisors in our service and, observing them, I have formed the opinion that they are happier in their work than their clerical counterparts. They do not have much European supervision, as the clerical staff have, and they themselves do supervise from five to fifteen African operators working under them, which clerks do not do. Thus they feel a certain degree of importance, being authorised to give orders to the men subordinate to them. And these technicians do make more money than their clerical colleagues.

It is my contention that the job of a Supervisor in Industry is much more suitable than clerical work for the more progressive African. Also, in this technical field there are many more opportunities for advancement and for earning power.

I think it is possible that progressive Africans do not look for such technical positions, not only because they do not know about them, but primarily because they are not suitably educated and trained for such work, and do find the initial stages difficult.

Consequently, I feel very strongly that a technical education and technical vocational training is highly necessary for them. It is the educational system in this country that makes them desire to obtain clerical work, whereas education and training of a technical nature would turn their minds more towards the technical field of activity, thus creating a new category of leading hands and artisans in industry, who would be happier in their work, their earning power, their chances of promotion, their own social position and environment. A clerical position can hardly offer all these advantages.

As far as African clerks are concerned, we have some quite good ones. But only the minority of those engaged for clerical work turn out to be good, reliable employees. We think that this fact confirms our opinion that their mind is not entirely up to clerical work, does not in the end satisfy their ambitions, which are often higher than their real ability.

Regretfully, in Rhodesia we have had a number of cases of misappropriation of money entrusted to African clerks. To prevent this necessitates a very strict, continuous and elaborate control. It is, however, fair to mention that our experience in this respect has been far more satisfactory in Nyasaland. In general, an African is inclined to keep changing his job and does not sufficiently appreciate the advantages of a stable, permanent occupation.

9. Amenities for African Labour

- (a) We accommodate nearly all our African employees, both single and married, in our own settlement. We have not yet family accommodation for all our married employees and some of them still use the rondavel huts. But we are building houses all the time and expect to have good family accommodation for all married employees within two years.

- (b) There are small vegetable gardens around the family houses, and for families wishing to garden more extensively special plots are allotted in the settlement grounds.

Those married employees who wish to purchase their own houses within the framework of the Government's African House Ownership scheme on "Ascot Farm" in Gwelo, we are offering financial assistance for the initial payment on a house.

- (c) Our African employees have their own Club where a film is shown twice a week, free of charge.

- (d) In the Club, they can buy food tickets cheaply as explained in Section 4. Good meat is sold at the sub-economic price of 11d. per lb. to those who buy ration cards and at 1/- per lb. to those who buy casually. This is 4d. cheaper than the lowest grade of meat on sale in town at butcher shops and the cuts purchased for 1/- per lb. are of better quality than that sold for 1/4d. per lb. in town.

- (e) The Club has its Sports and Boxing sections. Once a year an African Sports Day is organised on which all kinds of sports are displayed.

- (f) Members of the Sports sections are offered free transport by Company truck to visit neighbouring African Sports Clubs.

- (g) There is a school for African children in our settlement. A new, modern school building is at present being erected. A free ration of two buns and one cup of soup or tea (alternately) is given five days a week to children attending the Bata School.

- (h) Evening classes for adults are in progress.

- (i) An evening course for technical education (especially for Supervisors) has been organised and is in progress.

- (j) Temporary employment during school holidays is offered to African students.

- (k) Three Bata Bursaries are offered to African students in the newly opened African Technical College in Bulawayo.

- (l) A church has been erected by the U.S.A. Baptist Mission in our settlement. Roman Catholic and Dutch Reform church services are also held in the African settlement.

- (m) A Boy Scout troop also exists in the settlement.

10. Conclusion

Our Company is employing local Africans from the Matabeleland Reserves, but also from all parts of Southern Rhodesia. We also have African employees from Nyasaland, Northern Rhodesia and from Portuguese East Africa.

We believe we can claim that all of them are living in a happy community in our African settlement under the conditions described in this memorandum.

THE RHODESIAN BATA SHOE COMPANY LTD.

Dr. K. Fiksl—Managing Director

The Commission had before them Dr. Fiksl's written memorandum. In answer to questions he made the following points:

He was strongly in favour of encouraging more manual work among the Africans. The trouble was that as soon as they were educated up to Standard VI they considered themselves to be above anything but office work, though really quite unqualified to be clerks. It was most important to break down this aversion from manual work; he was convinced from experience in his factory that the manual worker was undoubtedly the happier man. For example, the supervisors in his factory had ten or fifteen men under them. This was good for their morale, and they were thoroughly at home in their work. The half-educated clerks, on the other hand, only had a false sense of superiority, were usually uneasy in their work, and had few prospects because their English was rarely good enough for them to get any further than copy-typing. For this reason supervisors were given disproportionately larger incentive bonuses than clerks. He hoped for their own good to encourage the workers to become supervisors rather than clerks. Supervisors were not expected to do too much bossing around or exercising discipline, but were simply there to help and explain. Nevertheless, he had a few good African clerks. Bata's best clerk was educated up to Form VI and was paid £32 a month, plus accommodation.

Asked whether Federation had helped his Company economically, he said he could not prove it in figures, but he felt that it had. There had been a slight but steady increase in output since Federation started, and he believed it would continue.

The Bata Shoe Company aimed to produce shoes that Africans could afford to buy. Although the general cost of living was going up and up, clothing and footwear were going down, largely because Federation made it possible to operate on a sufficiently large scale.

Memorandum

DR. J. R. SCARR

Nkata Bay District—1957 to 1959

In 1956 I joined the Federal Medical Service from England and after a year in Blantyre was sent as the first government medical officer to Nkata Bay.

On my arrival I was asked to attend some District Commissioners' and District Council meetings. At one, held at the court of S/C Timbiri, I was vilified and told to get out of their district; they said I was the advance guard of Federation and the things they most feared: white South Africa type rule and loss of land rights.

When I got up to go about half the people present jumped up and asked to know my surgery times.

This paradox continued throughout my stay there—politically they made a great show of hating what I was supposed to represent—practically they came in ever-increasing numbers as the medical facilities improved with the £100,000 programme in the district. Local Congress leaders themselves, though condemning Federation in public, came to us in private; among them A. J. M. Banda, his wife and T. D. T. Banda's younger brother's wife for her confinement.

The ordinary villagers were glad of my arrival. I used to ask them what they thought of having a Federal doctor. The almost invariable reply was "We are not interested in where you come from. You are our doctor".

If impressions are admissible as evidence, I formed two strong ones:—

1. The Territorial administration largely disliked and did not try to encourage the idea of Federation among the Africans.

2. The African National Congress and most other African political parties are the vociferous minority heard at every District Commissioners meeting, public occasion and commission, but they do not represent many thousands of villagers, who are often fearful of them.

Intimidation by the African National Congress was practised on a wide and increasing scale. My African staff at Nkata Bay Dispensary were threatened with death for themselves and their wives and children if they worked for the government, both before and after the riot. In fact they were the only government or commercial unit to do so, although compelled by threats to take out Congress membership.

I knew chiefs who feared and were under Congress influence—Native Authority M'Bwana of Usisya, N.A. Kabunduli of Mzenga and S/C Mkumbira of Nkata Bay; most chiefs I met seemed to be affected. A few were staunch supporters of Congress—S/C Timbiri, who threatened an American Mission during the riots; V.H. Mgozera and his fellow village headman, whose name I forget, both sentenced for inciting riot.

The extremists gained strength by two great weaknesses in the organisation of Federation: the lukewarm support given by the Territorial administration and the complete absence of any plan, programme or propaganda from the Federal government. In my two years in the district there were two visits by Federal ministers (both boycotted) and a few by Central African Film Unit; otherwise I saw no attempt at all to foster public relations between the Federal government and the Nyasaland African. Certainly no liaison existed on the spot between Federal and Territorial administrations.

After the riot of March 3rd, when I had to deal with 21 dead and 29 known injured, there was at first a tremendous revulsion to the European. This was followed by questioning and doubt as to the wisdom of Congress.

When the detainees—African National Congress leaders and intimidators—had gone and the district became more normal, some of my African staff hold me that their big fear was not of the European or of Federation but of the return of the detainees. They said this meant the return of fear for themselves and their families and they were anxious to know how long the detainees would be kept away. They said if it was for two years or more then these people's grip on their fellow Africans might have been loosened enough for their influence to have been lost.

I saw many of the arrested men in Nkata Bay jail and on board the Mpsa. For what it is worth, I agreed with my African staff—they seemed to me an unpleasant and rather dangerous group of men; not at all typical of the ordinary Africans of the district.

In 1958 the African medical staff in Nkata Bay District and Mzuzu totalled 44. 42 signed Federal terms of office. Of the two refusals one was a female cook known to be under Congress influence, the other a Hospital Servant who, having signed once for the Medical Service, said he distrusted being asked to sign for the same thing twice.

Of 10 later arrivals on the station, 8 signed Federal terms. The two who did not were a medical aide of 20 years' service who wished to retire and who told me that he had no particular views on the subject; the other was arrested for complicity at the time of the riots.

On the South Lakeshore of the district, remote from roads or trouble, I was always greeted as a friend and as if nothing had happened, both before and after the riots—they were grateful for any visit I made to them.

I cannot speak for the relatively small numbers of Nyasaland African townsmen. The villagers, who are the vast majority, suffer acutely from infantile mortality, malnutrition, malaria, tuberculosis which is rife and spreading at an alarming rate, hookworm and anaemia, amoebiasis and bilharzia and other ills. They discuss mostly food and crops, housing, money, illness and medical care, family and village matters, their chiefs and relatives. Local politics, for example should the lakeshore Atonga be ruled by a chief of the hill Atonga, were of great interest. National politics were rarely mentioned and the leaders names not even known.

Federation meant little or nothing to these people. Insofar as it was helping them in their great dependence on outside help, they were grateful for it.

Oral Evidence

DR. J. R. SCARR

Dr. Scarr had submitted a note of his evidence.

In answer to questions he said that he had been three and a quarter years in Nyasaland in the Federal Medical Service, but had recently left the Government Service and was now in private practice in Southern Rhodesia. His reasons for doing this were purely personal: he had had an offer with very good prospects, and he was not happy about bringing up his three children in Nyasaland at the present time.

He made the following points about his experience in Nyasaland:—

- (a) The Federal Medical Service suffered from a lethargy which he thought was common to all Government Departments in Nyasaland.
- (b) There was not enough liaison between Zomba and Salisbury. There was a general feeling of being "cut off". This applied to the administration as a whole. An illustration was the failure to advise the Africans about Federation in 1953.
- (c) There was rivalry and ill-feeling, largely due to misunderstanding, between the Federal and Territorial Departments.
- (d) The Federal Medical Service was over-centralised, particularly in the Northern Province.
- (e) The postal service within the Federation was shocking. It took much longer to get a letter from one part of Nyasaland to another than it did to London.

- (f) Agriculture in Nyasaland was on the downward trend, mainly because intimidation by the Malawi Congress Party made it impossible to get the Africans to co-operate.

Summing up, the witness said that he was not at all happy about Nyasaland's future, and had very little confidence in the Government.

I C. A. INNES

Mr. Innes said he was born in Matabeleland, brought up among the Africans and spoke their language. He qualified in medicine at Guy's Hospital and came back as a consulting surgeon. He served in the Royal Navy during the war. Two years ago he gave up surgery for private reasons and was now farming near Gwelo.

He made the following points in oral evidence.

He was against Federation, because he felt the whole idea was impracticable. Although he voted against Federation in 1953, he had done his best to support it when it came into being, and he considered that in the circumstances the Federal Government had made a good effort. Their task had not been made any easier by certain criticisms from abroad.

But he could not see Federation working out when the three partners were so different, and two of them were utterly opposed to it. Southern Rhodesia should be allowed to go ahead on her own and set an example of a good way of life. Later when the other two were ready, and if they were willing, they should be allowed to join up. In order to set a good example Southern Rhodesia should first break down the colour bar, which was the Africans' strongest weapon: this would also put a stop to the censorship of world opinion, which was doing more harm to Central Africa than anyone realised. What they were aiming for was "co-existence": this was a better word than partnership because Europeans had got to realise that they must either co-exist with the Africans or get out.

In order to achieve this the Government should first declare that no official colour bar would be recognised. Secondly, everyone must make an individual effort, and he believed Southern Rhodesians would respond to this. For example, Mrs. Little, manageress of the Victoria Hotel, Bulawayo, had set a courageous example in declaring her hotel multi-racial, which he hoped others would follow. On the whole, in spite of the die-hards, people were becoming more and more liberal minded. In his area twelve out of fifteen of his fellow farmers shared his liberal views, but the great fear of the other three was the stronger force, and must be broken down. He agreed that the old-established Rhodesians were far more liberal-minded than the more recent "settlers". Thirdly, Europeans had got to put it across to the African that he must be patient. From Standard VI to the space age was no mean feat. Jobs for Africans in agriculture, industry, etc., must keep pace with education. Educated Africans were being turned out by the dozen, expecting the world on a plate, yet unable to get good jobs.

Questioned about agriculture, the witness said that a tremendous amount had been done for African agriculture and Africans were turning out to be quite good farmers. The Land Apportionment Act would have to go in due course, but if it went immediately the middle-class Africans would suffer. He agreed with the suggestion that the Act might be amended to keep the reserves as they were at present, but at the same time to enable the Africans to buy land on their own initiative.

He disagreed with Mr. Macmillan's implication that the Africans of the Federation were inferior to those in other states such as Ghana. Potentially they were just as capable. The trouble was that there were four distinct sets of people—rural Africans, rural Europeans, urban Africans and urban Europeans—all of whom were utterly different and could not understand the others' point of view. This was particularly true in the two northern Territories: Southern Rhodesia offered a better and fuller way of life and her people were far more enlightened, contented, and less politically-minded than those of the other two Territories. But, even in Southern Rhodesia danger was closing in all round, and if Federation were not allowed to break up peacefully now, it would break up by force soon.

To sum up: Rhodesians must do away with the colour bar, seek for co-existence with the Africans, and "look to Britain for money, money, money". In reply to a suggestion that Britain herself was short of money, he said that people were seriously alarmed at the recent American Commission and the prospect of American dollars coming in by the back door and undoing all the good done by Britain.

I. D. SMITH, M.P.

Mr. Smith said he was a member of the United Federal Party, and the only Federal representative of his party in the Southern half of Southern Rhodesia.

He had been much concerned at the general anti-Federation feeling in this country, but could not help sympathising with this feeling in view of what was happening in the northern Territories. There was unrest, intimidation, lack of co-operation, and the governments seemed unable to cope. A minority opinion in Southern Rhodesia wanted to take the initiative and leave the Federation now, even though they might at first feel the financial loss of separation from Northern Rhodesia. He himself would hate to see the Federation break up, chiefly for the sake of the two northern Territories, but it looked as though that was what was going to happen.

The people of Southern Rhodesia had understood that the idea of Federation was to spread the Southern Rhodesian way of life throughout the three Territories. But the reverse seemed to be happening, and Southern Rhodesia was continually having to make compromises and concessions to the other two Territories. Since Federation it had become more and more apparent that the Southern Rhodesia way of life was far the best. Operations such as the clearing of the Kariba basin had been accomplished successfully and peacefully, whilst similar operations in the north had caused rioting and bloodshed. He was afraid they were going to be landed with the responsibility for the trouble in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, which was clearly unfair; Southern Rhodesia could not reasonably be expected to accept Federation on such terms. Nevertheless, there was a good chance of saving it if it could be run on Southern Rhodesian lines, with full independence in the Federal sphere. He thought that the British Government should hand over all remaining powers to the Federal Government. In his view it would be unacceptable to Southern Rhodesia if the Africans in the northern Territories were given a larger voice in the government at present. They had already been given too many concessions irrespective of their ability.

If the people of the Federation could be given a chance to make a success of Federation on their own, which he was convinced they could, the example would go a long way to promoting the moderate, pro-British elements in other parts of the African continent. If, on the other hand, Britain made a mess of it, there was no telling what harm might be done.

MRS. M. STENSLUNDE

Mrs. Stenslunde said that she was the third generation of her family in Africa and she had grandchildren also being brought up in Southern Rhodesia. She was a director of three companies established on the Gwelo heavy industrial site, employing 23 Europeans and 73 Africans. These factories involved heavy machinery at which Africans, under supervision, acted as machine minders, etc.

In answer to questions, the witness made the following additional points:—

- (a) It was not practicable at the present time to pay the same wages for Africans and Europeans. If this were done, it was inevitable that Europeans would be engaged in preference to Africans. Pressure for "the rate for the job" by European trade unions was not, therefore, a sudden burst of goodwill.
- (b) Southern Rhodesia had had a very adverse press overseas. It sometimes seemed difficult for the English to realise that those born in the Colonies were generally very well disposed to Africans, though they knew that it was too soon to force responsibility on them. When Africans did well, there was nobody more delighted than their employer, whose only desire was that they stand on their own merits.
- (c) Although she recognised that there were no Africans in the Southern Rhodesia Parliament, she felt that it was a bit too soon for that to happen. Still less could there be any question of one man, one vote.
- (d) Southern Rhodesia had given better opportunities to Africans in the Colony than existed in any of the British Protectorates—Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland, Bechuanaland or Tanganyika. But they resented being rushed into going further too fast; this could have disastrous results to those very people who most relied on the Europeans for improving their standard of living.

Memorandum

de L. H. STOWE

It would be disastrous for Southern Rhodesia and this part of Africa if Nyasaland was forced to remain in the Federation. Nyasaland is a trouble spot—a hot bed for political intrigue and dangerous subversive activity—a poverty stricken, slum territory created by the missionaries and the Colonial Office over the years—a playground for the Labour Party of Great Britain.

Nyasaland must remain Great Britain's responsibility until the territory is able to stand on its own feet economically, and politically. I feel our political leaders were "taken for a ride" when they agreed to include Nyasaland in the Federation without having demanded financial and political control guarantees.

Nyasaland's economy can never match up to her demands for services. Without an injection of big capital and an infusion of intelligent people her natural resources must remain underdeveloped. Capital will not be forthcoming while there remains a preponderance of self appointed leaders such as Dr. Banda and other power seekers thumping for Black Nationalism. The solution for Nyasaland's problem lies in the adoption of a policy framed on the pattern of Southern Rhodesia, strict control of the missionaries and elimination of subversive activity.

I should like to now move to the Southern Rhodesia scene by beginning with the occupation of Southern Rhodesia by the pioneers and early settlers and by the complete conquest of the Matabele and Mashonas in 1893. Prior to this, for a period of over 50 years the country was devastated by blood thirsty hordes of savages making annual raids on peace loving indigenous tribes—carting away their womenfolk and cattle and murdering their men. The Europeans brought civilization—Christianity, justice, peace and democratic rule to this part of Africa. The Pioneer column under the guidance of the late Rt. Hon. Cecil J. Rhodes and efficient and experienced officers prevented the Transvaal Boers from occupying this part of Africa and the German from linking up S.W. Africa and German East Africa.

The debt Great Britain and the Empire owes to our early white settlers and their descendants cannot be estimated. The hardships and sacrifices, the bloodshed and loss of life entailed in winning this part of Africa will never be known nor appreciated by outsiders.

In the same way that Americans conquered the Red Indians and Australians conquered the aborigines our forebears conquered the Matabele and Mashonas and were here by right of conquest. We are willing to share democratically with all our citizens white and black a peaceful co-existence in the same way that America and Australia is sharing a co-existence with the Red Indians and aborigines of those countries. The Africans whom we found in Southern Rhodesia at the time of the occupation were uncivilized, crude, illiterate and poverty stricken. Our European civilization has brought to them benefits such as state protection, hospitalization, education, employment and recreation never before enjoyed by them.

I will now pass on to the year 1900. At that time a rough census was taken and there were estimated to be 400,000 natives of all tribes in Southern Rhodesia. By normal methods of computation by the year 1959 this number should have grown to 1½ million. Our latest census shows that Southern Rhodesia has an African population of 2½ million. I suggest that the additional 1½ million Africans left Nyasaland, Northern Rhodesia and P.E.A. to seek work here and share in our prosperity created mainly by the capital, industries, enterprise and effort of the white man. Great Britain too has shared in our prosperity. Exports and imports between our countries amount to thousands of millions of pounds over the years. In time of war Southern Rhodesia has made a contribution in men and materials (comparatively speaking) greater than any part of our Commonwealth. We provided air training stations during the war and our people assisted in every way. Our gold and tobacco exports helped Great Britain in the post war period to economic recovery. We pooled our dollar earnings at the time so that Britain would get the major share. We were proud to be an outpost of the British Empire, flying the Union Jack. Britain's attitude in recent years favours Black leadership to European control and our confidence has been badly shaken. All that European capital, enterprise and efforts has built up over the years, all our achievements, our endeavour to civilize the African as fast as the country's economy would permit, is looked on lightly and with disfavour by the ignorant critics in Britain—especially by the labourites and the liberals—by the sensational press, by certain clergy and biased, ill-informed people throughout the world influenced by false and untrue propaganda that is being spread with specific intent to wreck this part of the British Empire.

Mr. Macmillan—a liberal extremist—in "Tory" disguise, followed by Lord Home, and Mr. McLeod, came to spy out the land and assure the Africans. These "power weighted" gentlemen did more to disrupt the tranquillity in Africa than any other factors. Mr. McLeod openly connived for the release of Dr. Banda, the release of the other detainees and a scheme for Black leadership in Nyasaland is also being planned at a time Federation is trying to get under way and while the Monckton Commission is still hearing evidence. This act of political indiscretion by the Colonial Secretary must disrupt all negotiations between Black and White and worsen our chances of settling the Federation problem in the three territories. Indeed all Mr. McLeod has succeeded in doing is to encourage Dr. Banda and his supporters to demand secession for Nyasaland from the Federation—which I believe would be a good thing for Southern Rhodesia!

Reason. The Federal Government has spent millions of pounds on improving services in Nyasaland to help in uplifting the backward people there—more than the British Government ever spent, comparatively speaking in all the years it controlled the administration of the territory. I maintain until the Federation gains full independence with a Senate to safeguard African interests—the responsibility for financing Nyasaland's internal services should remain with Nyasaland and the home government. Should the Federation break up Great Britain should be morally bound to refund to Southern Rhodesia and Northern Rhodesia, proportionally the monies expended on Nyasaland since 1953. Outside Federation Nyasaland will develop into a slum state. Under Dr. Banda it will become a graveyard.

I have lived amongst uncivilized Africans all my life. In Tanganyika, Nyasaland, Southern Rhodesia and South Africa, and learned a great deal about their customs, their beliefs, their superstitions and their weaknesses.

75% of the lower strata in African society are liars, and thieves, destitute of principle and very few have consciences. Dr. Banda after his contact with Dr. Nkrumah saw his opportunity and soon realised how easily these simple emergent Africans can be influenced, especially by preaching Black Nationalism to them. The plotting to overthrow local authority and the seeking after power by the agitators will continue so long as support is forthcoming from overseas. I believe that the organizers of the various political groups are supported by only 5% of the hooligan element of the African population—mostly out of work and semi-educated types, with a sprinkling of power seekers hoping for the "top jobs".

So long as interviews are readily given by the Colonial Office to just anybody claiming to speak for the African people so long will our racial problem in Africa remain unsolved.

The missionaries, the press and some of our Church men must accept along with the ill-informed critics overseas the full responsibility for most of the racial trouble in Africa.

I blame our local Government for allowing African education to be controlled by the missionaries and churches, who make little contribution financially but enjoy this power. The Federal Government makes block grants and pays teachers salaries and other facilities are paid for by the parents of pupils. The churches have in the past indoctrinated African youth with ideas—not only Christian in character, but political and subversive—Example St. Faith's mission, Rusape and churches in the Union of South Africa.

Communism is infiltrating everywhere in Europe, Africa, the Middle East and the Far East. Great Britain appears to be making a titanic effort to outbid the Communists in Africa for African favour, but believe you me all her leaders are doing is abandoning Africa and throwing the door wide open for Communists to walk right in and establish bases from which Western Europe could be destroyed over-night. The ignorant masses in Africa will be enslaved to develop Africa for the Russians. When England walks out of Africa, Russia will walk in. They will walk in—even ahead of America who has plans for pouring big sums of money into Africa—for development and exploitation of Africa's natural resources.

The Labour Party has demanded and actually received an assurance from the British Government that Britain will not hand over control to the Federal Government until they are satisfied all the people desire to join Federation. This assurance is as ridiculous as the Labour Party's demand, because 80% of the people of Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia are illiterate and uncivilized and will remain so for a long time because of our economy. South Africa, America and Australia after 100 years still have uncivilized coloured communities who take no part in making major decisions. Does Great Britain consult all the people when deciding major issues? Such as declaring war or withdrawing from the Suez Canal area?

In 1953 Southern Rhodesia was granted responsible Government—with Government stability. Capital poured into the country for industrial development and economic advancement. We were virtually an independent country. Our Prime Ministers attended Commonwealth Conferences and Southern was recognised as an independent state. The one remaining constitutional reservation African affairs would have been removed by 1955 had we not decided (persuaded by optimistic leadership) to support Federation. We supported the idea of a greater state—a bulwark in Africa—a loyal member of the British Commonwealth. Southern Rhodesia stuck to the undertaking but the Colonial Office, urged on by the Labour Party, political expediency and the discovery of Mr. Macmillan, that the winds of change were blowing across Africa whipping up black nationalism decided on constitutional changes for Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland. A premature violation of the Federal Constitutional set up and an immoral departure from British traditional fair play. It is impossible to keep law and order out here so long as deputations of self appointed leaders go singly and in groups to interview the Colonial Secretary in Britain. Surely in the name of diplomatic decency these "tittle-tattle tale" carriers should not be received, but should be referred back to authority in those countries from whence they came. Having received an audience with the powers that be in Great Britain they return with added prestige and backing. An entirely new approach to enfranchising the ignorant masses will have to be written into our Constitution. Something to satisfy the 80% of our uncivilized illiterate Africans. In such a unique political set-up representation for the tribal masses should be through their chiefs or special African leaders appointed to represent them in parliament. The educated Africans and those owning property and those able to fulfil the Franchise qualification will share a common voters roll. It would be suicidal politically and economically if we granted one man one vote. It would encourage mob rule and all development capital would be frightened away over-night. Constitutional advancement should be by stages over the years and geared to a country's ability to stand on its own feet politically and economically. During the transition stage it should be under the sponsorship of an independent neighbouring state—sharing its technical services, police and military protection with certain guarantees from some world organization until it has reached political maturity and independence. It should not be governed by a muddling, inefficient Colonial Office nor political churchmen and missionaries.

If Southern Rhodesia held a referendum tomorrow—an overwhelming majority would vote in favour of expelling Nyasaland from the Federation. Sir Edgar Whitehead would get a solid backing.

One final observation. The 1st and 2nd R. Rifles along with 100,000 South African troops conquered Tanganyika in 1918. These troops endured hardship and suffering because they were patriotic to Great Britain. Many thousands lie buried in Tanganyika and thousands were maimed for life. All fought to conquer the Germans and to protect Nyasaland and Kenya from invasion. Now 52 years later those graves are being trampled underfoot by black nationalism and the interests of those of us who survived are being sold to political expediency.

I believe that the problems of Africa can and will best be settled by the people on the spot—those who have a stake and everything to lose if a wrong decision is made—those who are concerned with the future destiny of the country and all its people white and black.

It would be a betrayal of the emergent masses if they were handed over to Black nationalism and inexperienced leaderships.

Oral Evidence

de L. H. STOWE

Mr. Stowe had submitted a note of his evidence.

In answer to questions he said he was in favour of maintaining Federation without Nyasaland, if Britain promised economic assistance. He resented paying tax to Nyasaland and getting nothing in return.

Asked if he thought that Federation should be broken up if Nyasaland did not secede, he said "yes". He did not agree with Sir Roy Welensky's statement that there was no possibility of Federation breaking up in such a case. If Federation failed, Britain was morally bound to repay Northern Rhodesia and Southern Rhodesia what they had put into Nyasaland

SHABANI

19TH APRIL 1960

Memorandum

B. J. HLAMBELO

Your Commission is purely advisory. It will make no binding decisions. Matters of concern will be taken only by 5 Governments at the 1960 conference. Fortune will only fall on them to have the recommendations of your Commission.

Let me hope that they will be fortunate and have my views available to them.

Federation had a bagful of palatable advantages preached to both Africans and Europeans before its birth in 1953. Amalgamation had previously proved abortive due to the pronounced African opposition, particularly those Africans of the Northern Protectorates who had been both in Southern Rhodesia and South Africa and had seen suppression of advancement in Southern Rhodesia and its allied apartheid policy in the Union.

During Bledisloe Commission, Fitzgerald saw the Native Opposition to the proposal for amalgamation. That was in 1938. The very opponents of amalgamation were in 1953 given another "version" of amalgamation in the form of Federation. The underlying principles governing the two issues has no differentiating bearing upon the ordinary African. It is the same pulpit and preacher of amalgamation. In the North, Africans are imbued with a hope of a not-far-off independence. In Southern Rhodesia the right to be governed by the majority is prevalent. At present the white man is a slave master and the master mind of Federation and suppression. This is due to the proximity of the Dutch element in the Union and the influx of the Boers from there to Southern Rhodesia. They have a damaging influence upon any Socialistic type of policy. They steer both the Federal Party and the Dominion Party, which Parties have an element of apartheid.

Certain services which were left territorially are a pointer that advantages which may accrue from Federation must only be enjoyed by the Boers.

The Native Policy of Southern Rhodesia is the only retarding factor in the smooth operation of Federation. Partnership which has been left ill-defined has received its deserved interpretations. The most suitable to an African is the relationship between a horse and its rider. When certain people begin to implement proper partnership, even if it means junior and senior partner or relation between father and son, crisis germinates as in the case of Todd's Government.

Dating from the dismissal of Todd and his complete failure to be supported by the electorate, Africans in all the Territories have become Nationally aware. This resulted in the inhuman detention of hundreds of Africans. The horse is still in detention. This has aggravated nationalism.

If Southern Rhodesia were Bechuanaland, there would be no trouble. If Sir Roy had been Todd, Banda would have hoped for the best. As long as a Todd is out of the reins, there is no future of a peaceful Federation. "Shots" will be fired in no remote time. Southern Rhodesia will soon surrender and go south. The African will be better off because he shall not be bribed any longer.

If Federation had not come:—

- (1) Would there be no Hospitals?
- (2) Would there be no Railways and Post Offices?
- (3) Would the present Police Force be not what it is?
- (4) Would the Native Affairs Department be not what it is now?
- (5) Would European and Coloured education not move a step forward?
- (6) Would the Zambesi still be without a Gerge?
- (7) Would there have been high postal charges and gas-line high taxations?

Let alone the dead answer.

Must Federation be disintegrated. No! No! Banda would be a thorn in the flesh of our doorsteps. Does it need renovating? Yes! This will make Banda to have a cooling and moderating influence upon Roy and his colleagues.
Federal New Look

Southern Rhodesia which is the backbone of Federation must change its Native Policy. Africans must be given a suitable franchise. Native Commissioners must die off as they seem to have flexible and unwarranted powers over the poor African. The Chiefs must cease to be Native Commissioners' messengers. Illegitimate coloured children should have their parents listed yearly in the Government Gazette. Land Husbandry Act which gives Africans, vegetable gardens and not fields, should give room to better animal units and farming acreage. At present 6 acres only result in subsistence living. The coming generation has no future in the reserves. The Land Apportionment re-division. The Morris Carter of 1930 is not different from separate development of South Africa.

The African wage must be brought up. At present he gets at list £6 while his partner receives £90. African education must go Federal. Education and Agriculture are the basis of a nation. Millions of African children go away from schools half baked. The £2 tax is feudal. People should be taxed according to his income. Partnership is meaningless. Democracy must finally be implanted and must be practised as we know it. Communism is not known to us and must be stopped from being spread by Europeans who best know it. The benefits of Federation should not be preached to us but acted upon. Shabani

B. J. HLAMBELO

CHAIRMAN: You are a teacher in an African School in the service of the Territorial Government?—A. Yes. I am not a Headmaster, just an Assistant. There are about 800 pupils in the school—this is the Mine School.

Q. Are you the first, second or third teacher?—A. There is no grade. I was a Headmaster prior to coming to the Mine School. My salary is £26.50d. a month. I would now like to hand in a paper. (Paper handed to the Chairman.) (See memorandum by B. J. HlambeLO.)

Q. Thank you. Do you belong to any Association?—A. The African Teachers' Association. I do not belong to political organization.

MR. CRAWLEY: Did you belong to any before they were banned—Congress?—A. Yes.

CHAIRMAN: You think there must be a change in Southern Rhodesia?—A. It is the stumbling block. The Northern territories are frightened when they have to federate with such a country as Southern Rhodesia.

Q. You do not see any prospect in federation?—A. There is, provided the present conditions change, particularly the policy of Southern Rhodesia. The most urgent change is that Europeans are mostly not against federation. There may be a few now. I personally think it is the attitude of the Europeans of Southern Rhodesia towards the Natives that must be changed.

Q. What is the worst feature of it?—A. There are many things. The Native Affairs Department needs a different outlook towards the African. It has never changed for the last fifty years or so. I am still handled as a man was handled then.

MR. CRAWLEY: It is the attitude you are speaking off?—A. Yes, we consider the Department is a sort of privileged Government within a Government. They have certain powers that do not need to go through Parliament. When we visit the Department, in most cases we are subjected to a low type of handling.

CHAIRMAN: Do you mean they are rude to you?—A. We will be told to sit on the floor. I experienced that myself when I went to pay my poll tax. I was told to sit on the floor or else leave the office. As a result, I never paid my tax on that date but left with the money.

Q. That was done by a European? And what happened?—A. I eventually paid it; a message was sent to me.

MR. CRAWLEY: This is an attitude of superiority, or rudeness?—A. Yes, they have a superiority complex. I think the poll tax is medieval, outdated.

CHAIRMAN: Do you think you should pay anything at all?—A. Income tax. It would be paid according to percentage. I do not know what percentage.

Q. You would pay nothing, surely?—A. That is better: my wages are low.

MR. CRAWLEY: But you do not object to income tax if the money is more?—A. If I were a European with the same qualification. I would not be getting £26.50d. a month. I am Matric; Standard X.

CHAIRMAN: Have you complained about your salary?—A. Yes, it should not be according to colour but qualification: the rate for the job is important.

MR. CRAWLEY: Are there any European teachers who have not got Matriculation standard?—A. Not to my knowledge. I went to European mission teachers, and they all had. They were paid three times what I am getting, I think.

CHAIRMAN: Are they all African teachers at this school?—A. The principal is a European. I would like to talk about the Native policy. I feel the franchise is made by the Government and is too high for the African. It should be lowered until all Africans have secondary education, then it could be changed. It is made only to keep the number of African voters low.

MR. CRAWLEY: Do you have a vote?—A. Yes, on the Special Roll. This year, if I re-applied, I may be in the General Roll because I am getting £26 a month. I do not know whether I can register, but anyhow I am a voter in the Territorial Parliament. I think if Africans could be in the Territorial Parliament our views could be represented.

CHAIRMAN: How many Members do you think would be needed to do that?—A. It is according to the voters; if people vote for ten or twelve Africans, that is all right.

MR. CRAWLEY: When you were a Headmaster, did you leave that school vountarily to come to this one?—A. I had to transfer when it got into the hands of the Native Affairs Department. I was at the school, and then, seeing my interest was with the missionaries, I transferred to a mission station.

CHAIRMAN: Have you anything to say on the colour bar?—A. Yes, it has to be removed. In Shabani we do not go into the stores; we have to go, as they say, through the window. It is acute here, because even the M.P. here is a member of the Dominion Party. We think it is typically South African Government.

Q. You cannot go into the stores, but are there any other forms of discrimination?—A. Trains: there are special carriages. Also, this is my first time to be in this building. It is a memorial hall, and no African has ever been in here except those who work.

Q. Have you ever been to a European's home?—A. Missionaries' homes, yes. I think if all politicians were as missionaries, then things would be all right.

CHAIRMAN: What age are you? Have you noticed any difference since Federation came?—A. I am about 35. I think there is little difference except that a few Africans have had chances of getting very good jobs—a very few. Amongst the rank and file there has been no improvement.

MR. CRAWLEY: Has there been any improvement in education?—A. Not African education, unless it goes Federal.

Q. They would have more money, in other words?—A. At present it makes no difference.

CHAIRMAN: You think you would get more money in the Federal set-up, and the administration would be better?—A. Money is the thing. At present we are told in the Teachers' Association there is no money. I feel most of the teachers would not turn up to give evidence because we believe that unless Federation carries on there is no hope for us in Southern Rhodesia. I believe some people have been persuaded not to come here by a member of the Native Affairs Department. I was myself told that no teachers should go before the Commission.

MR. CRAWLEY: Your Native Commissioner told you not to come?—A. Yes, when I went to the Police Commissioner I was assured that I had every right to come.

Q. Were you told not to come because you were civil servants?—A. So I was told. I had read that in the papers, so I went to make sure, from the Native Police, that I was supposed to give evidence. Two Chiefs are here today. I am told one Chief has been returned because he stated that he did not know anything about the Federation, and he was told to go back.

CHAIRMAN: Was it the Native Commissioner who told him to go back?—A. Yes, a European. The name of the Chief is Shiku; and as a matter of fact these Chiefs have come to a status of Native Commissioners' messengers. They are no longer representing the Africans.

REVEREND A. GRAY

I first came to this country as a missionary in December 1947 and have been here since that time, except for a period three and a half years working in a Diocese in the Union of South Africa. My interest in the country has remained constant during the thirteen years. Rhodesia is my home, and in saying that I speak for my wife and family. We have a house with a small farm attached which is our holiday home, in the Eastern Districts. Even when in South Africa we returned each year to Rhodesia for our holidays.

My work has been mainly with the rural African and particularly with the reserve African, though since working in Shabani and its district I have come into contact with a very different rural African—namely the African farmer of the Native Purchase Areas. In the early days I was frequently on trek for a period of two or three weeks at a time, and in those days it was an uncommon experience to meet another European during the whole trek, and they seemed rather strange people after living for three weeks among Africans. I mention this for one purpose only, namely to emphasise that it is purely prejudice which sets up a barrier between European and African; but it has to be admitted that their hygiene and cleanliness are not up to European standards and that their customs of eating, living, etc., are in many ways very different from ours. The intelligence of a great many of them is very limited; my experience, it must be remembered, is largely of the rural African and I would estimate that of them about 80% have no interest in politics and are virtually incapable of exercising a vote; the same might be said of a much smaller percentage of English people, but with this difference; the large proportion of politically disinterested Africans of low mentality would be the ready prey of the political agitator; the rural African is easily influenced by one of his own people with a smart suit, a trilby hat, and a brief case, arriving in a car.

I have been in Shabani for over three years and have, for the first time, come into close contact with urban Africans. Although there are, as might be expected, a larger proportion of better educated and/or skilled Africans, the great number of them are probably still rural at heart, and what I have said regarding their eligibility to vote would apply to them as much as to the African living in the Reserves.

Earlier I mentioned what I called "a very different type of rural African", namely the Master Farmer, certificated African who lives in the Native Purchase Area and has bought his own land, 100 acres or so. Many of these have built themselves European type houses and own a tractor or a lorry. It is only fair to say that in general these have been picked by the Native Commissioner before being allowed to take possession of their own farms. These men stand out from the ordinary rural African by virtue of their character, behaviour, self-assurance and manner or speech and good sense. I have no figures of the numbers of Africans occupying land in the Native Purchase Areas but I should think they are still a very small minority, though undoubtedly one of the important African minorities in the country. They constitute the foundation of African yeoman farmers; there will undoubtedly be an increasing number of Africans becoming eligible for Purchase Area farms, and land must be made available for them, if necessary through the purchase by the Government of suitable European-owned farms as and when they are offered for sale.

Speaking as a Rhodesian I have the impression that there are in general two fallacies deep-rooted in the minds of people in England; one is that Rhodesia abounds with lions, snakes and scorpions and that its citizens live in constant danger from them; the other that the generality of Africans ought to be treated as the social equals of the European. I am sure that members of the Commission will be able on their return to England to dispose of the first fallacy. The second fallacy constitutes more of a problem; there is constant confusion between 'racial' and 'social' in the minds both of the people of England, speaking about Rhodesia, and also of the European Rhodesians. People on the Left in England seem to think that a blueprint for the Welfare State which works in England, should be applied here. The problem of 'racial' versus 'social' here is acute because more than 95% of our African brethren would find their place in society in the lower levels. Having said this I must hasten to add that my wife and I have amongst Africans those whom we call friends, who sit at our table and we at theirs if we call on one another.

If Federation is to go ahead I am convinced that there will have to be a much more determined effort towards the integration into society of the civilised African, who should be accepted as the social equal of the average European. Hotels, bars, theatres and cinemas as well as churches should be open to him. Europeans have far more to be embarrassed about and ashamed of in the behaviour of young Rhodesians at bull-fights in Vila Manica or beatings up conducted by teddy boys in Salisbury hotels than they have of the advent into society of what at first would be a very limited number of Africans.

Regarding the generality of Africans, there are a certain number of pinpricks which have been removed, such as the dividing walls in Banks and Post Offices, which previously enforced segregation. I have heard a limited amount of verbal protest against the removal of these on the part of Europeans. The removal of these material obstacles does not go very far towards solving the problem unless it serves as a reminder to Europeans that their demeanour towards all Africans, whatever their social standing, must change; for example the housewife who calls out "Here, boy" and throws the duster he is to use on the floor for him to pick it up. There is still far too much of that sort of thing. We now order 'rations' for our servant from the butcher instead of 'boys meat' but it usually comes wrapped in newspaper whereas the bones for our dog come in greaseproof paper; this sort of thing tacitly suggests that the African is some lower form of animal.

In the education of the African the Missions have taken a leading part. People who have been in the country a long time remember the kind of African gentleman who was the product of the early days; they compare him with the modern product, who is often swollen-headed, cheeky and without manners; having passed Standard VI he behaves as if he knows everything, and is a social misfit. He is too superior to do manual work. (Standard VI is of course not a high academic qualification, and is normally passed by European children at the age of 12-13.) The Missions are blamed for this, but it is not their fault; in the early days the Missions drew up their own syllabus which combined a limited amount of academic study with a good deal of manual training. It is the Government Education Department which has forced the pace, and compelled the Missions to follow a more academic syllabus. The Standard VI social misfit thinks he knows all there is to know; he is insubordinate and strongly resents being told anything; he cannot drive a nail in with a hammer, or fill a wheelbarrow; and when he fails to get a white-collared job, he will come and ask, for example, for a job in the garden, and resent every minute of it.

There are two qualities which are sadly lacking in the vast majority of Africans, a fact which is overlooked by many English people when speaking about the Federation. These two are integrity, and trustworthiness in taking responsibility. For generations the African has looked to the European to provide him with everything and very few of them are capable of taking initiative and standing on their own feet; the great majority of them are still subject to persuasion by bribes or presents; no doubt due to the fact that the giving of bribes has for centuries been a marked feature of their tribal life. Within the mission field they will demand the entry of the Church which they think will provide them with the greatest material benefits. The influence of witchcraft and superstition still is considerable even amongst the more educated Africans. Only the other day I had a teacher (Standard VI with two years Teacher Training) who applied to me for a post in one of the schools in this area. I took him to the place and left him there. Two days later he returned here and informed me that he did not intend to stay. The reason given was that one of the inhabitants had told him that it wasn't safe for him to stay there as there were evil spirits that passed the school in the night. He evidently believed the story for I could not persuade him that it was pure nonsense. The story is not complete without its sequel. After much enquiry I discovered that the man who had made up the story about the evil spirits was the uncle of another applicant for the post, who in fact got the job.

Oral Evidence

REVEREND A. GRAY

The witness read a written statement which he handed in. In reply to questions Mr. Gray made the following points:—

(1) He belonged to the Church of England. He had charge of a limited number of schools around Shabani at present, but in the past had been Superintendent of 20 or 25 schools.

(2) Questioned on the colour bar, he said that it was not going fast enough, although there was a limited advance. A number of the old settler types had hardened against relaxations. This had been a reaction against Mr. Garfield Todd. Many of them could not get rid of their old ideas. Among a greater number, however, ideas were moving on slowly. He was not sure that legislation was desirable to remove the colour bar. Informed Europeans ought to do more socially than they were doing. He and his wife had African friends, but they still felt that they were not doing enough. He had first come out on a mission, and he thought that in old mission days there had been racial integration at its best.

At the present time in his own congregation, he had noticed a change of thought, rather than a change of practice.

(3) He considered that Federation was "the only thing".

(4) He thought there had been a change in the attitude of Africans towards Europeans, but it was not very marked. There had been a deterioration in the relationship towards Africans of the Standard VI semi-educated types, who were not as good as the earlier mission product. These people probably constituted the largest part of African thinking, but they were still likely to follow any lead which was given to them.

(5) On the subject of missions and education, he pointed out that the European child who was not of a high academic standard could get technical education, for example at the Bulawayo Technical College. A great majority of Africans would be in the same position, that is, only a limited number would be found suitable for university education. Therefore the majority ought to be trained for technical jobs, but there were not the facilities at present. He thought that this line would be the answer to the problem of the semi-educated Standard VI boys.

(6) He had seen a great advance in Africans today in respect of their holding responsible jobs in factories; such Africans could do their jobs well.

(7) On the desire of those with Standard VI qualifications for white collar jobs, he thought it was the outcome of history. The position of Europeans in the past had been that of supervisors and hence the Africans wished for white collar jobs to become supervisors themselves.

(8) He would say that the Master Farmers in the Native Purchase Area would be capable of having the vote. His wife was a doctor, and she could pick out such men immediately. They were self-assured, contented and sensible.

(9) On the land problem, he thought that the government should purchase land for African occupation as and when it came on to the market. But if the government were to take a slice of European land for Africans, it would provoke great opposition.

(10) He agreed that the expression "civilised African" was vague and that it was very hard to find a yard-stick. Probably what counted most in practice was not education but cleanliness, hygiene and general behaviour. He agreed that such people as hotel or cinema proprietors might find it hard to draw the line. It was certainly not purely a matter of education. Many Europeans were of low education, but they just "fitted in". But he would not say that removal of the colour bar could not be put into practice.

(11) Questioned as to whether the standard of living of Africans was beginning to rise, he said that since he had returned from South Africa and come to work in Matabeleland, he had noticed a greater backwardness among Africans there than in Mashonaland. In fact he thought that the Africans in the latter area probably had not moved forward at all in the last 13 years. A certain school which he had mentioned was in an extremely backward place. In contrast there had been a definite move forward in Mashonaland, where it was tied up with the general prosperity. In the Shabani area only a few Africans would come into town and work. In fact, in this area, there were still people who wore skins.

(12) He did not know if the police were regarded by the Africans as friends and protectors, although he thought that on the whole they were.

(13) He served two churches in Shabani; one was European and the other African. But in fact there was no European church at all, he had to share a hall used by other congregations. When the Anglican Church was built he would make it clear that it was open to all races.

(14) He did not consider that the racial prejudice among young Europeans was stronger than among the old.

(15) On the franchise, he thought it should be broadened a little, but not to the extent of the recommendations of the Central Africa Party.

(16) There was in the past Congress activity around Shabani. But in his own district work among Africans was limited. He worked among urban Africans, mostly those employed on the mines. He considered them to be very well behaved. Shabani mine conditions were among the best.

P. MABENA

The witness was a barber in the Township Municipal Board Location of Shabani, and also a farmer.

Mr. Mabena complained of the destocking of animals outside the town, and also about the allocation of lands. In the reserves people were counted when the allocation was carried out. If a person happened to be away then, when he came back he found that he had no land. People who went abroad to seek employment were left out of the land allocation. As a result they had no grazing permits. He said that these things had not happened to him personally, but he spoke for others.

The witness did not fully understand Federation, but thought that it would be a good thing for the Federation to continue and not break.

In reply to questions, Mr Mabena made the following further points:—

(1) The Agricultural Officers helped them much, so that people had more food, but the land allocated was not enough.

(2) People had been moved from Didaya area, some to Sabi and some to Nyamundi where people were being grouped together. There were no difficulties because they had no land and some had no grazing permits. The Land Husbandry officers had been there.

(3) Business men were not given houses. They were sent outside the township Municipal Board. The witness conducted his business under a tree: but it was not a very good business.

(4) He was not a voter, but would like to be. He lacked the qualifications to vote. There were many like him. He would like the franchise laws to be widened to include such people. He had no educational qualifications because there were no schools in his area. He had been taught to write only his own language. His income was between £40 and £50 a year.

(5) Destocking was not the result of congestion, but every year there was destocking, and a man's cattle might be reduced from 40 to 5.

Memorandum

T. S. STILL

Generally speaking if the United Kingdom should decide to alter the Federal or Territorial Constitution it would be a calamity if such alterations should make it possible for an African Majority to control the Government of our Country within the next 50 to 100 years, if ever; though as the Country progresses and their standard of education and general knowledge improves they will year by year have a larger say in Government, and one can only hope that eventually we shall be full partners.

I consider independence, even to Nyasaland in the near future would be disastrous, not so much for us, as for them. The only danger to us is that they would very soon be in difficulties and fall victims to some other help, most likely Communistic.

As far as I know we are on very good terms with most of our Africans and the only trouble emanates from a few agitators like Fenner-Brockway, Stonehouse, Barbara Castle etc., who have been stirring up strife with the support of Ghana, whose Prime Minister, according to his own Biography, has a leaning towards Communism or certainly had such a leaning a few years ago. I would refer you to the Autobiography of Kwame Nkrumah (Thomas Nelson & Sons) and Joy Packer "Apes and Ivory" pages 316, 317, Eyre & Spottiswoode.

I know full well that 90% of the people in Britain, who are supporting, by their gallop polls the rapid advancement of the African, have no idea what the average African is like or what he was like before we came to his rescue some 60 odd years ago.

We are all ready to give them as much education as possible and not in any way to blame for their apparent slow advancement. We have done all we could with the finances at our disposal, and our efforts compare more than favourably with the efforts of the U.K. during the same period over other Colonies such as Bechuanaland etc. The U.K. benefits considerably by her trade with this country and the Africans in particular, so if she wishes them to advance faster, receive higher wages etc. and to retain her good name with them she must spend large sums on development or make larger grants for this purpose, so that more and more industries can be opened up and more employment found. It is of little use educating thousands and then making them work with pick and shovel which would be the only work available unless very many more industries and development schemes are launched. They would be walking the streets looking for mischief. The U.K. should set aside £500,000,000 for this purpose and for education over a ten year period, otherwise Russia will only take over and do it for them. A strong Federation would be a wonderful help and asset to U.K. and the Commonwealth in case Russia or the Far East should decide to become nasty. Just look at the map of the world.

The majority of our Africans are peaceful and happy and a lot of the trouble is made by the idle who are not willing to work but prefer to intimidate others and steal etc. They are always ready to fall into line with any agitators, White or Black, so that the education they have obtained can be used for their own personal advancement.

There is no doubt the Press are also very largely to blame for their exaggerated reports and it is really too silly to think that the U.K. Government can be persuaded to send out Commissions, at no small cost, to enquire why some screaming and excitable young woman had her toes trodden on. I assure you if you had been in the front rank waiting to see the Queen come down the Mall 50 years ago and pressed too close to the soldiers in front you could expect a dig on your shins or toes every time.

It must not be overlooked that the Africans have very little background and quickly revert to barbarism; even the educated ones can revert back very quickly. I know of many cases where the African has been well trained and a very useful help but after one year in the Reserve he has quite forgotten all he learnt.

I need hardly mention that in 1918 after many years of Christian teaching, etc., there were lots of slums in London, Liverpool, Wigan etc. with ten adults and children living and sleeping in one room. Early in 1918 I was Depot Manager of a munition factory at St. Helens employing over 3000 and Pit girls were delighted to get increased wages up to 30/- per week to work on munitions. It was not till 1920 that the minimum wage of 50/- per week was introduced; at that time I know many farms hands were only receiving 10/- per week plus accommodation, no food, and house servants £10 to £20 per year plus accommodation, food etc.

Finally I should like to suggest how I think possibly a lot of the trouble in South Africa and now in the Federation originated:

After the South African War, generally speaking European Afrikaans South Africans were held in check, very few were admitted to senior posts in the Civil Service, Railways, Banks etc. No effort was made by the Government to give them special educational facilities to enable them to learn to speak and write English fluently and so take their place with people coming from the U.K. or other British Colonies to S. Africa. The Colonial Office should have spent large sums for this purpose to help to bring them into the family circle. The Labour Government had every opportunity when they held office but did little or nothing but send a few Africans such as Chiefs' sons to Universities and after they had qualified, what did they do for them. The Native Department could not employ them and all that was left for them was to get back to the Reserve, forget most of what they had learnt and possibly help their father who might be the Chief. Now the Labour Government led by a few politicians seeking publicity and trying to make political gain out of their actions, are trying to make us do everything at once and put the African into control knowing little or nothing of the task before them. The result will be that they will all quarrel among themselves and then fall easy prey to another Power such as Russia only too ready to buy them over. In other words, I am sure a great number of thinking White people in this Federation feel the U.K. is just throwing the Empire away and seriously damaging the future of the Commonwealth.

We are all anxious to help and improve the Africans to higher status and most of us are quite prepared in good time to mix socially with the educated African but the majority of the Africans must reach a much higher standard of education, respectability and have acquired civilisation and all that it stands for before we should be asked to allow them to freely attend our own schools and social facilities unless specially invited. The African prefers it and so do we, time alone can change and it must be a long time. Meanwhile the European on the spot with the aid of advice and help from overseas more particularly in the theoretical than in the practical sense must be given full control. We must be allowed to become full members of the Commonwealth and not be left to the whims and fancies of whatever party may be in power or trying to get into power in the United Kingdom. I invite you and the Archbishop of Canterbury who say we must all pray for the South African Government hoping they will change their policy of apartheid to come to our local Post Office at 9 a.m. or say from 8.30 a.m. to 9.30 a.m. and many other times and see how you would like to have lunch with our pals at the counter. We must be reasonable but not stupid.

I do not know if Mr. G. W. D. Kidd of Bulawayo has given evidence but if he has I suggest you ponder over what he has said particularly from the African viewpoint because he knows the African very well and I should say there are few who know them better and would or could give a fairer opinion.

I know what the Conservatives think of Barbara Castle in the Crewe district and what the average Englishman knew of South Africa or Rhodesia during the First World War. If an Englishman married a South African the villagers expected to see a Black woman arrive as that man's wife.

Oral evidence

T. S. STILL

The witness was a retired Bank Manager, who had come out to Southern Rhodesia in 1911 after 5 years in the Bank of England, and joined the Standard Bank of South Africa. He had served in the First World War as a Rifleman in the 60th in which he was commissioned. He had been wounded three times and invalided in 1917, and then had experience in the Ministry of Munitions. He had retired in 1948 after being Manager of the Standard Bank of South Africa in Bulawayo. He now had a small farm outside Shabani.

Mr. Still read and handed in a memorandum. During the reading of this he made two interpolations.

- (1) "We seem to be just throwing Africa away".
- (2) On the Post Offices—"We were much better off when they were divided off. The Africans then did not have to mix with the Europeans. It was just the same as the social bar in England."

In reply to questions Mr. Still made the following points:—

(1) The United Kingdom Government should have agreed to Sir Godfrey Huggins' demand many years ago for 100 miles each side of the railway.

(2) It would be a grave error to split up the Federation.

(3) He was not on principle against relaxation of race discrimination, but he was thinking of the Africans themselves. There was the question of smell. Moreover the girl who had to attend Africans in the Post Office did not understand them. She was not fully qualified for the purpose. Further, Africans could not be admitted ad lib to dances. All the riff-raff would just rush in. The thing should not be pushed on too quickly. But he had nothing against the black skin.

(4) Mr. Still had objected to "outside interference" and wondered — how it could be brought to an end. He thought there must be some control of the situation. The British Government should simply kick Tom Mboya out. The Africans interpreted the behaviour of the British Government simply as weakness.

(5) He considered everything had been fine in the Federation until they had had disturbances last year.

(6) The United Kingdom Government should promote a ten year plan for this part of Africa, and spend five hundred million pounds on educating the Africans. It was no use educating them, without also providing the possibilities of employment. If the British Government wanted the country to go ahead with African advancement, they would have to provide big help.

(7) He believed in a multi-racial community, and thought that the Europeans were falling into line with this idea. They were only now too pleased to receive the educated Africans. But he did not say that the Europeans were perfect. He himself thought that the Union of South Africa was going too much in the other direction. But racial discrimination must be removed by persuasion not by intimidation.

(8) As to the advancement and education of Africans, it was a matter of bringing up the Africans to quite a different standard of life; and the problem was how this could best be done.

(9) He had not visited Northern Rhodesia or Nyasaland since Federation. He would be surprised if he were told that the Africans there were almost 100% against Federation, and if that was so they had been misinformed. The development plan of which he had spoken was needed also in the north. If Nyasaland were separated from the Federation, the Nyasaland labourers would be automatically shut out from Southern Rhodesia jobs. If there was opposition in the north, we should clearly have to loosen up and come to terms with them. But he did not think it was so. If they were to get self-government they would be quarrelling among themselves and would be worried by people from Ghana.

I. B. DILLON

The witness was a member of the Southern Rhodesian Parliament for Shabani, and was a member of the Dominion Party. By profession he was a local gold miner. The members of the Party had agreed not to submit individual evidence, but he had decided on this day that he ought to say something to the Commission. His own entry into politics had only happened three weeks before the recent Territorial election, in June, 1958. He had formed in the area an anti-Todd organisation. He had then been asked to stand for Parliament and his nomination had been put in late. Thus his political background was nil, and had simply arisen from his opposition to Mr. Todd. He had then defeated Mr. Garfield-Todd in the Election standing as a member of the Dominion Party.

His own loyalty was first to Southern Rhodesia and the Queen, and not to the Houses of Parliament in Great Britain.

He felt that the politicians in Great Britain had been using people in Southern Rhodesia as a political football. He had very close association with his electorate, and the view which he expressed was shared throughout. On this he had sought the views of every member of his electorate. They all thought that there was too much interference from the U.K. Government. He did not hold his meetings on strict political lines. He himself also had closer association with the 400,000 Africans in the constituency than any previous Member of Parliament (meaning Mr. Todd). On Federation generally, he thought that the Africans were not really aware of the problem.

In 1953 there had been virtual independence in Southern Rhodesia. There had been Mr. Macmillan's statement on the 19th January reiterating the preamble in the Federal Constitution. By that he felt that the status of Southern Rhodesia had been lowered. When they had voted for Federation they had understood that it was to mean an economic union. Powers had been usurped from the Southern Rhodesian Government and taken over by the Federal Government. They were now dependent on the Africans in the Northern Territories as to whether they could get their independence or not. If the Africans there were against it, it would never come. Today people in the Northern Territories were in a position to dictate the future of Southern Rhodesia. In 1953 they had not been asked their view about Federation. Was it right that they should now control the destiny of Southern Rhodesia?

The fear in Southern Rhodesia was that through the channel of the Northern Territories the franchise qualifications were going to be lowered. This would bring first an African majority in the legislature of the Northern Territories. If that happened in a short time the Federal Parliament was also going to have a superiority of Africans. In that situation the independence of Southern Rhodesia would be no good to it at all.

Lord Malvern and Sir Roy Welensky portrayed Federation as an economic tie-up. If that had been so there would have been no trouble. He referred to the statement by Lord Home on 27th July, 1959. He was concerned with its affect in Southern Rhodesia. The interference from the Colonial Office, and the recent visit of Mr. Macleod for the release of Dr. Banda meant that he was not even going to consider the viewpoint of the Federal Government. There was no chance of keeping Nyasaland in the Federation unless we went back to the simple economic tie-up. The people in Southern Rhodesia had been misled. If they went back to the original concept the majority would accept it. But now the majority in the Shabani constituency were against Federation. If, however, Welensky and Whitehead told the U.K. Government "where to get off" that would have the full backing of the electorate. If it were not for the Federal tie-up, the people in Southern Rhodesia would not care whether there were a Black Government or a European Government in the Northern Territories. He hoped Welensky would tell Macmillan and the U.K. Government that they would prefer to "go it alone" for the benefit of both the Federation and Southern Rhodesia. If Sir Roy Welensky did that the Dominion Party would support him.

The Dominion Party realised that Federation had not worked out. For that reason they had worked out the Central African Alliance Plan. If that had come in in 1953, they would not have the present problems. His own views was that either the Central African Alliance Plan should be adopted or else let Southern Rhodesia "go it alone."

He concluded by saying that although he represented a Right Wing Party he wanted the Africans to advance, and had no desire to hold them back.

In answer to questions Mr. Dillon made the following further points:—

(1) He agreed that on the Southern Rhodesia Voters Roll in 1959 there were 64,000 Europeans and 2,000 Africans. But he thought that as the African advanced he should become entitled to vote. Meanwhile he would like the franchise to be maintained as it was.

(2) His only concern was that the majority in the Federal House would become African. In this he was assuming an extension of the Protectorates' franchises into the Federal sphere. The Africans would not be satisfied with the two different types of franchise that existed today. But he thought that the average African of the Northern Territories cared little about the franchise. The Dominion Party believed that one should not keep two levels of franchise.

(3) Mr. Menzies quoted from two debates in the Southern Rhodesian Parliament in the period immediately preceding Federation, indicating that at that time the whole of the Federal scheme was before the country, and not merely an economic association. Mr. Dillon agreed that that was so, but repeated that in a speech which Lord Malvern had made at Shabani in 1952 he had represented Federation as merely an economic association.

(4) Mr. Dillon favoured the concept of Federation, and thought that it had been beneficial. But if the United Kingdom were to alter the constitution of the Northern Territories, it would cause concern in Southern Rhodesia. There was in particular the recent example of Kenya.

(5) He would like a lot of the functions of government which affected people in daily life returned to Southern Rhodesia, including European education. In fact the only link up should be economic, including the railways, post offices and customs. Hospitals, industrial development, and education should revert back to Southern Rhodesia. Then there would be less concern about the African majority. He would, however, favour the maintenance of the status quo, if there were no chance of the franchise being lowered in the Northern Territories. Even on that basis, the transfer outwards of certain powers would ease people's minds.

(6) He agreed that there was violent opposition to Federation in the Northern Territories. He considered that the Government's concern had failed by not putting out sufficient counter propaganda. He regarded it as primarily a question of propaganda.

(7) His constituency was definitely opposed to African Government. They were afraid that European control in the Federal Government would be taken over by Africans. There were 400,000 Africans in his constituency and 5,000 Europeans; of these 1,500 Europeans were voters and 52 Africans. The Africans of the constituency were very backward. Many Africans of the area were too primitive even to have heard of the United Kingdom Government.

(8) Taxation should be a Territorial subject. In fact, he would like to see the Federal Government more in the nature of an Upper House, with all executive powers undertaken by the three Territories.

(9) He thought there was no possible hope now of keeping Nyasaland in the Federation. Economically Nyasaland was an embarrassment to Southern Rhodesia. But Nyasaland itself would benefit by staying in the Federation. But the people had been so steeped in propaganda that, come what may, they would adhere to the view that they did not like Federation. They did not even appreciate the economic benefits of Federation.

(10) He considered that economically both Europeans and Africans were worse off than they had been in 1953; mostly because of the insecurity brought about by Federation.

P. S. REYNOLDS

Mr. Reynolds was a pharmacist and optician in Shabani, and had been resident there for 22 years.

He drew the attention of those Commissioners who might have been in Northern Rhodesia or Nyasaland to the fact that there were no members of the Army or Police round the building and no banners. They were in a free country, there was no intimidation. This was in contrast to the Northern Territories. He drew the conclusion that there had been some good in the method of administration of Southern Rhodesia. It might be superior to what was done in the north. The big trouble in the Northern Territories was due to intimidation; he agreed that it existed too in Southern Rhodesia to a less extent.

The vast majority of Central Africa's troubles came from the outside. Outside people were always touring around the Federation, coming from Moscow, Britain and Ghana. Even the Church of England had taken the one-sided view that there was no good in Europeans. He condemned the attitude of the Church.

One most essential requirement was to deal with Press reports. It was a disgrace to Britain that the Press exaggerated matters just to get extra circulation. There were also the vote-getting activities of the Labour Party. For example, Gaitskell in person led a procession to Trafalgar Square.

The Europeans had done enormous good in Central Africa in the last 50 years. Africans were better paid and advanced in many respects, particularly in the Health Services, and in education. In Southern Rhodesia educational advancement was greater than in the Northern Territories.

Some part of Southern Rhodesia and the Northern Territories must be a European preserve. The Central African Alliance Plan had much to commend it. He regarded it as any rate as a talking point. One portion of the country ought to be under European domination though other parts could be under African control.

Of the Europeans in Southern Rhodesia, some had been born in the country, some were immigrants from the United Kingdom, and there were also those from the Union, though he did not like the politics there. But the fact that a man bore an Afrikaner name did not mean that he was against the United Kingdom. Immigrants were the same people as they were when they left their country. They were basically reasonable people, and not going to oppress the Africans.

As to the Federal Constitution, there was one important point, which ought to be considered before any of the restrictions on the Northern Territories were removed. When the Federation was formed, any change was to be judged by those on the Voters' Roll. The essential point was to define what was meant in the preamble by "the majority of the inhabitants." When the Federation was formed the inhabitants of the Northern Territories were told about it and not asked their views or approval. He could not believe that they had advanced to all that extent in seven years as to tell the people of Southern Rhodesia that their restrictions on Africans should be removed.

If educated Africans replaced Europeans they must be their equals, and in particular they must be morally their equals. He did not consider a man like Nkrumah to be of sufficiently high moral calibre to run a country. He admitted that all members of the Government in Southern Rhodesia did not have high moral standards.

In reply to questions Mr. Reynolds made the following further points:—

(1) He was in favour of Federation, in certain circumstances, provided that the majority of the controls were Territorial. The Federation should be looser; it should cover customs and a postal union, possibly defence, possibly police, but no immigration. European education should be Territorial. He would leave agriculture as it was.

(2) He distinguished between the Dominion Party plan and apartheid, in that the former did not necessarily imply social apartheid. But he did not recommend complete agreement with the Central African Alliance Plan.

(3) He agreed that he had criticised the interference of England, Ghana and the Church of England. He thought press reports grossly exaggerated giving only 1% or 2% of the truth.

(4) He agreed that it was a fact that Africans were not allowed in hotels, cinemas and restaurants. But this was due to custom and not based on any law. Very few Africans would wish to mix with Europeans of their own free will. A hotel proprietor was entitled to refuse entry even to a European. The habits of the ordinary Africans were not the same as those of Europeans. But he himself would accept a few Africans in hotels as equals.

CHIEF MAZWIWA

The Chief was a member of the Mungowa Tribe, of the Bungowa Division. His subjects included approximately 8,000 people.

The Chief said that they were pleased about Federation and to hear of its existence. People would be free and encouraged to work together. He had been told that when the three Territories joined they would work together, and also Europeans and Africans would work together. He was pleased to hear that.

In reply to questions Chief Mazwiwa made the following points:—

(1) He had noticed a few changes in the last 6 years. For instance in the Post Offices, there were now the same entrances for all. Also he had noticed that when persons were arrested for crimes they were allowed on bail and not kept in custody. Prisoners were well treated, given good uniforms etc. He wished the government to continue this treatment of those in prison. It was good for Africans to pay respect to Europeans who were leading them.

(2) He could not say whether he preferred the Federal or the Territorial Government, but would like either of them, if their rules were good.

(3) He had seen an improvement in agriculture among his people, through the visits of the Land Development Officers.

(4) In his work as a Chief, he was assisted a great deal by the police. His people liked the police and helped them.

(5) Many of his people went to the towns and factories and brought back money to the Kraals.

(6) His people usually followed his advice. Some times one or two of the younger men did not, and then he took them before the law.

(7) There was no Congress activity in his area. He had asked Congress people not to hold meetings in his area. All his people supported him in this matter.

J. DUNCAN

CHAIRMAN: How long have you been in Shabani? — A. Nine years in Shabani. I am an electrician. I was in the Union of South Africa for three years previously.

Q. Do you come to us as an ordinary citizen? — A. Yes, and also as an immigrant from Britain. In 1948 when the Labour Party was in power they gave us a report to go out to the Commonwealth and make an Empire. I was a staunch Labour supporter. I came out here and saw the country and the Europeans and Africans here. I was at first sympathetic towards the African and thought he was hard done by, but as time went on I realized the true position. When the franchise came, bringing on the African, I was all in favour of it but not with the haste desired by the Government and other outside people.

I call myself a Rhodesian now, and I think the Labour Party are stabbing me in the back. I am talking not only for myself but for other wartime service men who came out here. The African is shouting that he is hard done by. I only wish you could go up and see what is being done for him in our own mine here. He is given full amenities, hospitalization; he is being treated hygienically and given housing accommodation which he would never have in a kraal.

Taking the average African who seems to have some intelligence, to me it is only a veneer. For example, my own house-boy I would put above average, because he can read and write. One day he came to me and told me he was having trouble with his legs—varicose veins. I wanted him to go to hospital immediately, but he kept putting it off. Then one day he came to me in great pain with knife cuts along his legs. He told me he had gone to the witch-doctor in the kraal instead of going to the hospital. So it seems that even an educated African with some intelligence would rather go to his own witch-doctor than go to the white doctor, with the result that he put me in a quandary and also made his illness much worse.

The African has been given the so-called privileges of the European. He has been allowed to drink European beer and to participate in State Lotteries. To my mind the African has been given too much in too short a time and has not been made to shoulder his responsibilities. In the mine, he is given everything and still wants more. Even at Christmas time he comes and says, "Boss, you have the money, you have everything; boss, give me a present."

Also there is the advantage of the Government Offices, such as the Post Office. I was down there one day, waiting behind an African woman who wanted to draw a pound out of the Bank account. The assistant in the Post Office explained to her that there was no money left to draw, but she could not understand, and after about ten minutes the assistant had to send for someone else to explain the position. Time and time again you find Africans going into a Post Office and asking for certain things, and when they are asked a question they seem to be dumbfounded and do not know what is required.

As regards the questionnaire which is given to the African when he is filling in a form to vote, it is given more or less in an orderly fashion. That questionnaire should be changed because, knowing the retentive memory of the African and his parrot-like fashion, he can have it off pat.

Then there is the shouting of the so-called intelligent Africans. These intelligent Africans are swaying the masses and in doing that, to me, living here and knowing them, it is bad leadership. That is more or less what I wanted to say.

Q. You came out here as an electrician. What are your wages? — A. On the mine my wages are 7/6d an hour. It is a 48-hour week. Basically it works out, say, at £80 a month.

Q. What tax do you pay? — A. It varies with the children: my taxation would perhaps work out at about £10 total.

Q. Now, a lot of Africans are employed with you who do some skilled work under supervision? — A. No, I do my own skilled work. My African hands me my tools. He uses a hammer, and sometimes cannot do that. He gets £6.10.0d a month, plus his food and accommodation.

Q. Why does he get so little — is it because of his standard of living? — A. Yes.

Q. Do you want that standard of living to rise? — A. By all means let him rise. My thought is to give him his rise, according to his degree of work.

Q. How is he going to become an electrician? Are you in favour of trade schools so that he can learn and compete with you? — A. Yes. I have no fear of the African. I served my apprenticeship overseas and have had full-time employment, plus the time I was an electrician in the R.A.F.

Q. Your complaint is that he is not really up to any further part in the government at all, in the election of Government. Do you think the franchise has been too broad? You do not think the present franchise should be lowered? — A. No. It is a difficult question. I have lived with the African. I know him, and he is like a summer's day overseas; he is so changeable. You cannot judge him in terms of a white man. Psychologically, he is different.

Q. But the best African that works with you, would you say he was as responsible as the poorest white with whom he works? — A. No, not comparable. Taking as an example my boy, I have asked him certain leading questions such as, "What will you do when you retire?" His conception is his kraal, his mealie patch, his animals and pension. I asked him a couple of points about the Government, but he does not know anything and he is not interested. It is a different thing as regards religion. He knows that just like the back of his hand.

MR. CRAWLEY: He is a Christian? — A. Yes, in fact one of them is a lay preacher, Jehovah's Witnesses; and the other is a Roman Catholic.

CHAIRMAN: Would you not give him a vote at all? — A. No. I would be lenient if I said that the African had a Standard V intelligence, which makes him the equivalent of my daughter, who is twelve.

Q. Are there any Africans here to whom you would give a vote? — A. One or two: you get the Natives working with the Native Commissioner. You can hold an intelligent conversation with quite a few of them, but you take the average African, and it is like speaking to a small child.

Q. Your view is in short that, apart from these one or two Africans who are quite outstanding, there would not be enough Africans, in your judgment, who would be the equivalent of the lowest type of white voter in Great Britain? — A. No. That is my experience. If you take the average white man overseas, or, say, the lowest man in Britain, he goes as far as Primary School, which is Standard V. That is basic. I would give it to Africans of Standard V.

MR. CRAWLEY: If they all had Standard V, you would begin to think of giving them the vote? — A. Yes, I would bring him along with me. But you take the bush Native; you have only to go out here nine miles and visit some of the kraals and that is the type of African who is actually in the majority in this country.

CHAIRMAN: If you had an income qualification of £100 a year, or something like that, all those people would be outside it. — A. Yes, but the African is very gullible and if his Chief tells him to do something, instead of analysing it, he does it, because the Chief says so. The Chief in tribal customs has a very great sway over the Africans.

MR. CRAWLEY: Are there any trade schools in the mine at all? — A. Yes, they are teaching them mostly mining, but we have no time to give electrical training, because we are in production. There is no apprenticeship training, but we have a school for them in mining, and if he gets to a boss-boy standard, he is quite good. In the mines, the lorry-drivers get £12 to £14 plus their living.

CHIEF JOBE MAFALA

CHAIRMAN: Where is your territory, Chief? — A. Just outside Shabani, the Lunda Reserve. There are 300 people, not families.

Q. What is your work? — A. Just to look after the people in my areas.

Q. Are you a Government Officer — do you get an allowance for your work as Chief? — A. Yes, I had word from the Native Commissioner, saying there would be members of the Commission coming to hear about the Federation, and I wanted to come and see you, but although I did not know much about Federation. I had word to come on Thursday morning. The first thing I would like to say, according to my wish, the Europeans and Africans should always work together and act like one section, because if we do not all work together and assist each other things will not be done. There should be people leading us well, in places like schools. I feel that the education we are receiving is very inadequate. In some areas people have been asked to erect buildings for their own children, and each time we ask the people who are leaders at these schools they tell us they have not sufficient funds. As a result, in certain areas you find children who have long gone without schooling, when they do come to school they are told there is not enough room, or else they are too big to be admitted.

The second thing is we have not had African Members in the Territorial Parliament who would present our resolutions and feelings before the House, because such people would be in a better position to know how Africans live and the difficulties we encounter: because they are people born amongst Africans and they know the African customs and their life.

The third point is about the way we live in the reserves. We find our living is very difficult at this time. Sometimes when a grown-up child leaves his area to seek employment, when he comes back to his area he is told there is no room for him in the reserve, or the boys growing up are told there is no land for them. This is very bad, because we are told the land itself does not expand.

As regards farms, sometimes you will see one that is owned by one man—a very big farm—and there are no people living there, when it could easily accommodate perhaps a thousand families: that is a European farm.

What will happen to the people in the reserves when there is no more land to till or they are not allowed to be in the reserves? They will be forced to go out seeking employment, and if they have no money, how can they live? It is one of the important things. This is what causes misunderstandings, when people are told they cannot be accommodated in some areas. As a result you find they commit certain offences.

The fourth point is that we, as Chiefs, find our powers are limited. It occurs to us we are almost employees under the Native Commissioners, because as Chiefs we feel entitled to certain rights or privileges, to suggest something about our own people in the reserve to the Native Commissioner. This power is limited. We feel we should be allowed to meet the Native Commissioner, who would call the Chiefs together so that we could discuss certain points, and where we cannot agree we ought to be allowed to raise our own suggestions.

I would like to elaborate on the limitation of the Chief's powers. Some Chiefs, including myself, have been strongly instructed to tell people to look after them while they learn contour farming. In view of the drought we have had this year, we find the land is very hard to dig and people who fail to dig it in the time given are prosecuted; and all the time other people are chasing after us. There is no difference between a Chief and his followers.

The same thing applies to me as a Chief—I am also forced to do this, and have not been allowed to advance any suggestions at all.

On the question of owning cattle, people are not allowed to own as many cattle as they want, and the number of acres of land allocated to them is not sufficient, because you get some big farming people who own big farms; and the acreage allocated is not enough.

Sometimes we find if one has not properly worked his land he is told not to continue tilling that land. At times you find even if you work your land properly there is still not enough from the land to support your family. We are forced to be present at our kraals to work out whatever is required to be done on the land. Then if you remain at home just to work your land, you will have no money to buy clothing for your family.

Q. On education, do you say education has been improved for the Africans since Federation? — A. Not outside in the reserves, because there are still some shanty buildings there put up by the parents for schools. Insufficient funds is the main trouble.

Q. Do you object to the payment of the poll tax, which was introduced so that the African would make a contribution towards education? — A. One reason why I am opposed to it is that I am still experiencing the same difficulties as before—this is as far as the building of schools is concerned. If there had been any improvement in the reserves, I would not be opposed to it at all.

Q. Do you want to see the franchise extended? — A. Yes, I think everybody should become a voter, irrespective of whether he is able to write his name or not.

Q. Do you think it should be every man or every woman over twenty-one? — A. I would say Yes.

MR. CRAWLEY: As regards the young men who go back to the village and have no land, do they come and work in the mine here? — A. Yes.

Q. Is not that a good thing? — A. It is, but sometimes one gets tired of working. It is like a man sitting down; I will soon get tired of doing it and I will stand and stretch myself.

Q. Do you feel that every man should have some land? — A. Every man born and brought up in a particular area should have land in his area.

CHAIRMAN: Do you approve of the Master Farmer arrangement and the Native Land Husbandry scheme? — A. It would be a good thing if it did not entail any prosecutions, because in the meantime it appears that everyone in the reserve is being chased about like in a prison. So you find many old women and old men deciding to surrender their land. If they do that, where can they go? They are very old and cannot work.

Q. Is that because they are required to improve the land? — A. Yes. We appreciate the establishment of contours and the improvement of land, but we do not like the way in which we are told to do it.

MR. CRAWLEY: Do you know that too many cattle on one piece of land spoils the land? — A. No, I would not say that would be the case, but when I grew up myself there were many cattle and there was a lot of grass: the cattle were well fed. Now, if a certain area has been allowed to remain like that without cattle pasturing in it, the grass becomes no good.

CHAIRMAN: Surely you have conferences with the Native Commissioner. When all the Chiefs come together, do they not frankly and plainly discuss these matters? — A. We do have conferences as Chiefs, and find that whatever resolutions we pass to the Commissioner are not accepted. It would be a good thing if we could sit down with the Native Commissioner on occasions and put suggestions to him. It does not happen. There is another point about Federation. I would like it to go ahead if it would bring about some good understanding between all the races. Also, if we, as Chiefs, are given that privilege of reverting to our former powers.

Memorandum

F. T. NDORO

1. Partnership.

Too much publicity has been given to the nebulous ideas of the Federation and its policy here and overseas by some white politicians who hold positions of responsibility and influence, and very little if nothing at all has been done to put into practice those clauses on whose interpretation Federation was accepted.

It was made clear in the preamble, of the Federal Constitution that the aim of Central African Federation was to advance the Africans politically, Educationally, Economically and Socially. Much propaganda was disseminated under the disguise of "Equality" to all races in the Federation in the last six years, but it must be pointed out here that partnership has failed in practice and has been rejected by all Africans in the Federation who cannot accept it inch by inch.

It should be remembered that no country can make any real progress in any direction, when a large number of its population lives in abject poverty as it is the case at present.

It is my considered opinion and personal feeling that independence though much valued should not supersede economic advancement. In fact economic considerations are even more important than political advancement in Central Africa.

The Federal Prime Minister does not believe that an African is an equal of a European or that he ever would be so.

He said, as he was entitled to do by the interpretation of partnership in Central Africa that Africans would never be allowed to dominate the Federation.

I submit that S. Rhodesia House of Assembly the composition of the members of parliament should be half Africans and half Europeans.

The interests of the Africans are not better served by the so called experienced European term as the Minister of Native Affairs. It should be by the African.

2 Franchise qualifications in Central Africa

The whites in the Federation believe only civilised and responsible people should vote. By applying very fair tests of income and educational qualifications. The Federal Government claims to be able to identify the civilised African.

An African must earn a gross salary of £750 per year or be in possession of a high academic qualification. If he has either of these then he is eligible as a voter on the Common Roll. The Special Roll is another means of excluding the Africans from participating in the Federal Government. The Africans in the Federation are very unhappy with the Special Roll as it is there to limit an African voice.

The Federal Government have ignored the African opposition. The African Affairs Board should remain in the Federal parliament for the foreseeable future, this will give the African a large share in the Federal Government. The name "Federation" should be scraped off and be replaced by the name Dominion of Rhodesias as all Africans hate anything under the banner of Federation.

In the Federal Constitution it should be made clear that Nyasaland and Barotseland would remain as Protectorates within the Dominion of Rhodesias and have responsible Governments.

It is my humble submission here that in order to assess the feelings of the people of Central Africa the Federal Prime Minister should go to the country. After the findings of the Commission so that the inhabitants will feel assured that the Federal Prime Minister has the confidence of the country before we plunge into a possible new set up.

I wish to support my evidence by oral quoting evidence and answering questions before the Monckton Commission, Rusape.

Oral evidence

F. T. NDORO

The witness said that he had stood as a candidate for the Dominion Party at the last Federal General Election but had been defeated by Mr. Savanhu.

He was in favour of Federation, but not in its present form. In particular, partnership had not been put into practice. Partnership should be defined as the equality of all races in the Federation. Not enough Africans were employed in the Federal Civil Service or in the railways, and there should be more African members of Parliament. The policy of the British Government should be for the majority of the people to rule the country; this was doubted by the local European, who said that Africans were uncivilised. It was true that at present not all Africans who qualified for the voters' roll had registered as voters; one of the reasons for this was a general belief that registration for the Federal franchise implied that the individual concerned was in favour of Federation.

Turning to the franchise, the witness said that the qualifications for the common roll should be lowered to that for the present special roll, which itself should be done away with. It would be necessary to retain the African Affairs Board or some other form of appeal to the United Kingdom on African affairs. Unfortunately some of the African members of the African Affairs Board were there only for their own personal advancement; they were supposed to be representatives of the Africans. It was significant that when the African National Congress members were arrested there was no protest from the African Members of the Federal House, even though the people arrested had never committed any crime.

In the Southern Rhodesia House at least half the Members should be Africans. There should be the same number of special African seats as in the Federal Assembly.

The name "Federation" should be abolished and the country should be called "the Dominion of Rhodesias". At the same time, Natives from Portuguese East Africa should be refused admission to the Federation; Africans from Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia should have the first chance of employment in Southern Rhodesia.

Memorandum

W. H. STEAD

Credentials. Born 1903 the son of a Missionary in the Union of South Africa. Have spoken Native Languages since childhood. Served in the Department of Native Affairs, S. Rhodesia from 1922 to 1950 during which time learned Shindebele and Shona and attended a course in Social Anthropology and Colonial Administration in London. Author of lesser publications on culture and history of Rhodesian Tribes—African Studies 1946 Proceedings of S.A.A.A.S. 1948—Nada (Varicus). Retired to Farm and Native Storekeeping 1939. No ambition in the world of politics. Views are objective and constructive.

Multiple Government. The existence of five governments each having a hand in the direction of affairs and in the destinies of the people is confusing to all from Parliamentarians, administrators, lawyers down to the humblest citizen. To the mass of the African people who have always been used to a Chief as the controller of their economics, the arbiter of their disputes, and the father of the clan, the confusion must be appalling. I should like to see one Government for the Federation with local Boards of Provincial Commissioner status to deal with tribal and other local variations and needs.

The Senate. To maintain the confidence of those who are critics of Colonial Administration it would be necessary to provide a Senate which should consist of the Elder Statesmen from other Commonwealth Dominions and from Britain. Members of the Senate should be appointed for three years and during the time they hold Office should live in the Federation. Members of the Senate should be appointed by Her Majesty the Queen on the advice jointly of the British and Federal Governments. The same personnel might serve as an upper House for the East African dependencies.

The function of the Senate would be to scrutinise legislation, if necessary to refer it back to the lower House, and by debates, to bring fair treatment, equality of opportunity, and racial harmony to a multi-racial community.

The British Government. That the affairs of the Federal and Territorial Governments are the battle-dore and shuttle-cock of party politics in Britain calls for immediate change. Not only is it unjust that the bus drivers, dockside workers, bargees, and others with less reputable occupations and less knowledge of conditions in Africa should decide which Government shall have power in Britain to direct the destinies of the Dependencies overseas, but the system has the additional weakness that a British Government might change over some question of a domestic nature or over foreign policy and the dependencies are compelled to accept a change of policy and direction when this has not been a point at issue during the election.

I deplore the exercise of power by a British Government derived from an electorate which is ignorant of the conditions in Africa and which can be misled by distorted reports and I also deplore changes in policy brought about by a Government which has been voted into power for reasons other than that of Colonial Policy in Africa.

It is essential that all powers of Government and decisions in the Federation should be centred in the Federation and should cease to be the football of prejudice and party politics overseas. I believe the appointment of a Senate as described above would provide adequate safeguards if these are thought to be necessary and would ensure that all legislation had been considered in its broadest aspect before being passed as law.

Racial Matters. No obstacles should be put in the way of Africans to their advancement in accordance with their achievements, attainments, and economic status in the public life of the Federation. I do not feel that social integration should be the index as to whether there is partnership or not. The personal social life of an individual is his own affair and each can choose his own friends and associates.

It should be said that between black and white there exist differences of historical, cultural, religious and emotional background which provide logical and understandable reasons why, for choice, each seeks the company of his own kind. The fallacy that people are at a disadvantage because of the colour of their skin requires to be exposed. Where these other differences do not exist, where there is a common culture and a shared code of conduct and deportment the difference in the colour of a skin recedes into insignificance.

It should not be the motive of any Government or public body to interfere with normal choice in social relations nor should this choice be used to indicate whether or no partnership exists. Partnership is the working together for the common good and it is not necessary for the partners to spend their leisure time together.

Representation by Colour Rather Than Culture is not sound.

Few of the speeches made in the Federal Parliament by Africans nominated thereto show statesmanship or any sense of responsibility for the European population. Election in open competition is the only sound system of representation.

Rusape District,
22nd January 1960.

Oral Evidence

W. H. STEAD

The witness began by giving a short historical background to race relations in Southern Rhodesia from the time of the Portuguese Landing at Sofala in 1905. Since the introduction of Federation in 1953, the mass of Africans scarcely knew that any change had taken place. He recognised the basis of the fears of the Africans in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, particularly regarding their land, but he could not regard them as logical. He himself thought that there should be a unitary Government; only this way could the education services, particularly for the African, be expanded as rapidly as was required.

With regard to the witness's recommendations on the appointment of a Senate, he thought that there should be no direct reflection of the political parties in the appointment of members of the Senate. The sort of people who were needed were elder statesmen such as ex-Governors General. Such a body would provide adequate safeguards which would permit the removal of a government run by the Colonial Office. He recognised that the final power of disallowance might have to remain with the United Kingdom Government.

The qualifications for the franchise for the Federal Parliament should remain high. If a large number of Africans got on to the voters' roll they would quickly swamp the Europeans. With regard to the apportionment of land he would not oppose giving Africans land at present undeveloped by Europeans in the European areas.

E. ROSS

I respectfully enclose thirty copies of a Memorandum on the Revision of the Constitution of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. The opinion expressed is entirely personal, and is not intended in any way to represent any organisation mentioned in the brief autobiographical notes given below.

I am quite willing to give oral evidence to the Commission if called upon, and would particularly wish to give historical justification for the proposals contained in the Memorandum.

Introduction

It would not be true to say a racial conflict exists within the Federal borders. A racial conflict would surely only exist when a majority of one race held an opposite viewpoint to that held by the majority of another.

At the present time racial extremists would give an impression that a conflict does exist, but fortunately their influence is small. However, in a Constitutional Review it would be as well to consider the material extremists use in their efforts to excite the population, and whenever possible remove potential causes of conflict by amendment of the Constitution.

This Memorandum will consider two subjects which, left unattended, would in time be potentially dangerous.

Part I

The Name and Status of the Federation

It would seem that African extremists are using the very name of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland to arouse illfeeling. Despite the success of Federation the name has come to represent something not wanted by the ill-informed, and seems to convey that some loss of protection has taken place.

Again, the Europeans of the Federation see that the economic development of the Country warrants a higher status in Commonwealth affairs, they feel constitutional advancement is likely to be held back on racial grounds.

Reconciliation could be achieved by the use of a new name and status utilising that common bond uniting all the people of Central Africa.

In evidence it could be said that no greater loyalty to the Crown exists anywhere within the Commonwealth than that existing in the Federation. The Europeans of both British and Afrikaner stock wish to have no part in the trends developing to the South. The African people have traditionally looked upon the Crown as a symbol of good government and fair-play.

The name of the Federation could thus well contain some reference to the Federation's loyalty, and imply her intention of retaining the Crown for all time as the uniting force among her people.

Proposal: It is therefore proposed that with the gracious consent of Her Majesty the name "The Royal State of Rhodesia and Nyasaland" be used to describe the Federation.

The Status of the Royal State.

While retaining a Constitution best suited to its needs, the Royal State would hold the status of a full Member of the Commonwealth. The writer does not subscribe to the view that strong family ties should be a barrier to participation in the affairs of the Family of Nations!

Part II

The Method of Retaining Members to Parliament and of Determining Future Changes in the Franchise

The writer is of the opinion that the terms of Reference of the Delimitation Commission, and the criteria to be employed in changing the franchise should be subjects of the Federal Constitution.

Thus Political Advancement within the Country could be taken out of the sphere of party politics, and there would no longer be the danger of fostering a racial conflict from the political platform, or through the political manifesto.

The Constitutional provisions should make none of the following situations possible:—

- (1) A situation in which a race having economic control of the Country does not have political control.
- (2) A situation in which, by ordinary delimitation, a race may have some 40% of the total electorate, but yet an inability to return a Single Member of Parliament of that race by ordinary means.
- (3) A situation favouring the formation of political parties based on racialism.

Proposal: It is therefore proposed that the Constitution should provide for the Delimitation of Constituencies to allow numbers of European and African Members of Parliament to be returned according to the economic development of the two races at the time under review. The level of the franchise would then be adjusted to ensure the return of the specified number of Members of Parliament.

In practice the scheme would allow the use of a Common Voter's Roll, some constituencies having a majority of European Voters, some a majority of African Voters.

As African Members of Parliament were returned by this method they would replace Specially Elected Members until Racial Representation was no longer a feature of the Federal Parliament.

It is suggested that suitable criteria for determining the ratio African/European Members are as follows:—

- (1) A comparison of the direct amounts constituted to Revenue.
- (2) A comparison of the total earned incomes (bearing a relationship to indirect tax contributions).
- (3) A comparison of Educational attainments.

for example:—Supposing

- | | |
|--|-----------|
| (1) European Direct Taxation compared with African Direct Taxation (per £1 million P.A.) | ... 30.5 |
| (2) European Earned Incomes compared with African Earned Incomes (per £1 million P. Mensum) | 13.6 |
| (3) Europeans having completed 4 years Secondary Education compared with Africans (per 25,000) | 4.1 |
| The ratio African/European Members of Parliament could be of the order of | ... 47.12 |

By employing the method suggested the Royal State would be in a position to progress along sound political lines, the political advancement of the people would be related to its economic development. The attainment or retention of power would be dependent upon the productivity of those whose future was in question, and while there would be an incentive for a race to improve its own position, the efforts made would nevertheless be for the common economy, leading to greater prosperity and security for all.

Oral Evidence

E. ROSS

Mr. Ross said that at the time of the Southern Rhodesia Referendum on Federation, 35% of the electorate had said that they were not in favour of Federation. Today the proportion might well be greater. Many Europeans attributed the recent advancement of the African to Federation, and were against it for this reason. However, it was not a change in the form of association that was required; a change of name would meet the requirements.

Turning to the franchise, the witness said that what was needed was representation of the taxpayer. This was a system which had long survived in the United Kingdom. He recognised that other factors were nowadays taken into account, but so long as racial discrimination continued, disaster would follow a situation in which that part of the population which contributed least to the economy swamped that part which contributed most. Once this point was established, matters such as the pass laws, the sanitary laws, etc., would fall away.

In answer to questions, the witness said that in his view there were not enough Africans on the Voters' Roll for the Southern Rhodesia Parliament, though this was largely the fault of Africans who had not taken the trouble to register. It was essential to get more Africans on to both the Federal and the Territorial Rolls, and he would have no objection to the education and means qualifications being preserved, provided that the more uncivilised elements were not allowed on the roll. The present special voters' qualification would be suitable for the ordinary Voters' Roll. At the present time there were only thirty Africans on the roll in Umtali.

Under the proposal for the revised delimitation of Constituencies in Part II of his memorandum, it would be possible for the Constituencies to overlap so that at any given time African members would stand for Constituencies taking in predominantly African areas. In the normal way, delimitation took place over five years, and a method of changing representation such as he had proposed could be kept in step with developments through such five-yearly reviews.

Memorandum

R. G. BRADBURY

European Government

1. Federation, without being tied to the apron strings of the Colonial Office, is essential to the well being, in all its spheres, of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland and, subject to successful progress, should be granted full Membership of the Commonwealth at an early date. The Federal Government is in an extremely difficult position and cannot give of its best whilst tied down to London, i.e. power of veto of Federal legislation, subservience of Federal legislation under Colonial Laws Validity Act, etc., Further, under the present set up in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland Colonial Office servants may well shy away from decisive action—the responsibility being too great when it is likely to become a political issue in London. Membership of the Commonwealth would give a standing to the Country and ensure progress in all its forms to the well being of all races. A Government which knows the Country and its peoples, irrespective of colour, unfettered and free from political strife of the United Kingdom is the only one which can bring success to the Rhodesias and Nyasaland.

2. It is to be deplored but, nevertheless, true that unity among the Europeans here is not as strong as it might be. I submit that this is the result of self-interest as opposed to National. A change may well take place if the Country is allowed to progress freely under careful supervision of men of integrity.

African

May I be allowed to use three words which, although possibly presumptuous, are vital to the future of the Federation —“Know Thy African”.

1. The Bantu came from the North and the European came from the South. Both made entry 300 to 400 years ago, therefore the word “indigenous” does not arise in either case.

2. The African is a superb natural actor and his carelessness with the truth would leave one full of admiration if it was not so serious. He cannot be blamed for this, it is in his blood. Many long years of decent breeding are essential to clear this unfortunate state.

3. Education of the African Woman is essential, they hold great influence over the men. The first necessity is to raise their moral standards and over the years bring about that called for in (2) above and at the same time lower the illegitimate rate.

4. Opposition to Federation is, in the main, brought about by African agitators for their own desire, or that of their Leader, for power which will bring them position and easy money to the detriment of the vast majority of Africans who know little or nothing of Federation or for that matter the mechanism of democratic Government. It may well be that these agitators already receive monies from outside sources, i.e. Ghana, Egypt and not least, the U.S.S.R. I submit that here is a great danger which calls for constant attention.

5. Influence of the educated African on the peoples should have good results which would help them to progress towards a fuller life but, by and large, this is not so in practice. Some of the so called Leaders will go to any extreme to further their own ideas of Nationalism or to “save face” following a failure. The movement of the people from the Kariba area to be flooded is a good example and may be worthy of some study when African gods were invoked to flout authority. Further, Nyasaland labour did not materialize for the Kariba Dam and the Nyasaland African economic situation suffered in consequence. I submit that an African politician's misleading near-truths scared the people away. Such a situation leaves one to ponder as to the future of the masses under such Leaders. Detailed information on the above is given in the book “Kariba”, by Frank Clements, published by Methuen & Co. 1959, pages 88-89 and pages 96-99. To the best of my knowledge no denial has been presented and no legal action taken. I can, therefore, only assume the writings are true in fact.

6. It should be remembered that the average educated African, no matter where he may have been educated, receive a veneer behind which he tries to hide an inferiority complex

This is of course understandable but he should be made to realize that until he has been trained out of this trouble he is really not yet ready to take administrative responsibility of any magnitude.

7. I submit that the African is in a vacuum, feels lost and is possibly afraid of the future. To fill this vacuum careful handling is necessary to bring about two essentials—confidence and trust—but it is of the greatest importance that he be taught to walk steadily and correctly before he is trained to run. The African “man in the street” is a sound proposition provided he is led along the right road by men of faith and integrity.

8. Finally, I would like to say that the term “Colour Bar” as used in the United Kingdom is a misnomer. The true term is really “Social Distinction”. Class distinction certainly exists in the United Kingdom and among the Europeans out here. It also exists—note well—among the Africans, especially so where Teachers, Professional men and those of even higher education are concerned. It is a social distinction which is a fundamental human characteristic.

Oral Evidence

R. G. BRADBURY

The witness said that he was a supporter of Federation, though he thought that there should be a certain loosening up of Federal control. In particular, European agriculture should go back to the Territorial sphere where it should be run by the same department as African agriculture. The three Territories had very different problems; nevertheless, there were certain functions, particularly tsetse fly control, which should continue to be dealt with on a Federal basis. The Federal Health Department left a lot to be desired. This might be put right by reorganisation of the department; he had no information as to whether or not the position could be improved by returning health to the three Territories.

In the field of education, more attention should be paid to the education of women. It was noticeable that African men were not keen on taking steps to advance women; but much more should be done in the fields of hygiene, nutrition, child welfare, etc. For men, more technical and trade colleges would offset the present emphasis on academic education.

With regard to the franchise, he thought that Africans should be given more opportunity of representation. In particular, he would like to see African representation in the Southern Rhodesia Legislature. Nevertheless, progress should not be rushed; if Africans could not be got into the Legislature in any other way it might be wise to nominate one or two. The fact that not enough attention had been paid to African education in the past, made it difficult to avoid bringing them on too fast now.

On the subject of the colour bar, the witness thought that, again, the pace should not be forced. Already there was a trend moving quite fast towards the abolition of the colour bar; as people became more hygienic the colour bar would be progressively worn away.

Memorandum

A GROUP OF FORTY RHODESIAN CITIZENS IN THE VUMBA AREA OF THE EASTERN DISTRICTS, SOUTH OF UMTALI

We,—some of us citizens of very long standing and many of us with children born and bred in this country—have lived and worked in harmony with the African for many years, offer the following views to the Commission:

1. Constitution. We understand that the Constitution of the Federation is to be based “on the Will of the Inhabitants”.

In this area we find that certainly not more than 5% of the African population have any idea of the Federal concept; therefore “the Will of the Inhabitants” should be regarded as the will of the Enfranchised Electorate.

2. Membership of the Commonwealth. We are all in favour of Federation and Dominion status, but we object strongly to any idea of widespread franchise concession being used as a bargaining counter in this sphere. If there is to be any major change in the Federation presumably there will be a referendum of all Voters before any vital constitutional alteration is made.

3. Franchise. Universal suffrage—i.e. one man one vote—is not possible as yet. The idea is completely foreign to the African mentality and contrary to his traditional beliefs and tribal custom.

It is our profound conviction that such a policy would deliver the African into the hands of unscrupulous agitators to his own detriment and create indescribable chaos.

4. Multi-racial State. We are in favour of advancement irrespective of colour, for with the emergence of an African Middle Class the colour-bar as it is now called, will become a social and behaviour bar as in other countries. We believe in the maintenance of the European standard of living, but we regard it as absolutely essential that the standard of living of both the Asian and African should be raised, and this can only be done by progressive economic development.

5. Citizenship. We deplore the tendency to regard the European in the Federation as “a White Settler”. This is our Home and that of our children, and we take pride in the contribution which the European has made to the advancement of the African and the development of the Country, viz. Medical and Educational Services, in particular.

Although there have been failures, we are sure that the European in the Rhodesias has shown and is showing a broadminded and sound attitude in support of multi-racialism: He has produced and possesses now, leaders capable of making a success of this terrific experiment.

We submit that in this country the European cannot do without the African and vice versa.

6. Future Development. We maintain that the past record of this country proves that we are fully capable of working out our own salvation, provided that we are not subjected to undue outside interference or propaganda.

We would stress that ours is a non party approach—the issues are above party.

Should the Commission desire it, we shall be pleased to send up a Delegation to give verbal evidence.

Oral Evidence

A GROUP OF RHODESIAN CITIZENS FROM THE VUMBA AREA

Mr. Black

Brigadier Skeen

Mr. Glass

The witnesses made the following points in amplification of their memorandum:—

- (a) They were sick and tired of interference by the United Kingdom. Southern Rhodesia felt fully capable of settling its own problems.
- (b) Too many people throughout the world had the vote. The present Federal franchise qualifications were about right, but the vote should be regarded as a privilege on the lines of a decoration.
- (c) If the franchise qualifications were reduced in the northern Territories, there would be pressure to lower the Federal franchise, and thereafter the vote qualifications in Southern Rhodesia.
- (d) The delegation was in favour of Federation, which they considered economically essential. But not enough had been done to persuade the Africans that they would benefit from it.
- (e) Of the three Territories of the Federation, the prospects were that one would come under an African dictatorship in the very near future; one would remain at least partly under Colonial Office rule, and the third one would remain as it was. The logical conclusion was that Federation would be loosened and some portfolios transferred back to the Territorial Governments.
- (f) The Southern Rhodesian man in the street considered as a whole, was prepared to let Nyasaland go. But the right solution was that Federation should continue with slightly fewer powers.
- (g) With regard to paragraph (4) of the memorandum there had been a big advance in the development of industry in the Federation in the past ten years. Unfortunately African education was directed primarily to training Africans for white-collar jobs, and there was a danger of maladjustment of balance in the whole educational system. The aim should be to bring more Africa into industry, but to achieve this more technical training was needed.

- (h) On the question of the colour bar, far more depended on individual behaviour and manners than on legislation. The delegation were critical of an attitude of European "baaskap" as well as of African bad manners. As an interim step, it might be desirable to have some method of designating "honorary Europeans" on the lines of "assimilados"

CAPTAIN A. UTTERTON

Captain Utterton said that he was much concerned with the freedom of the Press in the Federation. It was entirely in the hands of the Argus Press, which only allowed certain views to be expressed. What was needed was that section 22(2) of the Southern Rhodesia Letters Patent of 1923, which had been removed under the 1925 amendment, should be put back again into the constitution of the Federation. The omission of this section had had an adverse effect on Federation. He personally would like to see Federation work, provided that it was based on good will to all concerned.

Memorandum

J. P. VALINTINE

It has been suggested to me by various members of this Community that, owing to my varied association with the Natives of this Country, my experience with them may be of value to the Commission.

After the last War, I left South Africa and arrived in Southern Rhodesia to take up residence at the end of 1945. I started a small business in Umtali and later became Manager of a Transport Business there. This operated buses and lorries transporting Natives and goods in the whole of the Umtali-Inyanga Area. It later became a Company and buses were also run from Umtali to Salisbury. In 1952 I resigned as Managing Director of this Company. During the time I was running this business it developed into one of the largest Transport Businesses in Southern Rhodesia at that time, operating 22 buses and lorries on a number of routes which covered most of the Eastern Districts. All the drivers of these vehicles were Africans.

When I resigned from this Company, I bought land in the Odzani Area, where I now reside.

During my association with this Transport Company, I had opened a Trading Store in the Honde Gorge in the Umtasa North Reserve, assisted by my wife. We now operate seven Trading Stores within a 15 mile radius of my farm and our two adult sons have joined my wife and myself in running this business.

During the whole of the period to which I refer, I have been associated with Africans, both as employees and as customers. I have done a good deal of grain buying at some of my stores and feel that, over the years I have been dealing with them, I have gained an invaluable knowledge of the African.

I now employ 60 Africans full time and a number of casual labourers, when work on the farm necessitates this.

Should the Commission consider that an interview with me would be of benefit to their investigations, I had thought of introducing discussion under the following headings:

1. (a) Native as then.
(b) Native as Now.
2. Attitude to Federation.
3. Education—Native and European Missions.
4. The Native Farmer.
5. Intimidation within their own Areas.
6. Exploitation of the Native by the Native with a little knowledge.
7. Health.
8. Assistance given by Europeans to Natives to try to improve their standard of living.
9. Effect of cash in lieu of rations.
10. Reversion to early way of life in spite of education.
11. Discipline main consideration in the maintenance of control and the improvement of their standards.
12. Influence of Native Women on their race.
13. An outline of our own plans with reference to pensions for our employees and the provisions of a place for their retirement, should they not have land already allotted to them.

14. Would the Commission consider interviewing a Native Representative from our Stores and from our Farm?

Finally, I would like to stress that we feel a strong sense of responsibility towards the African, and I am speaking for the majority of Europeans in this Country. In the words of an African to my wife, they "look to us as their father and their mother" and we, in turn, regard most of them as we would a backward child. It is obvious to people who have known them and worked with them over a long period, that the African agitators would be quite incapable of putting the welfare of their people before everything else. With the European, however, the whole of their background and education in this Country prepares them for the acceptance of responsibility. It is constantly demonstrated to us who work with them, that the African, in the majority of cases, has no sense of responsibility what so ever. Whereas the European feels he wants to assist them to improve their standards and become more useful members of their Community, the agitator only wants to help himself and to gain the power that his leadership of them gives him.

Additional Memorandum

J. P. VALINTINE

1. Natives as then—working as drivers and assistants—competition as drivers was keen—now there are hundreds. Some natives very quick in picking up driving—in some cases appears to be hereditary—some find it very difficult to learn (surprisingly enough some of the cleverer ones have found it most difficult e.g. Willard and Moses). Their reactions in an emergency are apt to be rather slow. My own methods of discipline worked—which cannot be applied to the same degree today. Pilfering negligible—goods dumped on side of road—not today—natives with own transport steal vegetables for re-sale in town. Cattle stealing. The Barwi Tribe then and now.

2. Attitude to Federation—Cannot say that I know of any Natives in this Area (25 sq. miles—40-50,000) who can, in any way, grasp the significance of Federation. One or two have asked to have it explained to them. To my knowledge, none of the progressive Natives in this Area were asked to appear before the Commission, or given any insight into what it is all about. The building of Kariba Dam and its possibilities in the development of their country is not appreciated—the reply is always the same—spend that money on our education—farms, etc. Then there is the gap between these few and the rest in the rural areas and they literally have no conception of what it means.

3. When the Emergency Regulations came into force last year, I questioned some of my store boys to find what they thought about Dr. Banda—one reply—he is a hands in pocket fighter—and . . . he can't even speak his own language . . . if that is the way he feels towards the European, he must shed European clothes . . . one of them had heard him speak and, when I asked what he had talked about, he replied that he had said that if he died his bones would go on fighting for them . . . presumably an appeal to the superstitious side of their natures and the witchcraft in which they still believe. The general attitude has changed towards the Native since Federation. (Refer to last paragraph of my letter.)

3. Education—Native and European Missions—The only Native Mission that I have any experience of is the Honde Industrial Mission, which hardly exists today. Developed by an African who received a call to help his people. It was well supported by everyone—funds were given by individuals and also supported by the State Lotteries. Carpenters and builders trained there were demanding almost double the rate of pay of the accepted rate at that time.

European Missions—The only advantage that I can see for having these Missions is that we are relying on outside financial support to assist with Native education. The present European would find it difficult to pay for this in the form of taxation.

The disadvantages are many:—

- (a) Missions of different denominations are scattered and pupils walk miles starting at dawn and passing a mission school almost on their doorstep for one mile away because of their particular religion.
- (b) These are mainly primary schools, so that if they want to further their education, they have to go further afield eventually.
- (c) In many cases their European teachers have only recently come to this country and have little idea of the conditions or understanding of the African. Others come for a short period only on contract. Commercialised.

- (d) Already most Native parents appreciate the difference between a Government School and a Mission one.
(e) No means test introduced.

4. The Native Farmer

The Native Department is doing a stout job of work, and, with the gradual introduction of irrigation (well on its way in some areas) conservation and crops for the different areas. Must rely on some form of collective farming eventually to make various farming machinery economic. European supervision essential or they go back to their old ways in spite of proof that better crops can be grown by doing as they have been shown—kleinenberg. Majority of farmers only work from November until May, and this idleness makes beer drinking popular.

Possibility of operating industries near these reserves.

Can we encourage them to build better roads, dams, sports fields, clubs, etc.

Can we promote interest in afforestation various areas. This field is wide open and the Department under-staffed. The average native craves for a piece of land but conversely, in some cases, the owners of land in this area are working as far afield as Cape Town.

5. & 6. Intimidation within their own Areas—Exploitation of the Native by the Native with a little knowledge.

Grain buying—

In business where the intelligence can be considered higher—intimidation through not only education but the social standing of the individual is often exploited to the fullest. Willard and his recommendation that travellers must pay before we buy. The Post Office Clerk, Jethro, stealing ruthlessly from his people and very cleverly and then delaying his arrest telling his clients there was no reason for alarm over delayed letters, etc., and not one of the many involved reported to me their complaint.

A good farm worker often has to leave because he works too quickly and will not fall into line. It is not often appreciated that intimidation is going on under our noses all the time even in the home if two or more are employed. James and Kenneth. Contrary to what the outside world appears to believe, exploitation of the African has not been confined to the European. An African with a little knowledge can and does exploit and intimidate his uneducated brother up to the hilt. Store boys do not hesitate to increase the selling price of an article, when the customer is unable to read the price ticket and pockets the difference himself. A Native given authority, automatically makes use of it for his own ends. Building himself up by intimidating those he has been given authority over, and ruthlessly too.

7. Health—I consider the work done by the Government in this respect an amazing effort. Honde Reserve cut out of the bush—mosquitoes—cattle under control.

Honde Maternity Home and Clinic.

Tsonzo Clinic—Shadreck's reaction

8. Assistance given by Europeans to Natives to try to improve their standard of living.

9. Effect of Cash in Lieu of Rations.
Gambling.

10. Reversion to early way of life in spite of education. Cook boy returns to the reserve for six months and comes back having forgotten everything he has learned—like a bucket being emptied. Freedom from tribal life has caused a big change and a certain lack of discipline. Not afraid to commit a paltry offence and if caught a few weeks in the Queen's hotel is regarded as a joke.

11. Discipline main consideration in the maintenance of control and the improvement of their standards.

One never consults one's staff as to what is to be done during the day. They accept a lead and have no incentive to make suggestions. Should you not give full instructions as to what their jobs are. Have to be careful when giving instructions to give one step at a time. Can't say—plough that land and plant potatoes—one must say—plough that land. Then when that is done give the instruction to plant the potatoes. Labour must be firmly handled—they respond to this and respect your knowing the job from A to Z and are very quick to pick any weakness and to trade on it.

12. Influence of Native Women on their race. They are the hewers of wood and the drawers of water and the farmers of yesterday. Like women of any other race, they can have a tremendous influence on their race and it is only through them that hygiene and the approach to health can be made.

13. An outline of our own plans with reference to pensions for our employees and the provision of a place for their retirement, should they not have land already allotted to them.

14. Two Native employees brought in.

Oral Evidence

J. P. VALINTINE

Mr. Valintine had earlier submitted a memorandum and now handed in an additional memorandum, and suggested he should answer questions on the headings therein.

Attitude to Federation

By this Mr. Valintine made it plain that he meant the African attitude and not his own towards Federation. He said that within an area with a population of between 20,000 to 30,000 Africans in which he knew most of the educated (self or otherwise) there were only about twelve who could grasp the idea of Federation. He had approached them particularly during the emergency, and had held a meeting of his store boys who represented the most intelligent members of his staff but even they could not understand the idea of Federation. They were only concerned with things of direct concern or advantage to them personally and were scared and horrified at any suggestion that they should appear before the Commission whose purpose they could not comprehend. He had used the Kariba Dam as an illustration of the possible advantages of Federation, but the only response was that the Africans could not see why the money would not have been better spent on education.

Intimidation and Exploitation

Mr. Valintine thought that intimidation and exploitation went together. He said that any African who was given any form of authority would as a matter of course intimidate his fellow Africans. He would use his knowledge and authority for personal gain. Older men would intimidate younger boys but he had no direct evidence of political intimidation.

He himself had been buying grain over the last fifteen years, and ran transport covering an area of 75 miles east and west where he had been given permission to go into the Native Reserves. The Africans would assemble grain at certain spots and pay him the controlled price, but they were also getting a cut bigger than the Europeans. He thought that this was a form of intimidation and that Africans exploited fellow Africans ruthlessly.

His permit to trade in the Native Reserves was subject to annual licence by the Native Commissioner. He was accepted in the Native Reserves because he traded fairly and kept his prices at the proper level, and he thought that the Africans could see the advantage of this but he knew that each year representations were made to the Native Commissioner to get him out.

He supposed that running African stores might be said to be a form of exploitation, but he thought he was giving a fair deal and he was able to compete with 35 stores within a fifteen mile radius of one of his own.

Education

Asked whether he would like to see the Africans educated so as to be able to resist intimidation by their fellows, Mr. Valintine said that he would, but he thought the present type of education was not suitable. It would be better to give more technical education, and to teach civics so as to broaden their outlook on what was going on around them, and thus give them more authority in their own area.

Pressed to define his own attitude to Federation, Mr. Valintine said that he accepted it as the only way out, but strictly because they (i.e. the African and his employer) must work in harmony, although events must not be hastened. He could not see that the existing European population in the country would be able to provide education for the vast majority from taxes. It was only through Federation which would attract capital and industries that the money would be found. He thought there was a better chance for development as part of the Federation.

Mr. Valintine was asked whether he thought that the Africans in Southern Rhodesia would like education to be a Federal function, and whether they wanted education similar to that of the European. He replied that Africans were getting their education under appalling conditions at present. The advanced African in the Reserve and on the farms was starving if necessary to send his children to school, as he thought it was their only chance. The child thought that he could concentrate on school but he was compelled to go to a mission school which might be ten or more miles each way every day. African education was entirely in the hands of the Missions. He knew that New Zealand sent money to supplement these Missions. He only criticised this form of education to point out that something should be done. In some cases, teachers were from overseas and under contract with no long term interest in the country. They relied more and more on the Africans under them. There was no stability and education was becoming commercialized. The priest in charge of a Mission would lose his job if the number of pupils went down. All Africans would withdraw their children from the mission schools if government schools were available. He did not see how the mission schools could educate their pupils adequately. A big school might be able to train children up to matriculation standard, but many fell by the wayside. A government school would be able to bring them to a higher standard.

He thought the children should be given some educational test to see that they were not wasting their parents' money. Their main objective was usually to become clerks, and they needed to be guided into industries and farming.
The Influence of African Women

The women had been looking after the land for centuries, and people did not realise the great responsibilities they were carrying. They are really responsible for the education of the children. There were cases where the wife was looking after the land, and as many as five children while the husband was away in Capetown.

The women had a tremendous influence, particularly in matters of hygiene.

He thought a way should be found to assist them within the Native Reserves.

Mr. Valintine mentioned that two of his African employees would be giving evidence. One was an older self-taught man (Ngwara Langton) and the other a younger man (Rodgers) who had a certain amount of education.

MR. RODGERS and MR. N. LANGTON

Employees of Mr. Valintine (See above evidence)

Mr. Langton spoke little English and Mr. Rodgers answered questions and interpreted for Mr. Langton.

Mr. Langton did not understand Federation. He had heard about it but he did not understand what it meant. He was a Southern Rhodesian who had only reached Standard II. He worked as a storekeeper for Mr. Valintine and enjoyed his work. He earned £10 a month plus 30/- ration money. His takings in the store averaged between £50 and £90 a day. He was perfectly happy as he was and saw no reason why he should have a vote.

Mr. Rodgers had reached Standard VI but had failed his examination. For some time he had not been able to get the kind of work he wanted, but was now very happy working for Mr. Valintine who had promised him more money because he had improved in his work. He was pleased to be learning things from Mr. Valintine.

He had heard about Federation and understood what it meant which he took to be how people lived and how the Europeans cared for them.

There was no food in the Reserves, the soil was poor. Many people came to the towns for work because of hunger and not having enough clothes. They only earned £1.10.0 or £2 and sometimes they had two, three or four wives to support. Sometimes there was nothing to eat in his village. His family had six acres of land, but they did not own it. It was very poor soil and hilly and it only produced two bags of maize, two-and-a-half bags of rapoko and a few groundnuts (perhaps one bag) and his family had four cows. There were ten in his family and although four were married they did not have fields of their own. They could go to live in a location, but this was not good and it would be better to have more fields. They fertilized the fields with the manure from the cows, but it was not enough. Six acres was the maximum amount of land allowed to any family in his Reserve and they were only given so much because the soil was not good.

Memorandum

A GROUP OF EUROPEAN ELECTORS OF CHIPINGA DISTRICT

We are committed to Federation in its present form, in which the safeguards for both Europeans and non-Europeans, appear to be adequate, and we are of opinion that the advancement of all races in every sphere is well catered for.

We are of opinion that the African is, under our present Government, happy and contented, and free from fear and tyranny of any sort. We believe that this state of affairs is due solely to the fact that the Government is in the hands of civilised men, who understand Western Democracy. It is abundantly clear to us that the African States which have been granted independence will quickly revert from Democracies, with Government of the people, by the people for the people, to republics virtually ruled by a dictator, who will tolerate no opposition. We are very much alive to the trends of certain African Territories which have recently become independent.

We are determined to maintain a true Western Democracy, and with this end in view we will resist with all the power at our command, any reduction in the qualification standards of our common Voters' Roll. Should the two Northern Territories be granted such a reduction in standards for the vote qualification, thus bringing into power an African majority elected by a bulk of uncivilised men, then the only course open to our country of Southern Rhodesia would be to secede from the Federation, and, to use a hackneyed expression, to 'go it alone'.

We strongly resent the repeated denunciations of the people of Great Britain that the moment the white man becomes a citizen of an African Territory, he at once takes on the role of a masterful and cruel oppressor.

Finally, for the preservation of law and order, and the betterment and protection from tyranny and even bloodshed, of all races, we deem it essential to fight for the removal of the veto clause in the matter of the Native Affairs of our country. We submit that we who live and work with the African, and have a real feeling of affection for him, understanding his tribal laws and customs, and knowing his real needs, are the only people who can give him the full advantages of civilisation, and a guarantee of freedom from fear and want. It is our desire to bring the African up to our European level of truth and justice, with freedom, and the present policy of handing over Territories to be ruled by men who have not learnt the meaning of Western Democracy, must be curbed forthwith, and all that has been so painfully and laboriously achieved will be dragged down, and our country fall a prey to Godless Communism, with all the horrors that this entails.

The above is the carefully considered opinion of the people of Chipinga District, and we stand by it.

- R. S. Thacker, Q.C.
- A. J. W. MacLeod

Colonel MacLeod said that the present delegation had been chosen at a public meeting to represent the European electors of Chipinga. Introducing the members of the delegation, Colonel MacLeod said that Mrs. Otterson had been in Southern Rhodesia since 1894 and had eight children and twenty-one grandchildren living in the country. Mr. Willemse had been in the country for 22 years, Mr. Oudendaal had arrived in 1894 on one of the early treks and had subsequently worked as a Native and Civil Commissioner and Magistrate. Mr. Edwards was the son of a pioneer of 1893. Mr. Thacker had spent 22 years in Eastern Central Africa, where he had been in the legal profession.

In answer to questions, the delegation made the following points in amplification of their memorandum.

- (a) The qualifications for the Federal franchise were about right at the present time, but if the value of money fell, they might have to be raised.
- (b) If the northern Territories got the franchise on the basis of 'one man, one vote' Southern Rhodesia would probably want to "go it alone". There was, however, no objection to an increase in the northern Territories coming on the roll. The emphasis must be on gradualness.
- (c) If the protection of the United Kingdom were removed from the Africans, it was accepted that some other safeguard might be required. This could be provided by a Federal Senate. Such a Senate would be able to protect the interests of Europeans if, eventually, the majority representation of Africans made this necessary. It would be hundreds of years before Africans, who did not understand the ideas of fairness or democracy, would be capable of governing the country.
- (d) Southern Rhodesia was on the right track. It should be accepted that people who had lived with Africans all their lives knew what was best for them.
- (e) Another problem was the new type of African who was living in the urban areas. There was a need to give them a measure of self-government in the towns. The establishment of councils which enabled the people to bring matters to the attention of the authorities gave an outlet for Africans in politics.

- (f) Some mistakes had been made in the past by having too many restrictions on Africans, such as the liquor laws.
- (g) Education had been carried too far; one difficulty was that the schools turned out partly educated Africans for whom no jobs could be found.
- (h) The effect of racial discrimination was often exaggerated. Africans practised more social discrimination among themselves than Europeans practised against them. There was no objection to Africans being accepted socially when they really achieved European standards.

Memorandum

G. HALL

A Federal Citizen, of 10 years residence, a pensioner of the Colonial Administrative Service, Gold Coast 1921-48. Member of Executive and Legislative Councils (in the Gold Coast).

1. Federation must continue, if only for the fact that two of the three Territories are unable to stand alone economically. But if it is to continue, it must become a real Federation and not the present bastard form of amalgamation.

2. It would seem that at its conception, a large section of European opinion in Southern Rhodesia, either through ignorance or the feeling that while everything in Southern Rhodesia was wonderful, so everything in the Colonial Office Territories was rotten, visualized the gradual extension of what may be termed Southern Rhodesian methods to the two Northern Territories.

3. As most of the African Affairs had, by the Constitution been left in Territorial hands, this had the unfortunate result of making the Federal Government appear to be a white man's Government in the eyes of the African. A feeling that increased when the Federal Government took control of European Agriculture in Northern Rhodesia and the ridiculous incident when a Federal Minister of Agriculture threatens the Nyasaland Government with dire consequences unless they agree to separate European from African Agriculture and place the former under his control.

4. Again one finds that Education is divided racially between Federal and Territorial Governments instead of higher and primary.

5. The criticism by Europeans in Southern Rhodesia of Colonial rule is not without justification, as nothing is more sterile than a Government of Civil Servants; the material advancement of the Gold Coast since becoming Ghana, and a comparison of conditions between Southern Rhodesia and the two Northern Territories illustrate this, but this was no justification for interference by Federal in Territorial matters.

6. The solution would seem to be the restricting of the Federal Government powers and the rapid advancement of the two Northern Territories to elected Self-Government within the Federation.

7. Elected, yes, but the greatest disservice that could be done to these territories is to introduce universal adult suffrage which would make a farce of the ballot box and place the power in the wrong hands.

8. The present general low standard of members of the British Parliament may, or may not, be due to this, but the tendency of some members to feel, that having been elected to some obscure constituency in the United Kingdom, they are entitled to interfere directly in matters within the Federation, must be checked.

9. No embarrassment need be felt by the U.K. Government over the fact that the two Northern Territories are Protectorates as under a Socialist Government, the wishes of the Chiefs and people of the Northern Territories of the Gold Coast to remain under British Protection, and not be given their "freedom" as part of Ghana was over-ruled for purely economic reasons. This is well known to at least one member of your Commission.

10. The African Affairs Board should be abolished, as the only useful purpose it has served, was the introduction of African members into the Federal Parliament, but as these, with the exception of Southern Rhodesia were originally nominated, their value was reduced. As racial representation may be considered necessary for some time, they could retain their seats as elected members.

11. The fundamental fault of the Board is its purpose to protect only one racial section of the community and not general discrimination against any one race. Its place may be taken by an elected Senate or a nominated State Council; the former necessitates party politics which so often means racial politics in this country, a State Council would seem preferable, some members of which for some time to come being nominated by the United Kingdom Government, who should also have some control over its deliberations.

12. The African will always appeal to the highest authority he can, as was so well illustrated by the number of petty land disputes in the Gold Coast that went as far as the Privy Council; it is essential therefore in the interest of peace and good Government that the present dual control of the various territories by the Federal and U.K. Governments be replaced as soon as possible, and as suggested above any control should be at Federal and not Territorial level.

13. One most important point on which I regret I am unable to express an opinion, is the control of the territorial representation in the Federal Government. Should the type and method be left to the Federal Government to decide or should the territories have some say in this matter? It is one of great importance to the Federation under the present state of feelings of all races.

Oral evidence

G. HALL

Mr. Hall said he had tried to make his evidence constructive. He read his memorandum and drew particular attention to the points raised in paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 5, 7 and 13, to which he attached great importance.

In reply to questions Mr. Hall said he thought that it would be a mistake to have general Federal control, e.g. Federal Police. The states must be kept together as states who could feel themselves developing. He cited the University as a distressing example of the results of Federal control. It had come to be regarded as offering European education only.

Asked for his views on the Land Apportionment, he thought it should be struck off the Statute Book, but conceded that he would need to give more consideration not only to this act but to other legislation before coming to any conclusion on the need for discriminatory legislation in favour of Africans.

He did not think the protective power of the United Kingdom should or indeed would be removed, but he thought it should be transferred; for example, if there was a Council of State the United Kingdom should appoint its own members to it and operate through it. He thought there should be looser control over departmental affairs in the individual states of the Federation, and that Education and Health in particular could be left to the individual Territories to administer.

With regard to the franchise, the witness thought that a wider Federal franchise would not be acceptable, but a more liberal Territorial franchise would be acceptable. Asked if he thought whether Territories approaching self-government would accept a franchise imposed from outside the witness replied that while they were within the Federation the franchise could not be regarded as being imposed upon them, but he felt fairly certain that it would be refused and could in fact break up the Federation. He thought that the composition and method of election of the Federal Government was the most important point for consideration.

The witness was asked how he considered the Africans here compared with those in the Gold Coast, of which he had great experience, and in reply he drew attention to the difference in the history of the Gold Coast and the Federation. The latter only went back sixty years, and while the tendency was to regard the members of the Federation as separate countries, they were in fact only recently artificially created, whereas in the Gold Coast there were three generations of educated Africans on the Coast, but Africans of little or no education were still going unclothed in the north. He thought the educated African in the Federation was less able to accept responsibility than the educated African in the Gold Coast, but there were a few who were just as able. He did not feel justified in expressing a firm opinion in regard to Southern Rhodesia where he had only lived as a pensioner, and had only slight experience of inter-racial contact and was generally out of touch. A further disad-vantage was that he could not speak the local African language. He thought that it would be dangerous to give an opinion judged on contact with servants only.

Memorandum

V. P. ODENDAAL

There appears to be no point in attempting to revise this constitution or to draw up a constitution for any other form of association, unless full consideration is given to the requirements of the two major races living within the present Federal boundaries, taking into account the following:

- (a) The difference in the living standards, culture, customs and laws of the two races which were evolved over hundreds of years to suit each particular type of civilization.
- (b) Democracy in respect of the Africans' mentality.
- (c) That the aims of African Nationalists do not allow for partnership, multi-racialism and integration, but complete domination by the African, and that this appears to be fostered by outside agitators who are using African Nationalism to gain their objectives.
- (d) The status of Southern Rhodesia as contained in the preamble, and, which she would have achieved without Federation.
- (e) The rights of the Europeans contained in the Preamble.
- (f) The definition as defined by Mr. Macmillan of the clause in the Preamble stating that ". . . when the inhabitants of the territories so desire to go forward with confidence towards the attainment of full membership of the Commonwealth".
- (g) The lack of appreciation by Britain, that in every case, where established Europeans have full control and responsibility, they have given more consideration to the under-developed people, than the Colonial Office type of government. In the territories under consideration, the Southern Rhodesians gave more within their means to encourage education, health and economic development, than the British Government gave in the territories for which she was responsible; where it appears that Britain and her investors' main interest was the exploitation of the territories giving as little in return as possible, except political advancement.
- (h) Southern Rhodesians never intended that the Federal State would be ultimately controlled by African political advances in the Northern Territories.
- (i) The Europeans in Southern Rhodesia were misled by Lord Malvern (then Sir Godfrey Huggins) into believing that the status of this country would be maintained, and that his definition of partnership would not mean ultimate integration as envisaged by Mr. Macmillan. (Lord Malvern's definition was a senior and junior partner as in a business undertaking). The error vesting the responsibility of the Northern Territories in the Colonial Office, and asking the Europeans to finance the Federal State, while the dictating is done from Britain. Europeans are beginning to distrust agreements made by Britain in connection with their future, in African territories.
- (j) The loss of confidence by African business men and responsible progressive Africans, who view with alarm European Governments with a lack of will to rule, being stamped by African political agitators.
- (k) The choice of a balanced economic and political advancement of the African instead of irresponsible political advancement. The Europeans appreciate that the lower the electoral qualifications, the lower the standard of Government.
- (l) The sharp deterioration of the pleasant race relations existing in Southern Rhodesia before the Federation's multi-racial and partnership policy was implemented. The reason for this is simple. The Europeans on the whole have no intention of implementing a policy that can only breed contempt. It is a policy that has been introduced by people who only come into contact with a small section of the native population, and were hoping that a policy of appeasement and handing over responsibilities, by lowering qualifications would satisfy the African, but looked on by the agitators as a sign of weakness. Their attitude to weakness can be seen in their reaction to the Christian Churches. The African on the other hand is quite aware that the European is capable of freezing them out of multi-racial institutions. What could be more antagonising?

Taking the preceding remarks into consideration, it is therefore necessary to seek a solution that will have a prospect of succeeding, a completely new outlook and one starting in the territorial sphere which will make allowances for the ultimate aims of the African and fill the requirements of the European.

The Europeans intend that Government will remain in civilized hands. The African can at present legitimately claim lack of representation. A solution would therefore require:

- (a) A more democratic system.
- (b) A system giving the African an opportunity to advance politically when and as he gains maturity.
- (c) A type of Government that will give him more control in his own immediate affairs, at his present stage of development.
- (d) A system which could allow for safeguards by the European against exploitation of the African by the African.
- (e) A scheme that will give the African himself the choice of whether he wishes to accept greater political responsibilities when he matures.

It is submitted that a possible answer that could meet the above requirement is the establishment of two lower houses (in the two Rhodesias) as well as a Senate, with only two lower houses in Nyasaland, outlined broadly as follows:

- (1) The Legislature. Members to be elected on a high qualification common roll, such as existed in Southern Rhodesia before Federation. With few exceptions the responsibilities to be those existing prior to 1953.
- (2) A House of Representatives. Members approximately 24, to be elected by the indigenous African, on a one man one vote roll. Each constituency to be centred around the present native administrative areas, rural and urban. The following responsibilities should be concurrent with those of the Legislature:—

African Agriculture	African Education
African Taxation	African Health
Roads in African Areas	African Rural and Urban Development.

As a safeguard against malpractice, the chief executive should be the Chief Native Commissioner. Each elected member to be appointed to a committee set up in each constituency, consisting of the Chiefs and the Native Commissioner. The executives of the above responsibilities to be attached to the Legislative Ministries concerned, as under secretaries. This House to be in existence for an interim period and to be abolished when the Africans have developed to such a stage when the majority could enrol on the common roll if they wished to, on attaining the necessary civilised standard.

A scheme of this nature with complete independence will be far more in keeping with the concept of partnership as was defined by Lord Malvern, and envisaged by most people. It could also be more readily understood by the African and it could give those who wished an opportunity to transfer to the higher common roll, when they gain the necessary qualifications, and a better understanding of democracy and that sectional representation and racialism are unacceptable. In the meantime, Africans not on the higher roll would have some control in their own affairs and with the development of their urban areas on European lines, there would be less and less friction between the races.

The additional house could be quite easily incorporated within the framework of the present administration. The advantages of giving the Africans the opportunity to have more control in their own affairs, would far outweigh any additional cost.

The Senate consisting of approximately 18 members. Three appointed by the House of Representatives, one of these by the opposition, 15 by the Legislature in ratio to the seats held.

The Federal sphere. A Government with less responsibilities and members elected on the higher roll, the size could be halved. The responsibilities to consist of, for example:—

- Defence
- External Affairs
- Banking and Currency
- Aviation
- Posts and Wireless
- Supply of Electricity from Major Undertakings
- Customs and Excise.

It is obvious that unless a far reaching change is made in the near future, more and more friction will develop between the races, with the inevitable outbreak of hostilities, as it is quite certain that the European has no intention of handing over or lowering his standards to suit the underdeveloped race. The trend at the last election in Southern Rhodesia is quite clear. There is a general rejection of partnership as it is at present defined.

Any form of sectional representation, preferential voting or a multiple vote system, will only give a temporary relaxation to the present tensions and it is contended that the African is parochial in outlook. Most important it will take into consideration tribalism, a factor that is generally overlooked and disregarded.

One of the main objections at the present time is that the closer association of the three Territories was primarily for defence and economic reasons. Yet the legislative responsibilities of the Federal Government read more like that of amalgamated territories, with an exclusive list totalling more than 40 responsibilities, and a concurrent list of a further 30.

Oral Evidence

V. P. ODENDAAL

Mr. Odendaal was born in Southern Rhodesia of one of the oldest European families. He had served in the Air Force here and in England and was now farming, having sold out his business profitably.

The witness read his memorandum and made the following points in reply to questions. He thought that race relations had deteriorated since 1953. He thought that there should be more African representation, but not on the present basis. Africans should have more control over African affairs, and by making provision for them to control African affairs, friction would be avoided. He was in favour of segregation, but he thought that both Europeans and Africans should have a say in their own affairs; he did not think that increased participation in local government by Africans was the answer.

He was in favour of some subjects being transferred back to the Territories and listed European Agriculture, European Education, Health and in fact all subjects but those concerning the economic and defence aspects of Government. He thought that the Federation now had too much power. In his view it was created originally for economic and defence purposes, but it was now tending towards a unitary state. He thought that at least three-quarters of the African population were indifferent to Federation. He thought that the Senate should not be in Nyasaland which would be an African state. He also thought that the term "partnership" was misleading. It had never been defined and he thought those concerned did not want it defined but merely wished to make political capital from the term which raised expectations which could not be fulfilled. He could make no firm suggestion for an alternative title but he thought "economic co-operation" would give a better idea and, if used, should be clearly defined.

A EUROPEAN RESIDENT OF UMTALI *

The witness said that she had been born in South Africa and had been married to a member of the Colonial Service in Palestine. She had travelled fairly widely and had lived for some time in the Middle East. After the end of the Mandate in Palestine she and her husband had returned to South Africa, which they had left after the General Election at which the Nationalists had been returned to power.

The witness said that racial prejudice was a universal sin not confined to Central Africa. It was not a subject on which advice could be given from far away; the problems could only be solved by those who had to live with them. She herself aimed to bring up her children respecting the dignity of every human being.

The present Federation was the result of the most wonderful advancement of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland over the past sixty years. This advancement had been based on the vision and enterprise of the white population, coupled with the good will and co-operation of the Africans. Federation itself had been in existence for less than seven years; this was a very short span, and with courage and faith it would be made a success.

One of the essentials was to build up a locally based Civil Service. She herself knew from personal experience that Civil Servants based on the United Kingdom were less deeply involved in the needs of the country they worked in. She and her husband had suffered no hardships at the end of the Mandate in Palestine; the hardships had all been suffered by those who had to stay on when the Civil Servants had left.

There had been a number of recent changes in favour of Africans:— the abolition of separate entrances in Post

* Name withheld at request of witness.

Offices, African participation in State lotteries the establishment of training colleges, the extension of the franchise, the admission of Africans to the Federal Civil Service. Indeed the Government had gone at a faster pace than many of the electorate liked. She was doubtful whether, if there were an election today, the United Federal Party would be returned to power in Southern Rhodesia.

European women had played a great part in the emancipation of African women. Many of them gave their time unstintingly to work for co-operation between the races, and to teach African women how to improve their way of life.

In answer to questions, the witness said that she thought there should be some representation of Africans in the Southern Rhodesia Legislature. This should not necessarily be achieved through the common roll but might be achieved through provincial representation. The time was not yet ripe for African members of Parliament, but African affairs were a Territorial matter, and Africans should be allowed to play a greater part in their own administration. At the same time further steps could be taken to do away with the small pinpricks which mattered to sensitive people. This would include such matters as the exclusion of Africans from lifts, the provision of separate lavatory facilities etc. There must be some recognition of the gap between those who had reached the top and those who were still at the bottom of the ladder. It was quite wrong to expect professional men, whether African or European to associate with garden boys. At present there was no common meeting ground between the races. Such contacts as existed were mainly on the basis of a master and servant relationship, and ended at the end of the working day.

The main obstacles to closer understanding were fear, intolerance and lack of education. On the education side, it was desirable that European children should be taught much more about the African population rather than children in Holland or Switzerland, as seemed to be the case nowadays. In addition, they should have to learn an African language. Eventually, multi-racial education was the only solution. This could be started immediately in technical schools, though at lower levels even secondary schools, problems of sex and age provided complications. Once the pinpricks had been dropped, further progress in this direction would be possible.

ST. FAITH'S MISSION

Father A. R. Lewis	Priest-in-charge
Father B. M. Makoni	Assistant Priest
O. Ndwora	Second master
V. P. Van Zyl	Farm Manager
J. Kekana	Chairman of Village Council

Father Lewis said that St. Faith's was an Anglican Mission; its primary work was religious and was almost entirely among Africans. In addition, they did medical work and agricultural work at the Central Mission, and ran more than 45 schools in all. Apart from the Mission itself, they ran a village community of some 600 souls. They had about 100 churches in their area.

Father Makoni said that St. Faith's Mission regarded it as a privilege to appear before the Commission, even though they were not in a position to give evidence on strictly constitutional issues. Nevertheless, they had been forced to scrutinise legislation affecting Africans; it was their view that Africans and Europeans should live side by side, each supplementing the other. It was wrong to think that one race or the other would disappear completely at some future date. Those Africans who believed that they could drive out the European were quite mistaken. It was necessary that the Government should provide equal facilities, opportunities and justice for all. In particular, Africans must have more constitutional means of voicing their grievances.

The concept of partnership had brought complete confusion in its train. Was partnership to be interpreted on a business basis—in which case the power of the partner should be regarded as proportionate to the number of his shares or the percentage of his investment. It was not easy to define what was meant by partnership, but it was necessary for the concept to be realised in practice, otherwise it would be regarded solely as a political bait.

One of the main grievances of the Africans in Southern Rhodesia was the Land Apportionment Act. This was a strictly Territorial matter, but it was difficult for the average African to see what good Federation had done him so long as he was tied down in his own country by legislation of this kind. It was not easy for Africans to see why they should be limited to, perhaps, six acres, when they saw Europeans in possession of thousands.

African advancement was applied very unevenly. In the Federal Service, doctors, for example, were treated on a basis of complete equality whatever their race. But teachers were not regarded as equivalent. Even though many African teachers may have undergone the same education as a European teacher (or, for that matter, an African doctor), he was denied the same facilities. Why should a doctor, because of his better pay, be able to take part in elections when the teacher was not able to do so? Similar considerations arose in the field of African agriculture.

On the question of education, the witnesses said that the Federal Government should be allowed to develop education along the lines of a properly run system, particularly in the training of technicians. The Territorial Government was simply not interested. In a multi-racial state there should not be a "native question" or "native problem". Legislation should not deal with one section of the community alone. Discrimination would sooner or later end in an outburst of some kind from the people. So long as the present state of affairs continued, the future of Federation must be regarded as very gloomy.

One of the causes of African agitation against Federation was the distinction between the ordinary and special voters' roll. So long as the special roll was limited in numbers, Africans were not willing to register on it. The two rolls should be made into one common roll on the basis of the present special roll qualifications.

Another difficulty was that freedom of speech was minimised throughout the Federation, so that if an African expressed political views he was immediately regarded as an agitator.

In answer to questions, the delegation made the following further points:—

- (a) They could only speak for some Africans in Southern Rhodesia; they had no knowledge of conditions in Northern Rhodesia or Nyasaland.
- (b) The scope of the powers of the Southern Rhodesian Government affecting Africans should be minimised, at least until Africans were better represented in the Southern Rhodesian Parliament.
- (c) On balance, Federation should continue, but in a looser form. The fact that the two northern Territories were giving increasing responsibility into African hands might mean that they would be able to influence Southern Rhodesia.
- (d) The African farmer was adversely affected by the Land Husbandry Act which gave him too little land to make a living off it. If they were able to hold more land and more cattle most Africans would prefer to stay on the land. The idea of improving the standard of agriculture was correct, though its application was wrong in practice. The total abolition of the Land Apportionment Act would be liable to affect the Africans adversely.
- (e) St. Faith's Mission was at present negotiating to sell their farm to the Government for African use. They hoped to be able to secure twelve acres per farmer of which eight would be arable and the remaining three or four under grass. It was true that there was not enough land over all, but even within the European area land was often not properly utilised. Such land should be bought for use by Africans.
- (f) The marketing of African crops was not fair; The fact that Europeans received the higher prices meant that Africans sometimes sold their maize to Europeans who re-sold it at the full price.
- (g) Better provision should also be made for the urbanised or detribalised African for whom there was no land in the reserves. The past policy of the men going to the towns without their families had led to a major social disaster. There should be some provision for pensioners who could no longer work to be looked after in the urban areas or to be given land to return to in the reserves.

MRS. BAILEY

The witness said that she and her husband had come to Southern Rhodesia from India where her husband had spent 17 years in the Indian Army. She herself had travelled a great deal and had served in the Women's Auxiliary Corps in India. They had now been in Umtali for 12½ years. They ran a small farm of 500 acres specialising in dairy produce, pigs and potatoes. Part of their labour force had been with them for ten years or more; others came and went on a short-term basis.

The witness said that her husband concurred in the evidence she was giving.

The first essential was stable Government; seven years was not a long enough period in which to judge whether Federation was the final answer or not. The country was very fortunate in having such men as Lord Malvern and Sir Roy Welensky as Prime Ministers: It was possible to give whole-hearted support to men like these, who knew their own minds and where the country was going.

The witness was quite clear that the goal was racial partnership. She had seen great advances in the past ten years. She had recently seen an encouraging example in a native reserve deep in the country where the women had got together and decided to pool their knowledge and improve their education. When they found that they could not make much progress by this, they had asked for guidance from a neighbouring European farmer's wife who had been able to give them great help in teaching them knitting, hygiene, handicrafts, etc. This action had been taken entirely on the initiative of the African women themselves.

Over the past few years there had been great strides in health, and in roads and housing. It often happened that farmers from the neighbouring native purchase areas came and saw round European farms to get ideas for improving their own husbandry. She and her husband welcomed such visits, and did everything they could to help. The great majority of African children now received some basic education; but this was still not going far enough, and they were not being taught to think or to take responsibility for themselves. The witness attached great importance to the creation of an African middle-class; this was happening, particularly in the transport field. Further progress was needed particularly in giving Africans responsibility in local government organisations.

Certain factors were operating against more rapid progress for the Africans. One of the main considerations was fear and distrust, both of Africans for each other and among the European working-class, where there was increasing competition from African labour. European artisans who had arrived in the last five years or so were particularly liable to adopt a rude and sneering attitude towards the Africans. This was largely attributable to fear, especially since in the farming districts the living standard of some Europeans was not so very much above that of the Africans. In particular, few had electric light or running water. Another difficulty was the flood of Archbishops and journalists who came to the Federation from the United Kingdom and gave what they believed to be good advice, but who had no responsibility for what happened subsequently.

Summing up, the witness said that good progress had been made during the past ten years, but that further action should be taken to increase good relations, both by the removal of legal pinpricks and by the improved standards of behaviour.

H. R. D. JESSOP

Mr. Jessop had come from the United Kingdom in 1947 and was farming and trading on the Melssetter border, which was a fertile and well-watered area. He had seen a steady advance in the status of the indigenous people. Then they were hungry and in rags, but today could afford to spend money on good clothing etc. The majority of them were good citizens and he knew them well. They were not politically conscious but wanted only to attend to their own affairs, and he knew many among them who were good traders. Employers with labour troubles had only themselves to blame. The races were inter-dependent. Without the European farmers the Africans would subside again into poverty, and without African labour the Europeans would find life untenable.

But now the Africans had heard talk about, for example, Dr. Banda, and this coupled with the blast of propaganda mainly from Britain had reduced them to imitation of Africans elsewhere. In his view the only solution was to unscramble Federation. Nyasaland was poor and a liability, although admittedly Northern Rhodesia was prosperous with its copper mines. Loyalty to the United Kingdom was reduced to its lowest ebb, and he wanted Southern Rhodesia to "go it alone". He did a lot of trade with native areas and knew that political talk dated only from the Nyasaland disturbances. He did not think there had been a change yet, but he could see the start of a change. A lot of Nyasalanders came as indentured labourers and there was also a lot of labour from Portuguese East Africa. The Nyasalanders were impressed by the good conditions and food in Southern Rhodesia, and he personally attached great importance to material prosperity as he thought that full stomachs made for content. He thought that any disturbances would start in the north and Britain would give in to whoever shouted loudest. He thought that there should be economic ties only with the northern Territories or Britain. He was afraid of African dictatorship. He thought that Dr. Banda was indoctrinated by Ghana, and Banda's strange talk did not impress the Europeans. If a break with the northern Territories politically led to economic sanctions he was confident that Southern Rhodesia could nevertheless survive. He himself handled goods from all parts of the world and felt that Southern Rhodesia could survive the loss of trade and would be prepared to take in its belt if necessary.

The witness returned on 28th April and said that he wished to implement the last part of his evidence (that concerning the economic effect of separation from the northern Territories) with the following: "We have a form of insurance in as much as I, in common with a great number of Europeans, feel that the long-term destiny of Southern Rhodesia lies in incorporation with the Union of South Africa, both geographically, culturally and racially".

G. H. HARTLEY

Mr. Hartley said that he had been English born and had come to Southern Rhodesia in 1928 as a farmer's boy. In 1930 he had joined the Native Affairs Department, where he had remained until 1947, when he left to take charge of the Salisbury City Council's Native Affairs Department. He had finally resigned in 1959 to take over a farm which had been worked by his uncle for upwards of 50 years.

Mr. Hartley said that many Europeans in Southern Rhodesia looked at Kenya with apprehension and hoped that the recommendations of the Monckton Commission would be better than those of the Kenya Royal Commission. The current attitude of the British public gave cause for great concern; it was unsatisfactory for people who knew little about conditions in the colonies to produce constitutions for them. He personally was very doubtful of the wisdom of exporting replicas of the Parliament at Westminster. The European population of the Federation would not stand for "one man, one vote". Their loyalty to the Crown was unqualified, but this loyalty could not be pushed too far.

One of the difficulties about the present stage of evolution of the Africans in the Federation was that they tended to enter public life at the top rather than at the bottom. They should be given experience of local government as a start. He personally had had wide experience of local government and social activities in Salisbury, and had found little sense of responsibility in the Africans who should take charge of these matters. From his own experience, he very much questioned whether Nyasaland was yet ready for constitutional progress.

He would like to make a serious plea for caution in the Commission's recommendations. Africans were beginning to follow Western ideas, but this was a slow process. Once they had graduated from local bodies, they would be qualified to go on to national politics. In his view, the present Advisory Councils had outlived their usefulness. He would like to see African members of the Salisbury City Council, and there was no reason why Africans should not be permitted to serve on town management boards, etc.

UMTALI

28TH APRIL 1960

Oral evidence.

COLONEL STEWARD

Colonel Steward said he had spent all his adult life in the Territory. He had been thirty years in the police service and had also been labour officer for ten years. Since his retirement from Government service, he had been personnel manager for the B.M.C. (British Motor Corporation), a post he still held.

He said that from the outset he had been one of the opponents of Federation. He knew Nyasaland very well and Northern Rhodesia reasonably well. He was opposed to Federation because African policy in the Northern Territories was quite opposed to African policy in Southern Rhodesia. The indigenous people in the north understood the policy of trusteeship which had always been pursued; it had no common ground with the policy in Southern Rhodesia, and it seemed to him that an attempt to line up two such opposite policies was bound to lead to trouble, and could only result in Southern Rhodesia being involved in the maelstrom of African politics.

He said that to the educated African progress seemed incredibly slow but to the European it seemed incredibly fast.

The heart of the difficulty was that there was no arbitrator to the dispute. Each of the parties to the dispute wanted to be the judge, and he did not see how it was possible to get round this difficulty.

Europeans who made social advances to Africans were looked at askance by their fellow Europeans, and Africans who made similar approaches to Europeans were regarded as yes-men.

He thought that the presence of Africans in the Legislature was merely a facade. Africans were only interested in African affairs, and therefore felt frustrated in the Federal Legislature. There was nothing useful an African could bring to the debates in the Federal Parliament.

There was a European representative on the African Affairs Board but no African had ever seen him and the African Members of Parliament were elected by Europeans who knew nothing about them. He thought that there was a great deal of hypocrisy in the talk about partnership, and in his view the climate of race relations had deteriorated since Federation. There was a large vacuum between the African in his home and in politics which had not yet been filled.

The witness demonstrated his own views on race relations by referring to his earlier career when he was in charge of the police in Bulawayo in 1946. At that time he had urged that something should be done about the low wages paid to Africans, and had foreseen the trouble which had resulted in the general strike in 1948, of which Bulawayo was the strike centre. At that time he had been urged to recruit European police, but he had refused as he thought this would only inflame feelings between the races. He had also refused to have a single policeman armed, and in the event the troubles had been resolved without any display of force.

He thought the Central Government refused to face the difficulties of the situation. The European must come out and meet the emerging African himself. He doubted whether Federation was worth preserving. In 1953 people had shown their feelings against Federation by refusing to go to the Queen's Birthday Party. In the north they had been frightened because they had seen the land go from the Africans in Southern Rhodesia. The Europeans in the north were politically all birds of passage, and there were few "permanent" European settlers.

He would like to see African representatives elected from the Reserves to an African Native Council. When African affairs came under discussion there should be a joint sitting of the African Native Council and the Federal Parliament. He thought this would serve as an escape valve for African frustrations.

Asked whether he thought that this would be regarded as too little and too late, the witness replied that the effort must be made if the races were to settle down together. Twenty-five years ago he had urged that African housing in Bulawayo should be improved. In the day time there had been complete economic integration between the races, but at night there was complete social segregation. Europeans in Salisbury might as well be living in a suburb in England. They had never lived with Africans. He thought that the United Federal Party was more liberal than formerly and that the Democratic Party was not radically different. But there had been little implementation of sound racial policy. He envisaged that the African Council he advocated would be purely advisory and without executive powers, but he thought it would provide a needed outlet. The African was essentially a member of a group and owed allegiance to far more people than the European who was an individualist.

He thought that there was grave danger from the wrong evaluation given to the reports made by the security services.

Asked if he thought it was impossible for Federation to succeed, the witness said that he thought that this was the case. The economic advantages of Federation were always pressed but human relationships were most important, and there should be sound recognition of the African as a human being. It was regrettable that the average European was not prepared to meet the emergent African. The Africans were getting education and wanting white collar jobs. It would be folly to deny them the right to use their education. The Africans were not interested in Federation; but they could not avoid the repercussions of events going on around them.

H. WENT

Mr. Went said that he had been born and bred in Umtali from a family which went back five generations on his mother's side, and two on his father's side. He was a fitter and turner by trade but was now a transport contractor and Member of Parliament for Umtali (United Federal Party.)

The witness said the present situation was damaging to race relations which were in danger of breaking down, and said that something must be done. The whites felt as keenly as the blacks that they had a right to be in the country, and intended to stay. The blacks had not been here very long and the Matabele etc. were not indigenous to the country. The white man felt that he had done his best for the African, and pointed to the position in a place like Liberia which had black independence for a long time but had not done much with it. The Europeans now had a feeling of frustration and did not know where they were, and the reasonable black African did not understand the present position and was therefore afraid of it.

In his view neither whites nor blacks must look to other countries for the solution of their problems. Safeguards must remain in the Federation by means of a Bill of Rights, or some similar institution. To make sure of real success either race must be able to appeal to a higher body within the Federation.

He himself had every faith in Federation which he thought would work; and he looked forward to an even greater Federation with say Portuguese East and West Africa, and which with other African territories could come to form a United States of Central Africa. All races could then live together in this United States in a better way than they did in the rest of the world.

He thought that the education statistics in Southern Rhodesia, where one in five of the population was in school, compared favourably with places such as Nigeria, Ghana and Somaliland. In Southern Rhodesia the revenue per head was £8 whereas in Nigeria it was 17s. 6d. and in Somaliland 25s.

He thought that damage was done to race relations by world events and the blaze of publicity given to incidents between black and white. His own personal relations with the Africans were getting better but others who were not so certain of success were looking at race relations from the angle of apartheid. In his view the only salvation was to get rid of United Kingdom control. He did not think that the country could serve two masters. It was bad for the Europeans, and while it did not matter for the majority of reasonable Africans, there were a few who exploited the difficulties of the situation.

The witness said that he knew Southern Rhodesia very well but not the northern Territories, and in reply to questions said that he thought that if United Kingdom protection were removed from the north Federation would be imposed on them. In his view the ordinary African was mainly concerned with ordinary every day matters, and he would like to ask the Commission if it enquired how the average African got his knowledge of Federation. He thought that if the northern Territories could have an African Government which was reasonable and elected on the basis of a limited franchise, they could remain in the Federation, but he did not think the franchise should be liberalised. If it was to be worth anything the vote must be restricted to thinking people, and the person who exercised a vote must have the interests of the country at heart and must show it to be the case. The witness agreed, in answer to further questions, that even if the franchise were lowered in order to get an African Government, that country could still come within the Federation provided the franchise had remained a reasonable one. He cited electioneering methods which used pictorial symbols and thumb prints: these he thought were useless. He considered that if there were an election now the United Federal Party would not get in, but a year ago he thought it would have carried the country.

The witness felt that Southern Rhodesia could stand alone without the northern Territories because even now Africans could get into Parliament. Southern Rhodesia wanted to avoid the mistakes made in other parts of Africa, and advances were coming gradually. He admitted that the Africans wanted to go faster; but no country could go faster than the economic position allowed.

He thought that if the United Kingdom insisted on making immoderate demands, Southern Rhodesia would swing away from the Federation to the Union of South Africa in spite of recent events there.

Memorandum

A GROUP OF EUROPEAN ELECTORS OF CASHEL AREA

Shocked by the apparent intention of the British Government, regardless of the European and other minorities, to hand over all power in Kenya to the African majority which had so recently revealed its innate savagery, the Europeans of Cashel, at a meeting held on March 16th, attended by nearly the whole electorate, decided unanimously that no such situation should be allowed to develop in Southern Rhodesia. A Committee was appointed charged to:—

1. Impress upon the Prime Ministers of Southern Rhodesia and the Federation that any attempt by the British Government to remove Government from the hands of civilized people would be resisted to the uttermost limit.

2. To draw up a Memorandum and give oral evidence to the Monckton Commission.

Here, in Cashel, we have ample evidence of what European rule has done and is doing for the African. When the first settlers of the Moodie and Steyn Treks crossed the mountains from Melsetter nearly 70 years ago into what is now Cashel, they found an empty land. To the South West, in what is now the Mutambara Reserve, were two small kraals, comprising at most 50 adult males, living under the most primitive conditions and in daily fear of raids by more warlike neighbours across the Portuguese border. The Pioneers were hailed as saviours by these people and, to this day, white and black have lived in this area in complete amity and mutual good will.

Many of the farms are held by descendants of these early settlers and today, in the Mutambara Reserve, where their forefathers found a handful of savages, is a total population of 9,600. To the South West of Mutambara and watered by the rivers of the Cashelis the Nyanadzi Irrigation Project, with 753 acres of some of the most fertile land in Rhodesia, is under irrigation. When the project was initiated by our Native Department in 1934 five families found a precarious existence in this area. Today there are 274 Plot Holders and a population of over 3,000.

These Africans in Mutambara and Nyanadzi, with their hospitalisation, clinics and schools are contented and prosperous. Many are store owners or transport contractors, while for those who want it work is always available on the European farms or on the roads.

Such is Cashel and the transformation effected by two generations of civilised Government and humane and orderly development, but this picture is largely true of the whole of Southern Rhodesia.

It must be conceded by any impartial observer that, prior to the advent of the European, civilization, even in its most elementary form, was unknown, witchcraft and the law of the assegai reigned supreme; land tenure was unknown and title to land was vested in the hands of the local despot who currently wielded the most power.

When Rhodes' column, with the approval of the then British Government first penetrated the country it is doubtful if the total native population reached half a million. Vast areas were completely uninhabited. In spite of great privation these dauntless people held on, the power of the Matabele was broken and law and order established throughout the land. As the Country developed and the unoccupied land was taken up steps were taken to protect the interests of the African, despite the savage brutality displayed in the rebellion of 1897. Adequate tribal land was provided and constantly added to until today the land is held in almost equal proportions by white and black.

It may be well here to compare the lot of the Africans in Southern Rhodesia with the fate of the original inhabitants of North America and Australia.

But this harmonious and orderly development, with its constant aim of attaining Rhodes' dictum of equal rights for all civilized men, is now threatened. Until two years ago there seemed a fair prospect that the experiment of a multi-racial Federation might succeed and, in Southern Rhodesia at any rate, the average African was quite content with the rate of political development. During the past two years, however, the growth of African Nationalism, seemingly fostered and encouraged in Great Britain, threatens to disrupt the orderly progress of the Federation.

In Southern Rhodesia are many second and third generation Europeans who know and can know no other home. These people, with their fellows from South Africa and Great Britain, who in all good faith have brought their wives and families to settle here, having lived in amity and understanding with the African. They know his real needs and they know that all he enjoys today comes from the sacrifice of their forebears and from seventy years of patient and tolerant government. In the past sixty years not a single African has been shot by the Civil Power in any riot or disturbance. We have a Common Roll and any African who reaches this modest standard can exercise his citizen rights. Already a significant number have done so, but in the mass they are completely politically immature. African Nationalism has no place in Southern Rhodesian soil. It is a poison imported from the North and made more virulent by the campaign of misrepresentation in a section of the British Press and the wild utterances of certain British Politicians.

These developments are viewed with disgust and alarm by the Europeans of Southern Rhodesia and have strained the loyalty of a hitherto completely loyal community to breaking point. It is hoped that the Commission in its appraisal of the situation will bring home to the British Government the folly of supporting unbridled African Nationalism in this last bastion of British influence in Africa and that, if all political power is to be handed to Africans in the North, if all that has been achieved in 70 years of orderly and humane government is to be sacrificed on the altar of British political expediency, then Southern Rhodesia must, in the recent words of her Prime Minister, "Go it alone" and her citizens will go to the uttermost limit in her defence.

Oral Evidence

A GROUP OF EUROPEAN ELECTORS OF CASHEL AREA

H. G. Holland Ramsey
J. Wright
T. G. Brent
M. Coetzee

Mr. Wright said that at the outset they thought that Federation was a good thing and that it could be made to work; but it would seem now that those who were against it might have been right. Nevertheless, they thought it should be made to work and without force. His group felt that the Africans in the north were encouraged by the attitude of the British Government who were prepared to negotiate with law breakers who led them to think that they could get anything they wanted. With Cyprus in mind they thought that the Africans were probably right. At present the nationalist outlook in the north made Federation impossible, and they were very perturbed at the attitude of the British Government. They were concerned to preserve Southern Rhodesia and felt that if they were left alone they would be able to continue in their campaign to bring all races to look on themselves as Rhodesians.

Mr. Wright recapitulated the historical facts set out in his memorandum and quoted Rhodes's dictum of equal rights for all civilised men. In their view this meant that the Africans would be accepted on a common franchise when they rose to the common level but they would not be acceptable as rabble. The leaders in Southern Rhodesia were trying to give the Africans a pride in ownership (e.g. land in the African reserves). They were also trying to give as much training as the country could afford, and they honestly believed that they were trying to make partnership work. They were, however, laughed and jeered at by people overseas, and as they had told the two Prime Ministers they would brook no more interference nor would they ever agree to their country being handed over to a rabble.

Asked whether an extension of the franchise which would satisfy northern aspirations would be acceptable to Southern Rhodesia, Mr. Wright thought that if the concessions were merited, i.e. the franchise extended on a limited basis to the people worthy of the vote, such as police, busmen, etc., it would be acceptable. As Africans showed more responsibility so they would become acceptable.

Mr. Wright said his group could not see how the British Government could hand over to the Federation states which were protected states. Mr. Wright was asked how far the developments in the north and also the disturbances in South Africa affected Africans in Southern Rhodesia. He thought they were content at present, but they would not continue to be so if the Government allowed self-seekers to stir up trouble. He thought that Southern Rhodesia's police methods were civilised and right. Many concessions had been made and it was admitted that certain legislation was out of date, such as the requirement of passes. As the African became civilised, restrictions must fall away. There were already quite a number on the electoral roll (e.g. store keepers) but generally they were not interested. He quoted one African as saying "If I come on the voters roll I shall be caught for income tax". In reply to questions, Mr. Wright said his group would agree in principle to a different form of association, e.g. economic, if the Governments in the north had African majorities. But it would be necessary to see that there was a fair deal for all and not only for Africans.

With regard to the Land Husbandry Act, Mr. Wright was not prepared to say how he viewed it, but he thought that the Land Preservation Act should be observed. In Native Areas the land had been made to carry more families than it could bear, and he thought that it was better to share it out between a smaller number, allow the Africans to own the land and enable them to leave it to their children. He did not agree that there were complaints about absentee European landowners. He thought the African had benefited by the European occupation of the land. Previously rule had been by the strong, but under the European the Africans had increased in numbers and now occupied almost as much land as the Europeans. Asked whether he thought it was right that 8 million acres should be set aside for Europeans if there was a shortage of land for Africans, Mr. Wright replied that if an African had the money and right to purchase land he should be allowed to do so.

In conclusion, Mr. Wright asked the Commission to impress on the British Government that Southern Rhodesia did not want interference, and was in deadly earnest when she said she was not going to put up with more interference.

27TH APRIL 1960

Memorandum (i)

CAPTAIN E. PLEWMAN DE KOCK

As suggested to me by Sir Roy Welensky I beg to submit my views to you, this Memo will give the outlines of what I hope to tell you.

I arrived in Southern Rhodesia in 1904 and with my wife, her companion and baby son trekked out from Headlands deep into M'Tokos and came in contact with a number of the Africans. They were then quite uncivilised, wore brief skins around their waists, made small gardens which the women hoed with small locally made hoes, the men did very little work except an occasional hunt, had savage ceremonies and did not even know the value of money. Their only means of barter were salt and calico. They had very strict laws about stealing, murder etc. but these only applied to within their own tribe. Outside the tribal areas stealing, etc., was considered a virtue. I have lived in fairly close contact with the Africans and am able to see that the few better class ones are wishful to better themselves after contact with us.

The tribes were jealous of each other and were constantly, one might almost say continually, at war with their neighbours. At times it was dangerous for one or two of a tribe to stray across the boundary which was usually a small river or range of hills. These conditions were gradually made better by us especially by the Land Apportionment Act that has been in existence for some time which decided many land disputes. The Mashonas particularly had no freedom, they were continually in dread of raids by the Matabele. This however the Government soon stopped and the Africans enjoy a freedom today which was quite unknown before the Europeans arrived.

About a year ago I was at Magui on the Zambesi River, this is a Portuguese commanders post. The commander drew my attention to a large island just opposite our fishing camp and told me that it was the marshalling ground of the slave traders only two generations ago where the most appalling cruelties were enacted against the poor helpless captives in their yokes. He related how the slavers whipped the bare bodies of the slaves, and how the babies were snatched from the mothers and thrown into the mouths of the waiting crocodiles. This of course has ceased, and I watched laughing natives gliding past in their canoes happy in the freedom won for them by the so much maligned "Colonial Powers".

When the recent emergency troubles were on, my son was employing more than 100 labourers, nearly half of whom came from Nyasaland. I spoke to many of them, separately and in groups and asked them if they wanted the whites to leave the country, without exception every one, whether from Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia or Nyasaland emphatically shouted "no, no, no", and stated that if we did all the improvements and civilization we had brought in would immediately disappear, civil war would, as before, break out between the nations and even between tribes and in a very short time they would revert back to barbarism.

In 1932 I published an article "Quo Vadis Rhodesia?" and followed it with a Native Policy "Parallel Development". This Policy was adopted by the United Party and was implemented until the delegates went to the United Kingdom to form Federation when the British Government insisted that Partnership should take its place.

This Parallel Development Policy was readily accepted by the Africans and Europeans and the Africans were steadily advancing in civilization and I feel sure that I am right in saying Southern Rhodesian Africans were the happiest and most contented people of any race in Africa.

But unfortunately recently I have noticed a decided deterioration in the Africans' attitude to us. Even our old retainers of 20 years and more steady work and close contact with us show a different attitude towards us. Some of the older Africans we have spoken to—my son and my grandson who work with them are fluent in all the local vernaculars—have been told that this change is largely owing to a deal of underground propaganda and so called "Freedom" talk which is going on in the Reserves. This talk they said they did not like. I asked if there were white men at work, and they replied they had not actually seen white strangers but had heard that there were some and had heard their words quoted.

Also I regret to say that I think that the Press has had quite a bit to do with the unrest, matters in dispute are in places exaggerated by flaring headlines which are sometimes quite different to the substance of the news.

In conclusion I would like to say that speaking from my 83 years of life in Southern Africa I unhesitatingly say that our former policy in advancing the African on parallel lines with the whites proved to be a better policy than the present one of Partnership and must express the wish that we in the Federation be left to work out our own salvation without interference from overseas.

Memorandum (ii)

CAPTAIN E. PLEWMAN DE KOCK

Following on my memorandum handed to the Federal Prime Minister's Office on 1st February for forwarding to you, Sir Roy Welensky suggested that I write the remainder of the evidence I proposed to give you orally, this I beg to submit.

I wish to emphasise how much the European had done for the African since his arrival in 1890. In 1901 the African population of Southern Rhodesia was estimated to be half a million. By 1957 it had increased to 2,282,823, a noteworthy indication of the benefits the European brought to this country. This enormous increase was largely owing to (a) the cessation of tribal wars which, before we came, were a constant source of death by assegai or club, (b) the relief of famine and (c) the institution of health services by the Government.

The Native Commissioners appointed by the Government did a splendid piece of work. They were not only administrators but had to be something of a teacher, agriculturalist, welfare officer, and in fact were the guides, philosophers and friends of the Africans. I have known many of the Native Commissioners over the last 56 years, seen them at work, and always found they were very highly esteemed by the Africans who look upon most of them as their Fathers.

At the time of the arrival of the Europeans in 1890, the Africans were grouped in small, isolated tribal areas but there were vast tracts of uninhabited land. At the request of the Africans certain areas were assigned to them in 1902. The Africans preferred, and asked for, the lighter sand veld areas, as their tools at that time were not able to work the heavier soils.

The raw indigenes were given education, at first largely by the missions, but later by the Government. In 1901 there were three Government aided schools with 265 pupils. This rapidly increased until in 1958 there were 2,741 Government aided schools with 432,000 pupils. A notable increase.

The health of the Africans has been well provided for as is proved by the enormous increase in population.

In agriculture the Africans have been excellently advanced. The old, wasteful and bad husbandry methods of the African is rapidly being replaced by sound, modern methods with excellent results; in place of periodic famines the Africans are now actually producing surplus produce in increasingly large amounts. This is shown very clearly in the enormous increase in the African-owned cattle. In 1901 Africans owned 43,926 head, in 1958 this had increased to over 2,000,000, or in 1901 approximately one head to every 10 Africans and now very nearly one for each African.

All this advance the Africans should be very grateful for, a few are, but unfortunately gratitude is a quite unknown quality in most aborigines.

Since our arrival the Africans have enjoyed a freedom which was quite unknown to them formerly. This is acknowledged by all whom I have questioned but, now, a few ambitious men amongst the Africans who had been educated by us, are rousing up the masses to clamour for 'freedom'. They demand one vote, one man, which, of course, includes women. This is directly contrary to their nature and customs. The women were never consulted in any matter, and even now women are still considered inferior.

I consider that a very large majority of the Africans in the Federation are totally unfit to consider intelligently any high political matter, and will be so for a considerable time to come.

Further I consider it advisable that the Franchise should be made so that only people of education, experience and intelligence should be able to be enrolled. I suggest that to obtain this the Franchise be altered to:—

- Basic 1. Education, passing the Cambridge or equivalent examination.
2. Twenty-one years of age.
3. Continuing study in a recognised school or college in which case no income will be necessary. If not continuing studies an income of not less than £250 per annum or ownership of immovable property valued at £1500.

These qualifications will entitle to one vote.

A second vote. When candidate gets a University degree, or becomes a solicitor, a commission in the forces or police, managership of a bank or similar institution, or a teacher in secondary schools, or an official of any church, professors, doctors, heads of departments, M.P.s inventors and others of like calibre, or running a big concern or any other way where the candidate shows intelligence and responsibility.

A third vote the achievement vote, or personal income of say £5000 a year for at least one year before an election, that is heads of big businesses or such like. Cabinet Ministers.

A fourth vote for people who have shown exceptional ability and wisdom such as Prime Ministers, General Managers of Banks, Heads of large concerns, and so on.

A fifth vote. This vote would be entirely the gift of the Sovereign for something extraordinarily beneficial to the country such as Her Majesty gives the P.C. (Privy Councillor) for.

A permanent Board would have to be appointed to assess numbers of votes for each applicant.

This Franchise will make sure that only people of intelligence, capable of understanding the problems of Government and with some experience of authority will be able to obtain to positions of authority in the Government, and thus ensure that the people will have a capable Government.

Oral Evidence

CAPTAIN PLEWMAN DE KOCK

Captain Plewman de Kock had submitted two memoranda:

He said that he had been a long time in the country, and all the time in close contact with Africans, whom he was accustomed to call natives. He had always had decent dealings with them. From the beginning the Europeans had thought of advancing them, including training in government. This had given rise to the parallel pyramid policy of the Reform Party, which although short-lived, had been the father of the United Federal Party. Then had come the talks about Federation, and the Europeans had been forced to take "partnership" instead of the former policy. It was however perhaps only a question of name. The Africans in Southern Rhodesia had been the best satisfied, better than anywhere else. He himself had 100 or more working for him, all from different tribes. They had no wish for a change of any kind.

Development could be illustrated by the census of cattle. The Africans had only had 43,926 cattle in 1901. But the last census had shown that there was one head of cattle to every man, woman and child of the native population. This alone showed how the Europeans had assisted the development.

Then there was agriculture. Formerly the Africans had cultivated by burning and only the women had worked. Up to a few years ago the Government had had to send out loads of food every other year to help the Africans; but there had not been any famine now for some years. Now there was even an export trade from the African agricultural production. In the field of advancement there was the special problem of the women. The ordinary African had throughout the whole of Africa always looked down on women. The Africans had no word for "vote" in their own language: they had been used to doing what they were told by their Chiefs. Now they were asking for adult suffrage. This was a new departure. But all these Africans were saying at the same time that they did not want women to have the vote.

There was a cry for freedom. But freedom from what? He had made enquiries from the oldest Africans. They had spoken of the great freedom which the European occupation had brought to them. In the past they had often been unable to move even two miles from their huts for fear of being murdered. Now they had been freed from that fear of sudden death. They were still not freed from superstition, but the Europeans were trying to eradicate that.

He considered that the majority of Africans in the Federation were totally unable to consider any high political matter, and would remain in that state for some time to come. He certainly did not want "one man, one vote", and he referred to the last paragraph of his second memorandum of the 22nd March, 1960. He wished strongly to emphasise the views there expressed.

He then drew favourable attention to the Central African Examiner, Vol. III of 9th April, page 18—"Favourite fallacies about Central Africa" written by an American Professor of Yale University who had been five months in the Federation.

He hoped that the Commission would consider his suggestions for a multiple vote set out in his second memorandum. He agreed that it would be a complicated business. People would have to be passed for the vote by Boards. One reason for this suggestion was that he did not like the people who made the assessments for the present franchise qualifications—why, for example, should a postmaster have the vote?

In answer to questions, Captain de Kock made the following additional points:—

- (1) On the question as to how the permanent Boards were to be appointed he thought that they should clearly not have any politicians, or at least not any professional politicians. There might be two judges, since they were supposed to be divorced from politics. But he agreed that the work would take up a lot of time. Members of the Boards would have to be residents of the Federation, people who knew something about the country.
- (2) With reference to his second memorandum, the Africans had formerly been contented and happy. He had noticed a change about two or three years before the recent emergency. This change had been gradual and not sudden. He remembered discussing it with Lord Malvern while he was still Prime Minister.

Memorandum

J. B. CHARTERS and H. S. DUNKLEY

submitting the evidence of a group of Farmers residing in the Gatooma District of Southern Rhodesia*

The following evidence is given under two headings:—

1. General principles which affect the country as a whole.
2. Evidence pertaining to the Farming community particularly.

1. How we believe the Federation can best be made to work to the benefit of all the people

1. We consider the most important principle to achieve this end is to raise the standard of living of the people of the Federation, to enable them to have proper homes, food and security.

2. To achieve this we believe it is of paramount importance to secure as much investment capital as is possible to provide work for all the people.

3. Sufficient capital, we believe, will only be forthcoming if the political future of the country becomes more stable and to ensure this we consider the following points are most vital:

- (a) The European in the Federation must be certain that his future is secure.
 - (b) The African must be sure that he will be given a fair share of the wealth of the Federation and that he will be given equal opportunity according to his merits.
 - (c) The people of the Federation must be allowed to administer their country themselves and be completely free from interference from overseas. When necessary the Government must be able to restrict extremism within the country.
4. We believe that only by retaining European leadership within the Federation for the foreseeable future can economic development be maintained and increased, and that in this way only can the future of the Federation within the Commonwealth remain assured.

5. The economy of the Federation cannot be changed overnight. Geographically we are badly placed for exports and imports due to long rail hauls and alien ports. Our labour force is as yet unskilled and illiterate. In the light of this and the recent background of primitive Africa we consider our progress compares favourably with any other African state.

6. Constitutional development on the lines now proposed for Kenya would be quite unacceptable to the European in the Federation. We therefore consider political advancement of the African in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland should progress only as fast as circumstances warrant. Standards of the franchise should not be lowered so that the Government will remain permanently in civilised hands.

II. Evidence pertaining to the Farming Community

1. Since the European began farming in this country, great progress has been made in developing a sound agricultural system which we consider is vital to the development and economy of the country. This progress must continue and increase. European agriculture is still developing and contributes most of the food required within the Federation and in addition provides very valuable exports.

2. Today this progress in European agriculture can be measured by the land taken up by ex-service men and others after the last war. In the majority of cases this land was then arid bush which was completely unpopulated. Now this land has been converted into developed farming units, well watered and producing maize, tobacco, cattle and many other agricultural products, necessary to the well-being of the country.

3. This progress was made possible by the knowledge, energy, courage and capital of the European Farmer.

4. The majority of farm labourers have little or no education or skill. To achieve a satisfactory standard of work the African requires constant European supervision. In spite of this the understanding between the European employer and African Employee has improved tremendously. As agriculture has progressed European farmers have done more and more for their African employees. For example, many established farmers have built schools, churches and permanent homes for the benefit of their labour force. They also allot land, plough it and give them seed so that they may augment their diet.

5. Many of our farm labourers from Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland who enter Southern Rhodesia on a two year permit, send for their wives and families and have their permit extended to enable them to remain with their employers.

6. The farmer perhaps more than any other feels the need for security, having put all his capital and human endeavour into his land. He has built for the future in the firm belief that this is his home and the home of his children.

7. Should the franchise qualifications be lowered this feeling of security which the European farmer has had in the past would immediately disappear. He would stop all capital expenditure and at the first opportunity leave the country. This would result in the unemployment of thousands of Africans and would lead to chaos in the agricultural industry. It is very doubtful if sufficient food could then be produced for the country's needs and agricultural exports would cease.

8. In the light of this we consider that the Government of this Federation must remain in the control of the European for the foreseeable future.

* The views expressed in the above memorandum are stated to be unassociated with those of the National Farmers' Union of Southern Rhodesia.

Oral Evidence

J. B. CHARTERS and H. S. DUNKLEY

The witnesses stated that their memorandum had been approved by a committee of about six farmers of the district, but did not necessarily represent the views of the National Farmers' Union. They had obtained 72 signatures of farmers to the memorandum.

The major problem of the Federation and of Africa generally was that of poverty, and the main task was to eliminate it. To achieve that end it was necessary to have more capital; and therefore investors must feel secure. Farmers must feel that they could trust their African farm managers. It was thus necessary to have political stability. To achieve this it would be necessary to stop interference from overseas. They could not have the African nationalists running perpetually to the United Kingdom. They should go to the Government of their own country. After all, they had representation in the Federal Government. In Southern Rhodesia they thought there was an opportunity for two Africans to be elected at the next election to Parliament. The Africans now had quite a number of voters, both on the ordinary roll and on the special roll. The two African representatives mentioned were likely to come from Harari (Salisbury) and Bulawayo. Gwelo might also get one such representative. They did not suggest the reservation of seats for Africans in Parliament, because that only brought in racial policy. They would indeed abolish the seats reserved for Africans in the Federal Assembly ultimately, but not yet; only later when more African representation had developed. By that time, the Rhodesians would be managing their own affairs, and the Africans would be looking to their own Government, and in that way understanding between Africans and Europeans would improve. It had been improving before the overseas interference began. There had then been a chance of them becoming proper partners.

In reply to questions, the witnesses made the following further points:—

(1) The attitude of Europeans to Africans had without question improved in the last few years: the Europeans were realising that the African must be accepted as a man, and not merely as a servant. But they would not advocate a faster rate of eliminating the colour bar. The process should come naturally, and had in fact been coming in that way. To break down all barriers at once would only shake the confidence of the Europeans, and might even force them to ally themselves with South Africa. They believed in evolution and not in legislation. It was necessary to raise the standards of living of the Africans in the fields of hygiene, housing and nutrition. That was the real problem of Central Africa. Considering the age of Southern Rhodesia it had in fact moved forward fast since the original occupation. In some ways the African had hardly developed at all, though in others his advancement was noticeable.

(2) Questioned on the Land Apportionment Act, they thought there should be areas allotted for Africans in the European towns so as to create a more stable people with a stake in the country. But at present the two races should remain largely apart. It was also necessary to bear in mind that if the present government remained in power, all would be well; but if you let in another Party that would only put African advancement back again.

(3) It was also important that the Europeans had accepted Federation on the basis of partnership. That indicated their generally liberal attitude. There were certainly different interpretations of partnership, but nevertheless it was an ideal. For themselves, they thought that it should be interpreted as "co-operation" rather than as "equality".

(4) They had advocated revision of the pass laws, preferably through review by a Parliamentary Commission. Certainly some passes should be abolished, such as week-end passes. There should also be the same documents of identification for black and white, without discrimination. There should certainly be no objection to everyone carrying identity cards.

(5) Reference was made to point (c) in the third paragraph of their memorandum. The reference in the last sentence was to extremists on both sides: it was essential for government to retain control so as to stop extremism, that is to say the actions of people who might be undermining law and order, whether Europeans or Africans, and generally behaving in a subversive manner. The government had been successful in doing this so far, but they must keep necessary authority. For this reason they advocated the formation of a Federal Police Force as soon as possible. In this connection, they referred to the intimidation by the Police Force in the northern Territories, giving the example of the Nyasaland policeman who had invited the crowd to kill Mr. Matinga. The standards of the Police tended to be lower in the northern Territories. Such a thing could not have happened with a Federal Police Force with the same standards as the Police in Southern Rhodesia.

(6) With reference to the fourth paragraph of the memorandum—by the "foreseeable future" they meant the immediate future. They considered the Europeans by virtue of their record and qualities of leadership were the only people who should have a majority in the Government. Universal franchise would put government into the hands of irresponsible people. They could not see the possibility of a non-European government.

(7) Sixth paragraph of the memorandum—political advancement in the three Territories of the Federation should be kept in line with one another, and that meant that government should not lower the franchise in the northern Territories. Voting qualifications should stay as they were at present until they could be lowered at the same time together in all three Territories.

(8) The witnesses thought that twenty years would be the length of time needed for African governments in the northern Territories to emerge. Questioned as to their reaction if there were to be such a government in Northern Rhodesia in two or three years' time they said that they would have no objection to it provided it was ready to co-operate with the Federation.

(9) It was the policy of the United Federal Party to bring Africans into public affairs. Questioned as to giving the Africans power to demonstrate that they could take responsibility, they referred to the representation of Africans in the municipalities, and considered that it was a sound scheme to bring Africans into municipal government. It was necessary for the African areas to be represented in the municipalities. They understood that Africans were approaching the stage when they would enter the central Government. In Southern Rhodesia they thought there would be an opportunity for Africans in the next Parliament. They also understood that there was no bar to the advancement of Africans in the civil service in Southern Rhodesia. As to the African rural areas, they saw no reason why Land Development Officers should not eventually be Africans developing out of the present African Demonstrators.

(10) They definitely favoured the concept of Federation even if there were advanced constitutions in the northern Territories. This was because of the economic advantages. They felt that the opposition to Federation in Nyasaland could be overcome by goodwill. That could only be achieved by leaving the administration of the Federation to the people on the spot. They had a good record and a good leadership. The Africans in Nyasaland ought to realise that they had nothing to lose, and everything to gain by Federation. The biggest obstacle to be got rid of was control from the United Kingdom. It would be foolish for the British Government to hand over control to Africans at the present stage. The status quo should remain until sufficient Africans were trained for government.

(11) They agreed however that an increasing say should be given to Africans up till the time when they had an African Government (viz. in the Northern Territories). But at the same time they should be encouraged more and more to look to the Federal Government. It might then be possible to agree on a common policy. They agreed that this was a difficult problem.

(12) They thought it would be consonant with the 'partnership' idea to amalgamate the whole of agriculture under the Federal Government. After all, both European and African farmers suffered from similar difficulties, common surpluses, and common deficiencies. There should be one single body to direct agriculture. In Southern Rhodesia the Africans were already depending on the European Farmers' Union for assistance. There could eventually be a combined European and African Union representing the whole industry. It would of course be necessary for Africans to come in of their own free will. They agreed that it had not yet been possible to bring in the European farmers in Nyasaland.

(13) They were asked to consider a system on which marketing and price fixing would be co-ordinated Federally, but the expansion services would be Territorial. They thought that in that case a staff problem would arise. Their own view would be that expansion services ought to be managed Federally, including conservation and all related matters. They did however realise the existence of the feeling against this in the north. Such feeling they thought was caused through fear and would vanish with better understanding.

(14) In Southern Rhodesia there was the National Farmers' Union and the Tobacco Farmers' Union, and both were recognised for price negotiations. The African Farmers' Union had been recently recognised and a licensing system introduced. But there had not yet been recognition of the latter for consultation and negotiation on prices. They did however actually take part in such negotiations. It was desirable to have a merging of these Unions. There might be resistance at first; but farming was an ideal field for co-operation between the races. The National Farmers' Union already had some links with the African Union, and this was a beginning. It was in fact the policy of the National Farmers' Union.

Memorandum

A. J. LABUSCHAGNE

(A member of the Standing Committee of the United Federal Party in Southern Rhodesia)

Historical Background

1. Born during the Anglo-Boer War from Afrikaans parentage in the Western Transvaal, my father fought on the Republican side, was twice wounded and as consequence of this lost the use of both his arms. During the war his cattle and sheep were all taken by the passing British armies without a letter of credit. He had consequently no claim for compensation. The house with the furniture was burnt down.

2. On this scene of devastation, utter ruin and poverty I first cast my conscious eyes. The atmosphere was thick with racial prejudice and hatred; admittedly not too enviably surroundings for a child to form his first impressions of life!

3. But it was not long afterwards that those two great Leaders of their people Generals Botha and Smuts struck a new note of hope when they coined their political slogan: "Forgive and Forget" with which they launched their well-known policy of reconciliation which formed the corner stone of the political party they formed with the support of both European races who were a short while ago still at one another's throats. This I think was the first evidence of political partnership on African soil: and what magnificent fruits it bore until it was poisoned and paralysed by the introduction of sectional nationalism by power hungry politicians of lesser stature! Politicians who could only succeed in their aim if they direct their call on the inflammable emotional material of nationalism, racial prejudice, and hatred.

4. This being the background of my early political consciousness, I have taken up the cudgel in defence of the higher aspirations based on co-operation and goodwill of all races constituting the actual nation of the country. This approach is virtually where the conception of partnership starts. Admittedly for the Statesman or politician this is not an easy road to follow: there is no place here for emotional fire-wood such as nationalism or deep-rooted prejudices whether these be based on race or colour. But in a multi-racial state it is the only way to ensure that every racial group will feel itself a welcome constituent part of the whole. The progress of such individuals or groups will solely depend on our own merits and the contributions made to the whole nation: then there cannot justifiably develop feelings of suppression or frustration.

5. In the above introductory paragraph mention has been made of the danger of race and colour prejudices; and as these in fact constitute the greatest obstacle to my mind of the full implementation of the principle of partnership it may just as well be to get this boggy examined in its true historical perspective.

6. We then find to our dismay that it dates back further than the beginning of the Christian era when the Romans drew most of their slaves from North Africa. These slaves were black. After the fall of the Roman Empire the slave trade continued to flourish on for centuries right through the formation of the present national States of Western Europe. It furthermore continued to play a significant part in the maritime discoveries which ultimately developed into a real scramble for colonies amongst the western powers.

7. During all these long centuries the black man was totally uncultured and uncivilized according to western standards while, at the same time, he was the slave and the white man his master. This condition of inequality did not pass unnoticed and did not remain static either: but gradually the colour was associated with the difference of culture and social standing and the status of slave and master. This conception again developed into our common enemy, the colour prejudice. It developed through ages since the Roman Empire and continued to grow until long after the slave trade was abolished.

8. During this long time it shot strong roots into the sub-conscious mind of the white man and fear and mistrust in that of the black man.

9. We are today living in the transition period where the advanced black man enters the door of his emancipation and claims quite logically that his new status should be accepted. But however much the white man would like to cast off that age-old and deep-rooted prejudice like an old cloak, is it humanly possible to do it just like that? It is not. And any political party or constitutional policy that ignores the above historical setting and human element related to this problem, is doomed as a failure not only but would aggravate the position and thereby worsen it.

10. Wherein then lies the solution? I would say firstly by applying a positive programme of advancement for the African. His advancement must follow the three stages—economical, cultural and social. On his part of the game it will be his responsibility to convince the white man of his progress. On the other hand the white man will have to make an honest and positive endeavour to expel from his mind the traditional concept of colour prejudices as obsolete where he meets a black man with the same cultural standing.

11. To achieve this idealistic aim the problem will have to be applied by statesmen who know both sides of their people intimately so that the advancement of the one member of the body-politic could be considered as a positive advance of all members of that body.

12. In order to apply the above policy it is essential that independence should be granted not only on the Federal sphere but also progressively to the constituent parts of the Federation: with adequate precautions to safeguard the interests of minority groups and the political influence of the white population. Such safeguards to be considered temporary measures until such time as the African as a race has acquired the same standard of culture and civilisation as the white man. By then the present fly in the ointment viz. colour prejudice should be non-existent.

13. To attain this Utopia is quite within the reach of practical politics provided that

- (a) External i.e. overseas interference and criticisms which are mostly based on total lack of knowledge and fairness could be done away with by granting autonomy to the Federation as a whole.
- (b) All traces of racial nationalism be erased and the higher conception of patriotism for the common Alma Mater cultivated in the homes, at school and public gatherings.
- (c) All racial discriminatory laws including Statutory laws for the protection of the one or the other race should gradually be done away with as those who are now protected advance and become able to stand on their own legs.

14. In conclusion, I would like to add that, being a farmer who has invested his whole life's toil and savings in this country, I voice the feelings of the White farmers when I say that no community is more dependent on a solution that would ensure internal peace and security than the farming community. Their assets are immovable and therefore their roots embedded too deeply and firmly in our soil to contemplate "packing up" and seeking greater safety somewhere else. If pushed to that extent we would rather add our blood to the sweat that has already gone into the soil: this is one major aspect of the responsibilities that rest on the shoulders of the Advisory Commission to prevent such a calamity. We are on the cross-roads now and it will be either toward peace, prosperity and goodwill or back to barbarism, chaos and bloodshed.

15. I would also as a farmer like to point out to the Commission that the great civilisations of the past existed only as long as they were rooted in the soil and protected from the turmoils of wars, marauding hordes and revolutions.

16. I would much appreciate the opportunity to give oral evidence before the Commission.

Oral Evidence

A. J. LABUSCHAGNE

The witness said that he had drawn up his memorandum hastily in only 1½ days, and had sent it in at the last moment. He would like to state the axioms on which his theses were based.

He himself and many farmers were quite convinced that there was no such thing as an "awakening African nationalism" among most of the Africans. He and the other farmers were daily in contact with Africans on their farms. He excluded from this the urban Africans who had come under bad influences. But the rural Africans were certainly not conscious of an awakening nationalism. The rural African was for the most part satisfied to do his work. He was anxious to have his children sent to school and satisfied with the efforts of government for the education of his people.

As farmers, he and his friends felt that their African population had not yet got economically to the right stage. They would like to see better hygiene, housing and nutrition. But they could only increase wages by stages. Such increases were limited by what the Africans could take in a good spirit. They should use increased wages for better hygiene, food, clothing and the education of their children; but they had not yet arrived at this stage. The farmers knew that better conditions would make for more efficient labour, but this must start with the labourers themselves. Any increase of wages at present would only be spent on gambling, drinking and diseased women. This would be the position in 90% of the cases. He and his friends felt perturbed about this. Increased wages produced no response in efficiency.

There had been an emergence of partnership after intimidation had been curbed in the recent emergency through the arrest of the leaders. In Nyasaland, the United Federal Party lists had gone up from 200 to 1,200, and this was a voluntary response after intimidation had gone. In their hearts the Africans wanted full co-operation with the white men. If ever they could be protected from outside influences they would come to complete co-operation instead of nationalism, and to patriotism for Federation. He and his friends had faith in their African people. As a South African, Africans were his friends. There was no racialism between him and them, forming a wall of partition. He agreed that racial prejudice today ought to be exercised on the side of the whites. It was unfair, un-Christian and against everything to let that prejudice remain.

Advancement, emancipation, development—whatever it was called—must come from the Africans themselves. They must try their best to cause a spontaneous uplifting, to promote humane feelings, and raise their standards of culture. Only when the Africans had reached up to their level would it be possible for the whites to meet with them on that level. He was referring to such humane characteristics as faith in the future of the country, honesty and goodwill to others. It was also necessary for the Africans to improve upon their unhygienic habits. It would be a good service if the educated African few would go to their people not to agitate them politically but to tell them how to open their hearts and how to promote their own welfare. But this aspect was ignored by politicians whom he himself would only describe as agitators. They were simply agitating a simple, law-abiding community and making use of ignorant, primitive people for their own egoistic needs. European farmers felt perturbed about this. Whatever the future of the country was to be, African development should be in step with the growth of citizenship. The Africans must come to parity with the Europeans, otherwise there could be no peace or goodwill.

The two points made above had been the basis of his approach in his memorandum.

There was another thing about which he was perturbed, but also amused. It was the loose, unfounded criticism of Southern Rhodesia by politicians overseas and the overseas press. This criticism came from people who not very long ago had carried on a flourishing slave trade, or had solved their own colour problem by lynching. It was unfair of these people to talk of the position of the whites in Southern Rhodesia. They felt that they had acted entirely in accordance with British ideas of fair play. They had had to carry the financial burden for the uplifting of the African people. They had been proud to make this contribution.

In answer to questions, the witness made the following further points:—

(1) In the urban areas he agreed that there existed a feeling of awakening nationalism, but it had been instilled into those Africans by agitators.

(2) African advancement must come from the African himself, from the heart. The Churches could help too. Whereas the agitator leader was simply being disruptive the teachers, the Churches, and the real political leaders with spiritual goodwill should be able to promote the advancement of the community.

(3) Asked how this process of advancement could be assisted from outside, he replied that on the farms they had been trying to put out small feelers in that direction through a bonus system in order to increase standards of efficiency. This worked well, but it took time. The friends of an African who was involved in this system eventually get drawn into the vortex of efficiency. The government of the country was also helping this process through education and was bettering the physical standards of the Africans through excellent hospitals and free treatment in every direction. There was also the policy of assisting the housing of native labour by giving rebates on income-tax.

(4) All African children on his own farm went to school. Many farms in the outside district had subsidised schools on the farms themselves. But the teachers were still very backward. They were able to help in the early stages of education, but it was still not sufficient. He could not say whether increased teacher-training was yet having any effect.

(5) He had visited the northern Territories at various Congresses and had met and had discussions with Nyasaland Members of Parliament. He had found them satisfied in the sense that they saw that there was a lot more to be achieved in the uplifting of their people, but they saw that as much as possible was already being done.

(6) In paragraph 10 of his memorandum his statement that "His (African) advancement must follow the three stages, economical, cultural and social", had meant that those factors had to come before the political factor. Africans must first be able to feed their own families, and to cultivate feelings of self-pride. The care of the body came first, then the spirit would have fertile soil for its own development.

(7) It would never be possible to satisfy the real agitators. But as to the genuine African politicians the Europeans, and especially the farmers, would like to give them full scope to help any efforts to promote the economic and social life of the Africans. He had no objection to an African being a Member of Parliament or a Minister if he were acting with a spirit of good will. He would sincerely welcome Africans elected on the common roll to the Southern Rhodesian Parliament, but he would not like to see special representation of Africans there.

(8) He considered it a duty of this generation to wipe out distinctions based on colour, although it was necessary to keep in step with public opinion.

(9) He was 100% in favour of the present franchise qualifications. The reserved seats for Africans in the Federal Assembly were only a second best at the present stage. That was not really the best way to proceed; but it constituted a temporary bridge. He would not perhaps object therefore to some similar temporary bridge as regards the Southern Rhodesian Parliament.

(10) In paragraph 7 of his Memorandum he had referred to the master-servant relationship between Europeans and Africans. Europeans in Southern Rhodesia were becoming more able to accept Africans as their equals, although even now many were labouring under the colour prejudice. But a good number of Europeans, at least on the farming side, did not accept educated Africans so long as they did not behave as political agitators. Neither would they accept "educated agitators". Equally, he would decry Europeans, from South Africa who came to Southern Rhodesia to agitate the people on racial nationalistic lines. In fact, he decried racialists of whatever colour. He felt that in the Federation they could give an example to the world that people of different races could live together with mutual respect. He had seen a marked improvement in the attitude of Europeans, especially in the last five years.

Memorandum

J. H. BEATTIE

I arrived in South Africa in 1925, aged 17 years and worked as a farm assistant for £3 per month and keep, when I did all types of manual work alongside and together with Africans who earned the same amount of money.

I came to Rhodesia in December, 1927, and worked as a Farm Assistant for a salary of £5 per month and carried on the same type of work together with African farm labourers.

Having married in 1937 I took up farming on my own account and lost the little capital my wife and I had the first year. I started dealing in cattle and anything else to keep the wolf from the door. Commenced butchering in 1941.

Today I own four butchers shops and three farms. I employ 160 Africans and 20 Europeans monthly. With all this experience I maintain that I know the African slightly better than people who visit our country for short periods.

I, like most Europeans, did not come to this country to make what money I could and then leave the country. Southern Rhodesia is my home, my five children are all Rhodesians and very proud of it. As one who meets very many people in all walks of life I can state to this Commission without fear that I voice the opinion of 100 per cent of the European population of this district when I state we, as Europeans are not prepared at any time to serve under a black government. Today Southern Rhodesia, under white leadership has a record that no other young country in the world can exceed. Our development since occupation is phenomenal. I have found no need to enlarge on this point as reports by senior officials will give a factual survey of development in the Federation. This progress could not continue under an irresponsible black leadership.

Since the occupation of Southern Rhodesia, progress for the African people was at a pace in keeping with the country's earnings and that, we felt, as old hands, was at a speed in keeping with a gradual uplifting. One could say since the Suez episode, the speed of altering African advancement in Africa has been like a very dangerous runaway horse. We have every good reason to attach a lot of this mad overnight political advancement to the British Labour party, the Americans with their huge financial interests, the press, the Church of Scotland and other clergy. Political advancement should not come before health, full employment, food for all and good housing. Your Commission cannot help but be impressed with what has been done for the African in Southern Rhodesia and which can, at the same steady pace, be improved upon.

Our Land Apportionment Act is the greatest security that the African has with regard to his land. This Commission must have seen the tremendous advancement in conservation work carried out in the reserves. The African can now own his piece of land which he can even sell. He can even own up to a maximum of three plots and none of his land can be attached for debt.

The tremendous strides in secondary industries is creating more employment all the time for our African people. In many industries the Africans remuneration is low but this huge question is most delicate and complicated for the reason that his output is low, he keeps moving from one occupation to another, he is inexperienced and he cannot hold down responsible positions through his lack of ability. Our industries could not hope to compete with other countries such as India, Japan or China if wages were suddenly doubled. This would create unemployment. I maintain that it is better to give full employment to all with a bare living wage than have unemployment and good conditions for only a few. The busy African makes a happy African.

Most sensible white people want to see the African advance and attain the same living standards of the European. On the other hand the European standard of living (which is only similar to that in Britain) must not be lowered.

In our constitution it states that "Whereas the said Colony and Territories are the rightful home of all lawful inhabitants thereof whatever their origin". Today, in the northern Territories the African Nationalists make it clearer each day that they do not believe in this. Mr. McLeod's deeds to date, lead to distrust and we all feel very strongly in regard to certain statements by him to Dr. Banda. It is clear that Mr. McLeod has not been fair to the Commission in acting in this way during the hearing of evidence by the Commission.

I voted for Federation because I, like many more who voted for Federation, felt that Southern Rhodesia with its great record and home ties to Britain and above all, allegiance to the Crown, would go forward as one grand country. We knew that if Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia were not incorporated in one Federation they might go Communist. In 1958 Dr. Banda stated "if communism will take me out of the Federation then I will have it". It is quite true that Dr. Banda wishes to break up the Federation as do the Political demagogues in Northern Rhodesia. We all understand that the function of this Commission is not to destroy Federation, far from it, but to advise us on how the Federation can best go forward. Dr. Banda has now been released and on returning to Blantyre on April 1st, stated to his people "if you listen to me you will soon have your own Government". Dr. Banda was imprisoned for one year, due, we understand for the safety and security of Nyasaland, yet Mr. McLeod has encouraged a man who has made it quite clear of his intentions.

I hope that this Commission, in its deliberations and findings will be able to satisfy all those who have a say in our future.

In view of my long standing as a farmer and employer and having worked in the early days together with the Africans, I feel that I am in a position to answer any questions this Commission may wish to put to me.

Oral Evidence

J. H. BEATTIE

The witness had submitted a memorandum. He said the most important thing of all was that Europeans were not prepared to be under a black government because the Africans did not trust one another. In Southern Rhodesia the record of African progress was outstanding. If an African Government came into power there would be retrogression, especially in farming, and people would leave the land and go to other countries.

He felt the African should have representation in the Southern Rhodesian Parliament and that it should be made clear to him what that representation would be. In his opinion it should be up to one-third representation. There should also be representation for Africans on Municipal Boards, particularly with regard to housing. As an employer of African labour, Mr. Beattie was interested in the housing position: he had found that married Africans would stay with him for longer than they used to, if a house was available for them. He wanted to show them that people in Southern Rhodesia intended to carry on a responsible government, led by Europeans but helped by Africans. This would be in the best interests of the country.

In answer to questions, Mr. Beattie made the following additional points:—

(1) It was obvious that Nyasaland would soon have a black government, and the same might be true of Northern Rhodesia in time. Eleven seats in Nyasaland and nineteen in Northern Rhodesia, as compared with twenty-nine in Southern Rhodesia, would lead to an African majority in the Federal House. That was the main fear of many white Southern Rhodesians.

(2) Mr. Beattie had voted for Federation, despite being very much against it, because he felt that the three Territories all showing a proper allegiance to the Crown, should go forward together as a reasonably sized Colony.

(3) Referring to his suggestion of a one-third African representation in the Southern Rhodesian Parliament, the witness said it was very wrong to promise Africans something without fulfilling the promise. Europeans must be fair and straight with the Africans. Therefore, he strongly advocated telling them that they would get a maximum of one-third representation when they were ready for it: he considered they were ready for it now in Southern Rhodesia. In the Federal House the proportion should ultimately be 51% Europeans and 49% Africans. This was in the Africans' interests.

(4) Referring to the franchise, Mr. Beattie said if the qualifications were lowered and more Africans had a vote, a lot of them would not have the faintest idea of what they were voting for. He did not think the cry of African political leaders in the north for "one man, one vote" would matter if it was made clear that the maximum African representation in the Federal House would be 49%.

(5) Enlarging on the one-third Territorial representation, the witness said that assuming Southern Rhodesia was divided into thirty constituencies ten would be African and twenty European. In those constituencies everybody would vote, black or white. He would retain the literacy qualifications for the franchise but abolish the money qualification.

(6) He wanted to see Federation kept, as a broad principle, and to see it going ahead and remaining part of the British Commonwealth, but emphasised that Southern Rhodesia was prepared to "go it alone" rather than be involved with the black north. He said he would not mind Nyasaland having their own black government. The position in Northern Rhodesia was rather different because of its bigger European population. He thought that Africans would still vote for Europeans for many years to come.

(7) He referred to the big Afrikaner community in Southern Rhodesia, and said they made excellent settlers. So long as they were good citizens the Rhodesians wanted them to stay. It was sometimes difficult to convince them of the need for African progress, but a lot of them were coming round and were not unreasonable in that respect. There had been an unbelievable change on the part of white people, including Afrikaners, towards Africans at all levels. Most Africans had responded to it, but there was still a certain element which did not. Therefore, unless the Europeans were protected as he had suggested, they would rather break away from the Federation. He stressed that the government should be retained in the hands of people who were capable of governing.

(8) Mr. Beattie said that in his experience racialism in Southern Rhodesia was gradually dying. He felt sure that neither black people nor white people wished to be completely integrated with each other; but so long as both sides met with good will at all levels and respected one another, racialism must and would die out.

(9) There was no doubt that the time must come, even though not immediately, when any respectable African would be allowed to stay at a hotel or attend places of entertainment, things which he was not at present allowed to do.

Memorandum

J. W. A. WIXLEY

I was born in England and came to Southern Rhodesia in 1935—twenty-five years ago. Apart from short periods elsewhere I have lived in Gatooma for over twenty years, married a Rhodesian girl, daughter of a pioneer, and have four children, three boys and a girl.

Due to insufficient knowledge of procedure, it is possible that this Commission has not heard enough views of the ordinary man (or average). I hold no extreme views—Englishmen do not change from the ideals of British fair play and justice when immigrating from England to Africa.

I am in business here as a chemist and optician, I have served as a councillor and Mayor of this town and I am now an Alderman.

My contacts with the African have, on the whole, whether in business at home or elsewhere, been reasonable and satisfactory. In the daily routine of business or leisure there are dozens of Africans I know, whom I meet and greet happily. The Africans I work with in business I respect and like. In fact apart from socially my relations with Africans are the same as with Europeans.

Segregation is a legalised form of living that is the natural interpretation of what the black and white man wants.

I am convinced that the natural course of evolution has been hastened far too much in recent years to nobody's real benefit. If partnership between the races is to evolve let it happen naturally. The African is far more interested in economic advancement than social equality. Education and schooling should concentrate on hygiene all health matters, and technical subjects. Basic knowledge such as this leads to incentive and sense of responsibility, two essentials nearly always lacking in the African. Automatically better living standards will then emerge, and that is one of my most earnest hopes.

The African can then obviously take a bigger part in the life of the community. He will then have achieved a social background.

Eventually social barriers will not be based on race but educational, business and moral standards. The European here must not expect the colour of his skin to be the standard.

I came here as an Englishman, have four children who are proud to call themselves Rhodesians, and if you ask me what I am now, I am a Rhodesian.

Oral Evidence

J. W. A. WIXLEY

The witness submitted a short memorandum which he read.

He stated that his views were purely personal, and that he had kept right out of politics.

In answer to questions he made the following points:—

(1) He would leave the franchise as it was at present.
(2) He was in favour of Federation and of its continuation on the present lines, as things were today. His attitude would alter if the two northern Territories attained black governments. If that happened the only possible solution would be for Southern Rhodesia to leave the Federation.

(3) A black government would ultimately be inevitable but the longer the time that elapsed before that happened the better it would be for everyone. As long as it was allowed to evolve naturally it would be all right; but no good could come from interference and encouragement from outside sources to hasten the process: it had already been hastened too much. He did not think that it would take less than 25 years, and 10 years would certainly not be sufficient.

(4) He was satisfied with Federation as it was. He felt that the Federation should be given the right to make its own decisions in the future. Also unless Southern Rhodesia had some say as to the political future of the two northern Territories and as to when they should be in a position to have black governments, the country could not be tied to Federation for ever. There should be no constitutional changes in the northern Territories without the consent of the Federal Government. The Federal Government should have the last word as to when a black government came into power: the decision should not depend upon what political party was in power in Britain.

(5) There was a natural segregation at present which, in his view, was the wish of both black and white. As regards Africans being allowed to attend places of entertainment from which they were at present excluded, he said those who had attained some measure of civilisation represented about 0.1%. The majority of Africans who would agitate about segregation were those who had attained a veneer of civilisation and were trying to cause unrest in the country. He felt that the majority of the non-vocal Africans, decent and hard working, did not really wish to be with Europeans socially. He considered the Africans were already equal with Europeans from every point of view, except socially. He did not approve of opening doors to them yet because although a small proportion of them were ready for it, the majority were not. Hygiene and social habits were the chief bar, not colour. He had no objection to meeting the aspirations of the few in this regard, and it was possible that the solution might lie on the economic level as regards deciding who could or could not go to a certain place. He had no objection to the experiment being tried, and suggested that a beginning might be made with cinemas and places of entertainment rather than hotels and swimming baths. Legislation was not a good thing; he would prefer to see these things come naturally. He was as keen as anyone else that the economic standards of the African should improve.

(6) The witness pointed out that agitation, as such, did not exist in Southern Rhodesia in the same form as it appeared to exist in the two northern Territories, where the Africans were said to have far greater freedom. This was possibly because of better housing and better conditions generally, including economic conditions, in Southern Rhodesia.

(7) Finally in view of the unfortunate political agitation taking place in the two northern Territories, it seemed that it would be better for Southern Rhodesia to "go it alone", but it would be a great pity, because the Federation could have acted as a buffer State. It looked as if Southern Rhodesia would have to be the buffer State.

H. J. NICHOLLS

The witness said he was a dental surgeon with nine years residence in the Federation. He was not a member of any political party and had simply come to put his personal view.

He was not happy about the Federation as it was at present progressing. The original intention, according to the referendum about 7 or 8 years ago, had been that Europeans for the foreseeable future would have control of the Government, not because they were white but because they had the ability to govern.

Latterly the British Government appeared to have taken the view that there could be no independence for the Federation until the majority of the inhabitants desired it. It seemed to him that the African population in the northern Territories would be against any change at present; but when they were able to express their views they would probably vote for independence. Therefore, any development of the Federation would be hamstrung from the beginning.

Northern Rhodesia, and even more probably, Nyasaland, would presumably get an African Government within a very short time. If those Governments were given proportional representation in the Federal Government—as they would no doubt wish to have—they would dominate the Government of Southern Rhodesia. It was quite right that ultimately Europeans must accept that there would be complete integration and an African Government when the Africans were educated enough to reach parity with the Europeans, but until that time arrived the control must be retained in responsible hands, and this meant European hands.

It was untenable for the British Government to say that they were unwilling to allow Europeans in this country to take over entire responsibility for the African population, and at the same time to hand over government in various other countries to untried African governments. The Europeans in Southern Rhodesia were in every way as responsible as those in England. Furthermore they regarded the country as theirs, just as much as the Africans'. The African was wrong in thinking that just because he was born in this country he automatically owned a part of it. The witness himself had been born in England and did not automatically think that he owned a plot of land there.

In Southern Rhodesia the African population was far more numerous than the European: the African had increased in numbers because Europeans had made conditions favourable for them. A great deal had been done for them, especially on the medical side and with regard to food. Progress had been slow for the majority of Africans; but the Europeans had done their best with the facilities available. It was no use trying to advance the Africans beyond their capabilities. It would be an excellent thing if educational funds could be increased so that the African people could have more schooling than they had at present. The witness thought little could be done with the present rural adult African.

He did not agree with the British Government's handling of affairs. Dr. Banda had been released, and the British Government had indicated that there would shortly be an independent Government in Nyasaland. If that did not come about, it would not be Dr. Banda who was blamed, but the Europeans. These people could not govern themselves. They had neither the ability nor the means. He would not be willing to live in a country which had an irresponsible government, the risk was too great.

The witness said the Federation must sever all overseas connections and be an entirely self-governing colony. It was useless to continue with the British Government having part control over native affairs. He did not wish to maintain the Federation as it was at present progressing.

In answer to questions the witness made the following further points:—

(1) He wished to see the franchise qualification raised, but as long as it was not lowered there was no reason for Federation not continuing satisfactorily. He was quite prepared for Africans to become ultimately the majority of the voters, when they had become educated and were able to take their part equally with the Europeans. He considered there should be the same franchise for the Territorial voter and the Federal voter.

(2) He was not against the African because he was black but because he was untried and had no experience. It was not necessarily a fear of being swamped by Africans, but fear of being governed by an irresponsible government. He instanced the governments of Ghana and Libya in this connection. He considered that the Belgian Congo and Tanganyika were unlike Southern Rhodesia, because there was no large European population in those territories which regarded the country as their home.

(3) He considered Nyasaland was a liability to Rhodesia and said it could not exist without being heavily subsidised.

(4) Finally the witness said that if Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia had self-government in the near future which would be predominantly African, he would not accept Federation because he considered that the African did not understand democracy.

C. R. LOTTER

Mr. Lotter came before the Commission not as a politician, and not as a member of any Party. He had only been in the country for five years, and had not been there at the time of Federation. He merely felt it his duty to come to speak as an ordinary person. He had come originally from South Africa.

What he had to say he felt to be the view shared by many others. If the Federation was to continue at all, it must be with the guarantee that government should remain in European hands. Like many other farmers with daily contact with Africans, he felt that that was the only way. Many of his friends were worried at the possibility of having their affairs passed into African hands. If the Commissioners wished, they could regard this as a minority anxiety, but many farmers certainly had this anxiety. At present no farmer in the area was going ahead with expansion, for example, as to dairies or mechanical improvements. They were waiting to see what would happen. This was nothing but a bad influence economically. All the farmers were worried. They had to have guarantees that their position would remain secure, and that Federation would continue.

This anxiety was of fairly recent origin, in the last year or so. It was the same with business; business people were waiting to see which way things would go. They seemed to see an increasing possibility of an African dominated government. The witness said that he was obviously concerned in the first instance with Southern Rhodesia. If no guarantees in the Federal sphere were forthcoming he and his friends would leave the country, or else give up Federation.

In answer to questions, Mr. Lotter made the following further points:—

(1) With regard to the two northern Territories he regarded Nyasaland as a complete liability to the Federation. He understood that it had cost the Federation four million pounds per annum, and there was no sense of gratitude for this money. There was every evidence that the people of Nyasaland wanted to secede, and on the Southern Rhodesia side they did not want to keep Nyasaland in on its own terms.

(2) Asked why he considered that the Government should remain in European hands, he replied that there was ample evidence elsewhere in Africa that with African self-government democracy simply went by the board so that both Africans and Europeans became worse off. They did not consider that Africans were capable of understanding the affairs of the Europeans. If an African were placed in a position of responsibility or trust he simply took advantage of it. The witness felt that African advancement was going too fast for their capacity.

(3) "Civilised" people must themselves make the definition of "civilised people". He would certainly be unhappy if the Africans on his own farm had a say in that definition. There were people on the African side who understood what was meant by a "civilised person", but they were in a minority. Government must be left for the time being in European hands. They had a longer tradition of government, and they could be trusted to be fair. He would not have any objection to Africans coming eventually into the Parliament of Southern Rhodesia—in fact, they must eventually come in, but he objected to the fast rate of advancement. His own definition of a "civilised man" was one who had a sense of responsibility. Time would provide the test of that. The original Europeans in the country had been crude and rough living, but they had developed. He agreed that not all Southern Rhodesian Europeans qua Europeans were civilised, but the majority were much more advanced than the Africans.

(4) He had no objection to the present standards of qualification for the franchise. But what guarantee was there that these standards would not be lowered? If so millions of people would be able to vote tomorrow, and he was afraid that the standards were going to be lowered.

(5) Asked what he meant by "guarantees", he said that it should simply be an undertaking that Government should remain in responsible, meaning European, hands.

(6) He agreed that in Nyasaland there were only a few Europeans, and that the development there must obviously be in the African direction. In that case the Europeans there should have special protection. It was clear that eventually the Africans everywhere would reach control, but his objection was to the rate at which this change was going on.

(7) If the Federation was to continue, the white people of the Federation should have control of the affairs of the northern Territories: he meant by that that it should not be white people from the Colonial Office. The Europeans in Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia should control their own affairs likewise.

R. DEARDEN

The witness had come from the United Kingdom in 1948, and had worked for two years as a farm manager at Marandellas. He had then taken up farming on his own account in the Golden Valley near Gatooma, where he was still farming.

What he felt was that the Europeans should remain "in the chair" for the foreseeable future because they had the greater knowledge acquired over a longer period. The Europeans must be the best men for the job; they had given the country advantages, such as schooling, medical services, a higher standard of living, and above all stable employment. They had also provided security for minority groups. This gave inducement to overseas investors, and enabled the country to make further progress.

At the same time, Mr. Dearden would give the African every opportunity for advancement. But it was necessary not to pamper the African. Anything gained easily was useless and not appreciated. He must learn to value what he received, and thus he must work for it. He should not be given financial aid, but only on a loan basis: he would then value it.

However the country could not afford to give out large sums of money for nothing. He would like to see the African develop in his own areas, both rural and urban. It was necessary to keep the races apart as much as possible, in order to avoid trouble. But in their own areas the Africans should enjoy their own form of government and have their own schools and hospitals. At the same time they should be enabled to air their views in either an Upper or Lower House, so long as it was on their own subjects. Asked how this could be achieved, he said that it was better for Africans to look after their own interests; but there was a strong objection to Africans having any say in the conduct of European affairs, for this would be liable to rile the Europeans. Africans working in European areas must come under European jurisdiction; but the reverse should also hold good for Asians, Europeans and others. In all races, the rate for the job must be paid; if a man could not hold down his job he should be dismissed.

His idea was to have a Lower House of Europeans only, and an Upper House for both Europeans and Africans, something on the same lines as the House of Lords in London. It should have the power to delay legislation if it was discriminatory. But Africans in the Upper House should only vote on their own measures. They could not be given any power over European measures. He simply threw this out as an idea since he had not thought out how to run an Upper House.

In reply to questions, Mr. Dearden made the following further points:—

(1) The European members of the Upper House should be elected by Africans, and the African members should also be elected by Africans. This should be on a purely African community franchise.

(2) He realised that there might be difficulty in dividing up subjects and measures into European and African. He therefore thought that anything controversial would have to be given to the lower House first, and then brought to the Upper House to settle. The Lower House could discuss African affairs, but the Upper House could not discuss European affairs. He agreed that the Africans would not be satisfied with such arrangements. But his point of view was that if you gave a greater vote to Africans you would have people who were ignorant voting on European affairs. It was a very great mistake to hurry on African political advancement. He agreed that his suggestions would take time to put into practice.

(3) The African urban townships, the Reserves, and the Native Purchase Areas could in time be run by a kind of Native Council. He agreed that he was mainly dealing with local government.

(4) On the question of integration, he thought there could be nothing but disaster if the races were brought too much together.

(5) He had been disappointed in Federation. It had been "bulldozed" through by Sir G. Huggins and had surprised Southern Rhodesia. It had not worked out and could not work. He himself would allow Southern Rhodesia to secede if it might look on paper that Southern Rhodesia could not stand alone, but when copper prices fell again it might not feel so much the need for Northern Rhodesia. It was not possible to link a self-governing country with two protectorates: that was bound to be unfair to one or the other. Nyasaland should be given its self-government, assisted by the Colonial Office or Southern Rhodesia if necessary. He would not be prepared to say that Federation had done much to help Nyasaland; but equally Nyasaland had not done much good to the Federation. Could relations be said to have been improved? He agreed that there might be an economic advantage over the years; but the union between Nyasaland and Southern Rhodesia should be an economic one pure and simple.

(6) Questioned as to what effect protective tariffs in the north would have in Southern Rhodesia, he considered that Nyasaland was poor and would want some economic outlet. The Nyasaland Africans would continue to come to Southern Rhodesia for work, and would be acceptable. This would be a means of taking the load off the shoulders of the Nyasaland Government.

(7) He was unable to say on what principle the decision in the Federation referendum in Southern Rhodesia had been based, since he had not been interested in the matter at the time.

(8) Referring back to his earlier statement, he said that financial aid should not be given to Africans directly, but only on a loan-basis. He was speaking from the government angle and not as between individuals. He was averse from giving funds for improvements, such as stumping in the Reserves because he himself would have to pay for such stumping. This free stumping was going on in the neighbouring Nyrati Reserve. He did not agree that the Africans were paying for such services through taxation.

S. N. EASTWOOD

The witness stated he was a Rhodesian by birth, from farming stock, who had started from scratch and was now a farmer. All his experience had been gained in Southern Rhodesia. He wanted to put his personal views, because many of the things written in newspapers about Central Africa were far-fetched and not factual.

The witness employed 100 male Africans. He had played with piccanins as a child and had lived with Africans all his life, so that he thought he understood them to some extent. He said the people on his farm were perfectly contented for the European to be in charge of the Government of this country: this was practically without exception. They were, however, as worried as Europeans about the future.

One read of African National movements from the newspapers. The Africans probably felt they had not had a square deal in the past and would like to take over the reins of government here. In his opinion that would be a very grave mistake if it took place right now. Though he liked Africans very much and worked with them and understood them, he did not feel they were in any way ready to take governmental responsibility. Mr. Eastwood quoted figures from the War History of the Rhodesians, Volumes I and II, which pointed to a fine record in leadership. Many Rhodesians had been in command at various centres in West Africa and elsewhere, and had done a fine job.

He was not opposed to African advancement. Every man had the right, through his own endeavour, to get somewhere in the world. During the last three years he had himself helped African farmers: he had attended their field days and addressed their Councils. They had a long way to go before they could be considered good farmers. In his particular area, out of 340 only 40 had been anything like successful. He had been out to their farms. In the Gatooma area it had been a bad year because of terrible droughts, and the crops had not been good; but the majority of the African farmers did not know the basic rules of agriculture or when to plough their land. They had a lot to learn, and it was his considered opinion that without a European farmer to help them they were not getting very far on their own.

Among his own Africans were some from Nyasaland, Portuguese East Africa and Southern Rhodesia. They were all good workers and were contented. Their rates of pay were probably not as high as they would like, but that was an economic matter and out of his hands. He gave them an average basic wage of £3 per month, as he thought most farmers in Southern Rhodesia did. That did not sound very much, but they were given all the food they needed, together with wood and water. He was giving them brick housing, and had been running a school for their children entirely at his own expense for some years. He bought the books and paid the teacher, and thus helped as much as he could with their education. He stressed that the £3 was spending money. The African paid 6d for a large tankard of beer and his cigarettes cost eight for 2d, so that he had a fine living for £3. Mr. Eastwood said he would like to see the living go higher, as everyone would, but that was a question of economics.

He also ran recreational things for the Africans and had discussed the Nationalist movements with them. He had found their opinions differed entirely from the things printed in the papers. They would hate to see the white man disappear from Africa. The white man is, and has been, their protection. They naturally were all for getting more money and more advancement but greatly appreciated what had been done for them already.

He considered that Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia presented a far greater problem than Southern Rhodesia. Nyasaland particularly was a poor country. From what he had seen of it, it appeared to be in the same state as Southern Rhodesia had been 60 years ago, with the exception of a few small towns created by Europeans. It had a long way to go. Without laying the blame on any one section, he thought that if there had been more Europeans settled there to provide work for these people, it would have been to the benefit of the country. To keep everybody out and offer a man a 99-year lease of a farm was not good enough.

Mr. Eastwood was not at all opposed to having a black Prime Minister as long as he was a responsible and rational man, but from the newspapers it seemed as if all the African leaders in Central Africa had been shouting things that literally got the back up of the Europeans. He was not prepared to give up all he had worked for in his lifetime, including all that had been done for the Africans, to irresponsible people. He thought that in 50 years' time it might be different. There would then be responsible people who would realize that this was not just the Africans' home but the Europeans' home, and it was not just one way.

The problem of how Federation might be improved was difficult, and the question of the northern Territories was probably the most difficult part of it. Europeans in Southern Rhodesia, as well as in the north, must have a certain security before they could consider the continuance of Federation. In Nyasaland he thought there possibly could be another status of some sort; but Southern Rhodesia was just 50 or 60 years ahead of the times. It was not possible suddenly to take over a country and begin to run it. He did not consider they could remain in the Federation as they were at present, when they could put their double number of seats into the Federal House. If Nyasaland got African independence, followed soon afterwards by Northern Rhodesia, within a short time they would have control of the Federal House. This would then bring Southern Rhodesia into the struggle.

He stressed the considerable progress made in Southern Rhodesia over the last 60 years, for Africans and Europeans alike. He felt sure that every European recognized the problems. None of them were against African advancement: what they were opposed to was forced integration. He thought that the African was also against that. Though there was room for multi-racial hotels and other places, there was also room for separate places for Europeans and Africans.

Mr. Eastwood said he had voted against Federation originally because he did not consider at the time that the Constitution was a good one. He was not personally against Federation; but he was against people taking over the reins whom he did not consider to be sufficiently mature. He felt at the time that Southern Rhodesia did not have sufficient safeguards. He stressed that for the foreseeable future—though not for the ultimate future—the Government should be in mature, European hands. He would not be opposed to an African Prime Minister in either of the northern Territories, provided he was a moderate and rational man. He was only opposed to Africans at the present time, but it would be different in 25 to 50 years, probably, when the Africans would have more people to draw from and there would be moderate men coming forward. It seemed to him at present that the African leaders had not been appointed by anyone: they were just there.

He was in favour of some form of association of the three Territories, apart from political association, which would include economic development, taxation, immigration and the extension of industry. In this connection he referred to the Central African Alliance Plan produced by the Dominion Party, and particularly to Barotseland. There was very little outside interference and they were very happy. Though small, they were important, and there was a lot to be done for them to introduce industry and farming into the country. Nyasaland had seemed backward to him at the time of his visit. It was an enormous territory, and something should be done to get Europeans in there and start things going, because all the Nyasa boys had at present to leave the country to get work.

Referring to the fears expressed by the northern Territories that Southern Rhodesia Europeans would dominate them, Mr. Eastwood said he did not think this could happen to any harmful point. Most of the inhabitants were British and had a British sense of fair play. The European was not trying to dominate Africans and never had. When his own grandfather had come to the country as Cecil Rhodes's manager, the country was just bush. It had been hard work for the Europeans to develop it. They were not prepared to lose what they had worked for.

He felt that the two northern Territories should not have their Constitutions altered, except with the consent of the Federal Government, or attain self-government until the Federal Government thought it was right. He did not think those Territories were fit for self-government at present. If the northern Territories were given black Governments without the consent of the Federal Government, Southern Rhodesia could not stay in the Federation.

Speaking of European land tenure, so bitterly opposed in the north, he said Southern Rhodesia had the Land Apportionment Act. Any man, no matter what his race, wanted to have his stake in the country. If the land was thrown open to Europeans, Africans would reap the benefit, provided also that there was enough land reserved for them. In Southern Rhodesia the principle had been that everything taken by Europeans had been balanced by the same amount being set aside for Africans.

African land was not inferior to European land, but exactly the same. He had been visited by African farmers who would not believe the amount of his yields, and he had pointed out to them the importance of fertilizers and had shown them how to increase their own yields: but it took time.

Referring to the segregation of business premises between Africans and Europeans and so on, he said he thought there was some legislation going on which would effect a change-over towards more intergration of trade. This was one of the problems facing the Federation. Africans had received a lot of protection. In the farming area their land included some of the best sandveld in Southern Rhodesia. If the door was opened so that Africans could come into a European area, the Europeans might want to go into the African areas. Protection was needed on both sides. He thought that there was room for multi-racial hotels and cinemas, just as there was room for African hotels and cinemas, owned and run by Africans. There were not enough of them. He was very much against any legislation forcing people to integrate.

Finally, he was in favour of Federation in its present form, but felt it was necessary to continue the control between Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland for some time.

E. D. RICHTER

The witness stated that he had been born in Southern Africa some 59 years ago. He was a farmer, and most of his life had been spent on the land. He had had considerable experience of non-Europeans—a term he preferred to use because it included Coloureds as well as Africans. He had been in Southern Rhodesia only fourteen years as a farmer, but felt very keenly that all he owned and all his offspring could ever hope to own was in this country. It was a wonderful country, if only it could be kept that way. That could only be done, he felt, by keeping Government in the hands of responsible, civilized people.

Unfortunately his experience had been that very few non-Europeans were responsible. During the last fourteen years between 400 and 500 of them had passed through his hands, mostly Nyasa boys. He had at present 25 on his farm, none of which had he found capable of being given a position of trust. This might be a question of the mental make-up of the African and non-African respectively. He said that advisedly, because he had found that if the average African was asked to draw a straight line from A to B, he could not do it. He would, however, make an excellent job of a circle or semi-circle: anything straight was beyond his reasoning powers. He thought it was possible that the African also took the same circular course in his outlook towards matters like education and government. Until the non-European became a really responsible person, Government must remain in the hands of Europeans.

Colour did not concern him considerably. At one time he managed a ranch and went for months without seeing a white face or speaking a word of English. He spoke Zulu fluently, and had found the Zulus to be morally and physically superior to Europeans. Unfortunately that did not apply to Central Africa, where he thought both Europeans and Africans appeared to be on a lower plane. The Africans had a long way to go to become responsible people.

Mr. Richter said he honestly felt that if the rank and file in the northern Territories were allowed to vote freely and had both sides of the picture put to them, there would not be a black Government in either Territory. He did not think the Africans could do without Europeans: Europeans could not do without Africans.

In answer to questions, he made the following further points:

(1) Assuming that black Governments did come into power in the north, he thought it was inevitable Southern Rhodesia would have to leave the Federation unless there was an assurance of a European majority in the Federal House. He would not mind the northern Territories having black Governments to run their countries as they liked. He was pro rather than anti-African.

(2) He was definitely of the opinion that any change in the Constitutions of the northern Territories should be subject to the approval of the Federal Government, in order to ensure that they did not get a type of government considered unsatisfactory in Southern Rhodesia. He thought the experience of other African countries which had been given so-called freedom in the last year or two was sufficient justification for this.

(3) Times had changed since the northern Territories were made Protectorates, and the witness felt that civilized people in Southern Africa today were very much better equipped to assist those Governments than one which was 6,000 miles away. This was a constitutional problem, and he would not like to give an opinion on constitutional government; but he felt that in the interests of the northern Territories the Federal Government would be better able to look after them than an outside Government. He would like to see control of those Governments in the hands of the Federal Government.

(4) He would prefer the Federal Government to be given powers before the northern Territories achieved self-government. He feared that the British Government might allow those two Governments to fall into the hands of inexperienced people. He thought the security of those people also could be trusted to the Federal Government. Though he wanted control of Government to remain in the hands of civilized people, this did not necessarily mean only Europeans. The European population did not consist entirely of civilized people. There was one type of European who was just as useless to the country as a number of Africans were.

W. A. READ

The witness said he was a farmer and had lived fourteen years in the Gatooma district, having come from Cornwall in 1946. After working for the British South Africa Company, he had purchased his farm in 1947.

The witness stated there was a determination amongst Europeans to stay in the country and ensure that it should be safe for all time for the Europeans. They must remain in control of Government for the foreseeable future: firstly, because this was in the best interests of the indigenous population; and, secondly, if there was confidence in a stable Government, the best interests of the country would be served by a vigorous immigration policy. With Europeans in full control, there should be a stable Government and confidence in the future on the part of investors, so that there would be scope for more investment and development.

If the immigration of Europeans was encouraged, this would balance the ratio between the races, which in turn would place the indigenous African in greater contact with the Europeans, and thus enable him to adapt himself more quickly to twentieth century conditions. It would also create a greater demand for African services, which would again advance him in many ways, not merely financially.

He considered that advancement for the Africans depended entirely on their ability to meet the standards set. That was the most important thing in this country. He felt that Europeans were generally far too tolerant towards the African. He must be made to stand on his own feet and prove himself. Mr. Read said that he himself, on his own farm was conscious of being too tolerant towards his own labourers. Standards were accepted here which would not be accepted in England by any means. It was essential for Africans to show their merit. They should not be pampered in any way.

In answer to questions, he made the following additional points:

(1) He was not a politician but felt that, looking outside Southern Rhodesia, and particularly to the north, the Belgian Congo and East Africa, tribalism was coming to the fore. That was not good in any country under present conditions. It would only lead to sectionalism and trouble.

(2) The franchise should be raised. There were even certain Europeans who were not fit for the franchise. A man must be treated as a man, and if he was capable of doing a job, he must be allowed to do it. He felt there was far too much protection of sectional interests in the country.

(3) As a broad principle, Federation was a good thing and should be held together.

(4) He definitely did not think that places of entertainment should be opened to the Africans at present. It was an omen for the future; it was possible that what his grandchildren might think of as quite normal, he would regard as shocking. He considered that abolition of segregation should come about naturally from within. It could not be done by legislation, which seemed to cause a lot of ill-feeling. In this regard he cited events in America. He felt there was too much hot air on this subject, but agreed that there were pin-pricks, such as unnecessary rudeness which was quite uncalled for.

(5) He stressed the importance of acceptance of Western standards—though this was a vague term and difficult to define—but anyone who reached those standards should be accepted. It was not right to attempt to move things by legislation against popular opinion; it could only be done by a gradual process of elimination.

(6) Colour of skin meant nothing to him. If one of his labourers did something wrong, he told him so in no uncertain terms, and if the man did not like it he could go and work for someone else. He said he would do exactly the same thing with a European, in fact he would probably be stricter with a European. In this connection he reiterated that Africans should not be treated with undue tolerance, and cited the case of an African student who was in his third year at university. He had failed all his examinations but was still permitted by the Principal to remain as a student. Mr. Read felt that was wrong: if a man was too good he must go out, just as a European would have to go out. He felt that agitators took advantage of tolerance.

(7) There were quite a number of Europeans who did not understand politics and who cast their vote without thinking about it, but he emphasised that the European should stay in control of Government because of the possibility that the Africans might revert to tribalism in this country. The European would, of course, suffer from this; but it was his sincere belief that the interests of the African would be best served by having as close contact with Europeans as possible. This would involve a much larger immigration of Europeans. Then the whole country could go forward towards more investment and development.

(8) If there were black Governments in the two Northern Territories who swayed the balance of power as far as Southern Rhodesia was concerned, Southern Rhodesia must pull out of Federation. He had voted for Federation originally because he believed that European control was the best possible thing for the three countries. Therefore he could not possibly agree to allowing the two 'Native States' in the north to pass some of Southern Rhodesian laws: it would be wrong. He would not have voted for Federation had he foreseen it developing under conditions as they were at present.

(9) He stressed that once the Africans were fully educated and experienced, he would not mind their gaining control, but not until that time. The Africans, naturally and reasonably, wanted these things; but the Europeans were in error in making too much allowance for them: they must get on solely on merit.

(10) There was no negotiation with the labourers on his farm, in any trade union sense. His word was law and must be obeyed, but he very often called in the more responsible men and asked their opinion on certain things. He was not entirely dogmatic. If they had no satisfactory answer to give, then he made his own decisions.

(11) Some of his men were very good and had been with him for fourteen, twelve or eight years. He had a fixed starting wage and a fixed maximum wage, beyond which a man could not progress unless he was above average. One of his tractor drivers, for instance, was at present receiving very much more than the average wage for the district. He insisted that they proved themselves and were paid on merit, irrespective of length of service. That principle must be adhered to.

Memorandum

THE CENTRAL AFRICA PARTY (MSENGEZI BRANCH)

J. W. G. Sojini—Chairman

S. Mazebananga—Vice-Chairman

A. K. Moraka—Secretary

T. D. Ndhlovu—Member

It has come to our notice and understanding that the Commission is set up by the British Government to take evidence from organisations and individual persons on various aspects regarding talks, will take place in London Conference of 1960, on the Constitutional review promised in the Constitution on the question of the Federation of Central Africa dominion status, in other words an "Independent Government".

It may be remembered the implementation of the Constitution reflected a clause of "equal partnership" to all races, inhabitants or living within the Federation of Central Africa, shall have been achieved and practised, the equal partnership in its true sense and meaning.

That being the case our branch here. Msengezi, subscribe the implementation of equal partnership has not been achieved in practice, it remains as theory with no meaning at all. The Federation of Central Africa was brought about six years ago which proves it could not have done much on the promises of its constitution, at this junction it may be treated as an experiment.

There is still a strong colour discrimination which exists instead of diminishing, is still being legislated by Parliaments in stronger resistants so as other races may feel the power of which race and supremacy of their domination. If this memorandum is examined it will be found is giving statements of fact, that the discrimination against non-Europeans is a source of irritation, leading to frustration of minds and hopes.

Nevertheless it is quite obvious if the statements bearing on this memorandum could be understood a better meaning of equal partnership may be interpreted in its full sense under democratic system which is the background underlying British principles and tradition in their long history of civilisation.

There are Europeans who have divided themselves into groups styled as League of Empire Loyalists. These groups of self-seekers are worsening and drawing back position of rapid improvements intended by those in authority to meet the needs brought about the world's evolution. The demand which is unavoidable equality of all races, under the British Commonwealth, to enjoy all rights irrespective of colour or creed.

These groups seek to destroy these human rights, thus trying to break down with their 28 lb. sledge hammers, the good reputation of the British Empire, equal rights to all civilized people which is a major question in these days. These irresponsible groups are not prepared to accept in the world's wide developments, they still look back to their pioneering days; the ideas of those days have long passed therefore those inferior and childish ideas cannot be lifted to the country of today.

We have now reached a stage when rapid adjustment is required to put into practice the principles of equal partnership whether that is to be done or not is completely immaterial, but has to be done for the good will and faith of all races, inhabitants in the Federation of Central Africa. Let liberal responsible Europeans put right Central Africa affairs for the contentment of all races. We must mention big ideas of the British people here and abroad which extended to all races under the British Crown, the principles of democracy and traditions. The granting of Federation did not justify self-seekers to play with the rights of other races in their fingers, it only meant to build a state where all the races will enjoy the rights of equal freedom of expression, freedom of justice, freedom of advancement as far as any race is capable of doing so, without laying any embargo.

It will be interesting to put the following sentences as examples:

- (1) Let us take the Industrial Conciliation Act which is being used by some Europeans in the industries against the competition of non-Europeans so as to keep European wage structure above others, to maintain a higher standard of living, to cause others to live below the level of bread. That is discriminatory.
- (2) They have set aside land which they termed "Land Apportionment Act". This also denies Africans and other races to purchase unencumbered land where he feels to purchase land. There are protective measures which give preferences to Europeans only.
- (3) The Restrictions of Fire-arms and European liquor to Africans.
- (4) The Restrictions imposed to Africans from free-movements by Pass Laws.
- (5) The insecurity of land tenure to Africans.
- (6) The refusal of admitting Africans in hotels, eating houses, restaurants, cinemas and the like.

There are many numerous things to mention if space allows.

The only time when talks of dominion status can be brought about, it will be when these discriminations could be abolished and when Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland as British Protectorates could first be granted self-Government with full powers as any government under the British Commonwealth. So when talks about bringing dominion status within the Federation of Central Africa, the Government concerned may participate in equal basis without the domination of one race government.

A case in stake is the Union of South Africa where dominion status was given before non-European races were prepared, and when the British Government granted this, thought it was on good faith not knowing it was a cover under diplomacy political cheating. This has today caused great disappointments on British nation.

We shall continue to oppose the dominion status of the three territories until we are quite satisfied that people of all races or colour enjoy the good things and the produce of the country equally, and to enjoy the opportunities that this country has to offer.

The reasons given statements are sound to any logical minded person and we should be happy to amplify this with oral evidence.

In conclusion, the representation has followed the Honourable Commission's platform for justice, irrespective of colour or creed so as to ameliorate the position of African races under the existing circumstances.

Oral Evidence

MSENJEZI BRANCH OF THE CENTRAL AFRICA PARTY

Representatives: J. W. G. Sojini—Chairman
A. K. Moraka—Secretary

Mr Sojini said that there was very little he wished to add to the written memorandum except that the main reason for the Branch coming forward was to emphasize the need for the early removal of discriminatory practices, particularly those that had been detailed in their memorandum. He added that in no circumstances should Dominion status be granted until these matters had indeed been adjusted.

Elaborating to some extent on the memorandum, Mr Sojini referred to the railways, where he stated that, although trains were made up for some hours before the time for departure African passengers were not allowed in but were lined up. Then a very few minutes before the train was due to leave they were rushed into the coaches where they were packed like sardines. Quite apart from anything else, many passengers often suffered losses of their goods and from pickpockets. He saw every reason why the Government should insist on the railways exercising some sort of check on this matter.

As far as he could see, however, the Government's only concern was to keep an eye on removing the various measures of protection of Africans that existed in the Constitution as it stood today. Mr. Sojini, however, added that notwithstanding the criticisms the Branch had made he liked the present Government which he thought was a good one, unlike that ruling in the Union of South Africa at the moment.

On being asked a question concerning the Land Apportionment Act, Mr. Sojini said that it was imperative that Africans should have proper title to their land; by this he meant the widest possible title because Europeans and others who had money available for loans on mortgage were not likely to lend it on property which could only be sold in a limited market. He went on to say that Africans did not need protection which took this form. The position was quite different in the old days before the introduction of the Land Apportionment Act, because then Africans could buy land anywhere, and he gave as examples that they could purchase stands in Salisbury and farms near Salisbury. The Land Apportionment Act had driven them out of these areas, although it was true that they had been compensated. But he mentioned that only a comparatively small number of Africans had been affected, and he quoted his brother in Gwelo as being a case in point. Nevertheless, it was the principle of land apportionment that offended so much.

On the matter of partnership, the reaction of the Branch was that although there had been general improvements, they took the view that little had been done because the improvements had not been in the direction of removing the various discriminatory practices obtaining in Southern Rhodesia.

FORT VICTORIA

30TH APRIL 1960

Memorandum

N. RICHARDS

1. To begin I must give you a brief outline of the form my evidence will take. I wish to prove to you that the S. Rhodesian approach to racial affairs is the best in Africa. To do this, I will have to tell you of the vast amount that has been done for the African by the European. I must tell you of the tremendous strides that have taken place in a very short time. You must know how the Capitalistic system, combined with Democracy, is being taught and put into practice.

2. This will show you how the European has cared for the well-being of the African from his savage state 60 years ago to a point now where his education in government and politics is being attended to. This is being done in conjunction with improving his standard of living. In fact, we are trying to do to the black races in one century what took the English nation at least 20 centuries.

3. I will then give you the result of our efforts, and stress what I think the Federation should learn from S. Rhodesia, and I will conclude with some observations on the Federal Constitution.

4. Now, to go back to what the European has done for the African in the past 35 years—the period we have had self-government, free of Colonial Office influence. Thirty-five years ago, the African was in skins, underfed, often starving, and dirty. He had no medical treatment, child mortality was in the vicinity of 80%. He was a heathen and completely illiterate.

5. In 35 years the efforts of a handful of white S. Rhodesians have improved his standard of living enormously, to a point today where some are earning +£3000 p.a., but where even the vast majority are clothed, never go hungry, and more and more are decently housed at a standard superior to some in Europe. Unlike the European, who pays 25/- per day in Hospitals, African Hospitals and Clinics are supplied free of charge, and even maternity treatment is free, and consequently child mortality has been reduced enormously. Most of them receive a basic education, and a few reach the top. Roads and bridges have been built and an immense amount of work is being done to eliminate malaria even in the most remote reserves. (Down to Portuguese East Africa.) Their agricultural methods have been improved from a mere scratching between the rocks to correct ploughing on contoured lands. Paid African demonstrators living amongst them instruct them in correct methods. Cattle dips have been built and all cattle are dipped every week. Post Offices have been built in the reserves and some have African Postmasters, although the percentage of Postmasters who have been dismissed for theft is, I believe, alarmingly high. Their education in local government has not been neglected, and even in remote reserves the Chiefs have Councils which have a very considerable say in local government.

6. The Capitalistic system is also being encouraged by the creation of Townships throughout the reserves, each with its own Stores, Tearooms, Carpenters, Millers, etc., and almost all the buses are African owned.

7. It would be impossible to comment on all that has been done—let it suffice to say that out of every £1 taxation, which for the most part comes from the European, over one-third is spent entirely on the African, and he shares in a big proportion of the balance.

8. Personal relations between the races in S. Rhodesia has always been—and still is—good. Our Police are quite rightly proud of the fact that since self-government, not a single life has been lost in civil strife. This record is ahead of U.S.A. and Notting Hill. Admittedly, we still have a number in detention, but our contention is that it is a far smaller number than are held in detention in England. What difference is there between putting anti-social teenagers in a Reformatory and putting anti-social riot-makers in rehabilitation centres?

9. It has always been the aim of white S. Rhodesians to accept all races as equals—provided, and when, they reach a reasonably civilized state. Our Franchise laws aim at this, but I consider have failed to define "civilization". Possessions, income and education have been stipulated, and a combination of these items can work to a certain extent, but there are at present too many exceptions. It must also be realised that if the £1 is devaluated, our franchise qualifications are immediately altered. However, I am unable to make a better suggestion. What is of paramount importance to all races is that the Government should remain in civilized hands—and that is what we are aiming at.

10. I have given you the methods used by S. Rhodesia to improve the standards of its Africans, and by so doing, to improve race relations, and I contend that it has achieved more than any other country in Africa or Asia in the shortest period. It is natural, therefore, that we in S. Rhodesia say that this method should be adopted by the rest of the Federation. This would be possible, if we could remove the Colonial Office influence. We have made a success of S. Rhodesia because we have to—it is our home. Our Civil Servants are Rhodesians. They do not go 'Home' to England, they go home to bed every night. Their families are Rhodesians and they are proud of it. They are proud of their achievements, and they want their children to remain in a peaceful S. Rhodesia. Therefore race relations must be kept good.

11. History has shown over and over again that any country governed from overseas is an unhappy country and will revolt eventually. Nobody likes being governed by a foreigner—but make no mistake—the white Rhodesian is not a foreigner. This is his country every bit as much as the Bantu, and so far he has done everything for it. The European happens to be the civilized race in this country and the percentage of civilized Africans is very small, therefore it is natural and correct that the Europeans should control the Government of the country. If overseas influence in the Federation could be removed, race relations would improve enormously within two years. The Civil Service failed to give a lead in Nyasaland and one wonders if their failure can ever be repaired, but it is certain that the two Rhodesias could pull together, and Nyasaland could be made to remain in the Federation until even their African leaders became adult enough to realise the enormous benefits.

12. I do not have the knowledge or the ability to suggest how the Constitution of the Federation should be altered, but regarding the Franchise it must be apparent to all that—

- (a) One man, one vote is out of the question. Over 90 per cent of the Africans do not know the names of their so-called African Leaders, let alone do they have any knowledge of government or politics;
- (b) Franchise qualifications must remain high and must be based on civilized standards. An educational qualification on its own can be wrong. For instance—a fair standard of academic education which is not followed up by a life where that education is put into practice is completely forgotten within two years. Our school education merely gives us a basis on which to educate ourselves during life, and if, after having received say a standard VI education, we return to live with others with no education, then we drop to their level in a very short period, and that school education is lost. A school educational qualification alone is therefore valueless. An income or property qualification on its own is also dangerous, in that money always devaluates, so that this particular franchise qualification would stand the risk of being lowered. If, through a lowering of franchise qualifications, the Government fell into uncivilized hands, extreme racialism and dishonesty in politics would automatically follow.

- (c) Once the number of Africans on the voters' roll reaches a certain percentage of the total roll, their special representation must fall away.

13. All four Governments should try to eliminate all regulations which serve little purpose, but which aggravate one or other of the races. A lot have been eliminated, but quite a few remain. Social integration of the races should not be forced. This will only cause extreme racialism. Integration will only come very slowly—it can never be forced. The Southern States of America can be taken as an example.

14. At present, because of the very wide differences in standards of civilization between Europeans and Africans, facilities offered by the Government in Schools, Health and Sanitation, etc. must be kept separate, but at a later date three standards could be offered: i.e. Europeans only; all races; Africans only. It must be remembered that a very big majority of Africans are just as desirous of keeping to themselves as are the majority of Europeans.

15. It is of the utmost importance that a decision regarding the Constitution be made as quickly as possible. Every month delayed sees a worsening of the situation. We have always been accustomed to organisations for Africans only, but untrue and immoral Press reports, coupled with the unfortunate and unstatesmanlike behaviour of certain British Politicians, have quite naturally angered a large percentage of the European population, and now organisations for Europeans only are being formed. Thus—for the first time—we are witnessing in S. Rhodesia a real dividing of the races.

16. Any action taken to alter the Constitution of the Federation must be the will of the majority able to comprehend what is being done, and that majority—with few exceptions—is made up of the citizens of all colours on the voters' roll. Judging by the activities of the British Government and Commissions—this one not excluded—the evidence and advice of extremists, particularly those who have not done anything constructive for their country, is headed before that of the average man who, after all, does echo the will of the country. Extremists, whether Left or Right, are a menace to this country, and any pandering to their whims will inevitably cause chaos. It must be remembered that the vast majority of Europeans and Africans in the Federation get on well together and understand each other. Good-will between the races in S. Rhodesia is better than anywhere else in Africa, and if Colonial Office control could be removed from the two Northern Territories, relations there would also improve.

17. The success of the Federation is of world-wide importance, particularly to the West. We are the dividing state between White-controlled and Black-controlled states, and if this state fails in its conception of partnership between races, then Africa is lost to the West. It is even more important to the European in the Federation, because he must succeed in race relations to ensure a happy and safe country for his family and progeny. Therefore, to conclude, I must stress that Colonial Office influence should be removed in the shortest possible time and thus allow the man living in the country to make a success of it.

Oral Evidence

N. RICHARDS

H. T. BARKER

In amplification of his written memorandum Mr. Richards stated he was born in Southern Rhodesia in ox-wagon days and had spent his entire life there. Having played with Africans as a child, served with them during the war and worked with them, he felt he had a sound idea of the African way of thinking, and was friends with them. He was also a trader in a native area. He expressed regret that the Commission would not have time to visit some of the native reserves in the area. The population of the Fort Victoria area represented one-quarter of Southern Rhodesia.

He stated that the idea of certain areas into which Europeans were not allowed to go was new. He had been trading since 1936; exceptions were made where it was deemed beneficial to the African population, with the approval of the Native Council. Europeans were not allowed to trade in African townships, so that they could not compete with the African trade. He believed this was a good thing.

The Councils had a great say in education. They raised part of the money for this; he thought it was probably £1 for £1. There were also Women's Institutes for promoting hygiene, and a great deal was being done to encourage the capitalistic system, which would be a good thing for the country.

African education tended to be too academic, and the African was not taught to use his hands, so that it became infra dig for a Standard VI African to work with his hands. It was most important that trades be taught.

It was of paramount importance that once a decision had been made by the British Government or the Federal Government it should be stable for at least ten years. Having the British Government looking over one's shoulder caused a great deal of strife. It seemed to the witness that the Commission had been spending more time heeding the evidence and advice of extremists rather than that of the ordinary African in the reserves and who represented the vast bulk of the African population.

As regards social integration, Mr. Richards said that there were too many regulations which caused irritation and were of no benefit at all. They should be removed. The time had not yet come for all discriminatory practices to be removed, particularly in relation to land. The African still needed protection because he had not yet the money to buy property in the European areas. If an African had an income of £3,000 per annum and regulations permitted him to buy land in the European area, he saw no objection to it; but he thought that in such circumstances Europeans must be permitted to buy land in the African areas. There must be protection for all.

In reply to questions, Mr. Richards made the following points:

(a) Although there was congestion in certain native areas, there were vast areas in the native reserves which were still unoccupied, usually because of a shortage of water. The Government put down water holes where it could with a view to settling Africans in such places. Many dams were also being built. More was being done to provide irrigation schemes in the native areas than in the European areas. The basic limitation was finance, and it had to be remembered that the European community had to pay half the cost of the schemes and the Africans paid nothing.

(b) Referring to paragraphs 15, 16 and 17 of his memorandum, Mr. Richards said that the average Southern Rhodesian was watching the Government closely at present. He was stable and hard-working on the whole, but he was being continually subjected to so much criticism and Press comment, most of it entirely unfounded, that it was having a psychological effect. Mr. Richards felt the Press was the cause of most ills, not only in Southern Rhodesia but also in the rest of the world. Evidence of good feeling and growing multi-racialism was not printed, only criticism.

(c) It was possible for the two Northern territories to have self-government within the Federation. He personally did not envisage a black government in Northern Rhodesia for some time. The franchise must not be on racial lines. The voters must be civilized, but that was not a matter of colour. Though the present qualifications were not perfect, he could not think of better ones.

Mr. Barker then gave his evidence. In general, he agreed with the evidence of the previous witness. He was a mining engineer, London born, and had been in Africa for thirty years. He had been in South Africa for eight years before coming to Southern Rhodesia, and for the past nine years had been operating a mine (chrome and beryl). For the last twenty years he had managed various mines, employing up to 3,000 Africans, and his duties included looking after their housing and other amenities. He had experience of natives from many areas, including Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland and Southern Rhodesia. Some of the men working for him had also worked for his father.

He stressed the following further points:—

(1) Most of the Africans needed protection from future legislation, but more than anything they needed protection from racial leaders. Though the extreme nationalism in the North might not extend to Southern Rhodesia, it could have an effect there. He had spoken to his boys in the reserves and approximately 60 per cent. had never heard of Federation. Those who had heard of it thought it only applied to Nyasaland. Some of them associated it with the increase in native tax two or three years ago.

(2) The future of Federation must be strongly based. If an African voiced an opinion against Federation, it was most likely because he had been intimidated and was frightened to say otherwise. Because of this fear, so deeply rooted in the Africans, even the more responsible people could be swayed by mass movements and intimidation. African political sense was not highly developed.

(3) Federation had been set up to create a multi-racial society: this could not be done with a wave of the hand, but things had developed further along that line in Southern Rhodesia than anywhere else in Africa—except the Belgian

Congo, perhaps, which had never been self-governing. He felt Europeans must remain in power in the Federation for at least twenty to twenty-five years. If irresponsible African extremists assumed power, they would create a racial state instead of a multi-racial one.

(4) Most Europeans agreed to a multi-racial society. It must be accepted that the Northern territories would have black Governments and Parliaments within twenty to twenty-five years. There was no objection to that, because these territories should rule themselves as they wished, but it would then mean that Southern Rhodesia would be opposed to the two Northern territories. He felt the Federal Government must be based on the dominance of Southern Rhodesia membership. At present the division was roughly equal.

(5) He would personally prefer an amalgamation of the three territories, based on Federation. He would like Dominion status for Southern Rhodesia, with Africans receiving the franchise as they developed according to ability. The only way in which Federation could be made to work was by retaining European Government control for twenty to thirty years until a more moderate and educated African had emerged. He agreed that a Federation which gave Southern Rhodesia domination would not really be a Federation. Many Africans fully realised the need to keep Europeans in the country, but they would never oppose their fellow Africans in the House.

(6) If, as he recognised, there were insuperable objections to amalgamation, the territories could be politically independent but associated on the economic level. If there was this economic association, he felt the majority of Europeans in Southern Rhodesia would be prepared to augment the finances of Nyasaland without any political tie-up, provided they thought it would do some good.

Memorandum

C. T. GIRDLESTONE

You will no doubt have read the report prepared by my friend Mr. Johann Rademyer. I wish to associate myself with his remarks and to emphasise that the average Rhodesian is thinking on those lines, though he will not go to the trouble of producing 35 copies of a Memo for you.

I do not wish to cover the same ground and will confine my remarks to points not touched upon.

Firstly, your Commission was badly organized. An advance agent should have gone round the towns weeks in advance, organizing accommodation and entertainment. An agent in each town should have been briefed to collect and duplicate 35 copies of Memoranda and to decide how much time you should spend in each centre; and what you should see. A tour of the Native Reserves, where 75 per cent. of the Africans live, is a necessity. As regards accommodation, we have two hotels here and each was, I am told, willing to accommodate two of the four African members of the Commission, provided the other hotel took two. As regards entertainment, if the Mayor had difficulty in giving a Civic Lunch to a party including four Africans, then the Chamber of Commerce was willing to extend such hospitality on behalf of the town. As Kipling stated so aptly in one of his admirable short stories—there is always a "modus vivendi" in such matters. But being badly organized—no accommodation and no official lunch . . . a bad show!

As I see it, Southern Rhodesia is starting its own line of approach to the Colour Problem. We prefer a Culture Bar as opposed to a Colour Bar. If any man can achieve a civilized standard of living and behaviour then we are going to admit him as a full citizen. Not in five minutes—it will take some time for us to adjust and to be sure of our ground.

It is necessary that we should do so for the following reasons:—

British standards have been hammered into succeeding generations of Britishers over many centuries. They differ in degrees from other European races and British democracy is all but unworkable in most other countries.

The African does not beat his children and his standards can be illustrated by stating that a good liar has much prestige; a poor liar is scorned when his clumsy lie is exposed. Theft is roughly on the same basis—to be discovered is the dishonour. Give him a position of responsibility and his reaction is "what can I make out of it". It is an extensive "racket". Even Africans seeking work are fleeced by the firm's head boys, who will promise to get work for them from the "boss". In the Government Hospital it is stated that an African patient must bribe the African Orderlies if he wants proper attention.

Unpaid public service is not understandable to the average African and I think they do not believe that many Europeans are not paid for such service.

As regards cleanliness—the African, and I particularly mean the 75 per cent. from the Reserves—is not used to European methods. His “kia” is normally bug infested and his sanitary arrangements non-existent. If you have a gang of labourers, say at the Kyle Dam site, and build a row of pit latrines, then they consider the latrines as indicating an area to be used, and for a radius of 50 yards in every direction the ground is littered. It is not long ago, when we built a public latrine for Africans, that we embedded broken glass down the corners of all available brick walls for reasons you can guess. Even today many of the less educated Africans consider anywhere inside the latrine enclosure is “good enough”. The buckets are certainly an idea, but not necessarily a good one!

These are some of the reasons why white Rhodesians refuse to consider throwing open their conveniences, hotels, wash-rooms, etc. to people, 90 per cent. of whom have no civilized standards as we know them.

This position is not static and the increasing impact of our standards will slowly rectify these problems, but it must be a very slow process, as so many Africans are not Urban dwellers and there is a continual stream from the Reserves seeking work in the towns.

After 40 years in Africa I must admit that I know very little about how the African thinks, although I must know a little more than many Europeans.

Race relations in Southern Rhodesia are slowly becoming more and more understanding as the black and white races get to know each other better. Here and there genuine friendships are springing up and the future is promising.

We are proud of the knowledge we have gained and the results we have achieved, and we are confident that we have the answer. Not a hard and fast one—but we are on the right road and by the careful use of trial and error method we shall arrive at our goal—a united and happy Rhodesia.

We do not want outsiders, without knowledge but with all the answers, to come here and tell us what to do.

I am at a loss to understand how Britain can consider throwing off all those responsibilities which put the prefix “Great” before her name. Napoleon, the Kaiser, Hitler and Mussolini all failed to achieve what Britain herself has done of her own free will in the past few years—and is patting herself on the back for doing it! I maintain she has fallen for a line of propaganda which I would compare with the basic principle of Judo wrestling. You do not use your own strength to defeat an opponent, but let him use his own exertions to defeat himself. At this rate Britain will soon stand stripped and will have antagonised her own best friends in the process.

I attach a small cutting from the Bulawayo Chronicle of April 6th, entitled “Rebels wiped out”. It made one inch of space and no comment anywhere. Yet a bruised toe of a rioting African Umfazi caused a Royal Commission of Enquiry at a cost of over £100,000—at our expense I suppose? What is Britain doing to us? Did she make even a protest over China’s murder of thousands in Tibet?

“Rebels wiped out”

“A platoon of Indonesian rebels was killed recently when Indonesian gunboats and short batteries opened fire on 25 rebel boats in the middle of a lake in North Celebes.”

Hapana Basa: This notice is displayed at many business premises in town. It means “No Work”. The Recession caused to a great extent by British Political Agitation and events in Kenya and Nyasaland, has thrown thousands of Africans out of work, as well as hundreds of Europeans. Any further attempts to interfere with our race problems, especially on the lines of “one man one vote” will bring disaster to the economy of this country, on which the African depends. Each European here means employment to one, two or even a hundred Africans. Consider the High Commission territories where there are few Europeans—the African inhabitants have to seek work elsewhere, in the Union or in Southern Rhodesia. No Europeans, no work. It is as simple as that. Southern Rhodesia needs a steady influx of thousands of Europeans a year to provide work for the normal annual increase of Africans.

As a final thought—we, British and Afrikaners living together in racial harmony as Rhodesians, have made this country, with precious little help from overseas. I do not count interest bearing loans as help—they are business transactions. From bare veld, plagued by drought, disease and wild animals, and having to teach regular working principles to African tribes, we, and our fathers, have achieved something deserving of the highest praise. Instead of that we are being subjected to a most vicious campaign of hatred by the British Press, which may yet cost thousands of lives—our lives, unfortunately.

I have organized the signing of the printed Memo for your Commission and hope to get 1,000 signatures in this small area. Apart from Government Officials, who cannot take part in politics, only about 2 per cent. of Europeans who read the Memo did not sign with enthusiasm.

It would be such a help if the Africans—and when I use that word I refer to our local Africans—would cease being irresponsible, unreliable, untruthful and dishonest, and grew up to be worthwhile partners in building the country. At present each European, on paper, is having to provide free education, hospitalisation, roads, irrigation, etc. etc. for approximately 10 Africans. The financial strain is too great. A veneer of education is not civilization, and the crying need of the moment is for civilized black men who can think on civilized European lines. It may take several generations to produce these. We also need a more enlightened attitude among more Europeans in the way of discarding colour alone as a civilization test. I think that is coming fairly quickly.

Fort Victoria.

Oral Evidence

C. T. GIRDLESTONE

The witness said that he had been in Fort Victoria since 1929, and was now running a motor business and a farm. Earlier he had been in Basutoland.

In order to develop the country it was necessary to bring in good middle class immigrants including the most highly skilled type of artisans. It was not desirable to bring in a lower class of immigrant who competed directly with African labour. With the opening up of the Kyle Dam, thousands of acres of land would be irrigated for the production of fruit etc.; Africans could not do so unaided.

At present the two races did not think alike; it was very rare to find an African of a standard of education which enabled him to think on European lines. Nevertheless, such people were beginning to go forward and the country was well on the way towards a better understanding between the races. The number of Europeans who regarded colour as an overriding test of civilization were becoming fewer; this was recently demonstrated at a meeting of the Fort Victoria Rate Payers Society at which Coloured and Asian members were made welcome. At the present time, there were virtually no African rate payers who could join such a society. It was significant that at the present time no Africans, even those who were well off, paid income tax.

The time was not yet ripe for the abolition of all discriminatory legislation. Unfortunately many Africans remained highly irresponsible and even cruel, particularly in their behaviour towards animals, which they were prepared to mutilate in order to have a chance of securing the meat when the beast had to be slaughtered. There were two ways of dealing with the present situation whereby Africans were barred from going into hotels and other places. The first was that certain Africans who were able to pass a test of culture should be designated as “assimilados,” as in Portuguese East Africa, or, alternatively, that hotels should have an annexe at which Africans could stay. On the latter system, it would be open to an hotel keeper to admit into the main part of his hotel any African who seemed to be comparable with a European. Some Europeans might dislike this idea at first, but it would soon be accepted.

Memorandum

E. M. BADZA

Land Animal Husbandry Act

Part One. The introduction of Land Husbandry Act and the allocation of land Southern Rhodesia sounded very wisely in theory, but practically affected or deprived the African to use the land of his birth accordingly.

Part Two. When the Destocking Act was introduced during the year 1945 Africans were made to understand that the land is becoming too small for the number of cattle people had at that period and it was mentioned that the grazing area was becoming impossible for the stock to feed sufficiently. One important factor was that soil erosion became a deadlock to many farmers. The country could not produce enough food for its inhabitants. Thousands of cattle were detached from the Africans and Europeans were allowed to buy all these cattle and put them in their farms. The destocking continued on until today and where you find many Africans who do not have cattle. The minimum number of stock an African is allowed at present is three and the maximum is eight herds. Assuming that many Africans have no savings account of money like other races do he should be allowed to keep a reasonable number of herds to make his life a bit simpler by means of selling cattle whenever needs arise.

This statement of saying that there are too many cattle in the country of Southern Rhodesia does not carry the weight to me and many other Africans because all the destocked cattle are bought by Europeans who do not export them to other countries but do keep them in the same land of Southern Rhodesia.

Allocation of lands

The question of allocation of land has brought a grave misunderstanding between the Native Department and Africans in Southern Rhodesia. The reasons being that there are many people who used to own lands before the Act, but when the Act was introduced some of these people could not be given lands to plough and were told to look for places where they can make their living. That is to go and work in towns, mines, farms or to buy land from another African who is going to purchase a farm or going to work somewhere. Some Africans are given places to build their homes, but have no right to own a land. The argument given here is that all those people who didn't register their surnames (Mutopo) during the year 1955 and 56 have no permission to own land because the land is only available to the registered ones. The reason of surnames is quite genuine as a law having been put by the government that every individual should abide with it. But this law does not justify the government to deprive someone to use the land where we all know that our life depends on it.

To make the Federation a success, the Federal Government should open its eyes abroad to see that every citizen in the Federation has a place where he or she gets a living. If another section of the race tries to monopolise all things to its advantage there will always be misunderstandings among the Federation's inhabitants. I wish the Commission to take these matters very considerable, since they are the most important subjects in the African life.

Oral Evidence

E. M. BADZA

Mr. Badza submitted and read his memorandum. He stated that he was a clerk employed by a local company. He farmed eight acres and had five cattle.

In answer to questions, he said that when the Europeans had taken the cattle, as referred to in his memorandum, they had kept them on their farms or sold them to butchers. Africans were not at present allowed to keep more than a maximum of five cattle. He said Africans saw European farmers with thousands of cattle. He felt the Government had wronged the Africans.

He stated there were young Africans of fifteen and sixteen who were not allowed to buy any cattle at present, because they could not be allotted any land. To an African, cattle represented money: also, without a cow or without oxen he could not plough or sow.

As regards the allocation of land, in 1956 Africans had been told to record their holdings of land to the Native Commissioners. Africans who were away from Southern Rhodesia were not able to do so, and on their return in 1957, when the allocation of land began, found they were not eligible for an allocation. He did not know whether this had happened throughout Southern Rhodesia; he was speaking of the area he knew, round Fort Victoria.

The witness stated that Africans felt Federation had been bad because before Federation there had been none of these things. Land distribution had been introduced before Federation, but the people thought it started then. In general, he wanted Federation to continue. It had done some good. If the land question could be put right he felt sure people would like Federation. Though land questions were territorial, he thought there were certain other subjects in which the Governments had joined together to promote the good of the people.

Memorandum (i)

SIX MEMBERS OF THE CHIREDDI RANCHERS' ASSOCIATION

R. L. Sparrow
B. G. Beverley
J. H. De La Rue
G. C. Style
A. P. J. Bezuidenhout
S. W. Southwood

We represent the farming community with varying points of view. Three Members of our delegation—S. W. Southwood, B. G. Beverley, A. P. J. Bezuidenhout—believe that the Federation should be broken up as it has gone beyond the point where political cohesion is possible. Three Members of our delegation—I. H. de la Rue, G. C. Style and R. L. Sparrow—believe that the experiment of Federation is worth further endeavour to make it a success.

However, jointly we submit the following on the assumption that if it is to continue then certain changes are essential to its progress for in its present form it is clumsy and politically unstable.

1. Since colonial affairs have increasingly become party politics in the British House of Commons, Britain has become more and more unable to govern her outside territories. Not only are local loyalties split within the colonial territories, but policies are played one against the other in the House of Commons. A glaring example of this is the appointment of the Monckton Commission by one party and the boycotting of it by the other.

2. The three territories of the Federation form a well knit and well balanced unit economically and in natural endowment . . . farming . . . mining and industrial . . . and has a great future, provided that it is properly governed, and that loyalties remain within the country, and are not split to divided parliaments thousands of miles away. We approve the principle of Federation.

3. Something has to replace the present trust of the British Government, till a greater majority of the adult people of the Federation are fit to exercise a full vote. We consider that an Upper House to the Federal Parliament be established on the following lines:

1. All members be appointed by the Federal Governor with the authority of Her Majesty . . . as she does with the House of Lords.
2. Seven members be appointed to represent each territory and fourteen members for the Federal Government. These appointees shall be made of people not less than 40 years of age . . . they shall be well acquainted with the territories for which they are appointed, and they shall be appointed for their knowledge or standing in the community regardless of race, colour or creed. Their appointments shall be made after consultation with the Governments concerned, but not necessarily with their approval. The Queen's decision through Her Governor shall be final.
3. They shall hold office for seven years, and be eligible for re-appointment, and shall retire in rotation, so that five new members will be appointed annually.
4. All territorial and Federal Legislation shall pass through them, except financial matters, which will then have the same channels as exist in the British House of Lords. The duties of the members will be to present the legislation of the territory for which the members are responsible, and on which they will be expected to be fully informed . . . but they will not be in any way bound to vote in favour of such legislation.
5. This upper Federal House will replace all powers enjoyed by Britain, but the original appointees will be made by the British Commonwealth Minister after consultation with the Governments concerned.
6. As the work of this House will be heavy and onerous, its Members will be adequately rewarded.
4. A constitution of fundamental human rights be drawn up and enshrined in our constitution, and these shall not be withdrawn until at least 75% of the adult population of the Federation, both male and female, are enfranchised. A franchise which shall not discriminate on grounds of race colour or creed.
5. The top heaviness of our administration if applied to a place like England, can be seen, as England would have a Parliament and Governor to every two counties . . . 25 in all, plus six Federal Parliaments for the different areas . . . a position that is laughable. Yet we have to support such an administration.

We suggest:

1. There be only one Governor, who shall perform the formalities for all four Governments.
2. The main Government of the country be vested in the Federal Government . . . at present powers are so split that they are almost unworkable . . . and that only limited items be vested in the Territorial Governments . . . we would suggest here for the Territorial Governments to retain only Native Administration and Land Rights.
3. It is thoroughly undesirable in a Federal state to have the capital of the Federation, the same as a state capital. It gives the one state an unfair advantage over the more distant state. We consider that the Federal Capital remain in Salisbury, but that the Southern Rhodesia state capital be moved as far away as possible, and thus Bulawayo be selected. This is not just a territorial matter . . . but has a serious Federal implication. The Federal capital must be free from any undue territorial influence.

6. In very few countries of the world have the older civilizations been able to make democracy work, and the cry of one man one vote in Africa is sheer demagogery, and could produce Dictatorship and bondage. We have seen in very recent times democracy in France fall to such a low level that a semi-dictatorship has been welcomed by the majority of its people. Such must not be allowed to happen in the Federation.

7. It is essential that the Government of the Territories remain in the hands of civilised peoples, and certain standards of education and earning be maintained before the franchise be granted. Where this cannot be granted appointments be made as at present with the Northern Territories. However, it should be the policy gradually to widen the franchise regardless of race, colour or creed, so long as reasonable standards are maintained. It might be possible for instance to grant universal franchise gradually according to age, so that experience rather than education could let in further number of voters . . . at some period . . . though not initially . . . possibly all men and women over the age of 45 should be eligible for the vote. (Age is an important voting factor in all democracies.)

8. As Farmers we would specifically urge all Agriculture in the three territories be made Federal. We have seen the benefits gained by European Agriculture in Northern and Southern Rhodesia, being Federal and the benefits derived by Territorial Agriculture in this regard . . . to specify . . . Cattle Marketing and guaranteed prices applied to European producers has greatly benefited Native Territorial Farmers. Likewise with maize and the guarantees of prices and marketing. But there are many anomalies to our divided Governments responsibilities which time has now shown need not exist, and we cannot afford to have four Governments mixed up in Federal Agriculture . . . it is wasteful and inefficient.

9. We approve the principle of partnership between the races, and the gradual removal of discrimination between them. However, we recognise that at the present time there is a wide difference between the races, in eating habits, education, sanitation, and personal habits, and that the pace should not be unduly hurried nor forced. Where one race desires to have separate facilities there should not be objection provided the interests of the other races are not impinged.

10. We believe that Federation has a very bright future, provided the administration and loyalties remain with the Federation. We believe that the vast majority of the population of all races are happy and satisfied, and we believe that conditions are greatly improving for all, both in health, wealth and education which are a sound basis for our future. We believe however there are a few self-seekers who shout loud from the housetops, who proclaim they have allegiance to vast numbers of people, but who in fact are doing their fellow men a great disservice and in fact do not represent the vast majority of the contented population.

Memorandum (ii)

G. C. STYLE

I should like to commence this Memorandum by quoting two paragraphs from B. G. Pavers' "His Own Oppressor":

"In January, 1957, the Rt. Hon. Alan Lennox-Boyd, as Secretary of State for Colonies, was asked in a press interview: 'What can be done to strengthen the Federation in the hearts and loyalties of its inhabitants of all races?'"

His reply was: "I would answer that the first task is to make it clear that Federation is here to stay and all must help to make it work well. Many people in the Commonwealth have been confronted before now with constitutional arrangements they have not entirely endorsed. They have decided to give it a go and make the best they could of what they had."

Surely the time has come—if in fact it is not overdue—for the Colonial Office administration in Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia, and Mr. Macleod in particular, to make it absolutely clear now, and in no uncertain manner, that Federation is here to stay.

Although many of us in the Fort Victoria district were against Federation in the first instance, we do realise that it would be a tragedy for the nearly four million Africans—and the Europeans—in the northern territories, if they were allowed to secede.

Since Federation, Colonial Office influence has been felt more and more in this Colony and has disturbed to a great extent our happy race relations. However, in the country districts things are much the same as formerly, with contented labour forces on the farms and ranches.

The following true story gives some idea of their interest in politics. An African in a trading store was asked what he thought of Federation. His reply was: "Oh! Have you got some. I've spent all my money, but I'll buy one next week."

It is only fair to us European Farmers, many of us born in Africa, that the British Government, for whom a lot of us have lost all respect for their handling of affairs in Africa, should realise that the majority of Africans are only one generation removed from savagery. They must realise that the Europeans are here to stay and are determined to keep the Government in civilised hands.

Many of us, born in Africa of British parents, have been brought up to respect the African, but we do realise his limitations, and it must be realised that integrity has not necessarily advanced with learning. In our Trading Stores we find the greatest difficulty in engaging an honest African, and for a farm or ranch store to reveal a shortage, at stock-taking, of up to £300 and more, is a common occurrence.

We have been subjected to certain pin-pricks since the advent of Federation and feel that the tempo of African advancement is moving too fast. There are demands for the removal of the colour-bar almost overnight. It is nothing short of chaotic in the Fort Victoria Post Office on a busy day, since the removal of the partition, owing to the delays caused by the raw African in conducting his business. On one occasion an African child was found writing a letter home at the only table available in the Post Office—no doubt the average African would prefer the old partition system.

Of late, there has been a clamour, from certain misguided quarters, for the removal of the colour-bar in public lavatories. So many people just will not realise that the raw African is still in the majority, and that he is unhygienic in the extreme. A suit of clothes is too often taken to be the badge of civilization. It would be a revelation to some people to see the state of some African latrines when it has been found necessary to whitewash them every week owing to the filthy state of the corners of the buildings and the smearing on the walls. In many cases the floor is preferred to the pit and latrine floors can be found completely covered with excreta.

We feel that our good race relations in this Colony are being upset by misguided people trying to advance the African too rapidly and by trying to, in a few cases, enforce social integration.

Finally, we feel that it is imperative that an intensive campaign be carried out by the Colonial Office in the Northern territories, to bring home to the African there the benefits that Federation will bring and the great disadvantages of secession. We feel that far too little has been done in the past in this respect, elaving an open field for the agitators.

Oral Evidence

CHIREDDI RANCHERS' ASSOCIATION

Representatives: I. De La Rue
G. C. Style
B. G. Beverley

Two memoranda had been submitted by members of the Ranchers' Association.

Mr. de la Rue said that his Association covered the Triangle and Hippo Valley. His Association was not strongly politically minded.

He felt that full powers should be given to the Federation. If a Federal Upper House were established, it should be on non-political lines so that the Queen, who now exercised her powers through the British House of Commons, could, with their approval, transfer them to such a body of responsible people in the Federation. The decision of the Upper House would be final, as an impartial and authoritative body. It was envisaged that the members would be appointed by the Governor: they would take the measures and the Governor would merely sign, as did the Queen, Decisions should be by a simple majority.

His Association considered that such powers as were thought necessary should be retained in Territorial hands. They preferred Native Administration to remain Territorial as at present; land rights should also remain Territorial because this was the specific wish of Africans. Southern Rhodesia could have Dominion status, if it wished, within this framework, because it could delegate such powers as seemed fit to the Federal Government. If the Federation were disbanded, these powers would revert to the Southern Rhodesia Government.

Though not constitutional lawyers, members of his Association offered the suggestion of a Federal Upper House as a possible basis on which to take the country's administration out of the hands of the British and the Americans—the Americans brought pressure on the British, and the British on the Federation. Loyalties were divided at present. The Upper House was necessary to exercise control if a certain section of politicians went haywire. It would act as an arbiter on the Territorial Governments. Southern Rhodesia would be likely to agree to this because authority delegated to the Federal House would be preferable to keeping reservations in the Constitution exercised as at present by a Parliament 6,000 miles away. Indeed, many Southern Rhodesians would be glad if some powers were taken out of the hands of politicians looked after by business men, responsible people and men of religion.

Any matter which the Territories felt was vital to their interests should be reserved for the Territorial Governments; otherwise they might be reduced to the level of local government Councils. They need not necessarily be identical in form. If the Northern Territories felt that certain interests should remain Territorial, then that should be arranged if necessary.

The three members of the Association who felt it was worth while to try to hold the Federation together were not committed to any particular plan; they would support any plan which helped to improve the situation and had a good chance of working. For the time being the Federal franchise qualifications should probably remain as they were. To change too much at any one time would be a mistake. If the framework were improved, the franchise would no doubt fall into line.

The Association were not agreed about a change in the Territorial franchise. It was a delicate situation, and in general it was felt that the present situation should stand for the time being, but that if widening of the franchise were considered, age should be a factor. This would reduce the danger of a number of young men being influenced by wild talk.

Mr. Beverley said that he felt the Northern Territories had gone beyond the point of no return. Through outside pressure, Nyasaland was almost bound to secede; it might therefore as well come now as later. However, if Federation improved and was continued, Europeans would support it to the best of their ability.

In his view, Northern Rhodesia would not necessarily leave the Federation if Nyasaland did. Most people would prefer Northern Rhodesia and Southern Rhodesia to form a union, and it had been suggested that they might join with Angola and Portuguese East Africa.

He did not think that if Federation broke up Southern Rhodesia would join with the Union of South Africa. Southern Rhodesia had mineral resources, tobacco and cattle, and many people thought that the country could manage alone, though financially things might be difficult. Most people would vote against joining with the Union, as they had done long ago.

Mr. Style said that he personally was not in favour of the age qualification for the franchise: one could not retain civilization on a basis of age alone. He felt strongly that the Colonial Office had failed to explain the benefits of Federation to the Africans in the Northern Territories. If something was imposed on a country, those who imposed it were under an obligation to give good reasons to the inhabitants and to explain the advantages and the benefits of what had been done. He did not know whether the Territorial Governments could have helped in this direction or not. It would be morally wrong to let Nyasaland secede, as well as being unfair to the Africans there who had been wrongly led by demagogues. He felt that it was imperative to retain Federation.

TWO AFRICAN WITNESSES, RESIDENT NEAR FORT VICTORIA*

In answer to questions, the first witness stated he was a Chief. He considered the African state must be improved. It was very low. The pay of the Chiefs was very low. A complaint had been made to the Chiefs' Assembly, but nothing had been done. A Chief's payment was £14 a month and his fee for trying cases in court was 5/- per case. He feared that unless the pay was raised, younger and more educated men would refuse to become Chiefs.

Federation was good if all people were treated well. There was a great difference between conditions in Southern Rhodesia and the two Northern Territories. Chiefs in the Northern Territories had more authority and higher salaries.

People did not like the Land Husbandry Act. It caused bitterness because a man who was not in a reserve when the allocation was made had missed his chance of land. The ordinary man in the area had six to ten acres; some had even less. There was additional grazing land, but no more than six head of cattle could be kept, unless a man was able to buy land rights from somebody else.

The Chief stated that many people in the area had been swindled by fraudulent financiers; these men had persuaded people to invest money in non-existent businesses. (The witness produced a list of people who had lost money.) The second witness said that he himself had lost more than £200 altogether.

* Names withheld at the request of the witnesses.

Memorandum

E. V. CHIMOMBE (Member of African Advisory Council, Fort Victoria—Urban Native Township)

I feel I should draw your attention to a few points as what should be done to make the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland a success.

Agriculture

This is one of the everlasting problems imposed on the African of Southern Rhodesia and which makes him opposed to the Government of Federation—the implementation of the Land Husbandry Act. This was introduced in order to make an African remain an industrial cheap labourer of the civilized immigrants in urban areas, because no human being would expect one to live and maintain his family economically and educationally from two acres plus one head of cattle permitted to him. And yet he is expected to do the best use of that small piece of land on the poorest soil of places set aside for Africans by the Land Apportionment Act. Refer to Native Department, Southern Rhodesia Government.

Education

If Federation is meant to benefit citizens of all races in Rhodesia and Nyasaland, African education should go Federal. This I think would enable the Federation to improve its citizens and train them to be skilled workers in the development of their country. But if one section of the inhabitants is left under the different Government, that section is forced to suspect the aims of the Federation.

Partnership

During the trial stage of the Federation the practical implementation of partnership has failed mainly because of the Southern Rhodesia Government's segregatory and discriminatory laws which are opposed to direct African representation in the Parliament. With this in view the Africans in the Northern Territories feel that the success of Federation would mean the deprivation of their direct political and cultural ties with the United Kingdom. And also that these discriminatory laws of Southern Rhodesia would be extended to Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

Oral Evidence

E. V. CHIMOMBE

Mr. Chinombe said that he was not opposed to Federation if it was run in accordance with what he understood was meant by partnership. At the present time Africans had no voice in the running of their affairs. He personally was Chairman of a Sub-Committee of the African Advisory Council, but the Sub-Committee could be disbanded at any time. Membership of the Town Council was reserved for Europeans only—there should be some African members on the Council as Africans formed a majority of the population of Fort Victoria. Such Africans should be elected in the same way as other members of the Council.

Memorandum

J. M. GONDO

May it please your Lordships' Commission to consider the following facts.

Partnership Policy

1. The Federal Constitution included, inter alia, the statement that it would foster Partnership and Co-operation between its inhabitants and enable the Federation, when its inhabitants so desire, to go forward with confidence towards attainment of full membership of the Commonwealth.

2. When the Federation became an accomplished fact, no definition was established as to what sort of partnership that would be. The word Partnership, being capable of various interpretations, leaders took those definitions which suited their way of administration.

3. Some leaders have taken it to mean a partnership involving a junior and a senior partner, others said that it meant a relationship similar to that of a husband and wife, and a few have taken its various commercial meanings. Africans have taken up one of its best interpretations, which is a relationship between two or more persons, who carry on an undertaking to which each contributes something with the object of making a gain, and sharing it equally between themselves.

4. The lack of a precise official definition has brought great confusion between the white and black inhabitants of the Federation. The African is looking forward for a constitution which will provide for an equal share and an equal participation. Therefore, I suggest that the partnership policy should now be reduced to precise official terms which do not permit by-interpretations.

Economic Problems

1. The European standard of living is also needed by Africans, but the European will not stand the nonsense of lowering his standard at the expense of stepping up the standard of a mass of backward people. Hence the Land Apportionment Law, which is the other form of the old idea of segregation.

2. It follows automatically that in order to maintain one end of the stick up, the other end must remain low. The high standard must be promoted and supported by high wages and salaries. Hence, the wage structure of the country, which ranges from approximately £6 to £30 for Africans and from £70 to £140 per month for Europeans.

3. Because the African is backward and cannot be miraculously transformed into a civilized person, very little has been done to bring African's accommodation nearer to that of a European. The Government has spent colossal sums of money on Africans' housing schemes, but only to produce a mass of crowded shanty buildings, which by the nature of their shape and plan, do not encourage the occupier to practise better ways of living.

4. Various commissions have enquired upon the Africans' cost of living and accommodation but, because they have been aware of the fact that the one end of the stick must remain high and the other end low, their findings have not made any reasonable improvement regarding wages and housing for Africans.

5. The high standard is good and should be the goal of every inhabitant of the Federation, irrespective of colour. The standard itself is no respecter of race and, therefore, no group should claim the monopoly of the standard. It is understood as well as observed that the European has brought civilization into Central Africa, but the whole idea of standards is now being called upon to justify the continuation of Economic and political segregation.

6. It is this concept of standard which has made partnership impracticable and has hampered race relations in the Federation. I suggest that the constitution should provide open avenues for the progress of all the inhabitants in all walks of life and then we can leave it for ability, intelligence and hard workmanship of each man to determine the height of success.

The Franchise

1. In S. Rhodesia, the qualifications for 1917 were as follows:—

An income of £100 per year or property value of £150. There was a statement that, if these limits were in danger of being reached by Natives, they could be raised. This statement has developed into the present day major dictum that the Government must remain in civilized hands. This is a cleverly worded statement. What has it done on the present Franchise law?

An income of £720 per annum or property value of £1,500, the minimum qualifications for this group being an increase of £300 or property valued £500 plus Standard 10. I don't wish to mention the useless special Roll.

2. Democratically speaking, a good franchise should permit a reasonable majority of its people to exercise their right in choosing their Government. The present set up of the qualifications are indications of the fear of an African majority in Parliament. I should consider it reasonable to leave the qualifications at the 1951 level, which were, an income of £240, or property value of £500, plus literacy. (That is, ability to fill up the enrolment form in English unaided.)

3. Therefore, My Lord and the Honourable Commission, I suggest that the Franchise laws should permit a reasonable majority of the Federation's inhabitants to participate in choosing their Government.

In conclusion, it should be remembered that the European and the African are lawful inhabitants of this land, and dual holders of this country; only a constitution which will respect our dual ownership in the right spirit and on equal terms is adequate for the promotion of the Federation.

Fort Victoria

Oral Evidence

J. M. GONDO

accompanied by Mr. MUNODOWAFA

Mr. Gondo said that he was an Associate of the Institute of Commerce and had a business as a butcher in the Fort Victoria urban township. The meaning of the word "partnership" in the Preamble to the Constitution was not clear; each man interpreted it in the sense which appealed to him. Africans expected originally that it would raise their status, but it had turned out not to do so. It was essential that the term "partnership" should be clearly defined to the satisfaction of all.

In answer to questions, Mr. Gondo made the following further points:

- (a) Many Africans read the newspapers and were interested in the problems of African advancement; it was a mistake to think that the African population was entirely illiterate and unconcerned with politics.
- (b) There was very little direct activity by political parties in Southern Mashonaland, but several parties had been established there in recent months. Literate men were well aware of the existence of political parties elsewhere.
- (c) Discrimination must not be made on the basis of colour. Although many Africans realised that discriminatory legislation such as the Land Apportionment Act discriminated sometimes in favour of Africans, it was also true that it kept most of the best land for Europeans.
- (d) Although a state of emergency had been declared in Southern Rhodesia, there had been no disturbances and people wanted to know why the emergency had been declared. They felt that the Government were not trying to get down to the root cause of the trouble. Many of those arrested were very inexperienced; the people who were at the root of the trouble had not been found.

Mr. Munodowafa said that there was anxiety felt that the policies of Southern Rhodesia would be extended to the Northern Territories and that Federation was the thin edge of the wedge of amalgamation which had been rejected earlier. The franchise laws were based on inordinately high qualifications so as to ensure a majority of Europeans. Only a thousand voters out of 64,000 in Southern Rhodesia were Africans.

Africans were very worried at the Federal Government's immigration policy. According to the "Rhodesia Herald" on 5th February, 1958, Sir Roy Welensky had said that by 1984 Europeans would outnumber Africans in Southern Rhodesia. This frightened Africans very much and fulfilled the earlier suspicions that Europeans wanted permanent domination of the country.

Partnership had totally failed. There were differences of pay between Africans and Europeans doing the same work and literate Africans were not given equal opportunity with Europeans. Under the Land Apportionment Act, people like Mr. Gondo were prevented from putting his business where he wished to—in an area where he could serve both Africans and Europeans. He had been interested by a statement by Professor Clegg that Europeans were able to double their incomes in the Federation compared with the United Kingdom, even though they were not more efficient there than they were at home.

No African wanted to dominate the Europeans or that the Europeans should go back home. All they wanted was to eliminate insecurity, fear and suspicion. It was necessary to ensure that the fundamental freedoms were available to all.

Memorandum

B. V. BREWER

In placing this memorandum before the Monckton Commission, it must be asked, if the British Section of the International Jurists definition of the primary object of Justice is considered binding on the Monckton Commission viz:—

"to uphold and strengthen the principle of the Rule of Law in the territories for which the British Parliament is directly or ultimately responsible; in particular to assist in the maintenance of the highest standards of administration of justice and in the preservation of the fundamental liberties of the individual".

And if the above is upheld, then the next important matter to study must be Mr. Atlee's speech in the House of Commons when on August 22nd 1945, he, as Prime Minister requested all parties in the House to ratify the United Nations Charter, and, when he was discussing chapter two he gave to the House a clear undertaking to see that the protectorate countries like Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland would be lead to self Government, but, he certainly did not indicate self Government within a Federation, and the question must be asked,

"was the Secretary General of U.N.O. informed of the first and subsequent European political moves to bring about the present dangerous and unsatisfactory Federation of Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

It must be recorded by the Commission that, prior to the Referendum, Sir Roy Welensky, speaking at Fort Victoria, referred to the United Nations' Charter as a piece of paper when requested to explain how any political party could repudiate the signature of the British Government to the Charter, and Mr. Van Eelden of Northern Rhodesia, when shown a copy of Mr. Atlee's speech, referred to it as Labour Party propaganda. At the second meeting on the subject of Federation, the Hon. W. A. E. Winterton MP. was informed that if Federation was forced on Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland Africans, trouble would occur and the European will be at fault.

The European politicians, having forced Federation on the Africans, talked of Partnership, but a Partnership only arises from an agreement, and to be a successful partnership there must be a definite mutual interest and goodwill of the partners, and this cannot be claimed to-day, so that partnership talk is not worth considering. As the reckless talk on partnership by the senior and educated partner is not conducive to the best interest of the other two partners in their present uneducated state, especially in the matter of so called Democracy.

To grant full democratic rights to a community before the general body of the people is fit and ready to exercise its powers and duties, is a very dangerous proceeding. It frequently results in the concentration of power in the hands of a few persons who have neither the training or tradition behind them which would enable them to administer the Government as trustees of the people and not for their own and their political parties benefit, while the people themselves are left without guidance and rule of their natural leaders.

It can be claimed with all fairness to previous and present Government in Southern Rhodesia that these Governments have been and are controlled by men who have not the training and tradition so essential to the understanding of the complex mentality of the various African races within the present Federation, and the majority of the European elected members are not suited to discuss the great African Question, as they have certainly not the training and tradition. A very large majority of Europeans, reared within a given system, demands that the African be forced to live under the said system.

To bring the African into the European political system, which system millions of Europeans in England do not understand correctly, is to deceive the Africans that they have machinery of an advanced type over the old tribal system, yet they are in fact, becoming really voiceless in the affairs of the country after making a single cross on one day every five years or sometimes less. It is obvious to any person that, with the political system that the Europeans wish to establish among the Africans, it will result in a distinct cleavage between educated Africans and the various Chiefs as the true and accredited representatives of the uneducated masses supported naturally by the various European Political Parties who for votes, and power, will, like in all European countries, promise the illiterate African through the educated African various benefits that they will not receive.

Typical examples of Political election deception are,

- (1) Land fit for Heroes to live in.
- (2) Hang the Kaiser.
- (3) An acre and a cow for every man.
- (4) The various Freedoms etc.,

and, if you have the African members of a political party touring the country, speaking for the various European political parties, it is certain that there will be a lot of loose talk on a given political programme that even the African speaker may not be properly versed in, as European politicians are for ever making statements that are not properly understood by Europeans let alone Africans, and even educated Africans do not always realise the full implications of a speech made, and certain phrases will be accepted as being a definite fact when the whole will alter their conception. In opposing the European system, it can be believed that it will occur to every sensible African that, under the conditions in which they would live under such a foreign idea to them, it will become imperative for the Africans of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland to come together and to think and act together and strike for a measure of control over their own affairs which will render them less and less the butt of political experiment and political chicanery of the present rulers.

The African system of justice had many good points, and though the British Section of the International Commission of Jurists have been pressing for compensation to be paid to victims of crimes of violence, the so called ignorant and savage African, had for centuries within the given tribal system the very thing, that the Council as stated, is now demanding as a Just Act.

All the Whiteman in Rhodesia and Nyasaland can offer the African, is a system of Political deception edged around with graft and corruption and illegal acts that the so-called Courts of Justice condone even when brought to the notice of the Minister of Justice, acting for a given political party controlling Southern Rhodesia, and it is fair to claim as can be proved, that the justice in Southern Rhodesia can be called to question in numerous instances, especially the attitudes of certain types of Lawyers and Government officials in dealing with the attempts to secure Justice for White or Black. The attached instances are given.

It is admitted that to some extent the Africans have received material benefit, but at the expense of living under a political system that they will never understand, and the destruction of a social system, that, however crude and cruel it may have seemed to the European, was a system thought out and put into operation by the brains of the Africans, to suit the mentality of the African, and it was a system that worked until outside influence commenced its destruction, and to-day you have the African mentality trying to understand a European system of Government that even the Europeans admit leads to Wars, Bribery and Corruption, and here it is fair to state, that even Lord Malvern has stated that politics is a "Dirty Scientific Game".

It has been proved throughout the ages that Democracy has never worked in a theorist manner, even when controlled by superior brain power, and Marcus Aurelius confirmed Mano in the matter of politicians in those distant days, and to-day there is no improvement. Democracy does not take into account the Customs and Manners of a given group, and to whether Democracy is suitable to a given group, and in Southern Rhodesia the Government have shown this to be true, by the insane way they have moved into the Low Veldt in the South East portion of Rhodesia, "the boundaries of the Va-Silengwe", the Va-Karanga and the Ama-Tebele whose customs and manners are entirely different, and therefore how much more so is the idea of expecting Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland Africans to agree to a system of Government, that, if the United Nations Charter is more than a scrap of paper, are being forced to live under a very imperfect and often unjust system of Government organised by the European. Europeans are not always suited to settle disputes between Africans, because the mission of the person trying a case presupposes a knowledge of the customs and usages, and the more or less rudimentary African Law.

The African always knows better than the European, those habits and customs which constitute the atmosphere in which he has himself been reared.

The African has a greater understanding and better chances of discerning the truth out of the attitude, the speech or the reticence of the parties concerned.

With ever changing political position in the African World, and the numerous ideologies of the Europeans as to how the African should be ruled and under what system, however imperfect, questions must be asked, and among those questions are,

(1) "Can the British Government deny its signature to the United Nations Charter? (Chapter two).

(2) If the signature holds good to-day, what right, in the first instance, had the British Government to agree to the Federation being formed?

(3) While it can be understood by all normal minded people, the utter impossibility of granting self Government to the Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland Africans, under the so-called European Democratic system, until the said Africans have shown an ability and desire to adopt the dangerous system, is there any injustice being done if the British Government continue to control these two territories outside of the Federation.

(4) The idea of African Paramountcy in the two territories will certainly be thought of by the Europeans as a great danger, but the Democratic system does not work and will not work in a multi-racial country, due to the fact that, reason, in political matters is never allowed, due to party bias and the emotional state of mind that party politics cause even in men stated to have brains".

It must be understood, the African is a very emotional egoist, as witnessed by the various actions and speeches made by African leaders. Therefore, does it not seem best in the interest of all races, that, multi-racial countries should be governed more by a direct rule which the African thoroughly understands, "The Chief System", and it would not be out of place to suggest, as an experiment for proof, if Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland were (in the period after breaking from the Federation) ruled by a member of the Royal Family and a Council, this would be understood by the African in a far better manner than the system under which they are being forced to live, and which as witnessed, brings only hatred against the other races.

Only by the most intimate contact with the African Leaders will a system be worked out for a multi-racial peace.

It must be borne in mind that the African National Congress was formed in 1912 in the Union of South Africa. In 1920 during 1st to 31st August in Liberty Hall New York, the first declaration of Rights of the Negro People of the World was formulated, and its 54 points, together with the National Anthem are still the basis of the Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland Africans demands to-day. The Africans understood the cult of Personality and not a political system, and the personality of Dr. Banda and Dr. Nkrumah to-day are examples, with Chaka and Msilikazi in the past.

If the British Government do not honour the signature on the Charter, then if the Africans at large in future, looks at England in an unfriendly manner, it will certainly not be the Africans' fault.

B. V. BRÉWER

Mr. Brewer said that he had for many years been a hunter and trader and had done special work for the British South Africa Company.

It was wrong to try to bring the English political system into a country where people had totally different emotional reactions. You could not put an English mentality into an African make-up. Federation was not something which the Africans would ever accept. For example, local Africans in the Fort Victoria area wanted to get rid of boys from Nyasaland; they disliked inter-tribal mixing and did not get on well with one another.

One of the main difficulties was that Europeans knew nothing about African tribal customs and were biased against the Africans. For example, the whole idea of de-stocking in overcrowded grazing areas was contrary to the Lobola system under which men received dowries from their wives' parents. These dowries were a form of insurance policy against ill treatment of the wife and it was not appreciated that if a man was compelled to cull his herds the cattle he got rid of were often not his own. This led to great misunderstanding and accusations of sharp practice.

Memorandum.

C. M. AUSTIN

It will not have escaped the members of the Commission that any change in the Federal Constitution must be based on two entirely opposed cultures and traditions.

The African has certain social laws which are entirely foreign to those enjoyed (?) by the European, and many of them if practised by the European would bring him into conflict with the law of the land. If the African is to be given a greater say in the political life of the country, care should be taken that he does not legislate for European social restrictions whilst he himself retains his traditional background.

To wit: He practises polygamy.
He pays dowries.
He is not called upon to support children he has produced illegitimately.
The inheritance laws are not in the main governed by wills, but by tradition.

Bearing these factors in mind, many Europeans including the writer, feel strongly that the great majority of Africans are not yet ready to absorb the full implications of political and social partnership, and knowing this, will oppose any alteration in the franchise laws which will have even a token effect of placing Government in the hands of uncivilised people, or even if it has the effect of allowing these same people to legislate or assist thereto, for Europeans in legislation they themselves will not accept. This cannot be a new facet of approach to the Commission, but any attempt to alter the existing status quo will and must be resisted by the European.

Africans must accept that their representation in parliament where all laws, including social, are made must be on an equal footing with the European, and not that the European must accept lower economic qualifications to meet African Nationalist demands. If economic, political and social equality is demanded by Africans, they must accept the Western civilised standard as his starting point, but trouble only can ensue if two different cultures, two sets of social standards are allowed which emanate from a multi-racial parliament.

It may be argued that the African has been denied the opportunity of reaching economic equality because of low wages and unhygienic living conditions. I say it is impertinent for such a statement to be made, and support this view by mentioning the terrific advancement in a short space of time enjoyed by the African in Southern Rhodesia as opposed to the two Northern territories. It is amazing that the Colonial Office should suggest that they are the guardians of African welfare when their contribution to African advancement in Nyasaland has been tragically low indeed. If the policy of the Colonial Office is to protect these people from European exploitation, then their effort in the two Northern territories compared to Southern Rhodesia's endeavour has been pitifully small indeed. Private enterprise alone has advanced the African to his present state, not outside interference or Colonial Office veto.

It is a remarkable approach to Government when a certain section of the community has to have guaranteed to them something like 21 per cent. of the seats of a Federal Parliament, and in addition enjoy a common franchise privilege. This guarantee of representation is denied to the European.

A factor that I am sure the Commission will not overlook is the fact that African emancipation, whatever that may mean, is being demanded by those small number of emergent Africans who have risen outside the pale of their traditional tribal life, and they have now become agitators, in the main, for release from a so-called bondage of millions of Africans who are not interested in civilisation or in altering their barbaric and traditional ways. I submit it is not possible to have a contented multi-racial community where barbarism, witchcraft and other social evils are allowed to be enjoyed (?) by only a section of the community. By all means allow the emergent African to enjoy the privileges of his enterprise, but in meeting his demands, we Europeans cannot and must not allow the requirements of the few to be enjoyed by those who are far from ready to accept or even value it.

Southern Rhodesia's record of its fair treatment of all its citizens is something even the Colonial Office cannot emulate. It is something we (all of us) are proud of and any alteration of the Constitution should not be viewed from the very meagre assistance given by the guardians of black nationalism, to wit, the Colonial Office, but by the very humane approach, the very magnificent strides, and the proud effort of Southern Rhodesia, and so I say the Europeans want a dominion of the three territories. If in its wisdom the Commission cannot recommend such a step, then peace will only remain by a division of the Federation leaving Southern Rhodesia a Dominion in its own right, a right it has richly earned and certainly deserves.

I accept that the Commission has been formed with the sole purpose of advising the parties to the constitutional review talks of the methods by which the present Constitution of the Federation can and should be altered for the benefit of all the inhabitants. Its terms of reference are simply advisory, and do not provide for any recommendation for dismemberment of the Federation. But it should be borne in mind that it will be the Electorate of Southern Rhodesia who will ultimately decide whether the Federation should continue or not, and any alteration to the Federal Constitution not acceptable to the Europeans of Southern Rhodesia will surely bring to an end a Federation that is bold in concept and politically and economically sound in design.

Fort Victoria.

Oral evidence.

C. M. AUSTIN

Mr. Austin said that he was speaking in his personal capacity and not as Mayor of Fort Victoria. Much play had been made with the idea of partnership when Federation was being discussed but most of the Europeans who were opposed to Federation were very worried by the word. Politically it was easy to define but there were a variety of views and opinions about its social implications. His memorandum was based on what was meant by social partnership.

It would be tragic at this stage to dismember Federation, but it was impossible to have two cultures dictating social terms which the other community could not accept. If Africans wanted to participate in political life they must start by accepting Western standards of civilisation. On that basis, their entry into the social life of the European would be fully supported. There were a number of very fine emergent Africans. Unfortunately any laws made to release them from the present social colour bar would cover millions of others who were not of the same standard and who were not interested in European culture. It was unacceptable to Europeans to have to lower their standards to cover the mass of the people.

In answer to questions Mr. Austin made the following points:—

- (a) He agreed to African representation in the Southern Rhodesia Legislature, but this should be based on merit and not purely on colour. The present franchise qualifications should not be lowered.
- (b) Contrary to what had been suggested in some quarters, Southern Rhodesians were not anxious for a Boston Tea Party. Nevertheless they might be forced to this position if Africans were pushed ahead before they were ready. Federation must be changed to meet the case of the emergent African—not of the primitive African.
- (c) The present division of responsibility between three, or even four, Parliaments in the Federation could not continue for ever. At the moment the Southern Rhodesia Legislature was the only elected Territorial body, since Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland were still largely under Colonial Office rule. The aim should be to have one Parliament with some responsibility delegated to administrators in the three Territories.
- (d) He personally had fought for the amalgamation of Northern Rhodesia and Southern Rhodesia and still thought that amalgamation should be the aim. There was no question of abandoning the Northern Territories to their fate.

SALISBURY

21st APRIL 1960

Memorandum

A. T. ADAMS General Secretary—United Federal Party
Partnership in the United Federal Party

Introduction

United Federal Party Policy in electoral matters is that political divisions should be based on Party and not race. In order to implement this policy the Party seeks to build and maintain a multi-racial membership and develop an organisation which allows all members, irrespective of race, to make their maximum contribution.

The African Voter

The effective entry of Africans into Parliamentary party politics is of very recent date. While in Southern Rhodesia there was no colour bar in regard to the voters' rolls, very few Africans had attained the necessary economic and educational qualifications prior to the war years and as they began to do so in the post-war years, many of those so becoming qualified did not seek to register themselves as voters. In the Colonial Office Territories of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, virtually no Africans were qualified to be placed on the electoral rolls as the law stood and no persons with British protected status were eligible to become voters.

It was only with the introduction of the Federal franchise law in 1959 that British Protected Persons could become voters. At about the same time the new Southern Rhodesian franchise law was brought into force. Both systems widened the roll very considerably for the African and when the Northern Rhodesian Electoral Act was passed in late 1958, Africans throughout the Federation in the Federal sphere, and in Northern and Southern Rhodesia in the Territorial spheres were given an opportunity of playing a reasonably effective role then, and an increasingly effective role in the future, through the electoral system. (The necessary changes in the Nyasaland franchise system were delayed owing to the declaration of the emergency in 1959).

Membership of the Party

Until 1957 the United Federal Party Constitution regarding membership confined membership to those persons on the voters' rolls, or those eligible to become voters in all respects other than the necessary term of residence. In that year and prior to the actual changes regarding franchise, the Party decided to open its membership, generally speaking, "to all persons over the age of 16 years, who accept the constitution and policy of the Party" so that it could recruit African members.

In the years up to June, 1957, there was only a handful of African members throughout the Federation and a comparatively small number of Asians and Eurafricans. Since then and up to date, membership on a racial basis has increased to: Asians 760; Africans 2,700; Eurafricans 260; Europeans 6,000. Some 2,000 of the African members are members of the Nyasaland Division, and it must appear that the Party has not had great success in recruiting African members in Southern and Northern Rhodesia. In Northern Rhodesia the task has been particularly difficult for while the Zambia congress was banned during the emergency last year, the African National Congress continued to be operative and the fear of intimidation played a fair part in making Africans unwilling to declare their support for the Party there. In Southern and Northern Rhodesia, the policy has been to recruit African members on a fairly selective basis so that those joining might be able to participate equally from the start. In Nyasaland this system could not be applied without limiting African membership drastically and for obvious reasons it was sensible to go for a wider membership immediately.

Quite apart from the problems mentioned above and the difference in our own policy towards African membership in the three Territories, it will be appreciated that the development of the membership of any organisation beyond a certain point requires the activity of a reasonable number of paid staff. The position in this regard is as follows:

NYASALAND: No paid staff at all until the middle of 1959.

NORTHERN RHODESIA: One man only for half the period between 1956 and 1960.

SOUTHERN RHODESIA: One half-time woman, replaced latterly by one full-time woman, between the years 1956 and 1960.

CENTRAL OFFICE: No staff until 1957 and from then on one man with from one to three women clerical assistants until the latter half of 1959.

It is only as from March this year that anything like a reasonable structure is being built up whereby each territory will have an office with an organising secretary and a field organiser.

The above position has been explained in some detail because it gives point to the argument that the development of membership requires a full-time staff (Nyasaland African membership dates almost entirely from the date of employment of staff) and this probably applies more particularly to the recruitment of African members who have not been brought up in the tradition of belonging to political parties and are, in fact, subject to pressures not so to do, when the party concerned is led by non-Africans. It appears, therefore, that with the appointment of field staff there will be a much more rapid increase in African membership.

Apart from the fact that the permanent staff was not really sufficient to mount a drive for membership, it was engaged almost continuously from March 1957 to March 1959 in a series of bye-elections and the General Elections in Southern Rhodesia and Northern Rhodesia and the Federal General Election.

The role played by the African in the Party

The mere recruiting of an African member would not mean a great deal without his reasonable participation in the affairs of the Party. The following examples show how the African, and the Asian and Eurafrican, has fitted into the Party organisation.

1. Parliaments

Prior to 1958 there were only two United Federal Party African Members of Parliament or a Legislative Council. Today there are nine Party African Members of the Federal House, one a Junior Minister and two in the Northern Rhodesian Legislative Council, one a Minister.

2. Caucuses

In the United Federal Party Parliamentary Caucus 20% of the members are Africans and the African therefore has a powerful voice in this all-important body. My information is that at no time has this group of nine shown any tendency to act as a "block" and it appears that they never "think" in terms of a caucus within a caucus which is, perhaps, the best proof that partnership works at caucus level.

3. Party Congresses

At the 1956 Federal Congress only two delegates were non-white—one African (an M.P.) and one Eurafrican. The numbers of non-Europeans attending the 1957 and 1958 Federal Congresses increased considerably and at the Congress held in 1959 some 25% of the delegates were non-Europeans, mainly Africans.

The Territorial Congresses of the Party have shown the same trend as the Federal Congresses. Whereas in the earlier years few men of colour attended, they now make up an ever-increasing and fairly considerable proportion of the delegates.

At all four annual congresses, the spirit in which the contributions made by non-European delegates are received make it clear that they are not merely accepted but are accepted with warmth.

4. Constituency Councils

(Bodies controlling the affairs of the Party in constituencies and made up of representatives of each branch in the constituency). The representatives of the non-European branches play their full and equal part in these Councils.

5. Branches

The aim of the Federal Standing Committee is, to quote, "wherever possible new non-European members should be incorporated into existing branches and that branches generally should not be confined to a particular racial group. It is recognised that it will not be possible at all times to succeed in the above aim; for example, it is inevitable that the Harari Salisbury branch will be made up almost entirely of African members. In such cases every effort should be made to hold frequent meetings of the Constituency Councils and the Councils should have joint meetings of branches from time to time so that a non-racial Party spirit is created." (Report of sub-committee on African membership approved by the Federal Standing Committee).

In a number of cases, branches include members of all four racial groups and in Northern Rhodesia some branches which were composed of Asian only members have now merged with what were exclusively European branches.

6. Federal General Election Campaign

In the Federal General Election of 1958 and the Northern Rhodesia General Election of 1959, the European candidates included appeals for support for the African candidates in their manifestos and/or other election pamphlets, and special polling day posters were designed, combining the names of the European and African candidates.

7. Platform Policy

The African candidates appeared in many cases on the platform of the European candidates. (It was not possible to do this at all times—for example, most African candidates covered anything up to six or seven “European” seats).

At the major meetings held by the Prime Ministers and the Territorial leaders, the local African candidates were part of the Party team introduced to the public from the platform.

8. African Speakers

One of the African candidates was amongst the five speakers most frequently asked for by the Constituency organisations, and another among the ten most frequently called for, during the Federal General Election Campaign.

9. Social Contact

At all the congresses there has been no sign of discrimination at the social functions arranged for the delegates. Recently, in Salisbury a social function was organised to bring together the ordinary member and the Party “Brass”. A good third of those present were non-Europeans and those providing the cabaret floor show were made up of Africans, Europeans and Euraficans.

10. Committees

At all levels, Africans, Asians and Euraficans fill places on committees, in the Branches, the Constituency Councils and the Standing Committees.

In Northern Rhodesia an African was elected as one of the four members to represent the non-Parliamentary Section of the Party on the Territorial Standing Committee. At the last Territorial Congress in Southern Rhodesia the contest for the one non-Parliamentary Member to represent all Mashonaland was fought out finally between an Asian and a Eurafican candidate—the Asian was elected by a majority of one vote. In Nyasaland, an Asian—who is a Presbyterian—is one of the two Vice-Chairmen of the Nyasaland Division of the Party, and this Territorial Standing Committee includes members of all four races.

Oral Evidence

A. T. ADAMS*

The witness had presented a memorandum.

Mr. Adams wished to add to his memorandum. He had been born in South Africa and only came to the Federation in 1956, and had only been six months there when he took on his present job as General Secretary to the United Federal Party. At that time he had been neither a citizen of the Federation nor a voter, but Sir Roy Welensky and Sir Edgar Whitehead had nevertheless accepted him for the job. He had done a number of jobs in his life, and had been for many years on the United Party staff in South Africa. His whole life was one of politics. He had come up to the Federation because of his abhorrence of the racial prejudice in South Africa. He had only agreed to keep his present job if partnership was really the policy. He had strong views on this. He had in fact found that with those views he could nevertheless serve the United Federal Party. He remarked that he would also be speaking at 12 noon to another Party on the question of school exchanges.

He had given these particulars as the background to his own views. In South Africa legislation was working backwards, in the wrong direction. For the removal of colour discrimination it was no use relying solely on legislation. The matter had to work in two ways at once. Legislation had to be backed by the sincerity of the people. He considered that the United Federal Party could not now go backwards, because it was now fully integrated as to colour. He saw this clearly and objectively as himself a newcomer to the Federation. Legislation was less important than the change in the outlook on colour. He had himself been amazed at the change in the Party since, 1956. At the Party Congress then only two coloured men had been present, while at the last Congress 25% had been coloured. The change was now fully accepted.

He had been in Lusaka in 1959 at the time of the Emergency, organising the Territorial elections. This had provided another testing point. He had feared reaction as a result of the Emergency. But the general feeling in the middle of the Party was one of sadness, and a spirit of determination to examine the reasons why it had happened. At that time one delegate had produced a resolution for the raising of the franchise: it had been received with the same kind of derision as a motion of the Conservative or Labour Party Congresses to take away votes from women. This was at the Umtali Southern Rhodesia Congress where there had been tremendous enthusiasm for advancement of Africans and their membership of the Party. No doubt they had lost a few members because of that. But it showed that the Party was now setting a definite course. The Party was also beginning to accept the fact that it must be educative, that is to say must do more than was normal in Constituency Branches. The normal approach was not possible with an African membership. He was confident that the Party would devote energy and money to adult education on the political side. His experience was that they could do this job. They had done it in Nyasaland, and hence should be able to do it elsewhere. They had not done enough yet to go for the non-European voter. Party politics had tended to play a small part in the lives of the Africans, and the Party had to make the new African voter feel that it was a regular part of his life.

In reply to questions Mr. Adams made the following additional points:—

1. Asked for his Party's view on getting African representatives into the Southern Rhodesian Parliament, he said that if there were a new election now in Southern Rhodesia, on the present delimitation of constituencies, the Party would put up one African candidate. On the new delimitations, they would perhaps put up two or three. The Party was keen to see African representatives coming forward and getting into Parliament. But they would naturally try to put up a non-white candidate in a set in which he had a reasonable chance of winning. There were already probably sufficient non-white voters to put up non-white candidates. He certainly did not agree that Africans would not vote for anyone but an African. Indeed the Braeside constituency had been won from the Central African Party on the African votes, so far as could be worked out.
2. The membership of the Party in Nyasaland was 2,000, and they had only started activities there in August last year. In Northern Rhodesia there were some 300. In Nyasaland there had been in some cases difficulties in getting the Party agents into the native areas, but to the best of his knowledge that situation had now improved.
3. At the Umtali Conference which he had mentioned, the alternative of lowering the franchise qualifications had not been raised.
4. The Africans in Northern Rhodesia had shown themselves ready to register and vote on the Territorial franchise, and had in fact voted in an astute manner.
5. The United Federal Party was satisfied that the voting qualifications were the right ones. They did not really know the answer yet as to how many Africans it would bring on to the Rolls. He would have thought that the Congresses in the North would have wanted to make use of the potential voting power which they had.
6. He realised that the qualifications could and did in fact leave out, for example in the copper mining industry, people who, though highly paid and exercising great responsibilities, were nevertheless completely uneducated. But he thought that the system had to be regarded in its whole context, and that one should not be affected too much by particular cases of injustice for the system generally speaking was correct. But he appreciated that the situation described did present a handle to political agitators.
7. He wished to stress that he had come before the Commission solely to deal with the matters treated in his memorandum, “Partnership in the United Federal Party.” †He had received the permission of Sir Roy Welensky and another Minister to put forward the views there stated since he was a paid official of the Party. He wished to deal only with that aspect and would not be coming with the Standing Committee of the Party before the Commission.

Memorandum

L. M. N. HODSON, Q.C., M.P.

False Legends concerning the Federation and its Member Territories

To one who has had his home here for 49 years (I was brought here at the age of 8) and has travelled sufficiently (in the U.K., 3 European countries, North Africa and South Africa) to gain some perspective, the first circumstance to be mentioned seems undoubtedly to be that the picture which has been presented abroad of this country, by many organs of the Press and many superficial observers, is grotesquely crude, and, in many respects, entirely false. I say this not as one who has merely vegetated here but as one who has led, for some 30 years, an active life in public affairs, and is still doing so. To the spate of misunderstandings that have contributed to the picture of turmoil and frenzy, deliberate twisting of the facts must, unfortunately, be added. The motives for this have been varied, and there is too much else to say to trace them all. It must suffice to say that the motives have not been connected with the welfare of the lawful inhabitants of these Territories, nor with the welfare of the Commonwealth, nor, indeed, with the fostering of world peace. To get at once on to a positive note, the overwhelming majority of the inhabitants live a happy and contented life, with less of grinding poverty than can be seen in some European countries, with a rising standard of education for their children, with other social services constantly improving and with ever increasing opportunities for economic and political and social advancement. The pace of this advance, that I have witnessed over 49 years, has been breath-taking, and greatly in advance of the pace seen in any country that I have visited or read about, with the exception of Israel and certain areas of Canada, where special circumstances have operated. There still remain racial differentiations which are dying too slowly. Opportunities for all could still be greatly increased. Profoundly mischievous influences have greatly unsettled the minds of many simple folk who have no inherent vice but can be emotionally swayed by the screaming voices of hysterical demagogues. When they have been so swayed, one gets an emergency. But the life of the community is not composed of emergency conditions, and the truth about this country will not be seen if it be supposed for one moment that the usual rapid pace of advancement to which I have been referring is not valued by the masses of the people or that they are really deeply moved by a feeling that they are being oppressed or that when the fun of attending inflammatory meetings is over and the violence begins, the people like the result. They hate it, fear it, and are immensely relieved when enabled to resume the even tenor of their ways. A fresh view and a true view, through the eyes of a Commission of high calibre, without a single preconceived notion in their heads, is most timely, and most welcome to all who have the interests of the country at heart.

Complexity of the Constitution

(a) A major reason for granting full membership of the Commonwealth to the Federation at the earliest possible date is the complexity of the Constitution. Its complexity and uniqueness is due in large measure to the fact that it is shot through with racial conceptions, so that, for example, agriculture is a Territorial subject when anyone grows crops in Nyasaland but is only Territorial in the other Territories if Africans grow the crops. Otherwise it is Federal. There is still much representation, both in Territorial and the Federal Legislatures, on a racial basis, except in Southern Rhodesia, where there are no Africans in the Legislature. It seems improbable that all this can be greatly simplified in the immediate future, though it is to be hoped that some simplification can be effected. In the meantime, however, there are very few in Great Britain who understand how the Federation is organised, and a very few are not enough, in a country which has supervision over our affairs. It is really too much to hope that the British public, whose vote is responsible, at general elections, for settling the broad outlines of policy, will be able to conduct the long and serious study necessary to put them in possession of the complex facts here referred to. This sharply distinguishes us from the many small protectorates, scattered about the world and having a unitary system, the approximate truth about whose government can be grasped by the ordinary voter. Here we have a very important country indeed, with some 8,000,000 inhabitants, of immense economic potential (if Federation is allowed to continue) and with numerous political situations most delicately balanced, over which no blundering can be tolerated. It is probably the last hope of the free world for the establishment of a multi-racial state great enough to exercise a wide influence. Under the present system of dual control, every opportunist, of whatever race, finds his promised land. Rushing with his political grievance, real or imaginary, to London, he must be listened to until it is ascertained beyond all doubt whether or not he is lying. Meanwhile his statements receive wide publicity, and any glimmerings of the truth that may be seeping down to the British voter are obscured once more in a cloud of dust. Those in authority must take some time to assure themselves of whether or not the man is lying. In the interim, confidence in properly established governments is shaken, subversive movements are encouraged and lives may be lost.

(b) If any example is needed of the lack of general comprehension to which I refer, what better example can be found than the recent emergencies. Over and over again British newspapers with reputations for reliability revealed that they were not acquainted with the most elementary points concerning our organisation, by fixing responsibility on the Federal Government for the acts of a Territorial Government or the Colonial Office. This confusion, I regret to say, was also from time to time apparent in the deliberations of the British Parliament and in those of various church and other bodies. So long as supervision from overseas continues, the situations I have described are likely to grow worse and worse, and so the difficulty of providing just and progressive government will be needlessly increased. Whether in fact there has been any exercise of the veto over Federal legislation is not at this point relevant. It is the mere fact that the political opportunist knows of the veto that causes the trouble.

(c) What would be the position if we were granted full membership of the Commonwealth? I claim that the Federal Governments of Lord Malvern and Sir Roy Welensky have fully demonstrated a wide and deep understanding of the task before them. The chief criticism levelled against them flows from the fact that they have not, as less scrupulous politicians might have done, interfered in matters entrusted to the Territorial Governments, e.g. the day to day affairs of the Africans, labour relations, etc. etc. Sir Roy has established recently a Parliamentary Secretaryship of Race Relations, which is doing good work in letting the people know what the Federal Government does, but the Constitution gave him no encouragement to do this. He has been deprived, under the Constitution, of all the instruments for making contact with the African people, constituting fifteen sixteenths of the population. I have serious doubts as to whether it is humanly possible for a Prime Minister to justify himself indefinitely in so many quarters at the same time and to cope with so many violently conflicting criticisms. He cannot "let up" for one moment, lest some particularly vituperative criticism be left unanswered and it be concluded that he is hanging his head in shame. Moreover, I think it is scandalous that the able Prime Minister of a great country should have to suffer the indignities of being baited by every Tom, Dick or Harry, whether he has any knowledge of or real interest in this country or not. Continuance of such a situation may well lead to a position in which the number of able men willing to submit to such indignities will dwindle to vanishing point, and what good will that do to this country or the Commonwealth?

(d) I should like to add, at this point, that I am supposed to be a little too advanced in my views on some points, within the councils of my Party, and this has, from time to time, brought me into considerable conflict with my leaders on points of substance as well as of procedure. The above opinion as to the general direction of my leaders' policies is therefore not the opinion of a "yes man".

(e) In conclusion, on this section of my memorandum, the record of the Federal Government is such that I suggest that the Commission might well ask themselves what more they could have done had they been in the Federal Government's place. I think the answer to that, in general, will be satisfactory. This being so, there does not seem to be any reason for retaining a right of veto which at present does do much damage to the sound government which is everyone's aim.

The Need to pass through all the Stages of Political Growth

This is no attempt to apply biology to politics, but is the result of practical experience. For example, at election meetings where a number of Africans are present, questions are asked which reveal attitudes that can only be explained by realising that the questioner has got normal stages of political growth of a country in the wrong order in his mind—probably due to the fact that he has seen such very swift changes from tribal rule to the present time. However fast we move, and we do move very fast here, we cannot altogether omit the stages of growth that are normal. It is no use answering this by some popular cliché or newspaper headline, such as "We live in the Twentieth Century" or "African Nationalism is on the march," etc. etc. Far more rigorous thinking is needed than that. More important is the question "Is this country worth the best effort we can make to build it and its people up to their maximum potential?" Anyone not interested in that question has no right to meddle in the affairs of this country. This is not Nineteenth Century morality or blind imperialism. The question does not succumb to abuse, nor is it altered by any abdications which may have occurred further to the North on this Continent. Every country must surely be viewed in the light of its own peculiar circumstances, and a peculiar circumstance of this country, which distinguishes it from India or West Africa, is that this is, in the fullest sense, the rightful home of all the lawful inhabitants. People did not come here merely as temporary administrators but to build, along with those they found here, a country which would endure on the footing of the contributions made by all. Therefore the aim must be to build a unified country and a country in which all share a common pride in achievements. It may well be that, in view of the true statements I made in section 1 of this memorandum, many people will, at first sight, under the influence of a totally wrong view that has been cultivated assiduously by enemies of the people of this country, think I am indulging in wishful thinking. That is not the case. I say again, the normal steps in political growth must take place. The idea of "one man one vote" is the end product of the British type of democracy. It simply is not the case that a country cannot be left to run its own affairs until there is a universal franchise. If that were so, Britain would have passed away long ago. After the Reform Bill of 1832, only one twenty-fourth of the people of Britain had the vote. The others had to take their government "on trust". You may say this was merely an historical episode, without any particular significance in the present context. But was it? Supposing "one man, one vote" had been introduced before the people had sufficient education to register sensible votes, would Britain have her present strength? It is no mere academic rambling but hard practical thinking that makes one return once more to the Plato of our student days, with his perennial freshness in great matters. Is it not true that the unstable democracies of his day, which he did not support as the ideal form of government, owed their instability to the very fact that the people were not, in the mass, mature enough to support such a government? As we would put it in this age, they had universal suffrage (if we ignore the slaves) before they had universal education. I therefore conclude, on this section of my memorandum that no educated man has any ground whatever for saying that a country cannot run its own affairs until after it has got "manhood suffrage." In fact, examples to hand of where the converse view has been adopted and votes have been given before the people could properly use them merely prove the dismal descent from democracy to tyranny that Plato described better than anyone has since described it.

A Brief Glance at Present Franchise Arrangements

It is not proposed to cover the rather dull ground covered by the numerous treatises on voting and how it is done all over the world, but just to pick out one solitary and important point. The British form of democracy evolved to its present stage through a number of more or less painful struggles of the under-dog. Profiting by that, what have we done? We have not been guilty of any of the reactionary pronouncements that were made as late as last century by opponents of extensions to the franchise. On the contrary we have carefully examined the situation and not merely made promises but solemnly inserted in our franchise laws, with every possible precaution against change of the general principle, a ladder for all to see whereby the country can climb to universal franchise within a very few years—much fewer than those which elapsed between 1832 and 1928—perhaps one tenth of the number. Simultaneously we have strained the local exchequer to the uttermost to provide more and more education. Do not forget that, at the turn of this century, few children in England could hope for a formal secondary education. We do not desire such a situation here. We are doing all we can to catch up, and that represents more for education than is done in other African countries. Ask the Territorial Governments whether they could have spent what they are now spending on education had it not been for Federation. Is it reasonable to say that, since every old woman in her kraal has not asked for dominion status (an idea which would be quite beyond her comprehension) that therefore the country does not want it?

What is Public Opinion and Where does it Reside?

As every member of the Commission will have fresh in his mind the authoritative works on this subject, I shall not weary them with repetition. But I would venture to remind them that it is only in very recent times that "a mandate from the people" has been regarded as respectable at British general elections. Previously it was regarded as somewhat indecent, and, I may say, for very good reasons. People new to voting could be swayed by all kinds of spurious arguments and give a political verdict which, had it been tolerated, would have been quite fantastic in relation to the grave questions put to them. That is the stage which has barely been reached here now. The local tub-thumpers are having a wonderful time with the masses. Every single proposal put forward is violently attacked, with arguments which would be funny if they were not so serious. The local Africans are no worse than the rest of humankind. The same sort of tomfoolery was seen in Britain. But we have an additional difficulty. Our "tom fools" go to London and New York, and represent themselves to be heroes fighting for liberty. Every encouragement is given to them. They can always collect a sympathetic crowd who will clap. They often provide a few sticks with which the Opposition for the time being in Britain can beat the Party in power. And so the discipline and restraint which distinguish liberty from licence are still further undermined.

No Background of Slavery

Where Europeans formerly had slaves on their plantations, it has taken them and their descendants a long time to eradicate from their minds the notion that the slave race consists of chattels. In some parts of the world they have not yet eradicated the notion. The Commissioners will readily call to mind suitable examples of this. Where European countries have made a great deal of money in the past out of the slave trade and founded some noble cities upon it, without witnessing its evils in all their intensity, the disclosures made by Wilberforce and others came as a profound shock to the public conscience. So much for this the case that a guilt complex developed, under the influence of which it is undoubtedly the case that a great many good people in England to-day will regard anyone with a black skin as slightly more than human. The Commissioners will readily call to mind examples to illustrate this. The Rhodesias and Nyasaland were fortunate in that the only intrusion of slavery into relations between blacks and whites has been that provided by the defeat and punishment of slave raiders from other regions by the British. The result of this is not to be underestimated. With the exception of the extremists, the people here of all races are more ready than any other group I know to see a man for what he is, in ordinary workaday contacts. The nitwits—and there is quite a large number of them—do not fall within this description. To them a "b..... nigger" is a "b..... nigger" and always will be, however high in the scale of civilisation he may reach. Unfortunately the exceptions are noisy, as all extremists are. The Commission will meet some of them. But, with all respect, I suggest that this is where one retains balance and just reminds oneself of two things. Firstly, there are many in the Union of South Africa, our next door neighbour, to whom this attitude has been traditional since the days, not long past, of slavery. Many immigrants come from there, but fortunately a high proportion of those immigrants are liberal-minded. Secondly, I venture to point out that we had had selective immigration here from the commencement. In the early days it required a somewhat unusual character to survive the hardships that were then the common lot. In recent times we have consciously selected our immigrants. I beg the Commissioners to examine the machinery of selection. Assuming they are satisfied with it, will it not be a very extraordinary thing and a complete surrender of all hope that a multi-racial state is a possibility in this world if they conclude that these selected people are not to be trusted to work in cooperation with the Africans of their adopted land, especially as a high proportion of them spent five or six years of their lives fighting against the Herrenvolk theory of which they are now suspected? I would say that the only hope of a successful multi-racial state is to let it be and not to subject it to a supervision which, for reasons previously indicated, has neither a balancing nor a steadying effect, but merely the effect of magnifying the growing pains that undoubtedly exist.

Would an Independent Federation not establish a Herrenvolk Doctrine?

Here again I invite attention to the existing franchise laws. We have reached a point of no return on the road to a universal franchise in which Africans will preponderate. Must we now be turned back to the less-developed and less mature forms of Colonial rule? If the Federation is not given the encouragement it asks for, that is the only likely alternative.

Why should the Federation be deprived of the Senatorial part of Self-Government?

Surely the House of Lords and other successful Second Chambers owe much to the fact that they are a repository of the traditional methods of the peoples they serve. At present the British Government acts as our Second Chamber. Can it possibly do so in a satisfactory manner? Its very presence in that capacity is out of keeping with both European and African ways of thought. The African, except when he had a tyrant, like Lobengula (and those cases were exceptional) had counsellors for his chiefs, drawn from a selected group of elders who were supposed to know intimately the ways of the tribe. Conduct such as that of those who have recently ranged themselves here again the Government would have been rewarded by crocodiles or other effective purveyors of punishment. The steady man who is not very politically minded (i.e., as in other countries, about 98%) does not understand how his governors can be called to heel by people who have never even seen this land. It only undermines his respect for his own governors, and does no good. Why retain it? Would it not be better to complete the picture of self-government by providing in our Constitution against hasty and ill-conceived legislation through providing for the senatorial aspect of government out of people on the spot?

Does Partnership exist in the Fullest Sense and, if not, what can be done about it?

Some Territorial Laws, soundly enacted when they were enacted, are out-of-date to-day, as the Commission will notice. But what in Federal legislation or practice is out of keeping with partnership? Philosophically, of course, the very name partnership is open to criticism. It suggests an eternal duality as much as Karl Marx's class warfare did. But we have got the word, and it means that all people should work together regardless of race. The Federal Assembly cannot overrule or set aside territorial laws. If it could, we should not have a federation. The Territories are getting along well enough. If the Commission has power to give them a push in regard to some matters, that would be a good thing. The Native Trust Lands in the two Northern Territories, for example, tend to be reservoirs of stagnation, with forms of land tenure quite unsuited to the support of a very large population, left to grow without the former checks of periodical famine, uncontrolled disease and internecine warfare. Even the opportunity to supplement a thin diet with the fruits of the chase has now largely disappeared, with no hope of return. Land apportionment in the South, again, designed for agricultural and pastoral conditions, hardly now fits in with an industrial age. Land laws, however, are difficult to reform. Those of England, in relation to conveyancing, still resist attempts at complete modernisation. The more advanced partner cannot be weaned immediately from the paternal methods which were well enough suited to conditions up to twenty, or even fewer, years ago. There is always some time lag in every country. But, if one looks at the human side, there are marked improvements in race relations everywhere to be seen—except only within the sphere of influence of the agitators. How far can the world go in pandering to the man who says "everything done up to now is completely wrong: let me be free to wield power: I care not if the masses starve, so long only as I and my friends can lord it over the others in the country?" I stress again that it is the moderates who are in the majority in this country, and that, to subject them to any one of the many revolutions that are being proposed would not merely be unwise—it would be an act of most unforgivable cruelty. It would not be evidence of partnership but of disregard for the elementary rights of the majority if local Europeans were ready to turn over the government of the country, at this stage of its development, to the opportunists who desire that to happen. Self-interest of the European coincides with my view, but self-interest of any country's leading citizens often does represent the interest of the country as a whole. The important point is that, if you seriously inquire of able chiefs and local members of native councils—in fact anyone who has any real experience of the problems of administration—you will not find support for the revolutionaries. They (the experienced) will tell you of the need for improvement in many directions. For instance they will be eloquent on the need for more and still more schooling. But they will not fail to appreciate that much has been done and that a quick end to it all would come if the proposed revolutionary moves were countenanced.

The Need for Speedy Adaptation

Often one hears it said that the Europeans must speedily adapt themselves to new situations that are now arising. This is true enough, and it is also true that there is a considerable number of Europeans who are stubborn on this point. This is a great country for leagues, societies and associations with a political flavour. The Commission may meet some of them. They represent, for the most part, an instantaneous and not very thoughtful re-action to misrepresentation overseas and to the fulminations of Dr. Banda and Co. To every extremist there is an equal and opposite extremist. To every exponent at Hyde Park Corner of the benefits of free trade there is someone at Tower Hill speaking for imperial preference. But it is hardly any better than the advancement of an extreme view to say vaguely that the Europeans must think faster unless a very clear indication is given of the directions in which they must think. I would suggest that, briefly, the position is this. The British Government was persuaded by Rhodes to undertake the colonisation of the Rhodesias. Any reluctance that may have been displayed is beside the point. That Government was so persuaded. The result was a conquest and annexation of Southern Rhodesia and an extension of protection to the Northern Territories, on detailed terms largely settled by the protecting power, which at no time laid it down that any territory would be deprived of the normal right to accept into full citizenship immigrant peoples of all races. Many immigrants came, from overseas, with blacks and whites from Portuguese East Africa and from the Union of South Africa. The recent citizenship law of the Federation received the Royal Assent. To Southern Rhodesia the British South Africa Company brought with it the notion of a local legislature, for elections to which a common roll was established. The weakness of this common roll was less due to the fact that qualifications for it were several times heightened than to the fact that local political parties in Southern Rhodesia made no effort to invite African voters to take part in their deliberations. The social colour bar worked against it, and so, to some extent, did the land apportionment. In the Northern Territories, official rule was never very tender towards the European entrepreneur who developed mining, agriculture and industry and made payment of the officials' salaries possible. The old Colonial Office formulae were employed once more, as if there was no prospect of what we now call partnership ever developing. Representation of communities on a colour basis was introduced—in itself a divisive device. Under the Federal Constitution the practical flaws in the Southern Rhodesian system, which had produced not a single African representative, were tempered by a blend of that with the Colonial Office system, and we immediately got representatives of the Africans, as a race, but Southern Rhodesia managed to ensure that its African representatives came to office through the exercise of the votes of those who had a vote, thereby in turn tempering the extreme racialism of the Colonial Office system. A recent amendment of the Constitution has gone further in the direction of regarding all people as people and not simply as races of people. The continuance of the inflexible purpose of establishing a truly multi-racial state demands that this shall be done. Europeans will have to adapt themselves more speedily than they are, in total, now doing to the prospect that, within the foreseeable future, community of interest among all the people must inevitably lead to complete acceptance in every public activity of all who have qualified for the vote, and it is extremely doubtful whether immigration of more Europeans will in future ensure that the majority of qualified voters will be of European stock. The more the Europeans face up to these facts and the more wholehearted their acceptance of all qualified voters becomes in practice, the more likely it is that racial tensions will be removed. That is the general direction in which the Europeans must move, and it will be found that the more reasonable of them are moving in that direction.

It is tempting to go on, since one's whole future and that of the country depends upon our getting successfully past the long-threatened review of the Constitution. The threat has increasingly become a set-back to progress, for no people, of whatever race, thrive in an atmosphere of uncertainty. But the Commission will, by the time this page is reached, either be with me on my main points, or not. If they are, then they will be able to develop them. I would only mention one more point, which some people may regard as trifling, though I regard it as of considerable importance. Can the Commission now find a name for the people (all the people) who have built up this Federation? The Constitution is full of references to "Africans" and others. Difficult as it may be to get away from that, when a chief basis of the division of functions between the Governments turns on a distinction between races, it is important that a name including the term "African" should not be appropriated to one race only. Great as the change to our ideas, or the ideas of Great Britain, may be, let us have "British Central African" as a name for all the inhabitants. Insofar as it may be necessary to retain the distinction referred to, let it be something other than what it is, in detail.

At this point it is necessary to point out how extremely difficult it is to amend the Constitution without at the same time making adjustments in the Territorial sphere. But it is recommendations and not adjustments that are now called for. By making certain Territorial adjustments (very big ones) the distinction could be between the enfranchised and the unenfranchised.

Finally, I conclude by wishing the Commission every success in its great task of showing how we can continue to progress, with great speed, in the interests of all the inhabitants, and would respectfully remind them that the Durham Report on Canada, though not altogether popular with the British Government of the day, succeeded through its intrinsic merit.

Salisbury

Oral Evidence

L. M. N. HODSON, Q.C., M.P.

The witness had presented a memorandum. He was a Member of the Federal Assembly, and a practising lawyer in Salisbury.

He wished to add to his memorandum the thought that the problem was one of getting rid of suspicion. He referred to the suggestion in the memorandum that a new name should be found for the people of the Federation. The division of people by race was something that did not happen in other continents. It created misunderstandings and suggested that racial interests can necessarily be in conflict. Questioned as to whether he thought there was a better word than "Federation" he said that he could not think of one, save that the expression "British Central Africa" seemed to be the less objectionable, and might help to soothe feelings in Nyasaland. He was also firmly of the view that there should be no further reviews of the Constitution—they were most unsettling.

In reply to questions Mr. Hodson made the following further points:—

1. He had originally been a keen protagonist of Federation, and still was.
2. Questioned as to whether he would keep Africans in the Northern Territories inside the Federation regardless of their opposition, he said that provided that represented their real voice it would be necessary to bow to the inevitable.
3. He did not think that one should speak of "black" Governments in the Northern Territories, but only of Governments of the most capable people, whether they were black or white. If there were deliberate reservations of seats for Africans, that would alter his view. He agreed that the franchise of the level of Standard VI would not in fact bring in a black Government, and he would not call that an artificial measure, such as deliberate reservation of seats. If black Governments in the Northern Territories came into being in that manner, he would see no reason to break up the Federation.
4. He had originally thought the Federal franchise qualifications were too high; but he thought it would be fatal to change them now. The qualifications were not unobtainable by Africans. He would maintain them at the present level.
5. He agreed that colour bar existed and was a cause of African frustration. It existed in hotels, public bars and cinemas. Asked if a clause in the Constitution prohibiting colour bar, would help to remove the Africans' feeling of frustration, he replied that that was a big question to answer. He thought that troubles had arisen in the United States of America by trying to force integration by legislation. He was against legislation for such purposes. He would rather approach the matter as an education problem. This was what had happened in other countries such as the West Indies. He thought that progress was being made.

Something on the lines of the Northern Rhodesian Committee on racial discrimination might be a better approach than legislation. But there was something in the point that a specific clause in the Constitution could do much to remove the feelings of inferiority and frustration.

6. He would not agree that European education should become a Territorial subject. He did not agree with the idea of multi-racial schools: the very young were not the people to lead the country. But he was all in favour of integration at the University level. It was difficult to imagine the situation which would arise if there were integration at the secondary school stage, when the children could speak the same language. He was sure that if this reform were introduced now it would create more friction than anything else.
7. Although he had been brought up on a farm and mixed with Africans, he had mixed with Africans very little since then. Before Federation came, he had hardly ever talked with them on a level; although he now had the opportunity to do so in the Federal Assembly. He agreed that the Europeans and Africans lived in water-tight compartments. Even if they wanted to mix with each other there was nowhere to do so. There were even difficulties in the organisation of games and sports with Africans; that was definitely frowned on in some circles.
8. He thought that, by and large, there should be no distinction between the franchises for the Federal Assembly and the Territorial legislatures. He would object to a franchise based on Standard VI in Nyasaland. He thought that too low, and likely to make a large proportion of the people the prey of agitators. He would not be prepared to have a lower franchise than that of Southern Rhodesia. He agreed that Nyasaland would take longer to reach that level. High qualifications were necessary, and that must apply to Nyasaland too. There should not be divergencies between the Federal and Territorial franchises and those which existed were a pity. There should in fact be a uniform franchise.
9. He had given no deep thought to the question of the composition of the Federal Parliament and whether it was right that the two Protectorates should have a majority of only one over Southern Rhodesia. This seemed to have worked all right so far. He had not discussed the question at length before now. It had not been brought up before now, although he knew of local feeling about it in Northern Rhodesia. This was partly because Southern Rhodesians knew little about Northern Rhodesia: they had false ideas about the North. But Federal Members of Parliament, including himself, did get around. He thought the balance was kept fairly well, on the present population figures and so on. He had heard no complaints from his fellow Members of Parliament from Northern Rhodesia.
10. On his memorandum, paragraph 4, last sentence "is it reasonable to say that, since every old woman in her kraal has not asked for dominion status . . . that therefore the country does not want it?" The decision should be based on the opinion of people on the Voters' Roll. He did agree with the Preamble of the Federal Constitution, but thought that in reality it was impossible to find the opinion of the vast mass; that had been the situation in England in 1832. No doubt the elected Representatives would pay attention to waves of opinion among those who had not got the vote. Even if it were found that the vast majority of headmen and chiefs in the Northern Territories were opposed to Federation, he still thought that, to avoid chaos, it was necessary to govern action on the views of those competent to form opinions.
11. If, because of the opposition in the North, rebellion broke out, it would be necessary to meet force with force; but he did not agree that this would be similar to the situation in South Africa. There was a great difference, because in the Federation doors to advancement were being kept open, which were being closed in South Africa. Indeed, in 10 or 20 years time the majority of the electorate in the Federation would be Africans. An initial education was being given to them. It was not necessary in fact to contemplate violence. Knowledge would spread of the good which Federation was doing, and people would come to see the stupidity of being governed from 6,000 miles away. Doors were being kept open, and the Europeans were not trying to oppress the Africans.
12. He would be in favour of consulting the Native Authorities on the problem of Federation. They were sensible as a general rule and it was possible to explain a point to them.
13. With reference to the mention of "Labour Relations" in paragraph 2(c) of the Memorandum. Although he realised that the labour relation systems in Northern Rhodesia and Southern Rhodesia were quite different, it would be better for the Federal Government to control labour. There was the example of the railways, with which they now had to deal through a Statutory Commission, and with the two different Governments for the settlement of disputes. There was also a cumbersome procedure in foreign relations in this field. He knew it would be difficult to reconcile the two distinct labour legislation systems of Northern Rhodesia, but he would try to get a single Act to apply on a uniform basis, although no doubt there would be much discussion before uniformity could be achieved. He would certainly establish a Central Labour Board, and thought it would be satisfactory. There would be a kind of extension of the present Territorial systems adapted for a Central Government. But he admitted that he had not really studied this subject. The only point which he had been making related to the difficulty which the Federal Government had at present in getting any direct contact with the people.

14. He considered the Federal Health Services to have been a great success because of the general economic development in the Federation. He would be surprised to hear that even in Southern Rhodesia people were not satisfied with the Health Services, although he had heard, for example, that advanced Africans complained about being given "native" food in the hospitals.
15. Mr. Hodson was reminded that chiefs in the Native Authorities in Northern Rhodesia are solidly against Federation. Would he, therefore, increase the powers of the Territorial government, acting on the principle that matters relating closely to the daily lives of the people should be Territorial. He thought that this would be a mistake, because if the Federal Government were weakened it was only made easier for the Federation to break up. Although there was no doubt room for some exchange of functions between the Governments. The major functions should still be left with the Federal Government: health should be left there for the reasons given in the Morton Report. Education was difficult, but on balance it should stay where it was. Otherwise the status quo should be maintained, despite the opposition. This was because he regarded the opposition as based on emotion.

Addendum to Oral Evidence

L. M. N. HODSON, Q.C., M.P.

During my evidence given on the morning of the 21st April, I took a question from Sir Victor Robinson as intended to elicit what contacts, on terms of equality, I had had, as an M.P. and professional man, with Africans, whereas, looking back on it, I think I myself introduced the limitation "on terms of equality". If that is so, I may have given the wrong answer, and therefore now give briefly the facts as they are, without this limitation, apart from my numerous contacts with fellow M.P.'s who are Africans.

1. Contacts nearly all in Southern Rhodesia.
2. Childhood contacts, apart from those with domestic servants, confined to being accompanied on shooting expeditions during school holidays on my late father's cattle ranch by an African much older than myself.
3. Court work from 1930 to 1952 (after which university and other public work absorbed a high proportion of my time) gave insight into African ways of thought, especially on the side of the defence, in criminal cases.
4. As a City Councillor in Salisbury (1932-36) made some study of African urban conditions and contributed something to the betterment thereof.
5. As a Member of Parliament from 1946 till now, I had on numerous occasions to help in the framing of policies connected with African advancement: also prior to that as a Central Executive member of my political party.
6. For the past eight years I have owned a farm where I have employed up to 52 African men and up to 20 of their wives (at busier periods). Some of the labourers come from Nyasaland.
7. On my said farm I maintain a school for the children of the labourers (sometimes as many as 50), at my own expense. It only goes up to Standard III, but involves some personal interest in teacher selection, sports days, etc.
8. My major public work has been what I did over 13 years towards founding the University College of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. That involved much research into African educational needs, including visiting schools, and working with African members of the College Council, of which I was first chairman.
9. For many years, off and on, I have been on the Executive of the local African Welfare Society, which has done much to ease minor troubles and to initiate proper inquiry into larger ones. Africans serve on this Executive, and the Chairman is at present an African.

10. My present Parliamentary constituency includes the African township of Harari, where I attend many political party branch meetings.

I may add that I like the African people very much and admire their amazingly rapid progress and growing reliability in spheres freed from the deadening effects of witchcraft, which is why I think it would be a cruel shame either to retreat or to fumble. A firm government, with proper machinery for explaining its actions, is craved by all. A stupid one, unable to see that Federation is beneficial from every conceivable point of view, can only make headway because it is resolute to destroy. Governments must be equally resolute to build. Frenzied and senseless cries will soon be forgotten.

Introduction

The Origin of Antagonism to Federation

In both Northern Rhodesia and particularly in Nyasaland, there is widespread African opposition to any form of Federation which includes Southern Rhodesia and although this opposition may be misinformed, it is nevertheless a fact. Without giving full consideration to this fact, no review of the existing Constitution of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland can make a lasting contribution to the future. It is therefore essential to establish in the most positive manner possible the true origin of African antagonism to Federation.

Ignorance, official ineptitude in explaining the Federal concept or deliberate misrepresentation by nationalistically emotional African political leaders must, for the moment, be disregarded. These factors have stimulated antagonism and aggravated fear, yet neither individually nor collectively can they be claimed to be the root cause of opposition to any close association with Southern Rhodesia. If the basic reason for this antagonism is to be laid bare, it is necessary to view the problem against its factual background.

In 1930, the British Government through the supervisory powers which were at that time vested in the High Commissioner for South Africa (whose supervisory role in Southern Rhodesia was only terminated in 1937 by amending Letters Patent) acquiesced in Southern Rhodesia's Land Apportionment Act of 1930. At the same time, that is, in the same year, the British Government published a White Paper commonly known as the Passfield Memorandum, and in so doing it appeared to accord simultaneous support to two incompatible concepts of the political and economic interests of Africans and non-Africans.

- (a) In approving of Southern Rhodesia's Land Apportionment Act of 1930 (an Act now under review) the British Government gave unqualified support to a policy which frankly declared that in European areas European interests would be paramount, while in African areas, African interests would be paramount.
- (b) In the Passfield Memorandum, the British Government formally and deliberately declared that if the interests of native and immigrant races should conflict, the interests of the native "must be paramount".

Both the inconsistency and the juxtaposition of these two policies were startlingly apparent to the Europeans of Northern Rhodesia. Six years earlier, when the territory of Southern Rhodesia became a self-governing colony, they had come under Colonial Office control. The difference between the supposed policies of the two territories so closely linked by geographical and historic association therefore assumed alarming significance.

In Southern Rhodesia, it appeared that there could and would be spheres of protection assured to both Africans and non-Africans, but in Northern Rhodesia it appeared that any conflict of interests would not result in traditional British compromise. The assertion of imperial trusteeship appeared to block the direct road to any form of self-government and, for this reason, the possibility of amalgamation with the self-governing colony of Southern Rhodesia appeared to offer the only way out of an administrative impasse.

In the early 1930's, the Copperbelt commenced to prove itself. The consequent increase in the European economic contribution and in the European population factor strengthened an insistent demand for amalgamation with Southern Rhodesia. Confronted with this demand, the British Government temporised by appointing a Royal Commission with Viscount Bledisloe as Chairman to determine how far it was desirable to go towards promoting closer union between the two Rhodesias and also Nyasaland.

The Bledisloe Report, presented in March 1939, favoured amalgamation of all three territories as an ultimate objective, but for the immediate future it recommended only functional co-operation. It made this recommendation because it stated that Southern Rhodesian native policy was "in some respects restrictive" in the opinions of Africans in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, and that there appeared to be "striking unanimity" in the opposition of Africans in both these territories to possible domination by Southern Rhodesia.

To determine the real significance of the opinion expressed by Africans in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland that Southern Rhodesian native policy was in some respects restrictive, it is important to recall the economic and educational conditions under which some 22 years ago the Bledisloe Commission called for evidence.

In Northern Rhodesia, the copper-mining industry and its inevitable corollary of Copperbelt towns offered less than a tenth of the field of employment it provides today. Furthermore, seven years were to elapse before Lusaka and its surrounding agricultural activities could come into existence as fields for African employment.

In Nyasaland, potential fields of gainful employment were non-existent. The tea industry which developed in the late 20's and early 30's drew its labour from the Nguru (who were migrating from Mozambique, and who today form nearly 20% of Nyasaland's African population) and Blantyre and Limbe were separate villages without claim to industrial potential. The wage-earning field within Nyasaland was therefore infinitesimal.

In both territories, African education had not yet outgrown its struggling mission origins. The vast majority of the population were totally illiterate tribesmen existing on the subsistence economy of a primitive agriculture unaided by the present determined efforts to supplement this economy by the introduction of cash crops.

Twenty-two years ago African nationalism was virtually unknown. Most of the African politicians who now oppose Federation were babes carried upon their mothers' backs or they were equally uncomprehending juveniles. Political consciousness had not yet been awakened, political agitation was ineffective and yet the tribesmen of a generation ago, confined by illiteracy and environment to the narrow horizons of a subsistence economy, showed "striking unanimity" in opposing the possible extension of Southern Rhodesia's native policy.

This original opposition to association with Southern Rhodesia has been passed on from the previous to the present generation of Africans, and in recent years it has received so much political impetus that today opposition to any form of association with Southern Rhodesia, and therefore to the Federation, is assumed to be a political malady requiring a basically political remedy.

The weight of evidence supplied by the prevailing conditions of nearly 22 years ago does not support this theory. What the evidence does prove is the fact that in the absence of fields of gainful employment in the Northern territories, tens of thousands of migrant African labourers have shuttled backwards and forwards across the Zambesi to find employment in Southern Rhodesia and the Union of South Africa.

For nearly half a century, and from sheer economic necessity, they have moved from beneath the umbrella of a paternal administration geared to the needs of a primitive subsistence economy to find employment in territories in which administrations designed to support the complexities of a money economy are, by their very nature, in many respects restrictive.

Inevitably, these migrant labourers compared conditions. In their tribal areas in Northern Rhodesia and in Nyasaland, the individual was an identifiable unit of village life with no need to produce documentary evidence of his identity, whereas, when he crossed the Zambesi, this became essential. In his tribal life, time was of no consequence, but in his changed environment of a wage-earning existence, time assumed a hitherto unknown significance. In the matrilineal society of his tribal life, the productivity of the individual was largely the function of the women, and in his wage-earning capacity in territories to the South, an entirely new approach was demanded of him. In his tribal life, there was complete freedom of movement, and no individual ownership of land. In the areas to which he travelled, freedom of movement was impossible. It was restricted by documents of identification and by the, to him, unheard of concept of individual ownership of land.

The accumulative effects of these differences between the conditions of life to which the average tribesman is accustomed and those which he encountered in his role as migrant labourer were amplified by what appeared to be a factor of tremendous significance to his future. The untutored tribesman naturally found that he could only obtain gainful employment in areas owned by Europeans. From this he assumed that virtually all productive land south of the Zambesi was owned by Europeans, and from this he came to the conclusion that any close association with Southern Rhodesia would inevitably lead to an extension of conditions which would deprive him of his land.

These comparisons of two systems, these misconceptions and fears were perpetuated by being recounted over nearly half a century in hundreds of villages throughout the Northern territories by tens of thousands of returning migrant labourers. Under the circumstances, the task of the militant African nationalist was a comparatively easy one. He had only to withhold the truth to have his views confirmed by the conclusions arrived at by those who had temporarily assumed the role of migrant labourer.

This is the fundamental origin of opposition to Federation. It explains the fact that in Nyasaland where there is the greatest economic need to sustain a subsistence economy by incursion into the restrictive administration of a money economy, there is the most virulent opposition to administrative association with Southern Rhodesia. Last year the total of Nyasaland Africans in employment outside Nyasaland was approximately 169,000, of whom 123,000 were in Southern Rhodesia and 26,000 in the Union of South Africa. This explains the Africans' blind refusal to accept the fact that there are fundamental differences in the native policies of Southern Rhodesia and the Union of South Africa, since none of the refinements of these differences would he be likely to encounter as a migrant labourer.

It is one of the greatest tragedies of the Federal concept that the British Government, through the Secretary for State for the Colonies, in 1953 refused to explain the Federal concept and that it failed to ensure that every inhabitant of the Northern territories would have the fear of land encroachment removed by the knowledge that Native Trust Land Orders-In-Council, first applied to Northern Rhodesia in 1936 and to Nyasaland in 1947, guaranteed to the African peoples of both territories some 95% of the land. (See Annexure 2—Map of European settlement throughout the Federation).

These Orders-In-Council rendered African land virtually inalienable to non-Africans. They cannot be amended or repealed by any Federal Legislature and they were therefore reaffirmed in the Federal concept. These facts are unknown to the masses. Militant African Nationalists can therefore continue to claim the support of the masses by assuring them that only by secession from the Federation can they be assured of land rights which so many years ago were freely guaranteed to the inhabitants of the Northern territories by the European governments who are today a party to Federation.

Opposition to Federation quite obviously does not stem from an informed political awareness. It is due to little understood economic factors, to lack of essential information and guidance, to a high degree of illiteracy and to deliberate falsification of facts. Any attempt to improve the future must, for these reasons, take full account of the basic origins of the present wave of opposition to what should be a buffer state between black and white forms of nationalism in Africa.

Part I

Voters' Qualifications and the Rate of Constitutional Evolution

In the present review of the Constitution of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, the determining factor in all deliberations cannot fail to be the rate at which constructive changes can become effective. For this reason it is perhaps not inappropriate to quote at the outset the following excerpt from President Eisenhower's State of the Union Message for 1960:

"New nations, and others struggling with problems of development, will progress only if they demonstrate faith in their own destiny and possess the will and use their own resources to fulfil it. Moreover progress in a national transformation can be only gradually earned; there is no easy and quick way to follow from the ox-cart to the jet-plane.

"All of us must realise, of course, that development in freedom by the newly emerging nations, is no mere matter of obtaining outside financial assistance. An indispensable element in this process is a strong and continuing determination on the part of these nations to exercise the national discipline necessary for any sustained development period . . .

"Moreover, everyone should be aware that the development process is no short-term phenomenon. Many years are required for even the most favourably situated countries."

These excerpts underline the gravity of your Commissioners' responsibilities. The 1959 actions of a portion of one section of the population provide no evidence of a desire 'to exercise the national discipline necessary for any sustained development period.' Two of the three federated territories can hardly be considered as 'most favourably situated countries.' Constitutional development 'is no short-term phenomenon' and this is particularly important when the complex composition of the population is fully understood.

It is common practice to describe the eight million people of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland as a multi-racial society. It is considered quite erudite if, in addition, it is observed that there are cultural gradations rising in scale from a primitive subsistence economy at near stone-age level, to the ethics and attainments of the 20th century.

This important horizontal and lateral stratification is, however, incomplete. There is the additional bifurcation of the indigenous peoples into patrilineal and matrilineal branches of African society. Each of these branches has its own pattern of tribal foliation. Each of these tribes has its own form of sub-division into the equivalent of clans, and these in turn consist of various groupings of villages.

At this peasant community level, in surroundings which govern their material existence and under conditions which dictate their mental horizons and affect their approach to problems beyond the limits of these horizons, there are to be found 75% of the total population. This 75% of the population is composed entirely of African peasants.

This simple fact is at the root of all our constitutional problems. The African nationalist sees only the significance of numbers when he cries 'One man. One vote'. The European with a permanent stake in Africa sees in a combination of primitive tribesmen and twentieth century self-determination an inevitable lowering of standards and the collapse of the society he has created and is determined to maintain. To most onlookers, unaware of the true anthropological background, a part of the population has assumed a greater significance than the whole.

For these reasons, the most sincere efforts are now being made to make the best of both worlds by providing a constitution designed to perpetuate a primitive subsistence economy while at the same time endeavouring to meet the needs of a modern state in a world committed to the complexities of a progressive money economy.

To appreciate this fact we have only to realise that if 90% to 95% of the population were peasants living and thinking at peasant community level then the question of voters' qualifications would have little or no significance. Race representation as such would fall away and each tier of the Administrative and Constitutional edifice would follow in neat and logical succession. This structure, commencing with the village headman, would lead progressively through tribal and district Councils to Territorial level and finally to an inter-Territorial summit. It would be the simple constitution and government of an agrarian state.

The Federation is, however, a far more complex structure. In spite of the fact that 75% of the total population is an African peasant people and has a tremendous future significance in the political sphere, it is as yet, in the economic sphere, a liability. This fact the following table of African Income in millions of pounds makes clear.

June 1959: Monthly Digest of Statistics

	1954	1955	1956	1957	1958
Wages	53.6	61.9	69.6	80.3	83.9
Self Employment ...	11.0	11.6	15.8	15.8	13.6
Rural Subsistence ...	57.0	61.0	66.0	70.0	70.0
	121.6	134.5	151.4	166.1	167.5

This table of African income illustrates two fundamental aspects of the Constitutional problem. In the first place it is apparent that in the political sphere the steady increase in African earnings will result in a substantial rise in the number of Africans who as potential voters will fulfil the financial qualifications of earnings per annum or of ownership of property which the Federal Electoral Act 1958 calls for in the Special and General Voters Rolls.

In the second place this income table underlines the fact that between 1954 and 1959 Wages increased by 30.3 million while Rural Subsistence was only increased by 13 million pounds. This means that the 75% who form the peasant community, with their contribution of 70 million pounds to the total African income of 167.5 million pounds, depend to a very great extent upon the earnings of Africans living within and contributing to the cash economy of the remaining 25% of the total population.

Unfortunately, the migrant labourer returning in temporary affluence from areas in which a cash economy prevails to areas in which a subsistence economy is the rule, is accepted as a tribesman returning to his natural environment. There is therefore little realisation of the extent to which both directly and indirectly the 25% of the population operating on the basis of an economy subsidises the 75% who exist on a rural subsistence level.

According to the Central African Statistical Office, the total population of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland as at December 1959 was 8,090,000 and included 7,760,000 Africans, 302,000 Europeans and 38,000 Other Races. The 340,000 non-Africans are all within the orbit of the Federation's money economy. To these 340,000 non-Africans can be added approximately 1,760,000 Africans associated with or employed in undertakings initiated by the financial 'know how' of non-Africans. In round figures, this multi-racial society of two million out of a total population of eight million constitutes the 25% who operate and develop the entire money economy of the Federation.

To the complexities of the racial, cultural, matrilineal, patrilineal and tribal stratification there must therefore be added a basic economic cleavage. It is only when this fact emerges in all its urgency that any delineation of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland can claim to be complete. Under these circumstances it will be apparent that no impartial review of the Constitution is possible unless all Commissioners are thoroughly conversant with the ethnographic and anthropological data available today.

There is, for instance, available to Members 'The African Peoples' by Professor Clyde Mitchell, Professor of African Studies at the University College of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. This material is an advance printing of Chapter 5 of the Federal Handbook which is due to be published later in the year. It was, therefore, written for the general reader and not specially compiled for the Commission and reference to the following works is essential:—

- The Tribes of Northern Rhodesia* by W. V. Brelsford;

Impartial and authoritative anthropological evidence is the only scientific method of weighing most of the emotional claims and statements now being submitted. Many of these emotional claims are represented as the carefully considered opinions of inarticulate majorities. These majorities, being inarticulate, are nevertheless assumed to have been given every opportunity to comprehend, call for further elucidation where necessary, and then to weigh with competency issues whose implications tax the mental resources of societies in intimate and daily contact with the problems involved. Furthermore, this inarticulate majority is assumed to have unanimously agreed to express itself in the unequivocal terms chosen by most self-appointed advocates of the inarticulate.

The gravity of the issues involved demands of the Commission the closest scrutiny of such statements and claims. The degree of self-interest as a motivating force must be clearly established and where this self-interest is established, the emotional plea can be reduced to true proportions. Where population figures are quoted and it is claimed that these figures in themselves supply sufficient factual evidence of alleged desires, it is necessary to determine the extent to which purely circumstantial evidence is being used to the detriment of inarticulate majorities in order to sustain the emotional claims of an overwrought cadre of militant opportunists or well intentioned but uninformed reformers.

If the principle of the paramountcy of the interests of the majority is accepted on the basis of realities and not emotionalism, whatever the origin of this emotionalism may be, it then becomes necessary to consider the structure which, at present, guarantees to a complex agglomeration of societies within the Federation the essentials of ordered existence. In an homogeneous state, capitulation of these essentials of good government should not be necessary. Under existing circumstances, however, they must be sharply defined as (1) administrative integrity, (2) public security, (3) economic stability, and (4) educational facilities ensuring continuity of constructive effort.

These essentials of ordered society are sustained, maintained and guaranteed to every individual in the three Territories of the Federation by the effort, the ability and the knowledge of a demonstrable minority as small as the apex of an inverted pyramid.

In terms of this minority's ratio to total population and by analysis in terms of colour, the illusion has been created that this governing minority which is becoming increasingly multi-racial, is a removable apex resting on, yet divorced from, the solidarity of a broadly based pyramid.

Unfortunately the present governing minority had no predecessors. The responsibilities of enlightened government were unknown to both the minorities and the majorities in all pre-European societies in this part of Africa. It was, therefore, impossible to usurp or to inherit any of the essentials of good government. The present governing minority were compelled to import these features. They were forced to introduce and maintain them from the bottom upwards. It is, in fact, an anthropologically and historically correct assessment of the origin and stabilising functions of this governing minority to see the entire Constitutional edifice and all it signifies as an inverted pyramid maintained in equilibrium by the efforts of this minority.

Positive historical and anthropological factors have dictated the need to insist on voters' qualifications capable of ensuring to the total population benefits which can only be acquired by adhering firmly to the essential provisions of ordered society. Equally positive and valid pressures have also resulted in measures designed to enable competent individuals in steadily increasing numbers to make their constructive contribution to posterity.

In February 1958, Royal assent was given to the Federal Electoral Act 1958, and this Act defined the qualifications of Voters on both the Special Voters Roll and the General Voters Roll in the following terms:—

Special Voters' Roll Qualifications

21 years of age or over; ability to speak, read, write and understand English and yearly earnings of £150, or ownership of property worth £500, or yearly earnings of £120 and educational qualification of Form 11 (Std. 8).

General Voters' Roll Qualifications

21 years of age or over; ability to speak, read, write and understand English. Plus earnings of £720 yearly, or ownership of property worth £1,500 or earnings between £480-£720 yearly and passed Std. 6, or property worth £1,000-£1,500 and passed Std. 6, or earnings between £300-£400 yearly and passed Form IV, or property worth £500 and passed Form IV, or a Minister of Religion or an African Chief.

The fact that the Special Voters' Roll offers three alternatives to the prospective voter and that the General Voters' Roll provides no less than seven alternatives, is proof of the effort made to increase the number of African voters and of the care taken to ensure that potential voters were not excluded by a narrow approach to the question of minimal qualifications. These facts are ignored by those who base their objections on the assumption that the economic and/or the educational requirements are set too high.

The steady increase in African earnings referred to in this Memorandum clearly points to the fact that in increasing numbers potential voters will achieve the stipulated standards of economic stability. The same is true of educational attainments which provide a rapidly diminishing hurdle. This is due to the fact that since Federation, African education which is a Territorial responsibility has, in all three Territories, received tremendous impetus. As a result, it is estimated that, while only 70,000 Africans had achieved a Standard 6 education up to and including 1959, the numbers who do so from 1962 onwards will in the following five years exceed the total of those produced since African education was first introduced.

Despite these facts there is considerable pressure to lower voting qualifications in order to provide an immediate and artificial African/non-African ratio of voters rather than allow a ratio of competency to be achieved by factors already inherent in the advancement of the African.

There is the pressure group who consider that speed is the essence of political sanity and self-preservation. For these reasons they would lower existing voting qualifications. In this approach they ignore the unbridled impatience of those who demand the disappearance of voting qualifications as a facile means of commanding a composite society to which they have contributed little and of whose complexities they understand still less.

The existing voting qualifications have, however, only been operative for one election. On this occasion African apathy and the political techniques of boycotts and intimidation prevented more than 30,000 Africans (who possessed the necessary qualifications but refrained from registering) from participating as voters. However, neither apathy nor intimidation can be resolved by whittling away attainable qualifications.

There is, therefore, no valid reason for destroying the potential voter's right to demonstrate his economic worth and his capacity for sustained effort in the educational sphere, since it is only through these fundamental attributes that the future well-being of this complex Federal State will be assured.

Part II

Constitutional Evolution and a Council of State

In part one of this memorandum the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland was outlined as a multi-racial State composed of an agglomeration of societies involved with one another and with the operation of an economic structure in which 75% of the population exist on a primitive rural subsistence level while 25% are concerned with the evolution of a modern money economy. To this composite picture it now becomes necessary to add two additional and important anomalies. These anomalies, in the interests of clarity, were deliberately excluded from Part I.

The first lies in the fact that there is a difference of nearly thirty years in the life expectation of Africans and the Europeans in the Federation. At birth, the life expectation of the European is 70 years, and it will unquestionably be agreed that while there are exceptions to the rule, men and women in the age bracket of 40 years and upwards are the citizens who in public life, in all the multiplicity of commercial, industrial and financial institutions, in the Civil Service and in Government, sustain the operations of all these essential undertakings. The life expectation from 40 years onwards is therefore of fundamental importance to 20th century society.

When we come to deal with Africans the situation is as follows: at birth the life expectation of the African in Southern Rhodesia in 1953 was 48 years; that of the African in Northern Rhodesia in the pre-Federation year of 1950 was only 37 years and, while reliable statistics are not available for Nyasaland, the life expectation in this territory was, according to Dr. C. A. L. Myburgh, a Member of the International Population Union and Chief Statistician of the Central African Statistical Office, very similar. From these facts, two conclusions can be drawn.

In the first place, the Southern Rhodesian Health Department's network of District Clinics, due largely to the efforts of Lord Malvern, then Sir Godfrey Huggins, Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia, was already beginning to affect this vital aspect of society. The medical facilities in the Northern Territories have, since Federation, been substantially improved and the life expectation of Africans in these territories is now considered to be just over 40 years.

The second aspect is of vital significance in two respects. In the first place, Members of the Commission will be conscious of the fact that with rare exceptions, they are in their dealings with African political leaders, dealing with men under the age of 40. The significance of this would be even more apparent were Members dealing with the constitutional problems of the United Kingdom, but confronted by death with the need to have discussions with and to consider the proposals of those in the 30-40 age group. In the United Kingdom, however, there would be the stability of outlook born of the experience of past generations. In African society in all three territories of the Federation, this background of stable conditions and past experience is non-existent.

The second facet of this life expectation impact on the evolution of African society is related to the nett reproduction rate. This increase in the African population has been determined as being affected by a higher birth-rate than that of India. To make the significance of this perfectly clear, it is necessary to remember that while the length of an African generation is approximately 26 years, that of the average non-African population is 30.

Since the toll of slavery and tribal wars was checked, there have been nearly three generations of the African life cycle, and the accumulated result of these checks on population increase have been added to by an increasing check on infantile mortality. The nett result is an inordinate increase in the number of people dependent upon the productivity of each individual able-bodied male. Unaided and undisciplined African society must therefore collapse more rapidly, more completely and more disastrously than any impact which haste can have on non-African society. Of this inevitable result the African political leader has absolutely no knowledge. Nor is the average European better informed.

No attempt to appease emotionalism will ever resolve these basic population problems. Steady marshalling of the entire economic resources of the three territories was, and still remains, at the heart of the Federal concept. Any arbitrary constitutional changes based on emotions and not on the population realities of the people for whom these constitutional changes are designed must remain criminally unreal. No political eloquence, no egotistical claims to non-existent competency, no religious fervour for immediate impracticable political reforms can overnight remove anthropological and economic realities.

Only time, self-discipline and continued guidance can assure to future generations the freedom which a voiceless posterity demands of those in authority today.

This introduces the second basic anomaly which was excluded from the factors presented in Part I. It is this. The population of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland faces the conflicting views of five Governments and the complexities of four separate constitutions whereas under normal conditions the citizen of average education finds it difficult to interpret with accuracy the functions of one government and the safeguards of one constitution. Cross-examination of witnesses appearing before the Commission will establish this fact. Only a very small percentage of those who submit constitutional proposals are in any way competent to do so. In most cases, their evidence is based on the views expressed by their associates. In other words, it is hearsay.

During the course of the Commission's investigations, Members will also become acutely conscious of the degree to which emotionalism clouds constructive thinking and of the damaging hiatus in the operation of many essential activities. Both factors are to a great extent due to uncertainties as to the outcome of the 1960 inter-governmental deliberations.

The circumstances in which the Commission finds itself are unavoidable. Nevertheless, constitutional evolution is no short-term phenomenon and existing circumstances should not be perpetuated.

Constitutional syncopation must be replaced by constitutional evolution. The development of all constitutions must not be expressed in terms of the current formula of y times 365 days, but in the demonstrable productivity of these years. For this reason, and for this purpose, a permanent institution in the form of a Council of State is essential.

Part III

A Federal Council of State

The first two parts of this Memorandum do no more than indicate the multiplicity of factors which contribute to the complexity of problems facing the peoples of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. If this enumeration of factors is even approximately correct, it must be apparent that the only possible solution is a continuing process of adjustment.

It is equally apparent that there exists today an urgent need to set up permanent machinery to allay fears and to ensure that the stress and strain inherent in a Federation of this nature does not result in legislative abuses either now or in the long term future.

To meet these conditions such machinery must possess authority to ensure that as a new ratio of voters emerges, impartial protection will continue to be accorded to both majority and minority interests. To be securely based such authoritative impartiality requires the continuing participation of all Governments who are today either directly or indirectly responsible for the preservation of the Federal concept. It follows, therefore that a body responsible for the ordered evolution of constitutions cannot be based on the electorate of all or any of the territories now constituting Federation since such association would result in the electorate becoming both claimant and judge.

For these reasons it is proposed:

1. That the five Governments concerned, namely, Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, the Government of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, the Government of the self-governing colony of Southern Rhodesia, the Legislative Council of Northern Rhodesia and the Legislative Council of the Protectorate of Nyasaland, should each be responsible for the provision of four members to a Council of State consisting of twenty members.
2. That the composition of the Council of State should be:

	United Kingdom	Federation	Southern Rhodesia	Northern Rhodesia	Nyasaland
Europeans	4	2	2	1	1
African Chiefs	-	-	1	2	2
African Commoners	-	2	1	1	1

3. That in this Council of 10 Africans and 10 Europeans the President of the Council should have the casting vote. It should also be noted that the 5 seats accorded to African Chiefs and 5 African Commoners ensure that African representation is related to peasant communities forming the major portion of the population of each Territory.
4. That for as long as the Governor-General is not a citizen of any African territory, all appointments shall be made at his discretion, and in the event of his post being filled by a citizen of Africa then appointments to the Council of State shall automatically be transferred to a panel consisting of the Lord Chief Justice and two assessors.
5. That panels of names together with details as to age and qualifications shall be submitted to the Governor-General by the Governments concerned.
6. That appointment as members of the Council of State shall be on conditions similar to those applicable to the Judiciary

- and retirement shall be not later than the age of 75 except in the case of hereditary Chiefs.
7. That the Secretariat of the Council of State shall be at Livingstone, Northern Rhodesia where the President and the Deputy President shall also take up residence during their terms of office.
 8. That the Council of State shall meet in session at Livingstone to consider all matters relating to the Federation as a whole and at each of the Territorial capitals for the consideration of Territorial affairs. Sessions would therefore be held in Livingstone, Lusaka, Salisbury and Zomba.
 9. That in order to remove doubts and misconceptions and to achieve nationhood as a continuing and not synoptic movement, the African Affairs Board of the Federal Assembly should be abolished and the functions of the Colonial Office should be transferred to this Federal Council of State.
 10. That for this reason, the President of the Council should rank as a Minister of State, and that both the President and the Deputy President should be provided on a non-party basis by Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom.
 11. That the function of the Council of State shall be to preserve the ordered evolution of the Constitution of the Federation as well as those of its member Territories. For this purpose, it shall be empowered to withhold consent to:
 - (1) Constitution Amendment Bills
 - (2) Electoral Bills
 - (3) Any Bill which contains discriminatory characteristics of sufficient magnitude to indicate a departure from the purpose for which the Council of State was created.

Board Elections

The African Daily News—21.12.59

"The Advisory Board elections in Mabvuku and Harare this year showed more clearly than ever before the dangers of the oft-repeated principle of 'one-man-one-vote' which is not supported by universal education. Unless the electors are informed and educated, they are liable to listen to promises of all sorts from gullible candidates.

In the election campaign important civic issues like housing, roads, and recreational facilities were never actively discussed, although they were printed on the manifestos. Issues that were used were, first and foremost, tribalism, promises of pecuniary advantages to organisers who in turn told the electors fantastic stories, and, last but by no means least important, canvassers told ignorant voters to put a cross against names of persons whom they knew nothing about. This can only take place among voters who are ignorant. If they had to elect members of Parliament the abuses would be excessive. In backward areas like our own it is important that education be made a requirement for the right to cast a vote."

Time is Running Out

The African Daily News—7.1.60

"... the main purpose of the Monckton Commission is to pave the way for the Federal constitutional talks to take place in London later this year.

It would, therefore, appear to us that all those who are going to give evidence before the Monckton Commission must, almost literally, know the Federal Constitution and all the relevant papers which were published just prior to the birth of the Federation in 1953, backwards.

Otherwise, they are going to cut distinctly miserable and unconvincing figures before the Commissioners.

And we wonder how many of those who are itching to cross swords with the members of the Commission have as much as cast their eyes on a copy of the Federal Constitution, let alone read it; yet it is the easiest thing under the sun to obtain a copy of this all-important document. After all, it costs only a few shillings."

Oral Evidence

B. G. PAVER

In opening his evidence Mr. Paver said he was producing other memoranda to supplement the one he had already lodged and he would appear before the Commission again if they wished him to do so.*

Referring to the figure of 30,000 African voters appearing in paragraph 49 of his memorandum in the part dealing with voters' qualifications and the rate of constitutional evolution Mr. Paver said that this number represented at the time of the last election the number of African voters who could have been on the roll. Indeed, he thought the figure could have been considerably higher as he estimated there were roughly 60,000 Africans with the Standard VI educational qualification. These potential voters had refrained from registering largely on account of apathy in Southern Rhodesia and intimidation in the northern Territories. There were, it was true, other minor reasons, such as merely putting off their applications, transport difficulties, distance from registering office, etc.

On being questioned as to whether Africans have resented being on the "B" roll and thus filling the category of second class voters, the witness said that he thought that being eligible to be entered only on the "B" roll accounted for a very limited number not registering, but the main reasons for their not doing so were those he had given earlier, and in his view apathy was likely to continue for a considerable time. The cause of the apathy perhaps differed in the three Territories but basically it was not unlike European apathy to voting that was experienced in Southern Rhodesia. Like the European very many Africans were more concerned with earning their bread and butter than with politics.

Mr. Paver was then questioned on his suggestion appearing in Part III of his paper for the creation of a Federal Council of State. He thought that the five Governments should have the responsibility of forming this Council of State from panels of names submitted to the Governor-General. It would be noted that he had put forward the idea that its membership should be composed equally of Europeans and Africans. The appointees should be local personages. The reason he had drawn a distinction between Chiefs and commoners arose largely from the circumstances that the evolution of the African in Southern Rhodesia had moved very much further away from a subsistence economy and tribal authority than it had in the two northern Territories. He added that in terms of economics the balance between the three Territories had to be maintained notwithstanding that outside the Copperbelt the northern Territories were more concerned with agriculture than industry, to which the African was rapidly being drawn in Southern Rhodesia.

Answering a comment on his remarks in paragraphs 38-40 of Part I of his memorandum Mr. Paver said there was a danger in over-stressing the emotional plea, but nevertheless he regarded the emotional aspect as far as the Africans were concerned as being of very great importance. One must not lose sight of the fact, however, that emotions always tended to ebb and flow, and what were matters of overwhelming importance today were often forgotten in two or three weeks' time. Time itself always had the effect of reducing and redressing the balance of emotions. The same sort of thing, however, was never true of economics. This always remained a reality. African emotionalism in his considered opinion was a passing phase; it would die down as people settled down. Mr. Paver said the people of the Territories and Federation had been living in an extremely emotional state for some time past. So much of it was due to uncertainty and fear; but there was no reason why it should be regarded as a continuing disease. The Council of State he had suggested was something that would lend stability to the situation, and that was why it was so necessary.

Asked whether the statistics he had given had taken into account every African who had passed Standard VI Mr. Paver said that they did, and that the figures related to the three Territories. The statisticians had arrived at these figures by taking account of the increase in population and mortality. The witness said that the reductions to age steps had been done by himself. What he had arrived at in this exercise was that the age group 0-14 representing infancy and childhood and the age group 15-19 representing adolescents being educated compose 56.6 per cent. of African society today, and these primarily were the coming Africans with whom one would have to live. The next age group 20-29 which composed some 17.3 per cent. of the total population was what he termed the immaturity group; in other words, as in all mankind, this was the group that was continually subjecting itself to adjustment; it was floating in industry towards the goal of maturity. Mr. Paver said that he had attempted to give the Commission basic figures, and that these would emerge more clearly in another paper he would be submitting in the course of the next few days. Here he made a brief reference to an aspect in the life of the African that should receive the most serious consideration, which was the almost total failure up to date in getting African women educated.

The witness said that he had given the machinery of his proposed Council of State in paragraph 66 (11) in Part III of his memorandum. He said that he had not considered fully the form it should take as there were people more qualified than he to do this, and because of this, apart from the basic suggestion itself, there was nothing very positive that he had put forward in this connection. He was thinking in terms of the future, but merely to deal with the future would by no means necessarily allay fears from the past or from existing legislation. His suggested Council of State, however, was not designed to deal with existing legislation. He did not suggest a new Constitution, but rather that consideration should be given to some sort of body that could supervise the electoral machine, and be above the four Governments in the Federation at the moment and thereby act as some sort of a safeguard. It would, indeed, have the effect of taking over the present functions of the African Affairs Board on the one hand and those of the Colonial Office on the other. This was the sort of body that would be able to guarantee to the African the question of land and control the registration of voters. He estimated that within a few years there would be over 200,000 Africans qualified to register on the present franchise.

Mr. Paver thought that the Land Apportionment Act and its implications were something that could be over-emphasised in the Federal structure. He thought that the legal machinery of Southern Rhodesia and its economy would inevitably change the pattern under the Land Apportionment Act and for this reason he thought that it would be unnecessary for any legislative power in this respect to be conferred on the Council of State. He thought that in Nyasaland it was very necessary that the basic structure of land tenure there should be changed to individual tenure.

The witness said that it was a common practice to determine population density in terms of the total population and to divide that by the total land area. This was perhaps valid in an industrial or partial industrial area, or in a country which had an advanced economy. It was, however, something that could not be done as far as Nyasaland was concerned. Quite obviously the land situation in that country was far more important in relation to Nyasaland's total population than it was here, and this was underlined by the fact that the population of Nyasaland was increasing rapidly. His impression was that in Nyasaland at the moment there were only 15,000 square miles of productive land. Under the normal system of ascertaining density of population Nyasaland had a density of 77 persons per square mile; but in point of fact having regard to the productive land the density was as much as 165 persons per square mile. Nyasaland had to face this very serious situation that in terms of the rate of increase of the population there in ten years this density of 165 would rise to 235. By token of this the production of that country must be increased by a minimum of 30 per cent.

Mr. Paver considered that it was obvious that a special investigation of the land/population ratio to productivity in Nyasaland would have to be made, and soon, and probably it would be necessary to bring Northern Rhodesia into the same or a similar exercise. Unfortunately it was usually the case that only when people were on the point of death that they were prepared to move positively in a matter such as this. It was in a matter of prime importance like the one he had just referred to that his suggested Council of State would have an opportunity of doing something positive; for it could relate its policy decisions on a matter such as this from the spot so much better than could another Government situated 6,000 miles away. Asked if it would be possible to shift, say, $\frac{1}{2}$ or $\frac{2}{3}$ million Nyasas to Northern Rhodesia Mr. Paver thought that this would present a very difficult problem on all levels. He thought that the present situation could only be changed by some major disaster. Unfortunately in his view Nyasaland at the moment was facing just such a disaster.

On a subsidiary point the witness replied that the President of the Council of State would probably have to have a casting vote. When a body was as equally balanced as was that he had suggested he thought it was necessary for there to be a casting vote.

In reply to a question on the franchise qualifications the witness thought that these should remain unchanged. They would be acceptable to what he termed "trained" persons, and it was a truism to say that all must agree to our having an ordered society. On the other hand, he thought it was against human nature for the franchise to be accepted as it was, and it would be unfair for him to give the impression that the Africans would welcome it. In a more equitable political climate this was a matter that could be resolved as soon as circumstances made it necessary.

Mr. Paver thought that partnership was something that could only emerge from African preparedness to accept it and from European goodwill. He thought that there had not been a great deal of evidence of the goodwill, nor for that matter in certain directions had there been much evidence of the Africans' preparedness to achieve it. He had difficulty in understanding what the African had to fear, because particularly with the impetus being given to industry under his estimate there would be over $\frac{1}{2}$ million African voters by 1970 or nearly twice as many as there would be Europeans.

On the question of the Council of State which was discussed further, Mr. Paver thought it was probable that the United Kingdom members in his scheme would most likely be drawn from the United Kingdom. It was true this would possibly not be very acceptable in some quarters in the Federation but, on the other hand, he considered the Africans would accept their appointment on this basis. He did not suggest that the Governor-General should be appointed from the Federation. It would not be very acceptable if this were done. Further, the appointments of Councillors would not be for life with the exception of the case of the hereditary Chiefs that he had mentioned.

Mr. Paver reiterated that his scheme was not complete in itself as he had set it out and he thought that there were others who were much better qualified to mould it into proper shape. He thought it would be a good idea if the Council were given the opportunity of considering Bills before they were presented to the House and of course the African Affairs Board would become redundant. Furthermore under his scheme it would not be necessary to have a second chamber. His Council of State would be a body that would have an absolute veto on legislation from which there would be no appeal.

Dealing with his reference to the Lord Chief Justice in paragraph 66 (4) in Part III of his paper Mr. Paver in answer to a question said that he knew of no precedent in any other country of Lord Chief Justices making political appointments. His idea was perhaps revolutionary but that in itself did not mean that it was intrinsically wrong. Generally his plan would have to be regarded as a compromise between what the average European in the Federation demanded and what the Africans, especially those in the northern Territories, wished for, and no compromise was ever really satisfactory. The Council of State would not be of a temporary nature but again that depended on what one meant by temporary; the Roman Empire had been temporary. The European here wanted control removed from London, while the African view was that control by Her Majesty's Government should be retained. He thought that the Africans were more likely to be satisfied with the compromise than the Europeans because the latter would still suspect the hand of the Colonial Office. What he was trying to do was to project into the future something that would sustain basically the concept of a multi-racial society in the Federation. Incidentally it was inherent in his proposal that the United Kingdom representatives would transfer from London to Africa.

Written Evidence

METHODIST CHURCH. Resolution of the 1959 Synod of the Methodist Church in Southern Rhodesia.

Status of the Federation

The Synod believes that under the guidance of God the Federation of the three territories of Central Africa can achieve the well-being of all its peoples. It also believes that independent status and an educated and enlightened democracy are the goals to which all must work.

It considers that the granting of independence should be delayed until such time as the Federation has gained the confidence of the majority of the people and until this confidence can be adequately expressed.

It is convinced that the Governments concerned are morally and legally bound by the conditions explicit in the preamble to the Constitution and implicit in the Protectorate status of Barotseland and Nyasaland to ensure that no final steps to independence be taken until the inhabitants of the territories, expressing themselves through acceptable and reliable channels, are known to desire it.

The Synod therefore, calls on the Governments concerned:—

- (a) To take no irrevocable step until the above conditions are fulfilled.
- (b) To take all possible steps to win the confidence of all the peoples concerned.
- (c) To prepare a programme in which the stages towards independence will be implemented gradually in accordance with the above conditions.

The Synod recognises that the Christian Church has a special responsibility to our country as it seeks to achieve these goals. It therefore calls on all Christian people:

- (a) To pray earnestly that God will guide the Governments and peoples concerned so that His will may be done in the Federation.
- (b) To gain such knowledge of the issues involved that they can make an intelligent contribution to the ideal of partnership.
- (c) To use all available means inside and outside the Church to deepen understanding between the peoples of the Federation and to refrain from any disruptive action during the progress to independence.

Oral Evidence

METHODIST CHURCH—represented by the Rev. H. Jesse Lawrence, General Superintendent for Southern Rhodesia.

The Rev. H. J. Lawrence in speaking on the Resolution circulated to the Commission said that this was a synodical multi-racial resolution of the 1959 Synod of the Methodist Church. He added that there were two branches of the Church in the Colony, one being the British which was established about 1890/91, and the American which arrived later. He represented the British Branch.

The Rev. H. J. Lawrence's evidence was to the effect that the fullest facilities must be made available for all races in Southern Rhodesia and the Federation to live together in harmony, and he did not think that the Federation could succeed unless the member states were members as the result of the exercise of their own free will or decision. Were any of the Territories to be coerced or retained in the Federation against their will, it was quite obvious to him that a sense of injustice would be created, and he considered that any must be free to leave the Federation at any time and not be under compulsion.

As far as the individual citizens of the Federation were concerned, it was necessary for them to be able to live their lives fully and freely without restriction.

If he was asked what the most important thing to be done in the Federation was, he would say without hesitation that this was the institution of a compulsory system of birth registration for Africans, and not only the other racial groups. In his view a tremendous amount depended on the ready accessibility to correct vital statistics of all sections of the population of the Federation. He admitted that as far as compulsory registration was concerned, there were certain difficulties, but he thought that these could quite easily be swept away. As it was the African was under a disadvantage and often there was no means of fixing their names nor of knowing the dates of their birth. Later on this had consequences which might well be serious because statistics were required for various purposes such as pensions, life insurance, age limits in education, school leaving age, etc., etc. He felt that when names of individuals, not particularly Africans, had been fixed through the medium of compulsory birth registration, the pass laws of the country could be thrown out of the window. Indeed he thought they could be abolished now. In the meantime he thought it might be advisable if it was made compulsory for all sections of the population to carry identity cards, but even this could be dispensed with once there was universal compulsory birth registration.

The witness went on to say that if there was to be a cohesive community of people living together in partnership in Southern Rhodesia, it would be necessary for the present discriminatory laws in the colony to be abolished altogether. The laws of the country had to be just for everybody and these had to be supported by a sound judicial system and judiciary. Southern Rhodesia, he said, had been well blessed for many years in its judiciary; but what the country was coming up against now was that the legitimate findings and decisions by judges were being subjected to the caprice of Ministers. His view was that as hitherto all men should be regarded as innocent until proved guilty.

The Rev. H. J. Lawrence submitted that in order to achieve true partnership a great deal of attention had still to be paid to education. He said that in general terms some of the races in Southern Rhodesia were being given all facilities for 100% of the child population. At the moment this was not the case with the African, but in his view as far as African education was concerned, Southern Rhodesia had a better record than any other country in Africa, and indeed some countries in Europe as well. Very large sums of money were being spent on African education in the Colony and it accounted for a very substantial percentage of the budget. He thought that 90% of the African child population in the country had received, or was receiving, schooling in greater or lesser degree. It was true that the numbers in the upper classes were comparatively small, and he thought that probably no more than 50% of the children were passing Standard III in order to get places in Standard IV and the higher classes. This had the effect of debaring many children from getting ahead, or at any rate having the opportunity to do so. It was found that with the age limit system that had to be applied those who were unable to proceed beyond Standard III were finishing their schooling at the age of 11 plus, and in consequence they were being subjected to many social ills. He said that the Department of Native Education was very much in line with the Churches and Missions in their thoughts about this matter; but the difficulty lay with the Treasury who appeared simply unable to provide the necessary finance. He repeated that, as it was, very large sums were being spent on African education.

The great want and need of the African was education, and coupled with this was the institution of non-racial schools. These he thought it would be impossible to institute in the lowest classes, but he saw no reason for any difficulty in doing so in the secondary stage of education, apart from the existing circumstance that European education at the moment was Federal whereas African was Territorial. This division of functions he thought should be examined, and he commented that it was only at the University stage where Africans and Europeans entered into the educational field on precisely the same terms. Why he enquired should not this be achieved lower down the scale.

In regard to the Land Apportionment Act, the witness said that this should be swept away. He was aware of the plea that it gave protection to Africans in the Reserves; but he thought the disadvantages outweighed the advantages. There were certainly lots of hindrances to the African. Why should he not be able to obtain business premises in the European area or buy a house there? If he was able to do this he would be enfranchised for local government elections, and thus get a share in municipal government. The whole principle of dividing the population was wrong, and if the country was genuinely endeavouring to achieve partnership between the races, he felt that it was necessary to do everything possible that was practical in order to achieve this goal.

The witness asked if he could hand in a copy of an open letter dated 16th March, 1959, which appeared over the signatures of the leaders of the Christian Church in Southern Rhodesia at the time of the Emergency. This letter was couched in the following terms:—

“We, the undersigned, desire to record our apprehension and protest concerning the legislation proposed to the Southern Rhodesian Parliament in the present emergency.

“We believe that no emergency, or danger of emergency, can justify injustice. A good end must not be sought by evil means.

“It is a violation of established principles and liable to grave injustice to detain any man's person without preferring a charge against him in the shortest reasonable time.

“It is a violation of established principles to convict a man in respect of what was permissible in law at the time of his arrest.

“It is a violation of established principles to assume that a man is guilty of an offence, until he has been tried by a court of justice and adjudged guilty.

“It is a violation of established principles to deprive a man of trial by a skilled and impartial judiciary. Courts or committees established outside the judiciary are almost certain to be unskilled, and often prejudiced from the outset.

“The strongest safeguard of a land is its people's respect for the integrity of its justice, as administered by an independent judiciary.

“Only in circumstances of the gravest emergency can human rights be set aside by the exercise of emergency powers. Emergency powers must be temporary, and strictly proportionate to the situation.

“We believe that no danger has yet been revealed to the public or to Parliament so great as to justify the proposed grant to the Executive authorities of enormous powers on the promise that they will not be misused, together with the diminution of the authority of the judiciary and the accepted principles and standards of justice.

“We appeal to Parliament to examine and judge this legislation in the light of these principles.

The Rev. H. J. Lawrence then replied to questions by members of the Commission. In regard to multi-racial schools he thought that for a few years it would be best to deal with those on the secondary level before trying to cope with the situation in the primary schools. This would be necessary until various problems such as the common budget—the cost of integration would be very heavy—were worked out. He thought it would be found that in practice only the children of the wealthiest Africans could go to European schools, and if such provision was made for them the standard of living of those Africans would have to be reduced accordingly to permit this facility to the child. With integration of the secondary schools he felt that a great deal of duplication in the shape of administrative staff, laboratories, buildings, etc., would be avoided. With this there was a building up of the human wealth that would develop from a common community that multi-racial education he felt must develop. Unfortunately he had no suggestions to offer on the financial side as to how best this schooling could be catered for. He did suggest that as far as the individual parent was concerned, it was unlikely that there would be a difference in cost to him. This doubtless would be borne by the state for even now it was found that the education of a European child who was at boarding school was being subsidised to the extent of £50 per annum, the cost being £121, of which the parent paid £71. The African parent at the moment was paying £16 to £18 a year which was supplemented by a Government subsidy of £6 and a further subsidy which was usually made available by the Missions.

The witness mentioned that the age of entry to primary schools had been changed and a child could now enter sub A at seven, and he was allowed until he reached the age of 10 years to catch up any backlog. As far as secondary schooling was concerned, he could not be older than 18 on entry. In practice, however, it was found that the African was now going in at 15 and this would soon drop to 14. He considered that in three or four years time the African and the European would be entering secondary school at the same age. When they did so he thought that both European and African parents should pay the same fees, and that the principle should be maintained that no African of suitable standard should ever be turned away on account of financial want. He regarded multi-racial schools as something that must become compulsory as soon as possible at the secondary stage. This would have a snowball effect as far as the English language was concerned because the African youngsters in secondary schools would be returning to their homes where inevitably they would practise the use of English with their younger brethren who in turn would benefit in their primary education.

On being questioned about the Land Apportionment Act, the Rev. H. J. Lawrence agreed that without it the European's greater economic facilities would have reduced the land available to the African, and that up to now the Act had protected this land for the African against exploitation by others. He added, however, that there was a time when the Africans in this country after the occupation could go where they wished and purchase land where they wished if they had the resources to do so. But now that the Land Husbandry Act was being implemented, it was no longer reasonable to retain the Land Apportionment Act. One found that with the rapidly increasing population thousands of Africans were coming to the towns, and he thought that within the next few years there would be hundreds of thousands of them in the cities. He thought that perhaps it might be reasonable to retain protection of the land for those Africans still in the African areas, and to let the Land Apportionment Act continue to apply only insofar as the rural African was concerned.

Dealing with the emergency legislation of 1959 the witness said that its existence was the cause of great public resentment on the part of both Africans and Europeans. He conceded that emergency legislation might very well be necessary for a period of emergency, but why continue it beyond that period. In any event the real crux of the matter was that people were being arrested at any time, they were being given no trial, and as he had said earlier one of the most important objections was that Judges' decisions had to be referred to the Executive. He said that the legislation was extremely fierce, and added that even his Church could be proscribed if he as a Minister in conscience offered criticism. The present legislation was to endure for five years, but the laws that were current immediately before the emergency legislation would doubtless be utilised, if necessary, after the five year period had ended. In his view, what he termed the old public order laws were more than sufficient; they had indeed proved sufficient for emergencies in the past. His main objections to this law were the interference with freedom, and the fact that the review of any decisions was subject to the whim of the Executive. He pleaded that the independence of the judiciary should not be lowered or interfered with in any way. He thought that the Act should be repealed at once in view of the fact that other perfectly adequate legislation was still on the Statute Book.

Memorandum

SALISBURY WOMEN'S INSTITUTE

There is, at the present time, a genuine anxiety among the members of the Salisbury Women's Institute regarding the future of the Federation and an earnest desire to contribute to the utmost in maintaining a Government which will be in the hands of responsible people for all time.

It is to be deplored that most sections of the Press, both local and overseas, have ceaselessly engendered hostility to the Federal State, and have never missed an opportunity of creating chaos in the minds of all sections of the community. They have done little to encourage and applaud the efforts of the many sincere people who are determined to achieve the goal of a happy and contented Central Africa. Misrepresentation and distortion of facts have played a very important part in fostering the feeling of unrest and uncertainty which is prevalent. We appeal to the Commission to take this fact into consideration when they view as a whole the progress of the Federation.

African Affairs

No doubt we may have an inadequate appreciation of the full implications of a uniform Native Policy, but it must eventually lead to a common citizenship which is the basis of a multi-racial State and the establishing of a multi-racial Nationhood. The primary need, therefore, is the provision of definite machinery for the study of a uniform policy for the Federation. It would seem that Native Policy is a subject which calls most urgently for co-ordination and that working towards a joint policy of practical application would lead to valuable results such as loyalty to one State and uniform conditions of employment. Due consideration in framing such a policy would have to be given to the special responsibility of Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom for the interests of the Native inhabitants in all the territories.

The Policies and principles which are being applied in Southern Rhodesia and in the two Northern territories present well-marked differences but a blend of both, hammered out by both European and African representatives from the three territories will bring about uniformity in the Federal State.

It is fully realised that basic issues are involved in devising the unification or assimilation of the divergent Native Policies which are being pursued at present.

Important adjustments will have to be made with regard to Franchise, the apportionment of land and land tenure in the three territories.

The gradual displacement and absorption of many existing institutions in a society of kinship will have to reflect the aspirations and hopes of the Africans but it is most essential in the building of a modern State on Western European lines that the political and economic beliefs of the Europeans and their legitimate rights should be fully assured.

Fundamental Principles underlying Democracy

African politicians of multi-racial territories are increasingly unwilling to settle for anything less than independence with the slogan "One man, one vote", regardless of the fact that the civilising work and leadership of the Europeans have largely been responsible for the development of these territories. "One man, one vote" in short means an overwhelming black preponderance in Government with Europeans tolerated on African terms.

Therefore adult suffrage could not be considered in these territories at the present time where the vast majority of the electorate are illiterate and irresponsible and they would dominate a minority who are schooled in the principles of democracy, a system of Government which has been evolved essentially for an educated electorate.

In Britain political power remained in the hands of an educated minority until the bulk of the people had been moulded by education to operate the concept of democracy. It has been stated that the bulk of the people at that time in Britain had an average education standard equivalent to Standard IV, i.e. below secondary standard. This level must surely constitute the minimum fundamental mental training to counteract even in part the results of hysterical emotionalism to which is added in Africa, witchcraft, ancestor worship and other completely illogical phenomena militating against logical and reasoned thought. Under the more advanced conditions prevailing at present in the world generally, more complicated economic and political aspects of life, the standard of education required for franchise should be correspondingly higher. Whatever may be the social, political and educational benefits to accrue to the whole Federation the ultimate success or failure of the whole policy will depend on the initiative and enterprise of an educated and responsible electorate.

Summary of Suggestions:

1. There should be a study group to consider a joint Native Policy throughout the Federation together with the preservation of the rightful heritage of the European.
2. There should be applied the principle of a responsible and educated electorate in the Federation.

Education Multi-racial Education

With the vast differences in the social, economic and political background of the whole population, multi-racial primary and secondary education is not considered practicable or advantageous to either of the main sections of the population—African or European.

Health

An assessment of the Health Services as they are at present must begin with a comparison of the existing services in the various territories prior to Federation in 1953. It was then clearly recognised that the provision of Health Services, and in particular of hospitals and clinics was far more advanced in Southern Rhodesia and that greater expenditure would be necessary in both the northern territories in order to meet their requirements more adequately and to bring them closer into line with the services available in Southern Rhodesia.

The level of inadequacy in the Northern Territories, considered in the light of their respective populations, is clearly reflected in the comparative expenditure on health services in 1953, as shown in the following tables:

		Recurrent Expenditure
		S. Rhodesia	N. Rhodesia	Nyasaland
1953	...	£2,202,245	£995,199	£267,000
1958	...	£3,780,095	£2,069,973	£815,794
		Capital Expenditure
1953	...	£544,521	£177,120	£40,000
1958	...	£142,429	£818,920	£198,554
		Population
1953	African	2,210,000	1,960,000	2,420,000
1953	European	157,000	49,000	5,000
1958	African	2,550,000	2,220,000	2,690,000
1958	European	215,000	72,000	8,800

By the above figures it will be seen that the pendulum has now swung in completely the opposite direction. Thus whilst recurrent expenditure has increased by about one third in Southern Rhodesia it has more than doubled in Northern Rhodesia and more than trebled in Nyasaland, and capital expenditure having dwindled to almost a quarter of its previous total in Southern Rhodesia has soared to four-and-a-half times its pre-Federation level in both Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

One of the most reliable guides to the adequacy or otherwise of a health service is the level of bed occupancy in hospitals, a safe maximum being usually considered to be 75% and an absolute maximum 80%. Figures for African hospitalisation are either non-existent or misleading for all the territories but at the time of Federation it was suggested that the budget for the African hospital in Bulawayo compared closely with that for the whole of Nyasaland, and Northern Rhodesian Africans were to a large extent cared for in mine hospitals. Southern Rhodesian African hospitals were grossly overcrowded prior to Federation. The position in all three territories has been greatly improved, but the demand for increased services grows greater daily. There is no doubt that the level of African services has enormously improved in the two northern territories since Federation.

The comparative figures for European hospital services are much clearer. Bed occupancy in Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia prior to Federation were about 30% and while the overall figure for Southern Rhodesia at that date is not available the figures for Salisbury and Bulawayo hospitals were 87·3% and 79·3% respectively, in 1958 they were 80·2 and 83·8 and in 1959 had risen still further. Salisbury hospital for that year is reliably reported to have been 90! The comparative figures for the three territories in 1958 were:

S. Rhodesia 69·2%, N. Rhodesia 40·4%, Nyasaland 44·0%, and these figures are further reinforced by the number of beds per 1,000 (European) of the population in that year, these being:

S. Rhodesia 4, N. Rhodesia 6·9, and Nyasaland 7·5, respectively.

There appears to have been a distinct retardation of services in Southern Rhodesia particularly in respect of services for Europeans.

Conditions led to a commission of enquiry whose findings have not yet been published. Dissatisfaction arose from several factors. To begin with the size of the Federation as a whole and the differing levels of urbanisation make for an unwieldy organisation which has to be geared to meet vastly different needs. Nevertheless all personnel are recruited on a Federation wide basis, and may be drafted to any part of any of the three territories as the need arises. This results in a lack of stability and a wastage of highly trained personnel, who may (because of seniority and other service considerations) be placed in situations where their special skills are of no use. This is particularly prevalent in the nursing services where, for example, there is no continuity of theatre staff, and no possibility of building up surgical teams. Likewise medical officers with surgical or other qualifications may find themselves in an isolated station where no opportunity exists to make use (or proper use) of them.

Recruitment meets resistance when it is realised that living conditions may vary from the ultra rural to the highly urbanised and through a wide range of climatic conditions with enormous distances between possible stations. This is clearly reflected in the fact that throughout its short history the Federal Health Service has been under-staffed and the position is steadily worsening.

In the National Health Service in the United Kingdom it was recognised that a service of such a personal nature as Health should have as much local autonomy as possible, and such was in fact provided by the Regional Boards. This is not the case in the Federal Service, where, more and more, the direction has been increasingly centralised.

A further cause of difficulty arises in that whereas Health is a Federal responsibility Social Services remain under the aegis of the Territorial Government. These services are so inter-related and so dependent the one on the other that this division has made for nothing but frustration and difficulty in both.

There is one other aspect of the Health Service to which perhaps attention should be drawn. African health services of every kind are provided free of charge. It is thus, as far as the African population is concerned a non-contributory free medical service. Such provision was readily understandable when the African population was still living a rural tribal existence, and not within a money economy—when European medicine was distrusted and shunned, and the provision of services was dictated by urgent public health requirements or on humanitarian grounds. Now however the African is clamouring for more and more services and for every kind of specialist facility. That such services are available in the quantity and at the level at present enjoyed in one measure of the Europeans' willingness to assist the African to a better standard. It would therefore appear that direct contributions from African wage earners towards their health service should be considered.

Finally there is a general feeling throughout both medical and lay opinion in Southern Rhodesia that allocations of health funds as between the three territories has been dictated by political expediency rather than by medical necessity and this would seem to be borne out only too clearly by such figures as are available.

Summary

It is therefore recommended that Health should become the independent responsibility of each of the three territories of the Federation.

Federal Police

It is suggested that an investigation should be undertaken with regard to the possible establishment of a Federal Police Force, in addition to the existing Territorial Police Force.

Conclusion

The foregoing suggestions have been submitted with the sole object of eliminating causes of conflict and of bringing about conditions which will make an ever greater contribution to the success of the Federation than has been made during the past seven years.

Oral Evidence

SALISBURY WOMEN'S INSTITUTE—represented by: Mrs. G. Ward, President, Mrs. Snook, Mrs. Jarvis.

Mrs. Ward stated that there was little they wanted to add to their memorandum but to confirm what the Morton Commission on Health had stated that the original move to make Health a Federal function was unwise. The Institute still held the view that health should be a Territorial subject. They also thought that there should be a joint African or native policy for the three Territories and they took the view that as everyone in the Federation was a citizen of the Federation all restrictions should be done away with for all races. In response to questions by members of the Commission it was stated that the difficulty in obtaining sufficient doctors for the Health Services particularly in the rural areas lay in the fact that most of the doctors and nurses for that matter wanted to be posted to the larger towns. To counteract this tendency they thought that better conditions, and this applied more to Nyasaland than elsewhere, could be offered to people going to the rural areas. They thought that the same consideration applied to teaching staff, although the staff position was probably as bad in Salisbury as anywhere. Even so, there had been a great improvement in the numbers that had been recruited since Federation; but they saw no reason why both Health and Education Services should not be Territorial, particularly as recruiting would then be less of a problem, because so many doctors, nurses and teachers disliked transfers, which tended to give them a sense of insecurity.

Replying to another question the delegation said that their reasons for saying that education should not be multi-racial arose primarily from the language difficulties that existed between children. This applied particularly in the primary classes, and the position would be very much the same in the secondary schools. Into the bargain the cost would tend to be absolutely prohibitive, because so many of the African children lived away from the larger centres, and boarding establishments would have to be put up.

African education, they said, cost less than European education; but it was not inferior. If there were to be any change over a to multi-racial basis, it would have to be very gradual indeed. Staffing would present serious problems because the African teachers were not sufficiently highly trained. The point was made that while African tax collections in the Colony yielded £1½m. African education cost £3m.

On being asked questions on the Morton (Hospitals) Report, land tenure and the franchise, the delegation stated that they disagreed with the conclusions of the Morton Report, and that as far as land tenure and the franchise were concerned, it was very difficult for them as laymen to make any recommendations.

The delegation stated that while they were not representing the Federation of Women's Institutes, they felt that that Federation would not necessarily disagree with the views put forward in their memorandum.

Memorandum

LEAGUE OF EMPIRE LOYALISTS (Central Africa Wing).
N. H. Wilson—Chairman and I. B. Wemyss—Organising Secretary

Firstly, we would like to convey to the Commission that the League of Empire Loyalists is not, as is supposed by some, anti-African or for that matter anti-coloured of any community. In fact, we believe that the Africans should be encouraged to gather together their own research workers, engineers, scientists, mathematicians, doctors, lawyers, etc., etc., if they can. We do, however, have a very real and great pride in our own race and believe that in terms of survival, the "colour bar" is essential for the protection of all. Abandon the political "colour bar" (however it may be disguised) and white civilisation will be drowned in the flood. Abandon the Industrial "colour bar", and there will be an intensification of inter-racial frictions, leading sooner or later to a head-on crash. Abandon the social "colour bar" and life in Africa will become unacceptable for all Britons except those with warped biological instincts. The "colour bar" in insisting upon a line of demarcation, enables all races to maintain some pride, some nobility, some dignity.

Properly understood, the recognition by the man of one race of a man of another race or colour is the only hope of a relationship based on courtesy and respect.

The influence of environment, coupled with the accidents of history, gives the Europeans certain advantages over the other races. It is not a case of better or worse in any absolute sense, but one of greater or less suitability under different conditions.

The so-called "indigenous" peoples have none of them been very long on the scene especially in Southern Rhodesia—indeed at the end of the last century, the country was still in a state of flux, tribe raiding tribe in ceaseless predatory warfare (each tribe really being of a different racial group). We must therefore allow for differences between the races, and even between groups composing what we tend to regard as a single race, e.g., various African tribes; for instance, no Matabele would accept a Mashona Chief—this has always been recognised by Government, which would never dream of trying to impose such a misfit. Yet, aren't we now aiming at just this with the African representatives in Government? It is so often forgotten by us when one talks glibly about the "Africans" one may be referring to people of widely different origins and cultures. The only racial groups which are homogeneous in the Federation are the Europeans. When preparing Constitutional proposals in the past, many of the basic differences which exist have been totally ignored, or glossed over, forgetting the stresses these differences set up.

No man of good-will can be satisfied with any goal less than a country the inhabitants of which live in concord with one another, each contributing the maximum he can to the common good. Such a goal is no idle dream. It will never be attained merely by a process of tearing down barriers—and just pushing the races together with the pious admonishment to live happily together ever afterwards! Rather, does it involve a process of mutual respect and understanding. At the moment for instance, even the African tribes do not wish to unite (the Mashangaan and Matabele living in Nuanetsi and their present troubles is a good instance)—there is a far higher barrier between Hindu and Moslem than most people imagine—the Asians therefore are not a homogeneous group. We have also a Coloured Community with fairly long-established rights which must be respected today.

All communities have their strong and definite ideas. The European is most unwilling that the control of his affairs should pass into other hands. He considers that the majority of Africans, for example, do not understand the very basis of European society and, he considers that if certain African leaders came to power, they would not provide the necessary conditions for its continuance. Have they not actually said so in their speeches? For this reason, the European knows that it is essential to the survival of his community and its standards that he shall manage his own affairs. Other communities are coming to think similarly. Therefore, there appear to be two main principles as being essential for the welfare of all sections of the community:—

- (a) That Her Majesty's Subjects in the Federation, as far as practicable, should have responsibility for the management of their own affairs.
- (b) That under no circumstances should anyone classified as non-European have responsibility for the management of European affairs.

The acceptance of the second principle thus means that in every inter-communal undertaking, the controlled authority shall be European.

Application of Principles

To a great extent African authority should be based on African custom and not on democratic systems alien to African thought and temperament.

Ideally, there would be a Supreme Council of Chiefs, under the Crown, exercising authority over African affairs.

Practically, it may be necessary to confine this Council to the Reserves and establish an elective system for Africans permanently resident in other areas. The system should be as simple as possible. African residents, likewise Coloured and Asian should elect representatives of Township and Village Councils; these councils should elect representatives to Regional councils; Regional councils should elect representatives to Territorial councils, and the Territorial councils should elect representatives to a Federal council.

The Federal council (with authority outside the Reserves) and the Council of Chiefs (with authority inside the Reserves) should elect representatives to sit with European members (appointed by the European Central Parliament) on an Inter-Communal Council presided over by the Governor (or his nominee, who would have to be a person completely free from any Party Political affiliations).

The function of the Inter-Communal Council should be in part advisory, in part executive, with such powers as may be necessary to enable it to exercise final authority over the conduct of those African, Coloured and Asian affairs which require European guidance. Its main advisory task would be the harmonising of race relations.

Administration

The Council of Chiefs and the Federal Council in their respective areas should be responsible for the administration of justice in all cases where Europeans are not directly involved. Appeals from these courts could go to a judicial committee of the Inter-Communal Council.

The same system might be progressively extended to other fields—medicine, public health, welfare, trade, agriculture and so on.

It would be possible for this system also to be employed at Territorial and Regional levels to avoid congestion of business at the top.

In general, moneys raised from African sources should be expended by African authorities. The same could apply to the Coloured and Asian authorities. Wherever these moneys are supplemented by grants from official European sources for specified purposes, there should be official European supervision to ensure that those purposes are being efficiently met.

We believe very sincerely that Federation should have been the greatest force for the preservation of British interests and the White man in Central Africa had it (the Federation) been administered with strength from its conception.

We are still, however, of the belief that the Federation should not be broken up and that by re-organisation with firmness of purpose this part of Africa could yet be saved from demagogism and barbarism.

We believe that we should stick rigorously to the assurances Mr. Hopkinson (the Minister of State for the Colonies) gave when he came out here in 1953 to put over the idea of Federation to us; and that the British Government should be made to fulfil and honour these assurances, as it was largely on these representations that we voted at the Referendum. Mr. Hopkinson declared:—

"There can be no question of a Gold Coast Government in Northern Rhodesia or Nyasaland. The Europeans in those territories have made their homes there and they are there to stay. They have largely contributed to the development and the well being of the Protectorates. They will continue to play their full part in the Government of those territories now and in the future and of course the same thing is even more true here in Southern Rhodesia".

Mr. Hopkinson also defined what was intended by "Partnership" when he said:—

"I believe that Federation will facilitate the development of this idea of partnership which is a question largely of goodwill and understanding to which all communities must make their contribution."

We submit that had this definition of "partnership" (which after all is the definition that was voted on at the Referendum) been used by the U.K. Government and our own Governments as a working basis there would never have built up the racial differences that are in our midst today—these racial differences have been caused and aggravated gravely by the blatant and unceasing efforts of British Members of Parliament coupled with our own Governments to bring about as speedily as possible the complete political, social and economic integration of the peoples of the Federation. Further, the Labour Party has made the task of making the Federation work almost impossible—they have insistently used Central Africa as a political football in spite of the assurances given by Mr. Atlee in 1953 at Ndola in his pre-referendum address when he said:—

"There is no question of Central Africa being used as a political football by the parties in Britain."

It appears to us that the real grievance of the Africans is a feeling of uncertainty. Brought about by the end of the tribal system and the apparent weakness of the White man today. Secondly, White rule, by eliminating warfare and ritual excesses has made life unbearably boring. The instinctive desire for security which is universal and the excitement of violence and conflict are today provided by nationalism. All races have a stake in the Queen's Peace and endurance of the Rule of Law and British Liberties. A militant rather than a defensive attitude to Accra and Cairo might well gain enthusiastic support among those who yearn for the battles of old.

We have all paid attention to the vociferous few hundred agitators—these do not after all speak for the African masses although they like us to think they do. The African masses are still unable to understand the first ABC of politics, let alone are they in a position to know what they want.

When discussing with the labour and peasant classes what their wishes are we still find an inherent distrust and fear among them that should the White man allow Africans control, their position would become intolerable; further than this it is difficult to get any coherent ideas whatsoever from them.

We find that when discussing the situation with the educated and moderate Africans that their whole desire is to be able to live with their families in peace and to be allowed to carry on their work without interference. Here again, we can sense the fear that the White man, having done so much for the African is now planning to leave him to the devices of those Africans who are enamoured with the idea of themselves becoming rulers and each and everyone of them picturing themselves as the possible Nkrumah of Central Africa.

We, the League of Empire Loyalists, are believed by the few hundred aspiring African Politicians to be "haters of the African." Nothing could be further from the truth.

Those of the educated but moderate Africans who are genuinely worried about the future for their children will often come voluntarily to the League's office and spend many hours discussing their political worries for the future and how they believe that the White man shortly intends handing over to Black rule which for their children they believe can only bring misery and victimisation. They have often pointed out that so many of those Africans who have assumed roles as leaders have been failures in any other walk of life and quite unable to get for themselves a steady job and work in an honourable manner; some of the African Politicians, they agree, have proved themselves to be able to work but of those who are most vociferous they tell us, they have been failures. When asking these Africans why they do not make their views heard and known, they say that it would be more than their life is worth to do so, that they can only tell those Europeans who befriend them, and hope that these Europeans will make their (the African) position and views known for them.

It has also been pointed out to us very frequently by these same Africans that as yet the Africans do not have full control of their own Townships and that if they have no members of their society who can be entrusted with this, how is it then that the White man believes that there are some Africans amongst them suitably qualified to Govern our country? They have repeatedly voiced the opinion that if Africans could have control of their own local affairs, then they could be happy: but not with complete control of the country going to Africans as they are convinced that many of them will be victimised out of existence—Nkrumah being quoted very frequently in this respect.

"Imperialism", "Colonialism", "Exploitation", "Oppression", ad lib are hurled at the heads of British settlers in the Federation and other British Colonies with all the gusto that men find in the groundless abuse of others; not only by our own kith and kin, but by those who, but for British Imperialism and Colonialism, would never have attained their present position in the world, whether as individuals or nations.

It appears to be totally forgotten by many that we have as much moral and legal right as the Europeans who settled in America, Canada, Australia or New Zealand.

When the pioneers and settlers came to these countries some seventy years ago two civilizations met, one, the product of some 5 or 6,000 years of trial and error by a branch of the human race developing by their own efforts, initiative, genius and inherited or acquired intellect and brain power. The other a civilization, that as far as can be ascertained had lain dormant in a state of stagnation since the stone age, possibly a million years more or less. Thus these civilizations moved on entirely different planes, psychologically, morally, intellectually and spiritually. It was not a question of colour, as so many people and propagandists blatantly affirm, but of culture and other differences well known to the biologist and anthropologists. It is extremely doubtful if the White man has ever understood the mind of the Black man and vice-versa, or ever will.

We are, we think, justified in saying without fear of contradiction, that the welfare of the Africans has always been a primary concern of the Europeans and that no nation has done so much in so short a time for the benefit of so many, by so few, with such limited means and, in spite of so many difficulties. Far from being underprivileged, as is so erroneously and maliciously alleged, the African people have been granted vastly more privileges under the White man's rule than they ever enjoyed under their own Chiefs: or might reasonably expect to retain under their own synthetic, veneered, intelligentsia.

We in the Federation, over the last few years have suffered from the propaganda of know-alls from far and near who, with the blessing of the applauding Communists, have shouted of racial differences, racial hatred, racial fear, racial colour bar, etc. etc.

Since the Africans are divided into several tribes, all with their own languages and tribal characteristics and there is also a large number of detribalised natives, no longer amenable to tribal laws or customs; the only recommendation that can possibly be made in order that these diverse elements may be adequately represented is on the lines we have already suggested. Thus we should be adapting the tribal system to modern conditions, without a break in inherited traditions, maintaining the dignity of the tribesmen, and given an opportunity for free self-expression and the development of a sense of responsibility and the unfettered means of co-operation with the more advanced culture.

All this is borne out by the conclusions of that great administrator and life long student of things African, Lord Lugard, who has officially stated that:—

"to try and remake an old established society in our way of living and thinking is certain failure: the native has customs and laws not ours, and we should strive for moral and material progress within the framework of his natural institutions."

The wisdom of his policy is admirably endorsed by that well known author of Communism, Fascism and Democracy Professor E. Horman, who states that:—

"There is an obligation to recognise human diversity as a value, and to stop setting one's self up as a yardstick with which to measure mankind."

Apart from the inalienable right of the European settlers to be master in their own house, a right which 13 British Colonies once asserted with considerable emphasis, may we infer that if two parallel lines never meet, therefore two parallel cultures or civilizations functioning on different planes will never clash; and that it is no derogation for the lower culture to recognise the greater experience and technical knowledge of the higher.

Any attempt to use the Constitution to mongrelise the Federation in order to appease our avowed enemies or the insidious fifth column within the gates, would go down to history as a despicable act of treachery and cowardly surrender at the expense of the ordinary peoples of all races living in the Federation.

We would like with all respect to refer the Commission to the report of another Commission; the Rhodesia-Nyasaland Royal Commission Report 1939 (Cmd. 5949) or as more commonly known to us the Bledisloe Report. We believe that a lot in this report will be of assistance to the present Commission. In regard to Southern Rhodesia we would draw the Commission's attention to Page 170, where a public speech made by the Prime Minister (now Lord Malvern) in the Colony on 30th March 1938 to an audience composed largely of natives is referred to and quoted.

We believe that if Lord Malvern had stuck rigidly to that policy and had gone forward with a sense of purpose from that time on those lines, now, 22 years later, the Africans would not be so dissatisfied—they would have had their own palatial Hotels, Cinemas, Houses etc.: and would not through natural jealousy be endeavouring to get for themselves what the White man has made for his own uses.

We have discussed this passage (P. 170) with many of the moderate Africans who appear to be in entire agreement with this policy and have put forward the unsolicited view that even now it is not too late to achieve something along these lines.

We have had over the last couple of years a number of U.K. Public men visiting us to ascertain, over their sundowners, whether we are doing things according to plan—their plan. It will be a long time before we forget the visit of a Labour ex M.O. named Johnson who did us the honour of looking us up. He according to Press reports, spent some time with the "Africans", and during the rest of his time, he occupied himself criticising the Europeans who had spent their time and money—as they are still doing—in trying to civilise the Africans.

Perhaps the inclusion of the following Press reports which appeared in the Rhodesia Herald on the 13th October 1957 and the 20th January, 1960, will give a clearer idea of what the majority, or masses of Africans are like, and will make it easier to understand what sort of task is before us to turn the African into civilised beings:

The Rhodesia Herald—13/10/1957. (Blantyre)

"Eight Die in Trials by Ordeal: There have been eight deaths so far in the wave of trials by ordeal held among local Africans to find witchcraft.

"These grim ceremonies, once very common here, mean either death or prison for the participants, for today they are illegal. Near Chiwawa in the humid lower Shire Valley, three Africans died recently out of twenty-one who drank deadly poison made from the bark of the muabvi tree. The tree, an evergreen, grows profusely along Nyasaland river banks. If the person who drank the poison vomited it he was judged innocent; if guilty—dead anyway.

"In Blantyre, when a young child died, the grandmother decided a spell had been put on it and ordered trial by ordeal. The child's mother, aunt and grandmother drank and the last two died. Nine Africans in court this week were fined £3 each (or one month's gaol) for attending another trial. They told the court that four children of a certain family had died without cause. The father called twelve senior members of the family together to discover the witch. All drank poison and three died. The other nine, after recovering buried the bodies which the police discovered."

"Dishonesty in North's African T.U.s—Registrar: "Serious examples of dishonesty and incompetence in African trade unions in Northern Rhodesia are revealed by the Registrar of Trade Unions, Mr. J. B. W. Wilkinson, in his annual report for last year. He says although there has been some improvement in the standard of administration of the African unions the entire initiative had come from the Registrar's inspectorate staff and not from union officers or members."

"Apart from some exceptions there had been only grudging compliance with the Registrar's requirements."

"It has been possible to end many improper and undesirable practices in unions ranging from excessive and unreasonable allowances for higher officers to persistent use of union funds on disbursements to officials and employees euphemistically labelled 'loans' or special holiday bonuses."

Lord Home on his fairly recent visit spoke of the many opportunities created for Africans and told us that integration in the workshop would not be the end; Social partnership he said would follow, and what we had to do was to take down artificial and unnecessary social barriers and make a daily practice of good manners. What have the Europeans done who have lived a lifetime in this country to be subjected to this presumptuous advice and criticism from the gad-about political big-wigs. Why didn't they come here with practical assistance 40 or 50 years ago? Those who have lived their lives here have paid the piper and paid dearly.

There is one thing however that these people should never forget:—

"Federation was never accepted by the Native populations of the Northern Territories, and by very few in Southern Rhodesia; they were never given the opportunity to vote on the matter; or to express an opinion in any other direction. The great majority—90% or more—were strongly opposed to Federation, and this being the case, it was forced on them. And, since then they have been trying to bemuse the natives into acceptance of this dictatorship, for that is what it is—the same dictatorship as is intended to be forced on us in this year of destiny 1960".

It has always been plain to us what the U.K. Governments intentions were and it should have been just as plain to all our delegates who went to London to discuss Federation. However, there it is, it will be just another piece of the Empire that the U.K. Government will be giving away—and that was planned to happen whatever Party was in power in the U.K. or what ever Commissions were set up.

We all want to do the best we can for ALL mankind, and it would be well, we suggest, if the telling comment of Somerset Maugham were kept in mind which, quoted, reads:—

"To say that a vanquished barbaric people gain in happiness when the civilisation of their conquerors is forced upon them, is hypocrisy."

Is there any reason to suppose that they are less happy in their primitive state than when compelled to accept a culture they do not want and reforms they see no need for, and they are ruled by an Alien Law. No, in studying and reviewing the Constitution, more thought for the Africans masses should be given in that they should have as much control as we can possibly give them of their own affairs. More thought should also be given to the Europeans, whose sacrifices and hard work have made this Federation possible, and for all time the Europeans should have complete control of their own affairs. Why should any of the races be presumptuous enough to believe that they know better how to handle another races's affairs?

If the Africans and Europeans are failed on the Reviewing of the Constitution the only sure way of combating Communism will be lost to us. We cannot expect to reinforce the existing White regimes if we have or quite obviously in the near future are to have Black controlled Governments. This reinforcement of the White population is the only sure way to combat Communism. Those countries that have been granted independence are now looking to Russia and threatening their former leaders who gave them a longer peace in Africa under benevolent White rule than they ever enjoyed before.

Christmas is no longer officially recognised in Ghana—is this the spreading of Christianity or is the "dark continent" reverting to its former savagery? All these things should be taken carefully into consideration when deciding on the future of this country.

If the few hundred Agitators in the Federation who are the only ones who get platforms in Britain, America and elsewhere and who are the only ones interviewed by prominent Public men on their visits to the Federation and who claim to speak for the African masses are in fact listened to, it would appear that we have raised a soulless Monster, a type of Frankenstein, whose only wish is to destroy its creators—but this is not so, as we have cause to know by the pathetic appeals made to us against these self-imposed Leaders.

The British could never have established themselves on the African Continent had they not had the ability and the guts to stay here. The policy being forced on all races of integration is obnoxious in sentiment and destructive of loyalty to the British World. Would it not be better if all the thought and good intentions which are being devoted to turning the African into a synthetic European were used to encourage him to be a Good African?

We respectfully suggest the Commission ascertain whilst in the Federation what contribution has been made by African brains to the building of our cities and the making of this glorious country? The answer they will discover is none. This being so how can we expect the far more complicated issue of the running of our country to be handled by African brains? It would be in effect to call for British Africa to revert to barbarism. If any members of the Commission are in doubt as to the rights and wrongs of Africans Governing, we can only cite to them the plea made by a Northern Rhodesia M.P. in 1957 that "African Members be not asked to take the oath of allegiance, because it is their belief that by so doing they place themselves in the power of the person to whom the oath is made! The world of magic is the African's natural habitat—how is it possible to share the responsibilities of Government of our country with a people so steeped in crude superstition?"

As for what the Colonial Office describes as "partnership", this is only another word for integration which seems to be quite abhorrent to the masses of Africans as well as to the Europeans. It is only the few hundred Agitators who want this so called integration as a forerunner to the breaking down of the fair rule of the White man, for their own intrigue and scheming, which would in turn lower all the standards of both White and Black.

In the words of our late King-Emperor, George V, our duty and hope should be that "we may still further strengthen, or at all events, pass on unimpaired, that pride of race, that unity of sentiment and purpose, that common feeling of loyalty and obligation, which knit together, and alone can maintain, the integrity of the Empire." And, in the words of Mr. H. Wood Jarvis in his enthralling Book Let the Great Story be Told: "To this end, one of the primary necessities is that the history of the British Empire should be comprehended; and that our own people in England should cease to echo grotesque misrepresentations which whether originating at home or abroad, are devised by those who plot and fight to deprive us of the heritage we have from our predecessors, and which we should determine to transmit unbroken to our descendants."

The words of His Late Majesty, King George VI are also worth recalling: "What each one of us will have to determine is whether to consolidate what past generations have achieved for us, or to consent to its being brought to nought; whether to preserve the spiritual inheritance common to our Mother Country and her kindred nations, or to witness its extinction."

Finally, if it is the British Government's intention that the two Northern Territories are to have Black Governments—then it leaves no alternative but for the Federation to be broken up and for Southern Rhodesia to secede, as the position would be intolerable with the Federal Governments being Black controlled by the two Northern Territories representatives.

Oral Evidence

THE LEAGUE OF EMPIRE LOYALISTS—Represented by Mrs. Wemyss and Captain MacMahon

Captain MacMahon thanked the Chairman for being allowed to appear before the Commission to give evidence. The President of the League was at present ill in Durban, and he had been asked to represent him.

The League of Empire Loyalists was only interested in upholding the prestige, dignity, power and honour of the Empire. He personally had come to Africa sixty-six years previously and was the oldest survivor of the British South Africa Police serving at the time of the Jameson Raid. When the early pioneers, with the authority of the British Government, entered Southern Rhodesia, they found a beautiful wilderness occupied by numerous tribes generally at loggerheads with one another. In particular, the Matabele looked on the Mashona as their dogs. The early pioneers came to make their home in Southern Rhodesia in the same way as the Pilgrim Fathers had made their home in America; unlike the Pilgrim Fathers, however, they had not come to exterminate the local people.

Captain MacMahon then gave an outline of conditions applying in the early days in the area of the Federation. Slavery had been endemic and had only been wiped out in 1912; stronger tribes raided the weaker tribes to secure cattle, slaves and women. All lived in terror of witch doctors. They were not bad people, but they were at a very elementary stage.

In the course of years, relations between the settlers and the natives became very satisfactory. It was not necessary for the natives to remain in the areas occupied by white men, but they settled down and multiplied. Indeed, Africans from far away came to work for the white men. This provided proof that they were satisfied with the conditions they found.

Nevertheless, in the last few years, there had been tremendous agitation against the settlers. This had been caused by democracy and the British political system under which a dictatorship of the majority was imposed on the people. Such a system was not entirely suitable in Africa at the present time. The tribes had been under the spiritual and temporal guidance of the Chiefs for many years and they were not prepared for a system in which they were expected to elect their own leaders. Democracies outside Britain had never been a great success—African countries in particular were used to rule from the top.

Since the Europeans had arrived in the Federal area, they had spent millions of pounds and many lives to bring Africans up to their own level. Assertions that they repressed or suppressed Africans were simply not true.

In the old days, justice was immediate and certain. Now, a man who committed a trivial offence which could be expiated by a few strokes was sent to jail for months.

What was necessary now was to encourage the Chiefs to administer their own territory. Where they were de-tribalised in the urban areas they should be allowed to manage their own affairs as far as possible in local councils. This provided good training in government. It would then be possible to select from men with experience of local councils members of a higher council whose advice would receive close consideration by Governments.

In recent years, a determined effort had been made to depreciate the work done by Europeans in Africa. If the Europeans now handed over 95 per cent. of the country to persons who had no claim to the support of the majority of their own people, they would rightly be accused of abandoning their responsibilities. The present rulers were more qualified to rule while an African Government was being built up than the so-called popular leaders.

There were five branches of the human race: white, brown, yellow, red and black. Four of these had in their time built up high civilisations; only one—the black—had never developed through its own efforts. Africans had been in touch with the white, brown and yellow branches for thousands of years, but they had never benefited very much.

The Europeans of the Federation would welcome the African's ideas and assistance—they needed his aid and goodwill. They were not unapproachable masters, but good partners in trying to create a mutually satisfactory partnership. At the present time so few were doing so much for so many in so short a time with very inadequate means; if that was being a Colonial he was proud of it. He hoped that those who followed on would not betray the early pioneers or throw them to the wolves to placate political dogmas evoked in a distant country.

Mrs. Wemyss said that the questions the Commission were having to consider affected vastly more than merely Africa. Africa itself was seriously affected by events in the rest of the world—in particular, the American passion for "democracy" was completely illogical, and one which they did not follow in their own country. Their aim was to find a market for American production. The closing of the market in China had caused them to look around for new outlets, and they were desperately trying to off-load their surplus production in Africa, and at the same time obtain minerals for their own use. The resources of Africa should be for the Empire and not for a foreign country.

This outside interference made it all the more essential that black and white should pull together in the Federation. Their cultures were different; but a system could, and should, be devised under which each race had prime responsibility for its own affairs.

Memorandum

H. D. WIGHTWICK, M.P. Member for Salisbury South in the Federal Assembly

The Commission will have received evidence from the Dominion Party in the Federal Assembly, setting out its proposals for a Central African Alliance (see Footnote 2), as an alternate means of maintaining association between the territories, instead of the present Federal System. As I was originally responsible for drafting this Plan, I should like to make some comments on it.

The Plan is, in my opinion, capable of a number of variations and alterations which should be considered in the light of objections which may be raised to it. These variations or alterations would not, as I see it, alter the principle of the Plan—which is political independence for the territories whilst maintaining economic interdependence. On a broader canvas this is in fact the principle behind the existence of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

The title under which an association of these territories continues is perhaps of importance. Due to propaganda, with a deplorable absence of counter-propaganda by our Governments, the name Federation has, amongst the simple minded masses of the African, fallen into disrepute. If a satisfactory alternative can be found it should be adopted—even if the present Federal System persists. If a system similar to the Central African Alliance Plan is adopted, the title is not of such importance as it would in fact merely be the name of a Treaty—the Zambesi Basin Treaty if you like. The term Commonwealth would appear to be an alternative both to the terms Alliance and Federation.

The boundaries of the territories, as they exist in the present Federation and as they would exist under the Central African Alliance Plan, are capable of adjustment. Alternatives are shown on the Plans attached to this evidence.

As an instance of this the Central African Alliance Plan shows a "Northern Territory" which it is proposed should be administered, and developed, by the Dominion of Rhodesia, and then, after a period of time should have the right of self-determination or affiliation. This area, the present North East of Northern Rhodesia, is a comparatively empty area. It is adjacent to Nyasaland where the problem is basically one of land and over-population. The natural expansion of Nyasaland should be into this territory. This "Northern Territory" might well be combined with Nyasaland into one Colony under the British Government.

The reason why such a suggestion was not made in the Central African Alliance Plan was the confirmed belief (perhaps a somewhat cynical one) that Britain wanted only to get rid of obligations not assume them, and that any suggestion that laid even a slight burden on the British taxpayer would be rejected out of hand. Britain's original insistence on Nyasaland's inclusion in the Federation is of course the basis of this belief.

Despite the difficulties of finance, for the overcoming of which suggestions are made later in this evidence, the combining of the "Northern Territory" with Nyasaland has certain obvious advantages. Neither in this Territory nor in Nyasaland are there any large numbers of permanent European settlers. No insuperable difficulties would arise in adjusting the present administration in Nyasaland and the Territory to cover the combined Colony. The frontier with the proposed Dominion of Rhodesia would be a short and manageable one across from the Congo pedicle to Portuguese East Africa. Geographically the natural outlet from these territories is to the East Coast by rail to join the Tanganyika system. (Reference to Economic Co-operation in such projects is made later in this evidence.)

If the present Federal System were retained it would still be sound to combine these two territories into one Colony. A curious result of such a combination might well be that Nyasaland's objection to the use of the name "Rhodesia" would to a large extent fall away as the majority area of the new Colony would in fact be North East Rhodesia. It would however be better to apply the Native name of the Lake. Another result of such a combination of these territories would be to force compromise and a more responsible attitude on Nyasaland extremist leaders, who would be faced with very keen competition from African leaders, such as Mr. Yamba, in the new Colony.

It is not suggested that this new Colony, whether within an Alliance or Federation or outside of either, should be given full independence. It would remain as a Colony under the British Government and gradually advance to more responsible government but in the interests of its inhabitants control must still be exercised over it for a very long time to come. If there is no objection to still primitive African peoples being controlled by civilised white people, there is an even stronger objection to their being prematurely controlled by a small oligarchy of their own race.

One of the objections which is raised to the Central African Alliance Plan is that if an area such as Nyasaland were outside the Federal System that it would become prey to Communist influence and probably have Communist legations. This objection is, in very truth, a Red Herring. It completely ignores the fact that Nyasaland would still be controlled by the British Government and that there is no more chance of Communist infiltration under British Control than there is under Federal Government Control. For that matter under an Alliance, instead of a Federation, control of Nyasaland's external affairs would still rest with the British Government in consultation with the Dominion of Rhodesia.

The principal problem of the Federation is the problem of Nyasaland and North East Rhodesia. This area contains roughly half the total African population of the Federation and a negligible number of Europeans. It is an area which, unlike other parts of the Federation, has not to the same extent absorbed "Western" ideas of life, and is unlikely to do so without greatly accelerated development by Europeans with "risk" capital. It is now certain that such European "risk" capital, other than perhaps Mining capital, will not enter this area except under heavy government guarantee or protection.

It is, I think, perfectly true to say that an overwhelming majority of Africans and the great majority of Europeans desire to see Nyasaland outside the present Federal System. A referendum of the electorate if taken today, would without much doubt produce a large majority in favour of getting rid of Nyasaland from the Federation. Outside of the immediate circles surrounding the Federal Government nobody wants to keep it within the Federation.

One of the objections, probably the principal one, raised against the Central African Alliance Plan is that the Copperbelt is included in the Dominion of Rhodesia and that thus the other territories would be deprived of their present share of the revenues from the copper industry.

This objection is not a valid one because the Plan provides for these revenues being made available to the other territories in the form of grants-in-aid. Morally the area termed the Dominion of Rhodesia has every right to the Copperbelt because it was developed by the people within that area. Nyasaland received no help from Copperbelt revenues prior to Federation. Southern Rhodesia made the Copperbelt possible with her railways and her coal.

If however the inclusion of the Copperbelt in the Dominion of Rhodesia is regarded as an insuperable obstacle to the creation of a Dominion of Rhodesia and the Central African Alliance, then there seems to be no reason why the Copperbelt should not be treated as a separate area, at least for a period of time. The Copper is, after all, a wasting asset.

The Copperbelt could easily be administered as a separate territory under a condominium of the United Kingdom and the Dominion of Rhodesia with a Resident Commissioner. The revenues from the Copperbelt would be apportioned to the territories on an agreed percentage basis. At the expiry of a period of thirty years the Copperbelt would become part of the Dominion of Rhodesia. Alternatives to this suggestion are, that the Copperbelt should be administered by a High Commissioner, as the High Commissioner Territories are administered in South Africa.

The above suggestions for separating the Copperbelt are merely designed to meet what I regard as quite groundless objections to its inclusion in the Dominion of Rhodesia, because the Central African Alliance Plan makes it quite clear that the Treaty would provide for the revenues of the Copperbelt to be applied for the benefit of all the existing territories and not for the Dominion of Rhodesia only. It is essential in considering the Copperbelt to realise that its population is, in the great majority, neither native to the area nor permanently resident in it. The African labour is, for a great part, domiciled in areas remote from the Copperbelt. When the copper deposits are ultimately worked out the majority of this population will move elsewhere.

A point which is not always clearly grasped relating to the Central African Alliance Plan is that it provides for the appointment of a High Commissioner for Central Africa by the British Government, whose functions would be somewhat similar to those of the High Commissioner in South Africa, in relation to the territories in the Alliance, outside of the Dominion of Rhodesia. This High Commissioner would also be the link between the territories and the Dominion—as he is today in the Union of South Africa. One appreciated that the existence of a Governor in Nyasaland raises difficulties with regard to a High Commissioner, but a formula can probably be found to overcome this difficulty. You could of course have someone who was Governor of Nyasaland and High Commissioner for Central Africa.

The appointment of such a High Commissioner raises the possibility of including Bechuanaland in the Central African Alliance (or Commonwealth). It seems probable that Bechuanaland would benefit by such inclusion which would not in any way prevent its progress towards responsible government. Its inclusion would also simplify the problem of the High Commissioner Territories within the Union of South Africa. This is a point which should certainly receive careful consideration by the United Kingdom Government.

Another objection which is normally raised, by United Kingdom circles, to the creation of a Dominion of Rhodesia as proposed in the Central African Alliance Plan, is that the Dominion would still contain some 3,000,000 of the Federation's 7,000,000 odd Africans, and that these three million Africans would not have the same chance as the Africans in the territories outside of the Dominion of creating purely African Governments. This is of course true, but one assumes that the object of any constitutional exercise is not merely to eliminate European political influence—particularly in those areas where the European has large interests and has gone a long way towards "Westernising" the peoples.

It is always pointed out that the British Government has certain obligations and a position of trust towards the African peoples in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland and to a lesser extent in Southern Rhodesia. It should be clear to the Commission that the Central African Alliance Plan takes careful note of this. Under this Plan, the African peoples of Nyasaland, North East Rhodesia (the "Northern Territory") and of Barotseland will progress, under the British Government, as African territories, ultimately having predominantly African Governments. This is not only keeping trust with them—it is probably more than they hope for at present. It must be pointed out that these Africans constitute the great majority of the Africans within the present Federation. What will be left in the Dominion of Rhodesia will be the present inhabitants of Southern Rhodesia, over whom the British in strict fact have ceased to have any control, and approximately 500,000 Africans only in that area of Northern Rhodesia which will be included in the Dominion of Rhodesia. It would therefore be possible for the British Government to say with a clear conscience that it had more than fulfilled its trust to the majority of the Africans in the territories.

But in case the British Government should have any twinges of conscience relating to treaties which were originally entered into with the object of acquiring control over territories largely for the purpose of trade, it is suggested in the Central African Alliance Plan that safeguards for the Africans who remain in the Dominion of Rhodesia should be incorporated in the Constitution of the proposed Dominion. Really these safeguards are only necessary for the 500,000 Northern Rhodesian Africans who will be included for their domicile in the Dominion; and indeed if the Copperbelt were excluded and a careful study of boundaries made, the number would probably be much less than 500,000.

The principal safeguard suggested in the Dominion of Rhodesia is the creation of an Upper House or Senate. The composition of this House is important and below I give my own view of what it should be and what powers it should have.

The Senate in the Dominion of Rhodesia should consist of a President appointed by the Governor-General who would not be a Senator and thirty or more Senators. Half the Senate would be Europeans and half would be non-Europeans. Representation would be given to all races, including Asiatics and Coloureds. Senators would be elected for a period of six years, but initially one third would retire every two years. The President of the Senate would be appointed for six years and could be reappointed. He could have a casting vote.

At least one Senator would be a Cabinet Minister and one Senator would be designated Leader of the Senate by the Government of the day.

The composition of a Senate of say thirty members might well be, 1 Asiatic, 1 Coloured, 13 Africans, and 15 Europeans. Of the 13 Africans, 3 might well be Chiefs.

The Asiatic Senator would be elected on a roll compiled from all the Asiatics on the Common Roll. The Coloured Senator would be elected on a roll composed of all the Coloureds on the Common Roll. The European Senators would be elected on the Common Roll. The Special Federal Roll and the lower bracket of the Southern Rhodesia roll would fall away and a senatorial Roll with lower qualifications would be created to elect the African Senators, other than Chiefs. The Chiefs would be elected by a special roll of all recognised Chiefs in the Dominion.

Alternative methods of election are of course possible. It might be advisable to elect African Senators representing rural areas and do so through a College elected by District Councils. However this restricts the vote and the idea should be to give as many Africans as possible a vote for Senators.

The powers of the Senate would be restricted as with other Upper Houses. It would have no power to hold up money Bills. It would however have power to hold up other legislation, other than legislation declared by the Governor-General to be Emergency Legislation, for one Session.

Apart from these normal restrictions on an Upper House the Senate would have special powers to replace the African Affairs Board in the present Federal sphere and the reserved clauses in the Southern Rhodesian Constitution. It would be able by a two thirds majority to declare a Bill to be discriminatory on the grounds of race—any race. When this occurred the Bill would be referred back to the Legislative Assembly or House of Representatives (or whatever the Lower House may be called). If not amended to satisfy the Senate it would only then become law if passed by a two thirds majority of the two Houses sitting together. The same powers of the Senate would apply to Constitutional Bills and to any legislation relating to Native Trust lands. The alienation of such lands could only be effected by a Bill passing through the Senate.

It is probable that in the future the Senate might cease to be of the value it will be at the present. Provision should therefore be made for it to be possible to abolish their Senate after a period of not less than 25 years. This would be done by a majority of the two Houses sitting together.

Apart from the fact that the Senate would provide a watch-dog for all racial interests it would provide a voice and a vote for masses of people who are not yet ready for full political power.

The Lower House of the Dominion (which should I think be called the House of Representatives) would consist of not less than 60 and not more than 80 Members, elected on a Common Roll the qualifications for which would be not less than the Upper Bracket of the present Federal Roll. Special Racial representation as now would be abolished, but provision would be made for the delimitation of a certain number of constituencies at below the prescribed minimum to effect the election of some Africans to this House, via the Common Roll. This provision should fall away after a period of years, and in any event would be reduced as soon as an African was elected for a constituency having the normal number of voters.

There are alternate and perhaps better methods of dealing with the problem mentioned above. In strict fairness no racial advantage should be given in a House elected on a Common Roll, particularly if special racial representation is given in a Senate. However there are already African Members in the Federal House and as a matter of politics it would be necessary to have some in the new Lower House. They should however be elected on the Common Roll and if special methods to elect a number of Africans are devised, then those special methods should fall away as Africans are elected by normal methods. This is of course already provided for in the Federal House today.

The Legislatures of Southern Rhodesia and Northern Rhodesia and the Governors of Northern and Southern Rhodesia will of course disappear. There will be one Parliament with two Chambers and one Governor-General in the Dominion. There will also be one Civil Service instead of three. There will be a considerable saving and a considerable increase in efficiency in administration.

The constitutional progress of Nyasaland (and N.E. Rhodesia if joined to it) would of course be a matter for the British Government. The same of course would apply in Barotseland—which however it is assumed would become an African Kingdom. The Dominion Government would only be interested in the constitutional advances in these countries to the extent which such advances effected the provisions of the Treaty of Alliance with them.

It would be necessary to have a body known as the Council of the Central African Alliance Treaty. This would consist of representatives of the Governments of the Dominion and the other territories who would meet periodically under the Chairmanship of the High Commissioner. The discussions of the Council would be limited to those subjects defined in the treaty and to economic cooperation. The internal affairs of the territories or of the Dominion would not be open to discussion at meetings of the Council.

The terms of the Treaty between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of the Dominion of Rhodesia will probably have been suggested to the Commission by evidence given by the Dominion Party. It would seem that Defence of the Treaty Area and Civil Aviation within that area should be the responsibility of the Dominion in consultation with the British Government. Posts and Telegraphs and Railways need not be controlled by the Dominion, but a centralised control of these would probably be to the advantage of all the territories. In the case of the Railways they are already separate as the Nyasaland railways are run by a Private Company. The area would be a Customs Union and there would need to be centralised control of Customs and Excise. Apart from these all functions of Government would be performed by the Governments of the territories themselves.

The great merit in a looser association of these territories, such as the Central African Alliance Plan, or something similar, is that the territories would feel that they could ultimately attain to full independence. The mere fact that they could do so, and thus satisfy the ambitions of their African politicians, would tend to bind them to the Alliance. The effect would be very much the same as the Statute of Westminster. It would come to be a free association instead of one which, quite frankly, can probably only be held together by force.

I come now to what I believe to be an essential to any plan for these territories—whether Federation persists or whether some other system of association takes its place. Whatever happens it is essential that an Organisation for Economic Cooperation in Central and Southern Africa be set up, somewhat along the lines of the Colombo Plan.

The subscribers to such an Organisation should be the United Kingdom, the United States, the Union of South Africa, the Dominion of Rhodesia, Belgium and Portugal and possibly France, since Madagascar should be brought into any sphere of economic cooperation in Southern Africa.

The Commission may well think that such a suggestion lies outside its terms of reference, but I do not think that it is possible to consider recommendations for the Constitutional future of a country without also considering its economic problems and the extent to which they are influenced by neighbouring territories.

Vast sums of money and technical knowledge and services on a great scale are required if the territories of Southern Africa are to develop more rapidly than they are at present doing. It is essential to political success that the standards of living of all the peoples in these territories be raised. To realise what has to be done one has only to look at the map. In the field of communications alone an enormous amount of work remains to be done. More links are required to the Atlantic, the East African System must be linked with the Rhodesian system. It will be apparent to the Commission at a glance that the New Colony I have proposed of N.E. Rhodesia and Nyasaland, is largely undeveloped because there are so few communications. Quite apart from Kariba there is a vast power and water potential as yet untapped. Housing, harbours, pipelines, technical education and vocational training, encouragement for basic industries—the list of what remains to be done is almost endless. And if it is not done, then no political solution you offer will really have solved the problems of this part of Africa.

But what cannot be done by one state can be done by a consortium of states working together to raise standards of living, and through essential developments to broaden the whole economic picture, to create new markets, to the benefit and profit of all concerned.

I seriously suggest that your Commission should make a recommendation to the Government of the United Kingdom that it should take the initiative to call a Conference of the countries I have named to consider the setting up of a permanent organisation for Economic Cooperation in Central and Southern Africa, such a Conference to be held in Salisbury and the permanent Headquarters of the Organisation to be established there.

I feel that I must add to the evidence offered above, a few remarks of a more general nature.

There is I think a very real danger that if the present Federal System persists, a Constitutional position may be created which would be quite unacceptable to the majority of Europeans and that, under such circumstances, much against its will, Southern Rhodesia might be forced to secede from the Federation. This is not desired. It is merely a statement of what might happen.

If Southern Rhodesia seceded from the Federation then there might be a grave danger that it might be forced, through economic circumstances, to seek closer association with the Union of South Africa; again this is not desired but circumstances might force it to happen.

I have fears that these dangers may be greatly discounted to the commission. I would assure you that they are very real because the Europeans you are dealing with here are people of British and Afrikaner stock—both very determined breeds, who in the final event will not hesitate to take quite extreme measures to secure their future. It is also my hope that the Commission will realise that there are very strong ties, economic, cultural, sporting, and family with South Africa. The European resident of Rhodesia, even if he is a recent immigrant from England, does not look upon South Africans in the same light as an Englishman resident in England. They are close to us, we mix with them and holiday in their country, they are in fact our friends and we regard them as very much the same people as ourselves—even though we may not like their politics. Our natural inclination is to side with them against extreme criticism from overseas. This goes, I think, for 90% of the European population in the Rhodesias. It would be quite wrong to assume that in dealing with the European in the Rhodesias you are dealing with the average "Englishman". It would equally be wrong to assume that Rhodesians feel any affinity to the Europeans in East Africa, and no solution that involves any tie up with East Africa would be considered. Whether you like it or not you have got to accept that the ties between South Africa and Rhodesia exist—even though they are not political ties. We are even now much closer to South Africa than we are to the United Kingdom. It would be a grave mistake to think otherwise.

Whilst I think it is true to say that most people in Rhodesia neither believe nor advocate that it would be a good thing for Southern Rhodesia to join the Union of South Africa, they nevertheless believe that if the political future of Southern Rhodesia were to be dominated by African majorities in the other two territories, that Southern Rhodesia could not remain in association with them. If you force Europeans to a choice between Black Nationalism and White Nationalism, you can take it as quite certain that the vast majority will choose White Nationalism.

In the event of the "framework" of the present Federation being adjusted to an Alliance or to any altered form of association, the redistribution of National Debts will of course present a difficult, though by no means insuperable problem. The problem would not be very great if a Dominion of Rhodesia were created which included the Copperbelt, because in that event the Railways and Kariba would remain within the Dominion and serve the Dominion only. They do not serve the other areas directly. If on the other hand the Copperbelt were excluded from the Dominion then a substantial part of the debt relating to both the Railways and Kariba would have to be funded from the revenues of the Copperbelt. It must be realised that Kariba was largely built for the Copperbelt. It is not necessary to labour this point here—it is a study which can only be made when a decision on political divisions has been arrived at.

One thing which is certain is that whatever decision is reached about the future association of these territories, it will not be a lasting and successful decision unless a massive propaganda campaign is mounted to reconcile the inhabitants to it. In the past both the British and local Governments have shown great weakness and timidity in this. I am personally of the opinion that, with the human material you have to work upon in Africa, almost anything can be "put over", as advertising people would say. But of course it must be put over by experts in the art of propaganda, not by a bunch of completely untrained Civil Servants lumped together into an "Information Department". At the moment the wrong sort of propaganda is succeeding merely through lack of any other sort of propaganda and the short sighted parsimony of governments.

A political point which I have not included in the above evidence is the possibility of including Nyasaland and N.E. Rhodesia in a system with Tanganyika. This seems to be a popular idea with Nyasaland natives and there is much to recommend it from the geographical point of view. It would certainly be much to the advantage of a Dominion of Rhodesia whose only frontier with such an area would be the short one across whose only frontier with such an area would be the short one across from the Congo pedicel to P.E.A. The only objection I can see to it is a financial one—the determination of Britain not to assume a financial obligation for the area. However, the solution to this problem clearly lies in a Organisation for Economic Co-operation in Central and Southern Africa to which the Dominion of Rhodesia would have to contribute. In any case the Dominion of Rhodesia would probably be prepared to pay quite well to get rid of the area, because what would remain of the present Federation would be a more compact, viable, and manageable area, which would in consequence leap ahead in development and rising standards of living. It would do so if for no other reason than that investors would have a confidence in it which they will never have whilst it is joined to Nyasaland. Even deprived of Nyasaland and N. Rhodesia markets, the Dominion and Barotseland would be much better off. Incidentally relations between Barotseland and the Dominion would be extremely cordial—as they are today.

It would perhaps be wrong to conclude this evidence without some reference to Social as distinct from pure political problems.

The main Social problems arise from what is referred to as the "Colour Bar". Whether you like it or whether you don't like it, the fact remains that there is a certain natural antipathy between people of different colours—on both sides. A conscious effort has to be made, on both sides, to overcome this—even by people who regard themselves as being particularly free from prejudice. It is better to acknowledge that this difficulty exists rather than to pretend that it does not exist. It is of course breaking down and will continue to do so and the calmer and more prosperous the atmosphere of a country is, the sooner will the "Colour Bar" disappear. One of the dangers of precipitate change is that one type of "Colour Bar" may be replaced by another.

As far as Rhodesia is concerned the real problem is the difficulty of distinguishing the civilised African from the primitive and still uncivilised masses. Because of this difficulty there is a tendency for people overseas, and for that matter for people here, to generalise about the African—when in fact they are talking about, or dealing with, particular cases amongst the Africans. Because of this also the more civilised African feels constantly frustrated for he is lumped together with the primitive masses of his own people with whom, socially, he has little in common. Because of this also the Asiatic and Coloured are frustrated and bewildered because they too are placed in this lump category. Because of this also the European fears to make social concessions for fear of being swamped by primitive masses, whose behaviour would outrage a fastidiousness which the average European has acquired by many hundreds of years of what we call civilisation.

The solution therefore does not lie in the generalisations which people indulge in without any knowledge of a multi-racial society, set in a country where the majority of people are still, in their habits, very far from civilised. Such generalisations may apply in Ghana, where in fact the same problem does not exist or they may equally apply in England where again the same problem does not exist.

The only really satisfactory solution, as an interim measure until the standards of the masses advance very considerably, is to find a means of recognising the African who has advanced to a reasonable standard of civilisation and behaviour and to accord to him the full social privileges enjoyed by the European. This has of course been done elsewhere, notably in the "assimilado" system of the Portuguese territories. This suggestion, of course, normally brings screams of anger from people whose real object is not to solve the social problem, so much as to advance one race, regardless of its development, at the expense of another. Whilst one concedes that there is some slight embarrassment attached to a civilised person having to carry some mark of distinction to indicate that he is civilised, this is considerably less embarrassing than being treated as uncivilised. Reasonable people of all races realise that it is almost impossible to distinguish at a glance between the "garden boy" dressed up in his zoot suit and the barrister who may have leanings towards Hollywood fashions. Let us be practical. It certainly does not lie beyond the wit of man to provide a solution and a reasonable test—and it merely begs the question to say that that test must be applied to all races. anybody who suggests that the average European is not more civilised than the African is merely being stupid—or stubborn.

A fairly simple method of solving the difficulty lies in the issue of a Full Citizenship Certificate, which would be granted on an application supported by four Europeans of different professions, say one Clergyman, one lawyer, one Chartered Accountant, and one Director of a registered Company with a certain paid up Capital. The Registrar of Citizenship would normally accept this, but if he was not completely satisfied he could have the right to refer the case to a Board consisting of himself and two assessors. There would be few such cases for no four Europeans of different professions would behave other than with responsibility. The holder of the certificate would be supplied with a small badge to be worn in his lapel—merely to avoid his having to produce the certificate. A little propaganda would lead to such certificate holders being accepted without question in all public places and the possession of the badge would avoid incidents.

There would of course be people on both sides who would dislike this sorting out, but the general feeling amongst Europeans would be one of immense relief, that the problem had been solved and that the danger of their social life being swamped by the uncivilised, had been overcome. From this there would be a natural acceptance of the Asiatic and the Coloured.

To solve these problems it is however necessary to give assurance to the European that he can face the future with the certain knowledge that he has a measure of political as well as social security. Without some political security he will not be prepared to make social concessions, but given it his whole attitude towards the "Colour Bar" will change and he will develop a tolerance which would otherwise be impossible.

WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE?

by Humphrey Wightwick, O.B.E.,
Dominion Party M.P. for Salisbury South

This is intended to provoke thought. It is not an expression of political Party opinion or policy. It is, in fact, an exercise in crystal gazing at problems which confront, or which may in the near future confront, us.

In 1960, less than two years hence, a conference will be held to decide what the future political structure of the countries of Central Africa is going to be. What will be discussed at that Conference? Who will attend it? What are the results likely to be? All these questions are of the most vital importance to the people who live in Central Africa.

The Conference itself will consist of delegations from the Government of the United Kingdom, the Federal Government of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, the Government of the self-governing Colony of Southern Rhodesia, the Government of Northern Rhodesia, which is not self-governing, and the Government of the Protectorate of Nyasaland.

I have said that the delegations attending the Conference will be from these various governments, but that is not necessarily strictly correct, for it is not unlikely, say in the case of Southern Rhodesia, that the delegation may include people who belong to Opposition Parties. In the past the Southern Rhodesian Government has made a practice of inviting Opposition Leaders to take part in discussions relating to the future of the Colony, and it may well do so at this Conference. Sir Roy Welensky has made it clear that the Federal Government will not follow this practice, though Opposition Parties may be consulted prior to the Conference. In this respect Sir Roy will be departing from tradition.

It will be seen that, at the outset, this will not be a clear-cut meeting of the Heads of Governments. Indeed the functions of the various governments taking part overlap to such an extent that the only delegation which will clearly represent one government, one electorate and one territory, will be that from Southern Rhodesia. The other delegations will, by the very nature of our systems of government, represent overlapping and sometimes conflicting interests.

The United Kingdom delegation will obviously be representative both of the office of the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Affairs. The Federal Government and the Southern Rhodesian Government are responsible to the Commonwealth Office whilst the Governments of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland are, even more directly, responsible to the Colonial Office. The weakness of the United Kingdom delegation will therefore lie in the fact that it will be composed of parallel but sometimes conflicting interests. This weakness might, in itself, lead to a rigidity of attitude which could well render the conference abortive because the other delegations at the Conference will not, in fact, be negotiating with the Government of the United Kingdom but with two separate organizations of that Government, each backed by its own advisers and each having different responsibilities in Africa.

It might be argued that, because of this, the United Kingdom delegation should consist of people who have no connection with the Commonwealth Office or the Colonial Office and that the delegation should be headed by a completely neutral Minister. There would be considerable merit in such a suggestion but even a neutral Minister would have to draw his advisers from the Commonwealth and Colonial Offices.

The Northern Rhodesian delegation will almost certainly consist of part official, part non-official members, and there is sure to be one or more Africans. The Official members will be Colonial Civil Servants and thus, in fact, subject to influence, if not orders, from the Colonial Office. In fact, therefore, part of the Northern Rhodesian delegation will be part of the United Kingdom delegation—an odd situation, but one of politically great significance.

Nyasaland is likely to send a delegation in which Colonial Civil Servants will be even more prominent than in the Northern Rhodesian delegation. These negotiators representing a part of the Federation will also, in some cases, be subject to the orders of the people with whom they are negotiating from opposite sides of the Conference table.

The delegation from the Federal Government will consist exclusively of members of one political Party and will almost certainly contain Africans. It will be a difficult delegation to choose because every Member of the Federal Parliament has a territorial affiliation. It is probable that the delegation will be chosen so as to maintain the accepted territorial balance which seems to have permeated Federal politics to the exclusion of pure merit. If this should be the case, the Federal Government delegation might contain the seeds of weakness and a tendency to over-compromise.

The Southern Rhodesian delegation will certainly consist of Cabinet Ministers and one (or perhaps, because of its strength, more than one) member of the Opposition Party. It will be the strongest of the delegations and, due to the strong Opposition in Parliament, the least likely to lean towards over-compromise where Southern Rhodesian interests are concerned.

There will be a number of interests who will not be represented at the Conference but who will—by lobbying, by propaganda and by many other means—seek to influence the deliberations. These interests include such organizations as the African National Congress, the Capricorn Africa Society, a number of meddling clerics—and in fact all those people who seek to influence politics in any way except through the ballot box.

The Press will also play its part, not only here but abroad, and the views it expresses and the manner in which it presents other peoples' views will have varying effects upon the public and the Conference. Overseas papers will affect the Conference to the extent that they influence the views of the United Kingdom Government—and one should not underestimate that influence. Generally speaking, the overseas Press will be extreme in its support for African political aspirations.

It is against this sort of background that the Conference will be held and it is at once obvious that the composition of the Conference will bring forth opposing views and that, by that very composition, the scales will be weighted in favour of the views of the United Kingdom delegation because that delegation will, in fact, be duplicated in part by the delegates from Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

The trend of the discussions will, of course, be conditioned by the Government which is in power in the United Kingdom at the time the Conference takes place. If a Labour Government is in power, then the local delegations will be faced with greater difficulties in putting across their point of view, than they will be if a Conservative Government is in power. But, whether the Government of the United Kingdom be Labour or Conservative, it can be anticipated that there will be serious differences between the views of the United Kingdom delegation on the one hand and the Federal and Southern Rhodesian Government delegations on the other.

Broadly speaking the approach of the Federal Government supported by the Territories (but opposed by some interests outside the Conference) is likely to be that of demanding full self-government within the Federation and the complete withdrawal of the Colonial Office from the affairs of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland. This measure of independence would in fact create what is called a "Dominion". Within that Dominion we would manage our own affairs and shape our own political systems subject only to "reservations" within a constitution, or a treaty with the United Kingdom. External affairs would continue to be handled, in the main, by the United Kingdom Government.

The United Kingdom Government will, probably, in broad principle, be prepared to agree to these demands, despite outside pressure for the dismemberment of the Federation but—and it is a most serious but—they will lay down conditions and reservations for the attainment of this degree of independence, which will be very hard pills for the existing electorates of the Federation to swallow.

It is around these conditions and reservations that discussion at the Conference will rage—and rage is probably the right word. The conditions will be more stringent if a Labour Government is in power in the United Kingdom, but whether the government be Labour or Conservative, very much the same conditions and reservations will be demanded.

What are these likely to be?

The United Kingdom delegation will be insistent that African political advancement must proceed at a pace which they (the U.K. Government), and not we, consider to be reasonable.

Whilst they will probably accept the franchises as they exist today in the Federal and Territorial spheres, they will undoubtedly (and to some extent paradoxically) insist on a greater degree of African representation in our legislatures. In Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland they will probably not be content with less than parity of representation within the near future, though they will not insist on this in the Federal legislature and will be powerless to insist on anything in the Southern Rhodesian legislature. Where there is insistence on parity of representation, or measures leading to it, there will also be insistence on the inclusion of Africans in government at Cabinet rank.

It can be taken as almost certain that the United Kingdom delegation will seek safeguards to ensure that qualifications for the franchise are not altered in the future so as to prevent larger numbers of Africans qualifying for a vote. In other words, the present franchises will have to be regarded as the very minimum concession to African political advancement.

The United Kingdom delegation will clearly state that African political advancement cannot be halted. They will want to be assured that it is accepted that, when the African forms the majority of the electorate, his political views will prevail and that he will be able, if he so desires, to form predominantly or even exclusively African Governments. They will want to be assured that any idea of permanent European political domination has been abandoned by our governments.

This is, of course, putting it quite crudely. It is however the essence of what will be demanded, and what may be conceded. It will, of course, be wrapped up in the language of diplomacy—the icing to hide the bitterness of the pill.

There will be many other conditions and reservations. The United Kingdom Government will wish to preserve the spirit, if not the letter, of treaties concluded with Native Authorities such as the Barotse, and it will probably seek the abolition of any colour bar or racial discrimination in a variety of ways. But these, and other points of discussion will be entirely subordinate to the central question of African political advancement.

Unless satisfactory agreement is reached on this central pivot of the discussions, then it is unlikely that the Colonial Office will withdraw from Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland and it is also unlikely that the Federal Government will be granted full control over the internal affairs of the Federation.

Of course, various compromises will be put forward. The Commonwealth Office may replace the Colonial Office in Northern Rhodesian and Nyasaland affairs, but still with the demand for parity or near-parity of representation. The tendency in compromise will be to give the appearance of concessions to European opinion by retaining a substantial European majority in the Federal legislature and by extending in some directions the powers of the Federal Government. But parallel with this there will still be that insistence on rapid increase in African representation in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, leading to parity and, ultimately, through the ballot box to political dominance. It is unlikely that any compromise, when carefully examined, will be found to exclude this, for the United Kingdom delegation will, by its very composition, be sensitive to African demands in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

Every device of government will doubtless be examined to overcome this central problem, and amongst these devices the Second Chamber will almost certainly be examined as being, at least for a time, the possible solution. Indeed it may prove to be the only possible solution, despite the fact that, so far, our politicians have rejected it out of hand. Yet in examining solutions it is unlikely that the central objective will be lost sight of by the United Kingdom delegation.

The attitude of the Federal Government to compromise will undoubtedly be conditioned by its majority. As its majority is a large one, it will feel that it can go further in concessions than if its majority was a narrow one. In matters which gravely effect the future of the country and of the European in particular, perhaps not every Member of the Federal Parliament will be prepared slavishly to follow the Party Whip, but with its present majority the Government can ignore any need for caution on those grounds.

The Southern Rhodesian delegation will be less prone to concession than any other. With a narrow majority it will tend to resist any compromise which would be distasteful to the Southern Rhodesian electorate, and it would be most unlikely to agree to any move which, within the foreseeable future, would put the African in the position of dominating the governments of the other territories or even playing a part in them which amounted to parity.

It can therefore be seen that the deliberations of the Conference are going to be long and difficult and may end in deadlock.

The last possibility is one which cannot be ruled out, but it would not necessarily mean the end of all negotiation. Indeed, with an intervening election within the Federation, it would almost certainly lead to a further Conference with a completely new approach to the problems involved.

The Federal Government is a United Federal Party government and will seek at all costs to keep the Federation, as at present constituted, intact. That is the avowed policy of the Party. Indeed by public utterances it has tied its own hands in this respect, before it goes to the Conference. It cannot now agree to any dismemberment of the Federation or even toy with the Dominion Party's ideas of separate Protectorates carved out of part of Northern Rhodesia and the whole of Nyasaland.

The possibility of deadlock with a United Federal Party government in power is, therefore, not only possible, but quite likely, for it may not be prepared to pay too high a price for independence with the Federal state as now and cannot agree to any form of dismemberment. Its attitude is such that it must either over-compromise or reject unless it is prepared to do a complete volte-face and adopt something very like the suggestions of its opponents.

This is perhaps over-simplifying what may happen, but the consequences of disagreement at the Conference are worth considering, merely because they will almost certainly occur.

If a U.F.P. government were to over-compromise in order to keep the Federation intact, it might well face defeat, if not in the Federal House, at least at the next election. If, bearing this in mind, it stood firm and, due to the inflexibility of its views, brought about a deadlock (albeit the deadlock was not of its own making), then again it might face defeat. If it accepted something like the views of the opposition, one assumes that there would be a political realignment, though, political consciences being what they are, this is by no means certain. The majority of politicians are more concerned with where they sit than what they believe. Nevertheless it seems fairly certain that deadlock at the Conference would result in a general election in which both sides would seek to woo the electorate by saying how tough they were going to be.

Against the background of such an election, the Opposition Party would have a great advantage but, whatever the results of such an election, the subsequent actions of the Federal government would be even more interesting. Whatever talk of toughness there might be and whatever actions might be contemplated, there would, of necessity, be certain preliminaries to action. We should not just slip into chaos overnight.

There would undoubtedly be a further Conference and one more determined to find solutions, but it would be a very different Conference from the first one. The approach of the parties concerned would be based upon a determination to find practical solutions to differences rather than, as will be the case at the first Conference, to attempt to reconcile those differences to ideals or existing systems.

If, following a deadlock, we ultimately proceed to a second Conference of this nature, it is probable that the only solution left which would be capable of retaining the Federation as it now stands, would be a solution based upon the use of a Second Chamber. Only by this means would it be possible to satisfy the desires of the African, and perhaps other racial elements, for greater political advancement without placing in their hands what might to the European, and indeed to the African, prove to be disastrous political power.

The objection to such a solution is that it would be a frank acknowledgment that racial and not non-racial representation is desirable at our present stage of development. Actually, this acknowledgment already exists in our present Federal Constitution and in the Federal Franchise. The devices which have been designed to eliminate it are at present more pious than real.

It may well be that the only path towards non-racial representation may lie in a more frank acceptance that it can only be attained through the satisfaction of racial aspirations. Only perhaps when there is some such measure of satisfaction on a racial basis, can we proceed to the evolution of a non-racial basis. It is a matter of the creation of a political climate. It is as well to bear in mind that there are more ways of killing a cat than by choking it with butter.

One cannot, of course, be certain that the Second Chamber would in fact provide the solution to racial aspirations or the solution to racial aspirations or the solution of a deadlock. It would depend entirely upon the circumstances. Nevertheless it would be worthy of thought and study, for it provides an elasticity not otherwise attainable and even permits of sections of the Federation having looser ties with a Central Government of limited but vital and independent powers.

(In case of any misunderstanding, I should make it clear that there is no suggestion that we should provide a political home for our growing number of Peers).

If we rule out this type of solution, then there is little doubt that we shall be faced with the partial or whole dismemberment of the Federation.

This is a thought from which people at present shrink, but to which they may yet have to apply their minds. There is really nothing terrifying or disastrous about the thought—when one approaches it without political hysteria. The Territories which form the Federation were, until five years ago, separate territories each having its own form of government and its own measure of development. They existed as separate entities before and they could, of course, exist as separate entities again. Such a step would be regrettable and perhaps even injurious to certain interests, but it would not by any means be disastrous.

Partial dismemberment need not really be dismemberment at all. It could take the form of the creation of two or more Protectorates within the boundaries of a Federation, which would, within certain limitations, be allowed to develop along lines of their own. The details of such a plan, and its implications, are worth examining; but, before doing so, it is as well to consider the main objections which have been raised against it.

The principal objection to any plan of this nature has, strangely enough, come from the European and the more liberal sections of the European at that. It is held that any such plan would create "Black States"—which is said to be unthinkable. Why it should be unthinkable to the ultra-liberal section of the Europeans and yet possibly acceptable to the more conservative of the Europeans is something not very easy to understand. The answer probably lies in a determination, instinctive rather than reasoned, to maintain the territorial status quo. We cannot, however, assume that it can be maintained, to the satisfaction of all its peoples.

Indeed, a dispassionate view of the future seems to indicate that the feared "Black State" will, in one form or another, develop, whether inside or outside of the Federation.

European immigration into Nyasaland and parts of Northern Rhodesia is negligible and shows no signs of increasing. Whether we like it or not, there are areas which are going to develop under any Federal system into areas in which the African is going to be politically dominant. It will perhaps take a long time, but it will happen. The "Black States" are going to appear whether they are inside or outside the Federation. It is only a matter of time.

The problem is hardly political; it is ethnological. Weave fairy stories as we may, it is obvious that European settlement and interests lie in Southern Rhodesia and a portion of Northern Rhodesia alone. Outside of that area there is a minimum of European settlement and interest and a maximum of Native interests. If we are merely going to draw lines on a map, that is the logical division of interests and, it can be argued, should be the logical composition of a Federation, if a Federation is going to persist. Any other division places European interests in Northern Rhodesia in the position that they will, almost certainly, be swamped politically in the Native interest—in other words be incorporated in a "Black State".

Of course, any plan which envisages the drawing of lines on a map to separate predominantly Native areas from areas in which the European has maintained, and must maintain, a substantial interest and political control, must be accompanied by some outline of the political system under which such a "reconstructed" Federation would function.

Obviously the Native areas or Protectorates would have a form of government best suited to their needs and state of development. In Barotseland that form of government already exists. In Nyasaland the limited legislature would from time to time be modified to meet changing conditions. The main areas of European interest in Southern Rhodesia and Northern Rhodesia would best be combined into one State.

The question, of course, would be responsibility for the "Protectorates". Would a Federal Government control these? Would the Colonial Office or the Commonwealth Office control these? Would it be a Condominium of some sort? The answers could be varied, but I think are likely to be as follows.

It is extremely unlikely that the United Kingdom Government would consent to full control of such "Protectorates" by the Federal Government. It is equally unlikely that the Federal Government would agree to Colonial Office control over the "Protectorates" and still have them within the Federation. There remains some form of Condominium. This could be exercised by the Federal Government and the Commonwealth Office, not the Colonial Office—merely as a face-saver. In practice it would amount to little more than the functions apportioned to the Government of South Africa in the High Commission Territories. It is possible that there might be additions to these functions, such as Defence, Police and even Justice, in addition to Communications, Posts and Telegraphs, Customs, etc., and such additions would make a material difference to the measure of control. In effect, however, the "Protectorates" would be outside the Federation, unless they possessed representatives within a Federal Legislature. Without that they could not be regarded as being fully under Federal influence.

It is difficult to see how one could justify the creation of these "Protectorates" and at the same time give them representation in a Legislature of the rest of the Federation. Without largely destroying any political balance in the European influenced area this could really only be done under a system incorporating a Second Chamber. There would seem to be grave dangers in giving a Federal vote to people in "Protectorates" not fully under our control.

There would be established a Second Chamber in the Rhodesian Parliament and representatives from the "Protectorates" would sit in that Chamber. The discussions in the Upper Chamber would be confined to Legislation which had force both in Rhodesia and in the "Protectorates". The second Chamber would be known as the Federal Council. The second Chamber would have no powers to hold up money bills, but it would have powers to refer other Bills back to the Rhodesian Parliament for further consideration. It would in any event be unable to hold up any Bill for more than one session of the Rhodesian Parliament. No person born in or resident in a "Protectorate" would be entitled to vote in Rhodesia. The "Protectorates" would not return any representatives to the Rhodesian Parliament, only to their own Legislatures and to the Federal Council.

The second plan is somewhat similar to the first but is likely to be more acceptable to Europeans and Africans alike. It envisages a State of Rhodesia with full Dominion Status, and the two "Protectorates", but it assumes that no legislation passed by the Rhodesian Parliament would have force of law in the "Protectorates" unless passed by the Governments of the "Protectorates". The Rhodesian Government would assume responsibility by treaty with the Government of the United Kingdom, for Defence, Main Communications, Posts and Telegraphs and Customs—but not Law—in the Protectorates. The only grant-in-aid would be made in respect of the cost of Defence which would be carried out exclusively by the Rhodesian Government. There would be no second Chamber and no person born in or resident in a Protectorate should be entitled to exercise a vote in Rhodesia.

In other words Nyasaland and Barotseland would be cut off from the existing Federation and there would be an enlarged Rhodesia which would adopt a "friendly neighbour" policy to these Protectorates, until they ultimately attained to full self-government. It is probable that for a period of years the Dominion of Rhodesia would have to finance development in the Protectorates and give technical assistance and advice.

The new Dominion of Rhodesia, would, in fact, buy its independence by subsidizing the Protectorates for a stated period of time, say at the rate of £6,000,000 a year for ten years. Faced with the alternative that the British taxpayer should subsidize the Protectorates, the ideological outlook of the United Kingdom Government might well undergo a subtle change. Herein lies a solution whereby, with a little mental adjustment, "face" can be saved all round and everybody including the bulk of the Africans can win what they want.

A "COLOMBO PLAN" FOR AFRICA?

by Humphrey Wightwick, O.B.E., M.P.

Whilst the plans of political parties and of the British Government for the future of Central Africa will not be known for some months, the ball has at least been set rolling. The Dominion Party have come out with their plan which involves the creation of a Dominion of Rhodesia, and a number of allied but separate Protectorates which will ultimately reach maturity as states, and will be known as the Central African Alliance. There is much to be said for free as against compulsory association and, whether you agree with it or not, the term Central African Alliance has a ring of greatness—and of hope.

I think we are gradually reaching a stage where a solution to the political problem of Central Africa will be found, if for no other reason than that, if it is not found, the present structure will crumble altogether and there will be nothing to take its place. Out of that solution there will, I am sure, grow a Dominion which will rank with the other nations of our Commonwealth and of the world.

As a Dominion we shall have reached political maturity and our politicians will have to live up to that maturity; their feet will have to tread paths which hitherto have been reserved for the United Kingdom. We shall have to turn our minds to wider issues than has been the case in the past.

It will be of little use to have solved the great political problem of Central Africa unless we bend our energies to solving the economic ones. It costs nothing to write a new political constitution but it costs a great deal of money to build a railway, to set the wheels of industry turning, to set oil flowing through pipelines, to turn arid wastes into gardens and to harness great waterways to the use of man.

It is to the advantage of all of us that the States of Central and Southern Africa, be they States under strong European influence or be they almost purely African, should develop at a pace which will insure ever-rising standards of life and ever greater prosperity for their inhabitants. Yet the developments which will bring these things about are only too often of such magnitude that no one State can undertake them.

Looking at a map, for instance, it is obvious that the arteries of development, the main lines of communication, in Central and Southern Africa are far from complete. It is also obvious that, as things stand, it would be economically impossible to complete them until the development of some areas appeared to justify it. It is only too often a case of which comes first, the chicken or the egg. If we are to hasten the development of Central and Southern Africa to the benefit of all it must be done to a grand plan to which the various States concerned are prepared to contribute.

A logical development must be some form of "Colombo plan" to cover the less developed areas of Central and Southern Africa. The subscribers to such a plan would have to be the Dominion of Rhodesia, the Union of South Africa, Britain, Portugal and perhaps Belgium, with interested benevolence, if not active participation, by America. Only with the backing of a consortium of states can a grand plan of development be contemplated and only with such backing will some projects, vital to the overall development, become possible inside individual States or areas. What cannot be done by one small State can be done, in the interest of themselves as well as the State concerned, by such a consortium. For instance, the 21 Colombo Plan countries are spending £1,000,000,000 a year on development.

Once an organization were set up to implement a "Colombo Plan" for Central and Southern Africa, there would flow from that organization other avenues of co-operation and goodwill. One can even visualize an ever-spreading Alliance. After all, it is the system which works so well in our Commonwealth—economic inter-dependence coupled with political independence.

The participation of the Union of South Africa would be essential to such a plan, and her politicians would not be slow to see the eventual economic benefits which would accrue to her. There would, however, be a much wider benefit: for South Africa's participation might well contribute to an eventual change in the political climate of a vast area of Africa, a lessening of tensions and a growth of goodwill. It is difficult to continue to dislike a man who extends a helping hand, even if you still disagree with some of his views.

The initiative towards this plan should, rightly, come from the Dominion of Rhodesia, and it is perhaps interesting to note that under the political plan of the Dominion Party there is already a start by the help to be given to neighbouring territories. True, that help is already being given in the existing Federation, but until we are an independent State we cannot take the initiative to extend the principle on a wider scale. (An important example of this wider-scale help was in the headlines last week—the Warsak Dam in Pakistan, which is costing £22 million and which Canadian technicians and money are helping to build).

Not entirely unconnected with a grand plan for development in Central and Southern Africa is the part it must play to preserve itself and to contribute to the preservation of western civilization. We cannot close our eyes to what has been happening elsewhere—in Egypt, in the Middle East and in the countries which border the Persian Gulf. The time has come when we must prepare against eventualities which we hope will never occur.

Just as we need a “Colombo Plan”, so we need a Southern African NATO. In this case it would have to be a SATO—South Atlantic Treaty Organization—to which the United States, Britain, France, Belgium, Portugal, Spain, South Africa, the Dominion of Rhodesia and Ghana would subscribe, as well as other countries on becoming independent. Northern Africa is, of course, already within the scope of NATO.

Within the last year or two we have had practical demonstration that our own frontiers are as far away as Aden and, if the Middle East of Europe are ever overrun, Africa will be the last base of the western countries, as, to a large extent, it proved to be in the last war. We should have to consider a much greater “defence in depth” in Africa than we did last time. The time has come when we must prepare for this, you cannot build bases and communications overnight, and the Western Powers must no longer delay in planning and co-ordinating the defences of Central, South, East and West Africa—not to mention the South Atlantic.

The obvious centre from which to do this is right here in Salisbury, and we should do what we can to encourage it. The establishment of a SATO organization here would bring in its train considerable economic advantages, not only in the inevitable establishment of bases, but because strategic requirements would dictate some of the major developments which would become necessary to carry out a full economic plan.

These are broad views, far removed from the hitherto somewhat parochial run of our politics, but they are the sort of things we shall have to turn our minds to, if we achieve the status of an Independent State.

Oral Evidence

H. D. WIGHTWICK, M.P.

Mr. Wightwick made the following points in amplification of his memorandum:—

1. As he saw it, there were only three courses open to the Federation. The first was to keep it roughly in its present form; the second was to adopt some alternative form of association on the lines of the Dominion Party’s Central Africa Alliance plan; the third was some compromise between the two.
2. Federation could only remain as it was, if a civilised form of government was maintained in each Territory. If this did not happen, it would fall to pieces. At the present stage of development of the African, this implied a European majority at the present time. If this were acceptable, then Federation could remain as it was.
3. It was logical that if Southern Rhodesia were given full self-government in the Territorial sphere, similar powers must also be given to the Governments of the two northern Territories. There was some doubt whether African majority Governments in the two northern Territories could provide stable government and such a system could only work if the Federal Government had the majority of powers.
4. If stability could not be maintained in Nyasaland, it would become increasingly difficult to maintain Federation. The logical alternative was some form of alliance on the lines of the Dominion Party’s plan. Alternatively, Federation could be maintained between Northern and Southern Rhodesia with an alliance under treaty arrangement with Nyasaland and Barotseland. Such a treaty would provide common services in the fields of defence, civil aviation, posts and telegraphs etc. on an agency basis.
5. Any solution arrived at in the 1960 review must be lasting. For this reason, the majority of the electorate should be in agreement so that the opposition party could not, as a result of a general election, upset any decision arrived at.

6. Although the Dominion Party contained a number of extreme elements, it was not an entirely reactionary party. It had in fact polled the largest number of votes in the last Southern Rhodesia elections and it was essential that its views should be taken into account at the Review Conference.
7. One of the great tragedies of the present century was the haste with which Europeans had got out of Africa. If there had been a little more time, Africans could have been brought up to something like a European standard of civilisation; as things were, they would probably never become civilised. If the Federation could find a way of building up a multi-racial state, Africans in the Federation would be far better off than Africans who had obtained their independence elsewhere.
8. If the country were divided on the lines he had in mind, it was not an essential part of the scheme that the Copperbelt should become part of the “Dominion of Rhodesia”. In any case, revenues would still be distributed over the whole alliance. Alternatively, there would be no great difficulty in treating the Copperbelt as a High Commission Territory or condominium. It could be administered by the High Commissioner for Central Africa in parallel with Nyasaland and Barotseland.
9. Although there were a number of people in Southern Rhodesia who regarded Nyasaland as a burden, Southern Rhodesia would only wish to “go it alone” if African majorities took over the northern Territories before they could provide civilised governments. If African majorities were established in the Legislature, it would not be regarded as a safeguard even if the Executive Council continued for the time being to have a “civilised” majority. Speaking personally, the witness felt that there would be no objection to African majorities in the northern Territories if these were achieved over a period of years through the existing arrangements.
10. There would need to be some redistribution of land, particularly in the eastern part of Northern Rhodesia, where some land was not in use and could be developed by Africans from Nyasaland. It was wrong that people should hold on to land which they failed to develop; this applied to Europeans in Southern Rhodesia as much as to Africans.
11. The franchise for the Senate (paragraph 24 of his memorandum) should be as wide as possible so that Africans could feel that they had an active part in the government of the country.

ASSOCIATION OF RHODESIAN AND NYASALAND INDUSTRIES

The Association of Rhodesian and Nyasaland Industries (ARNI)

As long ago as 1922, the year before the Colony became self-governing, manufacturing industry in Southern Rhodesia had made such a promising beginning that the employers concerned banded themselves together in Salisbury and Bulawayo to form Chambers of Industries. These two Chambers, while maintaining their separate identities and their local autonomy, came together for national purposes in a rather loosely-knit organisation known as the Rhodesian Manufacturers Association.

In the early post-war years, Chambers of Industries were also formed in the Midlands (Gwelo) and in Umtali and the central association was re-organised to bring them in. The new body, known as the Federation of Rhodesian Industries, thus covered the four main centres of industrial development in Southern Rhodesia.

With the advent of Federation in 1953, consideration began to be given by F.R.I. to the question of broadening the basis of the organisation to cover manufacturing industry throughout the three territories. In the result the Association of Rhodesian and Nyasaland Industries was formed in 1957.

The membership of ARNI consists of the following:—

- (a) about 350 firms who acquire membership by virtue of being members of their local Chambers of Industries (Bulawayo, Gwelo, Salisbury and Umtali);
- (b) a few direct members in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland;
- (c) about 30 associate members, consisting of employers in primary industries or who serve the interests of or are otherwise clearly connected with industry; and
- (d) 13 affiliated organisations catering for the interests of individual branches of manufacture, e.g. clothing, textiles, paint, etc.

The paucity of members in Nyasaland is due solely to the fact that, except for the processing of tea and the packing of tobacco and the repair and servicing of motor vehicles, there has been virtually no development of manufacturing industry in that country. In Northern Rhodesia, too, the development of secondary industries has lagged far behind that of Southern Rhodesia. There are in each of the main centres of population in Northern Rhodesia too few manufacturers to justify or support a local Chamber of Industries and those manufacturers who have not thought it worth while to join ARNI direct are, in so far as they are organised at all, members of a joint organisation catering for commerce and industry (COMINOR).

The ordinary membership of ARNI embraces a wide range of manufacturing activities, including, inter alia:—beverages, building materials (including asbestos products, cement, ceramics), chemicals (including fertilisers, paints, soap, cosmetics), footwear, textiles and clothing, agricultural machinery, engineering (including boat building, body-building, foundry work), furniture and upholstery, rubber tyres, plastics, ball-point pens, radio, batteries, paper, cardboard and packaging materials, brushware, tobacco and cigarettes.

Amongst the associate members are numbered the British South Africa Company, Rhodesian Selection Trust, Anglo-American Corporation of South Africa, all the commercial banks as well as a number of finance houses, and the leading industrial consultants.

The membership of ARNI is steadily expanding and each of the four Governments in the Federation, who each year send representatives to attend the Annual Congress and to take part in its deliberations, recognise ARNI as entitled to speak on behalf of manufacturing industry throughout the Federation. It enjoys a permanent form of liaison with the Federal Government on industrial and economic affairs through the medium of an Industrial Consultative Committee, the Chairman of which is the Minister of Commerce and Industry. ARNI is also represented on the Labour Advisory Council established by the Southern Rhodesian Government, and has recently taken part with other employers organisations in setting up in Southern Rhodesia a Committee to consider and advise upon the recommendations and conventions adopted by the I.L.O. in so far as they affect the Federation.

The foregoing brief account of the origin, membership and activities of ARNI indicate that industrial organisation has reached an advanced stage amongst employers of labour in the Federation and that developments in this field are already comparable with those in more highly developed countries such as the United Kingdom and the Union of South Africa by which they have largely been inspired. It should be emphasised that by its constitution ARNI is open to membership by any employer engaged in or associated with manufacturing industry without regard to race or colour. It is, however, the fact that so far no manufacturing industries under African management and control have developed to a stage at which membership of ARNI would have a realistic appeal. But ARNI will not fail to encourage such membership when the opportunity offers.

Brief review of economic development in the Federation

The Commission will no doubt have been supplied with a great deal of information from official sources about the economic development which has taken place in each of the three constituent territories of the Federation. There will, therefore, be no need to labour the matter in the present memorandum. Nevertheless some mention of certain salient aspects may perhaps be permitted in order to set the problem of the future in its proper perspective.

The following tables show the estimated population of the three territories and the total for the Federation by racial groups for the years 1954 and 1958 (Table I) and the numbers gainfully employed similarly displayed (Table II).

It will be noted from Table I that although the size of the African population in each of the three territories is roughly the same, the number of Europeans varies considerably. There were in 1958 nearly three times as many Europeans in Southern Rhodesia as in Northern Rhodesia, and over twenty-five times as many as in Nyasaland. From Table II it will be seen that the total numbers of all races employed in the money economy in 1958 in the three territories taken in the same order is in the ratio 7 : 3 : 1·8. Practically the same ratio applies if the African sector alone is considered.

It would appear, therefore, that to a first approximation the greater the depth of European settlement the greater the economic development, measured in terms of the amount of employment given generally and to Africans in particular.

If we consider manufacturing industry only, we find that there are three times as many Africans employed in Southern Rhodesia as in Northern Rhodesia and four and a half times as many as in Nyasaland. If the manufacture of pig-iron and steel-smelting are excluded in Southern Rhodesia and the refining of copper in Northern Rhodesia, the figures should be reduced by about 3,700 in each case, but this has only a slight effect upon the relative proportions.

It is, we submit, no mere accident that economic development and the expansion of manufacturing industry in Southern Rhodesia has far outstripped that in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland. Southern Rhodesia became a self-governing Colony in 1923 and the whole process of development became the responsibility of the European population who had made their homes there. It is true that in respect of certain legislative functions an ultimate power of veto lay in Westminster, yet never once has that power had to be exercised. Moreover, as was shown by the preliminary factual studies undertaken for the Conference on Closer Association in Central Africa held in London in March, 1951, Southern Rhodesia has never been less solicitous for the welfare of its African population than has the Colonial Administration in the two Protectorates. Indeed, so far as educational, health and agricultural services for Africans are concerned, Southern Rhodesia spent in 1950 over £2 m. out of a total revenue of just over £16·5 m., while Northern Rhodesia spent nearly £980,000 out of a revenue of just over £11 m., and Nyasaland about £532,000 out of a revenue of just under £3 m.

Expressed as expenditure per head of African population these figures work out at 27s. 3d. in Southern Rhodesia, 18s. 11d. in Northern Rhodesia and 6s. 0d. in Nyasaland.

So much for the nonsense one frequently hears about the exploitation of the African by the white settler! The aspect of the country in which the Africans are now living and multiplying in peace and growing prosperity is due entirely to the energy, initiative and organising ability of the white man. It bears not the slightest resemblance to the country as it was and as it would have remained had it been left to the black man with his tribal wars and his devastating methods of tilling the soil. The white man alone has been responsible for bringing the country to its present state of civilisation. With the help of the Africans as unskilled labourers, he has built 2,700 miles of railways in the two Rhodesias, and about 53,000 miles of roads in all three territories. He has opened up and developed the mineral resources of the three territories to such an extent that the total value of mineral production increased from about £23 m. a year in 1946 to roughly five times that figure in 1958, viz.:—£103 m. And the same story can be told about agriculture, forestry, fisheries, the building of schools, hospitals and houses, the development of electric power and so on through the whole gamut of activities that go to make up the economy of a modern state.

The demographic problem

With the above brief glance at one or two of the salient features of the past, we now turn to the future. The problem of the future which overshadows all others and in our view takes absolute precedence over any kind of political reforms is the problem of finding employment for the thousands of Africans who are now added annually to the population of the Federation.

It is estimated that the African population is growing at a rate which at the present time is close on 200,000 a year. A total net increase of this size means an annual net increase of about 50,000 African males seeking employment.

Past experience suggests that some 10,000 of this total may remain in the subsistence economy in Southern Rhodesia, although the day is not far off when according to expert opinion the Native Areas of that territory will have reached saturation point. Something may yet be done to postpone the full impact of this event by splitting up the larger European estates into smaller farms more intensively cultivated and by encouraging the establishment of rural industries in the Reserves.

So far as the two Northern Territories are concerned past experience again suggests that some 4,000 to 5,000 may be absorbed in the subsistence economy. It is possible that with the developments foreshadowed or actually in progress in the rural areas of those territories, that rate of absorption may be maintained for some years to come.

While it must be admitted that the calculations are highly speculative, it looks as if we must look to the money economy to absorb anything from 35,000 to 60,000 a year over the next decade. Reference to Table II above indicates that total African employment in the money economy rose in the four year period ending in 1958 from 923,500 to 1,058,400 or by 134,900, which is at the average annual rate of about 34,000. Making due allowance for a substantial margin of error, it looks, therefore, as if the expansion of the African population during the years in question was more or less matched by the economic expansion.

During the four-year period under review the rate of expansion of total employment for all races in the money economy was 3·8% per annum compound, whereas the rate for employment in manufacturing industry alone was 5·7%. If, therefore, we are to provide sufficient avenues of employment it appears that we must aim at achieving the expansion of manufacturing industry at a rate of 6% per annum measured in terms of employment. This rate of expansion should be sufficient so long as total employment continues to grow at a rate of 3·8-4% per annum and the subsistence economy continues to absorb the residue. But as we approach saturation point in the Native Areas of Southern Rhodesia, in, say, about five years' time, the tempo of industrial development will clearly have to be increased to something like 7% to 8% per annum.

It is not easy to estimate the additional capital which will be required to be invested in manufacturing industry year by year if the desired rate of expansion is to be attained. The amount of capital required per employee varies enormously with the type of industry. A modern fertilizer factory may require capital expenditure of the order of £50,000 per employee, whereas in the clothing industry the amount may be as low as £500. According to the statistics available it appears that for manufacturing industry taken as a whole throughout the Federation, the average amount of capital required per employee has been around £1,600. Allowing for some slight increase per head to cover rising costs it may be calculated that to achieve the required rate of expansion manufacturing industry will require a capital accretion per annum of the order of £16 m. rising to £20 m. or £25 m. over the next decade. This is a modest sum and should be obtainable, provided only that the political stability of the Federation is maintained.

African Advancement

Before we deal with the question of political stability, we should like to say a few words on what is generally referred to as African advancement.

We have already said enough to show that we are fully alive to the paramount necessity of expanding the opportunities of employment in secondary industry in order to provide a livelihood for the thousands of Africans who will year by year be unable to find employment in agriculture, mining or the subsistence economy. We are also aware that the labour force thus made available to industry will be wholly unskilled, except for the very limited number who may have had school instruction in the use of hand tools. It will, therefore, be necessary for us to continue and extend the practice of training on the shop floor, until step by step we have developed the whole apparatus of technical schools, evening classes, specialist training and so forth which is a characteristic of the modern industrial state.

We wish to put it clearly on record that as employers of labour we have no desire to do what we are often charged with attempting to do, and that is to undermine European standards both of life and of work by the exploitation of cheap black labour.

In the first place it is fallacious to assume that black labour is cheap. The African has no deep-rooted tradition of industry and, speaking generally, is incapable of sustained effort, with the result that output per man is low, and far more bodies have to be employed to secure a given output than in a corresponding factory in, say, the United Kingdom.

In the second place we should be very foolish if we brought about a diminution in the standards of life and conduct of that section of the community upon whose shoulders the main burden of past development has been borne and to whom we shall for many years yet have to look to supply the bulk of the skilled craftsmen and technicians necessary to our future expansion. Our aim must be not to depress the European but to raise the African, and in this context we welcome the initiative taken by the Southern Rhodesian Government towards the development of multi-racial Trade Unions.

On the question of wages we hold the view that wage-differentials between black and white for work of the same quality must in the long run disappear. In the meantime, while Africans are acquiring those qualities and skills to which we have already referred, it is our view both morally wrong and socially absurd to insist on payment at European levels, apart altogether from the inflationary effect of raising wages quickly to such levels without a corresponding increase in individual productivity.

Political Stability

We have referred above to the need for political stability if we are to secure and retain the capital necessary for the development of a healthy and prosperous and contented people. We are aware that "Africa is on the march" and that African nationalism is advancing under the banners of freedom and democracy. Indeed were we inclined to be complacent or ignore these manifestations, we can be sure that a number of organs of the United Kingdom Press or a posse of visiting Members of Parliament or liberal reformers of one kind or another would soon remind us of their existence. But in spite of all this, we remain obstinately convinced that political stability is not to be bought or secured by handing out concessions to a tiny but vocal minority of educated Africans in a hurry.

In particular we are convinced that there is no better passport to anarchy or dictatorship in Central Africa (as indeed has happened and is happening elsewhere in Africa) than a rapid broadening of the franchise. It is to us astonishing how persistent is the belief that the forms and practices of democracy as they exist in the United Kingdom after centuries of evolution, are articles of export. It should be borne constantly in mind that at present far more than half the total African population of the Federation still lives in the subsistence economy. You cannot expect those who live in that way or have recently emerged from that way of life into urban and industrial surroundings and wage-earning employment to understand and be able to follow the principles and practice of democracy as they are followed in the United Kingdom. To expect them to do so is as sensible as to imagine that Britain might have jumped from the tribalism of the days of Boadicea into the democracy of Elizabeth II without the hundreds of long and sometimes painful years of political experiment and development which in fact have separated the two eras.

In our view it is essential that Government should remain in the hands of civilised men and that to ensure that this is so, the qualifications for the vote—particularly the educational qualifications—should be fixed and maintained at a standard no lower than those applicable to the Federation as a whole. Moreover, the freedom of the territories to fix their own franchise qualifications combined with the vulnerability of the two Northern Territories to pressure from the United Kingdom, may easily, jeopardise any attempt to retain Government in the hands of civilised men. Indeed, in our view an attempt should be made to devise machinery for ensuring that the maximum degree of uniformity is attained in the structure of the electoral rolls for all four Parliaments.

Each of the four Governments in the Federation has control over certain aspects of economic policy and administration. General responsibility for economic development lies with the Federal Government but direct responsibility, for example, for labour supply, wages, housing, African education and vocational training, is vested in the Territorial Governments. Transport by rail and the distribution of Kariba power are matters for the Federal Government while the responsibility for urban development and the location of industry lies with the Territorial Governments. We are aware of the historical and constitutional causes of this dispersion of responsibility, but it would be difficult to devise a scheme more capable of putting obstacles in the way of a coherent and co-ordinated plan of industrial expansion of the Federation as a whole. It seems to us that it is of urgent importance to set up some inter-Governmental organisation, analogous to the Loan Council, to bring together the development plans of the four Governments, settle orders of priority, co-ordinate the parts to be played by different authorities and ensure that action is substituted for correspondence and "passing the buck". We may add that in our view nothing but good would come from associating representatives of industry and commerce with such a body.

Returning again to the theme of political stability, from which the preceding paragraph was to some extent a digression, we wish to put on record with all the emphasis at our command the view that stability is never likely to be achieved in Central Africa if one section of the population feels that at any time it can invoke the intervention of authority in London. To us it is intolerable that a sincere desire on our part to help to build a prosperous and contented multi-racial state in the land which is our home, should be so frequently denigrated in the public utterances of politicians and liberal sentimentalists in the United Kingdom. Even more intolerable is it that for lack of a sufficiently controversial domestic issue the future of our homeland in Africa and all we have done for it should be made the shuttlecock of British Party politics.

But we cannot emphasise too strongly the influence for good which private enterprise exercises, and must increasingly exercise, in securing the welfare and advancement of all the Federation's inhabitants. As a general rule the educated African puts political progress first in the mistaken belief that all other progress will flow from it, whereas it is in fact economic progress that opens the door for social and political advancement. Secession by any one territory would, we believe, tend to bring about the total collapse of the Federal structure. The consequent instability and uncertainty would unquestionably be accompanied by a collapse of confidence on the part of the overseas investor, and any hope of solving the increasingly acute employment problem which we have described above, would be lost. Even if by some miracle the political and psychological impact of secession could be reduced to negligible proportions, we believe that on purely economic grounds the individual territories would not attract investment at the rate which one might anticipate if they remained within the Federal framework. In short, the Federation can only be broken at the peril of severe economic repercussions which are bound to affect adversely the present and future well-being of all its people.

THE ASSOCIATION OF RHODESIAN AND NYASALAND INDUSTRIES—Represented by Sir Thomas Chegwiddden, Mr. Aldrige

In amplifying the memorandum, Sir Thomas Chegwiddden said that the membership of the Association was well over 500 firms, many factory and industrial, with about 80% representation in Southern Rhodesia but, not as much in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland. The Association covered the whole Federation. The associate members had no voting rights. The memorandum had been approved by the Executive Council, and Sir Thomas Chegwiddden had no doubt that although the associate members had no voting rights they would probably make their views known.

In the last sentence of the memorandum "the Federation can only be broken at the peril of severe economic repercussions," the witness thought those would be felt in Southern Rhodesia for a time; but they would not be so severe in Southern Rhodesia as in the other territories, particularly in Nyasaland. He considered that a number of firms looked for establishment here because it was a Federation, and they had a wider market. There would be a possibility that the two northern Territories might set up a customs barrier again, if instead of the Federation there was some form of economic association. It would be difficult to generalise on any repercussions because there were all sorts of curious things that Government could do which would not necessarily be covered by economic association.

Sir Thomas Chegwiddden agreed that he wished to see a franchise which would be no lower than the present Federal franchise. If there was a franchise to win the widest measure of popular support in various parts of the Federation there would be bound to be very serious repercussions on the whole Federal organisation, which would be detrimental to its future.

On the assumption that the present political stability of the Federation could not be maintained without considerable political trouble in the north, and possibly riots and disturbances, the witness thought it might be advisable to have some other form of association rather than a political one; but he did not consider it would be easy. He did not believe there was genuine widespread opposition to Federation in the northern Territories. In order to maintain the maximum amount of economic stability there would have to be arrangements for freedom of trade freedom of movement, some co-ordinating machinery which would enable conditions as far as the African was concerned to be kept in line in the three Territories, something like the East African High Commission. It would be very difficult to work out an economic association because the whole thing would tend to be coloured by racialism which would cause a break-up. He considered any organisation of an economic nature would creak and groan all the time and would not be very effective.

He did not think that the Central African Council had been made to work. One reason was that the Governors were not altogether free agents, being under instructions from London. In addition Southern Rhodesia ministers did not think much of the Council.

General responsibility for economic development lay in the Federal Government but the division of responsibility was difficult. In the Association's opinion it was of urgent importance to set up some inter-governmental organisation to bring forward development plans of the four Governments. Certain functions which affected industrial development were purely Territorial and certain others—customs, taxation, trunk roads, rail and so on, were Federal. The making of trunk roads was a Federal responsibility, the regulations which governed axle-loading of the vehicles which ran over the trunk roads were a Territorial responsibility. There were at least three different axle-loadings existing in the Federation. All that led to difficulties. There was competition between the three Territories to attract new industry and it was the feeling in Northern Rhodesia certainly that Federation was the cow which was fed in Lusaka and milked in Salisbury. They considered they were supplying all the financial sinews for the Federation, but were not getting more secondary industries, simply because Southern Rhodesia, being so close to the Federal Government, took all the opportunities for their development. The ideal was to have some liaison such as an Economic Advisory Council, although the Governments might have to deal with it in the end. The recommendation was that there should be greater co-operation among the Governments, and not only a transfer of powers.

Sir Thomas said that democracy as it existed in the United Kingdom was not an article for export. The witness wondered how many people who mentioned "one man, one vote" realised that 1832 was the date of the Reform Act, before which the number of voters was but 1 in 24. It was many years after that Act was passed, in fact, the early '20's before there was anything even approaching general democracy. It does not work amongst people who do not understand what the vote is about as has been demonstrated in other African territories. It would be impossible to set a programme for the adoption of British democracy, for it depended on education and the development of the democratic tradition. In referring to the practices of democracy, the witness said there was so much that could not be found in the rules and which took time to build up.

Sir Thomas Chegwiddden said that there was practically no system of apprenticeship for Africans, although there were the beginnings of it in the mines. The system had to be geared to the educational system because it was a waste of time without an educational basis for the apprentices. One of the obstacles to the implementation of a system was represented by the people who would be the Labour Party's supporters if they were in England, in other words, the European artisan, not the employers of labour.

Memorandum

THE SALISBURY BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL WOMEN'S CLUB—D. P. Cooper, M. Bratley and E. Wilkin—Members; E. McQuade and J. R. Innes—Secretaries.

(The Club is affiliated to the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs of Rhodesia and Nyasaland).

Aims and Objects of the Organisation

1. To awaken and encourage in business and professional women a realisation of their responsibilities in their own country and consequently in world affairs.
2. To promote the interests of business and professional women and to secure combined action by them.
3. To facilitate effective co-operation between business and professional women throughout the world.
4. To extend the facilities for education and training of business and professional women.

5. To work for high business and professional standards.
6. To work for the removal of legal, economic and social disabilities of women.
7. To make available and to ensure the use of the specialised knowledge of business and professional women in public affairs and in policy-making positions.

Introduction

1. The Salisbury Business and Professional Women's Club is concerned primarily with the status of women in employment, their working conditions, their training and education, and their general well-being. It adheres to the principle of equal pay for equal work on a non-racial basis and without discrimination on the grounds of sex—all things being equal, i.e. qualifications, integrity, responsibility, and the ability to conform with the standards demanded by professional and business ethics. (See attached memorandum on women in employment in the Federation). It is non-partisan.

2. It has therefore approached the problem of amendment or re-arrangement of the Constitution of Rhodesia and Nyasaland with these principles in mind. As an Association, it has always taken an active part in national affairs, and has afforded a public platform on such vital matters as the Federal Referendum (1953), the Urban African Affairs Commission, the Tredgold Commission on the Franchise, the Commission of Enquiry into the Legal Disabilities as between Men and Women, etc.

3. The Salisbury Business and Professional Women's Club wishes to record its concern at the approach to our problems by many overseas critics, whose whole attitude is based on racial issues and not on practical facts of general progress, and are aware that if the peoples were all of one colour or race this country would have had independence within the Commonwealth some time ago. It therefore deplores this racialism which continually condemns the Europeans who bear the burden of responsibility and which expresses the opinion that they are not to be entrusted with the responsibility of attaining independence and assisting with the management of a Dominion on behalf of all the inhabitants. It feels that to delay the attainment of complete independence until the more backward peoples have caught up with the more advanced sections may so undermine responsible Europeans' confidence in the Federation's future that they will gradually withdraw their capital and their great stabilising influence in this primitive country. Further, in considering the future of the Federation, it is felt that no single Territory should, by its backwardness, hold back the economic and political development and status of the whole; e.g. a family does not restrict its growth to that of one of its infants, nor does a business hold back the progress of the whole because one of the departments does not pay.

4. Are the "aspirations" for incomprehensible goals of the vast majority of the inhabitants, whose chief characteristics are a childlike lack of inhibition, indolence, cheerful disregard for integrity in the best sense and a gullible excitability which changes with every irrational appeal to their immature emotions, more important than the firm, steady and courageous purpose of those experienced in constitutional Government? The indulgence of violent political whims of people who do not understand elementary principles of democracy, let alone of federation, nor the purpose of a commission, and whose tribal life has been so disrupted that they are undergoing a turbulent revolution, not altogether appreciated by the academic theorists, can only lead to political hooliganism and eventual tyranny.

5. There is no doubt that the sentimental "multi-racial" approach of certain extremists is more racial than the most ardent segregationist.

6. This Club therefore urges the Commission to regard the problem on a non-racial basis, in the knowledge that in the fullness of time the differences will right themselves—only with harmony if there is no interference from outside, and to recommend the full independence of the Federation in 1963 in the faith that those who at present lead the Communities will fulfill their responsibilities with integrity and justice. Such independence would do more to restore a waning confidence among all sections and would unite the peoples in a single purpose. The longer this delay, the more reluctant will investors be to place long-term investment, and the present Europeans will hesitate to consolidate what has become a precarious position. (Demagogic agitators).

7. The Club will confine itself to the status of Southern Rhodesia, in relation to the Federal Constitution and on general issues within that Constitution since it is not competent, except through the opinion of its members who have visited the Northern Territories, to deal with matters concerning the Northern Territories. It will also endeavour to indicate some measure of wider public opinion.

Race Relations

8. With regard to race relations within these Territories, it has been observed that Northern Rhodesia appears to have more racial tension than Southern Rhodesia. This is understandable because security is handicapped by the presence of large groups of temporarily resident European Miners and Civil Servants whose loyalty cannot be really deep, and large mine compounds where political agitators can enjoy their loquacious idleness in stirring up trouble.

9. Observers state that in that Territory there are four main trends, viz., a Liberal Group embarrassingly desirous of racial integration, an opposite (European) group (found in Lusaka and the Copperbelt) anti racial integration but not against advancement, a violently nationalistic African movement, and a comparatively small moderate body of opinion trying hard to keep a level head in an uneasy situation. The one unifying factor seems to be a dislike of Southern Rhodesia, based no doubt on envy of this Colony which played the decisive part in the establishment of the Federation. It was a pity that the electorate of Northern Rhodesia was not allowed a Referendum in 1953. There are other important differences in Northern Rhodesia, fear being one of the strongest and the political advancement of Africans is too rapid.

10. The Nyasaland position is well-known. In Southern Rhodesia race relations are not now as sound or objective as they have been during the Colony's development. In fact, since the rebellions which occurred in the early days of its history there is no doubt that there has been more emotionalism, distrust, fear and loss of mutual respect among the races in the last four years than at any other time. This state of affairs is to be deplored because Southern Rhodesia has always followed a reasonable policy of progress—(common roll, Industrial Conciliation, reasonable advancement of Africans, etc.). There is no doubt that racial stability in Southern Rhodesia has been upset by overseas pressures especially by irresponsible visitors, certain press attacks, no less than by the forces behind African Nationalist movements which are generally believed to be spearheads of Communist infiltration—which has always followed in the wake of the triumph of modern National movements. In our midst are many Europeans who wish to push integration on an unwilling and unready population. There are Africans who would follow these, but these do not appear to be numerous as the bulk of African opinion still prefers its own way of life. Moderate opinion is stronger in Southern Rhodesia than in the other Territories but there are certain extremists who wish to see complete segregation.

11. At some time the extremes of opinion may meet in a common purpose, viz., self-preservation, the saving of the interests of the European minority. Much will depend on the outcome of the recommendations of this Commission, and the importance of its impact on the people, but more especially on the Europeans, cannot be over-stressed.

12. It is the wish of this Club to see that moderate forces, which will not press for progress beyond the economic capacity of the Colony nor beyond the readiness of its people to co-operate more closely in the future, are strengthened and maintained.

13. It realises that possibly more attention will be paid to African opinion than to European opinion, but it hopes that an unbiased view will be taken of responsible European associations who have the general well-being at heart.

The Federal Concept of Government

14. Assuming that of all systems of Government the Federal form is best suited to territories of widely differing conditions, the present Federation is considered in this context. There is opinion that to federate the three Territories in 1953 was premature, particularly for Nyasaland, and it has become obvious to some that a step by step policy, starting with the amalgamation of Northern and Southern Rhodesia, followed by a transfer of Protectorate Status of Barotseland and Nyasaland to a central Federal Government when the confidence of these protectorates had been gained, would have been the wisest course. However, another Commission advised differently. It is difficult to see what alternative forms of Government are preferable to the Federal form. There is no doubt that people are seeking a more flexible formula than the present one.

15. There has been confusion as to what a Federal form of Government really is and this is due to certain lack of co-operation between the Territorial Governments and the Federal Government. Anomalies in administration have also arisen causing irritation, especially where Southern Rhodesia Government Departments such as Irrigation, Roads, etc., are concerned (quote examples). In Southern Rhodesia lack of appreciation of the hard-won Responsible Government, especially by newcomers and Salisbury citizens, indicates that Federal and Unitary systems are not understood. But at the time of the Referendum on Federation it was made clear that the Territories were to enjoy the right to develop along individual lines, and that there would be no rigid pattern of forcing the attitudes or policies of one Territory on another.

16. During this time the political leaders were at pains to reassure the people of Southern Rhodesia that they would lose nothing except certain administrative rights, which was small sacrifice for the good of the whole. But a popular move was made on economic grounds to deprive Southern Rhodesia of her Governor whose constitutional position was confused with that of the

To be used in oral evidence.*

Governor-General, and it was proposed to fuse the two posts. Little regard was paid to the essential relationship between Her Majesty's Representative in Southern Rhodesia and the Africans of that Territory.

17. Some observers feel that the present Federal Government machinery is too rigid, and that many mistakes have been made in trying to level the Territories into one mould in order to achieve administrative smoothness, e.g. the Federal Ministry for Education strove to bring Northern and Southern Rhodesian Education into line by depriving the North of free milk and bus schemes, and did not want Southern Rhodesian Nursery Schools because there were no subsidised ones in the North.

These factors have caused much friction and open ill-feeling towards the Federal Government.

18. In matters of Public Health, there have been examples of Federal interference in the work undertaken by a Territory long before Federation (e.g. bilharzia control in Southern Rhodesia). Doubtless this Commission will discover many such examples in the Report of the Civil Servants' Advisory Committee.

19. There may be some good reason, therefore, for a re-allocation of *powers between the Federal and Territorial Governments in the two Ministries of Education and Health, both of which affect the day to day life, not only of Africans, but of everyone. Social Welfare is bound up with these and should remain Territorial. (See lists of suggested transfers from Federal to Territorial Lists, Appendix II).

20. And examination of other Federal Constitutions suggests that the Commonwealth Pattern which leans more towards a Unitary form than that of the United States, may not be the ideal one for this part of Africa. The United States does give greater autonomy to its States than do most Commonwealth countries. There is no doubt that in Southern Rhodesia, which is politically more mature than its associated Territories, there is a growing attitude that its independence must mean more than just towing the line of the Federal Government; that it is entitled to its own pattern of life, and its own institutions; that it should be ready in the event of the Federation not succeeding to be able to carry on as a Sovereign State. Therefore it seems competent to suggest that your Commission be asked to give this aspiration serious consideration, and that Southern Rhodesia's powers be strengthened and not weakened.

Rights of Minorities

21. One very important factor has emerged since the establishment of the Federation, viz., the need to recognise the rights of minorities and to safeguard these in any amended Constitution.

22. A new Federal Constitution could well consider a dual House (Upper and Lower House system), in one or other the Europeans and other non-Africans should have safeguards against any Africanisation of the Federal Government and administration of the Dual House, with an Upper House which could have the right of veto or restraint on discriminatory legislation. Such a device could replace the African Affairs Board. But such a device needs close examination.

23. The time, thought, finance and effort put into the organisation of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland is greatly appreciated. It is disquieting, therefore, that the weakness of the Preamble, which implies either a long delay to await the pleasure of a decision by "all the inhabitants" as to their ultimate destiny, or a too hasty conferring of franchise powers on these inhabitants, is being used by the United Kingdom to create further doubts as to the integrity and ability of the Federal and Territorial Governments to make wise decisions.

24. The financial obligations of each Territory, which has benefited from the economic alliance, and investment of taxpayers' money, especially in Nyasaland, should be considered with a view to the refund of that portion of Federal funds which has been taken from general revenue for administration in the Territory concerned. The Federal Government's Contribution to Achieve the Objects of the Preamble

25. Economic and Financial benefits of pooled resources have been published from time to time. Northern Rhodesia suffers a grievance that she gets less than she deserves or has earned; Southern Rhodesia feels that she could do with more, and Nyasaland does not appreciate that of the three, she has gained far more than any Colonial Office Government has given in the past.

26. A popular slogan at the time of the Referendum was "Vote Federal and keep down the cost of living". The cost of living index has risen to an alarming degree since Federation. Even the Federal Government has noted this. But whether this rise can be attributed to Federation, or whether it would have risen despite it is a debatable point. The fact remains that from the economic point of view Federation has offered security.

The Federal Government's administration has:—

(a) Advancement (Political)

By introducing a common qualitative Federal Franchise to all inhabitants whether citizens or British Protected Persons; by permitting the entry of all races into the Federal Public Service; by promoting instruction on the benefits of Federation to ignorant masses; by its general endeavour to encourage non-Europeans to participate in Party Politics, and to encourage all races to become responsible citizens that Federal Government has done much for general advancement. It is limited to non-African activities. African affairs should be left to the territories as at present.

* Administrative functions.

(b) Security

The Federal Defence Force did excellent work during the recent emergency. All races enjoyed this protection and participated in defence. There is no doubt that all three Federal Territories have enjoyed better security than previously. The pooled resources of manpower are helping to build up a common loyalty. The establishment of a mobile separate Federal Police Force as envisaged in the Constitution would add to internal security.

The greatest forces against this are the political agitators who should be dealt with far more severely than they have been. The African best understands hard justice—rule by example rather than by pious precept, and it should be remembered that respect for authority is still bound up with the concept of the Big Chief.

(c) Welfare

In those Government Departments entrusted to it, namely Posts and Telegraphs, Health, Higher Education, the Federal Ministry has shown a sense of responsibility and in spite of mistakes has done much for the welfare of its inhabitants and has deprived racial groups of special amenities on the Railways and in the Post Offices by removing discriminatory practices.

(d) "Co-operation and Partnership"

This phrase would be improved, in the eyes of some, without "partnership". However, basing the practice of partnership on the definition accepted during the first Federal General Election (quoted above) the Federal Government has promoted the advancement of all races in its employ.

One of the weaknesses in the Preamble is the suggestion that full independence should rest with the desires of all the inhabitants. To responsible people the phrase would have been better appreciated had it read: "with the decision of a responsible electorate answerable to the inhabitants". The majority of Africans cannot understand the meaning of local Government, let alone a Federation, and to expect the destinies of this great country to rest with millions of tribal, ignorant and gullible primitive persons is as shortsighted as it is absurd. The principle of a qualitative franchise is essential to the proper management of Central Africa, and a liberalisation of the franchise would undo much material progress. Very few non-Africans have confidence in African Governments—there has been little time to test existing "liberated countries" but there is a certain cynicism in the assumption that it will be a case of the survival of the fittest and a return to the rule of the Big Chiefs, particularly if European control ceases to be effective. Even responsible Africans share this view.

(e) Federal Franchise†

The Federal Franchise has a dual role and was so devised to embrace the different franchise systems of the three Territories. It tries to keep Government in responsible hands by a qualitative franchise. The conduct of the Southern Rhodesian African Members of Parliament in the Federal House indicates the political maturity of this Territory in which these men were elected by all the voters so that they feel responsible to all and not merely to Africans. Southern Rhodesia can well be proud of their African Federal Members of Parliament. There is no doubt that the Franchise system in Southern Rhodesia has greatly influenced the Federal pattern.

Application of the Principles Embodied in the Preamble to the Constitution, with Particular Reference to Southern Rhodesia

27. The comments concerning race relations in the Introduction are indirectly relevant to this part of the preamble "... a Federation ... Commonwealth".

28. When one considers the overall picture since the Federal Referendum, certain conclusions may be drawn. A brief resume of the trends since April, 1953, give some clues to the present situation.

29. It will be recalled that the 1953 Referendum was fought on the White Paper which set out the practical, economic, and political advantages of Federation. Much emphasis was laid on security, economic advantages, etc., it took the leaders, Sir Godfrey Huggins, Sir Roy Welensky, Mr. J. M. Greenfield and the U.C.A.A. team through a hard and contentious campaign, in which two main issues of doubt and dissent arose, one was the possible effect of such a Federation on Southern Rhodesian Race relations by the inclusion of Nyasaland, and the other was that the electorate was not allowed to vote upon the actual Federal Draft Constitution. When the latter was available in August of that year, followed by the first Federal Election, much opposition was made to the Preamble and the inclusion of the word "Partnership" (a much abused word of many interpretations). The electorate was finally convinced that this meant what Sir Godfrey and the other leaders were at pains to assure them, viz., a sharing in the responsibilities and benefits of Federation by all the peoples according to their capabilities and contribution. Great pains were taken to reassure the Europeans that this did not mean social integration, and on two occasions both Sir Godfrey and Sir Roy (election speeches October and November, 1953) respectively made categorical statements to this effect.

30. These points are made because the question of social integration, more especially residential association of the races is still the burning one in Southern Rhodesia. Many Europeans are fundamentally tolerant about the other races until what has been termed "racial privacy" is threatened. Whenever it is suggested that European residential areas might include an African, or, if Asians move in, there is an immediate reaction by local authorities and European residents. This is no doubt due to a concept that admission might be "all or nothing" and that one must include the masses in the concept of partnership.

31. One member of this Club who is a member of a local Town Management Board can substantiate this. Generally speaking regulations governing such matters as separate toilets for the races, and other amenities are favoured by local authorities on grounds of hygiene, and in the case of Asians, religion.

32. Many Southern Rhodesians favour the economic and political advancement of Africans as long as this does not mean enforced racial integration. There are African doctors, barristers, lawyers, nurses, and other professional people who have become accepted and respected. There never has been a bar to African promotion.

33. The Southern Rhodesian Government has sincerely tried to foster the political advancement, the welfare and security of its peoples, and also their co-operation and partnership in the accepted sense (not meaning social integration). By the following Acts the Africans have been able to enjoy more European amenities (not always to their benefit) Amendment to Liquor Acts (1957) (a dubious concession to "civilised" standards with a consequent alarming change in African communal drinking habits), Amendment to the State Lotteries Act (1959), Amendment to the Land Apportionment Act (1959), to enable an African barrister and professional men to practice in an European area; and to enable hotels to be multi-racial. There is growing opinion that this Act could provide an outlet for those who genuinely subscribe to that concept of partnership currently popular among the demagogues, viz., "racial equality and integration", by the provision of multi-racial areas where such development could take place without offence to those who do not desire it, and where it could evolve on a basis of honest and sincere co-operation instead of the specious relationship it has become.

34. Further testimony is in The Native Councils Act (to encourage self-government among Africans), the new Industrial Conciliation Act, and the Apprenticeship Act both legislate for non-racial participation. All these measures have been designed to bring all races economically into line. It is hoped that European standards will not be lowered. This Club has watched with growing concern the exploitation of cheap and inefficient African labour in competition with European clerks in commerce. Nothing has done so much to impair race relations as this threat to standards and economic security. The Southern Rhodesia Government has embarked on extensive housing schemes for Africans. Home-ownership and freehold tenure being most important.

35. Recent concessions to the Africans, particularly in public buildings, etc., have caused uneasiness and a sense of insecurity among Europeans, who feel a certain cynicism about a future based on a policy of appeasement which does not demand reciprocal standards of responsibility, hygiene, etc., from the appeased. It is felt there is a tendency to press the multi-racial idea to the utmost, and to attempt to enforce it in quarters where it is not wanted or needed, on the alleged ground that political and economic rights confer a natural right to immediate social integration. This idea has been encouraged by certain interests outside the Federation which seem more concerned to embarrass the European than to promote racial harmony.

36. It should be possible for all racial groups to make their contribution to the common good without losing their identity, but they can only do this if they are allowed to retain islands of racial privacy alongside the necessarily increasing number of *multiracial institutions.

37. Some observers feel that Europeans, who had been becoming more tolerant, are now showing a strong reaction against liberal moves. If this observation is correct, there is a need for early action to allay fear and reduce tension. Much is being said about the need to gain the confidence and goodwill of the African, but in achieving this it is surely necessary to retain the confidence and goodwill of the European.

38. The recent trouble in Nyasaland, and, despite the present state of emergency in S. Rhodesia has demonstrated that the most stable part of the Federation is still Southern Rhodesia, which has had no anti-European acts and has experienced more intimidation of Africans by Africans than is publicly known. This comparative stability is attributed to the fundamental difference between the Southern Rhodesian Government, a responsible one, in which all people, regardless of race, can, if suitably qualified, play their part, and the Northern Territories handicapped by Colonial Office rule. (See Appendix IV of S. R. Legislation).

N.B.—"Land Apportionment Act is a basic feature of S. Rhodesian land policy and has been described as the foundation of its native policy. While this is true to a large extent today it must be remembered that the Act is only an instrument of policy and not a final objective. In moving the second reading of the Land Apportionment Bill, 1941, the Prime Minister and Minister of Native Affairs said: "Those who regard this as a permanent solution of some of our difficulties, in other words the ultimate aim, will be making up their minds on evidence which is obviously quite incomplete. The Bill in front of the House is merely a step on the road and required for a period of time which as yet cannot be estimated".

Southern Rhodesia's Constitutional Position and Legislature

39. In view of the increase in population and the advent of Africans more fully into political life, any suggestion that the size of the Southern Rhodesian House of Assembly be reduced should be countered by provision for an enlarged House to which Members are elected on a Common but qualitative franchise, so that only those having a high degree of responsibility and civilisation may govern the country.

Franchise

40. This Club assisted with a joint memorandum to the Tredgold Commission of Enquiry into the Franchise, 1957, with the Salisbury Women's Institute and the Salisbury Branch National Council of Women (S.R.). It was gratifying to note that certain of its ideas were accepted in principle by the Tredgold Commission. We were concerned that the Government of S. Rhodesia should remain in the hands of "responsible and civilised persons" and pleaded for the inclusion of those people, e.g. Missionaries, while having high educational but low financial qualifications, should have the vote. If we may judge from what is happening elsewhere in Africa, the Southern Rhodesian Franchise, while not perfect, is a reasonable attempt to do just this. No person of any race is debarred from franchise, provided he or she can show the degree of responsibility expected from them. It provides for the inclusion of many persons of all races in the Special category. If the franchise is made too liberal that sense of responsibility would diminish and the whole political future would be jeopardised.

41. The Common Roll system does help to promote unity and loyalty. The development of the Party system has been possible in Southern Rhodesia because it has never had political representation on a racial basis. With the development of Africans, and their movement into areas which could form constituencies largely African, there is little reason why non-European candidates should not be elected to the S. Rhodesian House.

42. While the recommendations of the Tredgold Commission were not all adopted, its terms of reference are worth quoting:—

"By our terms of Reference we are enjoined to consider 'a system for the just representation of the people of the Colony in its Legislature under which the Government is placed, and remains in the hands of civilised and responsible persons'. We feel that we should emphasize, at the outset, that, in our view, the first requirement is more fundamental and more important even than the second. No system that leaves any substantial section of the people labouring under a justifiable grievance can, in the end, prevail. It must result in a sense of cleavage, which means that consent of the governed, upon which all government must ultimately rest, is withheld. Unless the principle is accepted that all sections of a people have their highest interests in common, that people will perish. A house that is divided against itself cannot stand".

43. The time may come when an African majority could be in Southern Rhodesia, and the protection of the minorities, in respect of land tenure under Land Apportionment and Town and Country Planning Acts (S.R.G.), schools and separate institutions, where so desired, should be entrenched into the Southern Rhodesian and Federal Constitutions.

44. It is respectfully suggested that comparisons with Kenya and South Africa should not be made with Southern Rhodesia, a country whose policies have been a good compromise between certain types of Colonial Office rule, by trial and error, and the extremes of South African Nationalism. A certain degree of residential and other forms of race segregation has been found necessary for the general well being and has proved successful in what has come to be regarded as the most politically stable territory in Africa.

45. The Land Apportionment Act is a basic feature of Southern Rhodesian land policy and has been described as the foundation of its native policy. Whilst this is true to a large extent today it must be remembered that the Act is only an instrument of policy and not a final objective. In moving the second reading of the Land Apportionment Bill, 1941, the Prime Minister and Minister of Native Affairs said: "Those who regard this as a permanent solution of some of our difficulties, in other words the ultimate aim, will be making up their minds on evidence which is obviously quite incomplete . . . The Bill in front of the House is merely a step on the road and required for a period of time which as yet cannot be estimated".

"In Southern Rhodesia the Land Apportionment Act has brought about a clear-cut division of land between the two races, and each has security of tenure in its own area. In Nyasaland there is no such division and Europeans and Africans may acquire land on the same terms in the same areas, though the Order-in-Council envisages that African interests shall be paramount in African Trust Land. In Northern Rhodesia Crown Land is primarily set aside for non-native settlement; and the reserves are, save in special circumstances, set aside for the exclusive use of Africans. The remaining 60 per cent of the whole land area is Native Trust Land, where permits of occupancy may be granted to non-natives, providing this is in the interests of the community as a whole, on conditions identical with those applying to Africans, should Africans desire a form of tenure other than traditional.

"The greater proportion of land reserved for European occupation in Southern Rhodesia compared to the other two territories should be considered in the light of the declared aim of the Colony to develop European settlement in the years to come to an extent far beyond the present". (Quoted from Comparative Survey of Native Policy in S.R., N.R. and Nyasaland (1951), page 15, paras. 45 and 46).

46. Southern Rhodesia should be allowed to control its own affairs, free from outside pressure, or by interference from the Federal Government in its domestic affairs in the knowledge that in the right time, reforms will be made. Any attempt to make it "go like Kenya" will surely cause a reaction in favour of "going like the South". The reaction has begun. If we were to lose the best of the Europeans, the loss would be greater for the Africans who remain. There is good reason to believe that responsible African opinion understands this. We have enjoyed mutual trust and good faith between the races and this will continue if we are not interfered with.

47. Racial co-operation has been S. Rhodesian policy, and a tribute to the patience of the average Rhodesian whose daily contacts with domestic and other employees must have had some good influence even if only to raise standards of hygiene, and an understanding of our complex monetary system cannot be ignored.

48. It would not be too much to plead for patience from those who would open up all doors to all races against the sincere wish of all to do so. It is hoped that the Commissioners will appreciate and understand the misgivings of the Europeans who in the main, have done well for their fellow men, and whose contributions in money, administrative ability, and integrity to Southern Rhodesia's steady progress have created stability. The fact that Africans from neighbouring territories flock in for work, yet criticise conditions is no argument for lessening control of the entry of these people.

49. All attempts to use grievances about Pass laws etc., for political ends overlook the fact that Africans are not yet compelled to register births, nor to take on surnames.

The matter of African registration of births and deaths is dealt with more fully: (See Appendix 1).

50. A further comment on the preamble refers to independence being "subject to the desire of all the inhabitants". Demagogic Democracy—the rule by the masses is not suitable for Africans. Our example might well be followed. Remarks in the introduction are relevant to this. Only a responsible electorate should make this decision. A prolonged delay in achieving independence affords time to those who believe that by violence and non-co-operation they will get their own way. A state of fearful anticipation and political unrest is bound to result from a prolonged waiting period.

The argument that there will be violence if independence is granted soon can be invalidated by the fact that defence and loyalty can be more easily rallied in a short period when swift action can settle the matter; better a brisk battle than a prolonged campaign in which the present forces of loyalty may be easily dissipated by uncertainty and economic insecurity. The campaign to convince the Nyasaland Africans of the benefits of Federation had not been altogether successful due to a late start and lacking internal co-operation. Perhaps a more salutary—almost disciplinary attitude in the spirit with which the Governor of Nyasaland and the Southern Rhodesian Government met the recent crisis would be more effective than yielding to the emotional cries of ambitious, immature politicians.

51. The above remarks indicate that the full co-operation of the peoples in the present sense of the word "partnership" has not been wholly successful. The people of S. Rhodesia dislike the method with which the Northern Rhodesians have tried to enforce "partnership"—by setting up Committees to report on discrimination against races. The fear of being like the "Black North" was a very real one in 1953. The control of the big financial interests and their influence on the Federal Government's attitude towards African advancement as evidenced in the Railways dispute have not contributed to S. Rhodesia's sense of political security.

52. The "interference" by the Federal Government in S. Rhodesia's anti-bilharzia campaign was resented, and there are examples in the Public Service where inter territorial bickering persists and many curious anomalies have arisen in administration which indicate that certain responsibilities should return to the territorial Governments and to S. Rhodesia in particular.

53. The main task of the S. Rhodesian Government has been to provide home ownership schemes for Africans, and to stimulate the growth of a settled African middle class which can gradually learn civic and other responsibilities and so take part in local and national Government.

54. Southern Rhodesians have every reason to be proud of what has been done to implement the objects in the Preamble, but they have been doing such things before Federation. They have learned to recognise and accept the fact that Africans are Africans and will not change their inherent characteristics in one generation. The emergent African has begun to make his mark. It is essential to restore the confidence of the non African groups in the Africans of S. Rhodesia and to re-establish good faith between the races. This will best be achieved by leaving these people to discover their own way of re-adjustment, without misguided impositions from outside. There is more possibility of S. Rhodesians becoming as one nation than any of the other territories because so far the peoples have travelled together, if not in the same coach, then in the same convoy.

55. Of all Government Departments that of African Education in S. Rhodesia—still largely subsidised by European taxpayers, deserves high praise. African schools are as jealous of their identity as are the European and school integration is not a popular suggestion among African teachers.

Laws, Customs etc., which favour Africans only

56. There are certain laws, customs and practices which are enjoyed by Africans only:—

1. Africans may marry according to native or civil law.
2. They may seek divorce either by native or statutory law, depending under which system a marriage was contracted.
3. Registration of African births and deaths is not compulsory (other races are penalised for failure to act). The unpopular registration certificate is rightly regarded as a substitute for a birth certificate.
4. Africans may continue polygamy, with the emphasis on the saleable value of women who through lobola enhance their fathers wealth.
5. Africans in rural areas are exempt from cycle tax.
6. The use of African surnames is not compulsory so that they can assume aliases with ease.
7. Because of low economic standards Africans are subsidised in housing, transport, and in the case of Africans in most urban townships, free or very cheap meals for their children.
8. Free Health services.
9. Apart from £2 per annum poll tax in S. Rhodesia little income tax is collected from Africans who can plead large family exemptions, and who do not seem to be penalised for keeping inaccurate or no records at all in business transactions. This inability to transact business on efficient lines is an understandable weakness in people so near to a "bartering" economic system.
10. Protection of land tenure under Land Apportionment.

It is not suggested that all these are given up; but as Africans emerge they should try to conform to the accepted legal practices.

Numerical Comparisons as between races in S. Rhodesia with particular reference to Salisbury and District

	Male	Female	Total
Africans	130,000	50,000	180,000
Europeans	44,000	40,000	84,000

(School children included in Totals above)

School Children:

Africans (Children under 15 years) ...	Total	50,000
Europeans:	Total	29,465
(Day Scholars 23,465
Boarders ... 6,000)

57. The numerical ratio of the races is largely responsible for European fears of being "swamped" by Africans should their institutions be open to all races. It should be understood that of all three territories there are a larger number of Africans at school in Southern Rhodesia who can progress in industry and earn high enough wages in the next few years to enable them to patronise cafes, cinemas, in large enough numbers to oust other groups.

Home Ownership for Africans in Southern Rhodesia, and an African Middle Class

58. One of the achievements of the S. Rhodesia Government has been the provision of Home ownership schemes on leasehold and freehold tenure for an emergent African middle class, which can assume civic and legislative responsibilities in time.

59. Mr. Jasper Savanhu, M.P. Parliamentary Secretary for Race Affairs Federal writes in Rhodesia and East Africa (1958) in an article entitled "An African Middle Class". To illustrate this:—

"What we want in the Federation" writes Mr. Savanhu, "is not an artificially propped up select African middle class. It must have its roots firmly embedded in the soil of African society, with its superstructure exposed to refreshing winds and nourishment of Western culture, thus blending into an harmonious whole the best in African and European culture".

60. Mr. Savanhu discusses the difference between "the concept of African social evolution in French, Belgium and Portuguese dependencies, which is a highly artificial pattern imposed on Africans". A pattern of which he disapproved because the "assimilado" . . . has become a black European, and is expected to throw in his lot with white Europeans . . ."

61. After some discussion on the way to achieve this African middle class, viz, by education especially of African women, higher wages, home ownership on a free-hold basis, Mr. Savanhu says:—

"Fairly and squarely the achievement (of this middle class) must be borne on the shoulders of the European in the Federation. Before he (the European) is half way through his task the emancipated middle class African earning the same wages as the European will have joined forces with him to bring along the mass of the African people. They may or may not mix socially, but politically and economically the two races will have been integrated. Racial politics will have been a thing of the past. European and African culture will have been blended in their best forms to merge into an harmonious whole, peculiar to the conditions of the country".

62. May one suggest that the educated African should assist now in the establishment of this middle class and not leave it all to the Europeans? The conditions "peculiar to this country" may be likened to a picture in mosaic in which each piece has its shape and colour and place.

African Housing

63. S.R. Government expenditure: Approx. £4 million (1961). Number of home-owned houses in the four territories: 6,000. Municipal expenditure on African housing through Govt. loans considerably more over the years.

The Federal Legislature

64. The Federal Legislature as it is presently composed contains some anomalies. For example the Northern Territories still have certain nominated representatives for African interests. It has an African Affairs Board which could be replaced by an Upper House. It would be preferable if the African members from the Northern Territories were responsible to the whole electorate as they are in the politically more mature South.

The Constitution provides adequate machinery for amendment and adjustment.

The List of Powers (See Appendix II)

65. Certain suggestions have been made that the Federal Ministries of Health return to territorial control and in the case of Southern Rhodesia European and non-African Education, should return to that Territory.

66. There is real antipathy to possible racial integration in schools, and strong resistance can be expected from all races if this were forced. There are many good reasons for keeping European schools separate. There is no reason why races should not meet in inter school debates, and certain forms of sport. But somewhere in the Constitution it should be laid down that no racial integration of European and non African schools should take place without first holding a referendum among the racial group concerned. If such integration in schools were contemplated, it is suggested that they be built in multi-racial zones when no one need be offended.

67. Health, Welfare and Education should enjoy closer territorial ties and powers than at present. One of the weaknesses of the Federal administration has been this division. Conditions vary in the territories and Southern Rhodesians in particular are apprehensive about probable future Africanisation of the Federal House.

68. Certain opinion feels that National Parks in Southern Rhodesia should become Territorial, and that all Land Administration should be Territorial.

69. It is desirable that powers such as are now enjoyed by the Responsible Government of Southern Rhodesia should be transferred as soon as possible from the United Kingdom to the Governments of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, so that their Civil Services can be responsible to the Territorial Governments and not to the Colonial Office. The influence of District Commissioners who know that they can leave the territory cannot be in the best interests of the people. Long distance administration has proved the weakness of the United Kingdom administration in other parts.

70. The relationship of the Protectorates to the Federal Government may have to be revised. The question arises would that part of Northern Rhodesia largely inhabited by Europeans be better constituted as the self-governing territory within the Federation, and Barotseland become a Protectorate of the Federal Government? Should Nyasaland continue to be a Protectorate until the full transference of powers, and then be allowed to seek membership of the Federation? Or, should this territory face the prospect of having to assume responsible Government within the Federation?

71. Much will depend on the handling of the political situation in the next two years. Southern Rhodesians have their reservations about Nyasaland. This Club, for example, in examining the flow of migrant labour from outside Southern Rhodesia at the time of the Piewman Commission on Urban African Affairs (1957), felt that inter territorial control should restrict Nyasaland labour on a quota system if it ousted local African labour from industry. It suggested that this control also be enforced on medical examination of migrants.

72. There is also the opinion that British Protected Persons should not be allowed to vote in Southern Rhodesian Federal Elections, but should have a postal vote to elect their Members in the countries of their origin. The infiltration of Northern Rhodesian and Nyasaland natives has not been devoid of problems, not the least being political agitators. This is a matter in which the necessary protection should be given to Federal Citizens in Southern Rhodesia. There is no question of disenfranchisement, but a control in Federal Elections. If the privilege presently enjoyed by British Protected Persons of voting in the election of S.R. Africans to the Federal House persists, then it would be possible for a Nyasaland African to be nominated as a Southern Rhodesian candidate and a Nyasaland Government may introduce universal adult suffrage on a territorial level which could have serious repercussions on the Federation. It could act as a pressure group to introduce one man one vote throughout the Federation. This would be unwise for a considerable time.

73. This Club is not competent to go into administrative details, but asks that these points be considered when administrative powers, and the matter of Franchise are considered by your Commission.

74. Franchise is a key to political stability in Africa, and this Club had studied its implications. That "the Government must be retained in the hands of responsible and civilised people" is no idle cliché. The rights of non-African minorities are bound up with Franchise. Some system, based perhaps on the Electoral College system, might be evolved—if universal suffrage were ever to be introduced. Safeguards for the minorities and their representation should be envisaged and cannot be over-emphasised.

75. Common loyalty to the Federation can be attained, not necessarily through trying to make one integrated nation one of many people, but by enlisting their loyalty through their group affiliations. The spontaneous growth of nationalist or tribal loyalties arises when these affiliations are threatened, but when these elements are used to constructive purpose, loyalty to the whole can be achieved. Some opinion, based on work among the different racial groups, has found that the non-Europeans prefer to run their own group activities, and while they appreciate

European help which works with them, they do not like being under an obligation to the Europeans, many of whom, unfortunately, leave an impression of patronage in their wake. This Club is affiliated to the International Federation of Business and Professional Women, and at its international conference peoples from all nations, and races, represent their own countries. They discuss mutual problems and form fast friendships.

76. They have mutual respect for one another's differences, and interest in customs etc. No one ever expects them to become moulded into the same pattern. They are bound to a common cause, and are loyal to it. No one suggests that they give up their national or racial characteristics in order to belong to the association.

77. Could it be that the constant and insidious pressure to make the diverse racial groups in the Federation conform to the same social pattern, to Europeanise the Africans, or to create a mixed community without first enlisting the loyalty of each group, through its chiefs and leaders and through its tribal or race loyalties, has contributed to unrest and insecurity?

78. It is believed by some observers that the attempt to mould a new nation without due respect for the natural desires to retain certain familiar patterns is psychologically unsound, and a fault on the side of certain Europeans in particular who can see no way in which to adapt different peoples to a common goal by agreement, rather than by coercion or imposition of one way of life upon another.

79. As in marriage, so in racial patterns there are incompatibilities which must be accepted, and used, not to destructive ends, but to preserve certain freedoms within the union.

Contribution by Women to Better Understanding and Co-operation among the Races

80. The influence of voluntary women's organisations among non-Europeans cannot be ignored. Their approach is sensible, practical and sincere. There is neither sentiment nor patronage, and mutual respect forms a basis for practical partnership, without fear of imposing one way of life on another.

81. Tribute is paid to the Federation of Women's Institutes for the establishment of African Homecraft Clubs and training centres, and to the untiring efforts of Lady Tredgold in the Federation of African Women's Clubs. These two associations train African women in rural areas in the essentials of hygiene, and home-making. These women are encouraged to run their own affairs, and to become self-reliant, needing limited guidance from the Europeans. Good African habits are encouraged, and bad substituted by better recognised habits. They learn to sew and to look after children and handle simple money problems. In the remotest reserves these activities are helping to raise standards and to promote friendship between the races. The Africans are proud of their simple achievements and interclub competition stimulates interest and enthusiasm.

82. The National Council of Women S.R. has assisted with the formation of African Outposts, Coloured and Asian Branch Councils, meeting together in conference, but always respecting the autonomy and understandable pride in each group. Warm friendships have sprung up as a result of this work, but there seems little evidence of wanting to live on each others' doorstep. The example of this co-operation teaches one lesson which the women of Southern Rhodesia have learned, viz. that it is happier and better to work with each other and not for each other. There is a lesson in this which politicians could profit by. There is also scope for more intellectual non-Europeans in other associations.

83. The Salisbury Business and Professional Women's Club has studied working conditions for women of all races, but the nature of its objects limits its scope. But it has co-operated in a survey of African women and their Tribal Status to send overseas, and adopts a non-racial approach to employment and training problems.

84. In their quiet unspectacular way, through African broadcasts, talks on nutrition and other kindred subjects the women of Southern Rhodesia have done much towards creating a stable rural African community and are assisting many of adjust to urban life.

85. This comment has been included in this memorandum to illustrate a practical method of co-operation which does not worry about the theoretical implications of existing "discriminatory" legislation but gets on with the job of home-making where people are most content—among their own kind.

Recommendations and Conclusions

Introduction

While this memorandum is largely one of ideas and opinion factual evidence has been included. But, as Sir Robert Tredgold said in the Report on the Franchise, memoranda which gave ideas and opinions were as valuable as cases based on facts, for these reflected sincere and mature consideration and a desire to explore and understand the problem under discussion.

The Salisbury Business and Professional Women's Club Study Group has attempted to gather and formulate its evidence on a strictly non-partisan basis. Being domiciled in Southern Rhodesia it has dealt mainly with the position in Southern Rhodesia and with Federal affairs as seen from Southern Rhodesia, feeling that detailed evidence relating to the northern territories can be given more effectively by voluntary organisations operating in these territories.

Importance of Ideas and Opinions: Account has been taken of the main facts relevant to the enquiry, but much of the evidence also refers to ideas and opinions. In such a complex undertaking as the building of a multi-racial state, the way people think and feel about the facts may be almost as important as the facts themselves. The Club membership includes women following a variety of trades and professions and having contacts both social and professional with different sections of the population. It was therefore considered that any attempt to ascertain majority opinion and present it as the opinion of the Club was neither practical nor desirable. Opinions which are believed to be widely held, either in or out of the Club, or which have been expressed by influential people or associations, are quoted where appropriate but not necessarily endorsed by the Club.

1. Federal System and Modifications

The Study Group of the Salisbury Business and Professional Women's Club makes the following recommendations on behalf of the Club. These are based on certain conclusions arrived at after general and specific discussions:—

(i) That in view of the economic and political achievements of the Federation, and of the sincere attempt to pursue the principles of the Federal Constitution as set out in the Preamble, a Federal form of Government should continue, with certain modifications.

These include:—

(a) Confidence and Loyalty: Confidence in the ability of the Federal Government to defend and control internal affairs. Therefore a transfer of Powers from the United Kingdom Government to the Northern Legislatures, as has been done with Southern Rhodesia, and to an independent Federal Government, as soon as possible would restore internal and external confidence in the Federation. Better a swift battle than a prolonged campaign.

(b) Loyalty to the Federal Government is best achieved through group loyalties.

(c) Permanently domiciled local Civil Services should be introduced.

(d) Re-allocation and decentralisation of Federal administration of Health and non-African Primary and Secondary Education, and a return of these to Southern Rhodesia. (Ref. Federal and Territorial lists).

(ii) Withdrawal by Territories: That in the event of any of the Territories withdrawing from the Federation either by force or due notice, such Territory should refund to the Federal Treasury such administrative funds as have been invested by the Federal Government in that Territory. The investment of taxpayers money in a dubious enterprise merits certainty of financial guarantees.

(iii) Strong S.R. Government: That the Southern Rhodesia Government should be strengthened by the return to it of Public Health and non-African Primary and Secondary Education. That the rights of minorities in respect of land tenure and residential areas, of education and hospitalisation be safeguarded, and that these rights be enshrined in the Territorial Constitution. (Rights of minorities be entrenched in Federal Constitution.)

(iv) Multi-racial: Because of the unique position of Southern Rhodesia, whose political stability is due to its traditional pattern based on territorial separation and on political and economic co-operation there, a new feature be introduced within the framework of the Land Apportionment Act to provide areas for multi-racial development, without upsetting Europeans and Africans who may prefer to live in their own areas. This would establish the freedom of choice of association essential to good relations; moreover the justifiable fears of European property devaluation and of exploitation of African areas by other wealthier groups would be dispelled and present tensions eased.

The multi-racial areas could be the bridge between existing separate areas, neither of the major race would feel it was being called upon to make undue sacrifices, and the spirit motivating people who live in these areas would reflect a sincere desire for social partnership.

In these areas multi-racial schools, hospitals, residential and business areas could be developed. It is felt that Southern Rhodesia can avoid the extreme emotionalism aroused by State intervention in schools, e.g. Little Rock, and the hardship such as is found in the application of the reverse policy found in the Union's attempt to enforce complete segregation by adopting its own system.

These multi-racial areas could act as the leaven to the whole, and in time the separate areas may disappear.

As far as is possible attempts to implement "partnership" should avoid friction. This Committee does not subscribe to the suggestion that the social patterns of the West Indies is necessarily the best one for this country. The psychological factors in race relations are of utmost importance and are often overlooked by theorists and planners. There should be common meeting places for all races but not at anyone's expense.

(v) Franchise: That the franchise should be qualitative and that the principle of "good government by responsible and civilised persons" should be the goal.

That British Protected Persons should vote only for Federal Candidates in the country of their origin and that arrangements be made for postal ballot when absent from that Territory.

That no British Protected Person should be eligible as a Parliamentary candidate in Southern Rhodesia.

(vi) Migrant Labour: That inter-territorial control of migrants be retained by the Territories and that such control be exercised in Southern Rhodesia on a quota system when industry warrants this, and on medical examination before entry.

(vii) Registration of African Births and Deaths: That the compulsory registration of African births and deaths be transferred from the Federal to the Territorial African administration. The use by Africans of African surnames should be enforced. (Long term policy).

(viii) Game Reserves: That consideration should be given to the return to Southern Rhodesia of its Game Reserves; that anomalies between the Governments be adjusted and if necessary certain functions be restored to the Southern Rhodesian Government (e.g. roads).

2. S. Rhodesia

This Committee has confined itself to Southern Rhodesia in relation to the Federal Government and it has commented on the other Territories only in a general way.

It feels that a strong Southern Rhodesia, which can pursue its level headed way along established patterns, which are flexible enough to be modified with changing conditions, is essential to the well being of the whole.

It would like to see a prompt decision about the future of the Federation since procrastination will be of little benefit to anyone.

3. Contribution by Women's Organisations

The importance of the contributions made by women has been stressed, particularly in the sphere of practical racial co-operation.

4. Outside Influences

Outside influences have been deplored and it is suggested that strong comment be made by the Commission regarding the adverse influence that irresponsible deeds and actions have had on race relations in this country.

5. Race Relations and Social Integration

This aspect of the national life needs to be handled with the greatest care, because it concerns a sphere in which the imponderables of thought and emotion are particularly powerful. Much attention has been directed, both within and without the Federation, to discriminatory laws and practices, and there has been pressure for their immediate abolition. Many such laws and practices have been abolished since Federation, and others probably will be. Indeed the rate of progress in this matter has caused alarm in certain quarters. It should be realised, however, that there are also certain laws and customs which discriminate in favour of Africans. The pace at which further action to abolish racial barriers should proceed should be determined by the needs and desires of the people actually concerned and not by the wish to placate outside opinion or to conform to a "fashionable" philosophy. Interference with established social patterns is liable to create tension and should be only undertaken if absolutely necessary.

The current tendency to place undue emphasis on the racial aspect of public affairs is deplored. The nature of racial and other group loyalties, and their proper place in the Federal system, need to be considered, in order that they may be used to strengthen the Federation and not to weaken it.

6. Legislatures

Certain anomalies, such as the presence of nominated members, still exist in the Federal Assembly. These were introduced to meet certain specific needs, but it is worth considering whether they are still the best way of meeting those needs.

The possibility of abolishing the African Affairs Board and transferring its functions to an Upper House should be investigated.

An alternative could be an Upper House or Senate with restraining powers on all discriminating legislation. It has been suggested that the size of the Southern Rhodesian House of Assembly should be reduced, but such action is not recommended. The growth of the population and the probable increase in the number of African voters might well justify an increase.

This Study Group recognises that the existence of treaties between the U.K. Government and the Territories is a matter for special knowledge and it is not competent to deal with this.

7. Protection of Minorities

When the Federation first came into existence, it was considered necessary to make certain arrangements to protect the interests of Africans. This is the reason for most of the limitations of the Federal and Territorial constitutions, and it is evident that Africans set great store by these safeguards.

The rate of African advancement, however, has led members of other racial groups to fear that they may be swamped. As a result there is a growing demand for the protection of minorities, to ensure that Europeans and other non-Africans will be able to preserve their racial identity and their individual rights. The desire to return control of European primary and secondary education to the Southern Rhodesian Government, while leaving higher education to the Federal Government stems from the fear of an African majority in the Federal House.

It is therefore recommended that provisions to safeguard the rights of non-Africans should be entrenched in the Federal constitution and legislature.

8. The Case for Independence

It is submitted that the record of the Federation to date has given ample proof of its fitness to manage its own affairs. Had the population been homogeneous, there would have been little difficulty in attaining independence within the Commonwealth. It is alleged that the granting of early independence to the Federation would result in internal strife, but on the other hand undue delay can enable various species of trouble-makers to consolidate their own position and hamper the development of a common loyalty. The Federation has earned the right to independence.

9. Tribute

Finally a tribute is paid to the years of effort which has gone into the Federation and to those who are presently working for the 1960 conference. It is hoped that the suggestions and recommendations put forward in the memorandum will not be swamped by the mass of facts, etc., which will confront the Commission. They reflect what the authors believe to be not only a cross section of one association's views but of much that is currently discussed.

Appendix I

Registration of African Births and Deaths

The proposal to separate registration of African births and deaths from those of other races will be opposed on ideological grounds, but the present difficulties of doing it are not serious at present.

The registration of African births, in particular, has now become an urgent necessity. The lack of registration facilities means that hardly any Africans have birth certificates, and in the near future they will be seriously handicapped without them. Birth certificates are required for school entry and leaving, often for admission to higher education institutions, employment, insurance, establishment of age for pension purposes, proof of date and place of birth for passports, establishment of identity for inheritance, etc. All of these matters are beginning to affect Africans in ever-increasing numbers. Even if a fairly comprehensive system of registering African births came into existence immediately, there would be need for some transitional arrangements to meet the needs of African adults who are unable to obtain birth certificates. It is therefore desirable to make proper arrangements for the necessary registrations as soon as possible.

The existing position is as follows:—

As far as I am aware, there is no registration of African births or deaths in the Northern Territories. Some records are kept, but they do not amount to registration and I am under the impression that no birth or death certificates relating to Africans are issued. The relevant legislation in those Territories certainly excludes Africans from any compulsory registration.

Southern Rhodesia has no compulsory registration of African births but it is compulsory to register African deaths in all areas under the jurisdiction of municipalities, town and village management boards. Compulsion can be imposed by proclamation in other specified areas, but I am not aware of any instance in which this has been done. Registrations of African births are accepted on a voluntary basis provided that the information is given by one of the parents or some other person who is acceptable as a "qualified informant". The details are entered in the birth registers in the usual way and the people concerned can obtain birth certificates on request and payment of the fee of 5/-. I am informed, however, that the legal warrant for such registrations is very dubious. The Federal and Southern Rhodesian Governments have been considering possible legislation, but I cannot say how far they have progressed.

It would not be practicable to make registration of African births and deaths compulsory throughout the Federation in the immediate future. The question of trained manpower alone would be a serious obstacle. It will therefore be necessary to introduce compulsion at first in restricted areas and extend it as circumstances permit. Some arrangements should be made for voluntary registrations in areas where compulsion does not apply.

Compulsory registration might be introduced at first in local authority areas and possibly within a specified radius of such areas and the conditions under which it would be applied to other areas should be defined. The registration offices should be staffed by trained African clerks but subject to regular inspection by a suitable European official. Such arrangements would be practicable in Southern Rhodesia now but I have some doubt whether either the registration systems or the Africans in the Northern Territories are sufficiently advanced.

It seems possible, therefore that the registration of African births and deaths would progress more rapidly in Southern Rhodesia if this territory were permitted to deal with it as a territorial matter.

Any separation of African from non-African registrations should, however, be subject to the proviso that the same forms and registers should be used as far as possible for both kinds of registration. In particular, the forms of birth and death certificate should be the same for all sections of the population. This would help to refute the allegations that are sure to be made that the Africans had been given an inferior registration system, as well as obviating the queries that might arise abroad if the certificates issued to Africans were different from others.

Section 33 (j) Minorities: Safeguards for Europeans and non Africans land tenure. The Federal Legislature shall not acquire European lands set aside for European use under Territorial Laws for non-Europeans. (i.e. African use, settlement, occupation etc.).
2. Section 10. Voting. Control of British Protected persons who are working or living outside their territory of origin or where they have temporary domicile. These persons shall not vote in Territorial or Federal Elections, nor shall they be eligible as candidates for election in that Territory, but shall vote by postal ballot for candidates in their country of origin. This applies particularly to Southern Rhodesia, where Federal Citizenship is a necessary qualification for the vote. This does not imply disenfranchisement of British Protected Persons but the control in Southern Rhodesia.
3. Sections 23, 1, 53.
4. African Affairs Board. If this is to continue, then protective Boards may have to be set up on a racial basis, to protect minorities. However, this is not advocated but some form of non racial body, perhaps an Upper House with powers to veto and restrain should be considered.

5. 19. Roads: Possible transfer of all major roads to S.R. Government might be considered.
6. 28. Subject to anomalies between Federal and S.R. Governments.
7. 30. Non African Primary and European schools should be transferred to Southern Rhodesia. Racial integration of these schools with Africans should not be undertaken except at express wish of the people concerned, and should be subject to a referendum by Europeans and non Africans. It is interesting to note that African Educationalists in S. Rhodesia do not desire integration for obvious reasons.

Federal Assembly

Composition of the Federal Assembly and Qualifications for Voters on the Federal Roll

The Federal Assembly comprises 59 Members—44 "ordinary Members" of any race. 12 African Members and three European Members with special responsibilities for African interests. These three European Members represent each of the three Territories and are nominated, in the case of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland by the two Governors; in Southern Rhodesia all the voters together elect this European Member.

There are two separate voters' rolls—the special roll and the general roll. Both are open to Africans as well as to persons of other races who are either British Protected Persons or citizens of Rhodesia and Nyasaland and who are aged 21 years or more. Voters must be able to speak, read, write and understand English and be able to fill in the voter's registration form without help. The residence qualification is that the voter should have lived in the Federation for two years and for at least three months in the electoral district in which he is applying for a vote.

The special voters are entitled to vote for an African Member and also, if they live in Southern Rhodesia, for the specially elected European Member. The general voters, too, will be entitled to vote for an African Member and in Southern Rhodesia for the specially elected European Member. They will, in addition, have their vote for an ordinary Member. Thus the special voters have one vote (for an African Member) and in Southern Rhodesia an additional vote (for the European Member for African interests). The general voters have two votes (one for an African and one for an ordinary Member) and in Southern Rhodesia an additional vote for the specially elected European Member.

*The Coloured voters are included in the European figures.

†Numbers of Territorial voters in Nyasaland are not given because there is not at present a common roll of voters of all races in that Territory. The Constitution and franchise of Nyasaland are awaiting review.

As regards both the special voters and the general voters there are certain income or property qualifications. For the special voter there are two alternatives:

1. he must have an income of £150 a year, or own land worth £500, including buildings;
2. if he has completed a two-year course of secondary education, it will suffice if his income is £120 a year;

General voters must also have certain income or property qualifications, or be deemed to be exempt from this requirement. There are four alternatives:

1. he must have an income of £720 a year or own land worth £1,500, including buildings;
2. if his income is between £400 and £720 a year, or he owns land worth between £1,000 and £1,500 he must, in addition, have completed primary school education. In the case of an African this is Standard Six;
3. if his income lies between £300 and £480 a year, or he owns land worth £500, he must, in addition, have completed a four-year course of secondary education;
4. if he is a minister of religion and has had the requisite training and experience, or if he is an African chief, he will be deemed to have an income of £720 a year and so will be able to qualify as in Group (1).

Southern Rhodesia

Voting Qualifications in Southern Rhodesia—Question of whether Colony has always had a Common Roll

All voters must be citizens of the Federation and be able to speak, read, write and understand English and be able to fill in the voter's registration form without help. The income and property qualifications are as follows:

- (a) an income of £720 a year or ownership of property to the value of £1,500;
- (b) an income of £480 and a primary education, or £1,000 property ownership and a primary education;
- (c) an income of £300 per year and four years' secondary education or ownership of property valued at £500 and four years' secondary education;
- (d) an income of £240 per year;
- (e) an income of £120 per year and two years' secondary education.

In general, registered voters have qualified in the following categories: (a) mostly Europeans, with a few Africans and Asians, (b) young, single Europeans and some Africans, (c) Articled Clerks and similar workers, (d) mainly African teachers and clerks, and (e) African clerical classes and self-employed artisans.

Since its inception Southern Rhodesia has had a voters' roll common to all races and there have always been Africans registered as voters.

A Legislative Council with some nominated and some elected members was constituted in 1898. Every male person over 21 years of age was entitled to register as a voter provided he was a British subject and had taken an oath of allegiance and permanently resident; could write his name, address and occupation, occupied premises worth £75 or had a bona fide wage of £50 per annum. Subsequently women were admitted to the franchise.

Appendix III (d)

New Constitution which Northern Rhodesia obtained in 1958

Northern Rhodesia is governed by a Legislative Council and an Executive Council presided over by the Governor.

The Legislative Council: Under the new Constitution the Legislative Council has 30 Members, of which no fewer than 22 are directly elected in single-member constituencies by an electorate consisting of voters of all races. Six of the remaining eight are appointed Official Members, all of whom are members of the Northern Rhodesia Government. The other two are Members nominated by the Governor and, although not nominated specifically to represent African interests, as was formerly the case, they have been retained "as an assurance that the increased requirement for Ministers who are not officials, and in particular the need to find two Africans for Ministerial office, can be met in the conceivable circumstance that the elections fail to return a sufficient number of candidates who are both willing and able to devote their full time to Ministerial duties."

The 22 constituencies are made up as follows:

- 12 ordinary constituencies in generally urban areas;
- 6 special constituencies in generally rural areas;
- 2 reserved seats for Africans in urban areas;
- 2 reserved seats for Europeans in rural areas;
- 22 elected members

The two reserved seats for Africans cover the same areas as the 12 ordinary constituencies in which the greater part of the European population lives and which are therefore likely to return European members.

The two reserved seats for Europeans cover the same areas as the six special constituencies which are inhabited mainly by Africans and therefore likely to return African members.

A candidate standing for election in an ordinary constituency must have the qualifications of an ordinary voter. A candidate standing for election in a special constituency must have at least the qualifications of a special voter and must, in addition, have a certificate from not less than two-thirds of the recognised chiefs in the constituency that they have no objection to his standing as a candidate. This latter provision is intended to act as a bridge between the two concepts of direct election and the traditional rule by chiefs.

The Executive Council: Under the new Constitution this has 10 Ministers, consisting of four officials and six others, of whom for the time being four will be Europeans and two will be Africans. The choice of Ministers is in the Governor's discretion, but before selecting the unofficials whom he will recommend for appointment the Governor is bound to consult with and pay due regard to the advice of the Member of the Legislative Council who, as party leader "is in the Governor's opinion most likely to command the support of the majority of the elected members of the Legislative Council" and in making his selection, he will first consider the elected Members.

Appendix III (e)

Franchise in Northern Rhodesia

Qualifications for Voters and how Franchise Works in Northern Rhodesia

The common voters' roll contains the names of ordinary and special voters. The means qualifications for registration correspond to those required for registration of Federal voters.

Special voters have to satisfy registering officers that they possess temporary and lower qualifications designed to allow the enfranchisement of "a fair proportion" of Africans of whom would not otherwise be able at present to fulfil the permanent voting qualification. There is provision for a review of the special qualifications at set intervals, and they will be raised in steps until they conform with the ordinary qualifications, when special registrations will stop. The qualifications may not be raised, however, unless the number of special voters at least equals the number of ordinary voters on the roll.

Basic Qualifications: In order to be registered as a voter a person must know enough English to complete the claim form in front of a registering officer without help; must be at least 21 years of age; must have lived in the Federation for at least two years and in his or her particular constituency for at least three months; and must be either a citizen of the United Kingdom and Colonies, a citizen of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, or a British Protected Person by virtue of his or her connection with Northern Rhodesia.

Ordinary Voters: In addition, an ordinary voter must have the following qualifications:

- four years' secondary education and an income of £300 a year or ownership of property worth £500;
- full primary education and an income of £480 a year, or ownership of property worth £1,000;
- less than full primary education and an income of £720 a year or ownership of property worth £1,500.

Certain classes of people who are providing full-time service for the community for little or no pay are exempt from these qualifications. Chiefs can become ordinary voters without normal income or property qualifications, and so can ministers of religion and certain lay members of religious bodies who can meet certain stipulated requirements in regard to training and length of service. The wife of an ordinary voter may register as an ordinary voter herself.

Special Voters: In addition to the basic qualifications, a special voter must have: Either an income of £150 a year, or ownership of property worth £500 or two years' secondary education and an income of £120 a year.

Hereditary councillors and certain headmen of two years' standing who are in charge of important villages, and certain pensioners, do not need the normal income or property qualifications in order to be registered as special voters; the wife of a special voter may herself register as a special voter.

Voting Rights: Every voter may cast two votes. The first will be for a candidate seeking election in the ordinary or special constituency in which the voter lives. The second will be for a candidate in either the reserved European or reserved African constituency of which the ordinary or special constituency in which he lives forms part.

In all constituencies ordinary votes will always count in full, but in the 12 ordinary constituencies and the two constituencies reserved for European special votes may not in total count more than one-third of the total of ordinary votes cast.

Appendix III (f)

Voting Qualifications for the Election of Members of the Nyasaland Legislative Council

There are 11 elected members—six non-African and five African. The non-African members are elected by all non-Africans who:

- are 21 years of age or over;
- were born in the Protectorate or have resided there for a continuous period of two years;
- have occupied, for three months prior to claiming registration, as a voter, property valued at £20, or have earned in the Protectorate an income of not less than £200 per year;
- have an adequate knowledge of English (be able to speak, read and comprehend English) and are able, unassisted to fill in the Voter's Registration Form.

The African Members are elected by the members of the African Provincial Councils of the Northern (one member), Central (two members) and Southern (two members) provinces.

Appendix V

The Federation—Land (with Particular Reference to Southern Rhodesia)

The Comparative Survey of Native Policy in Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland (prepared by the Committee of the Central African Council for the 1951 Conference on Closer Association in Central Africa) reveals some interesting facts which indicate that the system of land allocation and tenure in Southern Rhodesia has largely contributed to the gradual introduction of systems of Local Government to Africans at a slower but more realistic pace than in the Northern Territories. This steady progress towards political development has been undertaken in the full knowledge of the limitations of the African people. It has led to the stability and comparatively good race relations that have characterised Southern Rhodesia.

Time will not be wasted on an historical resume which will be well known by your Commissioners, but it would, it is suggested, be a guide to the solution to the problem of co-operation between the races if the practical progress of Southern Rhodesia was regarded in the context of its history, and not in relation to conditions in the Northern Territories.

In the appendix (No. 4) there are tables which indicate the work done in Southern Rhodesia for its African people. There is also a list of comparative figures to show what money has been spent on their advancement in the three territories.

The fact that under the Land Apportionment Act this progress was made possible because the drive and inherent abilities of the Europeans was not hampered by having to live among and literally carry the Africans. It is because of the degree of separateness that each group has lived in such amity over the years. This basic pattern should not be changed until the Africans are ready to live in a more closely integrated community or until the Europeans are ready to accept them. There is still a strong instinct of group self-preservation which will harden the more pressure is brought upon it.

And it is because of the Southern Rhodesian policy over the years to bring the Africans along with the population as a whole that there has been no real racial problem. It has only become a "problem" since everyone began to stir up emotions and interfere. If races, which are as different and incompatible as are the Europeans and Africans at present, are thrown into too close contact, respect falls away and it becomes a case of "familiarity breeds contempt".

The downward pull of millions of illiterate and semi-literate people can prove disastrous to the whole. It is firmly believed that with the flexibility of the Land Apportionment Act in Southern Rhodesia, that the gradual consolidation of the peoples into a heterogeneous nation, bound by a common loyalty to their country, through their group loyalties, will eventuate. Press too hard and the clock will go back 50 years. Pride of race and other human factors are psychologically important and the concept of racial harmony based on the false precept that peoples of different races can become homogeneous except through miscegenation is unsound.

"It has been Southern Rhodesian policy to concentrate on the Africans' material and economic development and his political development has been of set purpose to depend on the rate of his advance in those other fields. Moreover great emphasis is laid on the consolidation of each step before the next is taken." (P. 17 the above Report).

These words were written in 1951. They are relevant today because the real progress of the peoples has not been too fast. A great deal has been done to advance the Africans and would have been done in Southern Rhodesia whether federated or not.

Reasonable people have accepted these changes but they fear the fallacious utterances that "time is not on our side". It should be on our side. It could be if the United Kingdom Government trusted us and allowed the rightful "consolidation of each step first".

The proof is there—it is in the Northern Territories where political powers were over-stimulated that unrest and emotional extremes are all too apparent.

The suggestion has been made that under the Land Apportionment Act and other legislation in respect of Town Planning—there could possibly be a new Urban Areas Act—multi-racial areas be set aside.

These multi-racial areas would assist in the gradual evolution of the solidarity of the Rhodesians. They could bridge the gap between the races, by evolving voluntarily rather than compulsorily. They would follow the proven progress step by step of Southern Rhodesia. Common meeting places, schools, etc., on a multi-racial pattern would grow spontaneously, and the mistakes of enforcement as seen in the U.S.A. could be avoided. It is the uniqueness of Southern Rhodesia that has made it stable.

The management of the land and its peoples is of the utmost importance. Southern Rhodesians would do well to retain their independent outlook and not be brow-beaten either by world or Federal pressures.

Appendix VI

Extract from Memorandum Submitted by the Salisbury Women's Institute with their kind permission

Health

An assessment of the Health Services as they are at present must begin with a comparison of the existing services in the various territories prior to Federation in 1953. It was then clearly recognised that the provision of Health Services, and in particular of hospitals, and clinics was far more advanced in Southern Rhodesia and that greater expenditure would be necessary in both the northern territories in order to meet their requirements more adequately and to bring them closer into line with the services available in Southern Rhodesia.

The level of inadequacy in the northern territories, considered in the light of their respective populations, is clearly reflected in the comparative expenditure on health services in 1953, as shown in the following tables:—

Recurrent Expenditure	S. Rhodesia		N. Rhodesia	Nyasaland
	£	£	£	£
1953	2,202,245	995,199	267,000
1958	3,780,095	2,069,973	815,794
Capital Expenditure	544,521	177,120	40,000
	142,429	818,920	198,554
Population
1953 ... African	2,210,000	1,960,000	2,420,000
European	157,000	49,000	5,000
1958 ... African	2,550,000	2,220,000	2,690,000
European	215,000	72,000	8,800

By the above figures it will be seen that the pendulum has now swung in completely the opposite direction. Thus whilst recurrent expenditure has increased by about $\frac{1}{3}$ in S. Rhodesia it has more than doubled in N. Rhodesia and more than trebled in Nyasaland, and capital expenditure having dwindled to almost $\frac{1}{4}$ of its previous total in Southern Rhodesia has soared to 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ times its pre-Federation level in both N. Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

One of the most reliable guides to the adequacy or otherwise of a health service is the level of bed occupancy in hospitals, a safe maximum being usually considered to be 75% and an absolute maximum 80%. Figures for African hospitalisation are either non-existent or misleading for all the territories but at the time of Federation it was suggested that the budget for the African hospital in Bulawayo compared closely with that for the whole of Nyasaland, and N. Rhodesian Africans were to a large extent cared for in mine hospitals. Southern Rhodesian African hospitals were grossly overcrowded prior to Federation. The position in all three territories has been greatly improved, but the demand for increased services grows greater daily. There is no doubt that the level of African services has enormously improved in the two northern territories since Federation.

The comparative figures for European hospital services are much clearer. Bed occupancy in Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia prior to Federation were about 30% and while the overall figure for S. Rhodesia at that date is not available the figures for Salisbury and Bulawayo hospitals were 87.3% and 79.3% respectively, in 1958 they were 80.2 and 83.8 and in 1959 had risen still further. Salisbury hospital for that year is reliably reported to have been 90%! The comparative figures for the three territories in 1958 were:

S. Rhodesia 69.2% N. Rhodesia 40.4% Nyasaland 44.0% and these figures are further reinforced by the number of beds per 1,000 (European) of the population in that year, these being:

S. Rhodesia 4, N. Rhodesia 6.9 and Nyasaland 7.5 respectively. There appears to have been a distinct retardation of services in Southern Rhodesia particularly in respect of services for Europeans.

Conditions led to a commission of inquiry whose findings have not yet been published. Dissatisfaction arose from several factors. To begin with the size of the Federation as a whole and the differing levels of urbanisation make for an unwieldy organisation which has to be geared to meet vastly different needs. Nevertheless all personnel are recruited on a Federation wide basis, and may be drafted to any part of any of the three territories as the need arises. This results in the lack of stability and a wastage of highly trained personnel, who may (because of seniority and other service considerations) be placed in situations where their special skills are of no use. This is particularly prevalent in the nursing service where, for example, there is no continuity of theatre staff, and no possibility of building up surgical teams. Likewise medical officers with surgical or other qualifications may find themselves in an isolated station where no opportunity exists to make use (or proper use) of them.

Recruitment meets resistance when it is realised that living conditions may vary from the ultra rural to the highly urbanised and through a wide range of climatic conditions with enormous distances between possible stations. This is clearly reflected in the fact that throughout its short history the Federal Health Service has been under-staffed and the position is steadily worsening.

In the National Health Service in the United Kingdom it was recognised that a service of such a personal nature as Health should have as much local autonomy as possible, and such was in fact provided by the Regional Boards. This is not the case in the Federal Service, where, more and more, the direction has been increasingly centralised.

A further cause of difficulty arises in that whereas Health is a Federal responsibility Social Services remain under the aegis of the Territorial Governments. These services are so inter-related and so dependent the one on the other that this division has made for nothing but frustration and difficulty in both.

There is one other aspect of the Health Service to which perhaps attention should be drawn. African health services of every kind are provided free of charge. It is thus, as far as the African population is concerned a non-contributory free medical service. Such provision was readily understandable when the African population was still living a rural tribal existence, and not within a money economy—when European medicine was distrusted and shunned, and the provision of services was dictated by urgent public health requirements or on humanitarian grounds. Now however the African is clamouring for more and more services and for every kind of specialist facility. That such services are available in the quantity and at the level at present enjoyed is one measure of the Europeans' willingness to assist the African to a better standard. It would therefore appear that direct contributions from African wage earners towards their health service should be considered.

Finally there is a general feeling throughout both medical and lay opinion in Southern Rhodesia that allocation of health funds as between the three territories has been dictated by political expediency rather than by medical necessity and this would seem to be borne out only too clearly by such figures as are available.

Summary

It is therefore recommended that Health should become the independent responsibility of each of the three territories of the Federation.

Oral Evidence

SALISBURY BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL WOMEN'S CLUB. Representatives: Mrs. Cooper, Miss Wilkin, Mrs. Bratley.

The witnesses had submitted a memorandum with six appendices.

Mrs. Cooper stated that she and her colleagues now represented the Club as a whole, as their paper had been circulated and examined; they had the backing of four other Clubs in Southern Rhodesia and five in the North, including Blantyre, and of the National Executive. The Club in Salisbury had 80 members, 60 paid up. It contained a diversity of professional and executive women, including employees in commerce and civil servants, doctors, teachers, accountants and the like. It was a non-racial organisation, but at present there were no non-European members. One Asian lady had applied for membership, and it was expected that she would be admitted.

They thought it right to point out that there had been controversy among their members on the suggestion made in the memorandum about the transfer of education from the Federal to the Territorial Governments; there had been a balanced difference of opinion on this point. It was thought that if the function were not transferred to the Southern Rhodesia Government, nevertheless there should be a greater allocation of powers to the Territorial divisions of the Department. Education had previously been more advanced in Southern Rhodesia than in the northern Territories, and there were feelings among parents that Southern Rhodesia had been obliged to stand still while the other Territories caught up.

In referring to the conclusions and recommendations of the memorandum they said that they were mainly based on Southern Rhodesia experience, of which they were most competent to speak; but their observations on Territorial matters were based on full contacts and research.

In answer to questions the witnesses made the following points:—

1. They were in favour of Federation, although it should be adjusted in matters of detail.
2. Recommendations and Conclusions (ii). This recommendation had been inserted in relation to current talk about secession. The "dubious enterprise" referred to meant "secession". The funds to be reimbursed would go back to some central organisation, and not necessarily to a Territory. They were questioned as to whether if Southern Rhodesia were to secede it should pay back to Northern Rhodesia the funds received from that quarter. They did not directly answer this question, but said that they did not know how practical their general suggestion was. They only wanted to make the point that financial obligations and arrangements had to be borne in mind when questions of secession came up.
3. Recommendations and Conclusions (iv). In speaking of "areas for multi-racial development", it was only the big towns such as Salisbury and Bulawayo which came to mind. They thought there should be a special separate area for both races to live in, particularly residential: that is to say "open areas". They agreed when it was pointed out to them that research had established that in Salisbury at present only 69 Africans could afford a building clause of £2,500; but they thought that the matter should be thought out and the provision should be made for the future, even though the idea might not be economic at this stage.
4. Recommendations and Conclusions (v). The franchise. Miss Wilkin stated that she considered the present franchise reasonable, although it might be modified in detail. She would not like the qualifications to be lowered, nor to be at present materially higher. She was talking of both the Federal and Southern Rhodesia franchise, although aware of certain differences. The fact that a number of Africans had in fact qualified was an indication that the qualifications were not unattainable by Africans. There was a big gap between the most and the least advanced Africans. In an under-developed country with a diversity of population there should be minimum qualifications. Members of Parliament in the future would have to make decisions on an international scale. In the election of village management boards unqualified people might no doubt make sound individual choices. But for national affairs people must be able to depend on the written and spoken word, since they could not have direct personal experience of the issues involved. They must therefore have educational qualifications for voting in order to understand such affairs. The financial qualification, on the other hand,

- catered for those who, through no fault of their own, had had little education. However, people who had some economic success in life were likely to be sounder in their judgments. For these reasons she considered the qualifications to be reasonable as they were at present.
5. Same reference. On the reference to British Protected Persons voting for Federal candidates, the point was that they wanted British Protected Persons to be prohibited from voting in Southern Rhodesia; they were thinking of people who came in from other parts of the Federation to Southern Rhodesia. Such people could, of course, vote if they applied for Federal citizenship.
 6. Recommendations and Conclusions (11). "The case for independence". They would like this for the Federation as soon as possible; but in the meanwhile Southern Rhodesia should have full independence inside the Federation. But meanwhile also the ties of the Colonial Office in the North should be loosened, otherwise there would be no hope of the Federation ever becoming a Dominion.
 7. Being referred to Section 25 of the Federal Constitution, they doubted the practicability of its removal at present, that is to say before the Territories had their independence. While they wanted independence for the Federation as soon as possible, Southern Rhodesia should get its independence now, that is to say in 1960.
 8. Paragraph 34, last three sentences. The opinions stated in this paragraph were founded on experience of the effects of the entry into commerce of Africans. Africans should obviously come in with as much training as possible. When Africans were really competent and reliable, then they should have the same emoluments as Europeans. They mentioned an instance where four African clerks had been taken into employment in the place of two European women, each being paid one third of the European wage. They regarded this as exploitation, and felt that it was not a good principle. They thought that the Africans should have the same rate of pay as Europeans during the testing period. They agreed that the same principle should apply in the field of railway development.
 9. Paragraph 37, first sentence. "Some observers feel that Europeans, who had been becoming more tolerant, are now showing a strong reaction against liberal moves". They were asked to relate this judgment to events in South Africa. They replied that European opinion was extremely reserved about recent events in South Africa. People had had experience in Nyasaland of the bias and unreliability of press reports. They could not therefore say what the reaction was to the South African situation. They thought that the Europeans in the Federation were still set on separateness from Africans, but that did not mean intolerance.
 10. "Partnership" had become a political catchword. Its original intention seemed to have become lost. It had become an expression more misleading than helpful. At the time of Federation the Europeans had been assured that nothing was intended to force social and racial integration. False meanings had since then been given to the word "partnership", for example by the Church. They objected to the word "partnership". They also observed that it was people outside the Federation who wanted the Europeans to go faster with the advancement of Africans.
 11. The Club had no African members. It had not gone out to get any. There was the question of premises. There were also few African women capable of joining. They thought that only two were likely to qualify. The question of premises arose because of the Land Apportionment Act. But the witnesses had worked with African women in other organisations to which they belonged.
 12. They were questioned on "equal pay for equal work" in relation to African nurses, fully qualified, although serving in their own racial hospitals. They appreciated the difficulties of the Health authorities. Unless African nurses could undertake full responsibility they should not get the same pay as Europeans. African nurses were liable to fail to go on night duty at the right time, and have other defects. They were asked if African nurses with the necessary three certificates failed in such ways. They replied that they could only go on what they had heard, but they knew of an example in which a highly qualified African nurse at Domboshawa had been found to be negligent. It was a question of evolution towards responsibility.
 13. The significance of asking for independence for the Federation in 1963 was that it was ten years from 1953. They thought that the northern Territories could achieve complete independence if given a fair chance, that is to say if the same pattern were followed as in Southern Rhodesia. It was necessary however to prevent politicians from coming in to spoil it.
 14. Asked if they would persist in their demand for independence if it were violently resisted in the northern Territories, they replied that it would depend on how deep and genuine that violent resistance was. If the authorities in the northern Territories had been more successful in explaining Federation, violence would not have occurred.
 15. Paragraph 9 of the memorandum. They made an assumption that one unifying factor in the North was a dislike of Southern Rhodesia based on envy of Southern Rhodesia. There had been a feeling in the North that they ought to have had a say at the time of the Southern Rhodesia referendum before Federation. They thought there was envy of the stable government in Southern Rhodesia. There was a feeling in Northern Rhodesia that Southern Rhodesia had benefited at their expense. Nevertheless Nyasalanders were now doing their best to stay in employment in Southern Rhodesia.
 16. They thought unfair the accusation relating to the fact that there were no Southern Rhodesian Africans in the Southern Rhodesia Parliament. They thought there would come a time when African constituencies would return Members to Parliament, even under the present arrangements. Reference was made to some figures in Paver's "His Own Oppressor" which estimated that there could be 25,000 African voters in Southern Rhodesia.
 17. They thought they would still be in favour of Federation even if there were African majorities in the legislatures of the northern Territories. Bearing in mind that Southern Rhodesian Africans were further advanced than those in the North, they thought they would also accept that situation if it affected the Federal Assembly, but in that case they would wish to have safeguards for Europeans, for example an Upper House, to give protection to minority groups.
 18. Paragraph 26 (b), second sub-paragraph. In speaking of "agitators" they did not necessarily mean only Africans. An "agitator" was a person out to make trouble. They thought summary trial preferable to procedure through tribunals and the like. Punishment for agitators should be short and sharp. Young people would benefit from rule by example.
 19. Paragraph 26 (d), second sub-paragraph. They thought that in the Constitution's preamble reference to "desire of all the inhabitants" there must have been some implied reservations. Babies were inhabitants, but they supposed that it would not be necessary to seek their views. Therefore "inhabitants" must mean informed adults. They thought that it should really mean people on the electoral roll. But something like the elementary form of franchise used in Native Authority areas in Southern Rhodesia might be employed. The enquiry might be done through local government bodies, which they understood to be even more evolved in Northern Rhodesia. The franchise for this purpose need not necessarily be related to the franchise for Parliament. The Africans should have their say on the basis which is suggested. It was suggested to them that this might mean "one man one vote" on the question of remaining in the Federation.
 20. They would accept African Governments in the northern Territories, so long as there were safeguards.
 21. They said they had no social contacts with Africans, although they did have contacts through educational groups. They did not claim to understand Africans.
 22. They did not advocate the return to the Territorial Governments of education in order that there might be multi-racial schools, since they did not approve of multi-racial schools.
 23. On the question of safeguards they did not want a Bill of Rights: they thought that would be dangerous.
 24. They were not quite happy about present trends of developments so far as they affected Federation; but they had to accept them. Much would depend on the form of Federal Constitution which would emerge. The present Federal franchise should certainly remain. Indeed they would be happy to have higher qualifications for the franchise. A number of functions should go back to the Territories, for example Education and Health Services.

Addendum to Oral Evidence

SALISBURY BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL WOMEN'S CLUB.

My Committee would appreciate the opportunity to clarify certain points arising from our oral evidence:

1. Franchise (see paragraph 26 (e)). Mr. Katilungu asked re our reference to the phrase "all the inhabitants" being a weakness in the Preamble, whether by substituting "the electorate" would not the majority of Africans be excluded from making their wishes known regarding Federation?

In reply it was suggested that they need not be excluded from a referendum to decide this issue, if they voted through local councils and similar methods. This applies only to seeking the will of all the inhabitants through such a referendum and not to the election of M.P's who should be elected on a qualitative vote territorially and Federally. The Federal franchise should remain separate from the Territorial franchise as at present. This also applies to Sir Victor Robinson's question re one man one vote.

2. Southern Rhodesia's Status. Sir Victor Robinson and Mr. Ellman Brown asked whether we in Southern Rhodesia would accept black Governments in the North and hence in the Federal Government. We approached this on the assumption that such Governments would be elected by a civilised and responsible electorate (see paragraphs 39 and 40) and therefore acceptable. We would repudiate any association with African wholly nationalistic Governments elected on universal adult suffrage and which may be created for political expediency. A Federal outlook is essential in all Governments associated in a Federation.

Memorandum

A. J. A. PECK

I have the honour to make the following submission to you and to your Commission:—

African's Out-voting of European Foreseeable

Taking into account the number of Africans presently being educated, it is a distinct possibility, if not a probability, that in the absence of further amendments to franchise qualifications, the African voter will be able to out-vote the European voter in General Elections for the Southern Rhodesia Legislative Assembly within fifteen to twenty years. It is possible that, in the Federal sphere, the African will be able to out-vote the European even sooner than this.

The European Attitude to this Contingency

Speaking as someone who was born in this country in 1922, and who has since been educated and has lived in this country, my attitude towards this is perhaps typical of that of a large body of Rhodesians.

We fully realise that this country is as much the African's country as our own. For this reason we sympathise fully with the aspirations of the African to complete equality with the European in every way.

At the same time, we regard this as being as much our own country as that of the African, and were any attempt to be made either to exile us or to deprive us of rights, whether this attempt were to have a local or an overseas origin, we would even be prepared to take up arms should such an extreme course of action appear to be necessary.

We therefore seek absolute guarantees of our own rights both in Southern Rhodesia and in the Federation.

It is indeed a distinct possibility that, should political power fall into the wrong hands, the European might be evicted from this country, or—at best—be permitted to remain in this country only on sufferance. Such a state of affairs we cannot and will not permit to arise.

But it is not only the position of the European minority that must be safeguarded. It is of the utmost importance that the Commission should not overlook the need for the mass of Africans to be protected from possible tyranny by groups and cliques of their own race. A third aspect of the matter is that such civilised values and institutions as have been introduced into this country since the Occupation are equally in need of protection and preservation.

The Various Safeguards Suggested

It appears that the various safeguards suggested in this connection may be summarised under seven headings, and I shall deal with each of these in turn:—

(a) The African Good-will Theory

This theory appears to be the only solution offered by the Central Africa Party. In brief, exponents of this theory hold that the European should set about treating the African well now, trusting that this will create so much good-will on the part of the African towards the European that the question of the eviction of the European will never arise should the African gain political power.

However delightful this theory may be, and however necessary it may be to gain African good-will, the validity of the theory can hardly be supported in the light of general human experience. We have before us, for example, the treatment of the European in the East, in Egypt and to a lesser degree in other countries. No wise man would dream for a moment of entering into any very important contract in his private life without having that contract committed to writing. Still less would he be prepared to commit his whole political future, his very right to remain in the country of his birth, to the whim of a Government formed of members of another race, and speaking quite candidly, if I were an African, I am not at all sure that I myself would not be strongly tempted to vote for the eviction of the European from Southern Rhodesia should the occasion arise.

It is mere superstition to assume that since the universal franchise has worked well in the United States of America and in Great Britain, it will necessarily work well in Africa. The citizen of the United States and of Great Britain has become imbued down the centuries with certain values, such as a belief in the Second Great Commandment, in the Rule of Law, in the sanctity of human personality, in fair play, in traditions of liberty, free speech and opportunities for free self-expression. The African has no such traditions. His outlook has been conditioned by an authoritarian regime; and the fact is, not so much that the opinion of the African is unreliable concerning political matters, as that he has no opinion at all. He will thus uncritically and fervently adopt political beliefs that are as unbalanced as they are pernicious, simply because some extremist "leader" has preached them. He has no apprehension, by and large, of constitutional measures designed to protect the liberties of the individual and, were power to be placed ill-advisedly in his hands, it is quite possible that civil liberties would rapidly disappear. Liberty is like the air we breathe, unnoticed because we are so accustomed to it—it is only when it has irretrievably gone that we remark its absence, and lament its loss.

I speak, I may add, as someone born in the country, raised on a farm, with one year's service in the Native Affairs Department, with three years' experience as a farmer and native trader, with three years' experience as an advocate practising in Salisbury, and with one and a half years' experience gained from practising as an attorney in Salisbury. Hence I think it may truly be said that I have had a very wide experience of the Rhodesian scene from many points of view.

In my opinion it would be utter folly and completely disastrous to replace uncontrolled political power in the hands of an African electorate at the present juncture.

(b) The "Civilised Man" Theory

It is a widely-held theory that political power should be retained in the hands of "civilised men".

In my own view this principle is a myth. Doctor Banda, for instance, is a "civilised man", by any ordinary rule of thumb that can be applied in the making up of electoral rolls. So, too, in all probability, were many of the more ardent supporters of the Nazi regime and the Italian Fascist regime.

In the prescribing of standards for the compilation of voter's rolls, which is the acid test, there is hence really no practicable way of defining a "civilised man", and the theory is in practice of little value.

(c) The Upper House Theory

This theory appears, like the last, to be favoured in the highest quarters, but it is inadequate as a means of safeguarding the rights of the individual. British history shows that an Upper House can be "packed" and recent events in the Union of South Africa shows that this method of dealing with an Upper House has not altogether been forgotten. All that an Upper House can do, at best, is to delay the passage of legislation. It cannot prevent the passage of that legislation ultimately. Hence the Upper House Theory as a means of safeguarding the rights of individuals is untenable.

(d) The Basic Rights Theory

This theory is that certain basic rights should be written into the Constitution, such as rights to liberty and to free speech and so forth. In practice, however, the theory does not work out. It has always been found necessary in times of national emergency to curtail, for example, the rights of free speech drastically. This was the position in Britain during the last war. This, equally, was the position in Southern Rhodesia during the last Emergency. In my view it would exhaust the ingenuity of Man to devise a system of basic rights, with all possible exceptions and eventualities allowed for, that would meet the situation in this country today. I personally take the view that if the basic rights of many Africans had not been suspended during the last Emergency, there would have been bloodshed, perhaps widespread bloodshed, and if any provision had existed that had prevented the Government from suspending those rights, that provision would in the circumstances have been merely vicious.

(e) European Trusteeship

I would, with the greatest respect, urge the Commission to give this possible solution its most serious consideration.

It is perfectly true that the African suffers many hardships today, but it is equally true that such hardships as he does endure are primarily, not due to European ill-will, but to the country having developed at such a pace that the Government has hardly been able to keep abreast of developments. Much of the hardship exists springs, for example, from the provisions of the Land Apportionment Act. This Act was, however, a completely fair and just Act when it was introduced. If reference is made to the report of the Commission which brought about its introduction, it will be observed that the primary purpose of the Act was to eliminate friction between the races. The policy was thereafter adopted that Europeans could only enter the African areas for the benefit of the African and vice versa. What upset things was, firstly, what has been termed the "population explosion", which caused the reserves to become overcrowded; and, secondly, the fact that European-introduced commerce and industry caused the European towns to increase beyond all anticipation, so attracting the African to those centres.

However, many of the African disabilities—such as his treatment perhaps in shops and restaurants—will fall away with the passage of time for the simple reason that the African comprises the mass market, and hard economic facts will cause the European entrepreneur to extend that courtesy to his African customers that is so desirable.

Apart from the part-failure of the European to keep up with the extraordinary onrush of events (which has, in any case, only taken place since the war) the record of an entirely European-dominated Government in Southern Rhodesia has been astoundingly good. His provision for African education is the best in Africa even though the European has been well aware that he thereby putting the African more and more in a position to out-vote him. It is to be wondered whether such an example of magnanimity is to be paralleled in history.

The African has a system of clinics ministering to his health that is extraordinarily fine. The African Agricultural Department has done wonders. In making jobs available for Africans, the Government has done everything that can be done—the Civil Service is open to Africans; the Land Apportionment Act was amended to permit African professional men to practice; the medical profession has recently been thrown open to Africans on equal terms, again, with Europeans; and in the recently enacted Industrial Conciliation Act there is no distinction whatever drawn between Africans and Europeans—and, again, the whole field of industry is thus thrown open to Africans on the same terms as it is open to Europeans.

The Commission is humbly invited to consider the term "ethnic suicide" which is a term that was coined, I believe, by the late Dr. A. N. Whitehead. In their anxiety to do the utmost for the African, the European electorate of this country has shown itself prepared to risk precisely this.

Therefore, it is submitted with the utmost respect, that the European in Southern Rhodesia at any rate, should so be permitted to amend his own Constitution if necessary as to ensure that control of the country shall remain in the European hands or in the hands of Europeans together with such Africans as the European shall have deemed to have proved themselves until circumstances indicate to the Europeans that a wider basis for the franchise is advisable.

(f) Restricted European Trusteeship

The Commission may feel, however, that having regard to comparatively recent events in a neighbouring territory, it does not feel justified in leaving the country under an unlimited European Trusteeship. In that event, it may be possible for the Commission to recommend a limited form of European Trusteeship, somewhat as exists today. Here the European would be left predominantly in control, with the ability to retain that control, but with stringent safeguards against his passing of discriminatory legislation. In short, the European should be left in control, but with a rein kept on the way he exercises that control.

It need not be thought that the European would retain control for ever. In an industrialised society, as this is rapidly becoming, the Trade Unions as such have far too much political and economic power for any Government to deprive them of their due recognition. The African today possesses a very large proportion of the land area of Southern Rhodesia for his exclusive use. (It may be remarked that I am thinking primarily of Southern Rhodesia at this present juncture). These are distributed evenly throughout the country. The European could no more keep the African in permanent subjugation than he could control the tides.

What we are asking for, in essence, is simply the opportunity to go ahead in the future in the same magnificent way in which we have gone ahead in the past. If Her Majesty's Government feels it necessary to retain a certain slight sanction for protection of the African, then it seems that the European has no option but to assent to these. But the European does ask for the opportunity to be able to proceed as before, taking the African with him in more and more equal partnership as time progresses.

(g) A Basic Law Forbidding the Introduction of Discriminatory Legislation

It would seem that the writing of such a measure into the Constitution is a sine qua non. Certainly, if the African is to be left in a position whereby he can out-vote the European, either in the Territorial or the Federal spheres, such a provision must be made the foundation-stone of the Constitution.

The provision must be couched in the widest terms possible. It must make completely illegal any discriminatory legislation or subsidiary legislation on grounds of race. It must also ban any ways in which people or persons can be indirectly penalised on grounds of race. It should, perhaps best of all, be couched in positive terms in some such form as "All citizens of the Federation shall have equal rights in the eyes of the law and it shall not be competent for Parliament to diminish those rights on grounds of race either directly or indirectly". It would seem that this measure should be enforced, not merely by its being written into the Constitution, but by permitting of an appeal if necessary by those prejudiced by discriminatory provisions, to Her Majesty's Government perhaps, to the International Constitution of Justice at the Hague, or to the United Nations but these latter alternatives are perhaps not so desirable as provision simply permitting Her Majesty to disallow the measures.

It must be emphasised that the measure would in fact have to be couched in very wide terms indeed since it is fairly easy to penalise a section of the population indirectly by, for instance, altering the boundaries of electoral districts, although on the surface there may appear to be no discrimination whatever.

We may conclude our discussion of these various safeguards by remarking simply that perhaps some combination of two or more of them may be desirable.

Attitude to Federation

I have always myself been an ardent supporter of Federation, feeling that it would have been a major disaster had the confederate states been permitted to break away from the United States of America, since it would have derogated enormously from the economic prosperity and the stature of that great country, and that, similarly, it would be a disaster were the Federation to break up.

Nevertheless, I would prefer to be a free man in a small country rather than a slave in, or an exile from, a large one. For this reason, and with the greatest respect, I endorse the demand, recently expressed by an eminent member of the Southern Rhodesia Government, that the rights of civilised men in this country be adequately guaranteed.

Giving the Federal Government a Chance to "Sell" Itself

One factor that has militated greatly against the popularity of Federation in the eyes of the African populace is the fact that the Federal Government has had no opportunity to "sell" itself. The various Federal concerns, such as the hospitals and the Post Office, are not departments in which officials come into day to day personal relationships with Africans as does, for example, the Native Affairs Department and the Native Agricultural Department in Southern Rhodesia. For this reason, some thought might perhaps be applied to the problem of re-organising Territorial and Federal responsibilities with a view to giving the Federal Government scope to "sell" itself to the general populace.

Officials to have a Stake in the Country

It is generally felt that the time has passed when a country can be governed efficiently by persons who do not regard the countries concerned as their permanent homes. Certainly the management of matters appertaining to the recent emergency aroused fury in the hearts of many Southern Rhodesians since they felt that the opportunity for them to make a success of the Federation was being wrecked by utter mismanagement on the parts of persons from overseas. It is submitted that this Federation has no chance whatever of success while any officials employed in this country still do not regard this country as their home. The Commission should give the most earnest attention to the problem of ensuring that all officials shall be domiciled in this country before they can obtain posts here.

Dangers of Leaving European Education a Federal Responsibility

It is possible that the Federal Government will be dominated by Africans far sooner than the Southern Rhodesia Government. In that event it is questionable whether it is wise to leave the European Education a Federal responsibility. Such position might give rise to considerable friction in the future.

English the Official Language

A final point is that the Constitution might provide that English shall permanently remain the only official language. This suggestion is put forward in no spirit of partisanship, but in order to suggest an avoidance of the enormous waste entailed in having two or more official languages caused by the need for duplicating all documents etc.

Oral Evidence

A. J. A. PECK

Mr. Peck left with the Commission a pamphlet prepared by himself on African town planning (not reproduced).

He made the following points in amplification of his memorandum:—

- (a) There were two main requirements in the Federation:
 - (i) the prevention of racial discrimination;
 - (ii) the preservation of a civilised way of life.
- (b) The Federation must be protected from the whims of the British electorate and British administration.
- (c) There was a current naive belief in the United Kingdom that the characteristics of the mass of Africans were similar to those of the mass of Englishmen. This was very far from the truth. Africans were totally ignorant of the need for safeguards for personal liberty and freedom from corruption.
- (d) With regard to discrimination, there should be a basic law on the lines of parallel provisions in the Nigerian and Malayan constitutions forbidding any increase in discriminatory practices or any subsidiary legislation. Such discrimination must be defined so as to include any practices calculated to prejudice the position of one race relative to another, and to exclude discrimination calculated to benefit the weaker partner. It should apply to commercial and industrial matters, but not social matters which were a matter for the individual.
- (e) The civil service, police, etc. must be staffed entirely by persons domiciled in the Federation. This would not preclude recruitment overseas.
- (f) As the value of the pound went down and the minimum wage rose, it was quite logical to raise the franchise qualifications to keep roughly the same number of Africans on the rolls. It was not unreasonable that the number of African voters should remain smaller than the number of European voters so long as there was the present disparity in the level of civilisation between the two.

Memorandum

C. KIRKPATRICK

On the Proposed Formation of A.D.F.C. (African Development and Finance Co. Ltd.)

Object

The proposal is to form a company to specialise in the provision of finance, in various forms, to Africans.

In the initial stages it is proposed to concentrate on the provision of finance and credits to African Farmers (i.e. those in possession of Master Farmers Certificates and those who are holders of Registered Rights), and to African Farmers Co-operative Societies.

Directors

The following have agreed to serve on the Board (without remuneration until such time as the profits justify the payment of fees).

- N. R. Bertram, C.M.G., M.B.E.
- Colin Kirkpatrick
- A. E. P. Robinson
- R. M. Taylor, C.B.E.
- A. N. African (to be selected at a later date)
- A. N. Other (Representative of Northern Rhodesia)
- A. N. Other (Representative of Nyasaland).

Managing Director and Agricultural Adviser

It is believed that Native Agriculture presents the most immediate, pressing and promising field for finance. Accordingly, it has been considered essential to secure the services of individuals with wide knowledge and experience of Africans, African Affairs and African Agriculture in particular. The following have agreed to accept appointments with the Company:—

As Managing Director—Mr. J. M. C. Cramer. (Until very recently Head of the Department of Native Agriculture and Lands).

As Agricultural Adviser—Mr. R. M. Davies. (Formerly Director of Native Agriculture). Mr. Davies is presently employed by the Natural Resources Board on specialised work in connection with Native Agriculture (including the formation of African Farmers Committees, the equivalent of the European I.C.A. Committees). Since Mr. Davies' work for the Natural Resources will be so very closely connected with the work he will do for A.D.F.C., Natural Resources Board have agreed to his appointment as Agricultural Adviser to A.D.F.C. and his remuneration will be divided equally between Natural Resources Board and A.D.F.C.

Details and Particulars

These are set out on the following pages.

1. Preamble

For some time past the thought has occurred to me, as I am sure it has to many others, that sooner or later, there will be scope and need for a Finance Company which is prepared and equipped to provide finance to Africans engaged in commerce, industry and agriculture.

Professor John Fox of the Harvard Graduate School of Business recently made a survey into the whole question of Management (European and African) in the Federation. This survey was financed by C.I.P.M. (Council for International Progress in Management) of New York and was the result of certain discussions between the writer and Mr. David Rockefeller during the course of the latter's visit to Salisbury in March 1959.

During the course of Professor Fox's investigations I accompanied him on a number of occasions; and, in particular, during the course of his visits to Africans who were conducting their own businesses, (i.e. as storekeepers, transport operators, carpenters, farmers, etc.).

We came across a number of instances where success had been achieved (or was in process of being achieved) in spite of many handicaps i.e. lack of "know-how" and business training; and, of course, a desperate lack of adequate capital. Sources of financial facilities are almost totally lacking to the African "businessman" or farmer, excepting perhaps in one or two isolated cases where an African has "made good" and has been able to obtain limited facilities from a commercial bank. In the field of Agriculture in Southern Rhodesia, good and responsible African farmers are catered for, to some extent, by the Native Development Loans Fund Committee; but the resources of the Fund are limited and are inadequate to deal with existing requirements, let alone the requirements over the next five to ten years when the number of African farmers (in the Native Purchase areas and elsewhere) is likely to increase two or threefold.

As a result of Professor Fox's observations, and as a result of subsequent discussions with Mr. Jack Quinton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Native Affairs) with Mr. J. M. C. Cramer (formerly Head of the Department of Native Agriculture and Lands) and with various leaders in commerce and industry, I came to the conclusion that the time was ripe for the formation of a Finance Corporation which would be equipped to cater for Africans and which would be prepared to take the obvious risks involved. Furthermore, the existence of a Finance Corporation of this nature would certainly engender goodwill amongst the African people.

This conclusion was most strongly supported by Mr. Quinton and he immediately arranged an appointment with the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia (Sir Edgar Whitehead) with whom the proposal was discussed at some length. The Prime Minister was enthusiastic in his support of the proposal. He gave it as his opinion that while there was a developing, but as yet limited field, for financing African businessmen, there was immediate and very considerable scope in the field of (African) agriculture. He mentioned, for instance, the need for the provision of financial facilities (comparatively short term) to finance crops and to enable Master Farmers to purchase items such as fertilisers, agricultural plant, equipment and machinery, etc. He stated that he himself and his Ministry (through Mr. Quinton) would back the proposal to the hilt and give every possible assistance to its implementation.

2. Shareholders

A.D.F.C. will be operating in a new and uncharted field. The risks may be considerable; and in many cases, loans (or whatever the form of financial assistance) will, of necessity, have to be made on an unsecured basis. While the number of advances might be well spread and small in individual amounts, and while the Management would exercise every care and precaution, the fact must be faced that losses will almost inevitably be encountered on occasions.

Under these circumstances it is essential that participants come in "with their eyes open"; and the proposal is that individual subscriptions be confined to relatively small amounts. Invitations to subscribe to the initial share capital are therefore being confined to a number of the larger concerns and to those who might be inclined to regard the proposal on a "pro bono publico" basis.

3. Share Capital

After consultation with Sir Edgar Whitehead and Mr. Quinton and others, it is proposed that the initial issued capital of the company consist of:—

200,000 Shares of £1 each (10/- paid) = £100,000.

Note (a) It is visualised that financial facilities will normally be granted on a comparatively short term basis. Accordingly a fair proportion of the advances might reasonably be expected to revolve fairly quickly. It is considered that the issue of 200,000 shares of £1 each (10/- paid) will provide sufficient funds to cover the first 18/24 months of operations.

Note (b) In the light of experience gained and if the financial results make it possible, then the intention would be to consider the possibility of equity participation by individual Africans, and by African Farmers Co-ops.

4. Expenses and Income

Estimated Expenses (for details see Appendix A*) amount to £7,000 p.a. It is considered inadvisable to make any detailed estimate of income other than to say that it would seem reasonable to estimate that borrowers would be charged rates of interest carrying between say 6% and 8% per annum.

Thus, in order to cover the estimated expenses A.D.F.C. would need to have out on loan a sum of £100,000 for a period of 12 months at an average rate of 7%.

It seems reasonable to suppose that, in due course, sums considerably in excess of £100,000 will be out on loan. (In this connection the Agricultural Branch of Native Affairs Department state that, within two years crop and seed finance of not less than £150,000 will be required for the Turkish tobacco crops alone.)

(N.B. The above estimate of income does not take into account any income which would be derived from inspection and negotiation fees.)

5. Modus Operandi

It is intended that A.D.F.C. should operate on a Federal-wide basis but in the early stages A.D.F.C. will concentrate on Southern Rhodesia. However, steps have been taken to ensure close liaison with various Government lending organisations in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, details of which are given in Appendix B.

Southern Rhodesia

(a) African Businessmen (Storekeepers, Builders, Transport Operators)

It is visualised that applicants will be mainly those in the Urban areas, and that applications will be made DIRECT to A.D.F.C. It is, however, being arranged that close liaison will be maintained at all times, with Native Commissioners; and it is anticipated that a number of applications will be submitted to A.D.F.C. via (and with the support and recommendations of) the Native Commissioners. All such applications will, of course, be subject to the same sort of "vetting and investigation" as would be undertaken by any reputable Finance Corporation.

At this stage, this particular field is considered to be limited and somewhat hazardous; but it is one which may develop.

(b) African Farmers

Here the field is considered to be wide and immediate. The following remarks are extracted from the Report on an Economic Survey of Nyasaland 1958/59.

"We have already indicated our view that the primary purpose of Nyasaland's general economic policy as well as of its agricultural policy should be the stimulation of agricultural production. We think that this should be achieved mainly by increasing crop yields . . . and, whenever possible by the introduction of new agricultural products . . . To some extent this result must depend on technical factors but there are many instances where the African farmer is unable to introduce improvements which would increase his output because his own resources are few and he is unable to borrow for the purpose. The ordinary commercial credit agencies are only prepared to lend against securities of a kind which the African does not possess."

The above remarks can be said to be applicable to the situation in Southern Rhodesia. It is intended to adopt the recommendation made by Sir Edgar Whitehead that A.D.F.C. makes it a point of policy that no loans be made to African farmers other than:

(i) Those in possession of a Master Farmers Certificate, who are farming in the Native Purchase Areas and in the Communal Areas. The capabilities of those Farmers have been proved. Most of them farm between 100 and 250 acres. There are already 7,000 of them; and there are a further 5,000 Approved applicants who are only awaiting completion of surveys. The numbers are certain to increase considerably over the next decade.

(ii) Those who are Holder of Registered Rights (under the present Land Husbandry Act) in the Communal Areas. There are approximately 126,000 of such farmers and it is anticipated that the numbers will increase to over 250,000 within the next three years.

(c) African Farmers Co-operative Societies

In Northern Rhodesia this movement has reached important proportions. For example, the value of the ground nuts produced by the Eastern District African Farmers Co-op, and sold on the London Market, amounted to over £500,000 in the 1959 season.

* Not received.

In Southern Rhodesia the Co-operative Movement is in its infancy but is developing rapidly; and opportunities are almost certain to arise in the comparatively near future, whereby A.D.F.C. would have opportunities of offering short term facilities to the African Farmers Co-operative for bulk purchases, bulk sales, etc.

The Southern Rhodesian Government is encouraging the development of the African Farmers Co-op Movement; and it is believed that when it becomes known that credit facilities can be made available there will be a marked acceleration in the expansion and development of the movement as a whole.

(d) African Farmers Committees

These are in process of being set up by Mr. R. M. Davies (who is to be A.D.F.C.'s Agricultural Adviser). The intention is that these Committees should perform similar functions to those of the (European) Intensive Cultivation Areas Committees. It is considered likely that these African Farmers Committees will provide a most useful source of applications; and Mr. Davies' intimate knowledge of them should prove to be a valuable asset.

(e) Native Development Loans Fund Committee

At the present time the only source of finance available (for financing items such as crops, fertilisers, machinery, stock, fencing, land improvements and development etc.) is the Native Development Loans Fund Committee; but the funds are strictly limited. And there is the point that many African farmers would probably prefer to deal with a private enterprise concern rather than through a Government agency. Nevertheless it has been agreed that A.D.F.C. will work in the closest co-operation and association with this Committee. The Committee (when short of funds) will pass on to A.D.F.C. approved and recommended applications; and it will also pass on to A.D.F.C. such applications as would seem more appropriate for financing by A.D.F.C. rather than by the Committee.

Arrangements are also being made whereby all Native Commissioners, Provincial Commissioners and Land Development Officers will co-operate to the fullest possible extent by ensuring that suitable applications for finance are passed on to A.D.F.C. either direct, or (if thought preferable) via the Loans Fund Committee. In addition, arrangements are being made whereby Native Commissioners and Provincial Commissioners will, whenever and wherever practical, assist in the collection of interest and repayments; and also assist, via the Land Development Officers, in ensuring that loans are properly utilised for the purpose for which they were granted.

6. Scope for other Operations

Discussions have taken place with certain other financial institutions and in view of the fact that A.D.F.C. will have special facilities for checking and vetting applications from Africans it is considered that there may be some scope in the following spheres.

(a) Hire Purchase. Possible guarantee of H.P. Contracts.

(b) Commercial Banks. Possible guarantee of Bank overdrafts.

(c) House Purchase. Possible guarantee of Building Society advances.

(d) Insurance. Possibility of agency agreements with Insurance companies.

(e) Savings. There would seem to be opportunities, particularly in the Rural areas, for A.D.F.C. to attract African Savings. After all, after an African has borrowed from A.D.F.C. (for example, to finance his crops) and after he has repaid his loan; a mutual feeling of goodwill will have been established; and a logical result would be for the African to lodge his surplus savings with A.D.F.C. in the absence of any other similar facility.

It is, however, appreciated that this is a field which might grow only very gradually; and it is certainly a field into which A.D.F.C. could not enter prior to careful examination of the requirements of the Bank Act. Alternatively, A.D.F.C. might decide to enter into some form of Agency Agreement with one or more of the Building Societies.

7. Conclusion

It is suggested that this is a worthwhile project and one which, though it may never earn large profits, has reasonable prospects of, at least, breaking even.

It will certainly fill a gap which will need to be filled, with increasing urgency in the years to come.

In the political and social field it will certainly engender goodwill amongst the African population.

The fact that it is a private enterprise project, sponsored by leading concerns, all of which have an important stake in the Federation, will not go unnoticed overseas. (See Appendix C†).

The Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia has promised that every possible assistance will be rendered by the Ministry of Native Affairs.

The Constitution of the Board should ensure that the affairs of the company are conducted with vision, with prudence and with financial acumen.

Those better qualified to judge than I will, I think, confirm that on the whole the African is not a bad borrower.

Appendix B

A.D.F.C. will concentrate, in the early stages, on Southern Rhodesia, and, in particular, on the Master Farmers, the Holders of Registered Rights, and on the African Farmers Co-operatives. It is, however, intended that A.D.F.C. should operate on a Federal-wide basis as soon as possible and practicable.

Thanks to the help and assistance of the Governors of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, contact has been established and discussions have taken place with those responsible for various Government lending agencies in both of the Northern territories.

Northern Rhodesia

There are the following Government lending agencies:—

(a) African Farmers Improvement Fund—financed by proceeds of a levy on sales of maize. It is a Statutory Board and caters for Improved (or Master) Farmers.

(b) African Businessmen's Co-operative Credit Association—This comes under the orbit of the Development Commissioner, Northern Province (Mr. M. Halcrow). The Manager, Mr. C. P. Kinnmont, states that his funds are limited and that he would be pleased to co-operate with A.D.F.C. whenever and wherever possible. He also reports that since the Association started up some 18 months ago 122 loans (out of 618 applications) have been approved; and that in only one case extended terms of repayment of loan have had to be given.

(c) African Housing Revolving Fund—Loans are made to Native Authorities who re-loan to individual Africans for house-building in the rural areas. The Native Authority takes full responsibility for repayment of each loan. Approximately £50,000 has been loaned out over the past two years.

(d) African Businessman's Loan Fund—administered via the Native Affairs Department. The funds are extremely limited (£15,000) and I was advised that at least four times this amount could immediately be utilised, provided satisfactory arrangements could be made in respect of administration and after care. Government would like to see this organisation taken over by private enterprise.

(e) Rural Development—The Commissioner for Rural Development provides funds which are utilised for land settlement and development and to assist peasant farmers.

Nyasaland

A "Central Board" was established two years ago to supervise the making of loans (to African Farmers and Businessmen) out of the funds which were placed at its disposal. After a trial period, the Central Loans Board delegated District and Urban Boards the authority to make individual loans up to £250 in the case of farming loans and business loans, and up to £350 in the case of housing loans.

The rates charged were:—

- 5½% for agricultural loans,
- 7½% for business loans.

To date and in spite of very limited funds and the exercise of extreme caution (on account of the conditions prevailing) loans have been granted as follows:

336 agricultural loans	Total	£18,760
136 business loans	Total	£23,140
				£41,900

The experience of the lending authority has, to date, been satisfactory.

Discussions have taken place with Mr. Phillips (the Financial Secretary) and Mr. Pincoff (Manager of the Central Board). They are anxious to co-operate in every possible way and have gone so far as to suggest that a representative of A.D.F.C. would be welcome to attend any meeting of the Central Board.

As their funds are very limited they would like to pass on to A.D.F.C. approved applications which the Board (through lack of funds) were unable to finance.

Local Committees

Until such time as A.D.F.C. is able to operate effectively in the Northern territories it is proposed to set up small local Committees in both Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland. These Committees would liaise closely with the existing lending agencies and pass on to A.D.F.C. such applications as might be considered suitable.

Oral Evidence

C. KIRKPATRICK; J. A. C. CRAMER; A. JACHA

Mr. Kirkpatrick had produced a memorandum.

He said that he was a director and financial adviser of the Rhodesia Selection Trust Group. Mr. Cramer was until recently head of the Department of Native Agriculture and Lands, now retired. Mr. Jacha said that he was President of the African Farmers' Union, and a member of the Agricultural Research Committee.

Mr. Kirkpatrick wished to draw attention to a possible source of friction and frustration involved in the inability of the more advanced Africans to get finance. His idea represented some attempt to get local private enterprise to recognise that the need existed. He had hoped that before he came before the Commission the scheme would have been cut and dried; but it had had to be shelved until September or later while some of the Directors referred to the United Kingdom. Two of the Directors were also on the Monckton Commission.

Mr. Cramer explained that the idea was primarily for Agriculture in the African areas. They were feeling their way first in Southern Rhodesia. The African farmers did not often rise above a subsistence level of agriculture. This constituted a drain on the economy, rather than an assistance. Under such a system much development of the productivity was not possible. With a higher productivity the African farmers would be in a better position to contribute to the national economy and to increase the circulation of purchasing power. Loans were needed for fertiliser and seed and so on; but finance was not available because the African farmers could not apply to recognised lenders, as they did not know them. But finance companies would lend to Africans very largely on their personal integrity. The African farmers had the benefit of the Government Advisory Services. But finance should be used to assist private enterprise. There was now a small Government Revolving Fund for loans, and that had been useful. But he and his colleagues felt that the proposed new Company could better meet the need, and would help the African farmers to get above subsistence level by improving the land. It would also educate Africans in the wise use of money.

Agricultural Committees were operating at present and doing good work. The witnesses thought the Company would be able to make direct contacts with original borrowers. The business risks which they would take were no greater than they would normally take as business people. They felt that the African was not a bad borrower.

Mr. Cramer said that he had been speaking about the agricultural side of the scheme; but it also applied to traders, store keepers and other African businessmen. Such people subsisted on the purchasing power of the community in which they lived. They too required capital for stock in trade. The Company would deal with them on the same basis as the African farmers. It was unfortunate that such people could only hold land on annual rentals which made it impossible for them to pledge their land. The Company would be prepared to deal with these people on the basis of their integrity, so that the need to pledge land would not arise.

Mr. Jacha said that he had been a farmer since 1932. African agriculture in Southern Rhodesia was still in a very primitive state. Nothing had been done to encourage it. He concerned himself solely with Southern Rhodesia, and the consequences of the Land Apportionment Act. Reserves and Native Purchase Areas had been started in 1932, but very little real development had resulted.

There were 6,200 members of the African Farmers' Union. But they had not achieved much, the reason being that they could not develop land without capital. He had been given figures by the Ministry showing that the few European farmers in Southern Rhodesia had a joint income of £66m. per annum, while the African farmers only earned about £3m. per annum.

The Land Bank had been originally started for Europeans only. As a result of his own efforts its facilities were now given to Africans; but only for loans up to £500, and only for fencing purposes. He agreed that the Government Native Affairs Department had also a development fund from which loans were given for the marketing of maize and other produce. He had also heard that a sum of £80,000 was being raised in America to help African education.

Through the operation of the Land Husbandry Act 8-10 acres would be given to each man. Money for land development was insufficient; but now this Company was coming into the field and the Africans welcomed it.

There were many delays when the Africans applied for loans from the Government. They were sent from one office to another, and then at the end most of them did not get any loan. There was also a stipulation about a 25% deposit, which made borrowing difficult for many Africans.

The witness felt that the proposed Company should not confine itself to Southern Rhodesia, but should spread throughout the Territories. That was what he called real partnership when Europeans made efforts to help Africans in this way.

An African trader in the town might have some European friends to stand behind him financially. But this was not so in the Reserves. The Government had trained Agricultural Officers and Land Development Officers to teach the Africans how to work the soil; but there was also a need for machinery and implements. It was useless to call the African a bad farmer if he had not the tools with which to work well. The Company could help not only Africans but the whole community by financially assisting Africans and thus removing longstanding grievances.

In the African townships there was no security of tenure. Ninety-nine years leases did not meet the need. The Government should give African traders in the townships freehold title to the land which they occupied, in order that they would be able to mortgage it when necessary.

In reply to questions, Mr. Cramer made the following further points:

1. The scheme would not be confined to master farmers only, but would also apply to Agricultural Right Holders.
2. He did not think that the Company would be hindered by the operation of the matrilineal system in Nyasaland. It was proposed in Nyasaland to use the existing Government land system at first.
3. They knew that in Nyasaland European carriers had given long-term credit to Africans. They thought that the new Company might help on a similar basis.
4. The rate of interest in Nyasaland would be 5½% for farming loans, and 7½% for business loans. But the rate of interest was less important to the African than the ability to get an answer to his application within a week, instead of in nine months.
5. Mr. Jacha said that Africans were not afraid to borrow money. If they appeared to be afraid it was because of the channels which they had to follow at present in Southern Rhodesia for getting loans. Applications were often turned down by the agricultural administrators through which they had to pass. In fact many applications might never reach the actual lending body.
6. Mr. Jacha stated that he had been a voter on the ordinary roll since 1951.
7. Mr. Kirkpatrick added that he thought that the real value of the scheme was that it would be seen that Europeans were genuinely taking on the risk of trusting the Africans' integrity, and that it would also lead to day to day relations with African borrowers. If he could not get in the United Kingdom the additional £100,000 which he required for the scheme he knew that he could get it in America; but he would prefer to raise it in the United Kingdom.

Memorandum

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF WOMEN (SALISBURY BRANCH)

Mrs. J. Cowie—President

Mrs. D. P. Woods—Hon. Secretary

The following notes are submitted as a result of a Special Meeting held on 19th February 1960:—

1. Federal System

The Salisbury Branch of the National Council of Women subscribes to the concept of Federation, with modifications, on the following lines:—

- (a) (i) African Affairs: Should remain as at present—a Territorial responsibility—but decisions relating to alterations in policy should be taken within the Federation.
- (ii) Machinery should be set up to study and arrange for a uniform African Policy to operate in the three territories. (It is realised that this would present difficulties, bearing in mind Northern Territories' treaties with the U.K. Government, but nevertheless the goal of a uniform African Policy should be aimed at and machinery for study along these lines should be implemented.)
- (b) Civil Service: There should be a permanently domiciled Civil Service.
- (c) Health: The financing of health should remain a Federal responsibility but administration should become territorial. (This was not a unanimous opinion).

Further, in view of the African's growing awareness of the benefits of health services and increasing demand for all the benefits of health services and increasing demand for all the specialist services, a small financial contribution from Africans would do much to imbue them with a sense of responsibility for their own welfare.

- (d) Franchise: In view of the education and sociological gap in the population, the franchise for the time being, should remain qualitative.
- (e) Births and Deaths: The registration of Births (particularly) and Deaths should be compulsory and put on a territorial basis, preferably with the help of well-trained Coloured and African personnel. Compulsory registration is considered necessary in view of the increasing participation of these people in the higher spheres of employment, overseas study, etc., where establishment of identity is essential.

2. Education

Because of the cultural and economic differences between the two main races, primary and secondary education should not be multi-racial at present.

It is suggested however, that serious thought should be given to the inclusion of a clause in the Land Apportionment Act to allow for the setting-up of areas for multi-racial development. These areas could incorporate schools, hospitals, business and residential areas, etc., without arousing the emotionalism which legislation would occasion. The psychological factors in race relations cannot be discounted, but the freedom of choice of association by providing multi-racial areas would engender good relations and allay fears of devaluation and exploitation of property.

Multi-racial areas would do much towards the voluntary lowering of racial barriers, the abolishment of which should always be governed by the needs and desires of the people.

3. Minorities

Provision for the safeguarding of the rights of minorities should be entrenched in both Federal and Territorial Constitutions. (In the past emphasis has been laid on the safeguarding of the majority).

4. National Parks

Consideration should be given to the return to Southern Rhodesia of its National Parks, with adjustments of anomalies between Government: (i.e. land and road control).

5. Independence

The Federation should be granted independence with the minimum delay in order to prevent power-hungry ill-wishers from achieving their ends, and cognizance should be taken of the efforts and achievements of the Europeans in Central Africa during their seventy-year sojourn, in raising a primitive indigenous population from a state of barbarism to a state where they can begin to understand the meaning and enjoy the fruits of Western Civilization.

Oral Evidence

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF WOMEN (SALISBURY BRANCH)

Mrs. D. P. Woods—Hon. Secretary

Mrs. Hickman—Past National President

The witnesses emphasised that they were speaking only for the Salisbury Branch of the National Council of Women. The National Headquarters, which were at Gwelo, had already given evidence independently*.

The following points were made in amplification of their memorandum.

- (a) Legislation regarding African affairs should be settled wholly within the Federation and not after reference to the United Kingdom.
- (b) On the subject of a locally based civil service, it was assumed that enough civil servants from the two northern Territories would be willing to transfer to the Federal service. Civil servants who had their roots in the country could put more into their jobs than those who looked to the United Kingdom. Moreover, as Africans entered the higher branches of the civil service, they would gradually replace civil servants from overseas.

Memorandum

DR. A. PALLEY, M.P. (SOUTHERN RHODESIA)

Establishment of the Federation extended the Southern Rhodesian concept to the two Northern Territories.

- (a) Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia became Prime Minister of the Federation.
- (b) Southern Rhodesian cabinet ministers took over Federal portfolios.

* See Evidence at Gwelo on 19th April 1960 (p. 106).

First Federal Cabinet: 5 Southern Rhodesian Ministers holding key portfolios
2 Northern Rhodesian Ministers
1 Nyasaland Minister

- (c) Political party forming the Southern Rhodesian government became the Government of the Federation.
- (d) Senior civil servants of the Southern Rhodesian Administration took over the administration of Federal Government Departments.

Strong African opposition in Northern Territories to the establishment of the Federation: viewed as Southern Rhodesian "colonialism". This has grown with the urge for political emancipation and self-determination. Northern Rhodesian Europeans favoured Federation as it strengthened their position by allying them with the Europeans in the South.

Apprehensive European reaction in Southern Rhodesia to growth of African political power in the North.

Today, development of power politics in Federation between the two racial groups.

Inevitable political development of African in the North must lead to African majority government. This is obviously correct, and the only policy possible, because Europeans form an insignificant percentage of the population.

Franchise

- (a) Declared policy of the United Kingdom Government to extend the franchise in the Northern Territories—a political inevitability—opinion varies merely as to timing.
- (b) Declared policy of the Federal Government not to extend the Federal franchise.

Paradoxical position created whereby Africans will have franchise and control territorially, but no franchise federally.

This will result in a political struggle by Africans to obtain the Federal franchise, with strong possibility of disorders and political unrest leading to economic recession.

Political pressure, by Africans locally, by the U.K. Government and world opinion, will probably force an extension of the Federal franchise, and thereby create an African majority in the Federal Assembly, and an African dominated Federal Government.

Southern Rhodesian Europeans are adamant against an African dominated Federal Government, and demand high qualifications for the Federal franchise.

Possible approaches to the Federal franchise

1. Maintenance of the status quo: this will lead to political strife with the Northern Africans.
2. Separate Federal franchises for each Territory on a territorial basis: this hastens the process of nomination by Northern Africans.
3. General lowering of qualifications: on a sheer majority basis this completely swamps the European.
4. Indirect representation of Africans by tribal representatives to an electoral college: This is an antiquated idea which has no place in a modern industrial money economy. This is possible only in a peasant subsistence economy, but there is a tendency even there to elect nationalistic leaders and to displace the chiefs.

Aspirations of the Africans and European fear of African domination create a politically insoluble dilemma in respect of the federal franchise.

Strong secession movements developing in both North and South. Africans wish to avoid "white" domination, and fear they will not acquire legitimate political and property rights.

Europeans are fearful of "black" domination, and fear that they will lose property and political rights, and remain merely a technically skilled element of the population. They feel they will cease to exist as a political force in the Federation in the long run.

African Nationalism seeks expression by independence outside the Federation. It is not concerned with economic benefits until its political objects have been achieved. Nationalism drives moderates to the wall, and they become rejected by their own people. African M.P.'s in "European" parties are considered renegades by the mass of the African population. A common nationalism is essential for the creation of any modern state. In the Federation only divergent nationalisms exist.

Safeguards

Constitutional safeguards, vetoes, entrenched clauses, bills of rights, reserved parliamentary representations have scarcely been protection for minorities in mature, sophisticated communities, and certainly give no protection in an emergent society, such devices rest on respect for individual rights, rule of law, judicial and administrative impartiality. These concepts have only been adequately absorbed by Anglo-American communities and hardly elsewhere in the world. No matter how skilfully a constitution may be drawn, it must fail if it does not allow for fears, prejudices, ethnical and cultural differences. Men and their ideas are the eventual constitution makers, and constitutions must be fitted to the patterns of the local environment. Without a minimum common ideology no constitution will survive. In the Federation differences between the various groups makes it virtually impossible to establish a common patriotism.

Southern Rhodesia

The position of the European in Southern Rhodesia is unassailable for a very long time.

- (a) He owns adequate and agriculturally rich lands.
- (b) He controls the means for the production of wealth.
- (c) He has technical skills and superior education.

The European can afford to make concessions to Africans and still retain power. He cannot do this in the Federation because of the overwhelming disparity of numbers. Physics of numbers will swamp them. In Southern Rhodesia he can make social, industrial and political concessions and still retain a high qualitative franchise with a common roll. The establishment of a senate with possible racial representation, but limited legislative power, might further satisfy demands for African political advancement. Southern Rhodesian history shows that both races can co-exist peacefully, but this has not been the case in the short history of the Federation.

Justification for Federation

Only advantage and justification for the Federation is economic, but as long as political aspirations of Africans in the North remain unsatisfied there will be recurrence of the emergencies of last year, which will vitiate economic advantages. Without political stability there can be no economic progress.

No historical or political justification for the creation of Federation. No external pressure, such as fear of a common economy, and politically there is no homogeneity of race, culture, language, or political institutions. Federation is an administrative federation, not an organic federation.

Nevertheless aim must be to preserve economic structure and advantages.

Suggested Constitutional Development

Political Development

- (a) Transfer of functions by United Kingdom Government to Northern Territories leading to responsible government.
- (b) Transfer of power back from Federal Government to all Territories.

Territorial Governments

Increased legislative powers by:—

1. Exclusive competence to legislate on all matters set out in the Concurrent Legislative List (Part II of 2nd Schedule).
2. Retransfer to Territorial Governments of legislative powers enumerated in the Federal Legislative List (Part I of 2nd Schedule) except those matters reserved for the Federal Authority (vide infra).
3. Residual powers to be Territorial.

Federal Authority

Overriding authority in matters affecting customs, railways, transport, communications, currency, banking, and all matters incidental thereto.

There should be Territorial Representation on such Authority.

Indirect election?

Direct representation?

United Kingdom Government

To retain control for all Territories in:—

- (a) Foreign Affairs
- (b) Defence

This ensures strategic control of Central Africa by the United Kingdom.

These proposals may be the only means of maintaining an association between the three Territories. They allow political expression both to Africans in the North, and to Europeans in the South, while attempting also to maintain the economic advantages of Federation. Should this fail and eventual dismemberment of the Federation occur, the economic disruption would not be so great, as there would have been a two-phased process.

The aim should be to give each Territory political self expression but to maintain the economic ties as closely as possible. A Federation with loose and malleable constitutional links will last, but if rigid, will crack.

Salisbury

21st April 1960

Oral Evidence

DR. A. PALLEY, M.P.

Dr. Palley presented a written memorandum. He said he was a Member of the Southern Rhodesia Parliament. He originally came to this country from the Union in 1952, went back to the Union and returned here permanently in 1956. He was elected to Parliament in 1958. He was qualified both in medicine and in law; he belonged to no political Party at the moment. He had previously belonged to the Dominion Party, but had resigned about 18 months ago.

The witness considered that the Federal franchise offered an insoluble problem, and there was no political justification for Federation, but very good grounds for the continuation of an economic association. He felt that the political situation at the moment was that there were such diversive forces in the Federation that if a fairly rigid political concept were held, the Constitution would inevitably crack. He did not consider it had a long political life. The justification for the Federation was primarily economic in the sense that it was an effort to raise the standard of living of the African peoples. If the political structure could be preserved, it was necessary to loosen the political bonds in order to preserve a loose federation, realizing that something must be created whereby some economic elements were sustained. That would not be easy but if that were not done a situation would arise where there were political disorders, emergencies and unrest. Without political stability you could not have economic stability. The objective must be to allay the political fears, and the witness considered one had to realise the legitimate political aspirations of Africans and the legitimate fears of the Europeans. The only way to do that was to give both groups the right of political self-determination.

Nobody could stop the African from advancing politically, and in the north it was fairly obvious that within a short time the franchise would be extended. These people would be advanced politically to a stage where the Federal Government would have within the Federation a political administration which was not bound by the Federal franchise because, politically, the Federation could not exercise any control over the northern franchises. If it lowered the Federal franchise it was only a matter of a short time before there would be African majorities in the two Northern Territories and the African majorities would then control the Federal franchise, which would produce a tremendous reaction from Europeans in Southern Rhodesia. If the Federal franchise were not extended, there would be African political pressure, U.K. political opinion and political pressure; and the witness did not think the franchise could withstand it. The witness suggested that everything should be done to preserve the economic advantages, and try to allow political self-determination in the various Territories.

Where there was conflict under our present Constitution, as to whether a matter should preferably be Territorial or Federal, Dr. Palley said under our present Constitution the Federal Government could override the Territorial Government. The witness considered that was a wrong slant; it should have been the other way round. There was this unusual situation that Europeans were not prepared to make extensive concessions to Africans in the Federation because they were a small group, under a quarter of a million as against eight and a half million. They feared the sheer physical force of numbers against them. In a smaller community they might well make concessions which they would not be prepared to make in a Federal sphere. Southern Rhodesia was in the best position to make real concessions.

Dr. Palley considered that Federation had worsened race relations in Central Africa, in spite of the official and formal policy bringing some measure of co-operation between the two races. In his opinion racialism had increased substantially in Southern and Central Africa since Federation. There was little in common between the two racial groups who were worlds apart, and the witness did not think the gap was bridgeable.

The witness was in favour of the United Kingdom Government retaining certain elements of control, limited to foreign affairs and defence. He emphasised he did not mean Commonwealth affairs but foreign affairs, because for various reasons, race relations, fears of Communism, it was inevitable that Central Africa must follow the United Kingdom Government's line.

On the subject of having a Federal Authority with overriding control over economic matters such as customs, transport, banking, currency and so on, the witness queried the desirability of having direct elected representation on that Authority as this would be one of the most crucial problems. One might have indirect representation whereby each Territorial Government nominated a member or was represented in an overall Federal Authority. That had advantages in so far as that when economic problems arose in the three Territories, the spokesman in the Federal Authority would be representing Government opinion within the Territories; and therefore that might be better in the sense of sustaining conformity to general policy. That idea perhaps had a weakness in that it was not the creature of a direct election; but the authority's composition would be tied up to the Territorial electorates. If there were a Federal Parliament representation in it, it would be on a Territorial basis in which event the northern Territories could outvote Southern Rhodesia.

The witness said he had not considered the constitution of the old Central African Council to see how a constitution such as it had could operate the economic functions. That Council, he understood, would have had no control over customs, which was always one of the big revenue raisers. He would be very loath to suggest the Federal Government should not have the right of customs because it would be vitiating the whole concept of economic strength.

Dr. Palley considered immigration would have to be Territorial. If it was Federal it would stimulate opposition. There was strong opposition to immigration from certain groups. It would be dangerous to put it with the Federal Government.

On the assumption that there should be separate Federal franchises for each Territory, this would hasten the process of domination by Africans from the Northern Territories. The witness said the qualifications might vary in each Territory or even be the same, but whichever way it was inevitable that there would be a rapidly increased African representation from the two northern Territories; but it was his view that one should not even try to stop that; it would be unrealistic. This would produce repercussions in Southern Rhodesia, who would not subscribe lightly to an African-dominated Federal Assembly. That was why one must not find oneself in a position in which one was creating an African-dominated Assembly which could determine political matters in Southern Rhodesia or in Northern Rhodesia; one had to create a Federal Assembly which could control only economic affairs or rather the economic "advantages". One was more likely to be able to sell advantages than disadvantages to the Territories, and therefore the witness considered that the Federal Authority should retain for its administration the advantages which were common to the three Territories. This idea, he thought, could be got over to the Territories, and particularly to the Africans.

At the conclusion of his memorandum, the witness had said the aim should be to give each Territory political self-expression, but to maintain the economic ties as closely as possible. He did not agree that you could not retain an efficient economic unit without an elected political control in the central Federal Government. You would have your political control at the Territorial level and the witness could see no reason why an acceptable Federal Authority should not impose its economic policies over the three Territories.

Dr. Palley said that today his tentative view was that ordinary taxation should rest with Territorial Governments. This matter worried him a great deal; but it might lead to difficulties if you had the decisions with regard to financial matters in the hands of the constituent Federal Authority. For that reason he thought it better to save the situation with certain advantages even though there were defects in it. He had no doubt at all that customs should be Federal, and exclusively Federal. The witness thought that the Federal Authority would have to finance itself to a substantial extent from customs revenue plus a percentage contribution from the Territories—a reversal of the present situation.

In regard to concessions by Southern Rhodesia, Dr. Palley said at the present moment, as soon as there was a suggestion of a concession of any sort to the African, there was a reaction because, through it, Southern Rhodesia saw the European group getting swamped; but in the witness's view an extension of the franchise would nevertheless be acceptable. The Europeans in Southern Rhodesia today viewed the Federal set-up as a danger to their political future, which was not the case when Federation was constituted in 1953. The European then did not consider the African had a political power that was able to overthrow him; but that position had completely changed today. The European in Southern Rhodesia felt that it was only a matter of time before he would lose his position, and that the only avenues left for him were those of the highly skilled technician, executive and administrator.

Dr. Palley wished to indicate his view that some good could still come out of Federation, because there were certain definite advantages to the three Territories, and at this stage he would not like to see a complete break-up of the Federation. If the total break-up did come it would not necessarily result in such a tremendous economic upheaval. He pleaded that once the African had been given a substantial degree of representation, the country should be given a long breathing space, which was essential if things were to get on to an even keel.

Memorandum

REV. DR. J. KENNEDY GRANT

I am a Minister of the Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa, and have been at work in the Presbytery of Rhodesia for the past 18 years. The Presbytery covers the congregations—European and African—from Livingstone, through Southern Rhodesia, to Northern Rhodesia. The Church is multi-racial, but the multi-racial character is more in evidence in the courts of the Church than in local congregations. This has historical background—and includes differences in language, custom, dress, etc. Africans so far prefer to worship in their own churches—though there is a growing number able and ready to unite with Europeans in their services . . . and there is nothing to prevent that except perhaps the attitude of some reactionaries in every congregation.

Two things should be borne in mind: 1. that Europeans have been settled in these territories for many years and have been the chief agent in the economic development of the country—including all its inhabitants. Europeans are here to stay and any plan that omits that fact is bound to founder. The second thing to have in mind is that Africans at the moment are affected by the upsurge of Nationalistic feeling sweeping not only through Africa but through the world and some of them have clearly got hold of a weapon which they mean to use to the full—some with a real desire to further the good of their fellows, some with the desire to further their own ends, while the large mass of the people remains more or less untouched. Many are ignorant of the emotion, many are indifferent to it, and many remain unmoved by the fiery eloquence roused by it. Yet nationalism has not been unknown in the past—as we Scots and others know well—and nationalism has its part to play—and we in these territories will have to face it and come to something like terms with it. In order to do that certain things may be set forth—first political and then human.

Political

We of the West have been inured to political thinking—and have made great play with democracy—until we reached the belief that it is something that should be acceptable to the nations—and should be workable everywhere. One of the dominating ideas of democracy has been declared in the phrase “one man, one vote”. And it has been accepted almost without question—though the political situation even in Britain hardly seems to justify any great pride in the idea! Yet it has been taught by us to the peoples of the various colonies and dominions until today it has become a slogan capable of rousing the passions of all and sundry. Such a slogan is a menace—especially when it is taken as a fundamental definition of democracy. There are reactionaries among the Europeans who simply refuse to face the issue, as there are wild men among the Africans who are unwilling—or may be incapable—of appreciating the possibility of a better definition of democracy. The ultimate goal must be universal suffrage since the vote has now come to be a badge of manhood, but it is surely necessary that we envisage the need for one and all to be educated up to the use of the vote. Otherwise there can be nothing but confusion and worse. It must be possible for us to arrive at a just expression of democratic rights which shall make for sane government.

Turning to the human aspect it is here that we in the churches have the best right to speak and the most urgent need to be heard. More and more are we coming to realise that there are discriminatory laws and customs that have to go—even though the process hurt those of us who are White. There are all kinds of pin pricks which the African resents, and rightly resents, even though they have a history behind them. Pass laws call for reconsideration, the amendment of the Land Apportionment Act is overdue, and the need for African men and women to live in settled conditions giving reasonable access to the spiritual and cultural as well as industrial facilities which go to the making up of the life of us all. This last point is particularly important—present conditions, in many places, still militate against the upbuilding of a stable home. There are other things we have to change, but the point I am making is simply this that all that seems to dehumanise men and women must go from our social set up. There must be the recognition of the value of personal living—and personal liberties. And that will demand that there be a bill of human rights incorporated in any scheme of settlement in the future. My own personal belief is that it is quite impossible to lay down a policy which can be followed for the years ahead. Men and women change, therefore their situation constantly changes, and what we need in dealing with a human problem is to be alive to fundamental principles of human worth and right and then to meet each situation as it arises in the light of these principles. I am against any attempt to legislate finally—unlike the laws of the Medes and Persians our laws must be flexible so that we can meet the changing conditions of a multi-racial society with courage and with wisdom.

There is one final point I would make—linked with the strengthening of home life—and that is that the status of African Women must be raised. They are really the heart of the problem—and African men themselves have hardly begun to realise the fact!—and the education of the women to take their place in the social life of the country must be advanced quickly and effectively.

Further I believe that there are still enough men of good will both White and Black to get together and reach something like a modus vivendi even in the Federation.

Salisbury

Oral Evidence

REV. DR. J. KENNEDY GRANT

The witness spoke for the Presbyterian Church, but stated that his memorandum was supported also by the Congregational Church in Salisbury.

The witness, when asked which discriminatory laws he would like to see amended, cited the Pass Laws and the Land Apportionment Act, which were thought by many Africans to be directed against them and not to be designed for their own good. He did not think there would be any objection to an identification certificate for both Europeans and Africans; but that before a system of compulsory registration of births was introduced the people would have to be educated up to it. The feature of the Land Apportionment Act which Africans found objectionable was that it restricted them to certain areas. There were also the question of land rights. The Act had been intended to help the African, for example to protect the position of African traders, but many now felt that it was directed against them.

The witness said that there had been a marked change of attitude in recent years and the atmosphere was now more liberal. There was still, however, a long way to go, and the establishment of natural personal relationships was still difficult. On the question of a Bill of Human Rights the witness considered that the rights of man should be categorically stated in the Constitution. This would be welcomed by many Africans, quite apart from the legal effect that any such provisions might have. He added that he was thinking of an assertion of principles rather than the prohibition of certain acts.

As regards the status of women, the witness said that some Africans were not willing to see their wives educated, but it was chiefly through the women that one could get at the family. The present low status of women affected the growth of contact between the races, because it was much more easy for Europeans to meet African men than African women.

The witness thought that the widening of the franchise would be inevitable, as the general standard of education was levelled up. He thought that “one man, one vote” would come ultimately if the Western theory of democracy were to be adhered to. The present franchise in Southern Rhodesia was not acceptable to Africans, and many did not register as voters. He thought, however, that some held back, not because they objected to the standard, but in order to “make things difficult”. There were also others who did not care.

The witness said that his Church conducted missionary activities mainly in the area around Bulawayo. It also had Churches and schools in Salisbury. There were about 200 and 300 African scholars in these schools in the Salisbury area. There had been no real difficulty over discipline, and so far there had been no political activity or intimidation within the schools. The witness thought that there was a long way to go before multi-racial education either in primary or in secondary schools would be practicable, since questions of differing social life and background were closely involved.

Memorandum

WOMEN'S VOLUNTARY SERVICE, CENTRAL AFRICA—
Mrs. Z. Shearer—President

You will surely recall that eloquent phrase “ex Africa semper aliquid novi”, which we translated at school as “out of Africa always something new!” The translation has never altered; it remains the same. It read “out of Africa . . .” not “in Africa . . .” Here in Africa . . . all remains unchanged . . . as yet, but those who look in on us . . . make analyses of theoretical origin without the substance of practical experience, and naturally, their findings continually vary.

It has to be accepted today that we live in a world that knows no boundaries and that here, on this, the last continent of the world, we also will encounter the death struggle of many an old-time ideal. Ideals that have to make way for new ideologies to keep pace with modern progress. And so, in the interim, social problems remain the same here as anywhere else. If objectors in England become troublesome and demonstrate against the law, the British police are as efficient in their method of control as are ours. In London, the source of trouble is removed even if it takes two men to one woman, and of course, we here who endeavour to emulate the positive correctness of England, would not be permitted to send a Commission to enquire into the apparent misdeeds exercised in the name of law and order. You see, we too are supplied with both photographic and verbal evidence through the columns of our press. But . . . that's how it is.

We, who are citizens of the Federation know the danger, the country's economic danger which lies in the mono-economy. We know that prior to Federation copper belonged to the North, tobacco to the south, and a bit of tea to Nyasaland, and of course, we are now in a position to acknowledge that we can very easily become a very certain power in the world of sugar and citrus, and further, we know that the hidden mineral wealth of this Federation cannot even be calculated. It is so vast! But experiences over the last few years have proved how important it is to make preparations to contend with the attendant effects of wildly fluctuating mineral markets, and of uncontrollable droughts affecting our agricultural calculations. We already know the effects of tightening belts, unemployment, bankruptcy and so on, and so we have become aware of the dire necessity to promote secondary industry to its fullest extent. We know that once we have established secondary industry equal in strength and value to our primary industries, the future of our people will be secure, they will be materially safe and content, and this state will bring in its wake peaceful reasoning, calculation and understanding. It is the lack of certain security material security that has bred restlessness and unhappiness . . . not Federation.

I recall immediately prior to Federation, Southern Rhodesia endeavoured to raise a £10 million loan. The underwriters were left . . . holding the issue. And immediately after Federation became a fact, a similar public loan was over-subscribed within ten minutes of the lists opening, with our present constitution in force. In force, because those on whose behalf you are today seeking information, not only approved and advised us on this constitution, but were in fact a party to it. And the success of this loan, furthermore, was a material indication that the outside world approved of Federation.

We in this Federation are complimentary to each other. The South needs the North, just as the North needs the South, and as both North and South need Nyasaland. We need each other to form that geographical block, where supplies for the greater part of Africa's markets can be manufactured in Africa for export to Africa. With our markets in order our politics will be right for politics don't make markets, rather do markets make politics.

If our markets are wrong, then a recent loan of some £x million to Haile Selassie, followed post-haste by some 600 Russian experts arriving to watch the correct handling of this investment from Addis Ababa . . . all nice and friendly, can and will in fact be a type of investment that will spread to other corners of this magnificent continent, the last continent whose untold wealth could cause it to become the battleground of the world's scavengers unless we in the Federation remain a Federation.

To remain a Federation, one important factor presents itself. We must develop that, which through its absence, has brought about a state of affairs resulting in your presence here . . . a strong solid African middle-class. In one five-year period, the outside has expected us to develop in our country that which has taken other . . . some six five-year plans. Even England had to experience her industrial revolution before she developed that asset. The first three years of our existence was devoted to tying up loose-ends which were the legacy to us from previous governments. Then came world confidence. Immigrants poured in . . . Strangers to our way of life . . . and a thousand and one difficulties had to be unravelled by our authorities. We were a new country with a new ideology . . . and the outside world sat in its comfortable armchair of uni-racial experience, deciding how we should solve our problems, without even setting foot in this country, where we have lived and died for sixty years and more, building a new nation in a new world.

If there is real racial difficulty here, then I say it has developed through the wholesale influx of "strangers" some thirty years too soon . . . those who are as yet uneducated to our mode of life . . . who have not lived in our multi-racial society . . . who cannot recognise the bewildered African frame of mind . . . that very African whom the world wants us to plunge, without preparation, into a specialised competition which control society today. A type of life he cannot yet handle or understand. Of course he'll be able to do that in the future. He's not a fool . . . but what right have we to inflict the responsibility of self-government on to a people who have not the protection of a strong middle class . . . A people who have really only one class . . . from which a very low percentage has yet emerged . . . Originally a warlike-agrarian people, who were not even able to invent for themselves anything as simple as a wheel.

Is the critical world asking the Federation to permit the development of dictatorship amongst our Africans . . . because only that can develop in a nation without a middle class! Does the world want us to permit this in order that our Africans should fail . . . in order that our Africans should plead for return to control . . . so that we can say to them . . . "it serves you right, you kicked us out, and if we return we'll call the tune". No true Rhodesian would agree to this. We think too much of our Africans. Or is it possible that the underlying principle of those who criticise would decide on any means to retain their own markets on this continent . . . markets that can become ours! Markets that will become ours!

I know the African as I know the Coloured, the Asian and European. I work with them all day and night. I know the African for whom I have suffered untold embarrassment, for whom I have bought a home, paid medical expenses, and who in turn repaid me by stealing several thousand pounds worth of goods! That very African who telephoned me a few months later to say that despite everything he is making amends and naming his new daughter after me! You might call him naive . . . I call him a thief! I also know the African who found me at the roadside one morning at 1.30 when my car let me down on a return trip from a case. The African who came to my assistance, repaired my car and followed me back to Salisbury, some twenty miles out of his way just to see that I had no further trouble. You may call him a fool . . . I call him a gentleman! I know the African who refused to do anything at all for anyone without being paid for his efforts . . . the African without the slightest vestige of generosity . . . but I also know the African group whom I put on to a stage, presenting them in a musical revue . . . when every penny of the proceeds went to two of their charities. In Ndola hospital recently I met the African whose little baby was receiving relief in the local hospital from expert medical people. The child's over-enlarged head was not reduced in size by the European, and so the baby was stolen out of the hospital to receive treatment from the tribal witch doctor. I go into their townships alone at night . . . rehearsing their form for stage presentations and I have seen how they behave on a stage intermingled in a cast comprising European, Coloured, Asian and themselves . . . I have seen the effects of culture as an equaliser!

I know those who are unable to understand the simple courtesy of keeping an appointment . . . but I also know those who will stand in the streaming rain to meet me. In this country I know them, I work with them, and understand that our weaknesses are theirs . . . but that our strengths could be theirs if properly handled.

We accept that we are a "push-button" nation. We accept we cannot even pretend to calculate the material value in terms of labour of our male domestic servants. But it must also be accepted that despite these factors the earning capacity of our African has, according to our statistics, increased far beyond the European.

That education offered them has likewise increased beyond that available to the European, and the same applies to medical services. But this point may and must be made clear. Our Africans are no different from any other uneducated people . . . any other peasant class . . . but it is only we who know how to educate them, we who live with them as they live with us . . . and to leave them to their own resources at this stage of their development would be the greatest cruelty possible . . . perhaps on a par with one of their own . . . now extinct customs . . . that of flinging a law breaker from a cliff to his death on the rocks below.

We, the Federation, have a duty to the whole of Africa. We are enacting the greatest experiment of modern time . . . and I sincerely appeal to the Commission to consider these recommendations, bearing in mind the following facts:—

- A. That as a young woman I lived in an African kraal for six solid months without seeing a European. I learnt to know the African, and I learnt to respect him.
- B. That I was born in England, but was brought up and educated in South Africa, which country I left to come here some nine years ago, because of its racial policy.
- C. That I have no material stake in the Federation, so that what I suggest can be of no material gain to myself.
- D. That I am the "man in the street" mixing with and working for the people in the street, and I know them.
- E. That I have no idea of politics, but am purely applying logic as I see it.

I suggest:—

1. That Federation must remain a fact with whatever modifications are found necessary by those who know. We know! May I bring to your notice that those who knew both here and overseas were all a party to the present constitution . . . and therefore I suggest . . .
2. Another five years, to be followed by a further five-year development plan, be instituted without delay.
3. That the Federation be induced to send a well-informed multi-racial selling panel into the outside investment world to attract capital for the promotion of large-scale industry. We are the last manufacturing country between ourselves and Europe, and a potential 200,000,000 market is ours for the taking.
4. That our Federal financial geniuses be strongly advised to be courageous and budget for deficits of some £44 million rather than struggle through credit squeezes and suchlike . . . to obtain a pitiful £2 million surplus. A deficit of £44 million would establish the credit-worthiness of the country. £2 million surplus could never do that.
5. That the Federation throws its doors wide open to wholesale but selected immigration. The age of specialisation is here, and we need specialists in this country where we already boast world-famous inventions.
6. That the African citizens of this Federation be encouraged in our pattern of partnership, but that everyone must accept the natural immediate reaction of emancipation . . . which is abuse. That's a fact that has repeated itself time and again. Why . . . even when we women first achieved the power to vote, a necessary qualification was a background of being chained to a fence . . . and the ability to sustain a hunger strike. Today . . . we merely go to the polls, if it doesn't interfere in our daily routine.

7. That our African citizens are encouraged to make demands relative to their ability on a competitive basis. If their ability is not as evident as we would wish it . . . the deficiency be corrected with all speed through the compulsory education of the race. Naturally it will take some three decades to reach perfection . . . but it can be achieved . . . and the "rate for job" would be an automatic result.

8. That those powers watching the Federation, and hoping for a debacle, in order to control their own markets on this continent, be made to understand that Federation is here to stay, and that if internal disturbances should re-occur . . . it is purely progress, growing pains. But just as England through lack of understanding lost her American colonies, so she can lose her African possessions. We here respect the Englishman's claim that his home is his castle! . . . Our home is the Federation . . . We want the world to respect that claim!

9. That our African schools be induced to teach the future generation what the vote means, and how precious such an advantage is. That Governments be induced to permit this privilege only to those who can pass a relative means test. After all, even though I can read and write a little, I am not eligible for American citizenship until I pass a test, and if I pass that test, I am considered able to handle a vote.

10. That our African population be made to understand once and for all there is nothing new in nationalism . . . that nationalism is an old as Adam . . . but that our modern world calls for internationalism . . . and that is why we are here to stay!

11. That our African citizens be made aware of the dangerous influences that can be introduced by people who are strangers to us . . . even those who were born in the country . . . of African blood . . . who lose personal and lingual contact through living a lifetime in other countries, and then come back to yell "Kwacha" to a disturbed and innocent people . . . through interpreters.

12. That . . . perhaps more important than anything . . . is the protection the Federation offers Africans from inter-tribal attack. A like coloured skin does not make for national alliances. We have fought our own colour . . . China fought Japan . . . India did the same . . . and now we have the Congo!

I ask the Commission to call for evidence from those people who visited the Federation prior to 1953 . . . and have since revisited the country. Their decisions as to progress or retrogression would be of vital importance.

I further ask the Commission to bear in mind that we live here, right in the Federation. We are, rightly, proud pioneers of this new ideal. We don't have to "job" backwards . . . but would rather deal in "futures". If we have erred in the last five years, we will never repeat those errors (!).

We, the citizens of the Federation, consider ourselves a privileged people . . . participating in the making of modern history . . . and a component part of the Commonwealth.

With all goodwill, you can . . . as a Commission . . . advocate that we be given what Cecil Rhodes lacked . . . He said—"So much to do . . . such little time to do it in". Time is what the Federation and its people need.

Salisbury

Oral Evidence

THE WOMEN'S VOLUNTARY SERVICE OF CENTRAL AFRICA—Mrs. Z. Shearer, President

The witness stated that she had lived in Southern Rhodesia for nine years.

Mrs. Shearer read from her memorandum and made the following further points:—

1. The W.V.S. of Central Africa has 10,000 members, ready to be called upon only in the event of a national emergency. In that situation their role would be similar to that of the W.V.S. in the United Kingdom. While there is no emergency they have a different job from the W.V.S. in the United Kingdom.
2. She saw signs of the emergence of a strong African middle class. At present Northern Rhodesia (which she had visited) and Southern Rhodesia were on a par in this respect, but she had not seen the same progress in Nyasaland.
3. The organisation tried to encourage the spread of culture for two reasons. First as a form of occupation for youth to prevent delinquency. It had been impossible to get energetic support from African women until recently, when they had put on a musical show with their support.

In her analysis the support then given derived from a desire to receive applause, and she hoped that was so. They were also trying to give women some basic training for domestic service, but there had so far been little favourable reaction. She herself was opposed to the system of having male domestic servants. She also now saw strong evidence of the African woman progressing in the matter of her clothing, and she considered this psychologically important.

4. The Service was 100% voluntary, a full time service day and night. It constituted a heavy job. The staff were all European (they handled African and Coloured cases).
5. One of the objects was to teach the man in the street how to pay his debts.
6. Mrs. Shearer had said that "culture was an equaliser in a multi-racial community". How could this be squared with the Land Apportionment Act? She did not agree that the Europeans and Africans lived in different compartments. The majority were at liberty to select people with whom they would mix, and she saw a mutual desire of the races to visit each other. Culture could be spread if we could make the Africans understand that if we made an offer to help them there was nothing behind it but the desire to help. She distinguished culture from education, meaning the arts, which were international.
7. She found the term "partnership" difficult to interpret. She did not think that partnership had really yet come about because the African could not yet assume the European's responsibilities. The African would be as able as the European given the education. There was no limit of his educational potential, and she cited the examples of Bunche and Robeson. But Africa was the "last continent". If African women came forward with the right qualifications she would accept that as a true example of partnership.
8. She had concluded her statement by saying that the Federation needed time. She meant that it was too early to make any major changes. She did not object to criticisms of the Federation.
9. Asked if the time was opportune or not for the Africans to be given self-government in the Northern Territories, having regard to the political tides there, she replied that she could not answer as she had no knowledge of politics.
10. Her memorandum had laid emphasis on material advancement. Was that because of her lack of concern with politics? With material security there would be a rise in the standard of living, and hence a desire for culture and education. That would give rise to calm, clear understanding of affairs. Ten years was only a day in the building of a country. She had been in Northern Rhodesia recently, and she knew of the African demands there, but could not say whether they were right or wrong.
11. She knew that Africans were frustrated by the colour bar. She claimed to be ignorant of their being prevented entry to places of public entertainment. She herself put on shows multi-racially. But she agreed that she could not recall ever having seen an African in a cinema. She thought these prohibitions wrong.
12. On the assumption that the Africans in the Northern Territories did not want Federation, should they be held in by force, if necessary be shot? She would not like to see that.

She thought Federation was right, and that it should be maintained. She did not believe that Northern Rhodesian opposition would lead to war. It was necessary to keep Northern Rhodesia in the Federation, and also Nyasaland, which needed it very badly.

13. The rise of the African middle class could be fostered by the compulsory education of all up to the age of 18. That would be one of the reasons for having a £40m. deficit in the budget.
14. The Service was not getting co-operation from the Africans in its endeavours. There was wholesale suspicion. Although she had innumerable friends in Harare, she found it difficult to organise even so simple a thing as a play-reading. She had tried eight times recently to organise one, without success. The African attitude was always (i) Why are you doing this? (ii) Is there anything in this for us? And (iii) What is the message? She had tried hard to allay this suspicion. She agreed that it was difficult to induce the idea of reading for pleasure. She denied that they were asking Africans simply to simulate European culture. They were engaged in a search for the indigenous culture. She considered rock and roll a degenerate form of African dancing.

15. She mentioned four Africans who had composed beautiful indigenous music. She was hoping for one such member of the staff to go to America for a year's tuition, but he would be tied by contract to return for service in Central Africa.
16. She was against large-scale immigration, because new immigrants often displayed their ignorance and said unwise things. She was referring mainly to Italians and Portuguese.

1. A EUROPEAN RESIDENT OF SALISBURY*

2. MRS. SPILHAUS

The first witness stated that he was employed in a wholesaler's firm. Mrs. Spilhaus was concerned with family planning.

The first witness then made a statement. In this statement the expression "this country" meant the Federation as a whole.

He had been in the country for two years, after eleven years in South Africa, and before that, eight years in India. In all these three countries he saw the same problems being tackled in different ways.

Overseas the newspapers often linked this country with South Africa in regard to treatment of the blacks. (He explained that he would refer consistently to "blacks" and "whites").

He had come to this country in July, 1958. He knew it as the country of smiling faces. In the Union of South Africa there were no smiles. They had lost their sense of humour. He had noticed a marked change on coming to this country. People were free to say what they liked. There were smiling faces, both black and white. It was like coming out of a Police state to a free country. He felt that it was a young country going ahead, with everyone being looked after.

He then drew the following particular points of contrast between South Africa and the Federation:—

1. There were no shanty towns in the Federation. He had been through the African housing. It was excellent with good schools and playing fields. This was a great contrast to the Union where he had seen the shanty towns. They were just sheds or shacks thrown together out of old petrol tins and the like. The shacks were not waterproof, and had no sanitation, and were flooded out in winter. Conditions were shocking.
2. The attitude of the Police was quite different in the two countries. Union Policemen had no time for the blacks. If a black was caught without a pass he was manhandled. Blacks were manhandled on the slightest provocation. He had seen slightly-drunken blacks thrown into a van and the door shut on one of their hands.
3. There were no vicious Police raids in the Federation.
4. No black prisoners were killed whilst awaiting trial. Instances of this were sometimes published in South Africa. He had no doubt that others were hushed up.
5. There was no forced farm labour in the Federation. This was the Union system of farmers taking over black prisoners. The circumstances were often bad. The blacks were often tortured and sometimes killed.
6. In the Federation there were no repressive laws which could send a black back to his birthplace after twenty years or more without having committed any crime. He knew an example of a hotel servant in Somerville West who had been sent back thus to his birthplace after twenty years.
7. There was freedom in the Federation for a black to choose his place of work. This was not so in the Union.
8. In the mines in the Union there was no family accommodation. This was a big point. In the Union the black was looked on as a bird of passage in the white areas. He could not buy land, or bring his family to his place of employment.
9. In the Federation blacks were represented by their own Members of Parliament.
10. In the Federation there was freedom of speech. A man might say what he liked, while even whites in the Union had to take care otherwise a man could be named as a communist. The Act which provided for this was also made retrospective.

For himself he had no strong political views. He had been brought up to the Federation on a normal transfer and not to escape from South Africa. He had not in fact wanted to come.

He thought that the Europeans had done much for the Africans. The British post-war settlers in the Federation had been energetic and go ahead. They had made this a thriving country out of apparent jungle. In addition to building the beautiful cities of Bulawayo and Salisbury, there were good roads and all the amenities of civilisation. They had also looked after the Africans. There were beautiful African townships with good flats and agreeable hostels. There was also good schooling. There were excellent, free hospital services, for instance in the African hospitals at Harari and Mpilol. There almost seemed to be a colour bar against the whites if anyone were to inspect the Salisbury General Hospital. There were subsidised bus services for the blacks. There were excellent sports facilities. The blacks were free to take on any job—there was no reservation of jobs as in the Union.

He listed some of the problems which faced Europeans in their dealings with Africans. He agreed that there were a few white nationalists. But the average white settler wanted to advance the blacks, although without lowering his own standards of living. But to a large extent it was an economic question and not a political one. In any business you could not pay a man more than he was worth. He thought that the real contact between blacks and whites in the country had only taken place since the last war. When the Europeans were first in contact with the blacks they had found that cannibalism was still practised in the country—it was occasionally reported in the papers. There was also witchcraft and the influential witch doctors. This was the mentality which the Europeans had to educate.

Compared with the Union the Africans were, however, less well developed physically. There used to be much malaria, sleeping sickness and bilharzia. Malaria was now under control. Sleeping sickness was confined to the Zambesi Valley and was generally under control. The biggest problem in the country was bilharzia, which was increasing. There was little that Government could do about it: to eradicate it would cost millions of pounds. It was a problem for the Europeans because bilharzia was carried through Africans urinating in streams or lakes. Only by education could the problem be solved.

Another problem was that a large number of blacks were polygamous. They knew little or nothing about birth control. Their families were large, possibly of eight or ten children. Hence there was a tendency for their standard of living to fall.

A further difficulty was the vicious anti-white propaganda put out by self-seeking blacks, who saw themselves as future presidents of future black states. This was only based on self interest.

Finally, there had been gross distortions by overseas newspapers. The best example of this was the outcome of the Southern Commission in Nyasaland.

In his opinion the whites had also in various ways fallen down on the problem:

1. There was a lack of counter-propaganda against the anti-white propaganda which he had mentioned above. It was not enough to do good; one must also appear to do good.
2. There were too many Commissions and this caused unrest. He thought that what was wanted was less publicity and more hard work.
3. Everyone was forgetting the conditions before the whites came into the country—the tribal wars, the raids, the women stealing, and the prevalence of disease. The whites had not made sure that these facts were taught in African schools.
4. Whites and blacks sometimes failed to get on well together in this country.

Mrs. Spilhaus said that she did not want to be involved in politics. But she had been persuaded to come to give evidence. She had visited many African homes and talked with many African men and women. She had no connection with either the municipality or the churches. Her aim was to try to put over the idea of planned families and responsible parenthood. Over half of the Africans would not have anything to do with this idea, but the more advanced were becoming interested. It was a purely voluntary matter. But with the high mortality rate in the country, the birth rate was going up, and in consequence the standard of living was going down. The Africans were beginning to accept the idea that the notion was being put to them in an altruistic spirit. The difficulty was that Africans were full of good intentions, and were willing to start on committees, but not to go on with them. She was anxious to get committees going so as to be able to work not for but with Africans. But after a few meetings they always tended to drop out. They had not realised how much hard and tedious work would be involved, and when they did they simply did not turn up again. One African had told her that this was because there were only a few of them trying to do too much.

She herself thought that everyone needed patience. She had met few people who wanted to keep the Africans down. They all knew that the Africans were not paid enough money. But there was an economic balance to be considered, and she thought that the Government was doing its best. Many Europeans were now becoming genuinely interested in the welfare of the Africans. Many of her women friends were now prepared to help her. She thought that the time had not yet come for black self-government. The Africans had not yet enough background to cope with the heavy responsibilities of Government.

Her work was in affiliation to the International Planned Parenthood Association in London. Only about ten women such as herself were doing this work in the Federation. The work was going much better in Bulawayo, where there was a much better African Affairs Department and a better Medical Officer of Health in the municipality.

The questions were addressed mainly to Mrs. Spilhaus who, in reply, made the following points:—

1. She had come from South Africa. In the last few years she had seen a definite breakdown in the colour bar. There was a much pleasanter relationship between Europeans and Africans than five years ago. (Perhaps that was because her own white hair caused Africans to respect her). But she would say that there had been a steady improvement. The difficulty was always to get over the first stage. But she thought the Africans had fundamentally the same sort of ideas as the Europeans, and were affected by the same sort of domestic troubles.
2. In her work she did not experience much opposition from the Catholics, and none from any other church.
3. Her association dealt primarily with women, although the men were more evolved. She talked to African men, but never to the men and women together. The ideas she was putting across were new ones for the Africans, and against their mores. They believed in large families.
4. Education generally should be brought on as fast as possible. Advanced Africans, such as doctors, should be brought into Government. She herself was not against the blacks, and felt that black government was inevitable eventually. But it would have to be based on ability.
5. She did not know that in the Southern Rhodesian Parliament there was no African. She thought they ought to have them in Parliament.
6. She agreed that the basic problem was the emancipation of African women. She was hoping to be able to send an African woman of 30 to the United Kingdom for special training in social science, including the family planning course. When this African woman returned she would be able to assist in talking to African women about birth control. She greatly hoped that this woman would help to put the idea over to African women.

Memorandum

I intend to give oral evidence to the Monckton Commission when it visits Salisbury, Southern Rhodesia.

M. W. MUGADZA

I wish to propose that the Commission recommend:—

1. Easing of the Federal Voting qualifications.
2. The establishment of one educational system for all people of the Federation, irrespective of their colour.
3. Abolition of colour bar in public places.

Salisbury

14th January 1960

Oral Evidence

M. W. MUGADZA—Head clerk, Federation Furnishers, Salisbury.

The witness said that he had been born in Southern Rhodesia and schooled to Standard VI in Que Que. He had subsequently taken correspondence courses, and obtained his Junior Certificate, also a diploma for accounting and auditing. He was now taking his G.C.E. and had passed in two subjects. He had been in his present job for the last four years.

The witness stated that he had three points to make:—

1. The Federal Government should be able to legislate against the colour bar in public places in Southern Rhodesia.
2. African education should be a Federal subject.
3. The Federal franchise should be amended.

As regards (1), the witness said he had in mind hotels, restaurants, bars, etc. Federal legislation on this subject should override any conflicting Territorial legislation. The right of admission on social grounds should be preserved.

As regards (2), all people should be educated at the same pace. At present European children had to start their education at five years of age. African children started at seven years of age, and were able to refuse to go to school. This suggested that the education system was organised on a racial basis.

As regards (3), the witness said that the qualification should be Standard VI without any property or monetary qualification. The original qualifications were Standard VI and £20 per month. They were now Standard VI and £60 a month. The witness questioned whether this change was really due to inflation. It was rather designed to protect white nationals, and was causing widespread dissatisfaction, since the Africans knew that they would not get a vote for some time to come. The Federal Government must be a government by all people for all the people of the Federation.

Asked whether the reference to "one educational system" in his memorandum was intended to refer to multi-racial schools, the witness stated that he had no objection to multi-racial education on a voluntary basis, but that he was primarily concerned that there should be a single system with a single curriculum. He would not be in favour of all education being a Territorial subject, even if Africans got the same education as Europeans.

Asked whether he thought that the Federal Government should be required to legislate against the colour bar, the witness said that it should pass such legislation, and that this obligation should be enshrined in the constitution. There had been some improvement as regards the colour bar in recent years, and this, in the view of the witness, was due to influence from the northern Territories. Asked if he believed in the continuation of Federation, the witness said he would be sorry if it went. Formerly Africans had no Members of Parliament; but there were now Africans in the Federal Assembly. He thought that the qualifications he had suggested for the Federal franchise should also be applied in Southern Rhodesia. Asked whether he thought there should be any other safeguards against discrimination in the Federal Constitution (apart from his own suggestions about the colour bar), the witness said that the best safeguard would be an extension of the vote. As regards the European minority which might one day exist, the witness thought that the safeguard should be something along the lines of the African Affairs Board, but with more powers.

R. HORRELL

Mr. Horrell said that he had come from a modest upbringing in a working class family in the United Kingdom. After several years in the army in India and the Middle East, he had qualified as a chartered surveyor and had been in Southern Rhodesia for eight years. He wished to make it clear that he was giving his impressions of Southern Rhodesia, not necessarily factual evidence about it.

His first impression of the Federation was that Africa had not achieved any advance in civilisation comparable with the older civilisations in Asia and the Middle East, even though they had been in some contact with civilisation for several hundred years. Such civilisation as there was had been brought by missionaries and wise entrepreneurs. Otherwise the country remained basically primitive. For this reason, control must remain for a considerable time in white hands. Although many Europeans were inefficient, their general standards were much higher than those of the African. Technologically, moreover, the African was a very long way behind the European; it was significant that there were no African architects or civil engineers at the present time.

The witness made the following additional points in answer to questions:

- (a) To divide the Federation on Dominion Party lines was not in the interests of the Federation as a whole; it would particularly be to the disadvantage of the smaller Territories.
- (b) Development must be slow and steady. If advancement were too rapid, it would inevitably break down; the present policy in the Belgian Congo was self-extinction rather than self-determination.
- (c) Government must remain in civilised hands; this meant in hands strong enough to take a full part in world affairs and be able to defend the Territory against external aggression.
- (d) In preparing Africans for self-government, politics should be taught first at the local government level. For example, control of African townships should be put into African hands immediately. In the rural areas, Native Commissioners should be retained until they had worked themselves out of a job.
- (e) The African peoples should be told clearly what the implications of breaking up Federation would be. For example, they must realise that if Nyasaland withdrew from Federation, Nyasaland labour might have to be returned to their homes from Southern Rhodesia.
- (f) The witness recognised that extremist opinion often showed what was on the other side of the street. For this reason it was of considerable value and must be put into proper perspective. Such opinion should, however, be given only limited representation in Government, not full control.

R. M. MORTIMER

The witness said that he had come to Nyasaland from German East Africa in 1919, and had been in the Ncheu district until 1938 when he had moved to Southern Rhodesia. Although he had been a tobacco grower for forty years, he was now an estate agent dealing with farm property. He regarded himself as liberal minded.

The witness said that he had very friendly feelings towards Nyasaland, and would be very sad if it decided to leave the Federation. This would be greatly to its financial disadvantage. Overcrowding in Nyasaland was largely due to the numbers coming in from Portuguese East Africa to avoid forced labour. Nyasaland Africans themselves provided a large part of the farm labour force in Southern Rhodesia.

It was difficult to obtain a straight answer from Africans as to why they supported Dr. Banda, or whether they wanted to remain in the Federation. Not all the Africans he spoke to supported Banda. Many thought on the contrary, that he had come from England only to stir up trouble. There was a great need for Africans to take a larger part in the conduct of affairs; but in order to do this they must be educated.

Africans in Southern Rhodesia were in many cases dissatisfied with Federation. The Southern Rhodesia Land Apportionment Act should be amended to give more land to Africans. He personally would be in favour of areas in which Africans could sell their land to Europeans. Meanwhile, it was a fact that not all European land was fully used. There were a number of European areas where more land could be made available for African farming. Nevertheless, there were very few Africans at the present time who could afford an average farm of say 2,000 acres, even undeveloped land cost on an average between £2 10s. to £6 an acre.

K. J. C. FOX

Mr. Fox said that he had been born in India and had come to Natal. He had been educated at Sidara Agricultural College. He had come to Nyasaland in 1927 where he had been engaged mainly as a tobacco farmer. Subsequently he had grown tobacco in Southern Rhodesia, where he was Chairman of the Turkish Tobacco Growers' Association. The witness said that the Federation's only hope of success was as a multi-racial state. This demanded that there should be sufficient Europeans to make it work. He had left Nyasaland because it was very difficult to make a living there. At the time he left there were only 37 tobacco farmers out of 600 who had been there in 1927. The Malawi Congress Party was the logical successor of the Zinyaw Secret Society which had demonstrated that intimidation could take place without interference from the authorities. Such a stage had now been reached when no African dared open his mouth unless he were a member of Congress.

Southern Rhodesia had made great progress since the war. The price of tobacco had been going up and up, and, for the first time, the price of maize had risen in line with world prices.

Further advancement now depended on the availability of capital. There was still room in Native Purchase Areas for perhaps 12,000 African farmers owning 200 to 300 acres each. 5,000 such farms had already been allocated. The difficulty was that it took a capital of some £8,000 to build up an efficient farm of that size, and Africans found it difficult to raise that amount of money. What was necessary now was to supply capital and know-how, and this could only be done by Europeans who had faith in the future of Southern Rhodesia.

There would be no future happiness for the Territory unless Europeans and Africans lived and worked together, one helping the other. The establishment of a black state in Nyasaland would only give happiness to a very few. It was significant that all the main leaders in Nyasaland came from the Tonga tribe; they were clever and had a lot of pride and a lot of guts, but they also were difficult to work with, and tended to become agitators. If the Territory was to develop, law and order must prevail; the country could not be left to bands of brigands. At the present time everybody in Nyasaland was affected by intimidation: the police, government officials and the ordinary man. If this was to be rectified, it was necessary to show that intimidation did not pay. The Chiefs could do a lot to improve the position if they had their old authority restored to them.
