Mr. Selkirk said he had been educated in England and served in East Africa and Burma during the war. He had been in the Federation since 1948, and had a family of six children. He was aged thirty-six and his occupation was that of interviewer and recommender in the personnel selection field.

Mr. Selkirk said that the burden of his comment was on the question of the United Kingdom connection. He thought that English practices were no doubt sound in the United Kingdom but they were not in tune with the situation in the Federation. He said that the only freedom of the individual was the freedom of conscience and human dignity, and that liberty of the subject was something best guarded by people of conscience who were backed by basic independence.

The United Kingdom was in the fortunate position of having a wealth of human talent to call upon; but the position in the Federation was just the reverse. The Federation was a large but poor country with very little human wealth. It was understandable that the indigenous population should want a voice in the government of the country, and that it should feel the need to be recognised. He thought that in the Federation the electorate tended to be narrow-minded, and this was something that probably arose from the trend of a new country to grow very much faster than its human element.

The witness thought that the problem in the Federation in a nutshell was one of fear, a universal fear borne by all living here, and that to get over this it would be necessary to have some sort of Privy Council for the Federation. This was a body that would oversee any projected legislation, take up discriminatory legislation at an early stage, bring to an end all existing discriminatory acts and it would advise on the Royal Assent. It was a body which would be above politics, and one that could even represent the interests of the unborn. Today any elected assembly merely represents the current population. The Privy Council he had suggested was a body that would hold all the powers at present reserved to the United Kingdom Government. Indeed, it would be a form of star chamber comprising the Governor-General, Chiefs, Bishops, Judges, Privy Councillors, etc. It would thus be self-appointed or oligarchic in character, although it would be within the power of the government of the day to suggest nominations to it, but the body itself would elect its own personnel. It was not intended that the body should be democratically elected. Mr. Selkirk said that the African Affairs Board had been tried, but had been found wanting. What he had suggested would provide a very much better solution to many of the ills of the Federation. It would remove the fears that the indigenous population had of a legislative body elected by the popular vote.

In answer to a question Mr. Selkirk said he had no doubt that various proposals had been put forward to the Commission; his was another one, although there was no existing example of it, but equally there was no problem such as that obtaining in the Federation elsewhere. His Privy Council was nearer to the sovereign power than the House of Lords was. The reason he disposed of the idea of something akin to the House of Lords was that there was no justification in having a body representing landed and other interests.

MemorandumH. REEDMAN*1. Introduction

Very simply I wish to put before the Commission a scheme which will provide for complete adult suffrage, together with a progressive selection of able men in order to provide a Best Man Government

Both Franchise and Government will be non-racial, non-sectarian and non-party.

I enclose herewith various papers* which illustrate the arguments for this and the machinery to put the scheme into effect.

I have not indulged in compromise in establishing the principles of the scheme, but realise that compromise will be necessary in achieving the machinery. This I would like to deal with more fully in oral evidence.

I trust that, as a former Member of Parliament, I may have the privilege of discussion on this fundamentally important matter which, once settled, will ensure a spirit of co-operation and friendliness between the races in the Federation.

2. Evidence

That rule by Caucus is not Democratic rule.

That adult suffrage should be put in its proper perspective.

That in Democratic Countries the thinking and the unthinking have equal voting powers.

That by pressure of World opinion we will have absolute adult suffrage here, either immediately or by the progressive moves of appeasement by Governments.

That much more important than adult suffrage is the system of selection of Candidates for Parliament.

That with a system involving minimum qualifications and progressive selection leading to the election of a "Best Man" Government, we will have nothing to fear from adult suffrage, but we will ensure a Best Man, Non-Party, Non-Racial Government for all time.

That Rhodes's dictum of "Equal rights for civilised men" is as sound today as when he said it.

* Not reproduced.

That we need only be afraid of the future if (a) we are spineless, (b) we allow ourselves to continue to be governed by Caucus.

That alone of all published policies the policy of a Non-Racial, Non-Party, Best Man Government is scrupulously honest.

That neither Dr. Verwoerd, Mr. Macmillan nor Garfield Todd could deny the soundness of my scheme.

That you, Sir, are seeking the answer to the problem of how disparate races can live together in amity.

That history will not help you, but that history will be made if we look deep down to the fundamentals of this problem.

That this problem came about firstly, through the advent of Christianity to this once wholly barbaric country, and, secondly, through the adventures of empire builders.

That each of these forces, blest by Her Majesty's Government has had the effect of detribalising the indigenous peoples and encouraging people, previously held in utter subjection by their own leaders, to become individuals in their own right.

That a return to black demagogism would be the meanest trick we could play on these people.

That we can evolve a system of Government suitable to this unique product of civilising influences, which will take into account the further evolution, not only of the black man, but of the white man and all other races.

No race will or can stand still in this process of evolution.

We are already an integrated community of complementary parts, not one part is less essential than the others.

That there is only one sound system of legislation—that it shall be fundamentally Non-Racial (not multi-racial).

That there shall be equal opportunity for all irrespective of race.

That no one race will be in a position to assert itself over the others and that fear between races will entirely fall away.

This, Lord Monckton, is what I and my colleagues of the Electoral Reform group will ask you to closely consider.

We will be forthright but not hysterical since hysteria is not necessary to our cause, but we will ask you to consider the present lunatic set up which has been bequeathed to us by the Mother of Parliaments.

We have inherited Party Politics which provides a quinquennial crisis in the affairs of the British people, does little harm to the phlegmatic British race but never any good.

We will show that the Party system bequeathed us by our Mother Parliament, is now not merely outdated but relies for its continuance on the division of peoples. This organised division of thought has laid a pattern which has developed into division of thought on racial lines.

Party politics is the evil behind our racial problems—while the European engages in this lunatic process of government by Caucus, we can expect no equilibrium between the races and you, Sir, I submit, cannot advise liberation from our maternal legislator until we show we have a pattern for Government which will have lasting value.

It is up to us to put the case and the solution and the Electoral Reform Group promises to do this without subterfuge or self-seeking.

To my fellow Rhodesians I would say—forget the Party cry for Dominion Status, this will not solve your day to day problems any more than did the achievement of Federation.

Let us instead, achieve between us common ground and commonsense, and we will not need the carrot of Dominion Status dangling before us.

Annexure to Memorandum by H. Reedman

The Reedman Scheme—

"Proposed Electoral Reform to provide Adult Suffrage with Responsible Government"

Introduction 11th April 1960

In submitting my scheme, I have pondered on the best means of presentation since in private and platform discussion I am frequently asked a question which makes it clear that the fundamentals of my scheme have not been understood—such as—"If you were to seek nomination alongside of your cookboy, would he not receive most votes by virtue of his numerical superiority by race?"

I have therefore set out in graphical form the substance of my scheme together with a reprint of various papers I have published from time to time, which I trust will further illuminate my plan for sound, honest Government. Some reiteration results, but my hope is that the theme will establish the new reasoning I claim is necessary in our unique problem.

I show a schedule of occupations of present Members of Parliament and what the "spread" of knowledge and ability should be in a Best Man Government.

I include a population table indicating when a Black National Government would take over under the present franchise and/or with the reasonable and unavoidable demands for the franchise under the present system. I also show the incidence of an immigration scheme related to 10% of the standing European population.

The scheme generally is shown on the "Tree" indicating the progression from the family unit with its voting powers to the Prime Minister, who is appointed directly as a result of the voters' choice of Councillors and then on to the Executive and finally Parliament.

After more than 3 years' study of this problem, inside and outside the House, after argument and analysis with many of the best brains in the country, I believe the scheme I put forward is sound and if adopted will bring in the best form of Government and freedom from racial and related problems for all time.

Way to free Federation of fear and political disharmony

There is a wonderful future in Central Africa for all races and for every individual, subject to one condition—the elimination of fear. I claim this can be eliminated with the introduction of certain honest-to-goodness legislation, the passing of which will need the ultimate in courage and self-sacrifice by certain people, but the end result will deserve the illumination of our Federal maximum—"Let us deserve to be great."

Let us forget "1960" and party hecklings and deal with this one problem after which all other problems would fall into proper perspective. Our basic fear is related to the franchise. The Electoral Act is trusted by no one.

In the Southern Rhodesia House debate on the Electoral Act I protested at the method of relating white votes to black votes, which was devised to maintain an overwhelming majority of white votes. That was neither democratic nor fair. If you wish to override a section of the public, exclude him altogether, don't bait him.

That was a measure of the time being, but what do we anticipate in the future? A continual clamour for adult suffrage as the cornerstone of the democratic system we brought to this country. Can we refuse it?

Not attracted

Now, no one will dispute the fact that the selection of candidates is even less scientific than the voting system. There are men who would make first-class parliamentarians, Cabinet Ministers and leaders of the nation, who are in no way attracted to politics, but these are the people who could be relied on for sound judgment.

Now let us dovetail adult suffrage with the election of sound and proved candidates to a Government of the People by the People, with no fear of suppression by a minority race or oppression by a majority race—not merely for today, but for all time.

Whoever you are, you have a vote providing you have an occupation and you will vote for the leader of your trade or profession who, having become the leader as chairman or president, will function as such and be next in line as the representative of your trade or profession in Parliament. Every such leader will become your Member of Parliament and, as such, you will elect him carefully. He will be well-skilled, he will be the best of you and cannot reach such a position except by having become extremely proficient.

Consider the improvement in Parliament when every Member is a potential Minister, each exceptionally skilled in his own studies but, being a leader, will have a general knowledge of so many other subjects. There would be no dull debates and no party nonsense.

Country before party

However difficult we may find it to cast aside convention and do something intelligent, let us do this thing. Let us turn to our present leaders and say: "We will help to establish sincerity in Government, we will put country before party, we will give every aid and not resort to mischief. We will build a foundation of trust in Central Africa that not all the theorists together can break; we shall be strong within because we shall be right. We can examine our methods with anyone and we shall be fair because the system will be fair."

This scheme would give you proved and able men, and their successors would be, too, so that the best material is there for the choice of Prime Minister and Cabinet. There will be men of vast experience for the specialised studies of Select Committees and Members who will be available full-time to serve the electorate irrespective of Constituency boundaries.

My scheme is based on proportional representation through trades and professions related to the Census of Occupations.

Everyone will have a vote and he will not be required to vote for a party but for particular people who understand his day-to-day problems.

Qualifications

Qualifications for Members of Parliament: Previously held position as President or Leader of his Section.

Qualification as President: Previously been Member of Executive of his Section.

Qualification as Council Member: Elected to serve as Councillor by majority vote and holding position of either executive in administration or Foreman.

Voting would be part of a progression resolving in the election of a M.P. through stages. A prospective candidate is therefore proved at various levels which gives him experience in Council and Executive work, later as President which automatically elevates him to Parliament.

The current President would be a Member of Parliament elect and would be ready and able to step into his place as M.P. as soon as such position was vacant, but the sitting Member would stay in Parliament until either he chose to retire or his section appointed his successor.

This would provide continuity of Parliament without recourse to unnecessary changes in Cabinet, but would provide each Section with powers to withdraw their Member subject to certain safeguards which would provide against parochial or sectional control of a Cabinet Member.

Conclusion

There is today unwarranted fear of the future and there is no case for complete trust in any one person to allay such fear. We may very well have an excellent pilot but what is the state of the craft? I put it to you that the only prime fear there is related to future control of the country.

Shall it be by a majority, irrespective of right and in face of demands by Russia, America and our own kinsmen in the United Kingdom, and shall we forever be open to "inspired" advice and denunciation from the varying crusaders using racialism as an advertisement for their particular sects?

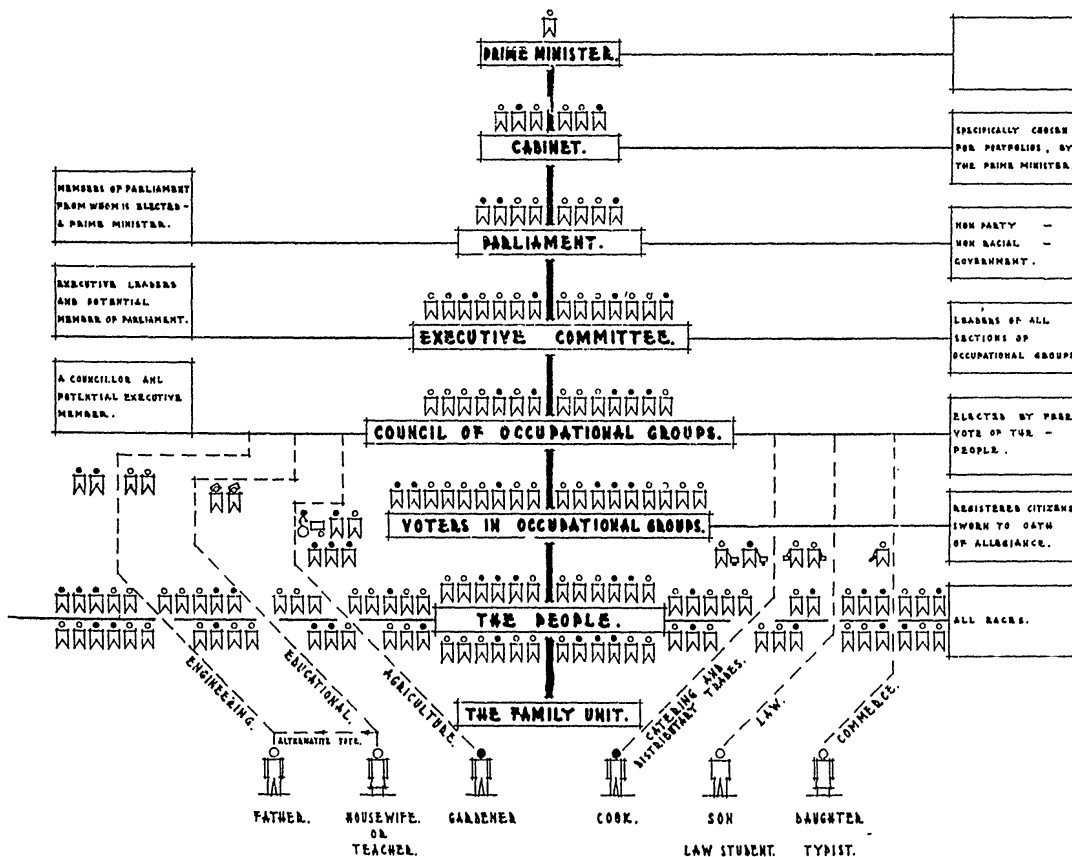

No, we can do better than this. We can legislate with complete honesty and ensure the basic principles of democracy and with our unique problems we must be basic. We must ensure that what we do today is going to be sound tomorrow and indeed for all time.

If we have established a truth it will always be true, whereas a device will in time lose its purpose and we will be proved to have been wrong and not having taken thought for the future. Our problem is unique; there is no similarity in history.

In Table I above the breakdown of occupations is related to:—

7th September 1959

How we exhort the voter to attach more credence to what we have to say than the other Candidates. We cannot be modest—somehow we must convince him that we, the disciple of such and such a Party, are his salvation. By and large this is indecent.

We must advertise our answers to problems not yet discovered. We may talk on the rights of certain classes of the public, but there are few who are brave enough to declaim on what is fair for all. And when he has said it—can he do it?

Is it not better to ensure having the best brains and proved ability of men with sufficient variety of calling to ensure that whatever problem is brought forward some Members will have intimate knowledge. We cannot have better than the best of us and this is what I promise in my scheme. Not to give judgment in advance of the evidence but to be able to deal with the evidence and comprehend it as and when required.

The field of the Voter—what is to be? Is he required to read Hansard to see what the sitting Member did in the previous Parliament, is he to scrutinise the background of the new Candidate or will he ignore both and adjust his sights to the Leader of each Party and declare either for the Government or against it?

I put it to you that the plight of the Voter is a real one—he can only guess and hope and whatever study he has made he has no assurance that his Party will put up a good performance—he has every reason to be apathetic.

Have you thought of what our problem would be if we had no racial problem—almost everything falls at the size of the racial problem—and yet our kinsmen in other countries would say their problems are many and acute—we have these, too, added to racialism!

These varied and manifold problems can only be dealt with by having as Members a cross-section of men trained in all walks of life. How do we get them?

Let the Voter choose his man—someone likely to do him the most good and understand his main problems—to ensure his full employment. Let him choose the best of his own people—someone already proved as a leader—someone who has done something for him already—has bettered his working conditions, established benevolent schemes and so on.

Let this be his field. Politics will not then be such a puzzle, will not savour of chicanery, will not require hysteria, but will be everyday politics as our problems are everyday.

Voters should have some power to replace their Member if he puts up a bad performance whereas, presently, he can be absolutely useless and get away with it until the next quinquennial crisis and even then be returned if he is lucky enough to be with the popular Party. You can say with every justification—This is not good enough. Party politics has failed.

My system takes no account of devices to prevent any race achieving a majority of votes—it does not need to. Cecil Rhodes' maxim will do for me—“Equal rights for civilised men”. Let the leaders climb to the top by their own initiative, but with the support of their fellows, not by wagon-jumping or intrigue. This will sort the wheat from the chaff and only the best will get there.

In pursuing the field of the Voter, I have first involuntarily secured the ultimate in the study—the best and most suitable Member, which establishes a valuable point—a study of one without the other is impossible and yet on today's set-up the two are entirely separate. There is indeed no legislation determining the qualification of the Candidate apart from the fact that he must be a voter and has not been caught in any criminal act!

To pursue the initial study. I am asked—“What about weight of numbers—will not the larger body of the unskilled outvote the skilled in the nomination of the Leader-cum-Member of Parliament?”

In answering this we should consider the moral before the machinery. It is morally sound that weight of numbers should out-manoevre the minority intelligentsia or the labourer the craftsman? By any standards the answer must be no.

With the moral established it is now a matter of machinery. I have made the point that your Member is elected purely on ability and leadership with no discrimination as to colour or race. As Member elect he would be the Chairman or President of his Association. Previously he would have served as a senior executive.

The executive is voted from the Association Council. Councillors are voted into office on proven technical or administrative ability.

The Council will be invested with certain powers, but primarily to deal with conciliation within its Trade, Industry or Profession—certain matters will be resolved with the further adjudication of the Executive—certain matters will be dealt with solely by the Executive.

The field of the Voter therefore is to elect his Councillors as and when vacancies occur. Councillors and Executive officers will elect Executive Officers as vacancies occur and the Executive will elect its President, who will automatically become Member of Parliament for his Association on a vacancy being declared.

In this way we elect a leader from amongst ourselves, which must be surely more democratic than any existing system, but, of course, is the usual method in other walks of life.

The President of the B.M.A. is not voted into office by passers-by. The Chairman of the B.S.A. Company is elected by his fellows—some content to serve as Executive without thought or wish to become President—others content to wait for opportunity to take the Chair.

This is the system I recommend to you—complete adult suffrage with a Best Man Government without fear of the future and an opportunity for everyone to progress according to his ability.

The resulting attitude of people and state of mind will be genuine liberalism with no fear of—are we going too far or too fast?

Man's morals are eroded through fear and anxiety. Everyone with whom I speak admits to the feeling of uncertainty as to the future. Not one race is happy with the present set-up.

We should now abandon fear and hypocrisy and legislate for the future in complete honesty of purpose. I shall work for this ceaselessly, whatever the cost, and look to each and every citizen to give calm consideration to this scheme with the object of putting new legislation forward in the very near future, to ensure the good will of all people in working to that bright future and prosperity which is ours by every right.

12th February 1960

1. Liberalism signifies tolerance, liberty, generosity and, in politics, progressive reform—largeness of mind and view.

Liberalism is presently being stifled through fear of the liberals themselves being swamped by the masses they have educated.

2. Every Political Party claims to be liberal in some degree, but wishes to preserve its own particular brand and so avoid identity with other Parties.

3. It is this schism, brough about by Party Politics, which has accentuated what might be called common differences in opinion, fostering the difference rather than resolving.

4. It is inevitable that such differences should find the greatest harvest in racial distinctions, leading finally to Nationalism. This, in fact, is our present position.

5. I claim that the cause of this diseased state of mind is Party Politics. Party Politics, therefore, cannot be said to be the cure for the disease—neither one Party nor another.

6. Whether we like it or not we have a multi-racial set-up and to continue to live together closely or loosely there must be harmony.

7. This harmony can be brought about by providing equal opportunity for everyone irrespective of race, to create for himself and his family a better living. So much has been done in this direction already; if agitators would leave well alone this progression would continue, but Political Parties rely for their survival by and through their skilled agitators, whose main exercise is not to see their opponent's point of view.

8. Inequality of opportunity is the main plank of friction between races and whilst this can be pinpointed people who would never take an opportunity offered now shelter behind the lack of opportunity which they say exists.

9. It is a feature of human nature that what should be of first importance—opportunity to earn a better living—is overlooked or considered secondary to the cry for one man one vote. Universal suffrage, it may be thought, will smooth out all other problems.

10. If this has become of first importance, then the problem must be dealt with, not, however, as an isolated study, but together with the study of good Government.

11. Leadership in the Armed Forces, in Medicine, in Science, in Industry, in Education, is by those proved and worthy to lead. Such choice of leadership is accepted in the Professions and Industry, but equally necessary is it that our Legislators are chosen for their competence and worthiness.

Leaders must not be self-chosen or installed by ballot among Party Leaders or for excessive contribution to Party Funds or other such arrangement.

12. Our study, therefore, is to couple the desire of the masses for adult suffrage with the necessity of the masses for good Government.

13. Adult suffrage, proportional representation, Councils for occupational groups and a Non-Party Best Man Government form a mosaic, a cohesive pattern.

14. Each group by occupation will elect its Council to deal with domestic matters related to its Industry or Profession. The cream of such Council progresses to the Executive of such Group, from which is selected its President, who, in turn, becomes a Member of Parliament.

15. The Elected Leaders, as Members of Parliament, elect their Leader, who will become Prime Minister and who will then choose his Cabinet. (The Cabinet could be elected by Members—the one to receive the highest number of votes to be Prime Minister.)

16. This Parliament, for ability, would be unique—each Member capable of taking a Portfolio. No time wasted in Party manoeuvre, but every effort directed towards sound legislation.

17. All Bills, Budget proposals and Motions would be subject to full and free debate and vote and division without fear of the fall of Government or censure of Member.

18. The result of such Government would be to eliminate racial strife and to continually examine and eliminate causes for discord until fairness was an accepted attitude of mind.

19. Fairness is a science—Judges practise it—it can only be practised by those skilled in mind and experience. Let us have the Best; we cannot manage or survive with less.

20. From the example of such sound and honest Government a pattern would be set for other States and Countries in Africa and abroad.

P.S.—We cannot look to Dominion Status to put our House in order. We must first put our House in order before seeking Adult Status.

Oral Evidence

H. REEDMAN

Mr. Reedman had produced a memorandum, and associated documents. He stated that he had once been a Member of the Southern Rhodesian Parliament in the time of Mr. Garfield Todd. It was at that time that he had first taken up the serious study of the franchise problem, on the lines indicated in his memorandum. He took the Party through his memorandum and explained a number of points, particularly relating to the tables and graphs in the centre of the document. He produced the following additional explanation of the graph:—

1. The figures shown were from statistics supplied by the Central African Statistical Office.

2. Figures of European Voters were calculated on 30% of the European population registered as voters. This percentage was from figures supplied by the above department.

In one graph the voting total was based on population + natural increase only. The other indicated voting strength based on population + 2% natural increase and 10% immigration.

3. African voting figures were also based on statistics obtained from The Central African Statistical Office and were calculated on present trends. For example, in 1956 there were 560 voters and in February 1960 there were 2,200 (4 times the 1956 total). This upward proportional increase would level off in time, but this was not expected to occur for the next 20 years because of the increasing number of Africans who were receiving education.

He also answered some questions to clarify a number of points; but indicated that his views were fully expressed in the memorandum taken as a whole.

Memorandum

L. TUCKER

During the life of the Northern Rhodesia Legislative Council previous to the present one, I was a Member and also a Member of the Federal Party. Since then I have taken no active part in Party politics but wish to put forward certain independent views of my own.

I believe firmly in the Federal concept and in the partnership approach to the multi-racial problems of this territory.

One of the matters requiring the most careful attention during the transition stage to political maturity is the question of proper representation for those who are not yet equipped to take part through the normal political machinery and franchise.

Unfortunately, the trend during early years of Federation in the political sphere has been the strengthening of racial divisions and deterioration rather than progress towards the objective, of a non-racial approach to politics.

To quote one example, I should like to refer to African colleagues who served with me during the time I was in Legislative Council. In the early years there was will on their part to work with the Europeans but later there was a gradual withdrawal and a growing bitterness towards the Federal set-up. This coincided with political developments outside the Council and in my opinion some of the main contributing factors to this were:

Happenings in other parts of Africa. A growing feeling that the Colonial Office was the protector of Africans and the Federal Government (and in particular the Federal Prime Minister) the protector of Europeans. At political meetings, politicians were obliged to pander to the feelings of the electorate, which includes Africans in such small numbers as to give them negligible influence. African advancement appears to have gone forward very slowly with considerable resistance at every turn, both as regards employment and in the removal of discriminatory practices. The approach generally appears to have been unsympathetic and, although much has been accomplished, there is no doubt that African opinion has not been conditioned to give credit for this. The handling of the Federal Franchise and Constitution when the House was enlarged had a particularly harsh effect on African opinion. What I might call "bickering" in Parliament on racial matters has also had a marked effect.

One of the major necessities, as far as the Federal Government is concerned, is that there should be substantial changes to give Africans a greater influence. The Northern Rhodesian Franchise offers a general pattern that might well be followed with advantage.

I feel that it is essential at this stage not to lower the ordinary qualifications for voting because I think it is necessary to be able to ensure that Government could not come under the control of those not yet suitably equipped to handle a very complex situation in the best interests of all concerned.

It is particularly necessary to avoid racialism gaining control in Government at a time when a non-racial approach to politics, though desirable, is as yet a long way from being established. I do, however, feel that it is very necessary to introduce temporary measures which will give Africans a wider influence on the representation in Parliament while their numbers qualifying for the ordinary voters' roll are so limited.

I believe that the original concept of Federation which, in my mind, was to work towards more subjects coming under the control of Federal Government with consequent lowering of the status of the Territorial Governments—will have to be reconsidered. I now feel that it should be the aim to have permanently strong Territorial Governments responsible, as far as possible, for all matters which affect the people i.e., the human aspects, and that the Federal scheme should be modified along these lines.

I firmly believe that success in Northern Rhodesia is a prerequisite to the implementation of a non-racial approach to politics and a proper implementation of a reasonable partnership within the Federation. I feel that if Northern Rhodesia as a territory fails to accomplish this, the position could not be reversed by the Federal authorities. It is therefore particularly important in my mind to move from the Federal Government as far as possible the stigma of having a controlling influence over the territories.

It is obvious that the United Kingdom Government will have lasting responsibilities, particularly in the Northern territories, and that as time goes on it will prove necessary to have the strongest possible links with the United Kingdom. However, I feel very strongly that these links must be only those which are essential—and that the move towards complete local autonomy, with only certain matters reserved—should be the urgent objective.

In order to remove one of the very strong objections to Colonial Office remote control, I should like to suggest that a Board of an advisory nature should be set up to operate in the Federation with representatives from the United Kingdom, from each of the territories, and from the Federation. It would have the responsibility of keeping a "watching brief" and reporting to the Governments concerned (in some cases a Territorial Government and the United Kingdom Government; and in other cases possibly the Federal Government and United Kingdom Government, and so on). Their reports would be made with the object of bringing independent, objective opinion to the attention of all concerned, upon Constitutional matters and other items falling within the reserved list. This would naturally include discriminatory legislation based upon race alone.

Representation on this Board should specifically exclude Members of any of the Parliaments or Legislative Councils, or any politicians holding office in a political organisation. It should be non-racial with men chosen particularly for wide experience in various spheres of activity and with a Judge or ex-Judge as Chairman. The appointment of the various Members might be from a variety of sources. The Members should retire by rotation so that there will be continuity and no complete change-overs.

This body should normally sit in private. Reports should be unanimous if possible, although including pros and cons in addition to recommendations. The machinery should be set up so that action or legislation within the prescribed field might be temporarily delayed for a not unreasonable period, to give time for a Report to be prepared and considered by the Governments concerned. This suggestion would not, of course, preclude having an Upper House in one or more of the Governments.

Government-sponsored development will require considerable expansion in the vast, undeveloped areas. Members may have seen the type of development which has been started in the North-Eastern Province of Northern Rhodesia. It seems necessary to increase the tempo of this type of work and expand it into other parts of the territories.

This places a great responsibility on the Territorial Governments and also a great financial burden, but I believe that it will have quick and lasting benefits on the political situation and might well help to save this most vital outpost of the Commonwealth for democracy.

Another matter which in my opinion requires very much greater attention is "public relations". We have not only to improve conditions in the Federation but let be known that the improvements are occurring. The benefits of Federation must be sold, like any other product.

Earlier in this submission I mentioned that quick progress towards local autonomy should take place. The time for disturbing the present Northern Rhodesian Constitution might not be right now, because of its recent origin, but nevertheless action should not be unduly delayed when it is decided that it would benefit the territory. More responsibility could be granted without major consequential changes.

I feel that at the next Revision, nominated Members should disappear and Civil Servants should be drastically reduced in the Northern Rhodesia Council. I do feel, however, that there will be need for some key men to remain as they are so much more in touch with the rural areas and have a vast fund of experience in these areas.

One of the worst evils that has developed out of the recent trends is a type of professional African politician, having no other interests whatever and living on the fruits of agitation. In fact, I think the only way to counter this is to show that the only chance of influencing Government decisions is from the inside, and the only chance of political advancement for individuals is in Government.

I should like to repeat that I feel the strongest possible link with the United Kingdom will be needed even more as we progress, to counter the severe strains which are bound to occur during the period of transition. It will be needed to preserve the stability with-out which the tempo of advancement in the economic sphere would slow down to a disastrous degree.

In conclusion I should like to suggest that serious consideration be given to the merits of a permanent Federal type of link between United Kingdom, and the Federation (and possibly some other Commonwealth states in Africa).

This course would seem to offer great prospects for the removal of racial fears and the creation of stability and strength.

The proposed advisory Board might be the start and Federation at a high level of limited special subjects the ultimate goal.

Mr. Tucker said that he wished to highlight the need to make changes in the Federal Constitution with the aim of giving Africans greater influence. If possible, a racial pattern of representation should be avoided. Africans did not regard their present representation in the Federal Assembly as satisfactory. Those members who had been added when the size of the Assembly was increased had, by belonging to particular political parties, decreased the real representation of Africans in the Assembly.

There was a case for varying the form of African representation as between the three Territories. At present, the system whereby Africans were returned to the Northern Rhodesia Assembly was fairer than that under the Federal system. This was a pointer to the need to turn away from purely racial representation.

In answer to questions, Mr. Tucker made the following additional points:

- (a) In any amended form of Federal association, the economic links should be retained but at the same time the political links should be weakened. It was not possible or desirable to get rid of the political links altogether.
- (b) It was desirable to return some of the functions of government to the Territories—in particular, the split between European and African education was not natural and led to the perpetuation of differences in policy. With regard to health, the arguments were more open. The training of nurses might well have been carried out better on a Territorial basis.
- (c) It was inevitable that in the Territories to the north of the Federation, African control would take place in the immediate future; in South Africa, white domination could be expected to continue. Thus, two worlds met in the Federation and it was vitally important that the Federal concept should survive, even though this might be difficult.
- (d) Partnership was implemented more genuinely in Northern Rhodesia than in Southern Rhodesia. But if Southern Rhodesia failed to establish a true multi-racial community, the rest of the Federation would fail.
- (e) On the economic side Federal control should move from the field of taxation alone towards a more direct control of spending. Financial stability was of supreme interest to the Federal Government and the borrowing power must remain Federal. The Federal Government must be in a position to regulate effectively the economic activity of the Federation as a whole.
- (f) If the Federal Government wished to discharge fewer functions, they could either keep a smaller share of the total taxation or reduce income tax and allow a greater margin for the Territorial surcharge. The Federal tax code should be uniform throughout the three Territories and should be sufficient to cover Federal expenditure plus a Federal pool for distribution to the Territories. This would enable development between the three Territories to be evened up.

Memorandum

W. J. and I. V. SAMPSON—Registered Voters, Salisbury South Constituency

A. Introduction

We do not feel that a case has been made out for dismemberment of the federation, although we sympathise with those who, in exasperation or despair, wish to dismember it. We consider that the last six years, a time when vigorous attempts should have been made to get inter-racial partnership and co-operation, have been largely wasted.

For economic reasons we consider that the three territories should remain associated; indeed we hope that in time other territories may join in our association. We are not, however, satisfied with the present federal system and we later propose two alternative forms of association. Nor are we satisfied with other aspects, in particular the colour bar, the restrictive franchise, the tribal/chiefly system and the distribution of the national fiscus.

Members of the Commission may ask what is our motive or reason for giving evidence. Our reason is probably stronger than that of almost any other individuals. We intend to remain in Rhodesia and we hope that all or most of our six children will choose to remain. One of us was born here and the other has spent thirteen years in Africa, of which over ten have been in Southern Rhodesia and we hope that all or most of our six children will of us works for a prominent company with interests in all three territories, but particularly in Northern Rhodesia.

B. The Situation in the Federation

Part One: Brief Historical Review

The immediate post-war period, from 1946–1953, was one of rapid economic advance in all the three territories now comprising the federation. This advance has continued since federation though at a rather slower rate. The slowing down is probably due more to world than to local economic conditions.

Economically federation has benefited all three territories by virtue of the fact that a broadening of the economic base has dampened down the effect, particularly in taxation revenue, of fluctuations in world commodity prices. This is not to say that some other form of association, e.g. unitary government of Rhodesia and Nyasaland or a federation of Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland and Tanganyika might not have had a similar effect.

Nyasaland has benefited financially from federation, to the extent of about £2.8 million p.a. in current revenue and about £1 million p.a. in official capital. Unfortunately not much of this benefit has reached Nyasaland's African people in terms of increased real earnings. Between 1954 and 1958 African real personal income (money plus subsistence) per head only increased by about 4% or by an average of only 1% p.a.

There has been little, if any, improvement in race relations since federation and in some respects relations have worsened, culminating in emergency. This we discuss in greater detail below (see part four).

In the period since our federation the doctrine "that economic advance must precede political advance", favoured by Sir Roy Welensky, has been shown to be disastrous to our neighbour, the Belgian Congo. In Tanganyika, a poor country, political advance is apparently successfully preceding economic, whilst South Africa, where non-Europeans have had some economic advance but no political, is one of the world's unhappiest countries.

Since 1953 little has been done except in Southern Rhodesia (Land Husbandry Act) to break down the archaic and backward tribal/chiefly system. This we blame on the Colonial Office.

The division of revenue between the federal and territorial governments has worked unfairly. The federal government gets, relative to its responsibilities and to the total fiscus, too much and the territorial governments too little.

The federal constitution has been clumsy in its operation and has led to inefficiency in government, wrong allocation of priorities, buck-passing, lack of co-ordination and so on.

Part Two: Partnership

The preamble to the federal constitution includes the words "and in particular would foster partnership and co-operation between their inhabitants".

None of the political parties in the federation has officially defined the word "partnership." According to the Oxford English Dictionary the word essentially involves association, sharing, participation and/or partaking. The O.E.D.'s commercial definition of "partner" is "one who is associated with another or others in the carrying on of some business, the expenses, profits and losses of which he proportionately bears". In normal commercial practice voting power is also proportionate and partnership essentially implies agreement between partners. In commercial practice a dissatisfied partner can leave the partnership if he so wished.

The present situation in the federation, and more particularly in Southern Rhodesia, is one in which the essential elements of partnership—association, sharing and agreement—are largely absent. Association between individuals of different races is discouraged and/or prevented, in many cases with legal support, by the colour bar (see part three on colour bar below). Sharing of economic benefits is weighted in favour of Europeans who are in many cases over-paid by world standards and job-content criteria, whilst Africans are under-paid. Sharing of the benefits of governments, which in nearly all the countries of the world is based on equality of treatment between individuals, is also weighted in favour of Europeans, e.g. in education. Agreement between our partners is poor, hence the recent emergencies.

Amongst individuals (i.e. excluding companies etc.) Africans' contribution to federal nett domestic output in the money and subsistence economy is 47% and this figure is an under-valuation because wages are valued at actual, that is at under-paid rates. On this basis, that of a commercial partnership, Africans should have at least 47% of voting strength—this they do not have.

We consider that partnership cannot be said to have been properly attained until (a) the colour bar has gone, (b) there is a more equitable distribution of government revenue (e.g. in education) and (c) wage-rates are related to productivity and job-content and not to race.

Part Three: The Colour Bar

Rhodesia is a good country to live in. The main drawbacks are racialism and the colour bar. Racialism will not disappear until the colour bar has gone, since it is largely the colour bar that is responsible for race-group identification on the part of Africans. No country can progress far whilst a large section of its labours under a serious sense of grievance.

The colour bar causes economic distortions; these distortions are particularly associated with the dual sense of values. In general, economic distortions and a brake on progress are inherent in any rigid social system. One has only to recall the economic advances which followed the break-down of the pre-revolutionary French social system, or the disappearance of the petty German princedoms, to realise the advance that will follow the removal of the colour bar and also of the tribal system.

We accept the judgment of the United States Supreme Court to the effect that facilities described as "separate but equal" never are equal. In practice in the Federation separate facilities are usually very unequal. It follows that racial segregation of any sort is discriminatory and constitutes in itself a denial of the concept of partnership.

In 1953, at the time of federation, there was a rigid colour bar in Southern Rhodesia approaching that of South Africa. In Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland the position was less severe; indeed in Nyasaland the bar was to some extent economic rather than racial.

The colour bar is applied most severely against Africans; Asians and Coloureds occupy an intermediate position. The appendix shows in simplified tabular form the extent of colour bar, both official and customary, in late 1959, in the federation and also for comparative purposes in South Africa. The following table has been derived from the appendix by an arbitrary system of points and weights; it shows the slow rate of progress made in removal of colour bar during the six years since federation.

With the coming of federation, the responsibility for the removal of the colour bar became divided. At present the federal constitution enforces segregation in two fields, agriculture and education; division of responsibility federal for non-African, territorial for African) for education other than higher education is an example of serious racial discrimination—what makes the situation worse is that it is enforced by the constitution. This is an obvious anomaly which the Commission must recommend to be removed.

Table: Extent of Colour Bar

	1953 %	1959 %	Eventual elimination at 1953-59 Rate Year
Asians and Coloureds
S. Rhodesia	51	45	2005
N. Rhodesia	41	27	1973
Nyasaland	30	18	1968
S. Africa	72	76	Never
Africans
S. Rhodesia	79	74	2050
N. Rhodesia	63	56	2006
Nyasaland	34	21	1969
S. Africa	85	86	Never

In the federal field little progress has been made in the removal of the colour bar in spite of all the United Federal Party propaganda that has been put out. Indeed in two federal spheres the colour bar has intensified since 1953; these are:

- (a) Non-European immigration.
- (b) Deportation of persons sympathetic to aspirations of non-Europeans.

Racial discrimination has remained virtually unchanged since 1953 in the following federal spheres:

- (a) Non-African Primary and Secondary Government Schools. Asian and Coloured children are still segregated from European ones in separate government schools. This has been stated both by the Minister of Education and by the (at the time) Acting Secretary for Education as being a political and not a technical matter.
- (b) Defence. Segregation by units; job allocation by race; different scales of pay and allowances for different races.
- (c) Job Reservation in Rhodesia Railways (this is currently under review).
- (d) Government Hospitals. Segregation by race.

In only four federal spheres has racial discrimination been completely or virtually removed since 1953: public counters of Post Offices, treatment of diplomats, the university (other than agricultural colleges) and air travel. In certain other spheres there is still a large measure of discrimination although there has been some improvement. The present position in these is:

- (a) Federal Public Service. European new entrants are automatically accepted into the higher paid branch one, whilst non-Europeans with similar qualifications have to undergo a probationary period in the lower paid branch two. Few promotions from branch two to branch one have in fact been made. This is a strong grievance amongst teachers and nurses. The only exception to our knowledge is that of qualified doctors, who are accepted into branch one irrespective of race.
- (b) Rhodesia Railways.
 - (i) In railway restaurants non-Europeans have to produce a first or second class ticket to get service, whilst Europeans do not.
 - (ii) Sleeper accommodation is normally segregated by race, i.e. an African travelling first-class will not normally be booked in the same compartment as a European.
- (c) Non-African Teacher-training. Asian and Coloured students now attend the same college as Europeans, but they are still segregated residentially.

The reasons for the slow rate of progress in removing the colour bar in the federal field are clear. They are:

- (i) Of the twelve federal ministers and parliamentary secretaries, six (Welensky, Eastwood, Greenfield, Owen, Coldberg and l'Ange) are segregationist, four are moderate and only two are liberal.
- (ii) 44 of the 59 federal seats are "ordinary" seats elected by general voters only; special voters, the majority of whom are Africans, have no voice in these 44 seats. The Africans, although 96% of federal population, only form 2% of the general roll.
- (iii) On the general roll segregationist Europeans outnumber non-Europeans. The government party, therefore, pays more attention to the views of the former than of the latter. It is significant that territorially in N. Rhodesia, where the non-European vote approaches parity with the segregationist vote, government is making faster progress in removing the colour bar.

Sir Roy Welensky has claimed in a reply to criticism by Roman Catholic bishops, to the effect that he has no electoral mandate to move fast in removing the colour bar. This is partially true, although the electoral results for the federal general election suggest that he is exaggerating. However, the partial lack of mandate is largely due to the United Federal Party's own action in drawing up the federal franchise which is so restrictive. The exclusion of special voters from any voice in ordinary seats was done by the United Federal Party. The partial lack of mandate therefore follows from the United Federal Party's own actions and cannot be pleaded as an excuse for slow removal of the colour bar in the federal field.

In the territorial field, and also in the local government field subject to territorial law, there has been some, but not much, progress in removal of the colour bar, with the exception of N. Rhodesia. In Southern Rhodesia there are certain laws that are reminiscent of barbaric or feudal days, or alternatively of war-time occupation of an enemy country; these include:

- (a) Pass laws and regulations.
- (b) Immorality and Indecency Suppression Act.
- (c) Restrictions on movements (e.g. of non-Africans visiting friends in African areas).

Certain other Southern Rhodesian laws, although discriminatory and therefore immoral, are not barbaric in themselves but are made barbaric by the rigidity of their application; an example is the Land Apportionment Act.

The reason for the continued existence in Southern Rhodesia of barbaric laws and practices and for the slow rate of progress in removing the colour bar lies quite simply in the restrictive franchise; segregationists, although comparatively few in population, outnumber non-Europeans on the voters' roll. The governing party hence pays more attention to the former than to the latter.

Part Four: Race Relations.

Race relations in the federation cannot be described by any other word than poor. There are several reasons why this should be so; most include the element of fear. As we see them, the reasons are:

1. The colour bar is resented by non-Europeans.
2. Many Europeans consider Africans non-human or sub-human.
3. Nyasaland Africans, aware from working there of conditions in South Africa and Southern Rhodesia, are afraid of any northward extension of apartheid. Statements by pro-federationists at the 1953 S. Rhodesia referendum such as "we want to kick the munts around in the North the same as we do here" and "we don't want a Gold Coast on our doorstep" did nothing to allay this fear. Nor now do (a) reactionary public statements by D. P. and U.F.P. leaders, (b) the fact that the U.F.P. is the governing party both in Southern Rhodesia and federally, nor (c) European outcries at siting of African suburban facilities.
4. Many Europeans come from South Africa and retain the traditional South African attitude.
5. Africans are afraid of losing their land. This fear is exaggerated under present conditions, although there are sound historical reasons for it. It seems likely that present removal of all land restrictions would result in a greater movement of Africans into present rural European areas than vice versa.
6. Europeans have invested large sums of capital in the country and are afraid of losing it, e.g. as in Indonesia.
7. Early atrocities by both Europeans and Africans have caused resentments on both sides amongst older people.
8. The survival of tribalism means that sexual customs, particularly around the age of puberty, vary widely as between Europeans and the more primitive African. The former are therefore afraid for their daughters. The remedy however does not lie in racial restrictions but in the abolition of tribalism and in the spread of education and religion.

Race consciousness is not inborn: young children have little or none. It is instilled into children by race-conscious parents and neighbours and also by the practice of school and residential segregation. It is this intense race consciousness or race-group identification that is the curse of Rhodesia, as also of South Africa. The remedy to this curse lies in the removal of all racial discrimination (including all forms of segregation) and in the stressing of national unity at all levels of government, education and journalism. Some short word, acceptable to all, must be found to identify and unite inhabitants of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, similar to the word Brazilian for an inhabitant of Brazil of whatever race. The words "European", "African", "Asian", "Coloured", etc., must be stricken from the official vocabulary as soon as possible.

Part Five: Education.

Non-Africans number about 4% and Africans 96% of federal population. In spite of this total government expenditure on non-African education is more than that on African. This disparity can be shown in another way, in the proportion of school-age children that go to school. If we take the normal needs of a child in an industrial society—and Rhodesia and Nyasaland must expand industrially to avoid stagnation—as extending to form four or school certificate standard, we find that in 1957/8 the proportion "actual of normal need" was:

Table: Percentage School Enrolment of School-age Children, K.G.—Form IV

S. Rhodesia:	Europeans (1957)	96%
	Asians and Coloureds (1957)	84%
	Africans (1958)	52%
N. Rhodesia:	Africans (1958)	38%
Nyasaland:	Africans (1958)	37%

The African position is a big improvement on the past, particularly in S. Rhodesia, but it still falls far short of normal need. Universal education can be a big strain on the resources of an under-developed country, but we believe that the federation is strong enough economically to take this strain and to educate all children through to form four. Indeed in the long run the country cannot afford not to do so.

Government expenditure per pupil is roughly ten times greater for Europeans than for Africans though the inclusion of mission funds might roughly halve this proportion. Government obviously could not yet afford to spend as much per head on all pupils as it now does on European ones. We suggest that the following as a suitable interim method until government can afford it.

We suggest that all schools be desegregated forthwith. There shall be two classes of school, one fee-paying (corresponding to present European government schools, charging, say, ten pounds per term primary and fifteen pounds secondary) and one free (corresponding to present African schools). Any member of any race shall be entitled to send his children to either class of school. At the same time the system of charging income-tax on individuals should be altered to give much greater relief to families with children. The present rebate system does not conform with the taxation canon "each according to his ability to pay" and we suggest its substitution by an abatement and family-unit system.

Finally we consider that the federal education department is inefficient, though this may well be partly a legacy from Southern Rhodesian administration. There is a marked tendency for headmasters and teachers who do not make a success in schools through poor discipline or teaching ability to move Parkinson-wise to posts as school inspectors and senior administrative officers (e.g. teachers involved in murder case at Enkeldoorn School). The poor quality of administration is particularly evident in the schools inspectorate and in school attendance.

C. Our Recommendations

Part One: The Franchise

1. The key to the whole political future of Rhodesia and Nyasaland lies in the franchise.
2. We feel that although democracy is not a perfect political system, no other system is as good.
3. We dislike the system of "voting by Symbol" and therefore feel that the ability to read and write, i.e. literacy, must be a voting qualification. Literacy in English is not, however, an essential. We consider that completion of primary education is prima facie evidence of literacy. Persons with less education should undergo a simple literacy test in any language in use in Rhodesia or Nyasaland. We recommend the rapid spread of education so that all become literate.
4. We dislike the present practice of an economic qualification; it is particularly unfair on account of the dual wage structure.
5. We do not have strong views on the minimum age for the vote, but think 21 reasonable.
6. We consider that the geographical qualification for the vote should be birth in Rhodesia and Nyasaland, or, if born outside, citizenship.
7. We have no strong views on the exclusion of lunatics, bankrupts, convicted criminals, etc.
8. We feel that the receipt of government assistance (e.g. social welfare rations or funds) should not be a disqualification.
9. We feel that the local government franchise should be open to all parliamentary voters living in the local government areas concerned; we dislike property qualifications. In the term "local government" we include municipalities, town and village management boards, road councils, I.C.A. committees, native councils (which we dislike as at present constituted because they are restricted as to race and often as to sex, etc.).

10. We dislike all forms of special representation such as special seats, nominated seats, dual rolls, racial rolls, etc. We also dislike the idea of an upper or lower house.

We therefore recommend for all forms of government (a) universal adult literate franchise, (b) common roll with no special seats, and (c) one legislature only.

Part Two: The Form of Government.

We have two main proposals as to the form of government. Our first preference is for unitary government. We feel that with a wide franchise (e.g. our suggestion of universal adult literate franchise) unitary government is workable. Our main reasons for supporting unitary government are:

- (a) It is more efficient than a federal system with its division of responsibilities and difficulties of co-ordination.
- (b) It is financially and fiscally more equitable.
- (c) It is simpler.

Our second choice is of a federal or high commission system, also with wide franchise, in which (i) government is mainly territorial apart from research, marketing and external subjects, and (ii) the distribution of the total fiscus between territories is largely related to population. Other subjects should become federal, high commission or administered by a joint public corporation provided each and every territory agree.

The two recommended forms of government are examined in greater detail below (parts three and four).

Finally we do not think that the present Federation should be split. On the contrary, we think that other countries (e.g. Bechuanaland, South-West Africa, Swaziland, Tanganyika) should be allowed to enter. However we feel that a much greater measure of partnership and co-operation is called for than has been shown so far either by the United Federal Party or by African nationalists.

Part Three: Unitary Government

The concept of unitary government is so simple that there is little need to elaborate on it. We therefore discuss the transitional arrangements.

For a limited period (say ten years) the legislature would have power to legislate for each present territory separately, with the proviso that at the end of that period all laws and regulations that were not nation-wide should automatically lapse unless specifically re-enacted.

The prevailing system of law should be English Law. For a period (say ten years) Roman-Dutch law in Southern Rhodesia would be residual, but after that period it would lapse completely apart from contracts arising before unitary government.

The legislature would have the power to delegate legislation, or regulation, to local government or public bodies, with the right to over-ride, supervise and review any delegated legislation or regulation.

Parliament should be elected at regular intervals; the salary of ministers, parliamentary secretaries and members should be high enough to attract top-calibre men (say £10,000 p.a. for prime minister, £6,000 for ministers, £4,000 for parliamentary secretaries and £3,000 for members). We suggest a legislature of about 60, excluding the speaker (who should not be a member).

The allocation of seats for the first unitary government election should be proportionate to total population in each territory. Within a period of between two and four years thereafter, and after every general election a delimitation commission should delimit constituencies on the basis of registered voters, with the proviso that for ten years or for two general elections (whichever shall be the longer) after the first unitary government general election, no constituency shall receive less than 60% and no present territory less than 80% of its total share based on population.

The unitary government should qualify for independence immediately after the first general election, from a common roll in which African voters on the roll are in the majority in not less than half the constituencies. On independence protectorate status in the two Northern Territories and the reservations in Southern Rhodesia's constitution would fall away. Until that time any unitary government legislation or regulation (even if delegated) would be subject to United Kingdom veto.

Part Four: Federal or High Commission Government

As mentioned above, our second choice, ranking below unitary government, is a federal or high commission system. There are many defects in the present system, including:

- (a) Racial split in government responsibility in agriculture and education.

- (b) Too much allocation of the subjects of a radically controversial nature to the federal government.
- (c) Unfair distribution of the total national fiscus.
- (d) Special seats in the legislature and the presence of the African Affairs Board.

We recommend:

1. That the territorial proportion of seats in the federal legislature shall be proportionate to the total population in each territory.
2. There shall be no special seats, dual rolls or special institutions such as the African Affairs Board.

In each territory registration as a territorial voter will automatically qualify one as a federal and as a local government voter; provided that a qualified voter in one territory who moves to another territory and is not qualified to vote in the latter, may for a time (say five years) remain as a federal postal voter in his former federal constituency.

We recommend that the territories by mutual agreement have identical franchise qualifications and our suggestion is a full adult literate franchise.

4. The federal legislature shall, under the constitution, be prohibited from passing any law or promulgating any regulation that discriminates between or segregates, either legally or in practical effect, individuals of different races. The ruling as to what constitutes racial discrimination or segregation shall be determined by the speaker or on appeal by the Federal Supreme Court.

5. No speaker nor member of either the federal or any territorial legislature shall be subject to any law of a discriminatory racial nature in any territory.

6. The following subjects shall be federal:

- External Affairs
- External and Internal Trade
- Business Law and Finance for commerce, insurance, building societies, banking, etc.
- Currency Issue and Credit Control
- Marketing of all products
- Immigration and Deportation
- Higher Education
- Air Transport
- Railways
- Trunk Roads
- Water Transport
- Customs and Excise
- Supreme Court
- Posts, Telegraphs, Telecommunications, Broadcasting and Television.

7. Certain subjects shall be concurrent though we recommend that administration shall be federal:

- Government Audit
- Statistics
- Information
- Tourist Development
- Research, Specialist, Co-ordinating and Advisory services (all subjects)
- Provision of Secretariat for joint inter-governmental committees, boards, etc.

8. All other subjects shall be territorial.

Note:—apart from marketing (federal) and services such as research (see concurrent list above), some subjects now wholly or partly federal will become territorial; the most important are education, agriculture, health and defence.

9. It shall be open at any time for a territorial responsibility to become either (a) a federal responsibility or (b) federally administered on behalf of territorial governments. The conditions for such change are (i) that suitable financial adjustments are agreed on, and (ii) that agreement as to the change is unanimous between the federal government and each and every territorial government and (as long as protection lasts under the constitution) the U.K. Government. Any territorial responsibility that becomes federal or federally administered may revert back to territorial control on due notice (say not less than two years) being given by any government.

10. Any two or more territories may agree to form inter-governmental committees, boards, corporations, commissions, etc., on which the federal government may also be represented.

11. There shall be no restriction on inter-territorial movement of persons with the permitted exception of convicted criminals. The term criminal shall in this context not include persons convicted of political offences or of any offence that is not substantially the same in all three territories (e.g. at present S. Rhodesia's Immorality and Indecency Suppression Act).

12. No person may be deported for any offence that is not substantially the same throughout the federation. Persons due to be deported or already deported shall have the right, under the constitution, of appeal to court.

13. We consider the role of defence forces is to protect the country from outside attack. It is not to support the civil power.

14. Finance and Taxation.

The federal government shall be responsible for raising basic income-tax, customs and excise revenue (less motor spirit duty) and if need be, export taxes. All other taxes and duties shall be territorial, apart from charges made for federal services rendered (e.g. publications bought, postage, etc.). Each territorial government may in addition charge a territorial surcharge on basic income-tax up to a maximum of 25%.

The revenue raised from basic income-tax, customs and excise duties (less motor spirit duty) and export taxes shall be divided between governments as follows:

- (a) A proportion necessary to provide federal services (see paragraphs six and seven above) with due regard to economy and good government; the proportion to be determined by a fiscal commission.
- (b) The balance shall be divided between the territories in proportion to the total de facto population in each territory.

15. External official borrowing shall be determined by a Loans Council consisting, as now, of the federal and territorial finance ministers or their representatives. The fiscal commission shall determine the proportion of external loans to be allocated to each territory in the absence of unanimous Loans Council agreement.

16. The maintenance of law and order and of all courts will remain territorial with the exception of the Federal Supreme Court. Federal law will be on the English and not the Roman-Dutch system.

17. A territory shall qualify for independence after the general election in which there is an African majority on the roll in not less than half the constituencies. The federation shall become independent when the last territory does so.

Oral Evidence

MR AND MRS. W. J. SAMPSON

The witnesses had produced a memorandum.

Mr. Sampson stated that he was employed as an Economics and Statistics Adviser to a large concern in Salisbury; but he was also permitted to do outside survey work and to engage in journalism. Mr. Sampson stated that he had been born in Southern Rhodesia.

In reply to questions on the memorandum Mr. Sampson, with his wife's concurrence, made the following points:

1. Section C of the memorandum Part I the franchise. As stated the franchise was the key to the situation. They suggested that what was required was universal adult literate franchise. They would remove entirely the present economic qualifications. For a start the dual wage structure in the country (for example differential pay of European and African bus drivers) made this kind of qualification grossly unfair. There was no point in it and it was simply a device to keep Africans off the Roll. But they were in favour of some educational qualification. A person should be able to read and write, so as to read the newspaper, but this might be in the vernacular, and need not necessarily be in English. The present franchise had been based on the Tredgold Commission, although modified. The modifications were there to try to get a balance between the Europeans and Africans. This scheme had not worked, except in Northern Rhodesia where it had in fact operated more fairly. For one thing, the principles of the Tredgold Commission had been largely maintained there, so that the special and ordinary voters could vote together; the Government had also made a drive to get the Africans to register. There was now, however, a tendency of the Government to study more closely the less privileged field of voters. He repeated that the economic qualifications were unnecessary, awkward to operate and unfair in any case. As to education, the present system should be modified. It should be sufficient to fill in a form, and to fill it in in the vernacular. If that person found difficulty in filling in the form, then some simple literary tests might be applied by the registering officer.

2. He was asked whether on the franchise envisaged, he would have any objection if it meant the Africans coming at once into power. He said that he would have none, but that for Southern Rhodesia he had calculated the likely figures for the next election. There could be 20,000 Africans qualified on that basis in the towns and say 30,000 altogether. There would still be 65,000 Europeans registered, so there would be no swamping of the Roll by Africans. He realised that there were 500,000 Africans now at school in Southern Rhodesia. But a person had to be 21. He had, therefore, calculated that an African majority would arrive, in any case, in 1975. He had no objection to that for Southern Rhodesia. His fear was not that of the swamping of the Roll by Africans, but of too slow a process leading to revolution as in South Africa.

3. He admitted that he had done little studying of conditions in Northern Rhodesia. But that Africans whom he knew in Southern Rhodesia were in general prepared to co-operate if given a fair chance. He agreed that in the Northern Territories there was a more militant type of African nationalism.

4. He did not agree with the form of Federation as it was at present. But he felt that there was difficulty in reconciling economic and political objectives. For example, Nyasaland was poor and could not afford even the necessary education for its people, and therefore it must have some form of help. There had been recent talk about help for Nyasaland coming from America or Britain, or even Russia. But it would be much simpler for that to be done in the Federation. There was the copper in Northern Rhodesia and the industry in Southern Rhodesia which should help to support Nyasaland. There was also the employment of Nyasalanders in Southern Rhodesia and Northern Rhodesia. If these countries drew their labour from Nyasaland, the Rhodesias should make some contribution towards Nyasaland.

5. He was not in favour of the Land Apportionment Act, and considered that it should be repealed.

6. Part Five—Education in the memorandum. They were in favour of the desegregation of schools. In reply to a question about the language difficulty, they pointed out that under the present system of segregation African children did not get the chance of learning to speak English properly. But they agreed that any such education programme must be gradual. It could certainly not be done in one year; for one thing the schools were just not there, nor the teachers, nor the equipment. But you could desegregate in principle forthwith, especially through the introduction of the fee paying principle. Asians and Coloureds could be desegregated immediately.

7. They considered that the colour bar could not be removed completely by legislation. The trouble was that the present legislation actually enforced colour bar—in Southern Rhodesia one had to observe colour bar whether one liked it or not.

8. The excuse of Sir Roy Welensky that he had no mandate to remove the colour bar quickly was only partially correct. If the franchise were changed in the manner in which it was suggested, it would be quite easy for him to get a mandate for the removal of the colour bar. But on the present franchise the United Federal Party were, of course, correct.

9. He was aware of the fears which existed that if the franchise were widened there might be a distinct swing to the Right. He did not think that would happen now since the troubles in South Africa. In 1958 the Dominion Party had had the best chance it had ever had or was likely to get. He had calculated that for the Dominion Party to get a majority in Southern Rhodesia, there would be needed a 12% swing in the voting, in comparison with the Federal elections. He thought they could get a 4% swing and adding to that 5% for the unknowns, that would make 9%, which would not be sufficient.

10. If there were a referendum in Southern Rhodesia on the Federation continuing on the present basis, he thought that the probable voting would be in favour, that is in favour of some form of Federation.

11. Calculating on an Electoral Roll of 65,000, he thought that the Dominion Party could get now 20,000 to 25,000 votes, that would not be enough for an electoral victory. He did not think that in any case there would be an election till April or May, 1961. New voters tended not to vote for the Dominion Party. They were mostly immigrants or Africans coming on to the Roll. Immigrants did not share the hatred of the Africans of the older settlers. The conservative element in the Dominion Party was not really growing very much. Recently it had been calculated 18,000 and it might now be 20,000. The United Federal Party and the Central African Party would tend to grow faster than the Dominion Party in respect of votes.

12. The time when it would be likely for an African to appear in the Southern Rhodesian Parliament depended on constituency delimitations. On the present basis an election next year would not produce such an African Member; but in 1966 he would expect to see two or even more, that is candidates and candidates elected. At the same time he did not expect the shape of political parties to remain constant—they had not done so in the past.

13. He referred to an article by himself in the Central African Examiner, about three weeks ago, forecasting that by 1975 the Africans would have a majority in the Southern Rhodesian electorate, on present qualifications, unless, of course, the Dominion Party first got into power. This was also on the assumption that the provision for the "cut off" at 20% of the "A" Roll would disappear.

14. They definitely preferred a unitary government for the sake of efficiency and they thought that the evidence of the Morton Commission on health confirmed this view. Also on the Southern Rhodesian side, there had been recent criticism of the Native Affairs Department.

15. Both the witnesses had formerly been civil servants. They considered that the general standards of government and administration had deteriorated since Federation.

Addendum to Oral Evidence submitting an article printed in the Central African Examiner entitled "The Voting Pattern in Southern Rhodesia. Bearers of Many Crosses", and a further memorandum on Electoral Prospects for a Southern Rhodesia General Election.

W. J. SAMPSON

This morning my wife and I gave oral evidence to the group headed by Lord Crathorne, our written evidence having previously been submitted in January. In the course of this morning's questioning I was asked my view on the future electoral development in Southern Rhodesia on the basis of the present franchise qualifications.

I gave my views verbally in summary form, but they are in fact based on two detailed statistical analyses I made recently. Copies of these are enclosed for the information of the Commission.

The longer-term analysis is based on research, carried out up to October last year. A condensed form of this was submitted to the Central African Examiner in October but was only published in March after some mutilation which made the article seem disjointed in places. This article was written before Sir Edgar Whitehead's announcement of an election in 1960 or 1961. (Annexure A).

My short-term analysis was made about a fortnight ago, shortly after Sir Edgar's announcement. The condensed form of this is given as Annexure B.

The Voting Pattern in Southern Rhodesia

By W. J. Sampson

Interesting changes have taken place recently in the composition of the voters' roll in Southern Rhodesia, and really important changes can be expected in the next ten years with the growth of the African electorate.

Between the Territorial election in June, 1958, and the Federal election in November, about 10,000 new voters, most of them European immigrants, came on to the roll in Southern Rhodesia. It is estimated, (Examiner, November 22, 1958), that 8,260 of these new voters used their vote, 6,440 voting UFP or Constitution and only 1,820 voting Dominion, Confederate or Independent. During the past year, the Territorial roll has increased by about 3,000 to a total electorate of 68,410 made up as shown in Table I.

From the table it can be seen that, contrary to popular belief, there are more Africans on the ordinary than on the special roll. Further, while the proportion of qualified Europeans registered is roughly what one would expect from past experience, that of the non-Europeans is low, with an unregistered potential of 22,000. An increase in the willingness of non-Europeans to register—a change that could happen in a fairly short period—could rapidly modify the composition of the electorate to such an extent that Party attitudes to race relations and the colour bar would be forced to change—as is already the case in Northern Rhodesia.

Difficulty of registration in rural areas is one explanation of the fact that only 12 per cent of Africans entitled to be on the roll have registered as voters. It is felt that many Africans are discouraged from registering as voters because they believe that once an African's name is put on the voters' roll, he becomes the target of salesmen of insurance policies and correspondence courses, who see good business prospects in Africans with comparatively high income and educational qualifications.

And the actual process of registration is easier for the European voter, whose education and income qualifications are usually accepted without question, than for the African, whose qualifications are carefully checked.

Future changes in the relative composition of the electorate will, in the long run, depend upon two factors. First, of those already eligible to be on the roll, a greater proportion can be expected to register as voters. Second, there will be an increase in the number of people who attain the minimum age, income and educational qualifications necessary before they can become voters. As far as European voters are concerned, immigration and the attainment of majority (21 years of age) are the two main factors which will lead to an increased electorate. For Asians and Coloureds, the age factor is the most important; but for Africans, educational and economic advance are much more significant.

African education is sufficiently important to deserve special consideration. The present criterion in most Western countries is for children to study at least as far as Form IV—School Certificate level. If this criterion is defined as "civilized need", the figures for Southern Rhodesia during 1958 show that of the total number of Africans of school age, 52 per cent were at school. This means that if African education up to Form IV level were to be made compulsory, the African school population would be nearly double the 1958 figure. This figure of 52 per cent for Africans compares with 84 per cent for Asians and Coloureds and 96 per cent for Europeans. But it is well above the figure for African education in the two Northern territories, which was only about 38 per cent.

level (Sub. A to Std. II), though enrolment in senior, primary and secondary classes is growing rapidly.

	Thousands
Junior Primary (to Standard II)	359
Senior Primary (Standard III-VI)	83
Secondary	7

A further important factor is the elimination figure from year to year—elimination being defined as the number of scholars in, say, Standard I in 1958 who did not move into Standard II in 1959. The average elimination figure between one class in 1957 and the class immediately above it in 1958 was 21 per cent.

The main reason for this is the scarcity of places for scholars in higher forms which means that a policy of selection is used. Between Standards III and IV elimination was 52 per cent, between Standard VI and Form I it was 57 per cent, reaching 77 per cent between Forms III and IV. Although so many leave school before reaching Form IV, a considerable number of Africans will still qualify for the vote when they reach the age of 21 (see Table II).

It seems reasonable to expect most, if not all, of the Form IV group to qualify for the ordinary vote. The Form II group should also all qualify, but most of them for the special and only a few for the ordinary roll. The Standard VI group is likely to find income a limiting factor. Figures from the Salisbury area suggest that in 1958 only about 10 per cent of those whose education stopped at Standard VI earned £20 a month or more. This proportion will rise with the general increase in African earnings.

In Table III an attempt is made to estimate the future composition of the electorate in terms of votes cast. The table is based on a number of assumptions including these:

- (a) Continuation of 1957-58 elimination rate in African schools.
- (b) That the real income per head of Africans in the money economy will continue to rise at the rate of 5 per cent a year.
- (c) An average annual increase from migration of about 9,000 Europeans a year in Southern Rhodesia.
- (d) That 60 per cent of qualified non-Africans, and 40 per cent of qualified Africans, register as voters.
- (e) That 75 per cent of registered European voters cast valid votes, with a higher proportion for non-European voters.
- (f) That elections will be held every 5 years.
- (g) That the present franchise qualifications will remain substantially the same.

In 1958 the majority of the voters could be classed as conservative: by 1963 the greater part of the country's voters should be in the moderate group, whilst by 1968 the moderate-liberal group should predominate. Between 1963 and 1968 the size of the country's liberal European vote should increase to such an extent that by the latter date it will exceed the reactionary-conservative vote. The Southern Rhodesia Government should then be able to implement partnership with enthusiastic support from the electorate.

*Note: Under the present Southern Rhodesian franchise laws the special roll (mainly Africans) will be closed when the number of voters registered on it represents 20 per cent of the number of voters on the ordinary roll. This is expected to occur in about 1970. If this restriction were to be removed and the minimum qualifications lowered and brought in line with those of Northern Rhodesia or the Federation's franchise laws, the total number of African votes cast in 1973, can be estimated at about 60,000.

Annexure B

Memorandum on Electoral Prospects for a Southern Rhodesian Territorial General Election in 1960 or 1961.

By W. J. Sampson. April 1960

Introduction

The United Federal Party has a small majority in the S. Rhodesia Legislative Assembly; excluding the Speaker, the majority is only 3 in a house of 30. The next general election would normally have to be held not later than 1963.

Sir Edgar Whitehead, the territorial Prime Minister, has announced that he expects to go to the country in 1961, and April or May has been suggested as most likely; if this is so, the election would be held on the roll closing on 31st January 1961.

Two other dates, both in 1960, have been suggested, in September/October (on a July roll) or in May/June (based on the present roll). Though neither of these can be ruled out, the balance of probability appears to favour 1961.

Method of Election

S. Rhodesia's 30 seats are all elected on a non-racial common roll, there are no special or reserved seats. Voting is by the preferential or single transferable system. Although there are two types of voter, ordinary (mainly European) and special (mainly African), each vote has identical power so the difference may be ignored in this exercise.

Recent History

The last two territorial general elections were in January 1954 and June 1958; the last two federal elections were in October 1953 and November 1958. The territorial rolls in both 1954 and 1958 were almost identical, that of 1958 numbering 55,000 of whom 53,000 were Europeans. Between the 1954 and 1958 territorial elections there was an average reactionary swing of nearly 5% as compared to an average swing of 12% in intervening bye-elections; the swing at the general election was the greatest in rural areas—about 10%. There was no general swing in urban areas, where the most successful U.F.P. candidates were the comparatively liberal ones.

By the time of the federal general election, which was based on the roll of July 31st 1958, nearly 10,000 additional voters had come on to the roll. Of these 64% voted U.F.P. and 18% Dominion Party; in addition there was a liberal swing of between 3% and 4% amongst old voters. The combined effect of these two factors enabled the U.F.P. to win 18 out of S. Rhodesia's 24 federal ordinary seats, as compared with 17 out of 30 territorial seats.

The Present Territorial Roll

Since the federal election nearly 4,000 additional voters have come on to the roll, making an additional 13,600 since the territorial election. New voters were a big factor in the federal election and, presumably, will also be so in the coming territorial election.

The present roll numbers 69,000, of whom 4,000 are non-Europeans (half Africans, half Asians and Coloureds). Non-European voters are largely concentrated in five of the thirty constituencies, though they do not predominate in any.

Prospects for an Election Based on the Present Roll

Experience in 1953/54 and 1958 suggests that S. Rhodesian European voters are more reactionary in a territorial than a federal election; this is perhaps because race relations and in particular African affairs are more important territorially. On this basis we can expect an average reactionary swing of about 4% since the federal election, after allowing for the effect of the 4,000 new voters since then.

In addition, most sources are agreed that there has been a further reactionary swing, the highest quoting 8% making a total swing of 12% since the federal election. Though a swing of this magnitude might well happen in a bye-election, it seems excessive in a general election. At the time of the 1958 territorial election, the reactionary swing (actually 4.54% since 1954) was at its maximum, and it seems unlikely that any further swing would exceed 5% (= 9% since federal election).

On this basis the reactionary swing since the federal election should lie in the range 4% to 9% inclusive. In the whole of this range, the U.F.P. would be returned to power as can be seen from the following table. Only in the case of the extreme swing quoted, that of 12% since the federal election, would the Dominion Party be returned to power and even then by a small margin.

Probable Election Results on Election on Present Roll

Uniform Reactionary Swing Since Federal Election	Seats by Party (Out of 30)
	Dominion	United Federal	Central Africa
0, 1	3	25	2
2	5	23	2
3	7	21	2
4	8	20	2
5	9	20	1
6	10	19	1
7	12	18	0
8, 9	13	17	0
10	14	16	0
12	16	14	0

Swings are not of course necessarily uniform. However, the results in numbers of seats given by an uneven swing is not likely to vary much from that calculated in the above table using the average swing as criterion. The following table shows the numbers of seats obtainable by the Dominion Party in various types of constituency.

Potential Dominion Party Seats on Present Roll by Type of Seat

Reactionary Swing Since Federal Election %	Seats by Type
	Urban (17)	Mixed (4)	Rural (9)	Total (30)
0	1	—	2	3
4	4	—	4	8
8	5	2	6	13
12	7	2	7	16
20	13	4	9	26

For example a swing of 4% in urban areas, 8% in mixed and 12% in rural areas would give the Dominion Party 13 seats—a minority. The average swing for this is 7%, which would give the Dominion Party 12 seats according to table I, a fairly similar answer. Detail by constituencies is shown in the Appendix.

Prospects for an Election in September/October 1960.

An election in September or October of this year would probably be held on the roll closing on 31st July. The tempo of new registrations has quickened recently from about 100 a month in the last half of 1959 to about 350 in March 1960. It seems likely that an election in September/October would be based on a roll between 2,000 and 4,000 higher than the present one.

This would give a result substantially the same as that for an election held on the present roll, but with odds against the Dominion Party lengthening slightly.

Prospects for an Election in April/May 1961.

Between now and January 31st 1961, when the roll would close for an election in April or May, there are over nine months during which potential voters could register. The gap between present enrolments and the maximum potential at January 1961 is about 50,000 Europeans and 20,000 non-Europeans. In practice under present conditions when registration is not compulsory 60% is a fair expectation for Europeans, 40% for Asians and Coloureds, and 20% for Africans, who have problems of language and in rural areas distance to make registration difficult. Using these figures the estimate for further new voters is 9,000 (6,000 Europeans, 1,000 Asians and Coloureds and 2,000 Africans).

As far as can be foreseen now, the likely result, after allowing for these 9,000 new voters is:

Probable Election Results on January 1961 Roll

Reactionary Swing Since Federal Election %	Seats
	Dominion	United Federal	Central Africa or National Democratic
1 to 3	3	23	4
4	3	24	3
5	4	23	3
6 to 8	9	19	2
9	10	18	2
10	11	17	2
12	13	16	1

The reactionary swing is not likely to be less than 4% since the election is territorial and its subject matter is largely African Affairs. Nor is it likely to exceed 9%, and even the maximum swing envisaged of 12% would still give the U.F.P. a majority. Between a swing of 5% and 6% 6 seats are marginal; if Sir Edgar Whitehead can time his election so that any swing is not more than 5% the result should be U.F.P. 23 or 24 seats, D.P. 3 or 4, and C.A.P. 3 seats. This distribution might well result in some progressive government and legislation.

Summary

1. Since the last territorial election nearly 14,000 new voters have come onto the roll. These voters are expected to support the U.F.P. and the C.A.P. rather than the Dominion Party. A further 9,000 new voters may register before a 1961 election.

2. A 1960 election would give the Dominion Party between 8 and 13 out of 30 seats.

3. A 1961 election, properly timed by Sir Edgar Whitehead, should result in:

U.F.P.	23 or 24 seats
D.P.	3 or 4 seats
C.A.P. or N.D.P.	3 seats

Memorandum

F. A. ALEXANDER

1. As a son of one of the Pioneers of Rhodesia and having lived in Southern Rhodesia all my life, mainly in the Rural Areas, I feel I have a right to put forward my personal views on matters concerning the future of the Federation.

Beginning of Federation

2. At the time of the Referendum in Southern Rhodesia I was convinced that the concept of a Federal State of the three territories of Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland and Southern Rhodesia was correct, and was the right step forward to creating a secure Independent Central African State of all Races. Had the preliminary discussions been better handled and the wording of the Federal Constitution been different, the situation today would have been a happier one.

3. Enlarging on this, I venture to state that at least 99.5% of the African Population of the three territories were quite unaware of what was taking place and also had no understanding of the fundamentals of the proposed form of Government for Federation. I would also add that a good percentage of the European population did not really know what was taking place although a good many of them voted one way or other at the Southern Rhodesia Referendum.

4. From the time of the publication of the Constitution which had in it the unfortunate word "partnership" things have not gone well, and it was from then that the so called 'wind of change' started among the small percentage of the politically ambitious African population. Having lived with the African all my life it was very noticeable the change that was taking place. Nowhere in the world did one have such a law abiding people and a people who had made such vast strides from barbarism to civilisation, through the advent of the European, over a period of a short seventy years. What a tragedy that owing to the administration of these people from outside the country, this happy trend has not continued.

The Present Position of Federation

5. What have we got today? A divided people, both black and white, who fear each others actions, and a springing up of various political parties who are by their words and deeds, determined to split up the Federation. Which party is right? Why have we got to this state of affairs? The answer is the misinterpretation of the Constitution. On the one hand we have the African leaders trying to obtain something that they are not yet economically politically or socially ready for, and on the other hand we have some European leaders either trying to bring the African on too fast for his capabilities or trying to keep him back from rights for which he has qualified.

6. Having worked with Africans and dealt with them in other ways there is nothing worse for him than a situation of uncertainty and misunderstanding. If he knows exactly what the position is and what he will eventually get there are no better people to work with. But today he has been offered something he cannot have and it is for this reason that we have gone through the unhappy state in the two Northern Territories over the last fifteen months. No two administrations some five thousand miles apart could possibly be in accord under the present set up and some immediate action is required to rectify this position.

Must the Concept of Federation continue?

7. If any consideration is given to the discontinuation of Federation and this comes about, there will, in my opinion be strife in Central Africa within a very short time. The age of small nations living in seclusion with their own ways of life and still expecting the other countries of the world to provide finance and protection are over. The three territories cannot exist independently and give the necessary advancement to its people. Reasons for this statement will be elaborated at the time of my appearance before the Commission. With all the points put forward I consider that ways and means must be found that will make it possible for all races to live harmoniously in the future.

What changes in the Constitution are necessary for the survival of the Federation?

8. In my mind the most important first step to be taken is to accept the fact that we are now living in conditions that are totally different to those prevailing when certain promises were made to the residents of the countries now within the Federation. These promises are now archaic and must be revoked with the understanding that something better will take place. The repeated statement that no major changes in the two Northern territories will take place, but with the desire or wish of those people is a dream. Who are the people in those two countries that have the knowledge of the complex administrations and financial organizations necessary to bring about their advancement in these modern times. I know they have leaders, but is it anticipated that these leaders, who have had no leadership experience, will be unbiased in their presentation of the case to the masses, without resorting to mass hysteria? If the opinion of the two territories for changes is to be obtained this way, Federation is doomed from the start. Some more realistic approach to this vital matter must be found so that the future prosperity of the Federation can be controlled by civilised and experienced people. This in my mind is the most important constitutional change to be resolved.

9. The second major change which would eliminate all attempts of breaking up of the Federation is complete Independence forthwith. I can see no reason why any probationary period should be necessary. This alone will give a fillip to the Federation by virtue of the fact that all people, black and white will endeavour to make this their country as a whole and not expect legislation policy to be administered from overseas.

10. In bringing about these major changes there will naturally have to be other advances in the franchise to all races. The idea of one man one vote that has been put forward by certain sections is completely unrealistic and cannot be entertained. If the scale of qualifications is made very low, that will inevitably lead to control by the inexperienced mass and will not benefit the Federation. To make the qualification too high will probably meet the present requirements for the immediate progress desired. By raising the standard it will eliminate some of the European voters but this will probably be desirable in a multi-racial state such as this. If it is found a very low qualification is necessary then the necessity of a lower and upper house form of Government is apparent. Some consideration could be given to the multiple vote system.

Rate of advancement of Africans

11. With the education system now prevailing in the Federation, and the increased industrialisation in the Urban areas it must be accepted that the African is advancing rapidly in the economic field. Some means must be found so that the African is not excluded from entering the economic field in competition with the European. I cannot agree that because a person is white that he has to be protected. His answer to that is to be more efficient. With the higher franchise qualification the advanced African must be allowed to enter the political field with no reservations.

12. The final point on which I feel very strongly is the social one. On no account must any legislation be passed to force the pace of social integration. This is an evolution phenomena and the present laws have been accepted quite happily in the past and any change must be left to the persons or bodies concerned, provided they comply with prevailing laws and regulation of the Authorities concerned. I am sure the African is as proud as the European to keep within his racial group and it is only the small percentage of off-types that want to cause embarrassments between the races.

I will elaborate on all these points at my appearance with the Commission.

Oral Evidence

F. A. ALEXANDER

Mr. Alexander had been born and bred in Southern Rhodesia and educated there. He had devoted his life entirely to agriculture, although he had many outside interests. He had been a farmer on his own account for 21 years with some success. He lived about 100 miles from Salisbury in the Rafungura area north of Banket.

He had produced a memorandum, to which he wished to add the following remarks. He had not come before the Commission because of conceit but as an ordinary farmer, since he felt it to be the duty of such people to give evidence. In his life he had spent much time, effort and money on the development of the country. He felt that he had made a contribution to the prosperity of Southern Rhodesia, and latterly to the Federation. He had built up his farm as a form of security for the future and for his children. He had come before the Commission to ensure that this trend would not have any setback. He also felt that he had made a great indirect contribution to African advancement in the rural areas. The African was really a happy person in the rural areas. Only years of extra prosperity in the agricultural sphere would bring the conditions of Africans into line with those of Europeans. For agriculture was one of the poorest industries in the country. He referred to the difficulties being caused by the current drought. He considered that Africans in the rural areas in Southern Rhodesia had been well treated. His experience had been entirely in Southern Rhodesia, and he had had no personal experience of the Northern Territories.

In answer to questions on the memorandum, Mr. Alexander made the following points:—

1. Paragraph 3, first sentence. He had a number of Northern Rhodesian and Nyasaland Africans working for him, and in fact half of his mail was for those people, which indicated that they still maintained close contacts with the Northern Territories. Not one out of 100 of those people with their families and children knew what was taking place. Several of them had radios, and two had motor cars and travelled about; but even they did not know what was taking place, in fact it was difficult for him to explain to these people what was happening. He had gone up to visit Northern Rhodesia and there also he had found complete ignorance about Federation.

2. Paragraph 4, first sentence. The "unfortunate word" "Partnership". He did not think that the Africans had interpreted partnership as meaning amalgamation. That at any rate was only a minor idea. The major idea was that partnership meant complete equality of the races, which was to come through Federation. Because of this misconception he had had to discharge a few of his employees, although he had done this in the proper manner at the end of their contracts; those people had started to strut around his farm and had been a nuisance. He was sure that this interpretation of partnership was the root cause of all the trouble today.

3. When he was asked how the problem should be solved he drew attention to the sentence in paragraph 12, "On no account must any legislation be passed to force the pace of social integration". The pace of the transitional period would only be a happy one if there were some plain speaking at the start. There were several political parties in the Federation all talking in different ways. The plain speaking should be addressed to both Europeans and Africans, and be to the effect that everybody had to reach a certain stage of civilisation without legislation. If there were legislation, and someone found that he was not qualified, he would feel rebuffed and disappointed. He compared the whole situation to that of a child in relation to a fond mother. The child would tend to run to its mother and the mother would give in. The trend of power from overseas was continuing nursing of one particular section of the community. So long as it went on that section would always want to refer to its mother overseas. He added that there were three Africans on his own farm whom he would not mind inviting into his house; but he dared not do that today, because the other 65 would then want to crowd in. If there were legislation, all would want to come in. He felt strongly about the social side of the problem. The economic side was somewhat different. In his view the Federation should administer its own affairs, and should be independent of control from overseas. If something were done on the lines suggested, immediately, he agreed that there might be strife in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

4. In Northern Rhodesia there was room for everyone; but there was a tendency for the Africans to come to the settled districts, leaving behind vast areas waiting to be developed. All Africans would not be able to be employed on the line of rail. He could not see Northern Rhodesia being developed properly outside the Federal concept. It was necessary for the people of the Federation to become one people, so that there could be resettlement both in the north and in the south.

5. He had never understood the Africans' fears of independence in Northern Rhodesia. He felt that this fear had no backing except in their imaginations. It was true that the majority of the whites lived in Southern Rhodesia. But the fear of swamping by the whites was just mass hysteria fanned by certain African leaders.

6. Paragraph 10. "By raising the standard it will eliminate some of the European voters but this will probably be desirable in a multi-racial state such as this." He was asked whether this would not also eliminate almost all the Africans. He did not answer the question directly but said that what he meant was, that there should be one qualification if a "multi-racial state" was to come about. It was wrong to have a different kind of vote for lower class people. In this particular case the lower class would be the Africans. This naturally created resentment: therefore there should be one single level of standards for all.

7. Paragraph 12, last sentence but one. He was questioned about integration in cinemas, hotels, etc. He replied that once you brought in the multi-racial state, it would involve economic integration on its own account. If there were amenities in the European area, and the Europeans accepted the situation, it would be all right for them to be shared with the Africans; but if there were legislation there would be economic breakdown of its amenities because of the swamping of them by Africans. He knew of a case where an African family had come into a hotel, and had then been seriously embarrassed by the bill. In due time those who were politically and economically sound would come into such places; but if it were done by legislation, large numbers would want to try something once including many who were not yet socially right for this advance. When it was pointed out to him that there had actually been legislation to permit the admission of Africans into such hotels as the Jameson, he said he was talking of cinemas and theatres. He added that he did not mind sitting next to a clean, civilised African, but not to others. This attitude might apply to Europeans also, but to a lesser degree.

Mr. Alexander then made the following additional points:—

1. His farm specialised in maize and cattle, and he claimed to be one of the main producers of maize in the country. He paid his lorry drivers £15 per month, and his tractor drivers £8 per month. There was no labourer on his farm getting under 16s. per month together with food and accommodation.

2. He would not be prepared to hold the Federation together by force.

3. If the Africans of the Northern Territories were not cut away from the United Kingdom, they would never be able to stand on their own feet. As things were, they were half living in the Federation, but were also accepting leadership from elsewhere. On this condition, he would not object to black governments in the Northern Territories.

4. He claimed that no-one had greater pride than himself in his connection with the British Government and the old country. Britain had colonised these countries; if the British had not come no one could foresee what would have happened. It had taken the British people thousands of years to reach their present civilisation; although in an environment different from Africa. Even so the Africans in the Northern Territories could hardly advance quickly enough to elect a government of their own in time to save the Federation. Their tribalism had still to be taken into account, and it would take many years yet to train them.

5. He thought it would be quite fair to impose on the Africans in the Northern Territories an independent Federation, for the advanced Africans would co-operate with the white people.

6. Referring to the question of immigrant labour from Tanganyika and the Portuguese colonies, and from elsewhere, he supposed that a Northern Rhodesian independent government would legislate to keep such people out. He did not know if that would work. But in any case immigration restrictions would have to apply equally to white and black alike.

7. He would not say positively that Northern Rhodesia by itself could be self-sufficient. He had doubts about the future of copper. Times were changing. There could be a turning away from copper to something else, then Northern Rhodesia would suffer.

8. He was aware that the position of Africans in the Northern Territories was based on fear of Southern Rhodesia's repressive laws, such as the Land Apportionment Act and the pass laws. But he had had Nyasalanders serving with him for 21 years, and others had returned frequently from their visits to Nyasaland. Out of his 65 employees, 38 were now married and 28 of these people were Nyasalanders. Therefore he supposed that they were now permanent residents with him.

9. Finally he said that he would not maintain the status quo by force; but he also thought it essential to do away with 'ne mother instinct'. He saw that there might be an interim period with the balance held by officials. If officials were from the Colonial Office, there would still be the old connection with the United Kingdom. Therefore they would have to become Federal officials and be appointed by the Federation.

COLONEL A. S. HICKMAN

Police in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland

I appreciate that the present system of policing in the Federation are the responsibility of the three Territorial Governments, but have no doubt that the "Advisory Commission on the Review of the Constitution" would wish to take note of the present situation and the possibility of future developments.

I have been resident in Southern Rhodesia for 35 years during over 31 of which I was a serving member of the British South Africa Police, retiring in 1955 as Commissioner. I have wide experience as a policeman and therefore feel I might be of some use to the Commission in answering questions, and in submitting points for consideration.

An outline of my views is contained in an article I wrote for the Central African Examiner, Volume 3, No. 6, dated 15th August, 1959, page 16 et seq. With the full permission of the editor I now forward a copy for your information. (Annexure)

Extract from "The Central African Examiner" August 15, 1959 Britain's Pattern—Not Canada's by Colonel A. S. Hickman, formerly Commissioner, B.S.A. Police

The Report by the Conference on Federation was presented to the British Parliament by the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations and the Secretary for the Colonies jointly in February, 1953. The Conference had been held in London during January of the same year and was attended by representatives of the United Kingdom, Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

I am concerned here only with its attitude towards police, and in this connexion, I quote:

"An item has been included in the Exclusive List to enable the Federation to establish, train and maintain a Federal Police Force for service or use in any Territory, at the request of the Governor of the Territory, in addition to or in substitution for, the Territorial Police Force. The preservation of law and order will, however, remain entirely the responsibility of the Territorial Governments."

The Exclusive List covers subjects on which only the Federal Legislature may make laws. In addition there is a Concurrent List with which both the Federal and Territorial Legislatures may deal, and subjects which were not included in either of these lists remain the responsibility of the Territorial Governments.

The preservation of law and order was to remain a matter for Territorial control, but in the Exclusive List set out under the Federal Scheme, which was presented at the same time as the Report, Item 35 reads:

"The establishment, training, maintenance and administration of a Federal police force for service in the employment of any Territory or use in any Territory at the request of the Governor of that Territory, in addition to or in substitution for, the police force of that Territory; and the conditions (including conditions as to payment by the Territory) on which the Federation will make such police available for such use or employment."

There is a footnote to this item which reads:

"Unless and until the Federal Police are employed by all three Territories, the charge made to any Territory for the services or use of the Federal Police (other than occasional use for emergency purposes) will include a proportionate share of the cost of Headquarters charges and training."

In contrast to its pious hopes for the future regarding Police the conference accepted Defence as a Federal responsibility, and as a result we now have a Central Africa Command, and a Royal Rhodesian Air Force, under an appropriate Ministry, with evidence of marked and increasing efficiency as was demonstrated during the recent emergency.

It is known that those who represented Southern Rhodesia at the conference favoured a police system based on that of Canada, where, in addition to provincial and city forces, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police operates as the Federal force. Without full information about this scheme it would be improper to criticize it in detail, but it must have its weaknesses, emphasised by the recent resignation of its Commissioner, Mr. Nicholson, following a difference of opinion between the Federal and a Provincial authority. Full details of this case would repay study here.

I draw attention, therefore, to an alternative method, which is based on the British, as opposed to the Canadian, system. In Britain the Home Secretary (corresponding to our Federal Minister of Home Affairs) has ultimate authority over any of the numerous police forces, be they county, city or borough. This he achieves through Inspectors of Constabulary who are charged with the duty of inspecting all the police forces, reporting to the Home Secretary on their efficiency, and satisfying themselves that each force is being run to an approved standard.

These Inspectors of Constabulary are officers of wide police experience who have themselves been in practical command, but who have no remaining tie with any force. They are responsible only to the Home Secretary, to whom they report if they find something seriously wrong, and it is then his responsibility to set matters right. This he is able to do because half of the expenditure on each of the police forces is borne by the British Treasury, and thus the Home Secretary can arrange for these funds to be withheld. This application of sanctions is rarely enforced because the local authorities know full well that they cannot afford to lose the Treasury grant. Thus all the police forces in general maintain a uniform standard of efficiency.

In the case of counties, a Joint Standing Committee is responsible for appointments and exercises other control over its police force; in the case of cities and boroughs a Watch Committee performs the same functions, but with somewhat wider powers.

In this way there is ostensible autonomy, but in practice the Home Secretary has the last say through the Inspectors of Constabulary, who in actual practice have no power to direct the local authorities, except by an ultimate resort to sanctions applied through the withholding of funds. Normally a quiet discussion with the Chief Constable concerned has the desired effect. In addition to my reading on this subject I have been told of its practical application by a distinguished Inspector of Her Majesty's Constabulary—a post which was created in 1856 (so it has been well tested)—and I understand that the appointment comes direct from the Sovereign.

A similar system, I suggest, might be evolved for the Federation, where we have three territorial police forces, each at a different stage of development. The British South Africa Police of Southern Rhodesia is self-contained as regards organization and operation. Those who join this force are not subject to transfer to other forces, and their sphere of activity is confined solely to Southern Rhodesia.

The Northern Rhodesia Police and the Nyasaland Police, however, have their personnel recruited, trained and used on Colonial Office lines, and are subject to inspection by the Inspector-General of Colonial Police. Thus they are by no means autonomous, and their officers are subject to transfer to other colonial territories. The present Commissioner of the Northern Rhodesia Police has wide and long experience in that office, but his predecessor came from the Fiji Islands, and found that a land-locked country presented many problems different from those of sea-girt domains. The Commissioner of the Nyasaland Police has quite recently assumed office, though he has previous experience of Africa.

During the preparatory talks on Federation the so-called "Mountie" system was favoured as a basis for a Federal Police Force—to be hired out to the Territorial Governments on the lines indicated in the Report by the Conference on Federation. I understand it was implied that the B.S.A. Police should form the nucleus of such a Force. But no one with any pride in his unit would contemplate with equanimity the domination of his force by a "big brother", however friendly. That is exactly what happened; bad feeling was engendered between the B.S.A. Police and the Northern Rhodesia Police until the former made it clear to the latter that no ulterior aims existed.

Today the three territorial police forces in the Federation co-operate purely on a basis of goodwill. This is a very fine thing and it has worked well, but it depends largely on personalities, so that the day could come when a rift might arise, causing acute embarrassment to the territories concerned and to the Federation. Let us hope, however, that past co-operation will continue; in the Nyasaland disturbances in 1953 contingents of the Northern Rhodesia Police, the B.S.A. Police and the Tanganyika Police were employed; in 1954, during the Wankie strike, welcome aid came from the Northern Rhodesia Police; and in previous years the B.S.A. Police were called in on several occasions to the Copperbelt.

At the time of discord when it was feared that the Federal Police Headquarters would be at Salisbury (a hint given in the Federal Scheme footnote already quoted, in that Territories would be charged for the services of Federal Police which would include "a proportionate share of the cost of Headquarters charges and training"), Northern Rhodesia was in a very favourable financial position, and considerable sums were spent on building of a police training establishment at Lilayi, near Lusaka. So that the Northern Rhodesia Police could be independent of "big brother". This depot is now a most up-to-date and efficient concern. Nyasaland, in a smaller way, began to develop the training of African Police at Zomba.

To maintain harmony it is obvious that there should be no further suggestion that any one of the Territorial police forces in the Federation should be swamped or absorbed by another. The three police forces must retain their identity partly because of their different stages of development, partly because they would tend to become unwieldy if ultimately consolidated into one Federal Force.

My suggestion is that a Federal Police Authority should be established under the appropriate Ministry, and agreement should be reached with each of the three Territorial Governments that the Federal Government should contribute to the Territorial exchequers one half of the cost of its police force. In order to maintain desirable standards, an Inspector of Constabulary should be appointed, who would have the same functions as the British incumbents.

This plan pre-supposes that the Colonial Office would cease to have a hand in the control of the Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland Police, which would then stand on their own feet as the police forces of their respective territories. In time this is inevitable, but separation from the Colonial Office will be a complicated process, and will not be possible without Federal backing. The Colonial Office system of policing is different from that in force in Southern Rhodesia, but the basic principles for the preservation of law and order and the prevention and detection of crime are the same, and the Colonial Police give devoted service often in difficult circumstances.

In anticipation of the developments I have outlined there seems no reason why a Federal Police Authority should not be established at an early date (there is already a Federal Security Service) to prepare the ground by the employment of a liaison officer (not the Inspector of Constabulary), who would have the task of maintaining goodwill between the three police forces of the Federation and the Colonial Office. This might seem to be an intrusion at the present time; the official concerned would have no executive authority over the police, but he would be in a position to keep the Federal Ministry in the picture as regards territorial police trends and developments.

His would be a difficult task, but with mutual co-operation and goodwill, it should not be an impossible one.

A prerequisite is that the Colonial Office should surrender its control over the police of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, as it must over the civil servants of these territories. Ultimately the civil service and police must look for advancement only in the territories in which they serve, and in the Federation. However devoted they may be, they cannot, as birds of passage identify themselves with local problems in the same way as officials who are also permanent citizens of the country in which they work.

The police of Southern Rhodesia have a great advantage over their northern neighbours because they can cover the whole of the country on routine patrol visits at regular intervals, so that the population of whatever race sees them as individuals, and the more primitive people are accustomed to the sight of police uniform, knowing that unless they contravene the law they have nothing to fear. These patrols which "show the flag" are valuable in building up a mutual respect between the police and the populace; and there is no doubt that they have been a strong factor in the maintenance of law and order, and the fact that since the Mashona Rising of 1897 there has been no outburst of racial conflict between Black and White.

There are no special riot squads in Southern Rhodesia on permanent stand-by in case of emergency, but the ordinary policeman receives intensive training in security work, so that, should the need arise, he can play his part in a crisis, and then resume his day-to-day duty. Although he is trained in the use of arms he does not carry them normally, and from being a soldier-policeman in the earlier days of this century he is tending more and more to be a constable on the British pattern.

In contrast, large areas of the northern territories are not covered at all by the regular police, but are visited by District Commissioners' messengers and tribal police. It is harmful, particularly in backward places, that the first contact the local inhabitants have with police should be when there is trouble, and they see them for the first time carrying a "big stick". In these areas, the regular police—not surprisingly—are feared and treated with suspicion.

Until routine patrols are authorized to cover all parts of the northern territories it is inevitable that special squads of police should be trained and employed solely to deal with emergencies. These squads are highly efficient, but their personnel can hardly be classed as policemen. They are strong-arm squads to enforce law and order when the situation is likely to get out of hand. They are not police according to the British concept of the term, but their employment is unfortunately necessary until the colonial policy of rural policing is changed. It is to be hoped that there will be no long delay, but it is sad to note that only a year ago no less than 14 rural police stations were closed down in Northern Rhodesia by order of the former Governor, Sir Arthur Benson. These smaller stations have a great value in bringing the regular police in closer day-to-day contact with the people, and should be established more and more until the country is covered by them, in a manner similar to the village constabulary of Britain.

Until there is a change of policy, the Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland Police, however efficient, are inevitably limited in their scope of operation.

In drawing attention to the use of specialized police solely for emergency measures it is appropriate to sound a note of warning as regards the establishment of a Federal Force—in addition to the existing Territorial forces—on the Canadian plan. This force in terms of the Federal Scheme would be for service in the employment of any Territory or use in any Territory at the request of the Governor of that Territory in addition to or in substitution for the police force of that Territory.

The key words are "at the request of the Governor of that Territory", and since the preservation of law and order is "entirely the responsibility of the Territorial Governments" it seems unlikely that Federal Police would be called in except for an emergency. Therefore they might remain chiefly on stand-by, which would hardly justify their separate existence. I think it would be far better to have the three Territorial police forces going about their daily duties, to be called on for Federal duty only if special circumstances should arise.

It is inevitable that there will be awkward situations whatever police system is adopted, but these will be growing pains and should be capable of solution with practical commonsense. For instance, when the Prisons Department was federalized in Southern Rhodesia the "raw material" continued to be supplied by the B.S.A. Police through the courts of justice—both Territorial establishments. In the past certain necessary fatigue duties, particularly at outstations, were performed by convicted prisoners. The new management required fees for prison service to be levied, in aid of Federal finance, against Territorial institutions. But when it was pointed out that, without the aid of Territorial police, Federal prisons would cease to function, the payment of fees was waived.

This outline of certain phases of police organization in various parts of the Federation, and my plan for future development, will, I hope, be considered by those who will be responsible for establishing order from what could, all too easily, become chaos; my suggestions will have served their purpose if they provoke thought in the right quarters—followed by action. I do not suggest that my plan is comprehensive, or even entirely practical in present circumstances, but it is worth consideration; and it is based on years of experience as a policeman.

Oral Evidence

COLONEL A. S. HICKMAN

Colonel Hickman said that he was speaking as an ex-Commissioner of Police for Southern Rhodesia. He made the following points in amplification of his memorandum:—

- (a) He did not advocate the establishment of a Federal Police Force; nor did he think that the responsibility for law and order should be transferred from the Territorial Governments. The position in Canada under which Federal, Provincial and Municipal Police Forces all existed in the same province, was cumbersome and could be improved on. It had led to major difficulties on one recent occasion in Newfoundland.

- (b) Nevertheless, co-operation between the three Police Forces of the Federation was at present based entirely on goodwill. The results might be very serious if this goodwill broke down.
- (c) In the two Northern Territories the Commissioner of Police did not have sufficient power. In particular, he was not in a position to give his Government a report on the overall security position in the Territory, as could be done in Southern Rhodesia, because his policemen did not patrol the whole Territory. The result was that in the Native Authority areas the police were never seen except in an emergency, and they were consequently regarded as enemies of the people.
- (d) The proposal in the witness's article in the Central African Examiner to set up an inspectorate was related largely to the question of redistributing financial responsibility.
- (e) The main objection to the establishment of a police reserve was that such a reserve would have nothing to occupy it except in times of emergency. Similar arguments applied to the riot squads in the Northern Territories. The British South Africa Police gave all their personnel training in riot control; they did not keep any form of special gendarmerie in reserve.
- (f) The Inspector General proposed in his memorandum would have no executive functions, but would exist to maintain liaison, to co-ordinate police methods, and to establish goodwill between the three Forces.
- (g) More could be done in Southern Rhodesia to provide advancement for African policemen. When he had been Commissioner of Police, he had recommended promotion up to warrant rank. This had been met by a compromise proposal to appoint station sergeants; but there was scope for promoting suitable people to the rank of warrant officer. Most constables on recruitment had at least Standard VI education; he thought that educated Africans should be encouraged to join the force to provide future officer material.
- (h) The police forces in the two Northern Territories should be re-organised to stand on their own separately from the Colonial Police set-up. In this way, all policemen would become Federal citizens. This should not impair promotion prospects, since it would still be possible for policemen to be transferred from one of the forces in the Federation to another on promotion. Recruitment should be carried out wherever the best people could be found regardless of the country of origin.

Letter to the Secretary-General of the Commission from
Col. A. S. Hickman, dated 28th January 1960

Sir,

I have been asked by Mr. Hlazo to hand in the attached Memorandum for consideration by your Commission. Hlazo, a farmer has not the opportunity of presenting it himself, but would be pleased to give evidence before the Commission.

For your information the following biographical notes on Hlazo, may be of some use to you:—

Titus John Hlazo. Born at Cala, Transkei on 14th May, 1895. His father was a transport rider conducting his own business in the early days of Rhodesia and when he had settled there he brought his family up to join him in 1897. For a time he was one of the earliest Methodist missionaries until the B.S.A. Company asked him to supervise the settlement of the Colonial Africans who had served the Company as Pioneers. Titus was educated at Lovedale Training School from 1913-1917, and qualified as a teacher. From 1918-1921 he was employed as a teacher at Hgwenya Presbyterian School, Bembesi. In 1922 he was appointed as a teacher at the new Domboshawa Government School. In the same year he married Rachel Masinga, a Zulu, who was then teaching at Hopefountain L.M.S. Mission, near Bulawayo, and who was responsible for establishing the Girls' Boarding School there.

The Hlazos were on the staff of Domboshawa from 1922-1942, when they both retired on pension at the end of 1942. Since 1943 they have been farming at Shangure No. 1 P.O. Melfort.

To my knowledge Hlazo has always taken a close interest in the development of this country, and he is a man of sterling character—quite outstanding.

He has three sons Theophilus, the eldest, is farming with his father, David is on the staff of the Native Affairs Information Department and Alexander is the only African clerk at present employed at the Manica Road Branch of the Standard Bank in Salisbury.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd) Col. A. S. Hickman

P.S.—Hlazo recently contributed Matabelle praise songs (Imbungu) to a publication by the Southern Rhodesia African Literature Bureau entitled "Imbungu Zalamhla Layizulo" (Praise songs of today and yesterday).

Case for Partnership

1. The federated states or territories are committed to the policy of partnership, using the colour blind arm of destiny—straining every nerve and muscle to fish out the highest and finest human qualities from every racial group in the federation which alone have transformed nations from the wild laws of the jungle to the elevated plane of the human person which makes life a blessing instead of a curse. Does the African then possess these great qualities? Yes he does, the great story of Dr. Livingstone's death abundantly bears this out. His African colleagues showed their last respect which was the fruit of genuine relationship between the great Doctor and them. Lobengula a celebrated despot but in his darkest hour, when the war that overthrew his reign broke out—the highest human qualities came to the surface when he sent word to all his blood-thirsty armies not even to dare touch his friends the missionaries at Inyabi whose friendship was so deep and precious even more than temporary glory. He sent warriors to escort them unmolested to a place of safety and to a position that they could be able to join their kind.

2. Federation

Is federation succeeding or failing? Federation is succeeding by leaps and bounds. Here are concrete proofs:

Since federation the Post Office has spread its branches to both urban and rural African areas.

The magnificent primary schools in every urban area are under the leadership of African Headmasters.

In Nyasaland assistant District Commissioners have been appointed. In Parliament Africans have been elevated to the positions of ministers.

Conditions of employment are daily being improved.

In actual fact the northern territories are swimming in freedom. There are a number of African M.L.C.s in their territorial assemblies.

While we in the south we have none. All these fruits of federation meet no opposition. Why then cut the tree that gives us fruit? Booker Washington left a great picture to the world when he said:

People were like a ship which got short of fresh water and began to send signs of distress to other ships.

The reply was: "Down with your buckets where you are". The ship had not realised that it was sailing in the waters of the Amazon. We are like that in our battle between good and evil.

3. African Background

The African background is the stumbling block at least for the moment as the old elements are on the way out. According to old African systems what is vice today with them was virtue. The different camps the tribes were divided into—actuated that the vices of suspicion and hatred pervade their minds so much so that they became their second nature. War was the highest tribunal and the referendum after which the vanquished had no voice whatsoever.

In this fashion the land was divided between the haves and have nots in a most animal like form because it did not make any allowances for progress.

The haves had to always keep a sharp look out that the have nots must be kept down in every way by looting everything then endeavoured to raise. Thus the haves found industries in looting which discouraged others to make any headway.

It then becomes plain that the present opposition is backed by hereditary characteristics than by actual facts.

4. The Solution

All the talk of independence and the rest of it, should be dismissed as air and gas and a bark without a bite. Not a long time ago African patients abhorred to hear the name of hospital because a strong belief had gone far and wide that whosoever entered hospital was subject to have his stomach cut opened with a bit sharp knife. I remember helping a policeman to persuade a very sick man to go to hospital and the last resort was to put handcuffs on and he was carried to hospital and got healed. The erection of gigantic hospitals alone is a proof that hospitals are by far better than the cunning witch doctor, and the rush to hospitals is just amazing.

5. The Missing Link

It is some time now that even the great nations have been trying to find the missing link. After World War I, the League of Nations was formed but had one flaw that it was not fully representative of all the Nations.

After World War II, the U.N. came into being in a more progressive way than the league. The U.N. is waiting for us to come to realise that unity among nations means sincere brotherhood.

6. Boycotts

Boycott is one of the weakest weapons of the nationalists. Boycotting of South African goods got big headlines a few weeks ago. The African in South Africa does not only envy the federation's policy of partnership but employ every means to cross the border, an affair which gives our Immigration Officers headaches.

7. Great Reminders

It should do the federation African a world of good to draw lessons from history.

8. The National Suicide

In 1836 Cape, Xosas listened to an African false prophet to kill their entire herds of cattle and to throw away their corn in anticipation of more and better cattle to come with their dead ancestors. As usual the battle between good and evil was waged. Some believed others did not. The outcome was disastrous to the believers as they died by thousand but those who did not believe were saved to perpetuate the Xosa nation which was on the verge of extinction through self inflicted disaster.

9. Abyssinia

This country has enjoyed independence of long standing but when Mussolini's hordes invaded it in 1935, independence proved to be no shield against mighty odds and the Emperor was forced to exile.

10. A Typical Synonym

The combination of the allies forces at the outbreak of World War II proved that: United we stand but divided we fall, hence partnership will prevail.

11. Franchise

The federations present system of franchise allows plenty of room for evolution so as to cover every step as well as to provide a very good training ground for the masses to learn to value this great democratic privilege which must be responsibly used.

12. Dominion Status

The kind of dominion status we want here is different from some that were obtained which excluded other races from participation. Ours will be more representative and its working will be what races agreed upon.

13. Grand Mother Mentality

Much as we admire the champions of African aspirations but when their stand reaches grandmother proportions we part roads. A grandmother will persuade her son to hand over the sharp razor to her grandson who cries for it though his hand is not trained to hold it in correct angles. Should the persuasion of the old lady prevail the favourite grandson cuts his throat instead of doing what the razor is meant to do.

14. Major Solution

Since the devil will always have something to do with idle hands solutions are absolutely necessary, here experts will know better. The potential African school population should be earmarked in planning ahead. More actual action among Africans is a great necessity.

If industries could so expand as to cover African areas so that apprenticeship absorbs most of them including other industries that will keep the human mind usefully employed and this should go a long way in remedying the present state of affairs.

15. British Leadership and integrity

All good achievements are a fruit of every stormy weathers. In this field the British, no matter where they are have always risen to equal any problems no matter how stubborn they may be.

Typical, the British Prime Minister's recent speeches in the federation show the substance the English are made of.

The creation of a new nation—a multi racial nation will make Central Africa the Bird's Eye of the entire world.

Letter from T. J. Hlazo to Col. A. S. Hickman enclosing an appendix to his Memorandum dated 13th February 1960

Dear Watcher of the Drifts,

I just wonder whether the enclosed appendix to my written statement will still find room for submission. I am particularly prompted by the fact that time for submitting evidence has been extended and I want to bring home our (Africans) outlook of the situation as actuated by our present state of development.

Imposing as the voice of the majority may be, history proves that the forces of righteousness are always in the minority but they are always on the right side.

Prophets were never in the majority and the Prince of Peace used and left the minorities to spread the truth and the news of salvation on earth.

Federation simply must not break up.

Yours sincerely,
signed T. J. Hlazo.

Letter to the Secretary-General of the Commission from Col. A. S. Hickman, dated 18th February, 1960

Dear Sir,

I submit an appendix at the request of Mr. F. J. Hlazo. His reference to me as "Watcher of the Drifts" arises from his Sindebele "praise song" a copy of which I attach.*

Yours etc.

Appendix to Memorandum by T. J. Hlazo

Definition of Partnership

Sometime in the twenties, Father Huss organised co-operative societies among Africans in South Africa. He wrote a pamphlet on the subject. He likened co-operation with two disabled men.

One man was blind but had very strong legs and the other was crippled but had very good eyesight.

One day the two men were brought together and they entered into a very serious consideration of their disabilities. In the end they arrived at a very great decision which soon reclaimed their hopeless lot and their lives became more happier and fuller.

Their great decision was this:

That the blind man should carry the lame man while the lame man had to do all the seeing as they went about with whatever business they undertook and they were rewarded with astonishing success.

Present Controversy

Different Political Parties have different policies which are responsible for the divorce of partnership from its correct definition and application.

Partnership is, "A business Association". One of the best examples: The blind and the lame man.

Indirect Rule and Africans

When Europeans settled in Africa the aborigines had to be led from what they knew to what they did not know, from their simple way of life to the more complex European way. Indirect rule gave birth to Native Policy which works extremely well so long as it was in the hands of a stable, liberal government.

With Party politicians with their different versions of policies Africans are bound to find themselves in deep waters should the government change hands.

The present state of affairs in South Africa bears this out.

The unfortunate thing about Indirect Rule, it threw the Africans into a groove as theirs, for the time being was to express their wishes and troubles, but not to make a contribution in the politics of the day.

Much as this was never intended to be until the African was articulate enough to make an enlightened contribution the African is in the groove because when we are called upon to make a contribution we find ourselves reciting destructive criticisms in so much that the African thinks Politics is to criticise.

Best Policy

No better policy could ever be evolved than the policy of partnership and already the Africans who have been entrusted with responsible work since federation show that we can adjust ourselves to higher levels than ever before.

*See Annexures I and II

Hence the most pressing thing above all others is to keep federation intact and the implementation of partnership a Reality—then one of the greatest of human achievements would be added in the Encyclopaedia of the World.

Such Dangers Sidestepped

We as Africans have learned the simple rudiment of driving cars, etc., but when mechanical complications arise which need expert knowledge of the garage man, what next? We must keep to the garage we know best.

The British Prime Minister

During his historic African tour the British Premier, among his great speeches, said this, that the world was divided into three great camps: The free Nations, the U.S.S.R. and the East. From these we must choose our garage to which we would take our car of state when it gives trouble.

We need someone to give a signal, a genuine one for that matter that we must go down with our buckets where we are for why look for a new garage when we are living inside such a good one.

Glorious Independence

A Multi Racial independence is more glorious than one which will not only throw us back but will bring us heavy loads of foreign ideologies plus making our land of birth a dumping outpost for their surplus population.

Federation simply must succeed failing which British Africa as a whole will be the victim of hungry wolves.

Oral Evidence

T. J. HLAZO

Mr. Hlazo said he had nothing to add to his memorandum (submitted through Colonel Hickman) but would prefer to answer questions.

Asked whether he was acquainted with conditions in the rural as well as in the urban areas, Mr. Hlazo replied that he was a rural resident. He did not think the benefits brought by Federation would be confined to urban areas: he expected them to extend to the rural areas, but he felt it had been right for a start to be made in the urban areas because the younger generation growing up in urban areas would become restless if they were not occupied by education and other things.

He did not think the franchise would remain as it was for ever, but the present system made a good training ground for Africans, especially the Tredgold recommendations, though it was difficult to plan for the coming generation because they might not want what the older generation wanted.

Mr. Hlazo thought the time had come when there should be some African M.P.'s in the south as well as in the north of the Federation. Asked how that could come about without some extension of the franchise, he replied he did not believe in any racial franchise. If the principle of racial partnership really worked, all races would return responsible people of whatever race. It was put to him that if people were not to vote on racial grounds it was theoretically possible for Europeans to vote for any African candidates who were put forward for election—did he think it would happen in practice? He replied that it ought to happen in order to implement equal partnership, and that that end could be worked for. He felt that Europeans, by and large, would be prepared to accept an African as a legislator, because a beginning had to be made sometime. He thought that, despite the fact that Africans wished to have a better representation, things had to be done very carefully in order to avoid mistakes in the future. He pointed out that even the Dominion Party, the most unpopular Party amongst Africans, had an African M.P. and this was a good thing. There should be some African Members in the Southern Rhodesia Territorial Parliament as well as the Federal Parliament.

It was pointed out to him that this situation could be achieved if Africans registered, since there were at least three or four constituencies in Southern Rhodesia where there were enough African voters to give a majority because of the African community being concentrated in certain urban areas. Mr. Hlazo agreed at this point and he referred to his birthplace at Cala, Transkei, where an African majority returned European M.P.'s. Unfortunately there were no Africans who had stood for election in Southern Rhodesia.

He felt that Federation had come with something new and something better. After less than seven years of it, the races were coming together. It would be wise for the Africans not to oppose Federation. The best policy was to give something new a sincere trial to see if it worked, and if it did not work one could then point to where it had gone wrong, and remedy the defects.

He thought that the Southern Rhodesia Territorial Parliament had a provision for Africans to be elected, and at the next election there would be Africans in that Parliament. It was pointed out that though the African had never been barred in theory from becoming a Member of Parliament, it had not happened in forty years of self-government in Southern Rhodesia. Mr. Hlazo said that was why he wanted support for Federation, because the African Members in the Northern Territories were interested in African progress and African representation being gained in the Southern Rhodesia Territorial Parliament, that was the biggest thing they could fight for. Mr. Hlazo thought that the reason why many qualified Africans did not bother to register was because some of them did not take much trouble to learn about the power of the vote. He said there was little emphasis laid on the teaching of civics in African schools. He had found that even many highly qualified people did not understand the value of the vote. Africans here did not greatly interest themselves in politics at present; they had not given as much consideration to it as the African in the Northern Territories.

He agreed that there used to be far greater discrimination in past years than was the case now, and the chances of Africans getting into Parliament in Southern Rhodesia were greater than in earlier times, for many reasons, including improved economic standards. He reiterated that the whole attitude of the European was changing considerably, and this was likely to bring about the practical application of partnership. In this connection he referred to the different policies of political Parties (see appendix to his memorandum) as being the chief stumbling block. If the different political parties could only agree on a unified Native policy there would be much less fear and suspicion.

The kind of government did not matter as long as people did the right thing. He instanced the fact that at one time there was no more liberal policy than that of the Cape of Good Hope in South Africa, though it was quite different today. His forefathers had become British subjects on the 14th May, 1835, when they made three solemn vows, including one of loyalty to the British Queen. When the Union of South Africa was formed, the Cape Province insisted on certain entrenched clauses in the Constitution which could only be removed by a two-thirds majority of the two Houses sitting together. In the same way, partnership was something new: if the definition could be so enshrined in the Federal Constitution that it would be an offence for anyone to attempt to remove it, then world opinion would be the arbiter. Mr. Hlazo said he would like to see it enshrined in a Bill of Rights.

Mr. Hlazo went on to say that the ideas of the Labour Party in the United Kingdom did not seem to help the Africans very much because they were just looking at one side. In this respect he was referring to the "grandmother mentality" (paragraph 13) mentioned in his memorandum. In connection with the opposition parties in Parliament, he said that in politics people had a way of saying things before they got into power; but they did different things after they had achieved it. The ordinary African was like a grandchild, and believed anything he read in the newspaper.

Expounding on his paragraph 3, "The Haves had to always keep a sharp lookout that the Have-nots must be kept down in every way by looting everything they endeavoured to raise. Thus the Haves found industries in looting which discouraged others to make any headway", Mr. Hlazo said that referred to African rule, because at one time the Africans had no say. He thought the present system, where everybody had a say, represented a remarkable and favourable change.

Referring to his suggestion in paragraph 14 that the poten-

The African school population should be earmarked for planning ahead. Mr. Hlazo said that the ordinary African in the rural areas, seeing the wonderful industries rising in the urban areas, thought the Government did not care much for those outside the towns. He would like these industries expanded into the rural areas so that the people there could also be absorbed. By his suggestion of "more actual action among the Africans", he meant that they should be really co-operative and learn that these things are for their own advantage. For instance, when an ordinary African went to work in a factory, he thought only of his wages without thinking that this factory was also important for the African population as a whole. The African should take more part in it.

Memorandum

REV. J. L. PRETORIUS, M.P.—Chairman of the Federal African Affairs Board.

I shall be grateful if you will bring the following evidence to the notice of the Commission and if you will indicate to the Commission that I shall be grateful for an opportunity to give oral evidence.

In this statement I shall restrict myself to two aspects of the matter only: (a) Causes of Resistance to Federation in Nyasaland; (b) The African Affairs Board.

(a) Causes of Resistance to Federation in Nyasaland

1. The urge for freedom has been in the hearts of the people all the time, and through the years there has been a minority who had rather strong feelings on the matter, but they lacked the educational training that would have enabled them to express themselves in a convincing manner. Declarations issued by the Colonial Office from time to time on its policy of developing the Colonies towards self-government raised their hopes. When, after the Second World War, the promises of self-government were more clearly stated these elements in Nyasaland became very hopeful, and when the possibility of a Federation with the two Rhodesias was mooted they felt that it would mean the end of their hopes of freedom.

2. In addition to this, nearly every African objected to their country being tied in any way with Southern Rhodesia. They knew Southern Rhodesia very well. Nearly every man had worked in Southern Rhodesia at one time or another and they feared that the restrictions which they experienced in Southern Rhodesia might come to Nyasaland. Now with regard to this fear, two considerations should be borne in mind.

In the first place as aliens they were more restricted in Southern Rhodesia than the locals and as strangers they suffered a number of disabilities which made their lot harder than that of the indigenous African population. Consequently, they had an exaggerated picture of Southern Rhodesian disabilities.

In the second place, the contrast between the restrictions which they found in Southern Rhodesian towns and the freedom of movement which they enjoyed in Nyasaland, made this Nyasaland freedom the more precious to them.

3. The policy of extremely cautious constitutional development in Nyasaland caused African leaders to feel that it was Southern Rhodesia which retarded development. When, in 1955 Congress' proposal for parity at the unofficial level was turned down, it was a severe blow to the more moderate elements in Congress, and many came to believe that only extremism would achieve their object and that it was the fact of their being within the Federation which was holding up constitutional development.

4. The failure of the Federal Government to appreciate the strategic importance of the professionally qualified African offended the well educated African and caused him to look upon partnership as a mockery. By starting such people in a branch lower than that of an European of the same qualification, they offended the young African right at the start of his career.

5. Too much was made of the economic benefits which were coming to Nyasaland. It is true to say that the country as a whole benefited, but the villager did not personally feel the benefits. One has reason to believe that he has less money in his pocket today than previously. There has been some increase in his earnings from the land but there are indications that the increase in his cost of living has been much higher than the increase of his earnings. Such a person finds it hard to believe that he is now better off than he was before.

6. It is widely believed that had the Colonial Office told officials to propagate the idea of Federation right at the start the African could have been won over to the idea. This might have helped at the time, but it is very doubtful if its effect would have been lasting. The words of the District Commissioners would only have had a lasting effect if the policy followed had produced beneficial results in which a large section of the villagers had a share. The situation worsened, not because the District Commissioners did not speak, but because the white politicians never gave a thought to the villager and because the Federal Government had no economic development programme for Nyasaland in operation.

7. They never had a guilty conscience about being unco-operative because they felt they had no share in the decision that Nyasaland should be within the Federation; and there may be no end to our troubles unless they know that at some stage they will be allowed to decide for themselves.

(b) The African Affairs Board

As will be seen from its history, the African Affairs Board has never had a warm welcome from the Federal Assembly. The Government Party does not feel entirely comfortable in its presence and the Opposition has always been against the existence of such a body. The reason is that no Parliament likes to have a watchdog watching its proceedings and those who went to the 1953 Conference on the Constitution accepted this peculiar body, merely because there was no other way out.

To start with, its very peculiarity was a disadvantage and when it was realised that the majority of the members of the first Board did not belong to the ruling party and were sometimes out of sympathy with the party, the tension between the Board and Government increased. This resulted in the method of discussion and consultation giving way to that of debate. But, in spite of this tension, the arrangement was not unfruitful in its efforts as the story of its activities shows.

The majority of the members of the present Board belong to the ruling party and consequently some of those not belonging to this particular party do not have the same confidence in this Board as they had in the previous Board. The new Board is only nine months old and has not had a chance of showing what it will be capable of in a crisis. If under such circumstances the members of the Board are able to forget to what party they belong, its findings will (on account of the affiliations of its members) carry much weight with the present Government.

The Party Caucus has informed its members who serve on the Board that the Caucus will not instruct them under any circumstances how to vote on the Board, and so far there is no evidence that all party members vote according to the wishes of their party.

It is also true to say that in its day-to-day vigilance the Board has not been less successful than the previous one in getting differentiating clauses in Bills amended, and with regard to such a major policy matter as the regulations pertaining to commissioned officers, it registered a measure of success in no mean order.

But this situation may not be due to the system only. One ventures to suggest that it may also be due to the personalities of those serving on the present Board. Had there been even one domineering personality on the Board, the position might have been less happy. It may also be due to the strong position in which the present Government finds itself. Had there been a numerically strong Opposition, the Board might have found itself in a difficult position. With a strong body opposing it the Governing Party will naturally be inclined to give more attention to moves by the Opposition than to the advice of the Board. In such a situation the Board will still be of moral value and a restraining influence, but it will not be able to show the array of practical achievements in such a short time as it did under present conditions.

The Board has served a useful purpose and it seems as if we shall need some such body as long as we have different racial groups living in this country. But the Board would have been more useful and, at times, less embarrassing, if it was consulted at the drafting stage of Bills where some controversial matter is likely to arise.

We are now nearing a stage in our development where we shall not need an African Affairs Board, but a body that will look after the interests of all racial groups. A Council of State may be the answer, but if such a body is to have the confidence of everybody, the four Governments should have an equal say in its election. There will, no doubt, be several proposals as to the composition of such a body. Perhaps the following proposal merits consideration:—

A Council of twenty-four members all of over thirty years of age and appointed as follows—

From each Territorial Government the following—

- 1 Chief nominated by the Governor.
- 1 African nominated by the Governor.
- 2 Europeans nominated by the Governor.
- 2 Members elected by Territorial Legislatures.

From the Federal Government the following—

- 4 Members elected by the Assembly.
- 1 Asian nominated by the Governor-General.
- 1 Euro-African nominated by the Governor General.

The Chairman to be nominated by the Governor-General from among the members.

No apology is offered for nominations on racial lines. Ten of the members will be elected on a non-racial basis, but unless the 14 remaining members are nominated on a racial basis, the balance of interests in the Council cannot be guaranteed, and for many years to come a balance of racial groups will be necessary.

Oral Evidence

REV. J. L. PRETORIUS, M.P.—Chairman of the Federal African Affairs Board.

The witness made the following points in amplification of his memorandum:—

- (a) The feeling among Africans in Nyasaland against Federation was very strong. At least part of the responsibility for the slow constitutional development in that country was attributed to Southern Rhodesia. When constitutional proposals were under discussion, agreement had been reached between the African and European non-official members in the Nyasaland Legislature supporting a move to parity of representation in the Legislative Council. This had only broken down because of pressure from Europeans in Southern Rhodesia. When this took place, the Africans had, in his view, displayed more statesmanship than the Europeans; but the result had been to put power firmly into the hands of extremists.
- (b) If African co-operation in Nyasaland was to be re-established, a completely new outlook was required from the Europeans. It was difficult to expect a responsible reaction from Europeans in Southern Rhodesia which would really take into account the aspirations of African leaders; but without this it was difficult to see how confidence could be re-established in Nyasaland. He considered it to be essential that white leaders should get rid of the practice of ignoring leaders whom the Africans had chosen themselves.
- (c) In any revision of the Federal constitution, it would be necessary to replace the African Affairs Board with some alternative body having power to protect all minority interests. At the present time the Indian and Coloured communities often needed a champion more than the Africans. Such a body might be a Council of State on the lines set out in his memorandum.
- (d) The Council of State should be empowered to concern itself with Territorial legislation as well as Federal legislation. Only by treating the Southern Rhodesia Government or a par with the other three Governments would African confidence be restored.
- (e) There should be one qualification for the franchise. The special roll gave Africans the feeling that they had been cheated of their rights.
- (f) The witness did not favour universal suffrage; indeed, any African who was in favour of democracy realised that a qualitative franchise was the most satisfactory answer provided that it was a franchise for a common roll.

Memorandum

SINOIA ASIAN ASSOCIATION—A. L. Rahman, Hon. Secretary.

I have the pleasure to inform you that our Association is prepared to send a delegation of two or more to give oral evidence before the Monckton Commission during its sittings in the Federation.

It is desired to give evidence on the following:—

1. Our Territory (Southern Rhodesia) within the Federation.
2. Our position as Asians in Southern Rhodesia and our disabilities.
3. Desirability of Federation. (Pros. & Cons.).
4. Desirability of continued British Protection for Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland.
5. Education.
6. Franchise.

I would be very grateful therefore if you will kindly let me know of the approval of this application at your earliest convenience.

Oral Evidence

SINOIA ASIAN ASSOCIATION Represented by: B. Govan and A. L. Rahman.

In giving oral evidence on behalf of the Sinoia Asian Association, Mr. Govan referred to item 1 of their memorandum—"Our territory, Southern Rhodesia". They wished to make it clear that they considered they were fortunate to be in a very good country, a wealthy, prosperous country, where most of the development had been achieved through hard work. They considered, however, the country could still be a much better place in which to live if full opportunities were given to all the inhabitants. At the present moment a vast section of the population was deprived of most of the benefits which should be made available to all its citizens. For their part they were prepared to accept the Federation, to go ahead with it and try to make a success of it. But they were not prepared to accept the terms of Federation at any price. There were a lot of conditions, particularly based upon race, which were not satisfactory.

Mr. Govan referred to the fact that although there are a lot of schools in this country, those schools are not available to all the children, particularly the Asian, Coloured and African children. In his own area there was a new secondary school put up at great expense, but only about forty European children had been enrolled. It was a sad thing to see most of their children walking about the streets not well equipped in mind and spirit. He mentioned the four grades of schools, teacher-training, technical, secondary and primary schools. In all those schools the facilities for their children and African children were very poor indeed. The money spent on the secondary school referred to was provided by the Government, which meant the Coloured people, who were part and parcel of the population, were being deprived of that benefit. If similar facilities were provided for all sections of the population, they would not complain; but these things were done for one section of the community, not for the others, and the others were told to wait because there were no resources available.

Mr. Govan mentioned the discriminatory practice in regard to the pay and terms of African teachers in the Civil Service. The standard of promotion was not satisfactory in the lower grades. There was also the question of teachers transferred from one school to another. An Asian teacher would only be transferred to another Asian or Coloured school; this also applied to an African; but a European teacher would sometimes be transferred from a European school to any of the other schools.

At present in the colony there were only two Government secondary schools to prepare their children for higher education, and that was insufficient. A number of children were turned away from the secondary schools because of lack of facilities. They felt that something should be done to admit them; and that the secondary stage of education should be multi-racial. They wished for something to be done for the girls, and there should be separate higher education for Asian girls, who could not even train as nurses at present.

The witness said also that there were not enough hospitals to serve their population. The only hospitals for Asians were in the larger centres; in the smaller areas there were no facilities. In the outlying areas there were European hospitals, but the Asians and Africans were not admitted to them, and they had to travel long distances to go to the nearest hospital available for them. Some years ago, because of lack of hospital facilities at Que Que, the witness's little daughter had died of malaria.

Moreover they had no maternity wards in their hospitals; no isolation wards were available for them and they simply had to use one unit, which was most unsatisfactory. The facilities for African maternity cases were also very bad because most of the African mothers who give birth at the hospital were discharged the same day.

Mr. Govan mentioned that the only branch of the Civil Service open to the Asian and Coloured communities was the teachers' side. He considered that they should be accepted in the higher grades in all branches.

In regard to the development of land, the witness said that new townships were being planned, but these were virtually closed to them. They could not participate in new housing schemes. There were many clauses of the Land Apportionment Act which must go.

Mr. Govan also referred to discrimination on the Railways in reserving accommodation. Seats were only available to them in the first coach; and railway travel was no longer a pleasure for them. Yet this was a national transport system.

The witness then referred to trade unions. Their doors were closed to them, although it was true the Government was trying to improve matters. The African who worked with the European was only allowed to pick up a tool and hand it to the European doing the job, and nothing further.

On the question of entertainment and hotels, the witness referred to the fact that there were only about three hotels that were multi-racial. If hotels were to close their doors against them he wondered what success partnership would have in this part of the world. Even public amenities such as swimming baths, provided by the funds of the ratepayers, were closed to them. There was also a great deal of discrimination in the field of sport, and even in barbers' shops. Asians and Africans were not allowed to enter a butchery and select their purchase according to their choice. All these things worked against a good relationship and against the concept of partnership.

On being questioned about the franchise system, the witnesses said their community felt that if the Government were to be truly representative—a government of the people working for the people—then it should not try to disqualify a certain section of the population by bringing about the disparity in the voters' rolls. They considered it utterly wrong to have a preferential system. They thought the qualifications were in any case too high for both the Territorial and the Federal systems. They would lower the qualification to what it was before it had been raised. They considered that a great many people who were responsible and educated were being pushed off the voters' roll because they had not the monetary qualifications. There should be one roll based on the previous Federal franchise.

In the witness's opinion, if Federation were to disappear, the two Northern Territories would not suffer to any great extent. But if Southern Rhodesia were given independence the conditions in this country would become even worse, particularly for the less privileged, as they would have no protection from the United Kingdom. As it was, the Federal Government was largely influenced by the Territorial Government of Southern Rhodesia.

For his Association, the witness expressed the opinion that if there were a change of Government the Asians would not be considered, because the Government did not depend on their support and they might very well take them off the voters' roll. They had no safeguards, and for that reason they would insist that until such time as this country became truly multi-racial there should be, both in the Territorial and Federal Houses, reserved seats for each racial group. Mr. Govan thought the reserved seats in the Federal Parliament for Asians and Coloureds should be by election, as were the reserved Federal seats for Africans in Southern Rhodesia.

The witness said he was in business and employed about twenty people, none of whom was a European. He did not employ Africans in responsible positions: this was not because of racial discrimination but because it would mean putting his own people out of work. Asked whether his attitude on this was not the same as that of the European trade unions, he said he did not think so. He employed those whom he thought were the best people for certain departments. If people in his position wanted to give Africans positions of responsibility, there was nothing to stop them, but it would mean that they themselves would be jobless.

Asked why Asians did not move into different spheres of business such as, for example, hairdressing and butchery, in order to serve their community, Mr. Govan said there were Asian butchers and hairdressers practising in Salisbury. He explained that Asians were not allowed to set up as building contractors because of a law preventing this, though there were Asian building contractors in Northern Rhodesia. The law came under the local authority and he fancied that sometimes the local authority used more power than it ought to. It was something which should be investigated.

He went on to say that Asians wished to see all education under the Federal Government, because this would build up a good relationship among the people. He considered education should be multi-racial at all stages, and did not mind his children learning with Africans. He thought there would be no language difficulty because most Africans were beginning to speak English and were proud of it. Multi-racial schooling would bring all the races together.

Referring again to the inadequate number of hospitals and schools, he said this only applied to the Asian and African sections of the public, and not the Europeans. In his district most of the Africans had been learning under the "shade of trees". The European child did not suffer because everything was provided for him. About a year ago an Asian school had been built, after a tremendous struggle, which cost only £6,000 as compared with £70,000 for the European school. This primary school had no facilities for sports. The school had at present a roll of 101 pupils, this being its first year.

Asked whether he was prepared to agree to higher taxation being imposed in order to pay for more schools and greater facilities, he said he would be quite happy, everybody would willingly pay more. He said that when the African poll tax had been increased a few years ago from £1 to £2, the Africans had freely accepted it, after it had been made clear that the extra funds would be used to further African education. He felt sure that people would gladly subscribe more for this purpose. He said there were no Asian private schools; but there was one Asian missionary school in Que Que; a lot of money had been subscribed in his area towards the erection of a school.

He wished for continued British protection in the Northern Territories and his Association felt the British Government should retain their protective powers until such time as the Federal State became fully multi-racial. Only then would it be acceptable to all. At present, the opposition to Federation resulted from lack of understanding of the benefits which it could bring.

His Association did not accept any form of racial superiority, European or African. They believed themselves to be Rhodesians, and wished to live as Rhodesians in Central Africa as part of the Commonwealth. The future of the Federation would depend on the ability of Europeans, Africans, Asians and Coloureds to work together without fear on either side.

Memorandum

W. A. NICOL

The points I propose to emphasise in this memorandum are as follows:—

1. The majority of Africans are not ready for political responsibility.
2. They need educational and economic advancement to prepare them for political responsibility.
3. State and private investment should be encouraged to invest in the Northern Territories to enable this advancement to occur.
4. The Federal and Territorial Governments must be elected by advanced Africans, Asians, Coloureds and Europeans measuring up to a high franchise qualification.
5. The very difficult problems facing the Territorial and Federal Governments due to the heterogeneous and backward nature of the population will require men of outstanding ability and integrity to solve them. Hence, the electorate must be restricted to people of discernment.
6. The history of Southern Rhodesia, because of this country's phenomenal and peaceful advancement, should be studied and used as a guide in planning the future of the Federation.
7. Introduce English as a universal language in the Federation as rapidly as possible.

To counter the impression of bias against the African the following remarks will create, I will start by explaining my views on these people and how I came to hold them. I have been fairly intimately associated with Africans since 1936. From that time until 1952 (excluding the war years) I worked amongst them organising their transport between Northern Rhodesia and Angola and the Gold mines in the Union of South Africa. Since 1952 I have farmed in Southern Rhodesia employing only African workers. Circumstances have thus compelled me to know them quite well. I have found them honest and cheerful but primitive in their way of life and ambitions. Politically, primitive Africans are completely ignorant. Those with a little education are easily induced to carry on like European university students bitten by the communist or other ultra liberal bug—full of Utopian ideas with no practicable suggestions to implement them. Those with enough education and character to acquire decent jobs as clerks, foremen, artisans, etc., and those who set up successfully in business themselves, are generally happy enough occupied with their own affairs without worrying about politics. (These are the Africans with whom I have had most experience). Any political views they hold are naturally aimed at preserving their own comfortable circumstances. Consequently they are happy to support the stable Government provided by the predominantly European electorate. This is proved by the small number of Africans who have bothered to register as voters in Southern Rhodesia where there are believed to be over 10,000 Africans qualified to register. These are the people intimidated by ruffians employed by nationalist African political bodies. They do not care enough about political issues to risk their well-being supporting or opposing them and consequently their views are seldom heard publicly. I am satisfied that the majority of these Africans are no different from Europeans in that they will support the Government they think will benefit them most. Unfortunately, they are still in such a small minority in the total African population that they are easily intimidated into silence and self appointed African political leaders claiming to speak for all Africans are seldom opposed by the conservative compatriots. It is in the goodwill of these advanced industrious Africans that the future of the Federation and each of its component territories lies. So we have at the one end of the scale the primitive and the half educated and more educated but unemployed Africans who provide perfect soil for the seeds of false propaganda and agitation sown by self seeking African political aspirants, in the middle the industrious African anxious to live in comfort and security, and at the other end the educated professional and successful business man. It should be made clear that the first mentioned Africans are too ignorant to be politically mature and can never have a say in the affairs of the country until they graduate to the second stage. People in the second and third stage enjoy full political rights in the Federal and all Territorial systems of franchise and do play an ever increasingly important role in political affairs.

The federation of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland is probably one of the most difficult political exercises ever attempted because the population of the three territories is so heterogeneous. There are scores of tribes of Africans all speaking their own languages or local dialects of the many languages used. There is no common language and there are very few individuals who could carry on a simple conversation with as many as a dozen of the different African tribes. The difficulty of explaining the pros and cons of Federation to such a heterogeneous population is easily appreciated. Of the seven and a half million Africans living in the Federation, perhaps a million have an elementary education and ten thousand a higher education. Those with university education can be counted in tens. These are the people the preamble to the Federal constitution states must decide the future status of the three large territories with immense resources of mineral and other natural wealth. The three hundred thousand odd civilised Europeans, Coloureds and Asians who are also inhabitants of the Federation will also have their say, but obviously if the words of the preamble are taken literally their enlightened opinions may be swamped by weight of numbers. Up to the present only a part of the 7,000,000 illiterate Africans has been reached politically by men of their own tribes, who have set themselves up as political leaders. Most of these people whose records have been investigated have turned out to be men who have not successfully held down any kind of a job previously and have nothing to recommend them as honest political leaders working in the best interests of the people they claim to represent. In fact, they are often shiftless individuals with a gift of the gab who are stirring up political unrest with a hope of benefiting from the resulting chaos. The politically ignorant tribesmen, misled by these mountebanks, have usually demonstrated their emotions by smashing up their own beerhalls or mission stations which have for years helped them or defying their District Commissioner whose duties are devoted to the furtherance of their interests. In short, 95% of the seven and a half million Africans in the Federation are politically immature and will remain so until they have advanced educationally and economically at least to the standard of the lower paid Europeans in the Federation. Political rights will follow because franchise in the Federation is based on qualifications which do not include colour, race or creed.

It follows that if Federation is to succeed with the backing of the Africans, the Africans must have Federation fairly presented to those whose education is sufficient to enable them to understand its meaning, and those who are not sufficiently advanced to understand Federation must be protected from the false propaganda of agitators who are working only for their own selfish ends.

There is one simple step which will take us half way to achieving this. The Colonial Office should reverse its original instructions to its staff in the territories which were to leave Africans to decide for themselves on Federation. This policy has proved wrong because it left the field open to agitators to whip up opposition to Federation amongst people who couldn't and probably never could understand its meaning and implications. (A visit by the Commission to tribesmen in rural and urban areas in their villages will demonstrate the primitive African's inability to make decisions on national policies). The Colonial district official is traditionally regarded by the rural African as his guide in the mysteries of European administration. When he received no guidance about Federation he was nonplussed and disinterested until someone else told him it was a bad thing. Then he naturally turned against Federation. Instructions should therefore be given to district officials in all territories to explain the advantages of Federation and vigorously counter false propaganda decrying it.

A second step towards fitting the primitive and poorly educated African to take his proper place as a worker and intelligent member of the community, I suggest, is the teaching of English as quickly as possible. There is at present no African language common to the three territories or even one language common to all parts of any one of the territories. It follows that any authority trying to disseminate information to every individual in the Federation must issue it in about a dozen different languages. Apart from the expense of such a system it is not practicable. African languages were evolved to meet the needs of the people who formulated them, primitive Africans. It is not difficult to appreciate that African languages are not suitable for the conduct of civilised modern business intercourse. There is a very limited amount of literature available in any African language now and not much prospect of such literature being available for very many years. To fully enjoy the advantages of education one must read, and obviously the only language that can provide enough literature in the Federation within the foreseeable future is English. The official language of all the Federal territories is English, but there are still millions of Africans with less than a working knowledge of this language, the only language spoken in all parts of the Federation. For these reasons, and to meet every practical situation, English must be the universal language of the Federation. Once this is accepted, it is the immediate and urgent duty of the authorities to have it taught to all people as rapidly as possible.

The need to multiply the rate of education of Africans throughout the Federation is so obvious that no comment is required. However, the Colonial Office could benefit from a study of the Southern Rhodesian Native Department's method of advancing African education. Southern Rhodesia, with far less money at its disposal, has educated far more Africans than any other African territory with all the wealth of the British Government to support it.

Education costs money and that money will be found in the long run in the economic development of the Federation. Here again a lesson can be learnt from Southern Rhodesia's history. Development in Southern Rhodesia has been phenomenal since Federation, whereas Federation has made comparatively little impact on Northern Rhodesia's and less on Nyasaland's industrial development. The main reason for this is the investor's fear of the uncertain political future of the two northern territories. Without investment these two territories will not advance in any way, because economic advancement is essential for any other kind of advancement. It is therefore necessary for the Colonial Office to encourage investment by ensuring a stable political future for these two territories. This can be done by devising a constitution for each territory that will ensure that the control remains in the hands of informed and responsible people and permit no possibility of the Government of the Territory falling into the hands of political charlatans elected by gullible African villagers, whom the Commission will see during the course of its investigations can have no conception of the intricacies of running a modern state, let alone a state bedevilled by racial antipathies and ignorance and poverty and superstition. When investors are satisfied that their money will be protected by stable government in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, that money will flow into those territories. There is wide scope for investment there, but the recent unruly behaviour of its ignorant population has stopped that flow almost completely.

Coupled with the encouragement given to private investors, the British Government should itself make much larger investments in the two territories in the form of Government capital expenditure on such projects as transport and communication systems, agricultural research, supply of electricity and schools and hospitals. These could be in the form of long term loans repayable in due course by the Federation or Territorial Governments concerned. In this connection a study of Professor Jack's report on Nyasaland is a "must" for the Commission.

While the African inhabitants of the Federation have been provoked into opposing Federation, the European population are in danger of developing a sense of resentment from the many criticisms made by leading politicians and newspapers in Britain. While it is not possible for the British Government to muzzle people or newspapers it could easily conduct a campaign in Britain to show that Federation is for the benefit of all inhabitants of the Federation. The Europeans of Southern Rhodesia are after all the most liberal Europeans of Africa. As stated previously they have done more for the education of the Africans than any one else. The same applies to the health service in Southern Rhodesia. The franchise has never excluded anyone on a colour basis. These are but a few examples of the Southern Rhodesian policy of advancing the African as rapidly as possible. It would be in the interests of all if the truth of the Europeans' genuine desire throughout the Federation to advance the African as quickly as possible could be put across to the British public in reply to the lies, innuendoes and unfair criticism to which we are so often subject. The point of these remarks is that the Federation needs Europeans now and will need them in the future to assist the advancement of the African. The activities of the newspeople and politicians in Britain are leading Europeans here to believe that Britain wishes to hand over Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland to the Africans living there as soon as they can get these two bugbears off their hands without a thought for the Europeans in those countries. The way Britain has withdrawn from her colonial territories in recent years gives weight to these thoughts. The result is that Europeans in the North are thinking of getting out while the going is good. It is significant that many who can afford it, now send their children to the Union of South Africa for education and that the tendency to have children learn Afrikaans instead of French as a second language is increasing. Further, while the thought of integration with the Union of South Africa has been repugnant to most Southern Rhodesians in the past, people in this colony are beginning to think they might have no alternative. In short, the Europeans are losing confidence in Federation. In the last year, for the first time since Federation, there has been a drop in the number of immigrants entering the Federation. This also can only be the result of adverse publicity in Britain. To put it bluntly, the irresponsible behaviour of the press and some politicians and clerics in Britain is depriving the Federation of a badly needed increase in the small but necessary nucleus of trained Europeans. The British Government should take steps to counter this tendency.

If the British Government is not prepared to take all the steps mentioned above to make Federation a success and a benefit to all its inhabitants because they will not put up the money, clearly her so called "protection" of the northern territories is really a drag on their development.

The extremely rapid industrial development coupled with the advance of the African's earning power, educational, economic and political advancement in Southern Rhodesia should be considered by the Commission. Clearly these things have been achieved by enlightened government. Southern Rhodesia has no material advantages of the two northern territories. The only difference is that the Southern Rhodesian Government is comprised of men chosen by an electorate limited by a fairly high franchise, to people calculated to choose their parliamentary representatives on merit rather than by emotion, and the northern territories are governed by Colonial Office officials temporarily there whose outlook must be that of a disinterested foreigner, concerned with the day to day problems of administration but unworried by the future of a country in which neither he nor his children will live after his term of office. While the colonial system of administration keeps the peace in static communities, it does not meet the needs of a rapidly developing modern state. The commission should therefore aim at devising a constitution for the northern territories which will give them a government made up of the very best of local men regardless of colour, race or creed. There are two essentials in such a constitution. No ministerial post or other government office should be reserved to an African or a European because of his race. The people to elect the governments must be limited to those with the knowledge, responsibility and experience to choose the best men only. The franchise must be high and the principle of one man one vote or anything like it must be forgotten. Over 90% of the Africans in the Federation have not the faintest idea of politics or interest in anything beyond their own private lives. To ask them to participate in elections on issues which they do not understand is unfair to them. They can worry about that when they have developed into responsible citizens. In the meantime, the management of the country's affairs should be left in the capable hands of the competent minority who have made such a phenomenal success in the past as shown in Southern Rhodesia. It is, of course, the duty of the Commission to see as many people in the Federation as possible and take an unbiased view of what they see. A fair comparison between the lot of the rural African in Southern Rhodesia and his counterparts in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland will show which form of government benefits these people most. The same result will be obtained from an examination of the lot of industrial and agricultural employees in the three territories. A further proof of the merit of a government comprised of local men is the difference in the development of Nyasaland and Barotseland on the one hand and the rest of Northern Rhodesia on the other hand. For a number of years elected local men have had some influence on the colonial office controlled government in Northern Rhodesia. However, the local men have been chosen by an enlightened electorate. To hand this choice over to Africans in their present state of development would be criminal folly.

Oral Evidence

W. A. NICOL

Asked how he suggested that the unifying influence of the English language should be promoted, the witness said that this would primarily be through education and also through the medium of official documents. He thought that the reason why some Africans who were qualified failed to register was that those qualified to vote were comfortable, and that if pressure were put upon them to register they would probably do so. Asked if he thought it was a fact that over 90% of the Africans in Nyasaland were not interested in politics, the witness said he could not speak definitely of the situation in that Territory. Asked further whether he regarded the representation of Africans in Southern Rhodesia as adequate, he said that the European members of the Legislature represented the Africans as well as the Europeans. He thought that the growth of industry in Southern Rhodesia had been influenced by the political situation in the Northern Territories, but there were also better facilities in Southern Rhodesia. The present franchise qualifications were in his view adequate, and any Nyasaland franchise should be on the same lines as the Federal franchise. He appreciated the psychological effect of a high franchise qualification on African opinion, but it was necessary to press on with education, and not bring into the Government people who were really unfitted for it.

Since Mr. Nicol gave evidence to the Commission he wrote an addendum in the following terms:—

"When I appeared before your commission yesterday, it was mentioned that a high standard of franchise in the Federation would dishearten Africans because they would see no prospect of their ever having any say in the Government of the country. I suggested that the answer was to press on with the education of Africans to enable them to qualify as soon as possible. I would like to add that everything possible must be done to advance them economically as quickly as possible. In the meantime, I would suggest that they be encouraged to take part in local administration and that legislation be passed to make this possible. I understand that this is done to some extent in Northern Rhodesia already. The suggested action, apart from going some way to meet the aspirations of politically conscious Africans, will provide a form of apprenticeship for those who will in time participate in national politics. There is of course nothing new in the suggestion. Many members of parliament in all countries practising a parliamentary system of Government graduate from service in local authorities."

Memorandum

SOUTHERN RHODESIA ASSOCIATION—N. H. Wilson.

Part I

Purpose of the Southern Rhodesia Association is, primarily to save this Colony from passing to African rule for the foreseeable future.

This danger arises from the present Federal and territorial franchise laws.

Its secondary purpose is, if it is unable to secure such amendment of the Federal franchise as shall effect this, to promote the Secession of Southern Rhodesia from the Federation.

Part II

The Colony, and the Federation, are not yet ready for democracy with a wide franchise.

Vide The Character of British Democracy by A. K. White, Lecturer on Political Philosophy, The University of Glasgow (1945).

Vide also, Chapter VI of Central African Dilemma, by N. H. Wilson (1954).

Part III

The danger of the present franchise resulting in African rule.

Vide speech by Sir John Moffat MP, in Federal Assembly, July 1, 1958. (Federal Hansard, 1-7-58, from first paragraph on column 155 to and including the first paragraph on column 157).

Part IV

When Mr. Hopkinson, Minister of State, visited the Colony in 1953, during the referendum campaign regarding Federation, he assured the people of Southern Rhodesia there would be no question whatever of establishing a "Gold Coast" type of government in either of the northern protectorates (i.e. a government controlled by Africans). It was largely on this assurance that the electors of Southern Rhodesia voted in the majority for Federation.

We ask that this assurance by H.M. Minister of State be complied with; or that a "civilisation" qualification for the franchise be instituted: or that Southern Rhodesia be allowed to have another referendum on the question of federation.

Part V

The "Tredgold" Commission on the franchise for Southern Rhodesia (vide lines 209-216 of Report) declared that a franchise based upon (a) educational and (b) economic qualifications did not give any assurance that the voter would be capable of exercising the franchise with judgement and responsibility.

Part VI

We recommend that a suitable "civilization" test for the franchise on the lines of the proposal contained in Chapter VI of Central African Dilemma, or some other test to be approved by the Southern Rhodesian Parliament.

Part VII

This Southern Rhodesian Association is not opposed on the grounds of colour, to Africans having the franchise. It merely wants a civilization test for the franchise to give some assurance that the voters are of a character which will give a liberal democracy a fair chance of success.

Part VIII

If the British Government is already committed to a policy which will ensure control in the northern protectorates and/or the Federation passing into the hands of Africans, we ask that Southern Rhodesia be given the right to secede, after a referendum of the electorate of Southern Rhodesia.

Oral Evidence

SOUTHERN RHODESIA ASSOCIATION

Represented by M. H. Partridge and R. Patterson

Mr. Partridge said that he regretted that Mr. N. H. Wilson, who had prepared the memorandum submitted by the Association was unable to attend on account of illness. The Association was not political, but was concerned with the future of Southern Rhodesia. In the few months in which it had been in existence, its membership had reached more than 5,000 and branches were or shortly would be, in existence in Salisbury, Bulawayo, Gwelo and Umtali.

In expanding the resumé of evidence contained in the Association's memorandum, the witnesses said that the reference to African rule in Part I referred to nationalistic and exclusive African rule which might mean that the rights of the European would come to be ignored altogether. The Association wanted to avoid a Kenya-type solution.

With regard to the franchise, qualifications referred to in Part II, they drew the Commission's attention to the Report of the Southern Rhodesia Franchise Commission of 1957, and to Sir John Moffat's speech in the Federal Assembly on 1st July 1958. Of the remainder of the resumé, much was contained in the Manifesto of the Southern Rhodesia Association, reproduced below.

Mr. Patterson said that the Association had tried to persuade the two main political parties—the United Federal Party and the Dominion Party—to adopt a non-party approach to Southern Rhodesia's problems. There had been parallels in the coalition Governments which had been formed in times of crisis both in the United Kingdom and in South Africa. Sir Edgar Whitehead had, however, not felt able to include representatives of the Dominion Party in his discussions in London on the revision of the Southern Rhodesian constitution. This was very unfortunate, since the Dominion Party had had a majority of the votes at the last election. The witnesses handed a memorandum to the Commission (not reproduced) giving the details of the submission made to Sir Edgar Whitehead and Mr. Harper in this connection.

The witnesses then put forward certain ideas for a definition of "civilisation" designed to provide qualifications for the franchise and for full citizenship rights on the lines of Portuguese East Africa in the "Assimilado". In a discussion with the Commissioners, the witnesses agreed that the test put forward was drafted too vaguely to provide the basis for a judicial test. The witnesses agreed to prepare a more precise definition which they would submit to the Commission as soon as possible in clarification of their proposals.

Annexure

MANIFESTO—N. H. Wilson, Founder; R. Patterson, M. H. Partridge.

1. It is the declared intention of the United Kingdom Government that Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland are within a very few years to be handed over to government by African majorities.

There are several authoritative statements to that effect. A typical one is that made by Lord Home, Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, in the House of Lords on July 27th, 1959, when he said:

"The conception is that as power is transferred from the United Kingdom in respect of the two Northern Territories" (i.e. Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland), "it will be transferred not to the Federal Government, but to the Governments of the two Northern Territories, which will become progressively more and more representative of Africans until they have African majorities."

The essence of this statement has been repeated by several Ministers and Secretaries of State. It can be quoted as virtually a promise that the two Northern Territories, as they are at present, will be handed over to African rule before the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland achieves full self government.

The recent policies adopted by the United Kingdom Government in other states in Africa makes it abundantly clear that it attaches far more importance to the conception that governments must be numerically representative of a state's inhabitants than that they should be responsible or prepared to recognise the liberties of subjects as enshrined in English common law.

This is borne out by the practical effects of the United Kingdom's policy which it continues to desire to implement in as rapid a manner as it deems possible.

2. Should such a policy be implemented in the Northern Territories, it is clear that Southern Rhodesia, if it then remains within the Federation, will in turn come under African control and be subject to present day consequences.

The Southern Rhodesia Association has been formed to prevent that from happening.

3. The primary objective of the Association is, therefore, to ensure that the franchise for all parts of the Federation is maintained in the hands of civilized and responsible inhabitants. (c.f. lines 189 to 192 of the Report of 1957, which reads "We are entirely satisfied that a country is amply justified in making an endeavour to confine the franchise to those of its inhabitants who are capable of exercising it with reason, judgment and public spirit. It is in this sense that we have interpreted 'civilized and responsible persons' as used in our commission"). We consider the implementation of this principle is entirely practicable.

4. The secondary objective of the Association, if it is unable to persuade the United Kingdom Government to accept the civilization qualification for the franchise of the Northern Territories, is to secure the secession of Southern Rhodesia from the Federation in order to preserve government in loyal and responsible hands, an incorrupt and impartial judiciary and police force, also the liberties and freedom of our inhabitants in terms of our common law.

5. It is apparent that the United Kingdom Government is anxious to escape its responsibilities, for which policy it explains its concern as arising at a high moral plane and from a sense of social justice. In our view, however, its policy is only one of commercial and political expediency to suit their needs at the moment. Its actions alone are the very cause of the coming into being of this Association, and it is, therefore, a necessary commitment of the Association that it seeks the removal of all United Kingdom Government political control and influence within the Federation, and the Colony of Southern Rhodesia, loyalty to Her Majesty the Queen and membership within the British Commonwealth alone expected.

6. A necessary corollary of the preceding objective is that the Association seeks (a) the removal of the remaining reservations in the constitution affecting Southern Rhodesia, and (b) that the Federal Constitution be so amended that constitutional reform in either of the Northern Territories be no longer the sole prerogative of the United Kingdom Government with a mere gentleman's agreement of consultation which has not been implemented in practice.

7. The Association views with concern the present lack of financial confidence in the Federation and in Southern Rhodesia. It is satisfied that the main cause of this is the existing uncertainty as to the political future of the Federation as a whole, and as concerns Southern Rhodesia as a territory of the Federation. The Association, therefore, seeks a speedy end to such political uncertainty which can only be affected by ensuring that the 1960 talks result in a conclusive agreement as to the constitutions of the Federation and the Northern Territories.

8. In order to obtain conclusive agreement on these constitutions, this Association seeks to ensure that the United Federal and Dominion party shall joint in a common approach to the 1960 talks, and thereby endeavour to reach common agreement to which both parties subscribe.

We believe that in the face of our rapidly expanding population the first and primary task of government is to ensure the full development of our natural resources. This is in the interests of all our inhabitants, and is a problem of immediate and vital importance which can be solved by ending uncertainty and doubts as to our political future, and by ensuring government is maintained in civilised and responsible hands. Thus, with confidence in a just government re-established capital and skill from the Western world will undoubtedly compete to be of service to us, and we will then be able to create a great Central African State with a tradition of responsibility, common loyalty, freedom and justice.

This Association is not a political party. Its aim is to gain support throughout Southern Rhodesia and so influence all political parties to see that the responsible and civilised people of this country are determined to achieve their country's own future greatness within either the Federation as a whole or as a separate entity but on terms of their own making, and not African Nationalism, fostered by United Kingdom Government expediency.

We, therefore, appeal to all who agree with our objectives to apply for membership and to advise their friends to do likewise.

Memorandum

MAJOR C. T. C. TAYLOR

The nature of my evidence would be that I have been resident in Southern Rhodesia for 33 years, that I gave evidence before the Beveridge Commission, that I was one of the first to propound the idea of a "federation" here, seeing that "amalgamation" had become impossible; I was invited to the first Falls Conference in 1949 as an unofficial observer, and in 1950 did my best in the United Kingdom to spread the idea in quarters of authority.

I have been a citizen of this Federation since it was established, and though the inclusion of Nyasaland with the two Rhodesias was somewhat forced upon us by the United Kingdom Government, whereas I had always felt that Kenya and Tanganyika should come in at the same time to balance it. I still have no doubts whatsoever that the formation of the present Federation was correct, and that its affairs have been conducted in a manner, by the Federal Government which is composed of people who actually live here, that should be a matter of pride to any group of people that form a government.

Therefore, I would say that this present Commission, and those who represent the United Kingdom by sitting in the House of Commons, have no right whatsoever to try to unscramble, or reduce the powers, of civilised government as represented by our Federal Government here; but to grant more powers to help maintain civilisation, and to help protect us from those outside our borders who, for their own selfish ends, are attempting to destroy our rapidly improving economy and, in the fictitious name of "democracy", would destroy also law and order and so introduce chaos.

Oral Evidence

MAJOR C. T. C. TAYLOR

Major Taylor had presented a memorandum. He stated that he was a farmer in peace, and an Intelligence Officer in war. He had lived longer in Southern Rhodesia than anywhere else. He claimed to have started the idea of Federation by propounding "Federal Union" from June 1947. He had preached federation from that time. Previous thinking had been on the lines of amalgamation. His own idea had been to have federation down to the coast. He thought that all the inhabitants were of one country, whatever their colour. He resented the misrepresentations of the press and radio from abroad. He was proud of his citizenship of the Federation, and thought that people should work for their country, not for "the State". As a farmer he had had dealings with many thousands of the Bantu tribes whom he regarded as co-owners of the land with himself, and whom he claimed to understand to a great extent. He spoke of the misrepresentations of the ghastly Daily Mirror produced for morons and illiterates of Great Britain. There was in fact no colour bar in the Federation. It was a culture bar. He referred to his acquaintance with the Turks and the fact that even Lawrence had been unable to tolerate continual social contact with the Arabs. It was a matter of culture, and the difference of background.

He criticised the passes system; but he would give a pass to one of his employees so that he could walk across country and cross a neighbour's estate without being held up. Could that be done in the United Kingdom? He expected his neighbours to respect his signature on a pass so given. Southern Rhodesians were criticised for having a pass system. But they had to look after their employees. Once in a lifetime an African might want to visit the bright lights of Salisbury. They were not used to traffic. What other means was there of tracing them if they had an accident, other than a "situpa"? But by all means let everyone have their monomark. It did not matter so long as the identity of everybody was known.

He had been to Great Britain in 1950, and talked with Members of Parliament and experts on the African scene: such a one was Dr. Rita Hinden, who had lived in Johannesburg up to the age of four, and was therefore regarded as an expert on Africa by the Fabian Society. It was fashionable to decry the whites of Central Africa. But it was really a matter of courtesy out in Central Africa. He had experienced more courtesy from the Bantu than from the whites in London: and in Paris. The whites in Central Africa ought to be courteous too. There were misrepresentations in the press. He had met only three honest journalists in his life. He had also met Lord Lucan in 1950. He thought that to save Africa there ought to be an A and a B roll in Britain: there should also be more seating added in the House of Commons to stop the rush of M.P.s to Central Africa so as to get reputations as experts on Africa.

Agriculture should be on the Federal list. Research under Federal auspices would be better done in a big way from one centre. He was horrified by the waste of land which occurred by allowing peasants to work it without regard to its soil structure and the monsoon system of rains. He himself had developed virgin land, a part of which had already been kraalled on by Africans, and had been ruined. His own employees could now get good crops from this land after its improvement by fertilisers. It was important not to waste the African soil.

Turkish tobacco should be encouraged. It could prove an important crop for Africans because it was possible to produce such tobacco in Central Africa of as good quality as that grown in Turkey.

He was Deputy Chairman of the Federal Tourist Board, and had been President of the Regional Development and Publicity Association for the last seven years. He did this work without payment. He considered that the tourist industry was that most calculated to spread wealth through the people. 112,000 tourists visited the Federation last year. That was poor by comparison with other places, but it showed that the possibilities were great. Moreover, this figure did not include local visitors.

National Parks were a Federal subject, but they only existed in Southern Rhodesia. The Kafue National Park was only held temporarily in trust. He did not know why. National Parks should be completely Federal, so that they could extend the amenities for tourists. There was also a chance to develop tourism as a new industry in Nyasaland. The Lake needed development: there was nothing to do there at present but look at the water or go into it.

The tourist industry was not sufficiently developed, although there was now a liaison officer for Northern Rhodesia. Every incident stirred up by people in the House of Commons had as an effect a stoppage in the pipeline of tourists. There had been a setback in Nyasaland. The African staff had actually refused to work for tourists in the Palm Beach area. Such conduct would not help anyone. It was true that the tourists were mostly of the Caucasian race (a term which he preferred to European), but there would be others in time.

He thought it bad that the Secretariat in Zomba had to work in a "London fog", with only one poor electric light. Someone there should rebuild the Secretariat so as to give the civil servants a chance. Civil servants in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland should be made to feel that they belonged to the country.

Southern Rhodesia, a state or country to be proud of, should be given more credit for the lack of any serious injury from civil strife since the Matabele rising in 1896.

In reply to questions, Major Taylor made the following further points:

1. He had toured in Northern Rhodesia from the point of view of encouraging tourism and agreed that a large proportion of the people there feared Federation. He thought the remedy would be to bring them down to Southern Rhodesia to see how well everyone got on there.

2. He referred to the former division of post offices into "European" and "Native" sides. The difficulty was that there had been at that time special counters for the Bantu, manned by people who understood them. Many of the Bantu were just peasants. They used to have a lady behind the counter to explain postal business to them, and who understood them. Now everyone was mixed up together. An intelligent person had to wait while someone was being given an explanation of postal business.

3. He thought that in Northern Rhodesia there were too few industries. There was need for a more varied economy.

4. He hoped that the Africans would learn to treat tourists well, and not throw stones at them. Tourism meant easy money and pleasant money. He had been impressed by the example of Chief Nsefu's camp at Luangwa, where all the money went to the Chief and his people.

5. He had got the impression in the hotels in Northern Rhodesia that the mentality of the servants was that they did not want to help. The courtesy of the African servants in Salisbury was greatly appreciated. Everything came back to courtesy in the end.

6. There was a need for more Bantu middlemen such as tailors and shoemakers—craftsmen.

7. Africans should own their own land, and not have it on a communal basis. It would give them a stake in the country.

8. Questioned as to the colour bar as opposed to the colour bar, he was reminded of the instance of an African headmaster being paid less than one of his European assistants. He said that he did not like that if it were true. He did not like it any more than women getting less pay than men for doing the same job. The former case looked as if it were based solely on the colour bar. He personally acted on the basis of culture only, and he would like the other kind of bar completely removed, but asked for the country to be given a chance.

9. When reminded that African women did not have to carry passes, and thus there would be no means of identifying one if run over in Salisbury traffic, he said that everyone should have some form of identification such as the monomark. But he did think that there was an argument in favour of the pass system. He remembered visiting tobacco and tea planters in Nyasaland in 1930. At that time the Bantu did not have to have passes. In consequence they could not be issued with rations in advance, nor could they be allowed to keep their tools because there was no means of identifying them. This was a cause of difficulty, and was one reason why white agriculture had more or less failed in Nyasaland.

10. He was questioned about the colour bar in hotels, cinemas, swimming baths and so on. He said that so long as standards were maintained, he would have no objection whatever to breaking down such bars. He had had experience with Bulgarians, and knew when a peasant was a good one or a bad one. The peasants in Africa happened to be black. For that reason blackness had become the badge of lack of culture. But he had a friend in Uganda, and he learnt from there that all hotels and places of entertainment had been thrown open to all races by order. There had been an initial shock, but in effect no trouble at all. The economic bar had cured the trouble.

11. Questioned as to whether he would retain the Northern Territories in the Federation by force, he said that as a regular soldier he resented force of arms: but resort to force would be an utter tragedy. On the other hand the break up of Federation would do untold harm, and would remove the possibility of creating prosperity in Central Africa.

12. He would not have any objection to placing political power in the hands of the Africans in the Northern Territories so long as they were really civilised. His definition of a civilised man was one who put his fellow man before himself, was intelligent, tolerant, and able to plan intelligently for his country. There were for example difficult questions relating to roads, railways and secondary industries. Whites had the background to understand these things and therefore to govern. The Bantu should be brought in gradually, just as Mr. Svanhu had been brought in, to see the difficulties, and to learn from them.

13. With reference to the last paragraph of his memorandum, he supposed that the Commission had powers to consider these allocation of powers in the original Constitution, but not to unscramble it. How could people advance in Central Africa if the Federation were likely to disappear? How could they go on under such a "sword of Damocles"? The Commission could not say that there was not to be Federation.

14. He did not believe in democracy in the British sense. He was against "one man, one vote". There ought to be an A and B roll in Great Britain. Politics should turn on what the intelligent man thought. Peasants had no clue as to what things were about.

15. Pressed again as to keeping the Northern Territories within the Federation by force, he said that if it came to force it would be better for Southern Rhodesia to withdraw. But law and order must be preserved in any circumstances.

16. He agreed that functions affecting the daily lives of the people, i.e., if they were adversely affecting them under Federal rule, should revert to the Territorial Governments. In his view economics came first. It might be necessary for the Territories to take certain functions back if they would maintain the well-being of the people. But the balance of power should rest with the Federal Government. Nevertheless, he would never use force.

AFRICAN FARMERS' UNION OF SOUTHERN RHODESIA

The African Farmers' Union of Southern Rhodesia is desirous of pointing out to the Commission the state of affairs concerning agriculture for Africans and the Land Settlement affecting the same in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. These remarks will centre mainly around the colony of Southern Rhodesia.

The African Farmers' Union deals with agricultural matters affecting Africans who own land under lease, agreement of purchase and freehold title in the Native Purchase Areas in Southern Rhodesia. The Purchase Areas were set aside under the Land Apportionment Act solely for purchase by Africans. The Africans who occupy land in these areas are in the middle class of the African community. They are the leaders of the farming community among Africans throughout the country, and they wish to set the example to the other sections of the African farming communities in the promotion of agriculture in Central Africa.

Agriculture practised by Europeans and Africans is one and the same. Both races are producing similar products which support the economy of the country along similar lines, viz.: the feeding of people and the manufacture of secondary products. All these products contribute equally to the country's industry and economy. But the present set up in the machinery of the Governments controlling agriculture makes it difficult for all farmers, white and black, to promote the cause of the industry of farming effectively.

The African farmers have no voice whatsoever in the control of the markets of their products and the prices thereof, yet the African farmers are required to promote the industry by conforming to proper and modern methods of soil conservation and maintenance of soil fertility, exactly the same way as their counterpart, the European farmer. The European farmer has a say in the disposal of his products, however.

It is difficult to work together with European farmers, though the farmers on both sides of the colour line wish to do so, because of the Federal Constitution, which set up two Departments of Agriculture, one for the Europeans, which is under the Federal Government and the other (for African Agriculture) which is territorial.

On the whole in the farming industry each of the above Departments of Agriculture plans the advancement of agriculture differently. There are schemes in African agriculture that are not applicable to European agriculture, though the two aim at producing the same product, in the same country, under similar climatic conditions for the accomplishment of the same purpose to promote the country's economy.

The Africans accepted Federation with the understanding that partnership would be practised, and similar privileges would be enjoyed under the Federal Government by all races. But we find that there is always a big difference between the prices of African products and European products such as maize, groundnuts, Turkish tobacco, livestock, poultry, vegetables, fruit and eggs.

We, the African Farmers' Union, strongly feel that unless African agriculture is brought under one and the same Government Department with European agriculture, these unpleasant complications will continue to exist to the great detriment of African agriculture. The African farmers also feel they are unnecessarily forced to support two Governments, making it hard for the tax-payer, especially in connection with the one Government, which does not benefit them at all.

The prices of African agricultural products, which are controlled by the territorial Government, are so low that the African farmer is unable to meet the higher cost of commodities produced by industries which are in the Federal standard of economy. The prices of our products are low because of the Levy Act imposed on our products by the territorial Government.

Land Settlement

The African farmers feel that the distribution of land is not in parity with the needs of both races on equal terms in that the land put aside as European area is far too large, while the land put aside as African area is far too small, though the Africans are by far in the majority.

Many thousands of Africans desirous of pursuing agricultural enterprise for a livelihood are unable to get land because there is not enough land available. The dissatisfaction among Africans arises from the fact that:

Land set aside for African occupation is not only too small but also the poor type of land, usually the broken waste and waterless land in the sand veld, where it is impossible to develop the land economically for the farmer. As a result of this condition, instead of producing a middle class farming community, we have that class which will as time goes on be reduced into the peasant type of farmer practically unable to contribute fully to the country's economy because he will be unable to come up to the present standard of living promoted by the advent of Federation.

This Union strongly feels that the Africans are an asset in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. In view of this, the land apportioned to Africans should be an economic unit both for the individual holder and also as a whole if he is to be an asset to the economy of the Federation.

This Union therefore feels that African agriculture should be under one Department with European agriculture.

This Union also strongly supports the views of the Rhodesia National Farmers' Union dealing with the chaotic state of affairs existing in the organisation of agriculture in the territorial and Federal Governments insofar as the powers and distribution of such among the Governments making it impossible to get a unified policy for the promotion of the industry.

Oral Evidence

AFRICAN FARMERS' UNION OF SOUTHERN RHODESIA Represented by:—Mr. Aaron Jacha (President and a member of the Native Land Board) and, Mr. I. F. Chipunza (General Secretary)

Before answering questions, Mr. Jacha said the membership of the Union was 6,000 at present and was expanding, because as new areas were occupied by farmers they applied for membership to the Union. The membership consisted of Africans farming individually in the Native Purchase Areas scattered throughout Southern Rhodesia. Land was first of all taken on a three-year lease and if a farmer proved his efficiency he was allowed to purchase: when the purchase was completed he got the title to the land and farmed it freehold.

The Union had been formed because common problems were being faced and a mouthpiece was needed to discuss farming matters with the Government. It began as a small thing but had grown into a big organisation. A subscription of 2s. 6d. was originally paid by each farmer, but last year, because of growing membership, the Government had passed legislation enabling African farmers to have a 10s. licence, on the same lines as Europeans. Now, as soon as each African farmer had a lease, he would have to take out a licence. The money would be collected by the Government in the first place and given to the Union. The new system of licence payments would be coming into effect on 1st July, 1960, and the payment would be collected by Native Commissioners when Africans paid their poll tax.

Mr. Jacha was asked whether, when the Union was formed in 1938, it would not have been preferable to seek membership of the Rhodesian National Farmers' Union—did he think it was better to have a separate Farmers' Union? African and European farming projects were discussed separately. After discussion, such matters went to the Territorial Government who appointed officials to discuss matters with the Federal Government. Mr. Jacha said it was felt they should have direct representatives on the Grain Marketing Board. The Southern Rhodesia Agricultural Department and the Federal Agricultural Department should come together. The problems and the marketing were the same, but the Africans had no voice in determining prices. He instanced the fact that maize prices were fixed by Government officials and his Association were not always happy about it because a number of deductions were made by the Territorial Government from the agreed prices. The Grain Marketing Board price for maize was 40s. 6d., and the Territorial Government imposed a levy of 3s. for delivery although it did not all come from one place. There was a levy of 10s. on groundnuts. There was also a levy on kaffir corn. It was true the levies were taken for the purpose of developing Native areas but the difficulty arose because these farmers were not on communal land but were farming individually yet the money was taken from them and pooled for use in connection with Native reserves.

Mr. Jacha said the Government knew pretty well that African farmers in the Native Purchase areas were producing proportionately more than those in Native reserves, and he instanced one African in the Native Purchase Area would be able to sell 500 bags from his farm, which represented the output of 25 Africans in the reserves. He said his members were contributing more to the Native Development Fund but were getting insufficient in return. Although at the end of the year a certain amount was allocated to roads and bridges and other developments such as water, his Union knew by experience that this money was not being used but was kept back because the roads were not made. This particular complaint had been made for about ten years by the African Farmers' Union. He gave as an example the fact that in the Eastern Districts a sum of £2,000 had been allocated for road-making; that was in November when the roads were bad. The people had complained that not a single road was made, and found the money although budgeted for had not been expended.

He said his Union felt that the Native Agricultural Department should not be separated from the Federal sphere and that they were glad to work together with Europeans, so that when the price of maize was £2 0s. 6d. they would be able to get it and develop their own areas. He thought there was a change of heart amongst Europeans in the country areas. They wanted to work with the Africans; but the thing which prevented this was that the two branches of farming were under different Governments. He agreed that there were at present a European Union and a separate African Union, but said they wanted to form one Union. They had formed an African Union in 1937/38 rather than apply to the Rhodesia Farmers' Union because an application would not have been approved.

Mr. Jacha agreed that there were two separate Agricultural Departments, one African, run by the Native Affairs Department, and one European, run by the Federal Ministry; each Farmers' Union worked with its own Department. This was because the law required it so. The Africans accepted Federation on the ground that partnership was coming. The Union preferred to see all agriculture federal rather than territorial, because they wanted Federation to develop the country and it was no use doing it on a territorial basis when they wanted to develop Central Africa. Mr. Jacha did not think the Territorial Government would develop agriculture so well because at present the Director of Native Agriculture was, in effect, the Secretary for Native Affairs. The administrative, not the professional, officer was the man who handed out the money and he was not very amenable to a lot of proposals they made.

Asked whether, if African agriculture in Southern Rhodesia was to be handled by the Ministry that dealt with European agriculture, that would meet the Union's point of view, Mr. Chipunza said that if agreement to amalgamate both departments were reached, his Association would not object to that.

Mr. Jacha pointed out that the Natural Resources Board was under the Territorial Government. These people looked after trees and soil. They would like to go into the Native Areas but were not allowed to because they were dealing with European affairs. His Union had asked that they should form Intensive Conservation Areas in the Purchase Areas. It had taken three years of struggle before the Government had agreed to this.

Mr. Jacha agreed that his Union was now receiving the licence fees from all African farmers in the Native Purchase Areas, and therefore was recognised by the Government as a Union representing the farmers in those areas. He said they were not recognised to the same extent that the two European Unions were—the Rhodesian Tobacco Association and the Rhodesian National Farmers' Union—for the purposes of consultation and negotiation, particularly with regard to prices. His Union was not consulted in discussions regarding the price of maize and other agriculture products common to both European and African agriculture.

Mr. Jacha said that Africans were being encouraged to grow Turkish tobacco; but the question of price was difficult, because the buyers gave what price they liked to an African. His Union had complained about that last year. They wished to have a proper system so that the African tobacco would be graded and paid for just as European tobacco was. European farmers had approached them with a suggestion to form one Association to deal with the production and marketing of Turkish tobacco. After assent by his Union, the Government had been approached in October, 1959, and an Association had been formed, the Turkish Tobacco Growers' Association. His Union now had a representative on the Central Africa Turkish Tobacco Association, who took part in discussing details of production and marketing. He said that it was a big step forward, although it had come slowly.

On the question of land settlement, the witness said that under the Native Land Husbandry Act there were eight million acres set aside to be cut up and sold solely to Africans in the Native Purchase Areas; but only two million acres of this had been sub-divided. There was a big demand for individual farm ownership and applications were coming into the Native Land Board and being approved; but there were 6,000 approved Africans still waiting for land because of the shortage of surveying staff. The Government said they could not cut up these areas because there was no other place to which the people living there could be moved. A Committee had been set up by the Government two years ago; and though there had been an interim report, the final report had not yet come out. Mr. Jacha said they were not in favour of interfering with the eight million acres.

The witness went on to explain that six million acres out of a total of eight million was still unsettled because of the squatters living on most of the land. He suggested they might be moved to unassigned and forest areas, which he believed to be available along the Zambesi Valley. Also, there were big estates owned by companies which were not being used, and which should be cut up after appropriation. He gave an instance of some Africans who had been removed to Sanyati; these Africans should be removed elsewhere than to a Native Purchase area.

It should not be accepted that all Africans were going into industries. When Europeans first came to the country, Africans were keen to work in industry, but today many of them were anxious to farm. He asked where they would be able to farm. Europeans were bringing Africans into industry, but as a result a number of Africans were being troublesome. It was due to the land question.

The Land Apportionment Act was irksome. Mr. Jacha said there were Indian and coloured shops in the centre of Salisbury. He asked why there could not be African shops there too. He considered the Land Apportionment Act should not operate in such areas, although it should continue to provide that only an African could own land in his own area. The Native reserves should not be interfered with and the Native Purchase Areas should be for Africans; but it should be lawful for Africans and Europeans to trade together. He considered the Land Apportionment Act discriminatory.

The witness said that Europeans should not be permitted to buy land in the Native Special Areas or the Purchase Areas. He agreed with the part of the Land Apportionment Act preventing the European from doing this and that part of the Act should be preserved, because the Europeans already had more land than the Africans. He would like to see the rest of the Act disappear.

Asked whether he wished to retain the European residential areas in the same way as he had suggested the retention of African farming areas, Mr. Jacha said all Africans would not be prepared to reside in the European residential area on economic grounds, if none other, but it was not an immediate problem because the earning capacity of the African was very low. Nevertheless the principle of the Act should be clarified. He said he was thinking in terms of multi-racial trading areas rather than residential areas, and he repeated that they would like to see Africans competing with Indians and Coloureds inside the towns. Asked about the introduction of Indian and European competition into the present African trading areas, such as Highfield and Harari, he replied that competition was quite all right. Harari was a very small area, but if one went immediately outside Harari there were only Indians and no Africans trading there.

In regard to the Sabi Valley, situated in the Native Purchase Area, Mr. Jacha said this was an experimental area but his Union would like to see it cut up to satisfy the demand for land by many Africans who were at present unable to obtain it. They were unable to buy land in this area at present because there was no irrigation, and the development was very, very slow. At present, though elsewhere than Nyanadgi, there were only irrigation schemes for Europeans.

The witness was unable to say what the squatter population was in the Native Purchase Areas; but it was large. He referred to one area he had recently visited, where land had been divided to provide 105 farms; but only 24 farmers had been given leases there, the rest of the farms being occupied by squatters. Even when an African had been given a farm he still had squatters there who were paying rent to the Government.

Mr. Jacha said that although some of the funds which were available to the Native Development Fund were devoted to the Native Purchase Areas, they were not as large as his Union would like. It was pointed out that the European farmer paid taxes and thus made a contribution towards the road system and the construction of bridges: thus if the African farmer took the whole price for his bag of maize or for other products, it was asked how he would contribute towards the cost of these services. Mr. Jacha replied that Europeans had Road Councils to which they paid a tax in addition to income tax. The Africans paid taxes to Native Councils, many of which had been set up so that Africans might learn administration. Money from the Councils could be used by them. Money was available, he said, but the Native Council would not permit it to be used. This question had been discussed several times with the Prime Minister, as Minister of Native Affairs. The Prime Minister had attended the Union's Conference in 1958 and had indicated he was sympathetic towards the problem, but could not help. Indeed, the United Federal Party was very sympathetic to the problems; but these were controversial issues, and they would be thrown out if they tried to do too much.

Mr. Jacha said there were local Councils in the Native Purchase Areas (excluding Que Que). The Native Commissioner of the area was the chairman of the Council and under the Native Councils' Amendment Act there was provision for an African to be vice-chairman. His Union wished to see Africans in the Native Purchase Areas left alone as they were always clashing with the Native Commissioner. The Native Commissioner might be there in an advisory capacity, but all the executive powers should be vested in the Council, especially in the Native Purchase areas.

He explained that Africans in the Native Purchase Areas did not come under Chiefs at all, nor did they want to; they wished to lead individual lives and look after their own land. He recommended a change over from the full tribal system to individual ownership of land as something which could be extended into the Northern territories. He did not know very much about Nyasaland, but had stayed with friends in Northern Rhodesia and had been told the people there would be glad to own land individually.

There was a distinction between areas: in the Native Purchase Areas where there was individual tenure of land there were no Chiefs but a Native Council; but where it had not been cut up, there were squatters under a Chief. Mr. Jacha explained that the people who had enough land did not want to be under a Chief. They came to his Union and complained about it. He would like to see individual legal title to land applied in the reserves. That he thought, was the aim of the Government under a recent Act. Through the Land Husbandry Act, Africans in the reserves were given the right to own between eight and ten acres, and the grazing was communal. A man had the right to sell his land if he wished and he could, if he wished, buy two or three plots, which he would hold under freehold title. Ultimately, it was a question of doing away with the reserves and having individual land ownership among the African people. That would be preferable. Mr. Chipunza supplemented this by saying that people worked much harder on their own land: there was not the same interest taken with communal land.

Mr. Jacha confirmed that many Africans living on communal land at present wished to buy land and farm it individually as their own property. The African, especially in Southern Rhodesia, with the new methods of farming, should be free from interference. He added that his own farm, comprising 600 acres was one of the first to be cut in 1931. That was acquired at a time when most Africans did not want to buy land. The average farm today comprised 200 acres.

Mr. Jacha said that the question of labour was difficult even for African farmers. There were casual labourers among the people living in the reserves who were paid 2s. 6d. a day—women, not men. Male labour, in particular, often did not wish to leave the town and go to work on a farm. Europeans were facing the same labour problem, so it was not altogether a question of low wages. He had himself only three labourers, which was insufficient for 600 acres; but part of his farm was not developed. He kept 45 cattle. Mr. Chipunza added that when Europeans were recruiting labour for farm work they could offer a £20 capitation fee, which was beyond the African farmer's means. Mr. Jacha said that squatters could not be recruited as labourers because, mostly, they were already working the land they occupied. What African farmers were doing at present was to go into the reserve and try to get people to work for 2s. 6d. a day until such time as all the work was finished. The farmers had to do most of the planting, weeding and cultivating themselves.

Mr. Jacha stated that the most essential thing for the progress of the African was education. In the urban areas there were a lot of primary and secondary schools; but in the country most of the schools only took children up to Standard III; there were very few which took them to Standard VI. The country children were brought up far away from any school, and the policy of the Native Education Department was that if a child had not reached Standard IV by the age of fourteen, he was not allowed to attend upper primary. More country schools should be established; they were absolutely essential.

When Mr. Todd was Prime Minister, Africans had been asked to agree to the increase of the poll tax from £1 to £2, the extra money to be spent on education. Africans had accepted that increase on the understanding that it would help education. This matter had been mentioned several times to the Government, but there were still no schools in their areas. He added that the Africans made bricks for buildings, and he asked for teachers to be supplied. Each child in the reserve paid 10s. school fees. Africans in the rural areas could not develop without education.

Mr. Jacha said that one of the reasons they wished to see African education become Federal was that they were not satisfied with the type of education they were receiving. Africans wanted the same education as Europeans. It was wrong that there should be two Departments, one for European education and one for Africans. It was felt that African education was at present inferior to European education. He did not mind which Government took charge of it, as long as it was the same Government for both.

Purpose

To illustrate to Commissioners the situation as between the European farmer and his African labour in Southern Rhodesia. The Farm

I farm 6,500 acres twelve miles from Salisbury on the road to Norton. In the above context this farm is broadly characteristic of any progressive farm in Southern Rhodesia. It is a food farm, comprising dairying, beef cattle, pigs, sheep, poultry and cash crops and market gardening. No tobacco is grown. The output of the farm is approximately £28,000 per annum.

Farm Staff

Two European assistants and 70 male adult Africans are employed. The African labourers come from Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland, Mocambique and Angola. About half are married and live with their families on the farm. About two-thirds are voluntary labourers, and the balance are supplied by the Rhodesia Native Labour Supply Commission on two years contract.

Background

I started farming on Rainham twenty years ago. At that time African labour could be engaged for 12s. 6d. per month. Every "boy" wore a sack instead of a shirt, and soap was a virtually unknown commodity. Housing was of the most primitive and was built by the labourers themselves of sticks, grass and mud. Rations were supplemented by porcupines, rats, guineafowl, hares, ants, antbears, locusts and honey, which were dug, trapped or extracted by the labourers with great ingenuity. Little was known of child welfare and nutrition and bilharzia, hookworm and malaria were rife amongst all the Africans. Almost all were completely illiterate.

Ploughing Back Profits

After a difficult initial three years' period, the farm began to show a profit. In ploughing back profits into the farm, due regard has been paid to raising the standard of living of the African staff. Over the years, three-room brick houses with asbestos roofs have been completed to accommodate 36 families at a cost of some £3,000. Each house has a half-acre garden attached for use by the labourers consistent with good farming practises. A school, fitted with electric lighting has been built in which 45 picannins are taught Sub A, Sub B and Standard I subjects in accordance with Government curricula. Night classes for the labourers are conducted by the African teacher from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m. Next year's programme provides for the building of a larger school (and teacher's quarters) to take these children on to Standard III.

Recreation

A compound Council of seven labourers appointed by the African staff advises me on all matters concerning their welfare. They meet every Saturday afternoon and their Chairman reports to me every Monday. The school is used as a community centre and is fitted with a wireless. Presbyterian Church services are held in it every Sunday and the farm African Women's Association meet there on Thursday afternoons. A football ground and two footballs are provided and maintained by me.

Wages

"Raw" recruits are now taken on the staff at 55s. per month and the average wage is around 75s. per month. Tractor drivers average 105s. per month, while the lorry driver and teacher earn £12 12s. 0d. per month.

Rations

All African labourers are rationed weekly when work ends at midday on Saturdays. This consists of per labourer:

- 14lb. mealie meal
- 2lb. ration beans
- approx. 3lb. fresh vegetables.

In addition a bullock is killed every third week which usually yields 5 to 6lb. of meat per labourer. Further, the entire African population of the farm has unrestricted access to the farm's 13 dams to fish with hook and line for bream and barbel. Milk can be bought at milking times for 6d. a pint and the staff are increasingly availing themselves of this service.

Perquisites

All housing is rent free. Firewood and water are provided free. Seed for the gardens is supplied free and I do the ploughing, harrowing and planting at no charge. The staff are permitted to keep poultry on free range. A range of medicines for simple illnesses is provided free and for more severe cases free transport is available to Salisbury African Hospital. This year I intend planting mulberry trees for fruit and shade adjacent to the African houses.

Relationships

Relations between Europeans and Africans on the staff are generally pleasant and happy. We work together all day and every day and we all go to bed tired at night. The greatest problem I have had to face in twenty years of farming has been the innate irresponsibility of my African labourers. This characteristic is deep-seated and cannot be removed by setting a good example or by insistence on efficiency. It can only be removed, I believe, by the gradual process of education.

By way of illustration, I have found that

- (a) With most Africans I employ there is no dishonour in lying or stealing unless one is such a naive liar or thief as to be caught out;
- (b) I have great difficulty in persuading them to do anything to help themselves;
- (c) Far too high a proportion of their incomes is spent on weekend beer drinks on neighbouring brickfields;
- (d) Having been thoroughly taught a job on modern, efficient lines they will unaccountably tend to lapse into the old lazy and slipshod methods, and
- (e) There is need for continuous European supervision for all but the most elementary tasks.

All this calls for massive patience, self-control and understanding on the part of the employer and his assistants. Where this is not exercised there can be exasperation and strong language with an occasional box on the ears. European farm assistants who have lived in close contact with Africans for some years are generally tolerant and restrained in handling their staff, but on occasion I have had to intervene with recent British immigrants who have not yet acquired an understanding of the African's habits.

General

All the Africans call me their "father" and come to me or my wife with all their troubles (anything from safety pins to syphilis). The older ones are mainly illiterate but the younger ones can read and write in an elementary fashion. They are all quite incapable of comprehending even the broadest aspects of such concepts as "parliamentary democracy", "the will of the people" and so forth. Most of them firmly believe that money is made by the Europeans who simply collect at the Bank every time they run short! Any debate on the pros and cons of Federation would be completely lost on them; nor would they show any interest, as "these things belong to the white people". They know Dr. Banda is in gaol and they refer to him as "the man is making trouble for the Europeans", but there their knowledge and interest ends. With one or two exceptions they would, I am certain, be completely incapable of exercising a vote with discretion and responsibility. They are a simple people, easily led by a colourful story or a gainful promise and are easy prey for people who would unscrupulously exploit their innocence or ignorance. I would chase such a person right off the farm.

Invitation

My wife and I extend a cordial invitation to any Commissioners who would like to see this farm to come and visit us. The telephone number is Salisbury 2063871.

Oral Evidence

T. T. DAWSON

Mr. Dawson said that there had been a number of enactments by the Southern Rhodesia Parliament which, taken altogether, gave the African adequate protection against exploitation. These enactments included:—

- The Land Apportionment Act
- The Native Juveniles Act
- The Workmen's Compensation Act.

In addition, there was the system of situpas, which provided the African's record of employment. The farm labourer was not at present included within the scope of the Industrial Conciliation Act, and there was at present no minimum wage in the industry. This could be expected to come shortly, and the witness personally believed that it was desirable (though he made it clear that he was not speaking for all farmers here).

He was in favour of Federation, though there were at present a number of anomalies between Territorial and Federal legislation (he gave as an example the provision of outspans for cattle being moved to market). In spite of the campaign launched against Federation by hostile critics in the B.B.C. and the Labour Party, the tempo of liberal measures in the Federation was very rapid. Unfortunately, as a result of interference, a reaction had been set up and there was a danger of a more reactionary Government being returned at the next election. As a result of this reaction more drastic measures such as the amendment of the pass laws, had been held up since it might well have caused the fall of the Government. Other steps, such as the representation of Africans in the Southern Rhodesia Parliament, were desirable in due course.

Memorandum

S. E. AITKEN-CADE, M.P.

The Case for Secession for Southern Rhodesia

There have been only three Federations comparable to the Central African Federation that can be used as a guide to the future in the Rhodesias and Nyasaland. One of these, the United States of America, resolved its differences in a bloody civil war, and the other, the British Caribbean Federation is in danger of breaking up. The third, the Federation of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland, is in a most unhappy state at the moment.

The Americans were, in the main, Europeans, with many institutions in common. The colour problem was confined to a minority group and the main issues were slavery, and the right of the States to secede from the Union. The first was practiced in the South and opposed by the North. So these two issues had to be resolved and they found it necessary to resort to bloodshed to find an answer. It appears that the immediate answer did nothing to settle the colour problem that exercises many of the United States to this day, and that, from a study of Gunnar Myrdal's researches, the racial position in the South appears to be more extreme than in our Federation.

The British Caribbean Federation was a more recent experiment in joining together various Crown Colonies at differing stages of development into one body under a Federal Government. The discussions began in 1947 and terminated in 1956, in which year the British Caribbean Federation Act was passed. Some nine years of discussion and negotiation took place before implementation. The Central African Federation was brought into being after three years and it appears that the matter was rushed to conform with the "hand-over" plans of the British Government.

The Caribbean Federation consists of Barbados, Jamaica, Antigua, Montserrat, St. Christopher, Nevis, Anguilla, Barbuda, Trinidad, Tobago, Dominica, Grenada, Saint Lucia and St. Vincent. These are all in differing stages of political and economic development, and have little in common save a desire for prosperity and advancement, though the familiar pattern of hasty political development for economically underdeveloped units has appeared since 1956.

It was originally intended to include the Bahamas, British Honduras, British Guiana and the Virgin Islands but these after consideration, declined to join. Why the issue was not forced as in the case of Nyasaland cannot be ascertained clearly. It may well be that Her Majesty's Government realised by 1956 that a major error had been committed in Central Africa by forcing Nyasaland into the Federation. One can only surmise, but it seems that that is a reasonable conclusion in view of the fact that already the people of Nyasaland were becoming restive and had made representations to British Members of Parliament and to the Colonial Office to extricate them from a position they felt was undesirable. It was probably considered that this mistake should not be repeated in the West Indies.

However we cannot escape the fact that in 1953 Nyasaland was forced into a Federation against her will while in 1956 those parts of the proposed Caribbean Federation that did not wish to participate were not made to join.

Again, the Caribbean Constitution is to be reviewed every five years whereas the Federal Constitution is to be reviewed between seven and nine years after it came into force. Was it realised that a shorter period was far better?

A further point is that the Caribbean Constitution leaves most of the executive powers in the hands of the Territories. Apart from purely domestic Federal affairs, such as the auditing of Federal Accounts, Federal Public Service, raising of Federal loans, etc., the following are the only important executive matters on the Exclusive List:—

Defence, Exchange Control, Insurance (with reservations), Libraries, Museums, etc. There is no direct evidence of this but presumably powers were left in the hands of West Indian Territories because of the vastly different levels of progress in those services. For the same reason, therefore, should not the following powers vested in our Federal Government, and which do not appear on the Caribbean Federation's Exclusive List, be returned to the Territories?

Imports and Exports (though a Customs Council is being set up in the West Indies), Price Control, Income, Sales and Purchase Taxes, Companies, Patents, etc. Roads, Railways (with a co-ordinating higher authority), Southern Rhodesia Agriculture, Postal Services, European Education, Technical Education, Health and Old Age Pensions. All these functions could be discharged more effectively and more efficiently by the Territorial Government.

Major irrigation schemes should also be returned to Southern Rhodesia. Already we have had to get on with the Kyle Dam project on our own and there is no hope of getting the major irrigation schemes in the Sabi Valley under weigh unless Southern Rhodesia gets on with the job.

The Caribbean Constitution leaves Income Tax and borrowing powers in the hands of the Territories. By 1956 it had probably been realised that the provision in our constitution that puts all financial control in the hands of the Federal Government and residual powers in the control of the Territories was a complete and utter blunder. It makes a mockery of the Territorial Government's attempts to finance new development. Finance control in the hands dedicated at all costs to keeping a federation in being inevitably means the pampering of certain sections to the detriment of others.

Even with many of the blunders avoided or corrected the West Indian Federation is not likely to remain intact. Jamaica will probably wish to secede in the near future and it is unlikely that British Honduras will look more kindly on the idea of joining than it has so far. Therefore it seems plain that the Caribbean Federation, in spite of more favourable conditions with regard to its Constitution is unlikely to endure in its present form. Jamaica is large and strong enough to "go it alone" and will probably elect to do so. And it just goes to prove that unless the component parts of a Federation are at the same level of development, politically and culturally and economically, there is little or no chance of successful integration.

Now in the Caribbean Federation the colour problem is somewhat different from our own. The Europeans have learned to survive though submerged. And there is still the problem of racism which is different perhaps from racialism in that it occurs between two coloured races and not between a white and a black race. The Asian and Negro races are not integrated and there is little possibility that the superior Asian people will allow integration with the negro people. There is friction and it will undoubtedly continue.

The European has learned to survive but it is only in the executive and professional classes that this has come about. Artisan wages have been pegged at a level too low for Europeans to compete with the indigenous peoples and still retain their own way of life. Inevitably, efficiency in this sphere of employment has suffered through the necessity for artisan-type Europeans to seek work outside the Caribbean Federation.

Friction is there in the Caribbean and will continue. It will continue for a considerable time if we are to take the United States of America as an example of how little real progress the liberal and ultraliberal element has made in the face of racial steadfastness and identification. The conservative will take a very long time indeed to be convinced that an adulterated article is as good as the pure product.

Southern Rhodesia, until 1953, had advanced the interests of all races in relation to their contribution to the general progress of the Territory. This rule was never applied as a rigid formula, in fact, as the Africans were unable to finance regional development they were carried along with the mainstream of national progress. The Africans now in professional posts owe their advancement and are the product of that period of Rhodesia's growth and indicate that the Territorial policy was liberal enough to allow an African to aspire to be an advocate or doctor or to qualify in any profession.

In my opinion, the idea of creating federations is a phase in the thinking of the Colonial and Commonwealth Relations Office employees that appears to provide an easy answer to the question of what we should do with emergent peoples who have been led to believe that they are capable of governing themselves. It saves the British taxpayer money and is therefore politically acceptable and the idea of freeing the underdog has great appeal for any Britisher. But it might be as well if the rights of European minorities were given equal consideration by the Government and people of Great Britain.

In advocating the secession of Southern Rhodesia from the Federation I do so with no wish or intention of weakening or abrogating the Imperial connection. We are loyal subjects of Her Majesty and I doubt whether one European wishes to be other than a British subject. But my loyalty and trust in the Royal family does not mean that I am prepared to accept all the acts of Her Majesty's Ministers in a spirit of apathetic forbearance. This feeling, I am certain, is shared by many thousands, if not all Rhodesians. We will see that Southern Rhodesia is a bulwark of Western civilization and make it a secure base for combatting Communism on this continent.

It is difficult to ascertain exactly how secession would affect Southern Rhodesia. As part of the Federation there are certain advantages in having a market of 7½ million people in the Federal area but the formation of a customs union or the establishment of a trade agreement between the Territories would be a likely procedure. In any event, we should have to ask ourselves whether the market in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland was not perhaps rather a reserved area for U.K. imports rather than a specific outlet for Southern Rhodesian manufactures. Whether it was not the local agents of U.K. manufacturers who were reaping the major benefit from the reserved area of the Federation. The whole question of benefit would have to be examined very closely. Because some article is assembled or painted in Southern Rhodesia does not make it a Rhodesian product.

With regard to manufacturing industries, the 57/58 census shows that Southern Rhodesian gross output was £105,096,000 compared with £16,458,030 for Northern Rhodesia and £5,526,000 for Nyasaland. In so far as mining is concerned the N.R. output fell from £129.3 million in 1956 to £77.2 million in 1958. Southern Rhodesia maintained a steady position of £23.2 million in 1956 and £25.3 million in 1958. There is no mineral output in Nyasaland. Maize production too reflects the more stable output of Southern Rhodesia as compared with Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia. For the years 1956/57/58 the Southern Rhodesian production in 200 lb. bags was 4.7, 4.6 and 4.0 million bags. In Northern Rhodesia the figures for the same three years were 1.7, 2.0, and 1.1 million bags. The position in Nyasaland is always most variable and the figures there for the same period were .3, .05 and .128 million bags.

Maize figures do not include the amount consumed by Africans and not recorded in production figures. This would affect to a great degree the production figures for all three territories. In a poor year almost all African production would be consumed locally. African sales are only records of production surplus to consumption requirements in the native areas. But the point to be considered and appreciated is that in most things Southern Rhodesia has a more stable and less fluctuating economy than either of the other Territories. The general spread of consumption of electricity shows that while there is a rising consumption in all three Territories the consumer spread is far wider in Southern Rhodesia than elsewhere. The figures in million kW's for 1958 show the following:—

	Farms	Mines	Second-ary	Domes-tic	Others	Total
S.R. ...	49.2	373.2	404.7	367.2	175.2	1369.5
N.R. ...	0.2	1373.1	46.8	122.0	29.0	1571.1
Nyasa. ...	0.1	Nil	8.5	6.5	4.3	19.4

The case for secession rests on two facts. Firstly, Southern Rhodesia would be no worse off financially than at present and the more settled political position might better the situation. To arrive at some assessment of the probable situation it is necessary to analyse the Budgets of both the Federal Government and that of the Government of Southern Rhodesia. As a result of such an analysis it is clear that the greatest amount that Southern Rhodesia would have to find for a Budget that would provide all that is now being financed by both Budgets is a sum of £52,441,665. The present Federal Budget is £78 million and the Territorial Budget £19.6 million.

Secondly, it is morally wrong to hold together in an artificial entity, the inhabitants of three different territories, all with differing aims and aspirations, and the majority of whose thinking inhabitants wish to fulfil those aims and aspirations in their own territorial capacities. The two Northern territories were given little choice of participation in Federation. The ejectors were, by means of a very effective propaganda campaign, stampeded into voting for Federation, principally on economic grounds. If a referendum were to be taken today in this Colony, the result would undoubtedly be in favour of secession in peace now than forcible separation in bloodshed later.

Money and estimates thereon are not of course the whole answer. There is always a human factor to be taken into account and there is also that vaguely wide term, political imponderables. One very hard fact must be borne in mind always and that is the assessment made by business and military people of the situation. In that respect is it not remarkable that all big business has come to Southern Rhodesia? Ford, Dunlop, B.M.C. and Whiteheads are four that spring easily to mind. If the Federation is as sound as is claimed why did not at least one of these firms go North? And why is the Air Force concentrated in Southern Rhodesia? And why are the top brass going to have still bigger and better air bases in Southern Rhodesia? It is because they know that we will hold firm and that there is security here, unknown anywhere further North.

In estimating what would be required for Southern Rhodesia to proceed with its development plans we have to make certain assumptions. First, that on achieving secession Southern Rhodesia will be a Dominion with the same diplomatic representations as at present operated by the Federation. The only difference would be that we would have Southern Rhodesians representing us in every instance rather than a hotch-potch of time-expired Colonial Office employees. Secondly, that there will be a Legislative Assembly of 40 Members and a Senate of 25 Members. This to comply with the spirit of the Southern Rhodesia Constitution. Thirdly, that comparable offices such as the Prime Minister, Treasury, etc., will, in the new Southern Rhodesia be on a higher scale of operations and that there will be ten Ministers.

An extremely generous estimate of the cost of services now rendered by the Federal Government to Southern Rhodesia as revealed by the 1959/60 Estimates of Expenditure plus savings that would be effected by the amalgamation of Prime Ministers Offices, Treasuries, Public Service Commissions, Home Affairs Departments, etc., would account for a total sum of £39.6 million. It is more than possible that this figure could be pruned by good housekeeping by ten or fifteen per cent. But by leaving the figure on the high side it is hoped that the hard-pressed Southern Rhodesian taxpayer may enjoy some tax reduction when the Colony regains its independence.

But before the cost is complete we must take into account the Southern Rhodesian Estimates of Expenditure for 1959/60 to judge with complete accuracy where Southern Rhodesia would stand financially. By deducting those items already provided for in the portion of the Federal Budget that will revert to Southern Rhodesia the balance left to be added to the previous figure is £12,789,908.

The sum total of estimated expenditure revealed by the Federal and Territorial estimates is £52,441,665. But it must be remembered that in all the deductions the scale has been deliberately loaded against Southern Rhodesia in most cases Southern Rhodesia has been left with two-thirds to a half of the estimated expenditure. It could very well prove in practice that the actual figure would be one-third to a half.

However, as the figure of £52.4 million has been reached let us seek the wherewithal in Southern Rhodesia to meet the bill. It is plain that Southern Rhodesia already has an income of £11.1 million accruing from taxation, licences and fees as shown by the differences in the 1959/60 estimates of Revenue between the £7.7 million of Income Tax and Territorial Surcharge and the £18.8 million of total receipts. To this must be added the actual tax on income or profits now paid to the Federal Government which amounts to a further £16.1 million. (20% surcharge = £3.2 million). This already reaches the figure of £30.4 million before we consider the other revenue that would return to Southern Rhodesia when it is once more an independent unit.

The estimated Federal Revenue 1959/60 is used as a basis for this exercise and may be accepted as a fair appreciation of the Revenue position. Using this as a broad canvas we can arrive at fairly precise figures. By placing the Federal figure first and indicating the proportion that would be taken over or would accrue to Southern Rhodesia the following table emerges.

Heading of Revenue	Estimate	% to S.R.	Amount
Customs and Excise ...	£14,500,000	60%	£8,700,000
Hospital Fees ...	520,000	60%	312,000
Posts and Telegraphs ...	5,804,000	60%	3,482,400
Schools, Ed. Services ...	693,000	60%	415,800
Loans and Advances*	9,058,000	40%	3,623,200
Ag. Services ...	178,000	60%	106,800
Aviation and Idg. Fees ...	165,000	80%	132,000
Refund of Capital C.M.E.D.	292,000	100%	292,000
Rent of Gov. property ...	371,000	40%	148,400
Share of profits:—
Central Bank ...	650,000	50%	325,000
Other receipts ...	786,000	50%	393,000
			£17,930,600
If we now take the previous revenue figure into a/c ...			30,400,000
We have a grand total of Territorial Revenue of ...			£48,330,600

* Compensated for under Vote 7.

If we now deduct £48.3 million from £52.4 million there is a shortfall of merely £4.1 million to find. It may well be that the figures for Territorial liability with regard to services now rendered is too high and that on closer study the two amounts could be brought more closely together. A five per cent reduction on expenditure would reduce the apparent deficit to £1.9 million. But these are exercises that can be more properly carried out at a later stage. I am concerned to prove in so far as I am able that the bogey of economic inability to extricate Southern Rhodesia is a matter of no substance. Given the goodwill and application that Southern Rhodesia has always shown it can be done with comparative ease.

But before proceeding further with a document already overfull of figures it will be as well to deal with a few of the misstatements and distortions put out by the pro-Government Press in the Federation. It is remarkable that the public is so easily misled. Individually, the reporters and journalists are not mental giants by any means. In fact many of them are of only "fair, average quality" with all the faults and weaknesses of the ordinary man in the street, and should not be looked upon as constitutional or financial experts. Many I find are woefully ignorant of Africa and its ways and rely on the reports of others of their own craft. Admittedly there are some highly intelligent members of the Press but they are so few that they merely emphasise the shortcomings of the rest.

In the Herald of 27/2/60, the Herald Africa News Service, for instance, makes this ridiculous statement, "Can Southern Rhodesia embark on the alternative, Can she go it alone? Once again the cold facts lend considerable doubts. She is still principally dependent on her £25 million a year tobacco crop. Much of Salisbury's impressive concrete facade is based on her association with the Northern Rhodesia Copperbelt's £100 million mining industry." The short extract shows the lamentable ignorance of reporters who seem to be employed on a political rather than a qualification basis. No mention of Southern Rhodesia's £105 million manufacturing industry; no mention of the £400,000,000 invested in the lands of Southern Rhodesia; no mention of the cattle industry or road transport industry? No just a reference to the annual cash return of one Southern Rhodesian crop. And what of the mining industry in this country? The mineral output this year as reported by the Minister of Mines is £25 million. With the mineral deposits in Southern Rhodesia is it probable that this figure will double and quadruple in a very few years. And we are not dependent on one mineral only! Our spread of minerals is wide and varied, from gems to base minerals, from coal to emeralds, yet our reporter can only refer to our tobacco industry.

The writer of that same article, who presumes to pontificate on problems beyond his capacity, deals also with a possible link-up with the Union of South Africa in what he calls the "cold facts" of association with that country. It is the reporter who suggests a joining with South Africa, nobody else, but he goes on to lay down what the terms of closer association would be, in view of his ignorance of Rhodesian affairs one wonders how he comes by his inside knowledge of the working of the minds of the Union Cabinet?

This reporter of the Herald Africa News Service concluded by saying, "For better or for worse the two Rhodesias are firmly joined as partners in the most expensive and powerful enterprise in Africa. Concrete may prove more binding than constitutions." One can only read this statement on Kariba with profound amusement for its backhand attack on the Federal hydro-electric scheme. But the Kariba scheme is not necessarily any stumbling block to the dissolution of the unhappy association that now exists. There are precedents for the management of such projects that should be used as guides for the future.

When the Federation ceases to exist, as such, it does not mean that Kariba will be nobody's responsibility. Its output will still be required by Northern Rhodesia's copper mines and by Southern Rhodesia's industry, and it can become the joint responsibility of the two Territories concerned. The St. Lawrence Seaway is the joint responsibility of the United States and Canada. The Panama Canal is shared by the United States and Panama. Before Egypt nationalised the Suez Canal it was administered by an international consortium. So there is more than one way of guaranteeing the investment in Kariba even if it proves to be the white elephant that some people believe. But the argument that Kariba is a tie that holds the Federation firmly together is just so much more nonsensical propaganda.

A further argument against re-forming the Federation or allowing each Territory to determine its own future is that the Northern Territories will not buy Southern Rhodesian goods. This has been a favourite argument from the Government side and has received a measure of support from those in opposition who should know better. It must be dealt with firmly.

They say that the Northern Territories, especially Nyasaland will purchase their requirements from India, China, Japan, Russia and other countries that have designs on Central Africa. That if this sort of trade boycott is implemented it will ruin our Southern Rhodesian secondary industries. That our capacity to employ the emergent Africans in the manufacturing industries will be severely curtailed. But these despondent people refuse to consider the other side of the coin. Of course, a weak-kneed Government might be faced with a falling-off of trade with the North but there is no reason why Southern Rhodesia should not produce the firm and unanswerable argument by using her position as the largest employer of Nyasaland labour to insist on a fair reciprocal trade agreement. If Nyasaland boycotts our goods, we boycott her labour. As Nyasaland is buying goods with our money there is no reason to think that she could argue for long. And without the wages earned in Southern Rhodesia she would be a poor market for any other country. Even if the United Kingdom and the United States stepped in to finance her, it is unlikely that they would not insist on a trade agreement with her. Finally, there is reason to suppose that the two Northern Territories would be only too pleased to accept a trade agreement as the price of their own self-determination.

But Russia would step in! That is the next cry. If the United Kingdom or the United States allowed that then they are less responsible than we have been led to believe. But as the United Kingdom is responsible for the present mess and as the United States has done little but exacerbate the feelings of the Rhodesian public, and done much to dispel racial harmony, they could very well assume joint Trusteeship of the penurious State of Nyasaland.

If Northern Rhodesia adopted the attitude that it would not "Buy Rhodesian", then the S.R. Railways come into the picture. For many years Southern Rhodesia subsidised the transport of copper to the Port of Beira and it is only recently that a more realistic rate has been charged. Both the railways and the coal at Wankie could be used as arguments to make a trade agreement a most desirable piece of business for Northern Rhodesia. A threat by Northern Rhodesia to use the Benguela line could easily be countered by Southern Rhodesia drawing the attention of the Portuguese Government to the desirability of keeping our trade flowing through the Port of Beira. Our Portuguese friends are sufficiently aware of the position to see the point and look after their own interest.

Then there is the point that we would have to do something about the Federal Civil Service. There should be no difficulty there. Most of the people now employed would be re-absorbed into the Southern Rhodesian Civil Service. It might well be that those with a Colonial Service training and background would rather serve in Nyasaland or Northern Rhodesia. There is no doubt that the development in Southern Rhodesia, especially in Native Agriculture, Native Affairs and Native Townships warrant a large increase in that field. In any case, by maintaining the high standards of our Service and the rate for the job the prospects for Europeans in the Civil Service will be better than at present.

The National Debt of the Federation is another big stick that is brandished by those who oppose the idea of freedom for Southern Rhodesia. They say that if the National Debt is split up among three self-governing States, it will be too great a burden for any one of them to bear! But are not these three States now bearing the full burden of this debt? At the 30th June, 1959, the Federal National Debt stood at nearly £226 million. Of this, Southern Rhodesia's direct share was:—

Loans obtained directly for S. Rhodesia	£16,247,034
S.R. internal funded debt assumed by Federal Gov.	£6,664,730

In the event of secession Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland between them would be directly responsible for their own share of current loans (£14,730,590) and their internal and external funded debts (£27,044,169). Southern Rhodesia's share of the balance of the Federal National Debt (£92,717,857) would then be approximately:—

Proportionate share (190/363) of current loans ...	£28,573,443
Half share Kariba project loans	7,892,000
60% internal floating debt	13,406,125

Finally, Southern Rhodesia's direct Territorial National Debt of £43,805,316 must be added to her probable commitments, making a total of £91,504,337 + £49,871,568 + £43,805,316 = £185,181,221.

At 5½% the figure shown in Vote 7 (see Appendix) of £10.4 million would be adequate to service this public debt. And it should be remembered that a proportion of the assets that would be of no use to Southern Rhodesia could be realised to reduce the Public Debt. In any case, the amount needed has been allowed for in the analysis undertaken in Vote 7.

A certain responsibility rests with Great Britain for granting Nyasaland advanced constitutional status before she was ready for it. Every mistake must be paid for and while Southern Rhodesia would be prepared to pay for the mistake of entering the Federal scheme it is equally important that the United Kingdom should pay for her own errors of judgement as well. Therefore Britain must bear her share of the burden and not expect us to pay for her mistakes as well as our own.

It is argued in some quarters that investment capital will be frightened away by fears of a reduced market for locally produced goods and imported goods of British manufacture, and the fears that this territory would join up with the Union of South Africa. The first point has already been dealt with in a previous paragraph but the last point is one that should be killed at birth. What right-minded Republican Nationalist would want a solid block of English-speaking voters joining forces against him at the Polls? Even if we assume that the Rhodesian voters want to give up their British way of life and sink their identity in a country from which many have migrated on account of the political situation there, it is most unlikely that the Union would have anything to do with the proposition. In any case, investors have proved by their continued investment in the Union of South Africa that they are interested in stability of Government rather than political ideologies. Southern Rhodesia with firm, civilized, Western leadership would be a better investment risk than the unstable, unwieldy, unsure Federation.

Federationists say that we should lose the benefits of the copper industry. In part, this is so, but on the other hand we would not have to share our well-balanced economy, based on agriculture, mining and industry. In any case, we have to decide a very simple issue here, and that is, which is better, to be comparatively wealthy with the constant threat of African domination hanging over us, or to be less wealthy but with our own future and the means of development in our own hands? Furthermore, the world price of gold must go up in the next year or two, with conditions in the United States as they are, and the resultant output from Southern Rhodesian mines would more than offset the loss of 14% of the taxation on Northern Rhodesian copper.

Southern Rhodesia is well able to stand alone and guide this part of Africa. There will be a series of unstable and transient black Governments in Nyasaland if she is given full independence and the United Kingdom must guard against this by restoring full Protectorate Status there. The first action a black government would take in Northern Rhodesia would be to nationalise the copper mines and safeguards must be provided there too. These are matters than can be settled by discussion and agreement.

For Southern Rhodesia, secession is not the easy answer. There will be much hard work and much frustration during the first year or two but the reward is so great, the future so important, that no Rhodesian can afford not to stake his hopes and aspirations on the attainment of freedom for his country. Unless complete independence is given to this country to manage its own affairs then it will have no alternative but to demand its rights and independence. But let us hope that reason will prevail and that the British Government will see the justice and logic of our cause.

This is a British Territory, not an African Territory, inhabited by Rhodesians who want to remain a part of the British Commonwealth of Nations. But it is now up to the British Government to allow us to so remain and not force us to take action that would be necessary though repugnant.

Oral Evidence

S. E. AITKEN-CADE, M.P.

Mr. Aitken-Cade said that nothing had happened in the two months since his memorandum had been prepared to make the case for secession in his view any less relevant. The people of Southern Rhodesia had been disappointed in the attitude of Her Majesty's Government. They were worried about Mr. Macleod's attitude towards the two Northern Territories and about Mr. Macmillan's attitude in his "winds of change" speech in Cape Town. They felt that the African people were not yet capable of taking over power, and that if this happened in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, Southern Rhodesia would prefer to contract out of the Federation altogether. This would not prevent the three Territories coming together again as an alliance if they wished to do so. He personally had voted against Federation in 1953, but he was prepared to give it a trial on the assumption that the Territorial Legislatures should not be interfered with from outside.

In answer to questions, the witness made the following additional points:—

1. If Federation was to continue, the Federal capital should be moved out of Salisbury and out of Southern Rhodesia.

2. The last paragraph of his memorandum of the 30th January should not be taken to mean that he necessarily expected that it would be necessary to use force to loosen Southern Rhodesia's ties with the United Kingdom. He thought that if the United Kingdom were faced with a clear statement that Southern Rhodesia wished to stand alone, that wish would be acceded to.
3. It was dishonest to suggest that there should be a different franchise for the Federal and Territorial Legislatures. If new franchise qualifications were introduced in either of the two Northern Territories for the Territorial Legislature, they should logically apply also to the Federal franchise. If there were any radical change in the franchise, however, Southern Rhodesia might well be compelled to dissociate herself from the Federation.
4. Although no right of secession was written into the Federal Constitution, there was nothing in that Constitution to say that one or more of the constituent parts could not secede.
5. The attitude of the various Territories and of the various policies in those Territories differed very widely. It must be recognised that the Mashonas were quite different from the people of Nyasaland. It was the reactionary settlers in Southern Rhodesia who had given Africans the greatest advancement, even though Africans in Nyasaland thought of the political pattern in Southern Rhodesia as being too similar to that of the Union of South Africa.
6. There would be no particular difficulty in dividing up the responsibility for money borrowed on the Federal account. Southern Rhodesia and Northern Rhodesia were both credit-worthy on their own merits, and it would not be unreasonable to expect the United Kingdom to underwrite Nyasaland's share.
7. If the Federal Government had had full confidence in the prospects for the Federation, they would have budgeted not for a surplus of £2 million in the current financial year but for a deficit of £40 million. Only by really drastic action could the necessary development take place.
8. Even if the Federal structure were drastically loosened, as for example in the Central African Alliance plan, economic co-operation between the three Territories would continue. Common services, such as defence, the post office, communications and economic policy, could continue to be run on a common service basis.
9. In spite of protests from the United Kingdom at legislation such as the Land Apportionment Act, it was significant that Southern Rhodesia had developed the land area allotted to Africans since the Act had first received Britain's consent, and African agriculture was being put on a firm basis without any pressure from the United Kingdom. Twenty-seven per cent of Southern Rhodesia's total income was being devoted to African affairs. All this demonstrated that Southern Rhodesia was playing the game.
10. He had been greatly disturbed at statements of United Kingdom Ministers who appeared to be pre-judging the result of the Commission's work.

L. M. THORNHILL

1. It has been suggested that I give evidence to your Commission. As I have been in Rhodesia a long time, I am able to give you some details to show how events have led up to their present shape here, and may I be permitted to indicate how they may be put in the right trend again. Firstly let me introduce myself to you. I have been in Rhodesia since 1910, I was then 19, and had come with my father's family to farm here. I had been brought up in the Midlands of the Cape Province. My great grandfather led a party out to South Africa in 1820. He had been a Squire in England but sold his estate in County Durham, when free trade made it difficult for growers of crops there. His coat of arms have come down to me, being the eldest in the line of his many descendants.

2. Now I would like to give you a brief sketch of South African history, that would show many apparently mistaken people in England, that we here have a right to some parts of Africa even if they judge it by who came into certain parts first. The Bantu tribes who are now in most areas south of the Zambesi River, which they crossed not much more than three hundred years ago; this was about the same time when the Dutch were settling in the now Cape Province. These Bantu people were an offshoot of the Negroes and went east of Africa, where they intermarried with Arabs. This cross seemed to make them a very virile people. They multiplied rapidly and gradually extended down the east coast. In Southern Africa they displaced, by killing the Bushmen in the way of their push into these areas. The Bushmen seemed to be a stone age people and did not understand forming themselves into bands to oppose their invaders. The more warlike of the Bantu gradually kept on pushing on to new lands down the east coast, but as they increased their peaceable ones just filtered inland up to the highlands as they began to multiply. The said warlike ones later populated Zululand and Basutoland. Then they went on into what is now Kafferaria, and from there they started going out in raiding parties to the Dutch farmers who had by that time extended to the midlands of South Africa, where they began raiding their own ancestral descendants who had filtered up from the east coast perhaps centuries before. These raiding Bantu carried on up, and when they reached what is now Rhodesia, many of them recrossed the Zambesi to the north, but others began settling in what is now Matabeleland. These, though, continued raiding their ancestral descendants the Mashonas who had come as far inland and settled in what is now the eastern half of Southern Rhodesia. In their yearly raids the Matabele took grain, cattle and women from the Mashonas, and killed off the men who stood in their way. Then not so many years after the Matabele had reached these parts, the Europeans came here too, and they came into conflict with that warlike tribe who fought and killed many of them; they killed all of Allan Wilson's patrol. Yet by the straightforward way the white man behaved and how he fought when brought to bay, made such an impression on this warlike people that they soon recognised him as their superior, and were willing to let him have parts of their vast land. Also the Mashonas were very grateful to the white man for rescuing them from the terrible Matabele raids on them.

3. When I came here in 1910 the Mashonas were still very grateful, and were pleased to have the white man settling in the highlands here, while they preferred the lower, warmer parts. Their kind of crops grew better there, besides they hardly wore clothes in those days.

4. Now since those days many changes have taken place, and improvements have steadily been effected and still more improvements in spite of world wars and extremely difficult slump periods.

5. Oh! I must go back a bit to the year 1912; at that time there were some here who thought that Northern and Southern Rhodesias should amalgamate into one Rhodesia, but most of the old people did not think that way, also my father spoke at some of the meetings held to decide, he said he believed that the white man had come up far enough in Africa, so let us keep the Zambesi River as our Northern boundary, and we will make this a white man's country, leaving the north to the natives, who, however, will be pleased to let the white man continue working the copper mines there with his skill and capital. That referendum showed that most people here thought that way too then.

6. Then after years of war and slumps a wonderful surge came into prominence, then he took up politics and became Prime Minister here, and things did go well after those slump years. He was still Prime Minister when the second world war came, and he no doubt helped the country well then. But soon after the war he got the big idea, which perhaps he thought would make him a second Cecil Rhodes. That idea was to form this Federation. The chief snag is our having joined with a purely native state like Nyasaland, and even in Northern Rhodesia the natives there have never recognised the Europeans as their conquerors and their more volatile ones are upsetting the natives here too. The idea of federating with the north only got passed because of the large influx of new settlers after the war, and they were given to understand that with federation capital would flow very freely into this country. I for one was amazed that so many backed the idea of joining with the north, and since that time some very clever people are trying hard to make the idea workable.

7. Now I will give my ideas as to how things are going to work out here before very long. Let me begin by saying that one of the reasons we were so pleased to come to Rhodesia was to get away from the crude Boer outlook in South Africa after the union there was formed; but now there is one thing that I am on their side about, and that is their "apartheid" policy. The only very short-sighted thing in this matter is that they are very far from being liberal enough in apportioning land to their coloured people.

8. It has not been known yet that two different types of people have been able to live in the same land together without the one or the other dominating. You will see by this that I am not belittling those called the natives of South Africa. Now I believe that they will be a great people one of these days, but that will not be until they have their own areas where they are free to carry on as they think best. You see I believe that each different type of people must have part of a country where they are free to do things in their own special way.

9. Now I will make bold and say something to you that may not seem relevant to some of your Commission. It is this: I do believe that Emanuel Sweedenborg was right when he said that the Lord had made the peoples of this world in the form of a "Grand Man". He, Sweedenborg, never saw the natives of Africa in the flesh, but he said that the Lord had allowed him to see and speak to those who had passed into the spirit world. He tells that the natives of Africa were of what he called a Celestial genius, while we Europeans are of a Spiritual genius. By this he meant that the European represented the cerebrum of the brain, while the Africans represented and had the capacity of the involuntary part, the cerebellum in the "Grand Man". The Europeans have a greater capacity to think out what is right, but then they must adapt themselves to that which they understand to be right and as soon as they do this the Africans by the great intuitive powers given them will see the right and will raise themselves to that perception and welcome it. I have had to work with and show many natives how to do things and to manage many during my life, and I can say the natives here and in the Cape Province respond quickly when we deal with them fairly.

10. The black men here have always seemed so much lower than we Europeans, but then for future purposes we must think this way. When the higher fall they fall lower than those of not such a high order.

11. So I am convinced that the natives of Africa will one day be a very great people, but that will not be until we Europeans begin putting our own houses in order and our outlook right. Then this world will no doubt become a wonderful place, and we Europeans will be proud to be even a small part of it.

12. So now let us put our thinking (our own house) in order, then the Africans by their intuitive powers, will see the right in us and will immediately adapt themselves to the order of that perception, I am sure! In this vast country there is much room for the natives, and for many more Europeans than are here now. The Africans must admit that we have helped them to civilisation.

13. Well, I have in as few words as possible tried to give you my point of view about matters here, but you will have understood that I believe that relations will not improve here until we allow different types of people to have full control in their own areas. I am sorry, but I must predict that things will go from bad to worse here, until we Europeans join together in our own areas, and when we do so we will find that we shall get on well by using modern knowledge, methods and machinery which can take away the drudgery of labour but in the initial stages we could have willing hired labour from outside, which at first will be ample from the native areas, I am sure, until they learn the use of modern methods and machinery to increase their production.

14. I had better not say much more now, but must add these few lines. Firstly, I am proud to be of English stock, also so very pleased to be under British protection here, which I am sure will be continued until those in England are sure that the different types of people here are capable of standing on their own feet in their own areas. Yes! that day is coming, but we shall have to have patience yet. However, a start in the right direction is rather urgent now!

15. May I humbly suggest that if you wish for further evidence in support of what I have written in this letter, that I shall be pleased to give it to you or your Commission.

Salisbury

7th March 1960

Addendum to Memorandum

L. M. THORNHILL

Firstly, my Lord, I must tell your Commission that my ideas of putting racial matters on the right trend here are based on the conception that there are intrinsic differences between the peoples of the different nations of the world, and that such different peoples should have separate areas where they can develop in their own special ways.

I have been sorry to see that the good conception of the founders of Rhodesia, to have very self-contained boundaries for the natives is being rather lost sight of.

When I came here in 1910 we were still very particular about native reserve boundaries, but because of this we unfortunately started nearly all the improvements and industries outside the native reserves and now they seem to be almost the backwaters of this country, yet they have ample land for present needs, and very good land too if it is worked on lines of modern agricultural knowledge. As stated there is plenty of land in the native reserves for their present purposes, but later to make their areas more self-contained they could allow the assumed native parliament to buy some of the land on their borders.

Now I am sure it will be wise for us to give the good chiefs more control where they are willing to co-operate on a democratic basis, also we should go all out at first to help them in agricultural matters also do our best to start some secondary industries in their areas.

I know the Natural Resources Board and the missionaries will say they are doing lots for the natives, but I am sure they cannot give the best help until the natives are given almost complete say in their areas.

Oral Evidence

L. M. THORNHILL

The witness had presented a memorandum. He said that he had been a farmer in Northern Rhodesia since the age of 19. He read out an additional statement which is also reproduced above.

In reply to questions, Mr. Thornhill made the following points:—

1. He had nothing to say about the European areas because he thought the Europeans would be able to bring them on well enough by themselves.
2. Referring to paragraph 6 of his memorandum he said he had been against Federation from the beginning, because he thought that it had meant that Southern Rhodesia was taking on too much. He was still against Federation.
3. He wanted complete separation of European and African areas. The Africans should have complete control of their own matters. But within Southern Rhodesia there could be a sort of Federation between the two kinds of States. It seemed to him that some sort of partition of this kind would have to come. He thought that the African people had great potentialities, but they were made in a different way, although they were not necessarily inferior.
4. He was definitely against federating with States north of the Zambesi. He did not wish for close contact with the Northern Territories.
5. Federation in Southern Rhodesia should come when the Africans were ready to take control in their own areas. There would be a European and a native State, two governments with a sort of federal government between them. But he could not say that representation in that federal government should be equal at once. Representation should be such that each side could be able to put its own point of view.

L. T. TRACEY

Should the Commission agree to hear me I would like to give evidence upon two projects with which I am well acquainted, both of which should have a great bearing on the future prosperity of The Federation, and neither of which, I submit, will come to fruition should confidence in the future of The Federation be lost.

These are (1) the establishment of a plant for the manufacture of nitrogen and (2) the Kafue Polder Scheme.

Precis of Evidence

1. Nitrogen Plant.

It has long been recognised that the soils of The Federation have a very low nitrogen status. On account of high soil temperatures humus is quickly nitrified and there is no known means of raising permanently the nitrogen status. Applications of dung or of green manure give practically no benefit except to the first crop. It is essential if the soil's maximum potential is to be realised that nitrogen in the form of fertiliser be applied yearly and, in the case of pastures, more frequently.

The efficacy of applications of nitrogenous fertilisers has been amply demonstrated on field scale by many farmers in the post-war years. Yields of maize and other crops on such farms are fully equal to those on the best farms in the U.S.A.

Even on poor sand veld soils where adequate fertilising is practised high yields are obtained in normal years.

The limitation of the use of nitrogenous fertilisers is governed by the high price and the risk involved in a year such as the present where the costs involved will result in a loss on the crop. The cost has completely debarred the African peasant farmer from using it. It is in the Native Reserves and Purchase Areas that the impact of cheap nitrogenous fertilisers can be most significant. With good farming practice yields in these areas could be quadrupled or more. In experimental work it has been demonstrated that increased production is lineal with applications of nitrogen up to 120 lb. per acre (600 lb. sulphate of ammonia equivalent).

In the beef industry nitrogen (as urea) can greatly increase the calving percentage when used as an additive. Increased arable production will also stimulate beef production and result in better slaughter weights.

The Roskill Report of 1956 indicates that a nitrogen plant can produce at a lesser price than now charged. Inadequate present consumption has been the main reason advanced by Manufacturers who have examined the possibility of establishing a factory in The Federation.

The capital cost of a factory of economic size is variously estimated at about £7,000,000 (Roskill) and £9,000,000 (Sir Harry Oppenheimer in an announcement when opening the Salisbury Show 1959).

My submission is that the provision of cheap nitrogenous fertilisers would revolutionise production figures especially in the Native Reserves and Purchase Areas.

Any loss of confidence in The Federation would preclude indefinitely the provision of such large finance. In the event of a break-up of The Federation no single Territory could command the credit for such a project.

2. Kafue Polder Scheme

The present Pilot Polder is investigating the agricultural potential of the Kafue Flats. The Dutch Consultants in their report consider that should half of the flow of the river be assigned to agriculture it would be possible to empolder 450,000 acres at a cost of £90,000,000. This under irrigation should yield agricultural and pastoral products to an annual value of £30,000,000. Present indications are distinctly hopeful.

The major portion of the Kafue Flats lies in Native Reserve and Trust areas. It is therefore envisaged that development of The Flats will eventually be mainly in agricultural holdings of a size suited to peasant agriculture. Four such holdings are presently being tested on the Pilot Polder. The scheme would be comparable to the Gezira Scheme in the Sudan but with the addition of pastoral products and therefore the protective foods so urgently needed in the Federation to overcome malnutrition.

It would be possible to empolder The Flats in stages, and the requirements of capital would therefore be staggered over probably a generation or more.

My submission is that any loss of confidence in The Federation will preclude indefinitely any development of the scheme beyond the present investigational stage which has already cost some £300,000.

Further, that in the event of the break-up of The Federation, Northern Rhodesia with its economy founded mainly on mining could not command the credit needed for even partial development.

L. T. TRACEY

The witness stated that the move to get a Nitrogen Plant established had been in operation since 1954. The benefits that could accrue from cheap nitrogen were well known and had been proved both in research and practice. The chief benefit would come to peasant farmers as they learnt to use it. Many who were in contact with European farmers would see the benefit of the application of nitrogen and be very ready to use it. The witness submitted that if confidence in the Federation were to be lost the establishment of a Nitrogen Plant would be impossible. The capital expenditure involved in the setting up of a Nitrogen Plant would be high, and financial assistance from the Government would be required. The main obstacle was the present consumption figure; but one would not get increased consumption if the intention was to make a profit on an unsubsidised basis. It was essential that the nitrogen should be cheap and it should be sold at £10 a ton as against the present price of £21 per ton for imported nitrogen. Cheapness should be brought about by Government assistance on the capital side—not on the consumption side as such a subsidy would have to be reduced as consumption steadily rose. Asked whether this meant that nitrogen fertiliser could not be produced economically in the Federation, the witness said that it could be produced economically but not at a price which would produce sufficiently widespread consumption. What was profitable to a producer was not necessarily profitable to the farmer. It was necessary for the Government to subsidise the plant in the way he had suggested in order to secure wide consumption.

As regards the Kafue Polder Scheme the witness said that the cost of the whole scheme would be £90,000,000 for 450,000 acres of irrigated farm land. The scheme could be carried out by stages, probably about four to be economical. The work at present was investigational and the results were hopeful. It was now possible to identify the problems involved, and they were approaching the Rockefeller Institute to work on these problems which were mainly concerned with soil physics. The plan would be in the view of the witness be a true partnership. It was thought that in the first polder there should be both peasant and mechanised farms. These could grow different crops so that the peasant could sell his labour when he had no work to do, and the mechanised farmer could do heavy work for the peasant farmer. When the whole scheme got going it should produce £30,000,000 of agricultural and pastoral products a year. It was suggested to the witness that with this yield it would be necessary to export, and he was asked if he thought it would be possible to compete economically in world markets. He replied that he thought that this was so, and that plenty of diversification would be possible. As examples he cited the production of tinned and dried milk and cheese. It would also be possible to grow vegetable and flower seeds. Asked whether he did not think that this scheme would disrupt the economy of the country, the witness said that in his opinion it would not do so.

Memorandum

A GROUP OF LOYAL RESIDENTS OF THE FEDERATION OF NON-BRITISH ORIGIN

The reason why this Memorandum is presented is to demonstrate the solidarity of Rhodesians of non-British origin with our fellow countrymen and women who came from Britain to make this country a permanent home, not only for themselves, but for their children and grandchildren, in wishing to see the Federation grow, with the minimum of delay, to full nationhood within the British Commonwealth of Nations.

Our reason for thinking that our views may carry some weight with the Commission is that we, who, in many cases have lost our homes and families through opposing oppression, either Communist or Nazi, would under no circumstances be parties to an oppressive form of government, or the oppression of one section of the community by another.

We feel, therefore, that the Commission will give some credence to our statement that in the Federation such oppression does not exist and our belief that this is due to the good will of the inhabitants of this country and not to the exercise of controls from outside.

We wish to make the following points why the Federation should be given its independence at the earliest opportunity:—

- i) The present state of uncertainty is leading to a deterioration of relations between the Races.
- ii) People are afraid to invest in land or businesses, or to build homes, while they fear that everything for which they have worked may be destroyed at the whim of people outside the Federation who have no knowledge of, or are ill-informed about the true situation here.
- iii) We feel that there can be no true security for anyone, of whatever colour or creed, while the affairs of this country can be made a party political issue overseas and prejudices within this country inflamed by people outside our borders for political ends, or for personal notoriety.
- iv) We would draw the attention of the Commission to the fact that this is a multi-racial society, to which members of all Races have made their contribution, some by their labour, some by their knowledge and some by creating the climate in which industries, providing employment for all, can flourish. In such a society, we, who belong to the section which has provided the skill and capital to make these developments possible, would never agree to abdicate in favour of any one racial group. Therefore, government will have to be on a non-racial basis.

- v) That we, together with Rhodesians of British stock, regard ourselves as citizens of this country and not as "settlers".

We would most earnestly request the Commission to give our spokesman the opportunity of putting our case more fully.

Salisbury

March 1960

Memorandum

I. R. SELMER (in conjunction with the above memorandum of a group of residents of the Federation of non-British origin).

In this Memorandum an attempt has been made to present the problems facing the Federation from a stand-point other than that of purely British experience. This in no way implies a slight on the British view point, but is merely a line of reasoning based on a variety of experience outside the scope of the average resident of British stock. One factor which may be worthy of note, is the basic unity of thought found amongst Continental Europeans of widely differing nationalities, many of whom have fought each other in the not too distant past.

Summary of Evidence

1. "Race Relations". This deals with a critical Analysis of this term and the different interpretations thereof.
2. Position in Under-developed Countries. In this section a parallel has been drawn between the under-developed countries of Eastern Europe and Africa with their attendant class and national struggles.
3. Attainment of Liberty. An endeavour has been made to show that national independence is not always synonymous with personal liberty.
4. Position in the Federation. In this section the line of reasoning set out above has been amplified and applied to the situation in the Federation.
5. Practical Recommendations. This is self-explanatory.

1. "Race Relations"

Preoccupation with this subject became marked after World War II and may have been influenced to a large degree by the reaction to Hitler's policy of extermination of Jews and Slavs. In addition British and American leaders were greatly concerned with colonial and domestic reform. In this context they often interpreted race-relations in terms of a limited Anglo-centre experience and tended to argue on the known experiences of East and Southern Africa and the United States "Deep South". In the thinking of many people the term race-relations is linked to definite physical characteristics such as the colour of skin, and to race—as colour-prejudice—and the oppression of Whites against Blacks.

We, Continental Europeans, are aware that "Race Relations" is a question begging term. We know how Eastern and Central Europe and, also, the Near East, was shaken by bitter national struggles amongst people who are white and have committed far more atrocities against each other than white and black here. In the light of our knowledge and experience, we feel that the real problem is the struggle of national majorities and minorities, allied to class struggles.

The British domestic experience is of little relevance here. When we examine the growth of English democracy, we find that it grew up under vastly different conditions from under-developed or semi-developed countries. The conditions which prevailed in Britain may be summarised as follows:—

- (i) Tradition of national unification achieved comparatively early in history—i.e., early seventeenth century.
- (ii) Cultural and linguistic homogeneity. (It should be remembered that even Aneurin Bevan delivers his attacks in English).
- (iii) Island position which gave security through a strong navy but without the necessity of militarism, i.e., no big army, nor a big bureaucracy were in existence.
- (iv) England pioneered the Industrial Revolution, built up great wealth and had thus something to re-distribute. (It was not the Chartists who saved England but Industry).

2. Position Different In Under-Developed Countries

Eastern Europe and the Near East are not only geographically much nearer to Africa, but are also nearer in their economic structure. Most of these countries are relatively poor. Their class struggles were invariably complicated by national struggles. These usually tended to be extremely vicious and arose alien minorities pioneered urban enterprises. Prague, for instance, started as a German urban settlement, whereas towns on the eastern Adriatic owe their existence mostly to Italians. In Poland trade and crafts were for a long time mainly in the hands of Germans and Jews. The position was that these alien minorities accumulated wealth and became middle classes.

That this economic disparity was only human. That it can, and invariably has, been a most effective weapon in the hands of a nationalistic majority against an alien minority has been proved time and again.

If we trace the growth of indigenous nationalism in Eastern Europe in the Nineteenth Century and our times, we find that mass education of the backward peasants was the first step towards nationalism. Degrees led to Civil Service jobs, which in turn led to considerable influence in the machinery of government and ultimately, to its control. Having got this control the movement broadened into commerce and industry and the acquisition of wealth.

This corresponds even quite closely to the spread of Boer Nationalism in the Union of South Africa.

The Germans and Poles were often anti-Semitic and, at various times, fought the Jewish minority by withholding higher education and the admittance to professional bodies by enforcing a "numerus clausus", and by the organisation of state corporations. Commercially and industrially boycotts, strikes, intimidation and physical assaults were among the means used.

In its most violent form extermination of the offending minorities, or wholesale expulsion became a familiar feature. The Ottoman "Young Turks", for instance, exterminated countless Armenians and expelled one and a half million Greeks in 1921.

Together with our fellow citizens of British stock, we are sincerely afraid of finding ourselves in such a minority position. The only difference being that many amongst us have already once lost our homes, our families and our country. It is only recently that many Greeks were thrown out of Egypt for Col. Nasser and we are not convinced by the ostensibly liberal phraseology of present day African Nationalist leaders.

We cannot agree with the popular approach current in Liberal circles overseas, which frequently equates the "settler" mentality with that of European Fascists. In evidence we quote the attached article by Dr. C. A. Rogers, a psychologist, who has carried out an attitude test on White voters. On the "tough-tender minded" scale commonly used by psychologists in such investigations, European Rhodesians are, in fact, more "tender-minded" and psychologically less inclined towards aggressive attitudes or the advocacy of brutal punishments, etc., than the average voter in the United Kingdom. The stereotype of the brandy swilling, sjambok wielding "settler" is completely without validity, though it still continues to bedevil the picture of us in overseas eyes.

3. Attainment of Liberty

Freedom for whom to do what?

It is one of the great misconceptions of our time that we tend to regard National independence and individual liberty to life, person and property as identical. This is not the case. Balkan and Near Eastern states, all white, did not promote personal liberty.

The polyglot Austro-Hungarian Empire, with all its failings, permitted the "Friedjung" trial, in which Masaryk had the liberty not only to accuse the Austrian Foreign Ministry of having committed a forgery, but to prove it. In few of the national states which came into being after World War I and partially inherited the Austro-Hungarian Empire, would such a trial have been permitted.

Parliamentary liberal democracy only worked in Czechoslovakia. Ultimately even Czechoslovakia became a victim of nationalist dissent. The other Eastern European states drifted into dictatorships and so did the Near East. In these countries dictatorship was, and still is, exercised by either Mass Armies or Mass Parties on the Egyptian, Iraqi or Sudanese pattern.

Parliamentary democracy based on a mass-franchise degenerates in under-developed countries where there is no tradition of individualism and Western rationalism. People tend to vote according to tribal or national affiliations which in turn leads to deadlock. To some extent this is even true in South Africa between Boer and Briton.

R. S. H. Crossman summarises this rather neatly in his book, Plato Today—"For the transformation of the class struggle into party warfare, of absolutism into constitutional government, and of power politics into the rule of law can only be effected where there is a pervasive sense of national unity, a long-standing tradition on the side of peaceful change and an expanding system of production to supply the wealth needed for social reform. These conditions were present in nineteenth-century England: they were not present in fourth century Greece"—and neither are they in Africa today.

Where there is no strong middle class and the general level of economic development is low, it follows that the new social-revolutionary expectations cannot be met. We will, therefore, have a drift to get a strong man to solve the country's problems.

The new nationalists will be mostly Civil Servants, soldiers or professional people dependent on state employment with its attendant formation of an "Etatiste" state of mind.

The results of dictatorship are well known, but will bear repetition.

(i) Personal freedom is lessened and a much more savage party discipline enforced. Of this we have an example in the Ivory Coast, where Houphouët-Boigny's "Rassemblement Democratique Africain" has sixty out of sixty seats. We also have dictatorships (black versus black) in French Guinea and the French Congo and civil strife in the Cameroons and the Belgian Congo. Reverting to the "Friedjung" trial, this could not take place today in any of the above named states.

(ii) Tradition of violence. In order to promote a national-revolutionary spirit no gigantic organisation is needed. A comparatively small number of "activists" is all that is required to swing a large number of people. This method was used by the Nazis in South West Africa before the war with great success. It has also been used by nationalist groups in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland. To illustrate this point the following report is quoted from the periodical, East Africa and Rhodesia of 10th December, 1959, Vol. 36, No. 1835, page 357:—

"A fifty year old African woman was set on fire with petrol recently . . . The woman was walking about a hundred yards ahead of two friends when three men approached her. They threw petrol over her, set her alight and ran away. Mary Kapombe's two friends, a man and a woman, went to her aid when they saw her burst into flames . . . A police spokesman said in Lusaka that 'this cowardly and brutal attack was made as reprisal against a woman who has flouted the beerhall boycott'. A boycott of beer-halls was called on November 16th by the United National Independence Party . . ."

4. Position in the Federation.

In the Federation a state of affairs similar to that in Eastern Europe and the Near East now exists. The nationalist struggle is still associated with the class struggle and where poverty among the masses is greatest, the Nationalists are strongest. This is the case in Nyasaland.

The most outstanding social problem of Africa is the general backwardness of the African population and the fact that it doubles itself with each generation. This position, which bears comparison with that of early Nineteenth-Century Ireland, can only be met by industrial expansion and this, in itself, presupposes increased European Immigration to provide more skills and capital. (Industrially and economically South Africa and Southern Rhodesia with the largest percentage of whites, are, also, the most advanced.) But in order to attract both capital investment and the necessary white skill and make them productive, requires above all a stable Government able to reassure the Europeans. The point has been made that industrialisation could be met by a system of white labour migrancy rather than by permanent settlement. Migrant labour, be it black or white, has proved to be inefficient, wasteful and expensive.

We may ask the question—what is the possibility of a revolutionary take-over? The conditions for such a take-over do not exist. The key positions, both economic and military are in European hands. It follows that no progress and, by the same token, no revolution would be possible without their consent and active co-operation. They occupy the "positions of vantage" (Lenin's words) and without these positions of vantage a revolution has practically no chance of success. Neither has outside intervention, unless backed by overwhelming military force from the outside. The Hungarian national Revolt—successful at first—was eventually smashed by Soviet armed intervention. Colonialists are, on the whole, less oppressive because they do not make ideological demands on a broad front, are content with security of person and property and, therefore, have only imposed a limited kind of rule. The "Fuehrer" type of ideology, which claims to make the Leader into the embodiment of the national will, comes from people like Dr. Banda. A quotation from Guy Clutton-Brock's book Dawn in Nyasaland, page 55, may make this contention clearer:—

"All the signs and portents of a national movement are there. There are the wrongs to be righted, the injustices to be made good, the fears to be allayed, the needs to be fulfilled, the bonds to be shaken off, the people's rising potential seeking to gain equality of opportunity, the deep urge of our time for freedom, equality and brotherhood. The national leader is there, a hero who has risen from the people, mysterious, confident, certain, decided that the time has come for an end to tea parties, memoranda, interminable abortive discussions, and polite speeches. The time has come for a man to lead in no uncertain terms, to shock both people and Government into awareness that the crisis is upon them now and to galvanise them into action. This is the new factor in the situation, the insight and dynamic of one man who presents himself not as a personal demagogue but as the embodiment of the will and spirit of the people. The young brigade are behind him, on their toes and ready; the old guard follow, hesitant and wistful. The die is cast; the way is chosen".

It is incomprehensible that an avowed British liberal should so slavishly imitate the words and approach of a Dr. Goebbels.

African Nationalism like its predecessors elsewhere, is more often than not led by the disappointed or unsuccessful. Among the Europeans, as a whole, there is a marked lack of confidence in their administrative and technological ability.

There is also a very real danger that the reaction of the European to being "pushed too far" will favour white nationalism. At the moment, they realise the need for African development and are willing to make concessions. In spite of everything that has been said about the Federation, and Southern Rhodesia in particular, the life expectation of a Southern Rhodesian African is greater than that of his Northern Rhodesian compatriot, or of a Ghanaian, or a Mexican.

Too often it has been said, that poor social conditions in towns are a result of white settlement and many people—mostly outside the Federation—are of the opinion that this is exclusively so. Sociological research tends to disprove this, as a perusal of A. E. Southall's and P. C. W. Gutkind's East African Studies, No. 9 entitled Townsmen in the Making: Kampala and its Suburbs, will show. It gives details on Kampala labour-migrancy. It also shows that wives are rarely taken to town, but mostly left in the reserves. Even in cases where the wife is taken the children are left in the reserve. Family life is therefore anything but stable and there is a prevalence of concubinage. These conditions exist despite the fact that there is no Land Apportionment Act nor white settlement.

5. Practical Recommendations

1. It is felt that one of the most important steps to be taken is the unification of Public Security under one Federal authority. It would not be necessary to lose the identity of either the Northern Rhodesia Police or of the Nyasaland Police. A Federal Police Board might meet the occasion. The reasons for establishing such an authority are as follows:—

- (a) To get the two Northern Forces up to the same standard as the B.S.A. police. Inefficient police forces are cruel, but not efficient ones. In this respect a comparison between the bloody "Gwembe Incident" with the bloodless crowd control of the B.S.A.P. in Nyasaland during the Emergency might not be out of place.
- (b) Security cannot be put into a water-tight compartment entirely divorced from defence, which is a Federal matter.
- (c) Security cannot also be put into a water-tight Territorial compartment.

2. Periodical amendments to the Southern Rhodesian Land Apportionment Act to allow home-ownership in specified areas for Africans within the European areas. This, in itself, would be an interim measure until the Land Market becomes free and is no longer regarded as a tribal or ethnic, but as a national asset. This would arouse great opposition in the Southern Rhodesian Parliament. The need, consequently, exists to educate the Europeans to change. Although this cannot be done quickly, as otherwise opposition will grow into dangerous reaction.

3. Encouragement of individual African home and land freehold ownership in the Northern Territories. Safeguards against the speculator in land must be either instituted or, where present retained as an interim measure.

4. A Council of State with representation for Europeans, Africans, Indians and Coloureds should be created.

It should be a reviewing chamber, similar to the House of Lords and it should:—

- (a) Have the right of suspensive veto for a limited time, say three years.
- (b) Have the power to commute to life imprisonment sentences on persons sentenced to death. (This is no reflection on the three Territories or their Judiciaries, but a reaction to conditions in Europe, particularly the eastern part, where far too many death sentences are, or have been, carried out.)
- (c) It should have over-riding powers in cases of expropriation without sufficient compensation by a lower authority.

It is suggested that the Commission consider the three proposals as to the machinery for appointing this Chamber given below:—

- (a) That the Chamber should be appointed by the Governor General on his Ministers' advice, but only for a specified term.
- (b) Representatives from each of the three Territories equal in numbers, to be nominated by the Territorial Governors, but also for a specified term.
- (c) Elected by an Electoral College consisting of Territorial and Federal M.P.s. It is envisaged that there should be one Electoral College for each Territory.

5. There should be no lowering of the Franchise. With the expansion of both educational facilities and economic advancement the Franchise will be within the reach of any reasonable and capable person. A lowering would merely accentuate the danger of a pseudo-democratic take-over by a black nationalism.

Oral Evidence

I. R. SELMER

The witness had presented a memorandum from a group of residents of the Federation of non-British origin and a second memorandum of his own.

Mr. Selmer stated that the memorandum had been signed by 80 or 90 residents in Salisbury or in the immediate vicinity. Poles and Germans were about equal and accounted for two-thirds of the signatures, the remaining one-third being composed of Hollanders and others. He invited questions in reply to which he made the following points:—

1. He referred to the paragraph 4 of the petition, expressing the wish that the Federation should be given its independence at the earliest opportunity. He did not think they could carry on as at present. There existed a double loyalty. It was like a child first going to its father and then to its mother. He felt that further progress could only be made after independence of the Federation. He meant independence as between the Federation on the one hand and the United Kingdom on the other. He thought that a deterioration of race relations had occurred since Federation. He had no recent experience either in Northern Rhodesia or Nyasaland, but he did know how Africans felt in Southern Rhodesia.

2. He was most anxious that there should be a definite statement of future policy.

3. The people whom he represented were mostly either now citizens of the Federation or applying for that status. They had all cut links with their own original countries and were settling down in the Federation. Quite a few were German Jews, many were non-Jewish Germans who had been anti-Nazi. The Poles included a number of Jews.

4. The suggestion included in the memorandum section 5, paragraph 4, for a "Council of State" was not merely for the sake of being diplomatic. He understood that ideas of this nature were current in the Commonwealth. He thought it might be advisable to have a second Chamber of all races instead of the African Affairs Board. He agreed that there might be a possible weakness in its Constitution, as suggested in the memorandum, mainly if it merely amounted to a project of the predominant political party in the Federation, at present the United Federal Party. But he wanted a safeguard on racial lines. He thought that the Northern Territories could be relied upon to pick people capable of stopping racial discrimination; he did not infer by that that they would not equally do so in Southern Rhodesia. He understood that the Governors in the Northern Territories were also the equivalent of Prime Ministers while the Governor of Southern Rhodesia was purely a constitutional figurehead.

5. His proposals were not intended merely to imply a perpetuation of white domination. He referred in this connection to the question in his memorandum on Mr. Crossman's book. He foresaw a rapid economic advancement of Africans coupled with better education, and training in citizenship. This would be the basis on which to build on the British pattern of democracy. He thought it essential to believe in one's country as a whole, as being one for all races. The Europeans had already in the Federation given the Africans an improved economic position, although he did not think that economics was the only thing that mattered.

6. He disagreed that the memorandum was merely an expression of the fear of domination by Africans. There was, however, an apprehension among those whom he represented that African majorities might lead to the loss of European lives and property. He agreed that fear existed on both sides. He would like the Commission to do something to eradicate this fear, that is to say, create security on both sides.

7. He regarded African nationalism in its present form as exactly the same kind of thing as had happened under Hitler. Lawful political methods were not being used. He agreed that it was a form of political struggle, but he did not like the shape it was taking.

8. In asking for "independence" for the Federation he wanted to see a guarantee given that Africans should progress to full equality with Europeans. He did not think that this could possibly happen in the situation of continued dependence, because of the divided loyalty which he had mentioned. It was essential for people to believe in their own country. He thought there was already a greater sense of unity in Southern Rhodesia than anywhere else in the Federation. He would like to see the Federation self-governing, with each of the components having its rightful share. He had never understood what the opposition to Federation was. He had known Africans in Southern Rhodesia ready to be known as Rhodesians, and in favour of the Federal concept.

9. He said, if the majority of the Africans in the Northern Territories were solidly opposed, for whatever reasons, to the concept of Federation, he would not seek to maintain it by force. He agreed that rather than break up the Federation, and on those assumptions, he would attempt to maintain some form of economic association. The Federation as an economic unit would be better than Southern Rhodesia trying to exist on its own. But he doubted whether it would be possible for the Federation to exist in the form of a purely economic association.

10. He was questioned as to the mention of the Land Apportionment Act, section 5, paragraph 2 of his memorandum. It would be difficult to abolish the Act. The decision he had made was that home ownership should be made available to Africans. In the rural areas he would like to see an extension of the Purchase Area Schemes. It would eventually be beneficial if there were a free market in land. He agreed that safeguards against speculation in land were necessary, and that this might indeed be the real effect of the Land Apportionment Act. He would like land to be owned by individuals and not communally. He agreed that amendments to the Land Apportionment Act would be likely to bring about strong reactions. Africans should certainly be able eventually to lease land in any area.

Memorandum

ADVOCATE H. E. DAVIES, Q.C., M.P.

1. Personal

Born in Bulawayo in 1915. Took degrees of B.A., B.Com. and L.I.B. at Capetown University and have practised as an advocate in Bulawayo since 1939. Queen's Counsel in 1956. Elected (unopposed) as Member of the Federal Parliament representing African interests in Southern Rhodesia at a by-election in May 1955. Joined United Federal Party in September 1956. Re-elected (for same seat) at the Federal General Election in November 1958. Member of African Affairs Board and Deputy Chairman since June 1955.

2. Future of African Affairs Board

In my view this is not a satisfactory constitutional device to "protect" African interests. On two occasions during the life of the First Parliament it reported legislation as differentiating under the Constitution (the Constitution Amendment Act and the Electoral Act). I was in the minority on both occasions but I appreciate the sense of frustration of the members in the majority when the United Kingdom Government agreed to the passing of the two Acts. It was said—and I think it was clearly the case—that the Federal Government had, before introducing the measures, consulted with the U.K. Government and had been informed by that Government that in its view the measures were not differentiating and would in due course be assented to. This prior consultation is inevitable—and probably wise—but it means that the subsequent consideration of the measures by the African Affairs Board was futile.

Apart from this aspect of the matter, the Board is not constituted so as to provide the best means of ascertaining whether legislation is differentiating or not. Difficult legal questions are involved and few of the members are by training suited to grasp the issues. Political considerations inevitably tend to play a large part.

3. Representation of Africans in the Federal Parliament

Apart from the 12 members who must be Africans, three members must be European with special responsibilities for African interests. Of these Europeans, one is elected (in Southern Rhodesia) by voters on both rolls and the other two are nominated (in Northern Rhodesia and in Nyasaland) by their respective Territorial Governors. I wish to make the following points:

- (a) In a Parliament which has 57 elected members, the two nominated members are "out of place" and do not fit in with the elected members. Rightly or wrongly, they tend to be viewed with suspicion.
- (b) Since the nominated members must normally be men who have taken no part in party politics they tend to be out of their depth in a Parliament run on party political lines.
- (c) The member elected in Southern Rhodesia is also in a difficult position. Since all members of the House have a full vote on all matters political parties must tend to contest this seat, and the electorate decides the issue on party political lines. It is quite impossible for an independent to run an election campaign covering the whole of Southern Rhodesia in competition with an organised political party.
- (d) Unless the person elected is well-to-do it is most difficult for a moderate and liberal European to keep the confidence of all African leaders.
- (e) I believe that representation of African interests by specially elected or appointed Europeans is unnecessary. The elected African members are capable of doing what is required. Moreover I believe that if these three European members were eliminated the ordinary constituency members would tend to take an increasing interest in matters affecting Africans, which at present they are inclined to leave to the special members. Such interest would be beneficial to all concerned.
- (f) The sooner "special" representation on a racial basis is eliminated the better. The "fading out" provisions of the amended Constitution have my full support.

4. Constitutional Advance for the Federation

(a) The U.K. Government has recognised as a convention that it will not initiate legislation for the Federation. The Labour Party has, I understand, said that it would not consider itself bound by this convention if returned to power. This fact alone, I suggest, makes it imperative that the convention should be given force of law by an appropriate amendment of the Constitution.

(b) I subscribe fully to the view of the United Federal Party that it is not in the interests of anybody that control over affairs in the Federation should be exercised by the United Kingdom Government. This Government is 6000 miles away. Moreover, its return to power depends on the wish of an electorate which is far more concerned with domestic matters and hardly (if at all) concerned with the Federation.

(c) I accept that if the United Kingdom Government relinquishes control there must be some constitutional safeguard to protect both the rights of Africans and the rights of minorities. I do not think a Senate or Upper House is desirable and I favour the "Constitutional Council" type of safeguard suggested by the Federal Standing Committee of the United Federal Party. I think, however, that it would be advantageous if all members of the Constitutional Council were entitled to take part in debates in the Federal Parliament. It should have the power to delay and require reconsideration of any proposed legislation which it considered adversely affected the interests of Africans or any minority group, and on such reconsideration the members of the Council might well be given the right to vote with members of the Federal Parliament.

5. The Franchise

I believe that the qualifications for the franchise laid down in the Federal Electoral Act are reasonable. To my mind they ensure that by the time a large number of Africans are registered on the general roll those Africans will approach politics on a party political and non-racial basis.

6. The position of the three Territories

I believe that Southern Rhodesia, by its record since self-government in 1923, has earned the right to full independence in its own sphere. And I believe that unless the two Northern Territories are advanced to the same status, with political power retained in responsible hands, as soon as possible, their economic development will be retarded. Whilst they are in an inferior position to Southern Rhodesia these territories are at a great disadvantage in attracting private investment. And I am completely convinced that whatever the importance of political "advance" so far as Africans are concerned, in the long term "freedom" depends on economic advance.

7. Conclusion

All my life I have subscribed to the belief that it is morally wrong to allow colour or race as such to play any part in the determination of a fellow-being's rights or duties. But I recognise that in all political activity it is foolish to blind oneself to the existence of all sorts of human prejudices. The most gratifying aspect of developments in Southern Rhodesia since the War has to my mind been the growing realisation by Europeans of the fact that the so-called "colour bar" has its roots in cultural differences, and the acceptance by more and more Europeans of the inevitability and desirability of its eventual disappearance. This land is my home, I know no other. There are thousands of Rhodesians who think like me. If we are given the full responsibility of governing our country we will continue with the utmost determination in our efforts to build up a great and happy country, in which a man's race or colour will eventually be of as little importance in determining his rights and duties as is, today, his religion.

Oral Evidence

ADVOCATE H. E. DAVIES, Q.C., M.P.

Mr. Davies said that he was a specially elected European member of the Federal Assembly representing African interests. He had appeared for Africans in a number of land husbandry cases in the courts, and had usually been regarded by Africans as concerned with Southern Rhodesia Territorial Affairs. In his view it was not right for Europeans to represent African interests in the Federal Legislatures since Africans could seldom regard a European as deeply involved in African affairs.

It was fundamental to the future of the country that the ideals of partnership and co-operation should be adhered to. Inevitably there were divisions in the country, but these should not be based on colour. It was intolerable that educated Africans should, when they had reached middle-class status in the economic sphere, be restricted in the political and social spheres. The Federation was the only part of Africa in which a truly multi-racial state could be built up; this was taking place under the economic impetus of Southern Rhodesia. In 1953 very few Europeans had recognised what was involved in partnership; in the intervening years there had been a big change in the attitude even of the most reactionary Europeans who now mainly accepted the inevitability of eventual partnership between the races.

Turning to the African Affairs Board, the witness said that all members of the Board had got on very well together personally, but they had inevitably run into serious frustration since there was a strong feeling that whatever action was taken by the Board, all matters of real importance had been settled in advance between the Governments concerned. If the United Kingdom reserved powers were withdrawn, some more potent body must be substituted for the African Affairs Board. In his own view, this could best be carried out by a constitutional council. This should be housed in the same building as the ordinary Members of Parliament. His proposals in this direction were dealt with in paragraph 4(c) of his memorandum.

Whatever constitutional steps were taken, it would be impossible to give any guarantee that all the trouble could be avoided. What was needed now was an opportunity to enable the Government on the spot to take whatever action was necessary. Africans would come to accept such firm government; indeed, many might think that a change might bring them benefit. The main requirement was an assurance that the United Kingdom Government would support Federal Government policies.

In answer to questions, the witness said that the Dominion Party had been making a good deal of capital out of statements by the Northern Territories that they wanted to get out of the Federation. If the present process ended in the establishment of predominantly African governments in the two Northern Territories Southern Rhodesia might not find it worth while to stay in the Federation. Legally, he accepted that the constitution did not include the right of individual Territories to secede; equally, there was nothing to say that they could not. But before secession could take place, all parties must be agreed.

The need to keep the Government in responsible hands was not equivalent to saying that it must remain in European hands. It would be very easy to have a responsible African Government in Nyasaland. This need not necessarily imply that such government must be fully elected.

With regard to the franchise qualifications, money and education were not perfect qualifications, but they were perhaps the least objectionable of many and it was very difficult to say what could take their place.

Memorandum

C. S. SKIPPER

I am a Rhodesian citizen, 55 years of age. I have spent my life:—

8 years in England
31 years in the Union of South Africa
4 years in Mozambique
12 years in Rhodesia

My entire working life has been spent in the service of a British Bank, and I am still following my employment, which takes me periodically to all towns in Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland and brings me in close touch with all communities. I am married and have one daughter. I do not think I can usefully produce to you statistics—all that you need in the way of figures will, I am sure, have been placed before you by the Governments of the respective territories comprising the Federation—but in the hope that the views and opinions of a Rhodesian citizen may be of some use to you in your considerations of the matters before you which are of the greatest importance to every inhabitant of our country, I write to record some of mine.

It is basic to the question before you that the three territories bound up in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland "are the rightful homes of all lawful inhabitants thereof, whatever their origin" and it follows that conditions in these territories should be such and should be kept such that the inhabitants should be able to live their lives and follow their pursuits in peace (in so far as peace be not broken by any enemy country). Maintenance of peace and of a climate conducive to progress and growth calls for sound, stable government, with a sound, progressive and fair policy. I suggest that in large degree we have that basic requirement now. The Government policy towards the different races making up the lawful and permanent population of the Federation is described in the term "Partnership".

I believe that the Federal Government has given substantial evidence of its good faith towards implementation of the policy of partnership which in essence entails effort to raise the living standards of the African, to advance him in education, in skills, and in opening to him doors of employment which have been regarded previously as belonging to the European. They belonged to the European because the European was at one time the only inhabitant equal to the demands of jobs calling for skills, handicraft, for education, for administrative ability, but we have now a proportion of African people presenting themselves for the type of work in question and they are obtaining some of this work. They will continue to share a growing proportion of this work and very many of us, the Europeans, now see that this must be, and that old traditional attitudes must be affected by the emergence of new factors. Though in the opinion of some commentators little has been done in this way, I suggest the Europeans have come a long way in the last few years to adjust their ideas to present trends. Many of us, the Europeans, including the Government, failed to appreciate, I suggest, the factor of timing in the aspect just touched upon—the economic advancement of the African. We understand that adoption of the policy of partnership represented the best way to achieve a better balance in the distribution of the product of work and effort in the Federation, but we tended to think that because the great mass of African people is so backward in education, in civilisation, we had many years, perhaps decades, to work out the solution, which we thought contingent in large degree on the spread of education, the inculcation of civilised social ideas, and ways. The march of events has demonstrated that we were in error and that at the most we had a few years only and some of those the locust has eaten. Nevertheless, as a non-official I feel I can validly express the view that the Government's intentions and good faith cannot be questioned and that they deserve confidence and trust in controlling the country in the difficult days which await us. I give my view that European people in this country in the difficult days which await us appreciate that the "wind of change" sweeping Africa will not by-pass the Federation, and that they are prepared to play their part in working alongside the African people, and the Indian people, and the people of mixed race, to develop this country for the common good.

I suggest that the facts of the case, the backwardness in all respects of millions of African people in the Federation, point to the need for a bringing forward of the African in an economic sense and in an educative sense as a matter of first priority. The greatest care must be exercised not to vest political rights in people who in the great mass have as yet no conception of civilised government or of the workings of democracy. I refer to the African. The idea of universal suffrage in this country and at this stage is, I suggest quite insupportable and unacceptable and the best interests of all the inhabitants of this country and at this stage would, I hope, throw up African people who are able, willing and equal to the responsibility of a larger share in Government and control than is available to them now.

The European people of this country, people who have made it their home and look to no other land either with nostalgia or longing, must not be placed at the mercy of a people who are uncivilised, uneducated and unaware. The African people of this country must not be left to the tender care of a few political extremists of their own race. Your Commission will have had before it African people who are educated and aware, but you have no doubt sought evidence from Governmental sources as to the ratio which people of that class have to the mass of their compatriots. The educated African male can be counted probably at the most in hundreds—the others are counted in millions. The educated African female, in practical terms does not exist in this country. If in response to vociferous demands of a few educated Africans political power were to be handed over to them, and they were to be able to seize the opportunity, and if the European people were meekly to accept the imposition of such a state of affairs which is not likely, a facade of democracy would pertain and elections could be held, but there is no doubt in my mind that the ignorant uncivilised black with a vote would vote for the black candidate for reasons which it is not necessary to put into words, and by force of numbers alone there would be a totally black government. Inevitably, in circumstances existing, the facade of democracy would merely be a formal screen—and it would hide nothing—for a black dictatorship and there is no doubt at all that the thin veneer of education and civilisation of the few at the top of the great black pyramid would not prevail against the opportunity to dominate and to attain their own personal ambitions, whatever they may be. We would have dictatorship tempered or accentuated as the case may be by the occasional assassination, but one dictator is not likely to be any more good for the country, for the blacks as well as the whites, than the other. This is a depressing picture. The result would be stagnation, slipping into chaos. A vacuum would be created to be filled by power, and it needs little imagination to envisage the interest of some world power in stepping in. Would it be too pessimistic to think that under any of the other possible succeeding powers the inhabitants of this country, black, white and brown, would be worse off than they are now? I suggest they would.

Surely the case for a controlled political advance of the African people in the Federation is clear? Control by means of agreed qualification for the franchise would result in a steady, reasonably paced, accretion to the voters' role. Elections would continue to be held on the party system, and the competition of the voters' role, predominantly European at present, with a steady reduction of the predominance until parity is reached would eventually change to predominance of the African. I would hope that this gradual transition would be accompanied by a gradual change from a government with a large European majority, to a Government which would be a mixture of European, African and Indian members. The merit lies in the timing—the gradualness of the African getting used to the change in the situation and the opportunity to learn slowly and thoroughly, the gradual increase in the number of civilised men among the African people, the inculcation in them of a sense of responsibility, or integrity, of willingness to accept and practise sustained effort.

While the process of education and of inculcation of the tenets of civilisation is taking place, it would be essential that government continues its present policy of opening to the African, doors to opportunity, to more advanced work, to the processes of reasoned conduct of affairs. The white man and woman must see that some of the work they have been doing must be shared by the African qualified to take it up. There is no easy solution to the question of what is to be done about the European worker so displaced. He is entitled to live in the country in which he may have been born or to which he may have immigrated—in either event it is his country and in the bounds of a competitive economy he must find a place. There will inevitably be hardship. The advance of the African in education, skills, more important work, must result in greater earning power for him. He must become a bigger consumer of a wider variety of goods. In other words his advance in the economy creates to some extent a larger market to be supplied, and the European, with his greater potential for adaptability can hope to find avenues of employment in helping to supply the needs of the expanding market.

These observations would be lacking if the words "colour bar" were not mentioned specifically. There is a colour bar in the generally accepted meaning of the term. The clap trap that is often expressed about a man being judged by factors other than the colour of his skin, does not express the whole story. There are hundreds of millions of people in Africa who are uncivilised in thought, ways, behaviour, personal habits, and they are black. The whites traditionally have stood away from them and they cannot feel impulse to do anything else whatever Government policy may dictate, but in the march of time there will be an increasing proportion of Africans who are civilised, whose civilisation becomes a growing thing not merely a veneer, and the process of opening doors of opportunity which I mentioned earlier on must result in acceptance of each other as people living alongside each other working for a common good and therefore for our own good. I suggest the colour bar as such should be left to solve itself in circumstances that a process will be taking place affecting the African resulting in his being educated, civilised and brought forward in economic life, in a gradually increasing stream.

I turn now briefly to the political system to the future of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. I suggest it is irrelevant to the matter before you how it came about that Nyasaland was brought into the conception of the Federation. It is a matter of fact that Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland are to be permanent and should be permanent without shutting our minds to the possibility of other neighbouring states seeking to join the Federation in time to come. Clamour of self-seeking African politicians should be assessed carefully as to what it really represents and I have no doubt the members of your Commission will put it in its proper perspective. The European and Indian inhabitants of Nyasaland are so few, and the number of civilised Africans are so few, that it would be folly even to dream that the lot of Nyasaland Africans could be improved in any way by taking that country away from the stabilising association of the Federal Government. In fact, I think it is the case, that the Federation is indissoluble by any normal process and that this fact should guide you in your considerations. I believe it is in the best interests of all the inhabitants of the three associated states that the state of Federation should endure and that it be made to work, as it can be made to work. The three territories, as a Federation can stand economically and politically and with effort and patience on the part of its Governments and peoples it can be a stabilising factor in Africa and a power for good in regard to all its inhabitants, its neighbours, the United Kingdom and the British Commonwealth of Nations.

Oral Evidence

C. S. SKIPPER

In amplification of his memorandum, the witness made the following additional points:—

- (a) The form of government in the Federation could and would be altered considerably in time. Nevertheless, a complete change in too short a period would upset the country to nobody's benefit.
- (b) There was no longer so much time to make this change as had been believed; the pace of development had been much greater than would have been thought possible even a few years ago, but there was perhaps a greater risk in going too slow than going too fast: either way there would be trouble.

- (c) In the process of advancement, great care must be taken not to swamp people with education and civilisation with the mass of people who were lacking in qualities.
- (d) It should be possible to work out a just and stable solution by continuing the policy which already existed in the Federation that people should live and work together. The colour bar should not be abolished by legislation; left alone it would solve itself.
- (e) His own organisation had been looking for Africans who could be recruited to do clerical work. On the whole, the results so far had been disappointing but in places where African clerks had been taken on little or no resentment had been displayed by European clerks. Sooner or later there would be hardship, in that European clerks would find employment difficult to obtain, but that could well be overcome with adjustment and good will.

Memorandum

FEDERAL LONG DISTANCE ROAD TRANSPORT OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION—H. Berry, Secretary.

The Unification of Road Transport Legislation

The responsibility for roads and the regulation of road traffic is constitutionally a concurrent matter as between the Federal and the three Territorial Governments. In practice the administration of road traffic laws is undertaken by the Territorial Governments in the same manner as took place prior to Federation and nothing yet attempted has resulted in unifying these laws, regulations or procedures so that a common standard is achieved.

One of the fundamental purposes of Federation was to bring together three contiguous areas which would economically be far more stable and sound than if left independent. Communications, being one of the vital factors in any economic planning for development, was quite clearly envisaged, in part at least, as being a federal matter because the economic problems and benefits of the Federal Area as a whole were essentially a matter for central direction. In pursuit of this policy the major trunk roads, Railways, and Airways were made a federal responsibility and it therefore seems illogical and, as this memorandum endeavours to point out, uneconomical not to put the legislative control of road transport under the same administering Government. From the point of view of policy direction it seems quite unrealistic to have matters dealing with commerce, industry, economic planning, rail and air transport under federal control, and road transport under territorial control. Because Territorial Governments have dealt with local road transport matters on a territorial basis, the outcome is the establishment of varying standards governing road usage which creates impediments to rational road transport operation on a national basis. The uneconomic conditions brought about by the varying laws can be classified as follows:—

- (a) Varying licensing procedures and practices.
- (b) Varying vehicle Construction and Use regulations.
- (c) Differing axle load limits.
- (d) Varying speed limits.
- (e) Differing approaches to the problem of private carriers.

Varying Licensing Procedures

The powers, constitution, method of procedure and appeal of the three Road Licensing Authorities in Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland vary widely and are, of course, independent. Each Territorial Authority controls road licensing in its constituent area, although many of the roads in question are inter-territorial Federal trunk roads. For example, the Northern Rhodesia Authority controls roads licensing north of the Chirundu Bridge and the Victoria Falls Bridge, whereas the Southern Rhodesia Authority is responsible south of these points on the two major trunk roads of the Federation. The same sort of split responsibility applies between Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland on the Salisbury/Blantyre road and also on the road between Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland via Fort Jameson. A further example of varying practices is that an identical vehicle can be given varying licensed carrying capacity in contiguous areas because of the varying bases of assessing the load factor. In Southern Rhodesia it is quite automatic to obtain a road service permit for an articulated trailer because the Authority in Southern Rhodesia regards the hauling unit as the effective transport unit and controls that. In Northern Rhodesia this principle is not accepted and the benefits of articulated transport, which has many economic advantages under certain conditions, are nullified because the hauling unit and the trailer are regarded and licensed as one and are not allowed to be separable. In Northern Rhodesia there is a properly constituted Appeals Tribunal, to which recourse can be had from the decisions of the Road Traffic Commissioner, whereas in Southern Rhodesia there is none. In Nyasaland one can only appeal to the Governor. An operator wishing to ply for hire and reward on an inter-territorial route has to make application to at least two Authorities for permission to do so, who may act quite independently. This resembles a student having to pass an examination twice before being successful.

The conclusion is self evident that the result of having independent territorial Road Service Authorities adds nothing to efficient government and leads to unco-ordinated localised policy making.

Varying Construction and Use Regulations

These have been summarised in an appendix to this memorandum and scrutiny of them will indicate how minor yet aggravating they are. The regulations are minutely enforced with the result, for example, that if a passenger bus built for Northern Rhodesia conditions is operated in Southern Rhodesia, then the whole of the seating layout has to be modified to conform with a varying set of seat widths, heights and gangway area regulations, etc.

Differing Axle Load Limits

The permitted axle load limits in the three Territories are:—

Southern Rhodesia	14,000 lb.
Northern Rhodesia	17,600 lb.
Nyasaland	15,680 lb.

This means that on all inter-territorial transits the lowest common factor applies and can best be illustrated by showing its effect on a standard type of freight vehicle:—

Type of Vehicle	Permitted Tonnage of Freight
	Northern Rhodesia	Southern Rhodesia
Leyland Octopus and Trailer	24.0 short tons	19.5 short tons
Leyland Octopus solo	14.0 short tons	11.0 short tons

The uneconomic outcome of such restrictions needs no further emphasis except to say that in all territories contiguous to the Federation the international standard of 18,000 lb. is adopted and the lack of uniformity within the Federal Area is bound to aggravate the comparative disadvantages arising from our land locked position. A further indirect disadvantage is the unwillingness of heavy vehicle manufacturers to develop standard models for federal conditions at the most economic price, which, in the long run, adds to road transport costs. If road transport control were federalised, then road economics could be planned in conjunction with road transport economics, which is a logical concept in a rapidly developing, road starved country such as the Federation.

Speed Limits

It will be noticed in the attached appendix that the speed limits in the three Territories vary, but it would seem to be a more rational approach if the Federal trunk roads had common speed limits, so that timetabling, particularly on the passenger side, can be standardised. It is fully appreciated that speed limits are a necessary control factor for public safety and it is also essential for the preservation of roads, particularly when these are related to axle load limits as well. It is, however, suggested that unification of axle load limits could be dovetailed with that of speed limits so that common standards prevail which correspond with internationally recognised standards.

Private Carriers

If each form of transport, at the national level, is to play its part in the economic growth of the Federation, then it is essential that some form of unified control is instituted to regulate private carriers. In particular this control should embrace the same factors applied to public service vehicles, so far as the vehicle's roadworthiness and drivers' conditions of service and hours of work are concerned, because these are very necessary requirements purely from the point of view of public safety. There also seems to be no justifiable reason why vehicle taxation should be, as it is at the moment, lower in respect of privately owned vehicles when compared with public service vehicles. In Southern Rhodesia no legislation exists to control private carriers—it does in the other two Territories, but the purposes and applications vary. There is, in fact, no adequate control anywhere and it is quite clear, as is fully set out in the recent Harragin Report on Railway Rates, that if the railway rating structure is to be used as an instrument to economic planning, and such policy has already received the approval of the Federal Government and representatives of commerce and industry, then the Federal Ministry of Transport must be able to control private carriers in a manner conducive to the economic well being of the transport system of the Federation as a whole. At the moment it is powerless.

The federalisation of road transport does not, or should not, mean the centralisation of authority and administration. It does mean centralised planning and decentralised application on a pattern which is designed for the well being of the Federation as a whole. It will also lead, in the view of this Association, to the weakening of parochial territorial interests, which is one of the biggest impediments to federal thinking by all classes of the community in all spheres. It should also have the advantage of being more economic in the cost of administration.

The Association offers to give oral evidence on this memorandum if the Commission so wishes and it would further point out that it is the representative body of all major long distance road transport operators in the Federation, other than the Road Motor Services of the Rhodesia Railways.

Oral Evidence

FEDERAL LONG DISTANCE ROAD TRANSPORT OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION Represented by: Mr. H. Berry, Mr. Munro

The witnesses said that if their concept were written into the Constitution then everybody would benefit. Their association still found that they had to deal with different Governments with different ideas on matters affecting road transport. The witnesses were asked if they would be satisfied if efficient co-operation could be developed between the Territories. They replied that experience had shown that co-operation had not come about, and that therefore a federal solution would be preferable. Moreover, road transport was becoming more and more involved in the economic development of the Federation. Asked whether they would be prepared to make any distinction between the regulation of road traffic and responsibility for roads, the witnesses stated that they would have no objection if road development were uniform and in accordance with common standards. A co-ordinated road plan would need to be developed. Asked whether they would favour a statutory board to develop roads, the witnesses stated that they thought that this would be unlikely to be possible politically.

Memorandum

RHODESIA ROAD FEDERATION

To urge that the Federal Government should transfer responsibility for roads to the Territorial Governments.

The Rhodesia Road Federation is an affiliate of the International Road Federation which is a world wide non-governmental and non-profit making organisation. It enjoys consultative status, category "B" with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations Organisation. It is supported by international industry and its aim is to promote the development of roads and road transport throughout the world in the belief that such development is a prerequisite to economic growth and consequent improvement of standards of living. Thus by increasing the yield of taxes without increasing the rates of Taxation good roads can be self-financing.

For reasons of administrative convenience the International Road Federation is organised in three regions with offices in London, Paris and Washington. It operates mainly through national Road Federations which now exist in more than 60 countries throughout the world. The London office of the International Road Federation is largely responsible for the activities in Africa of its affiliate organisations in East Africa, Egypt, Ghana, Morocco, Nigeria, the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, Sierra Leone, South Africa and the Sudan.

The Rhodesia Road Federation like the other Federations is composed of businessmen, industrialists, farmers and other civic leaders who believe that good roads are essential to national progress. It advocates the administration, planning and execution of programmes for road development, and at the same time endeavours to inform the populace of the benefits to be derived from better roads. In accordance with this policy the Rhodesia Road Federation is now making specific recommendations in respect of improved administration of roads in the Central African Federation.

Item 19 of Part I of the Second Schedule to the Constitution Order in Council of 1953 (the exclusive list) provides that the construction, alteration and maintenance of all roads listed as interterritorial in the final act of the Johannesburg Transport Conference of 1950 and any other roads prescribed as interterritorial shall be a federal matter. Item 54 of Part II (the concurrent list) provides that all roads other than those covered by item 19 shall be a concurrent matter. The aim of this memorandum is to urge that the responsibility for interterritorial roads should be removed from the exclusive list and that in item 54 of the concurrent list the reference to item 19 should be deleted.

The Rhodesian Road Federation has long advocated the establishment of a road fund. In furtherance of this policy the Road Federation submitted to the Southern Rhodesian Select Committee on Road Financing Programme in 1958 that the entire responsibility for roads should be transferred to the Territorial Governments in the following terms:—

"Federal roads are maintained and constructed by the Territorial Roads Department on behalf of the Federal Government which makes an annual grant for the purpose. The Rhodesia Road Federation suggests that they should be returned to the Territory with an endowment sufficient for their maintenance and betterment."

The Southern Rhodesian Select Committee in its Second Report recommends as follows:—

"In its First Report, presented to the House on the 3rd April, 1959, your Committee recommended that the responsibility for the planning, priority, construction and maintenance of all roads in Southern Rhodesia should be vested in the Government of Southern Rhodesia alone and that there should be a consequential revision of those provisions relating to the apportionment of finances. In implementing these recommendations, it would be necessary to compensate the Territorial Government for the Federal commitment it will assume if and when it takes over responsibility for Federal roads."

The demerits of the present system of dual control are succinctly described in the first and second reports of the Select Committee (L.A.S.C. 9-1958 and 6-1959) presented to the Legislature on the 3rd April 1959 and 16th February 1960 and attached hereto. The arguments contained in those reports supporting the transfer of the entire responsibility for roads apply no doubt equally to all three Territories and are the basis of the Rhodesia Road Federation's submission.

The Rhodesia Road Federation nevertheless desires to amplify the recommendations of the Select Committee in the following manner:—

- (i) The joint committee representative of all Territorial Governments envisaged in Report I, paragraph 7 should be specially charged with co-ordinating standards of design.
- (ii) The transfer of taxing powers referred to in Report II, paragraph 4, should be effected by the machinery for the amendment of the constitution provided by article 97, rather than by that of article 32 which permits of scheduled powers and if necessary the revocation of powers so delegated.
- (iii) The subvention (or endowment) accompanying the transfer of responsibility for roads should be allocated to the Territories by Statutory formula, a practice adopted in the Commonwealth of Australia.

Annexure I

First Report of the Select Committee on Road Financing Programme. Presented to the House on the 3rd April, 1959.

1. Your Committee was appointed on the 2nd July, 1958, to consider and report upon methods of financing and administering a long term road programme for Southern Rhodesia.
2. Since that date your Committee has heard the evidence of a large number of witnesses and has been furnished with a considerable amount of information, both oral and written, covering a very wide range of subjects.
3. Your Committee first gave consideration to the limits within which the scope of its enquiry should be confined. In order to form an opinion and to make recommendations for securing and safeguarding financial requirements for roads for any given period, it was deemed necessary to determine at the outset what a programme for such a period would entail in the matter of construction and maintenance of both new and existing roads.
4. Having determined the requirements of such a programme, your Committee felt that it would then be able to direct its attention to finding new and enduring ways and means for financing that programme.
5. Your Committee soon realized that if it was fully to achieve its task, the scope of its enquiry should cover the entire rural network of roads in Southern Rhodesia. At this stage of its investigation it became apparent to your Committee that the compilation of an overall programme would be impeded by three major obstacles directly traceable to the unsatisfactory division of responsibility for this road network between two Governments, namely, the Federal Government and the Southern Rhodesia Government. These obstacles are referred to more fully later in this report, but your Committee is firmly of the opinion that the division of responsibility mentioned has created and will inevitably continue to create—

- (a) totally unrelated priorities;
- (b) disturbing financial fluctuations; and
- (c) divergences of approach to what ought to be an overall programme for the whole Colony.

(a) Priorities

The evidence submitted to your Committee left it in no doubt that in many instances the Federal and Territorial roads are developing with largely unrelated priorities. To illustrate what is happening it may be as well to mention one instance where, due to unexpected changes of priorities over which the Southern Rhodesia Government had no control, four low level bridges have been left on a main and important road which forms a link with a neighbouring territory and which, save for a few miles, has been fully completed with two-lane tarmac. There were other instances given to your Committee in evidence which clearly indicated a parallel and unrelated development of roads in the Colony. It is your Committee's view that planning, both present and future, should embrace all roads within the Colony on a common basis.

(b) Financial Fluctuations

In order to ensure the practicability of any plan and to secure maximum long term efficiency from the various elements of road construction capacity such as plant, personnel and contractors, it is vitally necessary to avoid sharp fluctuations in annual road Votes. All the component parts of a road construction organization must obviously be kept constantly in use. The following comparative figures for road Loan works undertaken by both Governments illustrate the fluctuations which are in fact occurring—

	Federal	Southern Rhodesia
1955/56	£1,530,000	£750,000
1956/57	£2,531,000	£1,110,000
1957/58	£2,020,000	£1,350,000
1958/59	£976,000	£1,295,000

The following figures, taken from the current four-year plans, disclose an even more disturbing fluctuation in the immediate future—

	Federal	Southern Rhodesia
1960/61	£221,500	£1,450,000

The above figures need no elaboration. The ten-fold reduction in Federal Loan Votes over a period of five years leaves the Southern Rhodesia Government with the problem of absorbing the entire potential which it has established for work on its own and Federal roads. The magnitude of the problem becomes more important when it is pointed out that the Federal Government is responsible for 1,375 miles of road in the Colony and that these roads comprise a substantial portion of its main arterial roads. This mileage actually represents just under 4½ per centum of the total of 32,200 miles of rural public roads in Southern Rhodesia, but it is cared for and virtually administered by the Southern Rhodesia Government. Your Committee considers that the fact that responsibility for the road system is shared with the Federal authorities restricts the Southern Rhodesia Government in its endeavours to plan practical financial and construction programmes for the entire Colony, particularly when viewed in the light of the importance of these Federal roads.

(c) Divergences of Approach

The standard of Federal roads and the standard of Territorial roads passing through major urban areas should, in the opinion of your Committee, be the same. There should be no variance as between such standards. Nevertheless, evidence given to your Committee has satisfied it that the Federal Government reserves the right to dictate the standard of Federal roads passing through major urban areas, a standard which differs from the one considered necessary and desirable by the Southern Rhodesia Government. Your Committee was greatly disturbed by this evidence which must unavoidably detract from the advantages of laws recently passed by this Parliament and designed as a safeguard against premature functional obsolescence.

6. Your Committee is of the opinion that the road network of the Colony concerns the Southern Rhodesia Government and local authorities to a far greater extent than the Federal Government. Having no direct responsibility for the Railways or other modes of transport, the Territorial Government is in a better position to approach road planning on broad principles of development relating inter alia to town planning, local government and internal development. Your Committee is therefore convinced that the Southern Rhodesia Government should be the sole authority for such planning and, indeed, for all rural road matters in Southern Rhodesia.

7. In many of the other federated states in the world, considered opinion is that there is no need for dual responsibility for road matters as between the central and state governments. It is, therefore, significant to record that witnesses, including an organization representative of widely diversified interests, voluntarily expressed the view that those roads under Federal jurisdiction should be returned to the direct control of the Southern Rhodesia Government with a consequential revision of those provisions relating to the apportionment of finances. Your Committee is, nevertheless, alive to the desirability of liaison with the other Territorial Governments on matters of mutual interest. Evidence led indicated that, in view of present harmonious relations, this liaison could be satisfactorily achieved by the setting up of a joint Committee, representative of all Territorial Governments.

8. Your Committee has no doubt that the re-allocation of responsibility in the manner recommended will operate to the advantage not only of Southern Rhodesia but of the Federation as a whole. Irritations and embarrassments caused by confusion resulting from the lack of common approach in matters of road alignments, complaints, compensation and a host of other matters will be obviated. Possible sources of conflict through divided responsibility and conflicting decisions will disappear as will delays and unnecessary work caused thereby to the Southern Rhodesia Government. Finally, through reduction and simplification of work there will be savings in establishment costs.

9. Your Committee has still to take further evidence and, though not able finally to report this session, is confident of being able to do so during the next session of Parliament. However, your Committee is satisfied that it should, at this stage, recommend that the Government be asked to give consideration to making early arrangements, albeit only administrative at the outset, which would ensure that the responsibility for the planning, priority, construction and maintenance of all roads in Southern Rhodesia should not be divided between the Governments but should be vested in the Government of Southern Rhodesia alone; and that the Government be urged to make representations to the Federal Government for a consequential revision of those provisions relating to the apportionment of finances.

10. Your Committee further recommends that it be re-appointed at the next session of Parliament.

Second Report of the Select Committee on Road Financing Programme. Presented to the House on the 16th February, 1960.

Wednesday, 2nd July, 1958.

Ordered—That a Select Committee be appointed to consider and report upon methods of financing and administering a long-term road programme for Southern Rhodesia; the Committee to have power to take evidence and call for papers and to consist of the following members, viz., the Minister of the Treasury and Mines, the Minister of Roads, Mr. Clark, Mr. Currie, Mr. Ewing, Mr. Harper and Mr. Starling.

Thursday, 2nd July, 1959.

Ordered—That the proceedings of the Select Committee on Road Financing Programme be resumed at the stage at which they were suspended last session; and that the Select Committee, consisting of the Minister of Roads, the Minister of the Treasury and Mines, Mr. Clark, Mr. Currie, Mr. Ewing, Mr. Harper and Mr. Starling, be re-appointed to resume its inquiry.

PART A.

I. Constitutional Problems

1. In its First Report, presented to the House on the 3rd April, 1959, your Committee recommended that the responsibility for the planning, priority, construction and maintenance of all roads in Southern Rhodesia should be vested in the Government of Southern Rhodesia alone and that there should be a consequential revision of those provisions relating to the apportionment of finances. In implementing these recommendations, it would be necessary for a subvention to be paid by the Federal Government to compensate the Territorial Government for the Federal commitment it will assume if and when it takes over responsibility for Federal roads.

2. Your Committee wishes, at the outset, to stress that the recommendations it makes in this, its Second Report, would be quite impracticable if the conditions envisaged in paragraph 1 are not to be implemented. Financing cannot be divorced from planning, and the Colony must be placed in a position to plan its road system as a whole and in a manner that will facilitate development.

3. Not only is it essential to transfer the entire responsibility for roads to the Southern Rhodesia Government, but the authority to tax should follow that responsibility. It appears to your Committee that the revenues to be derived from fuel taxation were treated by the Fiscal Commission not on their merits or on logical premises but merely as a balancing factor after all other revenues had been allocated. Thus petrol may be taxed only by the Territorial Government and diesel fuel only by the Federal Government. Grave anomalies will arise in the administration of long term financing if this state of affairs is allowed to continue.

4. Your Committee therefore recommends that when the next fiscal review takes place, the taxing powers of Southern Rhodesia be extended to include all vehicular fuels, oils and spirits sold in the Colony.

II. Long Term Financing

5. The existing practice is to compile a financial four year development plan, of which the first two years are sharply in focus. The whole plan is reviewed every second year. In many important respects, a four year financial programme is not considered long enough for road purposes. Your Committee is therefore of the opinion that financial plans for road development should extend over 10 years in broad outline, such plans to encompass the four year programme as presently prepared.

6. The Division of Roads has to execute lengthy and complex operations such as siting, expropriation, design and planning and has to consider the most economical manner of execution, using both contractors and departmental organizations. All this, if carried out against the background of a ten year programme of guaranteed finance, can result in economies in that the Division will be better able to equip itself so as to derive the fullest benefit from mechanization and capital investment in plant, and to reduce expenditure otherwise necessitated by frequent movement of plant and personnel. The restriction of construction programmes to annual Votes can lead to the letting of small contracts and a sense of insecurity on the part of the contractors. All this makes for higher costs.

7. Your Committee realizes, however, that while it is necessary for road programmes to be long term, they must also be sufficiently flexible for resources to be switched at short notice to satisfy the needs of urgently required and unforeseen development.

8. Most of the witnesses in favour of some form of long term financing seemed to assume that assured revenue was synonymous with increased finance. Your Committee can find no grounds for supporting this assumption. Some of these witnesses went so far as to suggest that if generally accepted sources of road revenue were to be paid into an inviolate fund, this in itself would be sufficient for all road requirements of the Colony. Your Committee, on the other hand, considers this could lead to a decrease in the aggregate amounts which could otherwise be expected to be made available for road purposes.

9. Many witnesses were also under the impression that the channelling of specific sources of revenue into an inviolate fund would lead to an automatic increase in borrowing powers for road development. While this might prove to be true, it was not generally recognized that such additional borrowing powers would be at the expense of other essential development, and might also be precluded under existing loan financing arrangements in the Federation.

III. Methods of Approach

10. With the growing demand for road development and the recognition of road services as an essential feature of all economic and even social progress, and the need to meet the requirements of increased road use as illustrated below, equitable demands have arisen for an assured source of funds to be used solely on roads. The following table is illuminating—

	1950 (actual)	1958 (actual)	1965 (predicted)
No. of passenger cars ...	30,000	71,900	97,300
No. of commercial vehicles	17,000	35,800	43,500

11. It is anticipated that between 1959/60 and 1964/65, no less than £14,000,000 of loan expenditure and £18,000,000 of revenue expenditure will be required to carry out the first phase of a ten year programme to meet the minimum essential expansion on those roads which are the present responsibility of the Southern Rhodesia Government. Your Committee has not obtained comparative figures for Federal roads in the Colony over the same period but if these roads are transferred to the Southern Rhodesia Government, a very considerable increase in the funds required can be expected.

12. In its endeavour to solve the real problem of obtaining secured finance of this magnitude without disrupting the financing of other Government development projects, your Committee examined various possible methods, namely, financing through annual Votes, contractor finance, toll roads and a road fund.

(a) Financing Through Annual Votes

13. This is the existing method of providing funds, within the framework of the four year plan, for the construction and maintenance of those roads which are the responsibility of the Government and of Government sponsored road councils. Funds are obtained with Parliamentary sanction on submission of annual estimates of expenditure; this system taps no new sources of money, nor does it meet the requirements for secured long term finance.

(b) Contractor Finance

14. This is a method by which payment for the work done by a contractor is postponed. It could meet the problem of accelerating the completion of urgent outstanding work and, as contracts can be large and the contractors can equip themselves on as large a scale as they please, it makes for economic work. It is recognized, however, that the ultimate cost to the Government is also influenced by raising fees and the interest rates paid by the contractor or payable by the Government on outstanding amounts.

15. The principal obstacle to contractor finance at present is that the flow of funds for this purpose is related directly to the money markets of the world, but in any case, as contractor finance is a form of borrowing, it can be indulged in only to the extent that anticipated future finance will allow of repayment.

16. Southern Rhodesia has successfully utilized this form of financing for construction works, and it was with this in mind that a number of witnesses urged the adoption of contractor finance to meet the whole of the Colony's future road requirements. Indeed, in evidence, the argument was expanded to include maintenance works in this type of financing.

17. Your Committee, however, while not ruling out the possibility of utilizing contractor finance to some extent, is satisfied that because of its limiting factors, not the least of which is the Loans Council, this method will never provide more than a partial solution to the problem of long term financing for the large outstanding volume of road work in the Colony.

(c) Toll Roads

18. One method of financing suggested by some witnesses was an extension of the toll road system which at present operates on one road in the Colony. The principle of toll road financing is well enough known not to require further explanation. Though it may have specific application, it was rejected by your Committee as being unsuited for general use. Toll roads necessitate the availability of alternative routes, and whereas this may be feasible and economic in densely populated or heavily trafficked countries or areas, the provision of new roads or the retention of existing old roads in Southern Rhodesia to provide such alternatives will be uneconomic in the extreme at this stage of the Colony's development.

(d) Road Fund

19. A common method of long term financing in many other countries is a road fund. Briefly, this involves the appropriation of certain types of revenue, notably that derived from vehicle licences and taxes on fuel, tyres and vehicles, and other revenues normally directly associated with road users, to an inviolate fund, the expenditure from which is devoted solely to road purposes. The fund is controlled by an authority, the composition of which varies from country to country.

20. Witnesses in evidence put forward many arguments both in favour of and against the road fund method of financing. One widespread and, on the face of it, attractive belief was that moneys derived from the road user should be employed for the benefit of the road user, particularly as he pays his fair share towards other forms of governmental activity. This theory pre-supposes, however, that there is a special class of persons who have exclusive rights to road usage, and minimizes or ignores the extent to which road transport affects the economy of the whole country and its inhabitants. To segregate road users as a class for special treatment, therefore, appears unrealistic to your Committee.

21. More potent appears to be the argument that the authority can estimate with reasonable accuracy the revenues which the fund can anticipate over a period of years. The inviolability of these revenues would enable the authority to embark on long term planning and long term contracts for at least a portion of the Colony's road system, depending on the resources of the fund.

22. There is merit in the opposing argument that revenues appropriated to a fund reduce the already restricted field of taxation open to the Treasury, and further limit its powers to transfer funds from one service to another. Further, your Committee agrees with the contention that there is no greater justification for a road fund, per se, than for any other kind of fund.

23. However, your Committee, having evaluated the relative merits and demerits of the road fund method, considers that there is a balance of advantage in setting up a road fund, in order to deal adequately with certain of the essential road development in the Colony on a long term basis.

24. Your Committee considers that all the four available forms of financing which it has studied, namely, annual Votes, contractor finance, toll roads and a road fund, may have to be employed in varying degrees. However, bearing in mind that, for main road construction and maintenance, at any rate, a ten year programme is essential, and also that it is not vitally necessary, in the first instance, for the entire road expenditure to be derived from an inviolate fund, your Committee regards as desirable the setting up of a road fund, albeit comparatively small at first, to cater for the most important long term projects. It is anticipated that, as revenues increase from expanded development throughout the Colony, more and more moneys would accrue to the fund.

25. Your Committee accordingly recommends that a road fund be established to which is allocated all subventions which may be received from the Federal Government in respect of Federal roads if and when taken over by the Southern Rhodesia Government, together with allocation of certain revenue by the Southern Rhodesia Government as detailed in the following paragraphs.

IV. Administration of the Fund

26. The fund would be used to finance such roads as are declared by the Minister to be priorities. It is clear from the evidence given that, within the limitations imposed by the present system of yearly Votes, the Division of Roads and Road Traffic is making the best possible use of available moneys; and, further, that it is, to the maximum possible extent, making use of materials manufactured within the Colony. There is no evidence to suggest, however, nor does your Committee contend, that even this standard could be improved upon merely by setting up a statutory body to administer the road fund. In any case, if the fund were controlled by a statutory body, the critical function of Parliament would be restricted, a limitation which your Committee regards as undesirable.

27. Your Committee consequently recommends that the road fund be administered by the Minister responsible for roads.

V. Financing of the Fund

(a) Federal Subvention

28. Your Committee envisages that, in the event of a take-over by the Southern Rhodesia Government of roads which are at present a Federal responsibility, an annual subvention in settlement of this commitment, on both Revenue and Loan accounts, will become payable by the Federal Government. Both the subvention and its subsequent replacement would be paid into the road fund.

(b) Fuel Taxation

29. It is reasonable to assume that on a subsequent review of fiscal arrangements between the Federal Government and Territorial Governments a remedy will be found for the anomalous position at present whereby the fuel for certain road vehicles is taxed by the Southern Rhodesia Government and that for other road vehicles by the Federal Government. In your Committee's view, however, there is no reason why the establishment of the road fund envisaged should be delayed until this rearrangement takes place; and in the meantime, a portion of the revenue from motor spirit duty might be made over to the road fund in exchange for the taking over by that fund of firm responsibility in respect of a defined part of the road programme.

VI. Expenditure from the Fund

30. Expenditure from assured revenue would, in the first instance, be confined to priority scheduled roads. Your Committee believes that, with further road improvement and the general increase in road use, yearly road user revenues payable to the fund will gradually reduce the demands on the Roads Revenue Vote, thereby releasing further moneys appropriated by Parliament for further construction work by the fund. In this way, the sphere of operations of the fund could gradually extend into other classes of road.

PART B

VII. Other Matters

(a) Road Council Taxation

31. A number of anomalies arising out of the implementation of the Third Schedule of the Roads and Road Traffic Act, 1953, as amended, were noted during the course of evidence. Outstanding amongst these anomalies and one which your Committee felt should be examined was the extent to which in practice the operation of the Third Schedule restricted road councils in the amounts of revenue which they could derive from taxation.

32. These limitations of revenue stem from two different causes. In the first place, the ceiling of 30 units limits the amount of revenue recoverable from certain ratepayers in a number of categories. In the second place, evidence disclosed that some councils were constrained to keep the unit tax at a low level because of the inability of certain ranchers in their areas to pay increased rates. This was a factor which considerably hampered these councils, because it was apparent that many of the other landowners in the same council area were able and willing to pay increased rates in order to improve the roads in such areas.

(b) Roads in African Areas

33. One aspect of the evidence relating to the problems of financing the construction and maintenance of roads in rural areas concerned those roads which are at present the responsibility of the Native Development Fund. Increased production arising out of the implementation of the Native Land Husbandry Act, 1951, coupled with the greater road usage stimulated by rising African standards of living, has brought about problems which could not be envisaged at the time when the present system of financing these rural roads was instituted.

(c) Re-appointment of Committee

34. Your Committee has been unable to make as full a study of these two questions, namely, road council taxation and roads in African areas, as they would merit. Your Committee, therefore, desires to give further consideration to these matters and recommends that it be re-appointed at the next session of Parliament.

Oral Evidence

THE RHODESIA ROAD FEDERATION—Represented by R. Sullivan and C. J. Boden.

The witnesses had presented a memorandum.

The Chairman explained that the Party broadly agreed with the views expressed in the memorandum, and would therefore not consider it necessary to examine the representatives at length. There were however a few questions, to which answers were given as follows:—

1. In Southern Rhodesia there were 1,375 miles of Federal roads.
2. The Federal roads were run by the Territorial Governments on an agency basis, and this was the fundamentally unsatisfactory feature. The Rhodesia Road Federation definitely wanted to get roads back into the hands of the Territories.
3. The Rhodesia Road Federation fully understood the difficulties to which the Road Fund had given rise in the United Kingdom. They knew, for example, that with such an arrangement they would be up against the Treasury. It was pointed out to them that their recommendations ran counter to the arrangements in most federations, and for that matter in the United Kingdom. They replied that Australia had such a system as they recommended with a special formula for the financing of such roads.
4. They had considered whether it would be practicable to have one overall Road Department, and thought that it would not. It would be necessary to rely on the three Road Departments of the three Territories.

Memorandum

E. S. NEWSON

I. Preamble

1. This memorandum is submitted in the belief that undue emphasis is being given to the claims of a few educated Africans for political self determination without at least equal recognition being had of the necessity for a balanced and accelerated economic development. While in no way subscribing to the view held by some Europeans that a material increase in African wages will obviate the necessity for political advancement, it is believed that a proper balance must be maintained between economic development and political considerations as these are largely interdependent.

2. This memorandum will nevertheless be primarily concerned with the economic aspects of Federation.

II. Basic Concept

3. At the outset it may be desirable to state the convictions held by the writer which may be stated as:—

First, the belief that private enterprise is the most efficacious means of securing the economic advancement of the peoples of the Federation, but that this requires the sympathetic assistance of Government to attain optimum growth and efficiency.

Second, the belief in the concept of size and growth. This is an age where in most instances the small unit operates at a great disadvantage as compared with the large and for that reason, if no other, it is not economically feasible for Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia or Nyasaland to exist satisfactorily as independent states.

Third, the belief that each of the three territories is not only mutually interdependent, but also has to rely on international trade and its ability to negotiate with foreign powers.

Fourth, the belief that the Federation, not necessarily in its existing form, is the only possible prospect for the mutual co-existence and advancement of the races in the three territories concerned.

II. Nature of Business

4. The economic classifications of business will serve to illustrate diversity and ubiquity:—

- (a) Extractive Industries such as mining and agriculture.
- (b) Industrial activities such as the manufacture of flour, furniture and steel.
- (c) Constructive Industries such as structural steel fabricators and building contractors.
- (d) Commerce such as wholesale and retail establishments.
- (e) Services such as banking, investment trusts and road transport.
- (f) Public Utilities such as railways, power undertakings and hospitals.

5. As the attached statement of personal particulars of the writer will indicate, he has had actual experience in every one of the categories of business listed above. Furthermore, The British South Africa Company by which he is employed has at one time or another been engaged in activities within every class mentioned plus the additional one of the administration of Government.

6. The purpose of this recital is to illustrate that the writer may claim some experience and authority on the subject.

IV. Achievements of the British South Africa Company

7. It is perhaps pertinent to record the achievements of The British South Africa Company since it first organised the occupation and settlement of the two Rhodesias which in 1889 were occupied by primitive and barbaric African people of various tribes who in the main were not indigenous to the country, but were relatively recent settlers themselves seeking refuge from the attacks of the more powerful Bantu races to the South and the North.

8. History has recorded the very valuable contribution Cecil Rhodes made to the British Empire when he formed The British South Africa Company and thus extended the sphere of British influence over the vast areas which the German Imperialists had hoped to acquire and so link their Colonies in the East and West of Africa.

9. So far as the Company's achievements are concerned these may be considered in two separate periods, viz., 1889-1923/4, the period of Administration during which period of 33 years the Company paid no dividend, and 1924 to date, the period of purely business activity during which the Company has paid dividends continuously.

10. Such achievements have been very briefly but adequately summarised by Lord Robins, the Company's President, in an article published in the book Rhodesia and East Africa (published by East Africa Ltd.).

"The achievements of the company during the period of its administration can be stated briefly as:—

1. The creation of a stable and respected Government in the two Rhodesias. The first Governor of Southern Rhodesia under responsible government paid a tribute to the Chartered Company's administration which is worthy of being quoted here. He said: 'I venture to say that no territory annexed to the British Empire in the last hundred years has come with more perfect title deeds or a more honourable record than Rhodesia'.
2. The building and equipping of some two thousand miles of railways, connecting the territories with the Union to the South, the Indian Ocean to the East (at Beira), and the Belgian Congo to the North. This involved the provision of some sixteen million pounds of capital, all of which was found by the company or on its credit.
3. The sponsoring of prospecting and mining in Southern Rhodesia, enabling a prosperous industry to be built up both in precious and base metals.
4. The encouragement of agricultural development, and particularly the pursuit of experimental work in the fields of tobacco, citrus, and ranching, which provided the settlers with information of inestimable value and gave them a much-needed practical lead.
5. The recognition from its earliest days of its responsibility for the welfare of the native African peoples. The administration which the company set up and which it handed over to its successors has been described as 'a model not only in Africa but for any part of the world where you have the very difficult problems of the white settlers living side by side with the Natives'.

"It should again be emphasized that this success was due not only to the policy which Rhodes himself had laid down but to the picked men to whom he had entrusted the task of carrying it out. They never thought of the hateful term 'race relations' but only of human relations and fair dealing and treatment as between human beings, with the advancement of the more backward of the partners always in their minds.

"The achievements of the company in the thirty-three years that have elapsed since it handed over its administrative functions may be summarized briefly as follows:—

1. First and foremost, the development of the Northern Rhodesian Copperbelt (plus the zinc/lead/vanadium property at Broken Hill) with the co-operation of the Anglo American Corporation and the Rhodesian Selection Trust, and more recently the prospecting field of the New Consolidated Gold Fields and the Rio Tinto group; while the search for precious stones has been and is being pursued by another of Rhode's companies, De Beers Consolidated Mines. This development, which has resulted in the production since 1924 of minerals valued at some nine hundred million pounds has been the most important in Africa since the discovery of Witwatersrand, and its existence has served as the basis on which the Federation's economy has chiefly rested.

2. The sale of the mineral rights in Southern Rhodesia gave the Government and people of that Colony the control of great natural resources in the shape of gold, chrome, asbestos, coal, nickel and tin, which, with other minerals in lesser quantities, have proved extremely important to its economy.

3. The transfer to national control and management of a fully-developed and well-operated railway system, which under the company's control had been conducted without material profit to the owners, and gave to the Rhodesias and the Bechuanaland Protectorate an asset from which they have derived great benefit.

4. The provision of four million pounds of loan capital for the Kariba hydro-electric project. In addition, substantial loans to or investment in the Rhodesian Iron and Steel Company, the Rhodesian milling industry, Rhodesian Alloys, the Central African Archives, and other public concerns. Further, the company has made handsome donations to the University College of Rhodesia and Nyasaland (particularly towards the provision of the library), the Rhodes National Art Gallery, and the newly-established preparatory and secondary schools of Southern Rhodesia; and it has promised substantial financial support for the settlement of the ex-Service personnel in the Federation.

"All of this, in addition to the very large investment which the company has made in the copper mining industry as a shareholder, adds up to a prodigious total, and exemplifies the faith which the Chartered Company has in the future of the countries which bear its founder's name."

V. The Requirements of Business

11. Having given some consideration to the business achievements of the past it is now necessary to regard the attitude of business men towards the future, particularly in relation to the political aspirations of the Africans.

12. The requirements businessmen will seek before establishing new ventures or expanding old ones may be listed as under:—

- (a) An adequate and expanding market.
- (b) Adequate financial facilities.
- (c) Suitable locality.
- (d) Proximity to and adequate supply of raw materials.
- (e) Availability and reliability of labour.
- (f) Adequacy and cost of Power and Fuel.
- (g) Adequacy and cost of Transportation.
- (h) Stable Government.

13. The advent of Federation has had a markedly beneficial impact on all the foregoing considerations as the following detailed discussion under the individual headings is designed to demonstrate.

VI. Market

14. Two entirely different markets exist for businesses operating within the Federation, these are (a) the purely domestic market and (b) the export market. The latter which mainly comprises the export of raw materials such as asbestos, chrome, copper, gold, lead, tin, tobacco, zinc or refined products of such materials has not been influenced by the expansion of the domestic market that was achieved by Federation, but it has benefited very materially from the improved financial facilities available, the vastly improved transport system and the establishment of an abundant supply of power, the cost of which will in time reduce not increase as could have been expected had thermal power been required.

15. In the case of the domestic market the position can best be assessed by an examination of the undernoted figures:

Population Estimates of the Federation*

30th June		Southern Rhodesia	Northern Rhodesia	Nyasaland	Total
		(a) Europeans
1953	..	157,000	49,000	5,000	211,000
1959	..	215,000	73,000	8,800	297,000
		(b) Africans
1953	..	2,210,000	1,960,000	2,420,000	6,590,000
1959	..	2,630,000	2,280,000	2,750,000	7,660,000
		(c) Other Races
1953	..	11,400	5,000	7,500	24,000
1959	..	15,400	9,600	12,100	37,000
		(d) Total All Races (to nearest 10,000)
1953	..	2,380,000	2,010,000	2,430,000	6,820,000
1959	..	2,860,000	2,360,000	2,770,000	7,990,000

16. It will at once be apparent that a collective market of 6.8 million people at the time of Federation (now some 8 millions) was a far sounder economic basis for future development than those of the individual territories varying from 2.1 to 2.4 millions, particularly when the pre-Federation difficulties arising from differing customs tariffs and the effects of the Congo-Basin Treaty are considered.

17. Furthermore, for the development of the very necessary expansion of secondary industry a considerable measure of provision has been necessary and will be for some time. The provision for this and its negotiation with neighbouring countries and more distant suppliers was and is a feasible and effective possibility for the Federal Government, but was an immeasurably more difficult and less satisfactory problem for the individual territories.

18. It is of course common knowledge that prior attempts at closer association between the territories which had culminated in the operation of the Central African Council had encountered many difficulties and had by and large proved a failure.

19. With regard to the future prospects of the Federation's markets the potential is so great that it is quite impossible to quantify. From the agricultural point of view—largely following those introduced by Southern Rhodesia—the Government's policies of water conservation which is year by year materially increasing the land under irrigation, soil conservation and improved farming methods (which involves continuous experiment and research) give promise of considerable expansion in agricultural production which should lessen the Federation's dependency on importations of such commodities as tea, sugar, wheat, etc. Apart from the possibilities of export the present low level of consumption of such commodities particularly in Nyasaland, would indicate that the domestic market is bound to increase.

The following figures will serve as an example of this:—

Commodity	Consumption per Capita
	Nyasaland	Northern Rhodesia	Southern Rhodesia	Union of South Africa
Sugar	6 lb.	11 lb.	33 lb.	90 lb.

20. Should the Federal experiment be discontinued there is no reason to suppose that the two territories controlled by the Colonial Office would not revert to the unprogressive and backward state agriculturally that existed prior to 1953.

21. Turning to the export market all reliable evidence points to the fact that existing supplies of industrial minerals in the United States of America and Europe are being exhausted at a quite alarming rate. The whole problem was studied very exhaustively by a Materials Policy Commission set up by President Truman in 1951 and its report known as the Paley Report Resources for Freedom gives a remarkably complete survey of the situation in the free world and of the growing dependence of the major industrial countries on importations of raw materials. This report indicates (Vol. II page 6) that by 1975 production outside of the United States of America must double in respect of copper, lead and iron ore to meet the projected consumption at that date, while zinc must rise by 7/8th. It would appear therefore that there is tremendous room for expansion of the mineral resources that are known to exist in the Federation and for the exploitation of the additional deposits which geological exploration, at present being conducted on a very large and intensive scale, gives promise of locating.

22. Bearing in mind that the most fruitful ground for the spread of communism is among the uneducated masses with a low standard of living, it should be mentioned parenthetically, that it is difficult for an ordinary business man to understand how the United Kingdom Government and Press can even contemplate the risk of placing the control of such an important supply source of strategic minerals as the Federation under African domination.

VII. Finance

23. Prior to Federation, although the three territories had a uniform currency system operated by the Southern Rhodesia Currency Board they were individually responsible for their own borrowings and the banking system consisted solely of branches operated by Barclays Bank D.C. & O. and the Standard Bank of South Africa Ltd. The building society movement had virtually only just commenced and was conducted on a small scale and there were no other private banking or borrowing facilities available.

24. Since Federation, which was followed by the establishment of the Federal Reserve Bank, a considerable measure of advancement has been achieved. There are now at least five commercial banks operating, two merchant banks, two discount houses, a number of credit and hire purchase organisations and probably too many building societies, which however in the aggregate have attracted a considerable amount of finance. At any event it is now possible to employ surplus funds to the optimum extent and to have a scale of interest rates which more accurately accords with the relative surplus or scarcity of free funds.

25. Coupled with the foregoing it is fair to say that the Federal Government has enjoyed a better credit standing in international circles than the individual territorial governments had done previously.

26. All this has materially improved conditions for the conduct of business and has in fact encouraged business activity as the undernoted figures show:—

VIII. Suitable Locality

27. The Federation is of course an economic unit which has very few large towns and the tendency of business interests has been to locate themselves in the larger towns and territorially to favour the more advanced Southern Rhodesia. It is in this particular aspect that economic and political considerations are most apparently divergent. Politically decentralisation of industry and a wider spread of population and business are the desiderata, but the economic considerations, as has generally proved the case elsewhere in the world, have had the stronger pull.

28. Inter alia this has had the unfortunate effect of promoting parochial jealousies, the primary targets of which are Southern Rhodesia and Salisbury.

29. In the immediate post war years general conditions for the siting of industry and business were difficult. Transport was inadequate and as a result power and fuel supplies were subject to periodical crises. In addition the number of properly serviced industrial sites was very limited.

30. In the years since Federation all these short-comings have been overcome and there are now ample facilities in or adjacent to all the major towns in the Federation for the establishment of all but the heaviest and most specialised of industries.

31. It is germane at this point to consider the position of Salisbury, the Federal Capital, where the rate of expansion has far exceeded that of any other town in the Federation. It is important to remember that this predominant position was achieved prior to Federation. This growth was in fact primarily due to the facts that because of the popularity and expansion of air travel coupled with improved motor vehicles and roads the geographical centre had gradually shifted from Bulawayo to Salisbury, while in addition, due to the decline in gold mining in Matabeleland and the tremendous expansion of tobacco production and agriculture in Mashonaland and Manicaland, Salisbury had become the centre for the primary producers.

32. The expansion has of course been aided by the choice of Salisbury as the Federal Capital and the investment of substantial sums in real estate there has been influenced by this. It would be a measure of bad faith and help to destroy confidence in the stability of Government if the Federal Capital were to be moved now, as has been mooted from time to time, to placate purely political antagonism. There is also the practical consideration that the cost of any such move would be colossal.

33. Before leaving the subject of locality or land it is necessary to consider this from another angle which has an indirect impact only but nevertheless an important one on business. This is the question of the density of population and the rapid exhaustion of suitable agricultural land available for Africans. The undernoted figures indicate the relative densities of population in the three territories:—

	Southern Rhodesia	Northern Rhodesia	Nyasaland
Per square mile...	19·02	8·13	74·86

34. It will at once be apparent that at any rate in Nyasaland the ability of the land to sustain its resident population has already been stretched. This of course is proof positive that a substantial portion of the population will be driven to industrial employment away from the land. In fact the report of the Jack Commission has stated that 23% of the national cash income of Nyasaland comes from labour which has migrated beyond its borders for employment. The problem of finding employment for such labour is becoming increasingly important.

IX. Raw Materials

35. As indicated earlier in this memorandum (vide paragraphs 19 and 21) the Federation as a whole is very well endowed with most of the essential agricultural and mineral raw materials, though the individual territories have definite limitations, particularly Nyasaland where, so far, there have been no indications of worthwhile mineralisation.

36. From the point of view of being the most nearly self-contained in this respect, Southern Rhodesia is by far the most balanced economy. It is pertinent here to remark that it was an accident, no doubt as the result of the second world war, that Federation was achieved at a time when the Northern Rhodesia's economy was so strong financially, but this has in fact been a disruptive force in the cause of Federal harmony.

In point of fact indications are that this is purely a temporary phase and that in a relatively short time the more balanced economy of Southern Rhodesia will again exceed that of Northern Rhodesia.

37. However, from a business aspect with an inter-flow of materials between the territories free of duty and on a common transport system the Federation would appear to have most of the essential requirements of industry. The only reservations are that known resources of good coking coal and metallurgical limestone may limit the degree to which highly metallurgical refining processes can be undertaken, but it is probable that intensive geological exploration coupled with improved technical methods will overcome these.

X. Labour

38. Superficially, if numbers only are considered the labour position in the Federation is extremely good, but in point of fact this is one of the most complex problems with which both Government and business are confronted.

39. There are two separate pools of labour, European and African, and vastly different conditions of employment pertain in each case. It is probably this fact more than any other which has allowed the tide of African nationalism which is sweeping through Africa to achieve the proportions it has in the relatively highly industrialised and European settled area of Southern Africa.

40. The vast majority of Africans are uneducated and unskilled and as a result their wages are extremely small and their standard of living very low. The European employer is not entirely to blame for this, though there have inevitably been cases of undoubted exploitation. The African has himself been largely to blame and it is only comparatively lately due to the growing tendency of Africans to settle permanently in Urban areas that the need and desire for higher wages has become recognised by them.

41. For example many farmers, where until recently labour has in the main been in short supply since the war, were perfectly prepared to offer higher wages if a better output were to be achieved. The generally adopted practice for farm labourers is the task system whereby a definite task is assigned each day. The Africans by starting very early in the morning will often finish their task by noon, but no reasonable financial incentive would persuade them to carry on after a lunch break and undertake a reduced assignment of an additional two or three hours duration. Similarly the employers of domestic labour have found that recognition of good service by materially enhanced wages often had the effect of reducing the period of employment as the servant attained his monetary aim of savings quicker and was thus enabled to return to his reserve for a virtual life of idleness until his money ran out. The other conditioning factor has been that, apart from agricultural labour, the supply has always exceeded the demand even at the low level of wages prevailing at the time.

42. The root of the trouble of course lies in the low productivity of the African. The extent of this is not perhaps understood by people who have not worked with them. As an illustration the writer would cite a case in his own experience where this factor was fairly accurately assessed. During the formative years of a company which the British South Africa Company helped to sponsor at Gwelo for the manufacture of low carbon ferro-chrome, viz., Rhodesian Alloys (Pvt.) Limited, the Company ran into difficulties in a highly competitive international market and every phase of its activities was examined. In the course of this examination the writer visited an identical refinery operated by Societe d'Electro-Chimie d'Electro-Metallurgie et des Acieries Electriques d'Ugine at Ardoise in France and conducted a complete cost investigation. One of the results of this was to indicate that after the elimination of all skilled jobs the remaining establishment necessitated the employment of seven Africans at Gwelo for every one European at Ardoise (mostly Italian unskilled labourers). To put this another way each African was effectively working only nine minutes in every hour, though competitively this was very largely offset by the lower scale of wages. Nevertheless, studies in the Union of South Africa have also revealed that the African output is below 20% of the generally accepted European standards.

43. Education and proper training will overcome this difficulty in time, but the opportunities for advancement are being opposed in many ways by the attitude of the trade unions. The stand of the unions of the rate for the job or equal pay for equal work is prima facie an acceptance of the abolition of the colour bar. The practical effect, however, is to protect the least efficient Europeans and debar the advancement of the Africans because at the present stage of this development, as has been indicated previously, the Africans' work does not equal that of the European and his social responsibilities are less. In other words, for a period of time fragmentation of jobs and a differential scale of pay is necessary, with the ultimate aim being that of multi-racial unions and the rate for the job principle. Experience has shown that provided he receives an adequate demonstration of what he is required to do, the African is capable of doing many types of industrial work adequately and in repetitive jobs is often very good indeed, but he needs very careful supervision when operating machinery.

44. It must be borne in mind that labour control and legislation was not federalised but was left in the hands of the Governments of the individual territories. In point of fact this has been a wise decision as experience has demonstrated the definite superiority of the administration in Southern Rhodesia in this respect. Whereas the only major industry in Northern Rhodesia, viz., mining, has been plagued with repeated strikes, more often than not on the most unreasonable grounds, Southern Rhodesia has been virtually free from industrial disputes since it was first settled. This latter is in fact a remarkable record which should give food for thought to the Colonial Office, whose record generally in the post-war years in the maintenance of law and order and avoidance of industrial dislocation has not been a happy one. This factor, apart from other economic considerations, is bound to influence large scale business other than mining towards Southern Rhodesia rather than to the other two territories.

45. To sum up, the labour situation in the Federation is that there is a vast surplus of unskilled labour available, while specialist and skilled labour if not readily procurable locally is readily obtainable from the United Kingdom, the Union of South Africa and elsewhere. The industrialist has however a responsibility which he does not have to assume to such a major degree in older and more civilised communities of training the unskilled labour and of increasing wages so as to raise the standard of living above the appallingly low level that exists. In this connection it is a sobering thought that the African is utterly dependent on the European for employment. Except on a very small scale in the fields of transport and that of the middle-man, the African has shown no ability as an entrepreneur.

XI. Power and Fuel

46. Prior to Federation a very unsatisfactory situation existed in regard to the availability of power and fuel. The only coal mine in the three territories was, and still is, at Wankie in Southern Rhodesia and though Southern Rhodesia had a reasonably co-ordinated thermal power system to all its principle towns such was not the case in the other two territories. As a result the important mining industries in Northern Rhodesia at the Copperbelt and at Broken Hill had periodically to resort to the burning of wood in their furnaces and more seriously to curtail production. In an endeavour to ease the position the Anglo-American group took over the Wankie Colliery from Powell-Duffryn and stepped up production there very considerably and then financially assisted the Rhodesian Railways to enable it to acquire additional trucks. In addition, as a palliative, that Group together with the Rhodesian Selection Trust, and through the medium of The Northern Rhodesia Power Corporation, entered into a partial supply agreement with the Belgian Congo for electricity from the Lualaba hydro-electric scheme. The coming of Federation, however, made the provision of a more permanent long-term scheme possible and the Kariba Dam project, that is already operating but will only be opened officially next month (May 1960), was undertaken.

47. Thus, so far as Southern and Northern Rhodesia are concerned the vital questions of power and coal supplies have been taken care of for some considerable time ahead. In the case of Nyasaland, owing to its geographical isolation, no real improvement has been effected yet, but schemes such as the Shire Valley hydro-electric scheme are under consideration.

48. As indicated earlier, the completion of Kariba and the provision of adequate hydro-electric power on a reducing scale of charges as opposed to an increasing scale for thermal supplies is bound to have far reaching effects, particularly in relation to metallurgical processes. As an indication, Rhodesian Alloys, to which reference has been made in paragraph No. 42, is now contemplating the doubling up of its plant, while such important adjuncts to the general economy as fertiliser and explosives factories are under consideration.

XII. Transport

49. In 1953 there existed a good railway system serving Southern and Northern Rhodesia, which however due to the phenomenal expansion of those two territories was not at that time able to meet the calls made upon it. An independent system served Nyasaland. In addition there existed a remarkably efficient and extensive air transport organisation. The road system, however, left much to be desired and during heavy rains communications in almost every direction were interrupted.

50. Since Federation the Rhodesia Railways has completed an expansion programme costing £43,000,000 which has made it fully capable of handling all the foreseeable demands that might be made on it. Central African Airways has modernised and improved its services and the international services now calling at Salisbury place the Federation within easy reach of the major commercial and industrial countries.

51. With regard to roads, though these are in the main territorial responsibilities, these have, through the allocation of Federal funds, been improved to a quite remarkable extent for a country with so small an earning population. A corollary to this has been the terrific expansion by private enterprise of road transport and a very efficient system of road hauliers exists to-day.

52. Other forms of communication, such as telephone, telecommunication, cable and wireless have also all been tremendously expanded and improved.

53. The following figures will serve to confirm the terrific advance that has taken place in the transport facilities:—

XIII. Government

54. The Government entrusted with the duty of administering the newly formed Federation in 1953 was faced with an undoubtedly difficult task. At the outset, no doubt motivated by the British sense of fair play, but gravely misunderstanding the effect of its instruction, the Colonial Office made the really inexcusable error of instructing all its officials not to instruct or influence the African in any way towards Federation. For years these selfsame Africans had been brought up to depend on and trust the advice of such officials as District Commissioners in all major questions affecting their welfare. Yet when it came to the question of Federation such advice and guidance was denied them and they were told they would have to rely on their own judgment. Somewhat naturally the African quite unnecessarily became suspicious of the new set-up and distrusted its motives. Much subsequent unrest probably stems from this unfortunate mishandling of the problem.

55. It is possible too that the unhelpful attitude adopted by some officials in the territorial services of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland may have been fostered by the lack of decisiveness in the original Colonial Office attitude.

56. In addition many Europeans, particularly in Southern Rhodesia, were opposed to Federation because they in turn distrusted the Colonial Office.

57. Despite these difficulties, the United Federal Party, under its distinguished leaders Lord Malvern and subsequently Sir Roy Welensky, has done a commendable job as the previous sections of this report have indicated. The Government has maintained law and order firmly but with humanity, has helped to develop the country's economy, and has in the writer's view made quite remarkable strides in bringing the African along the road to full equal partnership. If it were not for the question of colour, this last claim would be more readily recognised by outside observers. In addition the control of the fiscus and general taxation policy, if perhaps relatively severe for a young developing country have nevertheless been consistent and impartial. The commercial and industrial legislation has in the main been reasonable and generally acceptable.

58. In other words, the Government has been such that it has had the confidence of business particularly big business.

59. It is fair to say that the Federal economy has proved that it is viable as it has, while virtually still only in its formative period, weathered the storm of a general collapse of the international metal market (copper in particular falling from some £400 per ton to £164) as well as a definite recession during 1958 and 1959 which affected practically every form of business activity. This reduction in the public finances was greater than had been thought possible when the fiscal policy of Federation was being formulated (The Fiscal Commission had considered a copper price at worst of £180 per ton), but nevertheless the financial measures imposed by the Federal Reserve Bank, including a material restriction of credit and the curtailment of Government expenditure (perhaps a bit too stringently) have had the effect of restoring a favourable Balance of Trade by the end of 1959. There is little doubt that the consensus of commercial opinion is that if it were not for the Constitutional uncertainties, the Federation would now be at the beginning of another boom period. The only existing aftermath of the recession of real importance is that there is now a considerable body of unemployed Africans for whom there is no immediate prospect of work.

60. There is plenty of confidence in the future of Federation. Examples of this are:—

- (a) The £8,500,000 expansion programme for the steel works at Que Que.
- (b) The construction of a £3,000,000 brewery in Salisbury.
- (c) The decisions of the British Motor Corporation and the Ford Motor Company to establish assembly plants at Umtali and Salisbury respectively.
- (d) The re-opening of Bancroft Mine.
- (e) Mr. Whitney Straight's project to build a 30 storey building in Salisbury, and Mr. Schlesinger's recent purchase for £475,000 of a central city property (to say nothing of the other numerous large buildings erected in Salisbury during the past five years).

XIV. General Comment

61. It is pertinent at this stage to consider whether, in view of the economic advantages that have flowed from Federation, the African has got any solid grounds for criticising his position as it now is. It is the writer's belief that he has.

62. There can be no doubt that a considerable degree of discrimination is still exercised against him. This is something that cannot be solved purely by legislation, it requires a complete change of attitude gradually. The difference in colour, lack of personal hygiene and general backwardness has caused the European to regard the African not merely as a person of a lower social status, but rather as a lower strata of humanity that might be expected to remain subordinate to the White. This is of course fallacious.

63. This attitude has very unfortunate results. Not only are Africans not accorded the ordinary courtesies any human being should be entitled to expect, but in shops and Government Departments they are often subjected to rudeness and indifference. This is all the more noticeable when the African is a man of advanced years and the official attending to him is a relative junior of twenty or so. Attendance at any big store, the Civil Commissioner's office, the hospital, etc., will give ample evidence of this unfair discrimination.

64. Then the African, often without reason, considers that the justice he receives in the Courts (mostly at the hands of Magistrates) is discriminatory. The scale of fines for petty offences does often appear to be disproportionate to the relative earnings of the African.

65. A further bone of contention is the Pass (Situpa). This has just been the cause of violent protest in the Union of South Africa where in fact the European also has to carry an identity card which is not the case in the Federation.

66. Many other pin-pricks exist and it should be Government's earnest endeavour to ascertain what these all are and if proved justifiable take steps to remove them so far as it is able to do so.

XV. Suggestions

67. The writer has not studied Constitutional or Comparative Law and is politically inexperienced, so he has not the temerity to submit definite recommendations, but nevertheless submits the following as suggestions which might merit the careful consideration of the Commission and the Federal Government. In submitting these suggestions the writer wishes to make it clear that they represent his own personal views and that they therefore do not necessarily represent the official views of The British South Africa Company. The Commission will no doubt have the opportunity of ascertaining these from the Directors of the Company in London.

68. For convenience the suggestions are classified into three groups covering political, social and economic advancement and they are all based on the following premises:—

- (i) That the continuance of Federation is not only desirable but is essential for the long term wellbeing of all its inhabitants.
- (ii) That the "unscrambling" of Federation apart from raising immensely complex financial, commercial and political problems would leave in its train a feeling of mutual distrust and bitterness which would probably render any other form of close association (it must be remembered that Northern Rhodesia is utterly dependent on this) completely abortive.
- (iii) That all economic and cultural development in the Federation has been achieved over the past 70 years by the Whites without any help at all from the Blacks except in the form of paid labour and that on that account, if no other, the European minority must have its interests protected. This means that universal adult suffrage and the application of the majority principle is unacceptable to the European at the present time.
- (iv) That eventually a fully integrated non-racial state with full universal adult suffrage is inevitable, but that at the present stage of the African's educational, social, cultural, political and economic development this is not a practical possibility. (The Commission will no doubt have ample evidence of the local Africans immaturity and of the dependence of their leaders on violence and intimidation to achieve their aims).
- (v) That the Non-Whites are entitled to aspire to the eventual enjoyment of the basic human freedoms and political and economic rights such as are already enjoyed by the Whites.
- (vi) That the economic, social and educational development of the African will have to be materially accelerated if abject poverty and human suffering of a large section of the population is to be avoided.

As already indicated the foregoing premises form the bases for all the following suggestions:—

A. Political Advancement

It is considered that the more rational African recognises the political immaturity of his people, but is unconvinced that Federation in its existing form will lead eventually to true partnership. It is suggested that consideration might be given now to a firm and unambiguous declaration by Government that its intention is that of gradual integration such that in (say) 25 to 30 years time there will be a non-racial status with full universal adult suffrage. It is realised that there are political difficulties in such a declaration and that the gradual elimination of a qualified franchise raises many constitutional and procedural complexities but with goodwill on all sides these should not be insoluble. If the Commission should not itself be able to formulate a suitable solution then it is suggested that a multi-racial convention might be held to define objectives and appoint a special study group to draw up the framework and time-table of the intervening procedures until eventual harmonious integration is achieved. It is considered that such a definite commitment would be acceptable to the African if adequately explained and subject to careful propaganda and proper constitutional safe-guards could be made acceptable to the European.

In addition with a view to demonstrating good faith and at the same time training future administrators, the African might to a far larger degree than at present be made responsible for the administration of his own affairs. The writer has not made a study of this so cannot quote specific examples, but believes there is considerable scope for such a policy.

B. Social Advancement

The Government should as soon as practicably possible publicly declare that it is its intention to do away with all form of discrimination and in particular abolish the Pass (Situpa) and abolish the curfew which necessitates the issue of a special pass. (Parenthetically in fairness it must be mentioned that considerable relaxation has already been effected in regard to this latter). It is realised that this does pose difficulties of administration and security but these should be capable of solution in some other form which does not discriminate against the Black alone. It has to be remembered that in addition to the Whites, Asiatics and Coloured persons do not require passes.

The Government might also consider taking steps to instruct all officials in the Public Service that discrimination against and discourtesy to the Non-White must stop forthwith. It would of course be necessary to take supervisory action to ensure that the instruction is actually carried out.

A further urgent requirement is the provision of adequate African housing. This problem is most acute probably in Salisbury where the conditions in the older section of Harari are deplorable. In addition there is an acute shortage of accommodation. The whole question of African housing might it is considered be further co-ordinated. At present it is a joint territorial and local authority responsibility and the problem has been aggravated by the phenomenal rate of growth achieved in Salisbury, Bulawayo, Lusaka and Kitwe, but discontent and crime are almost certain to result where slum living conditions exist.

The African population is increasing at a rate that, if it has not already done so in specific areas, it must in time exceed the ability of the population to exist off the land. It might be prudent for Government to conduct a campaign against indiscriminate propagation and subsidise a positive programme of prevention, or planned family limitation.

Under the heading of social advancement it is also necessary to consider the question of education. Considerable strides have been made since Federation in the education of the African, but if a fully integrated state is to be achieved in 25 to 30 years time a considerably accelerated programme will be necessary, particularly in relation to the emancipation and training of women. This problem is constantly being considered by expert Specialists, but the writer wonders whether too much emphasis is not placed on academic education on traditional lines. It would appear that a commercial and technical education for the men with domestic science and hygiene for the women is the prime requirement, while revolutionary teaching methods will be required in view of the tremendous numbers involved, a shortage of classrooms and a real scarcity of adequately trained teachers. Might not this be overcome by the use of thatched pole and daga halls with screen visual instruction (T.V. might also be used), recorded lessons over a public address system and a system of mutual adjudication?

C. Economic Advancement

The writer, with some diffidence as he is not familiar with all the financial implications, would suggest that Government might reconsider its conservative policy of a balanced budget and embark on a substantial programme of public works with a view to creating employment for a substantial number.

In addition industry might be encouraged by judicious publicity and perhaps, though not necessarily, by minimum wage legislation (which needs very careful consideration before being increased as it may lead to a reduction in the African establishments as was the case with the Todd award) to increase wages, to adopt incentive payment schemes (legislation may be necessary to permit this, e.g. the writer understands that the National Industrial Council Agreement to the Building Industry debars incentives) and to increase productivity through work study and proper training.

Owing to the Africans dependence on the European for employment and his acceptance of this, as is evidenced by his willingness to emigrate to areas settled by the Whites, the existing policy of restricted and screened European immigration—which the writer has always believed to be a wrong one—might be discontinued and active steps taken to encourage European settlement on a large scale. Similarly the establishment of new industries and the expansion of old ones might be encouraged by tax concessions and other means on the lines of the precedents set by Ireland, Ghana and elsewhere.

Finally in an endeavour to place the African agriculture in Nyasaland on more progressive and productive lines, the Colonial Office might be approached, preferably by the Commission, to take steps to alter the existing system of matrilineal succession, the disadvantages of which are fully discussed in the recent report of the Jack Commission.

XVI. Conclusion

The expansion and development that has taken place in the Federation in the post-war years has been phenomenal and the manner in which this has been handled by the Governments of Southern Rhodesia and the Federation deserves on the whole considerable commendation. The achievements of Federation in the short space of 6 years have been truly remarkable and are such that, in the writer's view, they give grounds for confidence that given reasonable time to continue the programme already initiated ultimate success will be achieved.

Oral Evidence

E. S. NEWSON

Mr. Newson had submitted a memorandum.

As the director of many companies in the Federation (as shewn in Annexure I to his memorandum), he thought he could claim some knowledge of industry in the Federation. He wished to say that the statement in the concluding paragraph that the "Governments of Southern Rhodesia and the Federation deserved on the whole considerable commendation" did not imply any criticism of the Governments of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland: and by the "Government of Southern Rhodesia" he had meant the Government up to the time of Federation in respect of the period of expansion from 1947-1953, and therefore he referred to both the Governments of Southern Rhodesia and of the Federation.

In reply to questions, Mr. Newson made the following points:—

1. Paragraph 22 of the memorandum. This paragraph was designed to sound a note of warning. It was now well established that in a short time Europe and the United States of America would become dependent on imported minerals. It might therefore be dangerous to hand over the government of those areas in Africa which produced minerals to people not competent to administer. It was also true that people with a low standard of living were liable to communist infiltration. The communists were already working very hard, and their impact was felt in the East and now in North Africa.

2. Having regard to the existence of strong political opposition in the Northern Territories to the Federation in its present form, he was asked whether an economic association without political attachment would be possible. He thought this would be very difficult and referred for example to a statement in Northern Rhodesia (actually by the European Mineworkers' Union) about the possible nationalisation of the mines. Referred then to the Common Market in Europe, he was asked if such an arrangement would be workable in Central Africa. He replied that to have such an arrangement it was necessary to have a high degree of advancement in the economy and also mutual trust: these conditions did not exist in Central Africa.

3. Paragraph 40 of the memorandum. Reference had been made to the need to increase African wages—how was this to be done? He thought there was no single panacea. There must certainly be a gradual raising of the minimum wage since some employers still had to be driven. But in addition there must be a strong movement among industrialists to improve productivity. There had been an improvement in this respect, but there were difficulties. There was clearly room for automation, but that tended to increase unemployment and thus to aggravate the social problem. It was also difficult to get over the opposition of the European artisan class, which stemmed from the Union movement in the United Kingdom. He referred to the experience of the B.S.A. Company's Low Carbon Ferro-Chrome Company where a condition had been made in agreement with the Government that no trade union would be allowed. As a result of this the Company had achieved stages of African advancement in the firm which they could not have done if unions had existed. Representatives of the Associated Electrical Union had tried to force the Company to make the people members of trade unions, but this had been resisted. The main problem at present existed in the Copperbelt, and the only serious drawback he knew of in Southern Rhodesia was in the building industry, of which he had little experience.

4. Paragraph 43 of the memorandum. He agreed that the slogan of "the rate for the job" could often be a means of protection for less efficient European workers. An effort was now being made in lower grade artisan jobs to try to designate particular jobs for advanced Africans, but the European artisans had resisted this. The effect of sticking to "the rate for the job" was that no one would employ an African if he could employ a European, because of the former's lack of productivity. The solution must lie in more technical education for Africans and also in fragmentation.

5. Under Paragraph A, Political Advancement in the memorandum. For lack of political knowledge he was not able to indicate what immediate steps should be taken.

6. The Employers' Association, to which he belonged, was not represented at I.L.O. Headquarters in Geneva. But he did not wish to imply that he and the other employers were in general adverse from collective bargaining or trade unions. It was only in the one industry which he had mentioned that they had barred trade unions, and that was for a particular reason. They had seen very special opportunities to advance Africans and did not want any trouble in carrying out that programme from United Kingdom immigrants. Even in that industry trade unionism would undoubtedly come at a later stage. At present they relied on a Works Council on which Europeans and Africans were both represented, and thus the machinery of affiliation actually existed. He thought that in that industry both Europeans and Africans considered their terms of employment as better than what they would have achieved under trade union organisation.

7. He agreed that if the current proposals for advance of the Rhodesian Railways came into effect they would have a definite repercussion on similar forms of employment in other fields, such as the bricklaying trade. But he foresaw the continuation of the resistance which existed among certain classes of European artisans. For himself he wanted Africans to step up to such jobs.

8. He considered that economic improvement would accelerate political advancement. Poverty in the country had been bad for its politics and had brought about too much attention being given to politics. But the principle of "one man one vote" would not keep six million people fed, which was the main problem.

9. In relation to the Nyasaland opposition to the concept of Federation, he was asked whether he would maintain the Federation by force. He did not think that would be necessary. If he were satisfied that the opposition to Federation were a truly representative view, he would then say, "Let the Northern Territories secede". But he thought that they would be most unwise to do so. He thought that the Nyasaland situation was aggravated by persons who were acting for their own personal ends. Nyasaland and Tanganyika were both on the lowest economic levels. He agreed that to apportion to the Territorial Governments the functions affecting the daily lives of the people would be a better solution than to permit secession, but at the same time the vital function of taxation should remain Federal. The Federal Government should also have the functions of justice, defence and external affairs. Without them there would be no uniform government. Health and agriculture might be Territorial subjects.

10. He agreed that Nyasaland had been held back by the land system there, and the system of matrilineal succession.

11. He considered that for Nyasaland to remain in the Federation was ultimately for the benefit both of Nyasaland and the Federation. It would be foolish to leave Nyasaland outside the Federation. There would be the same sort of trouble as was about to break out in the Congo. Also, in due course, the Nyasaland labour force would become a useful source of labour for the Federation, for the mutual benefit of both Nyasaland and the Federation.

Memorandum

T. D. PAPENFUS

As I understand it the Monckton Commission was required to carry out an impartial survey and to take evidence in order to discover what changes, if any, should be recommended in the Federal Constitution which is shortly to be reviewed. I shall try to keep within these terms of reference.

Having been born of pioneer parents in Southern Rhodesia within the last century I feel that it may be possible that I may make a useful contribution to the fabric of evidence so far obtained by the Commission, if only with a few strands, but I suppose it is very likely that these have already been contributed repeatedly, and more convincingly and eloquently than I may be able to do. If that is the case I can only offer my humblest apologies for wasting the time of the Commission and withdraw in haste.

Still it has been on my conscience a little that there is a proportion of the population for whom I might speak particularly those that belong or might belong to the Pioneer & Early Settlers Assoc., and their children, who may not have had much to say for themselves. It is apparent that these older ones who grew up in contact with Rhodes (at whose funeral I was present in an ox wagon) and with the birth and early days of Southern Rhodesia and Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, since their parents had a hand in fashioning these states, have now become a dwindling minority and in any case they are not given to saying much. They have been displaced by newer settlers out of all proportion in numbers to the old hands who blazed the trails. And most of them more numerous recent arrivals are more talkative and perhaps more eloquent than the older ones, who I would say generally have forgotten the arts of speaking or speechmaking, having been perhaps too busy and too absorbed in the everyday work of the colony or more occupied there than in the political theatre, into which perhaps they did not know how to enter, or too shy or had never learnt how to conduct themselves in it, that is, except for a few eminent exceptions, such as the Prime Ministers of Southern Rhodesia and of the Federation itself and some of the compilers of the Constitution.

I have thought it worthwhile to seek an audience with the Commission, even if I did not represent the Pioneers & Early Settlers Society or any official body but merely as an individual Rhodesian born of pioneer descent whose ancestry have been almost 300 years in Africa and who had no other home but Africa (i.e. in particular the Federation) and whose blood, sweat and tears have been spilt in Africa, over its wastes and deserts as well as in the fertile parts for all that time. To begin with therefore I would like to ask the Commission if there is any point on which they could give me a lead that is on which they would care to have an opinion from me, or on which they may have any doubt themselves, and on which my experience of this country, and long contact with the African people might be able to clarify.

If they are satisfied that they have had sufficient evidence presented them on which to form a clear recommendation one way or another for any changes in the Federal Constitution, and so do not require much more information of any particular kind, then of course I shall withdraw with apologies but if they may not think it necessary to invite any statement from me on any one topic but at the same time if they be willing to hear what recommendations I should presume to offer them, then at least I can reply as follows and make the following suggestions. But before making this suggestion I would wish their permission like to amplify my status and the grounds on which I feel justified in speaking to them.

In one respect particularly I must say that I have many African friends of most endearing qualities of courage and good humour in adversity of generosity and kindness and indeed with all the noblest human traits of character as well as of the average human failings. Some of them with extraordinary habits but understandably in their ecology and that I am concerned with the welfare of these friends quite as deeply as with that of the European. I can bring proof of this friendship in several directions and that I have African friends who have risked their lives for me and for my son and for whom I would do the same. In fact I too have done so on several occasions always fortunately with a happy conclusion or I would not be here. I have found them in their own environment generally a happy people and with the most dignified manners and codes of their own and quite rigid principles and discipline within their own culture which however is that mostly of a rustic or a peasant people. I have found them to be trusting and educable and often to have good powers of mimicry and oratory and good musical ears so that they are able to learn fairly quickly to read and write and to speak English and generally they can soon ape the European, more often unfortunately but inevitably in his worst aspects, the better ones are not so easy to see. I hope however no member of the Commission has neglected to read Tshaka Zulu by Ritter because the picture he gives in that book shows more clearly than most other authorities a just estimate of the barbarism which prevailed then for the African about 130 years ago, and still prevailed strongly at the time of Lobengula, when the white men entered Rhodesia 70 years ago and indeed still forms a large part of their present background and thought today, in fact wherever there may be witchdoctors or wizards with any power left to them.

Some of these still believe that the liver of a human body and other parts of the anatomy preferably of a young girl or boy cut from the living body are effective medicine and required for the success of certain ventures. The psychology, character and habits and culture of the African people however are probably well known to the members of the Commission and I apologise if I weary them but I can hardly shrink from mentioning these more sinister barbarisms so that people in England should know that sort of thing is not to be eradicated entirely in 2 or 3 or 4 generations in spite of education and Christian teaching. It still prevails to some extent in Voodoo in the West Indies and in the U.S.A. after a much longer period and years of European contact and teaching than we have had here.

To summarise then I have ventured to appear before the Commission on the authority of my own experience and for the sake of those African friends whom I would not like to see suffer in poverty and hunger as well as for all the people both white and black and coloured European, Asiatic and African, who may be puzzled as to how to define the partnership which is written into the preamble of the present Federal Constitution at which many scoff. To me that word implies respect, tolerance, friendship, even love, but not necessarily complete integration, not at first anyway, not for a very long time 4 or 5 centuries, not in the sense of a mixing up of the races in marriage, because that always has been a retrograde step followed by degeneration and a falling of the standard of living and of poverty which breeds a corresponding falling in the standard of behaviour and conduct.

The coloureds who need to be the bravest people, and often are, to sustain their deeper struggle to live, though not possessing much in worldly goods, can be envied in one thing at least, that is in their ability to see both sides, and to know too that (in the very long run perhaps) their time will come—though it may take many centuries till we are all their colour as Bernard Shaw predicted. Meanwhile they are an embarrassment and shunned as outcasts both by whites and by the blacks.

It is not to be looked upon as surprising that the whites fear this mixing of blood and take pains to preserve their heritage as purely as possible and that similarly the blacks do not wish to lose their identity for a doubtful secondary status and equal or worse poverty. On these grounds therefore I submit the following. First that it is essential having borrowed more than a hundred million pounds for it that the benefits to be derived from Kariba and the electrification of the Federation and the stimulation of industry be allowed to go forward in peace and in a favourable economic climate. I say therefore that too rapid a rise in African representation in the Federal Government at the expense of European control would seriously jeopardise the stability of the Federation and any talk or implementation of African nationalism beyond that at present obtaining in Barotseland say or a similar protectorate status, would seriously undermine the confidence of both overseas and internal finance and investment. There would be a flight of capital away from black dominance. The climate for such favourable investment must above all things be peaceful and obviously favourable to the growth of the seeds of a dynamic prosperity. The fruits of Kariba and of the Kafue hydro-electric and of the Shire Valley scheme as well as that of the Sabi and of the Kyle Dam all pointing to a great promise and flowering of prosperity in the Federation. These provisions for food and wealth must not be lightly upset. The consequences of riots and strikes and aspiring African nationalism elsewhere in Africa may be looked on favourably in England or America but for this country it is different. There are white Africans here too and believe me they will fight to defend what they have. Their stake is too great. But they are willing, and a majority have said so, to share the coming wealth, and to go along together with the African. But to attain it would require a second period of 10 years of the status quo. In that time the African population would have increased by several millions, possibly from about 7 millions to 9 but they would be better educated, better housed, better fed and perhaps better prepared to impose a self regulation of their prolific and heedless fertility which by its unrestrained and irresponsible uncontrolled rate of propagation gives rise to such places as the Old Bricks in Harare. Only education and a revision of their customs of Lobola where a girl child is the equivalent of the wealth of 5 or 10 head of cattle when they may learn that women should cease to be sold to the highest bidder. Only by education and a rise in their standard of living can the Africans be led into the promised land of prosperity and eventual equality. I would suggest therefore that the constitution be reviewed perhaps in 5 years, but not sooner and that at present it is perfectly adequate and should be maintained as it is for at least 10 years so that the industrial revolution now budding in Central Africa may proceed peacefully and the Africans learn how to step out of barbarism and adapt themselves to modern economy in a peaceful way. I suggest that the above mentioned economic progress is of paramount and supreme importance and only from it can real wealth and prosperity come to all, therefore the constitution should remain as it is with only one exception that in order to create still greater confidence in the stability of the Federation that I fully second Sir Edgar Whitehead's present effort to have the reservations in the Southern Rhodesian Government Constitution removed so that no veto or restraint may be possibly laid on us by the British Government on bills which may affect the African in Southern Rhodesia. We have shown ourselves to be worthy of this trust and there has been no need for protest or comment by the British Government for 36 years i.e. since the beginning of our independence, we have respected our trust but if there is a danger of the domination of our European brothers and cousins in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland by a black government we shall not abandon them and we shall need them to stand if not within dominion status at least with equal independence and to form a bastion of civilisation and true democratic freedom. Too rapid an ideological rise in African representation at the expense of European control would jeopardise the stability of the Federation. There was a danger of a severe depression in the price of copper. It was supremely important to implement Kariba, Kafue and the Shire Valley Scheme and bring in strong industrial development and to develop agricultural sources for ample food for all and to gain internal prosperity following electrification. This would require a second period of 10 years. By that time the African population would have increased by 3 or 4 million but they would be better educated and at a higher standard of living and more prepared to regulate their prolific powers of reproduction and fertility. I would suggest a review in 5 years with possibly greater African representation but no great change for at least 10 years. Winds of change are all over the world and chiefly in China.

Oral Evidence

T. D. PAPPENFUS

Mr. Pappenus read his memorandum to the members of the party. Questioned on it, the witness was asked whether he was suggesting that the Northern Rhodesian and Nyasaland Constitutions should remain as they were for five years. He replied that he would not press for the independence of Southern Rhodesia if this meant the same for the Northern Territories. He would not object to some slight advancement in the Northern Territories provided European control were preserved. The witness was asked whether he would have any objection to some African advance so far as the Southern Rhodesian Government was concerned, and if not, how this could be achieved under the moratorium he had suggested. He replied that some Africans could be nominated for reserved seats but that European guidance should be trusted. He also said that the Federal Government provided the framework for economic stability, and that there should be no change in the Federal Constitution at the forthcoming Review.

Memorandum

C. J. MATINGA M.F.P.

I, Charles Jameson Matinga, of Blantyre, Nyasaland, Federal Member of Parliament for Nyasaland South, wish to appear before the Commission to give evidence on the issue of Federation.

I am 58 years of age, having been born on 10th September, 1901 and was educated at Blantyre Mission, Nyasaland, and trained as a Teacher. I also worked for the Nyasaland Government as a Clerk in the Public Works Department and was promoted to the post of Storekeeper, 1934, and took over duties formerly performed by a European. Retired in 1955 after reaching a senior post as Storekeeper having completed 32 years service.

During the period I was in the Service, I took a keen interest in the welfare of my own race and as a result, was a member of Southern Province Zomba Native Association at its formation, Secretary for Blantyre Native Association from 1929 to 1937, Member of Advisory Committee on African Education 1937 to date, Member of Southern Province Minimum Wage Board, Member of Venereal Disease Committee, Member of the Central Labour Advisory Board, Member of the Board of Governors of the Blantyre Secondary School to date, Member of the Unified African Teaching Service Board, Member of the Blantyre District African Loans Board, Founder and Organiser of Ndirande Welfare Club, Founder and Organiser of the Nyasaland African Congress and first Vice-President October, 1944 to 23rd January 1945, and President General, 1945 to 1949, Farmer and Brickmaker and dealer. Own freehold land since 1944 and employ African labour varying between 70 to 150 during the year.

Initiator of anti-Rhodesia in 1935 while serving Blantyre Association and it is for this very particular point, I wish to begin my case, as there seems as if few people understand what and how this slogan of anti-federation arose. Also that while there seems a strong resentment of all that Rhodesia stands for there is also a growing number of Africans from Nyasaland going to work in Southern Rhodesia and also why myself having started this anti-Rhodesia changed my mind to support Federation as in the best interests of Nyasaland.

It was about May 1935 that European residents of Nyasaland including Rev. W. P. Young of Livingstonia Mission, then a member of Legislative Council in Nyasaland with special responsibility for African affairs assembled at Blantyre to discuss the possibility of forming "Greater Rhodesia League". There were about 600 of them present. It was the time, if I can remember correctly a United Rhodesia Party was formed in Southern Rhodesia with a view to uniting possibly the two Rhodesias. Two or three months later I arranged a meeting for the Blantyre Native Association and the meeting was attended by people from Chikwawa, Cholo, Mlanje, Chiradzulu and Neno or Lisungwe areas. They were just observers since it was a responsibility of Blantyre Native Association. The estimated number of people who attended was 5,000. It was at this meeting that speaker after speaker said all they wanted about the badness of Southern Rhodesia and most of the speakers including myself spoke of anti-Rhodesia though at that time I had never been to Rhodesia. As government had sent a detective whom I knew, I called him to speak and this one was the only man who knew of Rhodesia since he was a Rhodesian. As a result of the Europeans' proposal of a Greater Rhodesia League and the Africans reaction to it, the Governor of Nyasaland, Sir Harold Kittermaster, declared at the opening of Agriculture show at Limbe that he decided to refer the matter to the Colonial Secretary. Thereafter a Royal Commission on Amalgamation was appointed by the His Majesty King of England.

Before I proceed on this subject, another matter arose during the year of 1935 and that was the question of migrant labour and this caused very considerable concern in that at that time many people used to leave the country freely and never come back and their families began to get worried. Besides an individual firm was recruiting and it was felt that there was no proper arrangements made for the families' maintenance. Many wives of the migrant labour complained that once their husbands left the country they never wished to come back from Southern Rhodesia and in fact they either got married or stayed for periods which caused a break to many families and so the Government appointed a Commission to inquire into the incidence of uncontrolled labour movement to Rhodesias and the Union. I mentioned this as it is tied very considerable in the arguments I have to bring in the favour of Nyasaland staying in the Federation and also why I changed my mind in the campaign against Rhodesia. This I shall refer to again later on.

The Rhodesia-Nyasaland Royal Commission was then appointed 1938 arrived in Nyasaland in June and began taking evidence in Zomba, on 18th June, 1938. The Blantyre Native Association, which was responsible for creating anti-Greater Rhodesia League was the only Native Association which met the Commission and gave evidence in a memorandum sent to the Commission. Its delegation was 12 men including myself. It was during this time that I realised that most of the arguments advanced were merely hearsay and the only complaint made verbally to the Commission was mainly about "Situpa" that if amalgamation came pass laws would be introduced in Nyasaland and that the status of the chiefs would be reduced. Many said there were no recognised chiefs in Southern Rhodesia and also that Southern Rhodesia oppressed the Africans ruthlessly. Others complained that amalgamation meant that Africans will be subjected to imprisonment as some labourers while in Rhodesia were found with amalgam and were imprisoned. They confused amalgamation with the word amalgam. Such was the evidence that one of the Commissioners, Mr. Mainwaring, invited us to the house of Mr. Rodger at Blantyre Mission and said he was sorry but that he thought the Africans had been very unconvincing and didn't really appear to understand the situation.

As I had not visited Southern Rhodesia at that time, and my arguments were based on what I heard from those who worked in Rhodesia, I decided to visit Southern Rhodesia in 1941 to find out how the Africans were being oppressed there. I asked the Government and the Provincial Commissioner Southern Province, Mr. Eric Smith at that time, arranged for me to report to the Chief Native Commissioner, Mr. Simmonds. The Chief Native Commissioner arranged for me to visit a few reserves. First he introduced me to the Director of Native Education, Mr. Stark, who showed me several schools including a two days stay at Domboshawa. I was then introduced to the Agricultural Officer, later on Director of Native Agriculture, Mr. Alword, who arranged for me to visit and see Native Agriculture Shows in Shiota and Zeke Reserves. Lastly the Chief Native Commissioner took me to Makwiro Native Purchase area where I attended agriculture courses for two days.

I visited Shiota again in 1943 and stayed one week with Mr. Mbofana when he was Agriculture Demonstrator and again attended his lectures as well as seeing many villages. Also visited Ntabazinduna Reserve just to see what was going on.

Another visit was made in 1943 and this time I tried to find out what one would get if one just stayed or remained in townships. I stayed one month in Southern Rhodesia in Salisbury, Bulawayo and Gwelo and not one day was I victimised by Police for being in the town with friends. With this experience I began to think cautiously.

During that period, however, there were several Native Associations in Nyasaland working independently of each other and as the question of amalgamation was coming on I made an effort to get the associations together on the experience I gained from South Africa in 1941 and that thinking that through one effort Africans could approach their problems realistically. This we managed and in 1944 African Congress was formed.

In 1945 a Central African Council consisting of the Governments of Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland was formed and this was queried by me as leader of Congress as a step for amalgamation or Federation. The Colonial Secretary, Mr. Hall, denied that it was intended so and that if any change was to come Africans would be consulted. In 1948 Mr. Creech-Jones visited Nyasaland when he was Colonial Secretary at a meeting in Blantyre. He similarly denied and said this question was not in his Office and if it was considered Africans would be consulted. Asked if Great Britain could not develop the country without any closer ties with Southern Rhodesia, he said as a result of the two world wars it was impossible for Britain to find sufficient money for development of her overseas colonies and that the days of small units were fast dying, and it was necessary that countries like Nyasaland should associate with their nearest neighbours.

In 1951 then came the Federal scheme and at the first meeting when the Provincial Commissioner just tabled the white paper saying the Africans should decide themselves, I suggested that Government be asked to allow all the chiefs in the Protectorate and their representatives to come to Blantyre so that this question could be decided on the realistic approach as, although Africans had been turning the suggestion down every time there were other matters which should not be ignored. I referred to the question of migrant labour and its effect on the community, African education, and several other points. The Provincial Commissioner Mr. Eric Barnes, agreed but later he informed us that the Government had turned down my suggestion.

Thus the initiative was left to the Congress and at its first meeting at Blantyre Market square, just as the meeting began, telegrams came from London, one of them from a society known as "Union Democratic Control" saying boycott the Federal Scheme and the meeting with Mr. James Griffiths. After that no one was allowed to express a word on the scheme, and the Congress declared that any one who expressed the contrary would be dealt with as an enemy.

As that was the case, I then drew up a personal memorandum to Mr. James Griffiths who was coming to Nyasaland for Victoria Falls Conference. Similarly I addressed Mr. Henry Hopkinson then Minister of State for Colonial Affairs, on points which, to my way of thinking, should be considered. The main points were:—

- (a) That since 1920 the British Colonial Policies have been changing from time to time so that one did not understand which one would be permanently followed. In other words there has been a wavering on policies towards the colonies for since 1920 there have been Native Paramountcy, Trusteeship, Indirect Rule and now Partnership. This created suspicion and hence opposition, for in this respect the British seem to follow a policy of wavering.
- (a) Native Policy
- (b) Leadership in the Federal Sphere
- (c) Education
- (d) Economic set up in Nyasaland
- (e) Migrant Labour

In the case of (a) I had watched for a very considerable period say from 1920 to the time of federal scheme and what I feared was whether Southern Rhodesia Parallel policy was working well and in the event of Federation whether it would be applied to Nyasaland.

- (b) I wished that the Africans should go into the question of Leadership i.e. in the case of producing a suitable leader from rank and file of Africans whether the Colonial White men could accept such a man to be a Premier in the Federation at a future date when Africans have advanced to the same degree as white men.
- (c) That for partnership to be of value to both races there should be no division of education but must be under one control, even though separate facilities may be prolonged. What I wanted was to press for Federal Government when established to set one common standard of education for all races.
- (d) That before rejecting entirely the Federation scheme, the Nyasas should go into the economic set up of the Protectorate as from my experience there have been so many schemes but lasting for a very short time. That at that time no major secondary industry existed and to depend on agriculture only was to me not an answer to the economic needs of a rising generation. In this I wished the British to say whether they could find enough money to develop Nyasaland outside the Federation.
- (e) Migrant Labour. That before rejecting the federal scheme the African Congress should consider seriously that if Southern Rhodesia Native Policy is as bad as it was being painted, why do so many Africans leave Nyasaland in very large numbers to work in Southern Rhodesia, all them going quite freely.

The suggestion was accepted by the Blantyre Branch of which I was the local President but when I attended a Conference at Zomba to discuss the Federal Scheme, I put forward my views, but immediately it was announced that The Union Democratic Control wished that African Congress should send a delegation to London and demand self-government, no one wished to talk of anything and thus the position got out of hand. However I put this challenge and asked that a new approach be made and that since forming African Congress the question of self-government had never been raised, and therefore it should not be mixed with Federal Scheme issue. The meeting not only did not wish to give me a hearing but did not wish me to be present and as a result of my insistence not to mix the two issues which in my opinion were not related, the Congress took a threatening attitude and in 1952 in July came at night to attempt to kill me. Due to this attitude the position became extremely difficult for everybody and whether a Chief or not they did not wish to express views in favour of Federation. Intimidation was general.

Now that the Monckton Commission is to consider what should be done to improve federation, I wish to give evidence. I am convinced that the Federation has been a success and beneficial to the country.

I feared about the Native Policy that it might be an issue which might create difficulties. Today it is far from what I thought. Southern Rhodesia since it accepted federation on partnership card, has made such concessions that to break or scrap the federation would only show the rest of the components did not wish it to work. As I have stated in the earlier remarks, I instituted the anti-Southern Rhodesia when I had not known exactly what the Europeans then were doing for the Africans. It was only when I visited Southern Rhodesia that

I realised I was wrong and since federation I am satisfied they are doing everything possible to meet the policies of the northern territories and it is up to the two territories to respond.

One of the other points I raised to both Colonial Secretaries under Labour and Tories, was leadership. This is now in practice in that already one African of the federal governing party is a Minister and as this man continues to show a sense of responsibility I have no doubt there will be further openings for Africans in the federal sphere. Besides two Africans are now in London discharging duties of greater responsibilities. It does not matter whether they have come from Southern Rhodesia or Northern Rhodesia. The fact is Africans are being associated fully in the affairs of the Federation and it is up to them to show a sense of responsibility that they can be of use to the country as are the Europeans doing.

I realise education is a thorny question but I think if the Commission can recommend for it to become federal, the Commission will be rendering a good service. I regret it was not federal and I blame nobody but those who refused to see other peoples' point of view. Those Africans who refused to discuss the scheme at the commencement of Federation made a great error. This should not be left out of Federal sphere at the next review.

With regard to the economic set up in Nyasaland, this is one of the questions I referred to Mr. Creech-Jones and Mr. Griffiths in my memoranda both as leader of African Congress and as independent person. As I have said earlier, I have 35 years as a political leader to my credit and during this period I have been as much concerned about the welfare of my own race as any other African in this country. I have done this not only by speaking for my race but by offering employment to my people and this dates actually from 1932 when I first obtained a contract for brick-making from the Nyasaland Government. Since then I have been employing people of my own race and I am now employing them from 70 to 150 persons per month depending how I can afford. Anyone trying to defeat this argument is welcome to see what I do for my labour at my farm and I go a long way to say if the Monckton Commission is to be of great help to Africans, a visit to my farm will convince them that the case for Nyasaland is not political but for economic development of the country. At the same time see what any of these loud speakers are doing for their people. I have told the Colonial Secretaries of State that what is primarily wanted is economic development of the country.

If I am permitted to ask the Commission, will it tell me why, if the Africans are totally opposed to anything Southern Rhodesian there is a steadily growing number of migrant labour seeking work in Southern Rhodesia greater than it was some years back when the case of federation was being talked about. For instance about 1946, 35,000 Africans left for work in Rhodesia or South Africa that is a time when no one was talking loudly about federation and 10 years after, that is in 1956, about 75,000 left Nyasaland for work mainly in Southern Rhodesia—a country which is said to be oppressing them. This ever increasing number of Nyasas seeking employment in Rhodesias is an indication of how the Nyasas are dependent on Southern Rhodesia economy a point which I wish African Congress could have considered. In addition to this there has been marked industrial progress ever since Federation became operative in Nyasaland. So far, just to mention a few openings, we have Cement, Biscuit, Netting, Textile, Sweet and Cotton Seed Oil and Cattle cake factories which have been established and which show that once there is a common union, much could be done for the future of the country. Therefore I say if there is a country which has derived benefit from federation, Nyasaland is one of those countries. My only regret is that Industries which could have turned Nyasaland into a most promising unit of the Federation continue to be established or centralized in the Rhodesias and the Commission should make a note of this.

It is true there are a few Africans who think they can run the country. These people do not represent the true feeling of the masses. They take advantage of the ineffectiveness of the Nyasaland Government to run a country fairly well. I indicated this to the delegation from the United Kingdom Branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association when they visited the country some two or three years ago, the same remark I made to the Colonial Secretary in 1957 and also to the Governor of Nyasaland in February, 1958. I said that the main cause of continued unrest in Nyasaland is the Government policy of trying to please a few African extremists at the expense of the right principles.

My recent visits around the Southern Province and two districts in the Central Province convinced me that the masses and the Chiefs or Native Authorities do attach more importance to the continued leadership of Europeans than any other community or race in Nyasaland. What they do regret is that the Federal Government, which has the means to create prosperity, is not directly concerned with their day to day problems. It is therefore my considered opinion that if Federation is to go as I wish it to, African affairs must be in the hand of the people on the spot and not 6,000 miles away.

There is another point I wish to cover very briefly. This is the suggestion that one-man-one-vote will solve the problems of the country. In fairness to my own people, I say this is not so. Nyasas have many years to come of training. The introduction of indirect rule was a step towards this end but so far educated Nyasas have never tried to interest themselves with the set up of indirect rule. In 1953 I made suggestions to the Nyasaland Government that a minimum of £180 or £250 per annum be the requirements for training of Africans as voters if such was introduced. Also that by tradition Native Authorities or those people with great standing in society should qualify for a vote. As an educational qualification I preferred standard VIII but my supporters indicated that Standard VI should be the minimum. I still hold these views. One-man-one-vote is foreign to native traditional way of life.

I should add that I have had considerable personal experience of being intimidated since I left African National Congress in 1949. Serious violence has been used against my wife, myself and my property on several occasions. On one occasion my wife and I were actually threatened by African members of the Nyasaland Police while in the police lines for protection. I can give details of intimidation and violence used on myself and others to the Commission which will prove that the African extremists do use violence deliberately to suppress opposition. I am convinced that, but for this, there would be wide African support for Federation.

Oral Evidence

C. J. MATINGA, M.F.P.

CHAIRMAN: Would you like to add anything to the memorandum?

A: There was one important point which was omitted about the African Affairs Board which I wished to stress because I never welcomed it for various reasons.

Q: Could you tell us your reasons for not welcoming it?

A: My reason for not welcoming it was this, that if you are running a Government and you have some spies trying to check your movements you find that any person who is a Prime Minister would either dissolve Parliament or disband the Affairs Board. I must say that possibly I was right because I found out that in most of the legislation we have never found anything that discriminated. But the main point why I did not welcome it was this: that if you are running the country on the basis of partnership, there is no need to try to have partnership because it shows that behind the back the European does not wholly welcome the African; if you do welcome the Africans and you feel that an African can play an important part in the structure of the Federation, there is no need to have an African Affairs Board. With my experience during the last year I am fully convinced of that and when your recommendations are being studied I would like to stress that point that the African Affairs Board should be disbanded.

Q: Would you substitute anything for the African Affairs Board, some safeguard of rights of minority communities?

A: Depending whether there are some motives which one should feel that the European did not welcome the Africans as part and parcel of our Federation, then you may have some safeguards. Judging from experience, particularly from Nyasaland, I find that the Europeans are willing and prepared to share. By partnership, if you think that we are going to work together, then a stage might come when an African will take a greater part, perhaps becoming one of the Prime Ministers, perhaps take a major share in the statutes of the country and there is no need to have safeguards. Those safeguards show that the other races do not welcome the Africans and therefore they must be guarded, but, as I say, with my experience in Nyasaland I am fully convinced that the Europeans there are willing to work together with the Africans and therefore safeguards are not necessary.

Mr. GONDWE: Do you say the same applies to this country?

A: From the little I have seen, there is one point which surprises some of us and that is since the Rhodesian people accepted Federation on a referendum, they are prepared and they are trying to do their bit to break pin-pricks which still have been obstructing our relationship. Looking from those angles, I do think that they are willing to meet the Africans, but there is a point you have to appreciate that from the early days they designed their legislation in order to administer the country, and the removal of those conceptions might be a long process. They just cannot be wiped out in one day. For instance, when we go in the Post Office we find that we can queue with the Europeans without somebody creating ill-feeling. So I could not say wholly that the Europeans are prepared but there are some people who are willing to accommodate the Africans as equals in society. The cause of discrimination was the African white policy coming from South Africa running possibly right up to Cairo, but with Central Africa rebelling from those policies.

CHAIRMAN: Would you agree there remain quite a number of pin-pricks?

A: Yes, There used to be and there still are but the way is being prepared to meet the people.

Q: Do you think a process of eliminating these pin-pricks could be accelerated or do you think the pace could not be forced?

A: Here where you have people of different cultures meeting together you cannot just do it overnight. It is a case for me to understand the European way of life and the European to understand the African way of life, and that will take a little longer.

Q: Do you think there is a genuine desire on the part of the bulk of Europeans in Southern Rhodesia to remove these pin-pricks to see there is no discrimination?

A: That is a difficult question to which to say Yes or No. But here again you have on the one side African extremists and on the other European extremists.

Q: You think there is no need for an African Affairs Board because you think there is no intention of the European majority in the Legislature to discriminate against the African?

A: I should have given this evidence in Blantyre where I can give you documents from Colonial Secretaries, which were presented in 1951. Having studied the federal scheme, I said that by creating the African Affairs Board you are creating suspicion among Africans; if you have got a genuine desire to implement partnership, you do not need to have the African Affairs Board because that again does question whether you would create racial strife. The African might deliberately bring a point to say this is discriminatory, and they will stick to that, and the other people will say the African people are ungrateful. Then again, whoever may be leading the Government will say, "I am trying to do my very best to meet the African and you say my ways are discriminatory." The best way is to finish with the African Affairs Board and even to go to the country and ask for a new mandate. That is a point I made to James Griffiths in 1951. With my one year's attendance at meetings of the African Affairs Board, I did not find anything which was intentionally discriminatory.

Q: Would you see any reason to have in the Constitution some Bill of Rights?

A: Yes, you could do, but that Bill of Rights should be for all races, not necessarily protecting one race at the expense of the other. I must say this, that I have always had in mind that if we are going to make the Federation a country where all races can work together, the best thing which we should do is to find out whether we are all citizens of the Federation. At present we have some people who are protected. From what? That is the point. That is what I find difficult. If you protect others, then there is something sinister with the other party. If they are prepared to work with the others you do not need any protection.

PROFESSOR CREIGHTON: I notice you suggest that African education should become a federal subject. Are there any other changes that you would like to make in the distribution of powers as between the Federation and the Territories?

A: That has been one point, again, which I put already to Mr. Griffiths and also to Mr. Hopkinson when he came. We are trying to build a common citizenship and a partnership. Then you create a Federal Government with all the best resources at its disposal and you say you can have money and do what you like, but do not look after the interests of the Africans. Nyasaland has not the best resources at its disposal: you say look after the interests of the African education. A suspicion is bound to arise that your intention is to create the African as a second-rate citizen, and I must say that I am fully justified in this suspicion because, taking Nyasaland as an example, since Federation that Federal Government has had a colossal sum of money to develop Coloured, Asian and European education in such a way that we came to suspect that the intention of Federation is still to make Africans second-rate citizens. If you are expecting the African to play a greater part in the future of the Federation, it is my view that African education must come within the scope of the Federal Government so that the money that the Federal Government is having must be fully shared with all the races, and the standard of education must be exactly the same. Take one point of view:

for some reason or other we have been so fortunate as to have one African become a Minister in the Federation, but if a man reached Standard III, the best standard he could reach, how can we expect him to play a greater part in the building of Federation if his education is limited to the primary stage? If Federation is going to be to the benefit of all, surely the Commission should recommend that African education must be a responsibility of the Federal Government.

In Nyasaland, where I am fully acquainted with the structure of African education, you will find that capital expenditure is about £30,000 for over a period of five years. What can you do with £30,000 with a race which is developing? You are able to find capital expenditure on a vast scale in the Asian schools in the community which produce only 500 students a year whereas we are having every year about 30,000 to 40,000. That is where I suspect the whole intention is not to allow the Federal Government to develop African education.

Q: Are there any other Territorial powers you would like to transfer to the Federal Government?

A: I ask that Education must become Federal, and again one point, I just feel that the Police Force must become Federal.

Q: Would you explain why you feel that should be so?

A: We have a system whereby the head of the family becomes the person who determines your future. In those early days we trusted our Chief or Headman as a figurehead in uniting hands and protecting hearts, irrespective of belonging to this or that tribe. But in the modern society to run a country you have Police and you expect that Police should be an impartial body for the good of the society. To some of us we thought that too, but to express our feeling frankly we have come up against a difficult situation whereby I would support Federation for various reasons when some of our friends become so angry and say these people are doing this, we just discovered that the Police Force has not been wholly loyal to the Crown. They have been the medium of discrimination in Government policy or plans which they tended either to suppress Congress or they tended to be biased, and some of us have suffered by the Police themselves. In one instance I was travelling in a car and the Police called out to the people: "This is Matinga, the man who should be killed." If that is the position, the quicker we get the Police Force federalized, the better. I have tried to bring the case quite openly to various Police officers with no success, to try to stamp out that feeling, and I feel if we could have a Police which could protect the people it would be better. With those who suffered great difficulties with intimidation, had it not been that the Government appealed to the Federal Government for protection, we do not know what would have been our position.

CHAIRMAN: Why do you say there would be greater assurance of protection by the Police Force if it were federal and not territorial?

A: My experience is that there is a great difference between the British South Africa Police and the Nyasaland Police. Here you can report your secrets and they will never leak out, whereas in Nyasaland when I go and report secrets the next morning they are out.

Q: But if the Police Force was federal, you would feel the ranks of the Police Force serving in Nyasaland would be filled with men of the British South Africa Police?

A: Not necessarily, but you have a common policy and it is possible to switch the people in Nyasaland to meet friends, and once they have experience of how their friends are moving you will be able to have a common policy.

Q: You would transfer some away from home where local loyalties would no longer affect them?

A: Yes.

MRS. HUXLEY: You have mentioned in the memorandum the question of intimidation. As a result of that and other reasons, there is widespread opposition, is there not, as you know probably better than anyone, to Federation? How would you go about trying to convert the people of Nyasaland to support Federation?

A: When we talk about secession or anti-Federation, it is not the case that we are speaking for the whole community of Nyasaland. You have a few intellectuals who have the feeling that once Federation fails they will come on the top. Then you have the traditional element who are actually working in chorus with the Government and these people do not want Federation. Immediately after the emergency was declared, about May, I went round all the Native Authority centres in the Southern Province and I tried to find the feelings from the Chiefs, whether they were behind this, and they told me they were against it. I said: "Are you prepared to get Federation broken?" Vast numbers of people—in fact, in my first tour all except two Chiefs—said: "We do not want to break Federation. What would happen to our people if we break Federation? Where are they going to work? We have no complaint about that. The position is this: that the Government said, say what you like in 1951, and of course we followed what the leaders of the Congress said, "Do you not accept Federation." And we just answered what Congress said; we never supported them, we did not express our views." I went through the whole of the Southern Province. I found the expression just the same.

Q: You think under the surface people do not want to break but in the meantime how would you feel with the Malawi Congress which has great influence?

A: If Malawi people were enjoying a widespread support, why do they resort to intimidation? I do not think any Malawi could stand on the platform and say that the whole country is behind them. The very fact that they have adopted an attitude of intimidation just shows that they do not enjoy the support of the community. Of course, there is one point which I stated earlier, that when this question came up I was the only person in Nyasaland and Rhodesia, about 1935, who created that feeling. Nobody asked me why. It is just the same thing when you are asked why do you not want Rhodesia; they will tell you the reason why. The only point they could do is to say we would be forced to carry a situpa. Even if we examine the situpa it is not sinister in itself. We had experience in Nyasaland about 1930 on the road going to Zomba, a man was killed by a lorry. He had no papers and it was seven days before he was buried. The Government took a photograph and put it in all the papers but it took a month before he was identified; he was from an outside village. Then about 1947 there was a bus accident, so many people were killed and their papers remained at Lilongwe and they did not know where those people came from, except one from Fort Johnston who had a receipt. They telephoned the District Commissioner and he was identified within two days and he was buried, whereas the other bodies remained for a very long time. From my personal knowledge on most occasions when I have been to Southern Rhodesia I have entered here without applying for a local pass; I have never been asked for one. You have to take into consideration whether pass laws are really sinister, but I do agree that the implementation by Governments might create that situation. Something to assure that you are a citizen has to be adopted. The first thing any African is going to have is some sort of identification card; is there anything sinister in that?

MR. GONDWE: Would you agree that the difficulty in this respect with the situpa is that it only applies to one section of the community? If it applied to all sections of the community it would not be objected to by Africans in the Northern Territories?

A: I quite agree on that point.

MR. ROBINSON: Do you think there should be some sort of identity certificates for all citizens?

A: Yes.

MR. WOODROW CROSS: Europeans may not have to carry them but they have always their birth certificate or marriage certificate and they are required from time to time.

A: I will accept that. It is the sort of ticket which always must be stamped, that is the objection, but, as I say, again, that particular card itself is not sinister.

CHAIRMAN: You said that the Malawi Congress had resorted to intimidation and that it is widespread. How would you stop that intimidation? You said the expression against Federation was by people who had been intimidated to say they did not like Federation; how would you overcome that?

A: Just now it is too late. But there was a time when they could have suppressed it. But here you have a Government which possibly is too narrow to govern the three countries. They have been allowed to have publicity, they have given a free hand for the Malawi to do whatever they want without a deterrent.

We feel very sorry that the only people who have been shot dead and punished are those people who never belonged to African Congress, never belonged to Malawi, but people who were brought into friction because they were told if you do not come forward, when we take power we are going to kill you, and these people came forward, not to say they were against the Government, but they thought the country was in the hands of the Malawi. These people are very poor, they have no means, they have never been defended in the courts by legal experts, but money has been coming from Ghana in support of the Malawi and that has given the ignorant people an idea that the country is in the hands of the Malawi. It is that ignorance which has created all these situations. I do say that ignorance is a thing to which you cannot apply a yardstick; there is no limit. The only way is to try to rule the country in a way which people should really know that to commit a crime does not pay.

MR. GONDWE: You would say that the Malawi Congress Party at present is all-powerful in Nyasaland and that many people have just come to identify themselves with it? I agree with you in that respect, for fear of reprisals when Malawi takes over the Government because they think themselves that they will take over the Government in the very near future. Would you not say, Mr. Matinga, that the way to fight Malawi would be to have another strong political body established in Nyasaland whose aims would be acceptable to people in Nyasaland?

A: Yes, if you are dealing with an advanced society, I would agree that it is possible to do that. But here it is a country where fear is really ruling the community I have tried to think about that point; it is very difficult.

Perhaps Mr. Gondwe will remember as long ago as fifty years when Dr. Heatherwick was travelling from Mlanje to Zomba, he was with Professor Drummond, and in those days we had to carry loads. There was a man who was carrying about a 70 lb. load and the others about 50 lb., but amongst those people this one was the happiest. He went on the whole way, jumping, dancing, chanting, and Professor Drummond said: "I will give a fortune if I could know what is inside that person." But suddenly he said my mother or somebody else has died, I want to go away, and the man did not wait to be paid and he went away. That is the point as far as Nyasaland is concerned, the difference of civilization. Unless you know what is inside the African you will never be able to rule the country. It is exactly the same spirit which is amongst the people. The people say the country is ours. They say Dr. Banda is our king and our god and it is just as widespread. They say we are going to have self-government, but individually it means to say perhaps self-government will give them what they like, irrespective of what the law wants a man to do. That is where the situation is very difficult in Nyasaland.

Then again with the modern way of communication we get to hear in England that we have got the Secretary of State saying he is our champion and they believe he is the only man. But given a chance, the Labour Party got into power, is he going to act differently from what the Conservative Party agrees? I doubt that. As far as my experience is concerned, whether Tory or Socialist come to power it will make no difference to us. The reaction is, why should I look after my cattle? Why should I bow to the District Commissioner? Why should I pay taxes? Can you run a country without taxes? My own Chief was only able to do what you are doing up to 1928. Each year at the time of clearing the garden we had to work for nothing. Was this not a tax? We should not do just as we like yet today people are thinking that.

MR. ROBINSON: May I go back to the Police question? You made a very serious assertion about the Nyasaland Police, that when you were travelling in Nyasaland in the company of the Police, they called upon the people to attack you. I would like to know something more about that. To what extent have you been personally intimidated by the Police?

A: Except in one case which I did not report, all the reports have been put before the Government. The first time I did not realize—in December I was travelling from Fort Johnston and I was asked for a lift, I had no permit to lift anybody except my legitimate employees. This chap said: "I am a Policeman, I am on duty and there is a chap who committed a murder and I want to go and meet him at Kalambo." Then I felt I must help. I put him in the lorry. The first thing he told me was that he was going there to investigate this because they did not condone murders but he said: "I am going to resign, not only me but all the Police people we have are going to resign. We are only awaiting a word from the Congress about which time we are going to go." Then I got a bit nervous. I said: "Why?" He said: "Because we feel we cannot work any longer because we are underpaid and our people are subjected to biased influences and we do not want to become stooges." He did not know that I was Matinga. The first thing he said was: "A man like Matinga who is selling this country is the first man we are going to eliminate." I was sorry I had to carry him. The next morning I reported to the District Commissioner and gave him the instance.

Then on 26th April, 1959, my wife received a warning that she must leave quickly because the Congress were coming to break our house and stone her. She telephoned the Police and she insisted on having a European who refused to come and give her support. They said we cannot help you. Immediately going to the Club they started stoning and she went straight to the Limbe Police and told Mr. York, and Mr. York tried to make the European apologise.

The third instance was the day Dr. Banda was arrested. A crowd of over 200 came to my house. They broke my telephone wires and spoiled my house. My wife managed to escape. I was in, I came out with a shotgun and saw the crowd. They were full of hate. When they saw I had some weapon they ran out. Eventually my wife managed to report to the Police. It happened about 10 o'clock. About 4 o'clock the Police came. They took me. But while I was waiting in the Police Station the Constable started swearing and spoke all things; I felt very shocked. I told the Officer-in-Charge: "I am sorry, I would rather go and allow myself to be killed in my house because I cannot go to the Police location." They said they are not going to allow you. I realized that they were actually heavily committed. I went to the Police location. I stayed only one night. That night I was subjected to abuses by the Police. Next morning I rushed to where I lived and the next night the Police came to fetch me. I said I cannot stay because I am being abused by Police constables. I refused. I said: "I am not asking you for any protection."

Then there is the incident which I have related with the Police constable shouting: "This is Matinga who should be killed." It is very difficult for me to report right away, because I thought the news would go round right away. So I went round the Southern Province and finished my tour by which time I reported. They said they knew the chap, but whether they punished him or not I do not know. You may have a memorandum signed by Chief Mpana where a policeman was standing here and the Congress chap started threatening me and my friends and said: "Matinga is one who is doing this and should be killed." I ran from that place to my house, which is about eight miles away, quickly rang the Police and I insisted on a European, and a European policeman came and I reported all that had taken place with a Police constable standing by, and he took no steps to do anything.

Another incident was where four police constables were sent to arrest an African. The African happened to be a Rhodesian man and immediately they found the man they asked him: "Are you Matinga?" and they started beating and beating him so badly and assaulted him so heavily he was bleeding; he was sent to the Medical Officer and the Medical Officer thought that mere treatment would not suffice. He must be X-rayed. The case went to the experts where he was discharged; he was being arrested. This man had sued the Commissioner of Police but whether the Commissioner of Police has done anything about those people, I do not know.

Q: Have you made these complaints to official quarters, to the Government?

A: I have made in the House a statement that I am going to report, but except the one incident about these four people, the rest have been reported and no action has been taken. That is where people cannot express the view that they refuse Federation because of that policy. I do know so many people, not only in Blantyre but throughout the country, who are being intimidated on those lines with full knowledge of the Police, and no action is taken.

CHAIRMAN: Thank you very much.

A: I do hope your findings will be in the best interests of the Federation rather than a section, because I do believe as far as Nyasaland is concerned the Colony is most backward, and you should try and consider how best a country could be developed either out of Federation or within the Federation.

G. F. SURTEES

Mr. Surtees said that he had been born and educated in England, and had since served in the R.A.F. in the United States and Canada. He had first seen racial partnership in practice in the United States. Subsequently he had come to Southern Rhodesia, where he had been farming for nine years, and after that four years in the transport business. His views represented those of the average Rhodesian: he was not a member of any political party.

The witness made the following further points:—

1. Although his first impression of Africa was that Africans were not getting a square deal, he had come to the conclusion that they were not in fact being unfairly treated. Although there was an occasional African of exceptional ability, the average was low, and only fifty years ago they were completely uncivilised. It was unreasonable to expect them to reach a full state of civilisation overnight.

2. It was difficult to bring them to further advancement on purely European lines; for example, they did not regard being sent to prison as a social stigma in the same way that the European did. Witchcraft and superstition were still very important to them.
3. The European in Southern Rhodesia took a great pride in his country, and was more politically minded than his opposite number in the United Kingdom. He regarded the difficulties he faced as a challenge to show the rest of the world what could be done. In this partnership between African and European was essential, and neither could make progress without the other.
4. Qualifications for the franchise should be on a non-racial basis; Europeans should not qualify for the vote unless they deserved it.
5. If the Federation broke up there was a grave danger that Southern Rhodesia would be forced into closer association with the Union of South Africa. This was the last thing they wanted. Moreover, Nyasaland would be quite unable to stand on its own feet economically, and it was the duty of the Federation to do everything in its power to help Nyasaland to advance.

CHIEF CHINAMORA ZWIMBA

The witness said that they were very thankful for some of the instructions issued under the Land Husbandry Act. Better methods of ploughing and the use of such things as cattle manure and compost were benefiting many people by providing improved crops. Nevertheless, there were very difficult points arising from the Land Husbandry Act, in particular the limitation of the numbers of cattle. In the reserves, people had multiplied and there was not now sufficient ground for all to cultivate. They recognised that some people would have to live permanently in the towns, but there should be land available for people to come to when they were no longer able to work in factories. He would ask the Government to look urgently at this problem before the congestion on the land became too great.

In answer to questions, the witness made the following further points:—

- (a) The maximum land holding in the reserves was 12 acres, and the minimum was 4 acres. The amount actually given to individuals depended on the demand in a particular reserve.
- (b) Many people came to the Chiefs to ask for land to cultivate in the reserves. Such people might have been in the towns when the allocation of land took place. It was very difficult for a father if his own son had been deprived of land in this way.
- (c) The provision of more land was a matter for the Government; something should be done to provide more land as a matter of urgency.

CHIWESHE RESERVE COUNCIL—Shadreck Mokom Bochoto, Isaac Magunji and Andrew Whata

The witnesses said that the people in the Chiweshe Reserve were very crowded; there were upwards of 20,000 people in a very narrow area, with an estimated capacity for 18,000 head of cattle. The people were asking for two things: they wanted more land to plough, and they wanted more schools. At present there were fifteen junior primary schools from Sub A to Standard III, but only one senior primary school. If they could have two secondary schools, this would relieve the pressure on other secondary schools elsewhere.

The land in the Chiweshe Reserve had not yet been allocated, but there was not enough land for all the people living there. There was some undeveloped European land adjoining the Reserve, and this should be bought by the Government from local farmers to be added to the Reserve.

DOCUMENTS APPENDED*

1. Paper by Sir Charles Cumings, K.B.E., on the Franchise.
2. Action and Achievement being the Principles and Programme of action of the United Federal Party for the Federal General Election, November 1958.
3. Principles and Policy of the United Federal Party for the Southern Rhodesia General Election, June 1958.
4. Principles and Policy of the United Federal Party for the Northern Rhodesia General Election, March 1959.
5. Statement of Policy and Principles of the United Federal Party, Nyasaland Division, 1959.
6. Constitution of the United Federal Party.

Introduction

1. This memorandum is presented by the Federal Standing Committee of the United Federal Party (for short the U.F.P.) on behalf of the Party as a whole. It will treat mainly of what may be termed the Federal aspects of the Constitution. Territorial aspects will be dealt with by the three Territorial Standing Committees of the Party in separate memoranda.

2. The U.F.P. embraces people of many shades of opinion who are in broad agreement on matters of principle and major policy, but naturally have some diversity of opinion on matters of detail. Some members of the Party will give evidence independently, and their evidence will probably differ in certain respects from the case here presented.

3. It is the policy of the U.F.P. that the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland should be advanced to full membership of the Commonwealth as soon as possible. The Party recognises that this entails not only the removal of the powers reserved to the United Kingdom Government in relation to the Federal Government's sphere of action, but also advance to responsible or representative government in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland. It recognises also that this advance may have to come in stages, and that, as the Commission's terms of reference also recognise, there must be a "programme".

4. This memorandum is not concerned to prove that the Federation should be maintained in being, a matter which the U.F.P. respectfully submits is outside the Commission's terms of reference.

5. This memorandum will be concerned, in the main, with the removal of the reservations relating to the Federal Government, or as it will be termed hereafter "Independence in the Federal Sphere". It will deal only briefly with the distribution or redistribution of functions as between the Federal and Territorial Governments. It will be left to the Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland Standing Committees of the U.F.P. to elaborate the case for advance to responsible or representative governments for these territories.

6. Before proceeding to the main case some chapters will be devoted to background material namely:—

- (1) The history of Political Parties in the Federation, with special reference to the U.F.P.
- (2) The peoples of the Federation.
- (3) African attitude to Federation.

After setting out the case for independence in the Federal sphere, the memorandum will discuss "safeguards" which may be devised in place of the present reservations. It will go on to discuss the Federal Electoral Franchise and the reasons why it is considered that the present Electoral Act is a satisfactory basis for Federal elections.

Chapter I

The Scope of the Commission's Enquiry

7. The Commission is enjoined "to consider the constitutional programme and framework best suited to the attainment of the objects contained in the Constitution of 1953 including the Preamble." It is in fact only the Preamble which refers specifically to the objects for which the Federation was established. The fifth clause in the Preamble mentions among these objects—

- (1) "the security, advancement and welfare of all their inhabitants";
- (2) The fostering of "partnership and co-operation between their inhabitants"; and
- (3) the enabling of "the Federation, when those inhabitants so desire, to go forward with confidence towards full membership of the Commonwealth."

8. The Commission's task is to advise the five Governments in preparation for the Review provided for in Article 99 of the Constitution. When dealing with the meaning and purpose of this Article in the House of Commons on 24th June 1953 the Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Rt. Hon. Oliver Lyttleton (now Lord Chandos) said:

"I emphasize that this Conference is not to decide whether Federation should be abolished or discontinued. Nothing of the sort; it is a conference to make such alterations in the detailed working of the Constitution as experience of its work has shown to be necessary during this decade, the first decade of its life."

9. The U.F.P. believes that the Commission's terms of reference must be viewed in the light of the foregoing pronouncement, and also in the light of a joint declaration of the United Kingdom and Federal Governments of 27th April 1957 whereby it was agreed that:

"The purpose of this Conference is to review the Constitution in the light of the experience gained since the inception of the Federation and in addition to agree on the Constitutional advances which may be made. In this latter context the Conference will consider a programme for the attainment of such a status as would enable the Federation to become eligible for full membership of the Commonwealth."

10. To the extent that the lack of full responsible Government in either the Federal sphere or in any of the Territorial spheres is an impediment to the attainment of full membership of the Commonwealth, the 1960 Review Conference must include in the programme steps for the removal of such impediments. It would appear that the Commission, too, must have regard to these matters when it considers the Constitutional programme and framework.

11. It is clear from the Preamble to the Constitution that the task in which all five Governments, that is the United Kingdom Government, the Federal Government, and the three Territorial Governments, are concerned is to build within the boundaries of the Federation, and out of its diverse inhabitants a nation capable of taking its place as a full member of the British Commonwealth of Nations. This nation is to be based on partnership and co-operation between the inhabitants of the three territories.

12. The ultimate constitutional framework which the U.F.P. envisages for this Nation is a Federation in which the Federal Government is independent of the United Kingdom Government in the spheres of government which are federal, and the Territorial Governments have progressed to full self-government, independent of the United Kingdom, in the spheres of government that are territorial.

13. The U.F.P. submits that the Commission must consider this framework as a whole, and must also consider the programming of the various steps. It submits also that the grant of independence in the Federal sphere must be one of the first steps to be taken as a result of the 1960 Review.

Chapter II

The History of Political Parties in the Federation with Special Reference to the United Federal Party, its Constitution and Policy

14. As a general rule Constitutions and Laws which have a direct bearing on them such as electoral laws, are silent, or nearly silent, on the subject of political parties. The working of the Party Political System of any country is, however, of considerable importance in the study of its constitutional history and development. The successful working of the Constitutions of the United Kingdom and her associated Commonwealth Nations, as also of the United States of America and other foreign states, is dependent on the existence of a sound and responsible party political system.

15. The building up of political parties and the establishing of sound traditions in them is apt to be a slow and difficult task. This is the more so when some of the political leaders are heavily engaged at the same time in laying the foundations of sound government in a newly formed nation. The U.F.P. believes that on the whole the growth of political parties in the Federation has reached a stage when they effectively contribute to the proper working of Government and Opposition. It is therefore hoped that the following brief history will not be considered to be without value.

16. At the time when the Federation was inaugurated in 1953, there was a fairly well-developed party political system in Southern Rhodesia, where elections of members to a Legislative Council on a common qualitative franchise had been held during the period 1898-1923, and to the Southern Rhodesia Parliament from 1923-1953. In Northern Rhodesia elections on a much more limited scale had taken place for certain members of the Legislative Council in the period 1926-1953, but party political divisions among elected members did not run deep. Mr. Roy Welensky had formed a Northern Rhodesia Labour Party in 1941, but at the time of Federation there was no properly organised political party bent on securing the election of members of the Legislative Council. In Nyasaland before Federation, nothing in the nature of Parliamentary elections had ever taken place, and consequently there were no Parliamentary Political Parties. In Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland there were exclusively African political bodies known as the Northern Rhodesia African National Congress, and the Nyasaland African National Congress, but these evinced little interest in the respective Legislative Councils of these Territories.

17. In 1953 Lord Malvern—hitherto President of the United Party of Southern Rhodesia, and consequently Prime Minister of that Territory—took the initiative with Sir Roy Welensky, leader of the unofficials in Northern Rhodesia, and Sir Malcolm Barrow, leader of the unofficials in Nyasaland, to form the Federal Party. It was hoped that this Party would embrace persons of all shades of political opinion amongst those who had worked for Federation, and those who, although originally opposed to Federation, were prepared to strive to make it work. This hope was in a great measure realised, and the Federal Party at its outset included in its membership persons who had belonged to all the various political parties in Southern Rhodesia, besides persons interested in political matters in the other territories. From the outset the Party was non-racial, and it included European, African, Coloured and Asian members.

18. Lord Malvern had intended that the Party should confine itself to politics in the Federal sphere, so that the political divisions which had become manifest in Southern Rhodesia need not occur in the Federal sphere, where they might not have the same relevance. He considered that the existing Political Parties in Southern Rhodesia could remain as they were, or re-organise for the purposes of the Southern Rhodesia territorial elections. In the case of Northern Rhodesia, however, as there were no active political parties in existence, and a territorial General Election was due within a few months, it was considered that it would not be practicable to duplicate a party political system in both Federal and territorial spheres. It was decided that though primarily the Federal Party should engage in Federal elections, it could also engage in Territorial elections if it saw fit. At the outset it confined itself to the Federal aspects in Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, but in Northern Rhodesia its activities extended to the Territorial sphere also.

19. Meanwhile some of those persons who had been opposed to the formation of Federation banded together as the Confederate Party. This Party purported to operate in all territorial spheres, as well as the Federal.

20. In the first Federal Election held on 15th December 1953 the Federal Party won 27 out of 35 seats, including two African seats in Southern Rhodesia, while the Confederate Party won only one seat.

21. Meanwhile in Southern Rhodesia the United Party, led by Mr. R. S. Garfield Todd, combined with the Rhodesia Party to form the United Rhodesia Party, and won 26 out of 30 seats in the Election of February 1954. The Confederate Party had no success in this Election. In Northern Rhodesia in the Legislative Council elections during 1954, the Federal Party also won the majority of seats for elected members. In 1956 the Confederate Party disappeared, and a new opposition party grew up called the Dominion Party led by Mr. Winston Field. This Party operates in the Federal and Territorial spheres, and now has members in each Legislature except the Nyasaland Legislative Council. With the rise and growth of the Dominion Party a desire was evinced in the Federal and United Rhodesia parties, whose membership was virtually identical, for a merger, so that a united front could be made against the Dominion Party.

22. Eventually in October 1957 the Federal Party reconstituted itself as the United Federal Party, which would operate in the Federal and all Territorial spheres. The intention was to dissolve the United Rhodesia Party. Before the merger of the two parties was complete, a split occurred between Mr. Garfield Todd and his Ministers. The dispute was referred to a Congress of the Southern Rhodesia Division of the newly constituted U.F.P., as a result of which Sir Edgar Whitehead, Lord Malvern's former Minister of Finance, was elected as Territorial Leader, and became Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia in place of Mr. Garfield Todd, who, however, held office as Minister of Labour in his first cabinet.

23. The split in the ranks of the Southern Rhodesia Division was only temporarily healed, and in April 1958, following the defeat of Sir Edgar Whitehead at a bye-election, dissident members under Mr. Garfield Todd revived the United Rhodesia Party. A General Election then took place in Southern Rhodesia, when the U.F.P. under Sir Edgar Whitehead were returned with 17 out of 30 seats, the remaining 13 going to the Dominion Party. Mr. Todd and his U.R.P. candidates were totally defeated.

24. In November 1958 the Federal General Election took place for the enlarged Federal Assembly of 59 members. The U.R.P. did not contest this Election; the U.F.P. won 47 seats, and the Dominion Party 8 seats. As regards the 12 African seats, the U.F.P. won 3 of the 4 in Southern Rhodesia, the Dominion Party won the remaining seat. The U.F.P. won the 2 elected African seats in Northern Rhodesia. The other two African seats in Northern Rhodesia, which are controlled by a purely African electoral college, were won by Independents, who belong to the Northern Rhodesia African National Congress. The U.F.P. also secured the 4 African seats in Nyasaland, all of which were unopposed, the Nyasaland African National Congress having decided to boycott the Elections. Here it may be mentioned that the African National Congresses of the three Territories have never directly participated in Federal Elections, though in the case of the two African members for Northern Rhodesia, whose election is controlled by a purely African electoral college, the African National Congress is believed to have exerted a large influence.

25. In Nyasaland the first Territorial Elections ever to take place were held in 1956 for 6 non-African members of the Legislative Council. At this stage the U.F.P. had not decided to intervene in Territorial Elections in Nyasaland, and the six seats were won by Independents. Five of these were in fact members of the U.F.P. and the sixth subsequently joined the U.F.P. None of the African members, whose election is in the hands of purely African electoral college, was a member of the U.F.P.

26. In Northern Rhodesia the general election of the Legislative Council under the new 1958 constitution was held in March 1959. The U.F.P. won 13 seats, the Dominion Party 1 seat, the Central Africa Party 4 seats. The last mentioned Party was formed in 1958 and incorporates the revived U.R.P. with Mr. Garfield Todd as Federal Leader, and Sir John Moffat as Leader of its Northern Rhodesia Division. At the Northern Rhodesia General Election for the first time the African National Congress participated in the elections in the special constituencies in which only African candidates were nominated. They secured the return of their Leader, Mr. Harry Nkumbula.

27. The present state of the parties in the Federal and Territorial Legislatures is as follows:

Assembly	Type of Seats	U.F.P.	D.P.	C.A.P.	A.N.C.	IND.	Total
Federal Assembly ...	African ...	9	1	0	0	2	59
	Open ...	37	7	0	0	3
S. Rhodesia Assembly ...	All seats open to members of any race ...	17	13	0	0	0	30
N. Rhodesia Leg. Council	African ...	2	0	2	1	3	22
	Non-African ...	11	1	2	0	0
Nyasaland Leg. Council ...	African ...	0	0	0	5	0	11
	Non-African ...	0	0	0	0	* 6
* of these, 5 were always U.F.P. and 1 joined later		76	22	4	6	14	122
Total ...		+ 6				- 6
Total ...		82	22	4	6	8	122
Of which there are:	Africans ...	11	1	2	6	5
	Non-Africans ...	71	21	2	-	3

It will thus be seen that the U.F.P. has

- more than twice as many elected members as all other parties in the Federation;
- more elected members in each Assembly than any other party;
- more elected African members than any other party.

U.F.P. Constitution and Policy

28. The Constitution of the U.F.P. admits to membership persons of any race and whether citizens or British Protected Persons. Branches of the party may be confined to one sex or to one race, but branches are encouraged to extend their membership to both sexes and all races. Persons of all races have been elected to the Standing Committees of the Party. Copies of the Constitution of the Party as printed in 1958 are annexed.

29. The U.F.P. policy in electoral matters is that political divisions should be based on Party not on race. While accepting the reservation in the Federal Assembly of 12 seats for Africans and 3 for Europeans to represent Africans, the U.F.P. believes that ideally there should be no racial tags attached to Parliamentary seats. The Constitution Amendment Act 1957 consequently provides a means whereby these special representatives for one race will eventually "fade out". Meanwhile the Party put forward candidates for these special seats wherever possible, and it was pleased that the Dominion Party did likewise, and that the Government and Official Opposition both have African Parliamentary representation in their ranks.

30. The U.F.P. policy statements as printed for the Southern Rhodesia General Election June 1958, the Federal General Election November 1958, and the Northern Rhodesia General Election March 1959, together with a short summary of policy for Nyasaland published in mid-1959, are annexed.

Chapter III The People

31. The Federation is the home of two main races—African and European—plus a smaller number of Asians and persons of mixed descent referred to as Coloured people. The Preamble to the Constitution makes it clear that the area comprising the Federation is the rightful home of all its lawful inhabitants, whatever their origin.

Population

32. The population at 30th June 1959 was estimated to be:—

	European	African	Other Races	Total
Southern Rhodesia ...	215,000	2,630,000	15,400	2,860,400
Northern Rhodesia ...	73,000	2,280,000	9,600	2,362,600
Nyasaland ...	8,800	2,750,000	12,100	2,770,900
Federation ...	296,800	7,660,000	37,100	7,993,900

33. The ratio of Europeans to Africans should be noted. In Southern Rhodesia it is 1 to 12, in the Federation 1 to 26. This compares with 1 to 100 in Portuguese East Africa, 1 to 100 in Kenya, 1 to 400 in Tanganyika, 1 to 600 in Uganda (the whole of East Africa averages about 1 to 215) and 1 to 200 in the Congo. The total of 334,000 non-Africans in the Federation may not seem many when compared with large cities in Britain, but their stake in the Federation is vast, their past achievements considerable and their future role vital not only for themselves but also for the advancement of the African. The size and permanence of the non-African community is one of the factors which distinguishes the Federation from most other states in Africa. It is because of this that methods which may be tried in more homogeneous societies should not necessarily be applied here.

34. Certain marked differences between the three racial groups should be noted.

Africans

35. When the Pioneers came into areas which are now within the Federation as recently as one life-span ago, they found an indigenous population consisting of a number of Bantu tribes sharply divided by tribal differences. The people were engaged in pastoral and agricultural pursuits, the work being performed largely by the women, the men being occupied in hunting and inter-tribal clashes. The Bantu had no written language and no form of education according to any recognised standards. They had erected no permanent buildings and could fairly be described as being in a primitive state.

36. African advancement began with the advent of the first Europeans and has continued ever since. Missionary organisations started rudimentary schooling and some elementary health services. These tasks were enormous because of the large number of Africans involved, because of starting absolutely from scratch without any foundations whatsoever upon which to build, because these activities were entirely new concepts which found no ready response in African minds, and because there was so little money available.

37. With the establishment of formal administration in each of the three Territories, the Governments gradually assumed responsibility for those and other services but progress, particularly in education, was very slow. In all three Territories missionary bodies still provide the greater number of schools with the aid of government subsidies.

38. For the reasons mentioned, the majority of the African people are still illiterate and have not made great progress in acquiring working skills. Many have tended hitherto to work for comparatively short periods, returning periodically to their rural homes for lengthy sojourns to attend to crops or cattle or family matters. Intermittent spells of work have meant the carrying forward of a minimum of accumulated experience. In all three Territories the majority of the African population exists in the Subsistence Economy—varying from 54% in Southern Rhodesia to 75% in Nyasaland. The average income in the Subsistence Economy is low. Wages in the money economy rise year by year, as does the degree of productivity per head. The average wages per African employee throughout the Federation is £80 a year.

39. African society is no longer an undifferentiated mass. From the lowly beginnings which have been portrayed herein, substantial progress has been made particularly in recent years. Although most Africans still have inadequate schooling, many are fully literate. A tendency towards greater responsibility in employment is discernible. A small number of professional men has emerged, consisting mainly of teachers, clergy and journalists. There is now also a class of African businessmen.

40. Many Africans, particularly those at the lower end of the scale, are more concerned with their material day-to-day affairs than with politics, but many others have recently started to show a political consciousness, some embracing extreme Nationalism whilst others are moderate and wish to co-operate with other races.

41. Very few African women are in employment (those few being mainly domestic servants) and very few take part in business or political affairs.

Europeans

42. The opening up of the countries which now comprise the Federation, and their conversion from wilderness into a modern state has been due in great measure to the energy, initiative, skill and capital of the Europeans who have made this their home. They have been greatly assisted by labour provided by Africans, sometimes poorly paid.

43. The European group provides most of the professional and technical men, financiers, businessmen and skilled artisans as well as an appreciable number of farmers and ranchers. The main avenues of occupation (including both principals and employees) are:—

Commerce and Finance	23%
Manufacturing	13%
Construction	12%
Transport and Communications	10%
Mining	9%
Government Admin. Services	9%
Agriculture	8%
Medical & Educational Services	7%
Other	9%

44. A high proportion of European women are gainfully employed. There are relatively few unskilled Europeans in the Federation, and not a great many who are only semi-skilled. The immigration policy of the Federal Government has been selective, designed to admit only those who could bring skill or capital to the common weal.

Asian and Coloured

45. Almost all the Asians in the Federation are merchants, with a small number of professional men, mainly a few doctors and teachers. Asian women do not seek employment except in shops owned by close relations.

46. Some of the Coloured men are self-employed, usually as cartage or other contractors rather than as traders. Some fill skilled occupations, whilst others are semi-skilled. Many Coloured women seek and obtain employment, frequently in factories and in semi-skilled jobs.

Educational Attainments

47. There are wide discrepancies in the level of education attained by the three main racial groups. By and large the general scholastic standard in the White section is high—probably no lower than in Britain. The selective character of immigration has maintained fairly high standards in this direction, and figures to be quoted shortly will show that European school-leavers in the Federation achieve satisfactory scholastic levels.

48. The attainments of the Coloured and Asian communities are not as satisfactory, the facilities for these people prior to Federation having been less good than for Europeans. There has been considerable improvement in the last six years, especially in Nyasaland where previously facilities were almost non-existent. In spite of past difficulties the Coloured and Asian people are literate, some achieving university levels.

49. African education is a territorial subject and there are some fairly wide differences in the attainments of the territories in this respect. In all three territories African education is only partial because the facilities do not yet exist to offer full range schooling to all African children. The current endeavour in Southern Rhodesia, for instance, is to provide five years' education (i.e. up to Standard 3) for rural children, and eight years' (up to Standard 6) for urban children, with secondary education and technical education on a selective basis.

50. Figures quoted in Appendix III show that progress in development of African education has a relationship with the ratio of Europeans to Africans in the population. Where this is highest, i.e. in Southern Rhodesia, the facilities provided for African education are the best and the enrolment of school children is the highest. More is in fact done pro rata for African education in Southern Rhodesia than in any other African country.

51. The following figures indicate the great differences which exist in the educational levels of attainment of the three groups:—

	Estimated Potential African School-children	Actual African School-children	Actual as Percentage of Potential 1958
Southern Rhodesia ...	510,000	449,000	88%
Northern Rhodesia ...	444,000	232,000	52%
Nyasaland ...	538,000	271,000	50%
Total ...	1,492,000	952,000	64%

52. Some African children do not remain long at school—the numbers drop rapidly with each higher standard.

53. Children leave school having attained the following standards:—

	European (Federation)	Asian and Coloured (Federation)	African (Nyasaland)* (estimated)
Proportion leaving school below Form III (Std. 8)	12%	77%	99·5%
Proportion leaving from Form III and above ...	88%	23%	0·5%

* Figures for Southern Rhodesia and Northern Rhodesia are not available, but will be better than those of Nyasaland.

54. School-leavers intending to go on to University or undergo professional training are (approximately):—

European	25%	} Results of survey
Asian and Coloured	10%
African (S. Rhodesia)	0·6%	} Estimated
(N. Rhodesia)	0·4%

Conclusion

55. One of the real problems in this part of Africa is poverty and the Governments must find means whereby all the inhabitants can enjoy continuously rising standards of living, with the greatest immediate progress at the lower levels. Poverty is a relative term and it should be noted that, although the incomes of the mass of people are so small, some of them have in their link with the land and in their native customs a form of social security which saves them from the harsh effects of poverty as it is known in parts of Asia and even at times in depressed areas in western countries.

56. The facts disclosed in this chapter also indicate the vital necessity to press forward even more vigorously with African education and training. To close the gap between European and African levels in all directions is a necessary but monumental task. The United Federal Party believes that nothing would be gained (and much would be lost) if closing the gap were achieved by finding a common mean between the two levels. To reduce the standards of those above the mean—Coloureds, Asians and Europeans—would be of no service to any race in the country. The only course is to aim at building a state based on European standards, elevating the African people step by step until they reach European levels—to build up, not to tear down. By these means there could be achieved a harmonious community with all individuals judged according to their merits and where differences of race would be merely incidental.

57. The task of elevating the mass of the African people to European standards could not be accomplished by African Nationalists. The United Federal Party is unaware of their ever having produced any realistic policy or programme, or any practicable solution to the problems of their fellows. The progress of the Africans materially and politically, will continue to depend to a very considerable extent on their fellow European citizens' initiative and enterprise.

58. A start has been made and exciting progress has already been achieved. Its successful continuance will require wise political leadership and vast sums of money.

Chapter IV

African Attitudes to Federation

59. It seems clear from the terms of reference themselves, as well as from the Government pronouncements on them that the Commission is precluded from considering any scheme for the dismemberment of the Federation or the association of its members in any other way. Evidence of the opponents of Federation directed to achieving these objects will presumably be disregarded for such purposes.

60. Nevertheless the attitude of the people of the Federation to the form of government they enjoy has a bearing on the constitutional changes to be discussed by the Commission, and the attitude of Africans in particular, owing to the weight of their numbers, is of such importance as to warrant special treatment.

61. It is commonly supposed that the majority of Africans are opposed to Federation. The U.F.P. believes that relatively few Africans have much, if any, appreciation of the meaning of Federation or any understanding of the constitutional issues involved.

62. In none of the African languages are there words to denote the most ordinary juristic or constitutional concepts. It would be impossible through the medium of African languages to give any adequate description, for example, of the difference between a federal and a unitary state. Relatively few Africans have a sufficient knowledge of English to enable them to grasp explanations of matters of this kind.

63. Apart from language difficulties the ideas involved in constitutional concepts are themselves strange to people whose contact with government is very remote, and who, in the vast majority of cases have never exercised the vote in parliamentary elections.

64. That there are some Africans who are well capable of understanding the niceties of these constitutional questions is not disputed. Even in such cases, however, few, if any of them, would have much practical experience or expertise in matters of government.

65. Whether or not they have any appreciation of the meaning of Federation or of the constitutional issues it is certain that many Africans are ready to denounce Federation. The U.F.P. believes that opposition has been fanned up. 'Federation' is blamed for all sorts of matters. Grievances, whether of territorial or federal origin are attributed to Federation. If there is a drought or failure of crops this is likely to be attributed to Federation. In the minds of some Africans Federation is an evil looming up in the future from which their leaders are protecting them. Others believe that it is a state of affairs which exists in some other territory but which has not yet reached Nyasaland.

66. It is respectfully submitted that if evidence is received disclosing opposition to Federation the witness should be tested about his understanding of that term, and also as to the reasons which prompt his dislike or opposition.

67. The U.F.P. believes that essentially the real opposition to Federation on the part of African leaders stems from their desire for the creation of separate independent African states on the lines of Ghana. They believed that Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia were destined for such a future, and the inauguration of Federation frustrated their hopes. The setting up of a larger multiracial state based on partnership has no appeal to them because they have become obsessed with a narrower African nationalism. They do not wish to share the government with European "settlers".

68. It is important to realise that the African nationalists have this much in common with the European "settlers"—both desire to see the disappearance from the scene of the Colonial Office type of administration. Europeans and moderate Africans however would like to see it replaced by responsible governments in which both races have a share, and in which responsibility implies a certain degree of civilisation and experience in political and administrative matters. African nationalists would like to see it replaced by African dominated governments based on the enfranchisement of the illiterate masses.

69. The U.F.P. believes that the African Nationalist leaders who seek independence for Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia outside the Federation have given little thought to the economics or the practical realities of the situation. They have not considered the lack of experience in politics or administration in their ranks. They have not given any thought to questions of policy or finance. If questioned about the viability of their countries they take refuge in the thought that the United Kingdom, the U.S.A. or the U.S.S.R. will see them through, it does not matter which. They feed their followers on slogans such as "Poverty with freedom is better than riches with slavery".

70. The U.F.P. submits that the lack of responsibility of African nationalist leaders is amply demonstrated by their utterances in the debates recorded in the Nyasaland Hansards.

71. It is abundantly clear that African nationalists have resorted to widespread distortion of the truth in their propaganda and to intimidation, threats and violence directed at all Africans who do not agree with their policy or submit to their desires. The recent disturbances in Nyasaland are evidence of the intention of certain African nationalist leaders to subvert the Constitution. It is significant that when a number of these leaders were removed from circulation it became possible for moderate Africans to join the U.F.P. in substantial numbers, when previously they were fearful to do so.

72. An appendix is attached (Appendix IV) setting out the proved activities of the African National Congress movements in each of the three territories.

73. Unfortunately the recrudescence of the Malawi Congress Party has given rise to further intimidation and violence as evidenced by threats and violence directed to persons appointed to the Nyasaland legislature and other bodies.

74. The most plausible reason given by African nationalists for their opposition to Federation is that it has resulted or will result, in bringing to Northern Rhodesia or Nyasaland the race policies of Southern Rhodesia. Similarly it is suggested that the Federal Assembly and Government are dominated by Southern Rhodesia.

75. An examination of the record of Southern Rhodesia will show that this Territory has had a remarkable record of good race relations. There has been very little in the way of racial riots or disturbances since 1896. Southern Rhodesia has by far the largest European population of any Territory in the Federation and its legislation in regard to African Affairs has followed a pattern somewhat different from that in the other Territories.

76. The U.F.P. believes, however, that even before Federation, the attitudes of Europeans to other races were changing. Since Federation and the emphasis on Partnership as the policy in race affairs, there has been a pronounced change in the attitude of most Europeans which has given an impetus towards the removal of discriminatory practices. No doubt much remains to which exception can be taken but no person of goodwill can deny that in Southern Rhodesia, as in other Territories, there have been considerable changes, since Federation, in the direction of which Africans would approve. The U.F.P. believes that so far from Federation resulting in discriminatory practices being carried from Southern Rhodesia to other territories it has in fact resulted in less discrimination all round.

77. As for the suggestion that the Federal Assembly and Government are dominated by Southern Rhodesia, this is demonstrably untrue. The representatives of no single territory have a majority in the Federal Assembly but in any event voting there has never proceeded on Territorial lines. In the Government, the first Federal Prime Minister was indeed a Southern Rhodesian but he was succeeded by one whose whole political life before Federation was spent in Northern Rhodesia.

78. Turning to the Public Services it will be found that several of the most senior members were drawn from the civil services of the Northern Territories.

The Emergencies of 1959

79. The declaration of a State of Emergency in Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland and the proscription of the Zambia National Congress in Northern Rhodesia, followed by the detention of large numbers of Africans in Southern Rhodesia and in Nyasaland and the restriction orders made in Northern Rhodesia, coupled with the rioting which took place in Nyasaland and entailed the use of police reinforcements besides the Defence Forces, have combined to make many people in the United Kingdom wonder whether it is right to keep the Federation in being or whether one or more Territories should be allowed to secede. Some of these people have been inclined to blame European "settlers" for the disturbances. They would urge that these recent events indicate at least that the Federation should not be allowed any advance in status at the present time.

80. It should be pointed out that the States of Emergency were declared by the Territorial Governments on their own initiative as they have the primary function of preserving law and order. This action was necessitated because of subversive movements directed at the overthrow of the governments of the Territories and the Federation. The U.F.P. believes that the disturbances were not due to any genuine grievances, or any defect in the Constitution or the administration of government, but were due simply and solely to the action of African Nationalist leaders attempting to force the United Kingdom to allow Nyasaland to become an independent African State regardless of the consequences to its people.

81. It is submitted that the great mass of Africans have no real understanding of the issues at stake and if left to themselves would be willing to accept Federation on the present basis and even on a basis of its attaining advanced status. African opposition is based on narrow African nationalism which if given way to would be disastrous for all concerned. Given a clear and definite indication that Federation is permanent and firm government which shows that agitation, violence and intimidation will not be tolerated, and given good and just government which responsible political leaders in the Federation can supply, most Africans throughout the Federation will accept the situation with a good grace.

82. The grant of Independence in the Federal sphere and of an increased measure of responsible self government in the Northern Territories will be the best means of gaining the loyalty to Rhodesia and Nyasaland of the majority of its African inhabitants.

Chapter V

The Case for Independence in the Federal Sphere

83. The ultimate destiny of the Federation recognised in the Preamble to the Constitution is full membership of the Commonwealth and this entails more than Independence in the Federal sphere. It entails also self government by the constituent territories. The U.F.P. is pledged to strive for the attainment of both these objectives. It recognises that in the special circumstances of the Federation it may be necessary to advance by stages towards the ultimate destiny, although events in relation to other states in Africa suggest that progress may have to be more rapid than was at one time thought to be practicable.

84. The U.F.P. believes that as a minimum it will be necessary as a result of the 1960 Review for the United Kingdom to concede to the Federal Government its Independence in the Federal sphere. This step ought preferably to be accompanied by substantial changes in the Constitution of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland in the direction of responsible or representative government.

85. The Party believes that there are in fact cogent reasons for the early concession to the Federation of a much wider and fuller status—a status compatible with full membership of the Commonwealth. As a concession of Independence in the Federal sphere is part of the process of gaining Commonwealth status, these reasons will be stated in their wider context before setting out specifically the reasons for conceding the narrow form of Independence as a first step.

86. It has been, for many years, the avowed policy of successive Governments in the United Kingdom to advance the various British Colonies and Protectorates in Africa and elsewhere to full self Government. This policy is being rapidly implemented. All over Africa erstwhile dependencies of the United Kingdom are being advanced to independent status. The same policy is being pursued even more rapidly by certain other metropolitan powers. In some cases the territories concerned have had a measure of self government and some experience in the workings of a legislature based on a franchise system, having a more or less close kinship with British Parliamentary institutions. In others they have had little or none of this experience.

87. Before Federation came about in 1953 Southern Rhodesia had enjoyed virtual self government for 30 years, and had indeed attained such a status that her Prime Minister for many years regularly attended the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conferences. Had Federation not come about there can be no doubt that, in keeping with developments elsewhere in Africa, Southern Rhodesia would by now have attained full independence within the Commonwealth. In the interests of a wider Federation, however, Southern Rhodesia submitted to a delay and the Federal Prime Minister took the place of the Southern Rhodesia Prime Minister at the Commonwealth conferences.

88. Since 1953 several countries which had not until that time enjoyed nearly the same degree of self government as Southern Rhodesia have been conceded full independence, notably the Sudan, Ghana and Nigeria. Others appear to be on the verge of gaining, if not complete independence, a large measure of self government although they have nothing like the experience in the arts of Government as the people of the Federation. It now appears that the Belgian Congo which borders on the Federation is to receive full independence in 1960 despite the fact that there has hitherto been no semblance of parliamentary government within its borders.

89. It is the natural desire of any dependent country, except where its inhabitants are so primitive or backward as to have little political consciousness, to advance to independent nationhood or to link up with some other country and become a part of the self governing nation. Self government is in fact the general desire of the great majority of those inhabitants of the Federation who think about these matters. Some want it for the Federation as a whole, others want it for their own territories as separate entities. The U.F.P. is a party embracing members of the former group—the African National Congresses are parties of persons in the latter group.

90. In view of the rapid changes elsewhere in Africa the U.F.P. believes that it will be impossible, and in any event it would be most undesirable, to defer for long the advance to full self government of the Federation and its constituent territories. The choice must lie not between maintaining the Federation in a state of tutelage or giving it independence, but between giving independence to the Federation as a whole or allowing the Federation to disintegrate into independent fragments. The United Kingdom Government with the Governments of the Federation have put their hands to the plough of making a multiracial nation based on partnership between the races of the three territories and there can be no turning back now.

91. It is sometimes overlooked that nationalism in Africa north of the Limpopo is not confined to Africans. The purpose of the Federation was to make white and black nationalism flow together in a multiracial partnership, leading to a united nation.

92. It is inconceivable that the Federation should be the last geographical unit in British Africa, or perhaps in Africa as a whole, to escape from tutelage. It is inconceivable because one of the territories has for 36 years enjoyed almost full self government, and has demonstrated in the process a capacity for sound stable government which has produced a minimum of friction between the races. It is also inconceivable because the Federal Government for nearly seven years has also proved itself. How would it be possible to justify full self government to the Congo where there have hitherto been no parliamentary institutions, where none of the inhabitants have had experience in government, while denying it to the Federation? While it is natural for the people of a dependent country to desire to advance to full and independent nationhood, there are solid practical reasons why these aspirations should be conceded when the time is ripe.

93. Firstly government from a distance or attempts from a distance to curb the local government, are often ineffective or unwise. No government situated thousands of miles away can have a proper appreciation of the local circumstances, problems and difficulties. Clashes between external and internal politicians are inevitable.

94. Secondly if there is any form of dependent local government this cannot command the full respect and loyalty of its citizens if its decisions are liable to be interfered with by an external government.

95. Thirdly there is usually uncertainty about the future of a country which has not attained an independent status. This discourages both the inhabitants and potential investors or immigrants.

96. In the case of the Federation a strong case can be made out for the grant of full independence at a very early date. The U.F.P. is, however, conscious of the difficulty, without unseemly haste, of advancing Nyasaland in one step to full responsible government within the territorial sphere. In that Territory Africans, who form the vast majority of the population, have no experience whatever of elections, few have much educational attainment or practical experience to fit them for the responsibilities of government either as politicians or as public servants. It may, therefore, be premature to concede responsible government in the territorial sphere at one stroke.

97. Recognising this difficulty, the U.F.P. does not press the case for the immediate grant of such a status as would enable the Federation to apply for full membership of the Commonwealth. The Party does, however, press the case for the grant of independence within the sphere of government allotted to the Federal Government as being an essential step to the fuller status which is the ultimate destiny of Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

98. At the outset it is necessary to define Independence in the Federal sphere. The Federal Government is described in the Preamble to the Constitution as "responsible government". There are, however, certain restrictions in the constitution upon its freedom of action. The most important of these are:

- (i) The United Kingdom has the power to veto any Federal legislation and especially any such which has been reserved at the instance of the African Affairs Board.
- (2) The United Kingdom in strict legal theory can legislate for the Federation. In April 1957, however, the United Kingdom Government recognised the existence of a convention precluding it from exercising this power without the request of the Federal Government.

- (3) Federal legislation in conflict with U.K. legislation may in some circumstances under the provisions of the Colonial Laws Validity Act be ultra vires.
- (4) The United Kingdom Government has the final say in the appointment of the Governor-General who has important functions under the constitution.

99. It is proposed to set forth first the reasons why, in the opinion of the U.F.P., Federal Independence ought to be conceded by the United Kingdom at the 1960 Review, and then to examine suggestions for "safeguards" to take the place of the present restrictions.

100. It will be essential as a result of the 1960 Review to show to the people of the Federation substantial progress in the direction in which most of the countries of Africa are going—full nationhood. A concession of this nature would serve, as no other single step would serve, to show that the Federation is firmly established and that its break up will not be countenanced.

101. Unfortunately, the provision in Article 99 of the Constitution for a Review has had a most unsettling effect. It has afforded an opportunity for all the opponents of the Federation to renew their efforts to destroy it. In every country in the world where Federation has been embarked upon there has always been opposition, which has recurred at every suitable opportunity. In the case of Rhodesia and Nyasaland the 1960 Review gives impetus to the opponents of Federation. In the case of certain African opponents, in particular the African National Congresses, they have stopped at almost nothing to denigrate the Federation and to intimidate any Africans who would otherwise have been willing to co-operate to make it succeed. It is a remarkable fact that with the proscription of the Nyasaland African Congress it became possible for the U.F.P. to enrol about 2,000 African members in that Territory. With the recrudescence of the Congress in the guise of the Malawi National Congress, intimidation, threats and violence are on the increase.

102. Mere declarations about the permanence of the Federation have little effect on the African population when the opponents are able to point to the 1960 Review and suggest that this is the occasion for breaking up the Federation. The grant of independence in the Federal sphere would be a signal to the opponents of Federation that it is here to stay. It would restore confidence, as nothing else would do, to those who believe in the realisation of the purposes of the Preamble. This confidence would extend to the European inhabitants in the first instance, and to the outside investor whose capital is so greatly needed in the interests of development of the country for the benefit of all races.

103. Under present conditions it is extremely difficult for the Governments in the Federation to gain the confidence of the African inhabitants. These are an easy prey to the political agitators who opposed the creation of the Federation in many cases because this frustrated their hopes of Northern Rhodesia or Nyasaland becoming independent states, in the governments of which these same agitators would play a leading role. So long as the present reservations in the Federal Constitution remain these agitators can point to the existence outside the Federation of a superior government which will help the inhabitants against the Federal Government. This naturally tends to lower the prestige of the Federal Government. The grant of independence to the Federal Government would be a blow to those opponents of Federation and the U.F.P. believes that once it becomes impressed upon the African population that Federation is permanent, they would generally be willing to accept the position, especially as the material benefits became more apparent.

104. The grant of this concession by the United Kingdom Government would be taken by all as a strong indication that the United Kingdom Government is willing to trust the Federal Government. Trust is apt to beget trust and establish confidence all round.

105. The U.F.P. submits that a decisive declaration by the United Kingdom Government of its faith in the Federation is amply justified by the record of the Federal Government in the 6 or 7 years since Federation was inaugurated.

106. The tasks facing the Federal Government in 1953 were formidable. A completely new government machine had to be created and set in motion. A large volume of legislation had to be enacted. There were endless legal and financial problems to be solved. All this would have been difficult enough in a Federation where the territories were at the same general level of political and constitutional advancement, and the population of a homogeneous character. These conditions did not obtain in the Federation.

107. All this was efficiently accomplished. A Federal Public Service has been brought into being of a quality of which any country might be justifiably proud. The necessary legislation has been competently enacted. Two general elections have been successfully carried through. Although the cumbersome machinery necessitated by an awkward constitution has creaked it has never broken down. The record of the Government in its administration will bear comparison with that of any of the governments advanced to Commonwealth status since 1946. The United Kingdom Government could withdraw from the Federal scene secure in the knowledge that the Government here is conducted in the best British traditions free from corruption. Can the same be said of some of the other countries in Africa likely to attain complete independence at an early date?

108. One of the main tasks confronting the Federal Government was the enactment of a uniform Federal Electoral Act. This subject was naturally highly controversial. Before this law could be enacted it was necessary to get the agreement of the United Kingdom Government and the three Territorial governments to a constitution amendment which, amongst other matters, provided for the enlargement of the Federal Assembly. It is worthy of note that the Federal Government succeeded in getting the consent of four other governments to this controversial legislation. The U.F.P. believes that the Electoral law has done much to assist in the cause of establishing political partnership between the races. In particular it has directly associated European voters with African Members of Parliament with immense advantage to the cause of mutual understanding. It has also opened the way to British Protected Persons, who never before even in territories administered by the Colonial Office had enjoyed the right to vote.

109. Turning from the tasks of government to the political scene, a difficult task confronted the political leaders in laying the foundations of the political institutions so important to the proper working of government. Several political parties founded on the initiative of Europeans have been firmly established on a multiracial basis. They have encouraged Africans to play their part in the political life of the Federation with the help and guidance of those who have had experience in political parties carried on under the best British traditions.

110. In Commonwealth affairs the Federation has played its part by making contributions to imperial defence, and units from the Federation have seen service in Malaya and the Royal Rhodesian Air Force has served in the Middle East.

111. In the economic sphere the advantages of Federation are everywhere apparent. It is not suggested that the progress so noticeable on every hand stems directly from the Government, but it can fairly be claimed that the Federal Government provided sound administration under which private enterprise could flourish.

112. In addition, however, the Federal Government directly initiated the Kariba Dam project, gaining for it the largest loan hitherto made by the World Bank, a project shortly to be opened by Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother. This was one of a large number of capital projects undertaken by the Federal Government for which loan funds have been raised both inside the country and overseas. The point to be recognised is that the Federal entity is a much stronger economic unit than the sum of the three territories separately. Individually, the territories had vulnerable economies, but they were of a complementary character so that, brought together, they constitute a more balanced, a more widely spread, and viable economy. Federation is a much better risk, and therefore more able to raise money, than the territories separately, thus making it more easily possible to finance development projects in the areas where these are most needed. These are not necessarily the areas that would otherwise attract investment.

113. The existence of Federation with its greater economic stability leads to increased business activity and a large flow of taxes. This in turn makes it possible for revenue funds to be devoted for advancement purposes in those parts of the Federation which suffer the greatest need. For example, total Government expenditure on African education in Nyasaland in 1948 was £181,021, whilst in 1957 it was £981,254.

114. In the realm of social services the Federal Government has responsibility for non-African education, i.e. the education of Europeans, Coloureds and Asians. It has also responsibility for Health for all races. Before Federation the services maintained by the Territorial Governments differed greatly. The Federal Government has had a complex and difficult task in spreading its favours in the Territories. In particular it found that education of Coloureds and Asians in Nyasaland had been badly neglected. This has been rectified and a separate statement is annexed (Appendix I) showing what has been done in Nyasaland in this respect.

115. As regards health services the improvements which the Federal Government has been able to make in all three Territories are considerable. A statement is annexed giving details (Appendix II).

116. It is likely that some objections to the grant of Federal Independence will be based on the alleged African fears of the Federation being dominated by Europeans in general, or the Europeans of Southern Rhodesia in particular. The U.F.P. believes that there is no justification for these fears but that on the contrary it can be shown that where the European population is the greatest, African advancement in education and in material prosperity is the greatest. In Nyasaland where the ratio of Europeans to Africans is very small the least progress has been made in these fields. Since Federation it has been possible for more to be done for the African than before. The fact remains that in Southern Rhodesia with its much greater ratio of Europeans to Africans the greatest advances for the African have been made.

117. A statement is annexed (Appendix III) showing how educational and other benefits for Africans have a direct relationship with the ratio of European to African population.

118. African nationalists and their supporters will no doubt attempt to offset the argument above by the suggestion that the amount of discrimination against Africans is greatest where the proportion of Europeans to Africans is greatest, namely in Southern Rhodesia. This is a very superficial view, but in any event the impact of Federation has been considerable in liberalizing European opinions and actions in Southern Rhodesia, whose Government have recently enacted a number of laws designed to remove discrimination in various fields.

119. One of the "safeguards" which the present Constitution provides is the African Affairs Board. If Federal Independence is conceded the provisions relating to this body would have to be considerably modified or some other "safeguard" substituted for it. In this connection it is pertinent to examine the Federal Parliament's record in legislation from the standpoint of discriminatory laws. This will show a remarkable absence of any disposition of the Government to embark on racial discrimination. Only on two occasions did the African Affairs Board find it necessary, by a majority, to ask for the reservation of bills, namely the Constitution Amendment Bill 1957 and the Electoral Bill 1958. In form neither bill differentiated and the Board had to rely on the "practical effect" clause. The Government disagreed with the opinion of the Board, and gave what the U.F.P. believes were sound reasons for doing so. Here it may be mentioned that the two bills were in a set. Any one of the three Territories could have blocked their passage by refusing to adopt the resolution which was a sine qua non of the introduction of the Constitution Amendment Bill to the Federal Assembly. All the territorial legislatures passed the necessary resolutions, and the United Kingdom Government ultimately upheld both Bills. It must not therefore be assumed that the opinion of the African Affairs Board was right.

120. Although the U.F.P. believes that "safeguards" against the enactment of discriminatory legislation are not really necessary to protect the African it is willing to have internal safeguards written into the Constitution. Such safeguards can be devised which will be just as effective but without detracting from the sovereignty of the Federation. This subject will be discussed in the next chapter.

Chapter VI

Constitutional Safeguards

121. In a previous chapter (paragraph 98) the main external restrictions on the freedom of action of the Federal Government have been set out.

122. The abrogation of the Colonial Laws Validity Act in relation to Federal legislation should present no political difficulty. In the case of the older "dominions" this was done by the Statute of Westminster and similar United Kingdom legislation would be necessary in the case of the Federation.

123. The United Kingdom's power to legislate for the Federation is the subject of a Convention, recognised in the Declaration of 27th April 1957, whereby it is only exercised at the request of the Federal Government. The U.F.P. submits that this convention should now receive statutory recognition. The principle having been recognised by the United Kingdom Government, the enactment of the necessary legislation should present no difficulty.

124. The abrogation of the United Kingdom's power to veto Federal legislation will also require United Kingdom legislation. The U.F.P. anticipates that the United Kingdom Government may be reluctant to abandon this power unless it is satisfied that the Federal Constitution contains some suitable device which will serve to discourage the enactment of Federal legislation which might differentiate against Africans to their detriment.

125. The U.F.P. is not averse to the provision of a suitable internal "safeguard" because it does not believe that future governments will deliberately set out to enact differential legislation unless there is some very good practical reason for doing so. But if such "safeguard" is to be provided the U.F.P. believes that it should serve to discourage differentiation against non-Africans as well as Africans. In other words, if a safeguard is required to allay fears of racial domination it should be available for all. In this connection it may be mentioned that the present Constitution makes special provision for securing the representation of Africans in the Federal Assembly but makes no corresponding provision for securing representation of non-Africans.

126. It will be appreciated that it is not possible to impose a complete ban on legislation which differentiates between races. There are many instances where differentiation is necessary because of differences in customs, standards of education and the like. To give an example, the system of trial by jury is probably unsuited to Africans at their present stage of development, but this need not deprive other races of the right to jury trial. What is required is a means of deterring a government from passing laws which differentiate to the detriment of a section of the population.

127. It is often suggested that the Federal Supreme Court or some similar body of independent lawyers should be used as a brake on the enactment of differentiating legislation. There are, however, very important objections to this.

128. There would be no objection to the Court being asked to determine whether a measure is in form one which differentiates, but there are grave objections to asking the Court to adjudicate on the desirability or otherwise of the measure. Such an adjudication obviously involves political considerations and it would be wrong to make a court, however eminent, the arbiter of political questions.

129. There are several devices which might be provided in the Federal Constitution in substitution for the United Kingdom's power to veto Federal legislation. This memorandum will proceed to discuss three such devices namely an Upper Chamber, a Constitutional Council or a Bill of Rights.

130. The African Affairs Board is part of the present machinery under which the United Kingdom's power of veto may be exercised. A Board of the same or similar character could be used in conjunction with an Upper House or a Constitutional Council but the U.F.P. believes that it would be simpler and better to dispense with such a Board.

131. The U.F.P. has not come to any definite conclusion which of the three devices mentioned above would be the most appropriate, nor has it come to any definite conclusion as to the precise form any such device should take. Suggestions will be made in broad outline as to the possible shape of an Upper House and a Constitutional Council simply as a basis for discussion.

An Upper House or Second Chamber

132. The Federal Constitution in Article 97(5) confers on the Federal Legislature the power to establish and constitute a Second Chamber. In considering the devices which might be used for the purpose of scrutinizing differential legislation and perhaps delaying or preventing its enactment, a Second Chamber therefore merits very serious consideration. Of all the devices which could be chosen this is the one most likely to find general acceptance because most people would regard such a body as a normal part of the legislature and many would think that the establishment of an Upper House would be a sign of progress in the constitutional sphere. There is no doubt that it could in fact serve a useful purpose in scrutinizing all legislation, acting as a reviewing body and on occasion as a brake upon any tendency to impetuosity on the part of the Government.

133. There do, however, appear to be certain disadvantages. The use of an Upper House for delaying or preventing the enactment of discriminatory legislation is probably without precedent. If it is constituted according to the usual precedents it would probably not be regarded by some as strong enough to serve the extraordinary purpose of dealing with discriminatory or differential laws. If it is specially constituted to serve the latter purpose effectively it may prove to be too powerful vis a vis the Lower House in relation to its normal functions. Moreover the procedure for dealing with "run of the mill" legislation may require to be different from the procedure for dealing with differentiating measures. It may therefore be necessary to have some intermediate body between the Upper and Lower Houses to judge whether a measure is of a differentiating character or not. In total there would then be produced an extremely cumbersome legislature.

134. One of the difficulties in relation to the creation of an Upper House is that there are a thousand and one ways of constituting such a body and several ways of trying to reconcile its disagreements with the Lower House. This makes it very difficult to secure general agreement on the form it should take and the difficulty is likely to be vastly increased when the Upper House is required to perform extraordinary as well as ordinary functions. There has been much criticism of the present Federal Constitution from the standpoint that there is a multiplicity of governments or parliaments disproportionate to the income of the Federation and the availability of suitable manpower. The creation of an Upper House would possibly evoke criticism because it would tend to increase expense and be wasteful of manpower.

135. If, despite these considerations, it is deemed desirable to create an Upper House, consideration will have to be given to the extent of its powers relating to differentiating measures. The U.F.P. believes that a power to delay, but not to prevent, is all that should be allowed for. In any event, the Party believes that the Upper House alone should not have power completely to prevent the passage of any legislation. If a deadlock is reached between the Upper and Lower Houses, it should be possible to resolve such deadlock by some procedure such as a joint sitting, from which the legislation could emerge if passed by a two-thirds or possibly greater majority. Alternatively, it might be resolved by invoking the opinions of the Territorial Legislatures.

136. There follows an outline of a possible Upper House:—

- (i) There should be 30 members of whom 15 would be African and 15 non-African.
- (ii) 5 Africans and 5 non-Africans would be residents of each Territory.
- (iii) (a) The Governor-General in his discretion but after consulting the Federal Prime Minister and the Territorial Prime Minister or Governor would nominate 1 African and 1 non-African for each territory.
- (b) The Governor of each territory, in his discretion but after consulting the Prime Minister or the Leader of the Unofficials would nominate 1 African and 1 non-African.
- (c) Three Africans and three non-Africans would be elected in each territory, probably indirectly by electoral colleges.
- (iv) The Upper House would be dissolved at the same time as the Lower House and be constituted as soon as possible after a federal general election.
- (v) The President would be a person elected by the Upper House either from its own ranks or from outside. In the event of an equality of votes the President would have a casting vote.
- (vi) Ministers may be drawn from either the Upper House or the Lower House. All ministers should have a right of audience but only to vote if members of the Upper House.
- (vii) The Upper House should have power to amend or reject bills, but a bill so rejected or passed with amendments not acceptable to the Government must be passed after the lapse of 12 months from the date of rejection or amendment if the Government or a succeeding government decides to go on with the Bill.
- (viii) If greater powers are considered necessary in relation to bills of a racially discriminatory character, these should be delayed for a further period or until after the holding of a general election or until accepted by a joint sitting of the two houses with a prescribed majority.
- (ix) A discriminatory bill would be defined as one which imposes liabilities or duties or grants rights or privileges unequally as between Africans and non-Africans.
- (x) Bills to amend the Electoral laws or the Constitution could be subject to the same conditions as discriminatory Bills.

A Constitutional Council

137. In lieu of an Upper House with the general powers of such a body and the special powers of dealing with discriminatory legislation there might be a much smaller body of a nominated character whose main purpose would be the scrutiny of discriminatory legislation, franchise bills and bills to amend the Constitution. It might also be consulted when an appointment of Governor-General is to be made.

138. Such a body would normally be smaller than an Upper House, and thus more economical in manpower. It would be constituted having regard to the special purpose mentioned above, and need not, when so constituted, embarrass the government in regard to "run of the mill" legislation.

139. It could operate with or without the assistance of a Select Committee of the Federal Assembly to draw its attention to legislation considered to be discriminatory. The Council should have power to delay the passage of any bill in the three categories mentioned above to which it found objection. The U.F.P. does not believe that it would be right to vest an absolute veto in a body of this kind. If the Government were not disposed to amend or withdraw the legislation on the representations of the Council the deadlock might be resolved by recourse to a joint meeting of the legislature and the Council, with a prescribed majority, or it might be resolved by recourse to the opinions of the territorial legislatures. The procedure might be varied in relation to the class of bill under consideration. The Council would also be concerned with subsidiary legislation and would probably be a more effective body for dealing with such matters than an Upper House.

140. Members of the Council should have such terms of office as to make them independent in outlook. The Council might ordinarily sit at some place other than the seat of government if this were considered desirable though there would probably be advantage in members being able to hear debates in the Federal Assembly. Indeed, the Chairman and Vice Chairman might be given a right of audience in the Federal Assembly.

141. Such a Council by its very nature would be likely to be less susceptible to political influences than an Upper House.

142. It might be constituted in a variety of ways but it seems clear that there would have to be equal representation of the three territories and probably also of Africans and non-Africans. It would probably have to consist of 6, 12 or 18 members. These might elect their own Chairman, or it might be considered better to have a Chairman in addition. Members should hold office for at least five years and be so remunerated as to make them reasonably independent.

143. The following are suggestions as to how the Council might be chosen:—

- (a) The Federal Prime Minister after consulting the Speaker and the Leader of the Opposition to choose an African and a non-African from each territory, i.e. 6 members.
- (b) The Territorial Prime Minister or the Leader of the largest political party represented in the legislature each to choose an African and a non-African, i.e. 6 members in all, again after consultation with the Speaker and Leader of the Opposition.
- (c) These 12 members should choose a Chairman and Vice Chairman from their own number. Alternatively, the Governor-General in his discretion to appoint an independent Chairman who should have a wide knowledge of all three territories.

144. The choice of the members might be made from panels of names of persons with prescribed qualifications as to age and experience in public office or the like.

145. Alternatively the appointing authorities could be the Governor-General in his discretion in regard to (a) above, and in regard to (b) the Federal Prime Minister after consulting the Territorial Prime Ministers or Leaders, or from panels of names submitted by the latter after consulting the Leaders of the Opposition.

A Bill of Rights

146. As this term is understood, it means the writing into the Constitution of a clause prohibiting discrimination on racial grounds in all or in certain specified respects. Legislation enacted in contravention of the clause would be ultra vires and would be so declared at the instance of any complainant by the Federal Supreme Court if that body is satisfied that the law violates the prohibition against discrimination.

147. There are several precedents in modern constitutions for Bills of Rights. The most recent example perhaps is the Nigerian Constitution. It is noteworthy that there is often an escape clause to provide for some degree of latitude especially in times of emergency. A Bill of Rights which sets out, inter alia, to protect the rights of the individual in respect of personal freedom by insisting on a fair trial before he can be imprisoned may be rendered nugatory by the exception relating to emergencies. In the last resort, no responsible government can afford to allow sufficient freedom to its inhabitants which would enable them to subvert the constitution. The protection of a Bill of Rights may, therefore, turn out to be illusory.

148. There are other difficulties. A law may have stood unchallenged for decades and then unexpectedly it is the subject of a challenge which, if successful, may bring the administration into a state of chaos. Admittedly all legislation in a federal scheme is susceptible to challenge for ultra vires, but if the challenge succeeds and the law is really necessary, another government would be intra vires and the matter could be put right. But if there is a prohibition of legislation on grounds of discrimination, presumably all the governments would be inhibited.

149. Experience has shown that the most unexpected results occur and laws are challenged successfully in ways that were probably never intended or guessed at when the constitutional "safeguard" was devised. In some cases it would be most difficult to predict whether a law would be capable of classification as discriminatory. Take for example a law which proposed to deal with criminal trials and to provide a jury trial for non-Africans and a trial by judge and assessors for Africans. Both Africans and non-Africans might equally challenge the law as discriminatory against them, because a European might argue that he preferred a trial by judge and assessors to a jury trial, while the African might do the reverse.

150. If the basis of the clause were to be a prohibition only against laws which discriminate to the detriment of the complainant, this would involve the Federal Supreme Court in the political task of deciding what is good for the people. In the opinion of the U.F.P. it is very undesirable to run any risk of involving the Courts in politics.

Amendments to the Constitution

151. The grant of independence to the Federal Government would give rise to certain difficulties in connection with constitutional amendments, since at present the necessary rigidity is supplied by the compulsory reservation of constitutional Bills for the Royal Assent.

152. In designing a method of constitutional amendment the following factors must be taken into account:—

- (a) The retention of an exclusive amending power by the United Kingdom Parliament is not necessarily incompatible with full independence (vide Canada).
- (b) A federal constitution requires that the constitution should be relatively rigid, and in particular that the balance of legislative power between the territorial governments and the federal government cannot be altered by unilateral action on the part of either.
- (c) if it is thought necessary to provide a "racial safeguard" for ordinary legislation, there is no logical reason for excluding constitutional amendments from such safeguard.

153. In the light of these factors it is possible to suggest in outline a method of constitutional amendment which would be compatible with full Commonwealth Status or with the lesser status of Independence in the Federal sphere.

1. Amendments to the Constitution to be passed by a prescribed majority of the Federal Assembly and ratified by simple majority in legislatures of two out of three Territories.
2. Constitutional Bills to be subject to same "anti-discrimination" treatment as is designed for ordinary legislation, i.e. scrutiny or delay by Senate or Constitutional Council.
3. No alteration of Constitution diminishing the proportionate representation of any Territory in the Federal Assembly (or Senate or Constitutional Council) to become law unless approved by a prescribed majority of the legislature of that Territory.
4. All provisions laying down the procedure for Constitutional Amendment, and the structure of other safeguards to be placed beyond the amending power of the Federal Assembly, thus necessitating a request to the United Kingdom Parliament for alteration of such provisions. This request should be supported by at least two of the Territories.

154. The above does not take into account the question of constitutional amendment on the initiative of the Territories. If this is considered desirable it could be provided that on the request of two Territorial Legislatures the Federal Assembly must convene a joint sitting of all Legislatures to consider proposed amendments. Proposed amendments might be passed by prescribed majority of the joint sitting.

155. The joint sitting formula could also be applied to a request to the United Kingdom Government for amendment of the entrenched provisions by a provision that no such request should be acceded to unless supported by a prescribed majority at a joint sitting of the four Legislatures.

156. If provision is made for the establishing of an Upper House as part of the Federal Legislature or of any territorial Legislature, the foregoing suggested procedure may have to be modified in detail.

157. Finally, it may be desirable to draw a distinction between formal amendments and others of a more drastic nature, or between amendments which affect merely the working of the Federal Legislature or its creatures without directly affecting the Territories. A less rigid procedure for amendment might be appropriate in some of these cases.

The Governor-General

158. The full members of the Commonwealth choose their own Governors General or President without reference to the United Kingdom except when of their own volition they seek to appoint a resident of the United Kingdom. So long as the United Kingdom retains control of the appointment of the Governor-General of the Federation, Rhodesia and Nyasaland could not claim to be fully independent.

159. The U.F.P., as explained above, is pressing at this stage, only for the narrower form of independence—i.e. independence in the Federal sphere, pending the time when the constitutional advancement of the northern territories will enable a fuller measure of independence to be accorded.

160. In the present Constitution, the Governor-General has certain important powers. These mainly relate to the reservation of bills. It should be noted, however, that in relation to requests by the African Affairs Board for the reservation of bills as differentiating measures, the Governor-General has virtually no discretion. He must usually reserve the bill on request. The decision whether to advise Her Majesty to refuse assent lies with British Ministers. The U.F.P. submits that if the appointment of the Governor-General is vested solely in the Federal Government, this would not impair the safeguard which may be provided as indicated previously in this memorandum against differentiating measures.

161. If any qualms were felt about the matter, the constitution could limit the choice of a Governor-General for a period by excluding persons who had been actively associated with politics in the Federation within a certain period or, for example, by requiring that the Governor-General should be a person who had held high judicial office for a certain term of years.

162. Even under the present arrangements, it is customary to consult the Federal Government about the choice of a Governor-General and the Southern Rhodesia Government about the choice of a Governor.

163. The U.F.P. believes that the time has come when the United Kingdom should entrust the choice of Governor-General entirely to the Federal Government, subject perhaps for a term of years to some limitations as regards the field of choice.

Chapter VII

Allocation of functions as between Federal and Territorial Governments

164. The U.F.P. believes that on the whole the basis of the allocation of functions as between the Federal and Territorial Governments provided for in the present Constitution is sound. No doubt it will be contended by some that in the light of experience certain changes should be made.

165. The U.F.P. hesitates to make recommendations on this subject at present because it believes that the subject cannot be adequately considered except against the background of the constitutions of the Territorial Governments and possible changes which may be made with regard to these. It must be borne in mind that the original allocation of functions was based inter alia, on the broad principle that matters affecting the day to day life of Africans should be dealt with by the Territorial Governments, while certain other matters which were capable of uniform treatment without affecting the peculiar susceptibilities of Africans should be dealt with by the Federal Government. A shift in the extent of representation of Africans in either the Federal or the Territorial Legislatures might well affect opinion as to the propriety of a function being exercised by one government or another.

166. As at present advised the U.F.P. is of the view that the distribution of functions should remain broadly as now. Here it may be mentioned that, as a rule, in neither the Federal nor the Territorial general election campaigns of 1958 and 1959 did the subject of transfer of functions as between governments attract much notice, and the political party policies published for the purposes of such elections on the whole make no special feature of the need for such changes. The main exceptions in this regard are with regard to Police, the Preservation of Law and Order, and, in the case of Nyasaland, the federalisation of non-African Agriculture. Since the general elections there has been some evidence of a tendency on the part of certain persons to seek to enlarge the scope of the Territorial Governments' functions at the expense of the Federal Government. The U.F.P. would strongly resist any proposals to transfer non-African education to the Territorial Governments. It would not be averse to a change in regards to Roads, whereby the entire responsibility for road construction would be placed on the Territorial Governments, subject of course to the necessary Financial adjustment. It would favour the regulation of road traffic remaining a concurrent subject.

167. As regards Police, and the Preservation of Law and Order, the U.F.P. recognises that in a federal system these are ordinarily a prime responsibility of the Territorial Governments. The Federal Government has, however, a considerable interest in these matters from the standpoint of:—

- (a) the enforcement of Federal laws;
- (b) the maintenance of peace and security and the preservation of the Constitution.

168. The present Constitution permits of the setting up, with the consent of the Territorial Governments, of a federal police force analogous to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. This force would be hired by the Federal Government in detachments to the Territorial Governments who agreed to come into the scheme, and who would retain operational control of the forces in their territories.

169. The U.F.P. policy lays down the establishment of a federal police force on these lines as one of its objectives. Since this policy was drafted, however, enthusiasm for this system has waned as a result of the recent friction between the Federal Government in Canada and the Newfoundland Government over the supply of reinforcements.

170. In the view of the Party other ways must now be tried of protecting the legitimate interests of the Federal Government in these respects.

Emergency Powers

171. The present constitution does not make clear the respective rights and duties of the Federal and Territorial Governments to declare a State of Emergency and to legislate for the contingencies arising in such emergencies.

172. The Constitution of the Federation of the British West Indies furnishes an excellent precedent of what, it is submitted, is required in Rhodesia and Nyasaland in this respect and it is submitted that this precedent should be followed when the constitution is revised. The effect of the provision is that in a Federal emergency, territorial laws may be suspended or temporarily amended, and in a Territorial emergency, Federal laws may be similarly dealt with unless the Federal government objects.

173. These powers of suspension or temporary amendment may be vitally necessary in an emergency and it is important that they should not fail for ultra vires.

Chapter VIII

The Electoral Franchise

174. The Federal Electoral Act of 1958 was enacted after discussions had taken place in April 1957 between the Federal and United Kingdom governments.

175. The Electoral Act was preceded by a Constitution Amendment Act of 1957 which enlarged the Federal Assembly and made certain changes in the manner of electing some of the African members from Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

176. The Electoral Act was controversial and the African Affairs Board by a majority considered it to be a differentiating measure chiefly because of the provisions relating to the election of the additional African members in the Constitution Amendment Act and the Electoral Act. The Government disagreed with the opinion of the African Affairs Board and maintained that the law was not a differentiating measure. In the event the United Kingdom Government refused to apply a veto to the Bill, which became law.

177. The main principle underlying the Electoral Act 1958 is the retention of voting power in the hands of civilised and responsible persons. The Act provides for two common voters rolls open to persons of all races known as the General Roll and the Special Roll, the former requiring high and the latter relatively low qualifications. General voters are entitled to vote for ordinary constituency candidates and for certain categories of special representatives of Africans, while the special voters are entitled to vote only for the latter categories.

178. The U.F.P. maintain that the system of qualitative franchise is in the real interests of all the inhabitants of the Federation and that there should be no lowering of the present qualifications. The vote is not an abstract end in itself but a means towards achieving just and responsible government, the respect for democratic institutions and the best possible life for the people. It is therefore essential that voters should be able to distinguish not merely between rival candidates but between the political principles and policies of the Parties concerned. This means that the vote should be exercised with reason, judgment and public spirit. It is therefore not a universal right but a responsibility to be acquired by those who can use it with discernment.

179. There are many examples of people who have been granted franchise rights before being ready to exercise their responsibilities with reason, judgment and public spirit. The granting of the vote may have seemed to be a democratic move but in many cases adult suffrage has been the means whereby a power group has been enabled to seize control with the result that military dictatorships or other oligarchies have supplanted the proposed democratic forms and the people having enjoyed the franchise fleetingly have then been deprived of it completely. This aspect is well understood by many politically conscious Africans in the Federation, who fear that this could happen here. They see the present system of qualitative franchise as the only sure path to true democracy for their people.

180. The Electoral Act has been criticised by various other persons and parties but the U.F.P. believes that it provides a sound and satisfactory basis and that it should not be altered. The Party believes that Universal manhood suffrage is not a suitable basis for the election of Parliaments in Rhodesia and Nyasaland. It considers that the arguments against universal suffrage are well set out in a recorded speech of Sir Charles Cumings, a member of the Tredgold Commission on the Southern Rhodesia Electoral Act. Consequently copies of that speech are annexed in support of the retention of a qualitative franchise.

181. The Federal Electoral Act is sometimes criticised on the ground that the special voters do not, as in Southern Rhodesia, enjoy the full voting rights of the general voters. They are entitled to vote only for the representatives (African and European) of African interests, but not for the ordinary constituency members. This criticism does not take account of the differences between the Federal Assembly, where 12 seats are reserved for Africans and 3 for Europeans to represent African interests, and the Southern Rhodesia Legislative Assembly where no seats whatever are reserved for Africans. This difference in a great measure accounts for the differences between the Federal and the Southern Rhodesia Electoral laws.

182. Many who criticise those responsible for enacting the Federal Electoral Act do not appreciate the magnitude of the concession made to Africans when the franchise was extended to British Protected Persons, a step never taken previously by the Territorial Governments. It is noteworthy that the Southern Rhodesia Electoral Act made no such concession. The removal of the citizenship barrier opens the way for Africans to have an increasing influence on the voters' rolls, if they care to avail themselves of the opportunity. In Nyasaland especially their influence could soon be very significant.

183. The objection of the African Affairs Board to the provisions allowing general voters to vote for the African members deserves to be answered. The U.F.P. believes that the system of reserved seats for Africans should give way in time to a system where all seats are open. Pending that time, however, it believes that the general voters have every right to participate in the election of African members of Parliament whose vote in Parliament has the same weight as the vote of any other M.P. The U.F.P. believes that the system whereby the non-African voter participates in the election of African members is beneficial both to the European voter and the African candidate. It forges a valuable link between the two. The non-African voter's prejudice against African politicians is broken down in this way. He has opportunities for hearing African candidates expound their view from public platforms. The African candidate is given the opportunity of addressing largely non-African audiences. European and African candidates stand shoulder to shoulder for the same political parties. If the election of African candidates were vested solely in African voters (as it is in the case of two African members for each of the Territories of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland), this would isolate the European voter from the African candidate and M.P. in a very unfortunate way.

184. The U.F.P. believes that the Electoral Act promotes the working of political partnership between the races and encourages members of all races to join political parties together — parties which carry on the traditions of British Parliamentary Democracy. This theme is further developed in Appendix V.

Composition of the Federal Assembly

185. The Federal Assembly was enlarged by virtue of the provisions of the Constitution Amendment Act 1957, which came into effect at the General Election of 1958. This was a step which had the concurrence of the three territorial governments and the United Kingdom government. The Constitution now provides for the eventual elimination of "reserved seats" or, as it has been put, for "fading the colour out of the Federal Assembly". The time may come for a further increase in the number of members and it may also come for a review of the quota from the respective territories. The U.F.P. believes that there is an element of contract in this matter and that no change should be effected which would disturb the ratio of members to territories without the consent of all three territories. Moreover, the Party considers that as the constitution was amended with effect only from 1958, no change need be contemplated for the foreseeable future.

Chapter IX
Conclusion

186. Most African countries north of the Federation have a predominantly black population. Europeans form a very small percentage and consist largely of civil servants or others who have no permanent roots in Africa. Kenya is the only one of those countries which has a substantial number of Europeans, Coloureds and Asians, but even in Kenya these people are in a very much smaller ratio to the black Africans than is the non-African population of Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

187. South of the Federation in the Union of South Africa where the ratio of Europeans to black Africans is the highest in Africa, the declared policy is separation of the races.

188. Whatever may be the most suitable form of government for these other countries it is clear that Rhodesia and Nyasaland must remain multiracial and pursue a policy of racial partnership. This policy is often described as an "experiment" by outside well wishers and critics but such a way of looking at it is quite wrong. It is not a policy which can be discarded in favour of some other policy. It is the only way in which the various races can successfully co-exist—the only modus vivendi.

189. The working out of partnership in the Federation is not an experiment but it may well be an example to other countries where there are racial problems.

190. The political problems facing the Federation are tremendous but so are her resources. The three Territories between them have almost illimitable natural resources. They enjoy a climate that is hard to beat. European initiative, skills, and capital are needed to exploit these resources in the interests of all the inhabitants. Without them the condition of the African population would inevitably relapse into a sorry condition. What the Federation needs above all else is sound, stable government. Attempts to control the governments of the Federation from afar are impracticable, and lead to inefficiency and frustration. The saying that "too many cooks spoil the broth" is particularly apposite to the Federation and its external critics.

191. It has been demonstrated in this memorandum that the greater the concentration of European population within the Federation the greater the material prosperity and educational facilities for the African. Also that under European leadership more pro rata has been done in the Federation for African education and similar services than in any country to the north. The U.F.P. believes that Europeans in the Federation as a whole recognise the need, not only to promote the material, cultural and educational advancement of Africans, but also to allow them to take a share in the government of the country which should increase as the Africans demonstrate their ability and sense of political responsibility. They believe that the best way for Africans to develop politically and economically is in association with the Europeans.

192. No fair minded person can deny that considerable progress has been made in the economic life of the country and in implementing partnership and co-operation between the races. Nor can it be denied that much more could have been achieved if African nationalists had sought to co-operate instead of to disintegrate the Federation.

193. The U.F.P. believes that of all the emerging nations in Africa, Rhodesia and Nyasaland holds out the brightest promise for the future. To withhold constitutional advancement in 1960 when it is being thrust upon the less developed and responsible populations of other African countries would be to cause intense frustration to the positive people who have striven to uphold the lofty ideals of partnership and co-operation. It would give some sort of bitter satisfaction to those negative people who have consistently carped, criticised and refused to co-operate.

194. Above all, there should be no decision to have another Review at any predetermined time in the future. Recent experience has shown quite conclusively that when it is known that there is to be a Review of the Constitution, the period prior to that time is one of doubts and uncertainty in the minds of the inhabitants of the Federation and of investors from beyond the borders of the country. That prior period would create a suitable atmosphere for agitation, demands and worry. It would be a period not conducive to the establishment of new enterprise and investment of either equity capital or loan funds. The plant will not flourish if it is pulled up every few years for the roots to be examined. There should be neither delay nor further review.

195. On the 23rd October 1953 Her Majesty the Queen in a gracious message to the people of the Federation said:

"An inspiring vision has been vouchsafed to you. To realise it will call for sustained endeavours in so developing the resources of the Federation as to make possible a better living for all by the expansion of education, health and other services. These endeavours will meet with the sympathy of all those who in every part of the world look with goodwill upon your efforts and wish for the Federation a great and successful future."

196. The U.F.P. firmly believes that its leaders have made the sustained efforts referred to in Her Majesty's gracious message. Thus far in the year 1960 the sympathy referred to in the message, if it has found outward expression seems to have been drowned in the flood of hostile criticism promoted by those who seek to destroy the Federation. The grant of a significant and substantial constitutional advance would be of the greatest encouragement to those who are endeavouring to make the sustained endeavours which Her Majesty desired to see. Withholding it would tend to discourage them and to give a bitter and empty satisfaction to the negative forces of disruption.

Improvements in Educational Facilities for the Coloured and Asian Communities since Federation

Many new Government schools have been built for Asian and Coloured children since 1954 and there has been a tremendous increase in the number of pupils enrolled as the following figures indicate:

Primary Schools for Coloured and Asian Children

	Prior to Federation	In 1958	Percentage Increase
Southern Rhodesia ...	16	18	12.5%
Northern Rhodesia ...	8	15	87.5%

Health Services

The improvements in the service since 1953 are impressive, as the following figures indicate:

Expenditure on Health Services being the increase in expenditure from 1953 to 1959, shown as percentages at 1953 figures.

	Recurrent Expenditure %	Grants %	Capital Expenditure %	Total %
Southern Rhodesia ...	66	55	50	44
Nyasaland ...	184	426	227	196

The population has increased, of course, but more is now being spent per head on health and other services than ever before. The increase in expenditure on health per head (including Africans) from 1953 to 1958 is 63%. In terms of money this increase in six years has been £3,352,822 (from £4,478,147 to £7,830,959).

Some Examples showing that Africans benefit from large, settled European populations

Far from there being any substance in the belief that a large European population is inimical to African interests, there are many indications that Africans derive direct and substantial benefit from Europeans, these advantages increasing with the size of the European population. This is because employment opportunities are created and European enterprise leads to a greater flow of money and more taxation being available for services.

The following are some examples:

AFRICANS IN EMPLOYMENT, 1958

	Numbers Employed	Percentage of African Population
Southern Rhodesia	616,800	24%
Northern Rhodesia	267,400	12%
Nyasaland	174,200	6%

(About 200,000 Nyasaland Africans are employed outside that Territory).

ENROLMENT OF AFRICAN SCHOOL-CHILDREN 1958-1959

	Total number of children enrolled	Percentage of potential scholars

Northern Rhodesia	245,816	54%
Nyasaland	270,882	50%
Total and Average	979,527	64%

If Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland had enrolled African school children to the same degree as Southern Rhodesia, those Colonial Office Territories would in 1959 have had the following additional number of children at school:—

Northern Rhodesia	155,464
Nyasaland	213,118

Activities of African National Congress Movements which are now prescribed

In each of the three Territories, official enquiries were conducted into the activities of their own African National Congress

1. Southern Rhodesia

The Review Tribunal in Southern Rhodesia found that the following activities were proved to be the principle objects of active Congress members. Much activity in fulfilment of the objects had taken place.

- (i) To excite disaffection towards the constitution with the object of altering the constitution by unlawful means.
- (ii) To excite disobedience and hostility to the Laws and lawful authorities of the Country.
- (iii) To excite racial hostility and disseminate subversive propaganda.
- (iv) To coerce the Government by:
 - (a) Demonstrations;
 - (b) Processions;
 - (c) Strikes.
- (v) To ridicule and undermine the authority of:
 - (a) Native Commissioners;
 - (b) Land Development Officers;
 - (c) The Chiefs;
 - (d) The Police;
 - (e) African Members of Parliament.
- (vi) To organise boycotts.
- (vii) To misinterpret and falsify facts with a view to bringing the Government and Europeans into disrepute.
- (viii) To intimidate people to join Congress by threats of boycotting business and threats to life.
- (ix) To give out that Congress was more powerful than the Government.
- (x) To co-operate with the Nyasaland African Congress, the Zambia African National Congress, and the Northern Rhodesian African National Congress and to co-ordinate its activities with those organisations.
- (xi) To infiltrate into and obtain control of other African organisations.

2. Northern Rhodesia

The Report of an Inquiry into all the Circumstances which gave rise to the Making of the Safeguard of Elections and Public Safety Regulations, 1959, found that persons and bodies of persons in diverse places throughout the Territory had taken the following actions:—

- (a) have conspired to make use of intimidation, force, violence and restraint against persons in the Territory in order to induce or compel such persons to refrain from voting at or from standing as candidates for the said election;
- (b) have conspired wilfully to obstruct voters at the polling stations or on their way thereto during the said election;
- (c) have conspired to make use of intimidation, force and violence against persons on account of such persons having voted at or having stood as candidates for the said election;
- (d) have conspired to commit acts of arson;
- (e) having conspired maliciously to cause damage to property and to cause death and injury to persons;
- (f) have conspired to organise, hold and participate in unlawful meetings and assemblies;
- (g) have conspired to corrupt members of the police force and other public officers;
- (h) have counselled and attempted to procure, and have committed acts preparatory to—
 - (i) the use of such intimidation, force, violence, restraint and obstruction;
 - (ii) the commission of the aforesaid acts of arson, acts of malicious damage and causing death and

- injury and acts of corruption;
- (iii) the aforesaid organisation, holding and participation in unlawful meetings and assemblies;
- (i) have published, uttered and reproduced untrue statements concerning the Government of the Territory, the Federal Government and the other Governments within the Federation as by law established, the departments, military forces, police forces and public officers of such Governments, with intent to bring the said Governments, departments, military forces, police forces and public officers into hatred and disrepute and to inspire contempt towards them;
- (j) have published, uttered and reproduced statements with intent to promote feelings of illwill and hostility between different classes of the population of the Territory;
- (k) have published, uttered and reproduced statements indicating and implying that it would be incumbent and desirable that voters in the Territory should refrain from voting at the said election.

3. Nyasaland

In Nyasaland, Congress conducted a vigorous campaign of intimidation against other Africans including arson, personal assault and extortion. Notes of a meeting held on 25th January, 1959, included plans:—

- to "start war";
- to dig up roads;
- to destroy anything belonging to Europeans;
- to refuse to pay taxes;
- to "hit Europeans or cut throat";
- to end European agriculture.

The items above are extracts from a translation of the Chinjanja notes relating to a meeting of 25th January, 1959, quoted as Appendix II on page 146 of the Report of the Nyasaland Commission of Inquiry, Command 814 (the Devlin Report).

That document also contained the following statement:—

"6. The people who discredit Congress should have their names written down".

In paragraph 168 of that same Report, the Commission recorded:

"We have found that violent action was to be adopted as a policy, that breaches of the law were to be committed and that attempts by the Government to enforce it were to be resisted with violence. We have found further that there was talk of beating and killing Europeans, . . ."

Appendix V Political Partnership

The changes brought about in the composition of the Federal Assembly by the Constitution Amendment Act, and the electoral system, are sufficiently described in the White Paper issued by the Federal Government in September 1957, C. Fed. 72.

The position may be summarised briefly thus:

- (a) The Federal Assembly has 59 members of whom 15 are of specified race and 44 may be of any race. The 15 consist of 3 Europeans, whose purpose is to represent African interests, and 12 Africans.
- (b) The Electoral Act governs the election of 53 of these 59 members. The other 6 consist of a European and two Africans in each of the Northern Territories. The 2 Europeans are nominated by the respective Governors and the 4 Africans are elected by all-African electoral colleges prescribed under laws made by these Governors.
- (c) The 53 members whose election is covered by the Electoral Act consist of 9 special members whose race is specified (viz. 1 European and 4 Africans in Southern Rhodesia and 2 Africans each in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland), and 44 general unspecified members representing 24, 14 and 6 constituencies in Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland respectively.
- (d) The Electoral Act sets up a qualitative franchise with two voters rolls, each of them open to members of all races and to Federal Citizens and British Protected Persons alike. Qualifications for the general roll are relatively high, and the general voters may vote for general unspecified members and also for special members. Qualifications for the special roll are relatively low, and special voters may vote only for the special members.

Africans are in a small minority in most of the general rolls, and have not bothered to register in large numbers on the special rolls, though many are eligible. Thus, at present, the Europeans on the general roll are able to dominate the election of the special representatives. The position in this respect could greatly change if African apathy and boycotts were eliminated.

The Federal Government has been much criticised for allowing the general voters, mainly European, to participate in electing 8 of the 12 African members. Sir John Moffat, the Rev. Andrew Doig, the Dominion Party, and several African members were all in agreement that African members should be elected only, or chiefly, by Africans. The United Federal Party stood firm, on the principle that members of all races should participate in the election of the four Southern Rhodesia African members and the 4 additional African members in the Northern Territories.

The reasons are summarised below:

(1) Ideally, the legislature should not be divided into racial groups. The provision of a group of special representatives for Africans is looked on as a temporary expedient, until such time as Africans, on their merits, in open competition with other candidates, may hope to be elected. When that stage is reached, the Constitution provides a device whereby "colour" may be faded out of the Constitution. Meanwhile the rights of Africans to vote and to speak in Parliament are identical with the rights of the other members. They are not debarred from debating or voting on European education, or any other subject which affects Europeans only. In principle, it seems right that European voters should participate in electing such members.

(2) The main reason for bringing the European into these elections is not the principle mentioned above, but the belief that political partnership between the races is best promoted by bringing the African candidates and European voters into direct relationship for the mutual benefit of both.

If the election of these African members were to be left to African voters only, there is a very strong probability that their election would soon be controlled by purely African parties with a policy of racial domination. In fact this has occurred in the 1958 elections, as regards the election of the 2 remaining African members, whose election is left to a purely African electoral college. The same would have occurred in Nyasaland, but for the boycott there by the African National Congress of any participation in the Federal elections.

These purely African political parties might boil down to the Congress alone, but, even if not, such parties would develop along lines foreign to the traditions of British political parties. They would not attract European membership, or get the benefit of disinterested European help or advice.

The scheme devised by the Federal Government on the other hand is one in which parties cut across racial divisions. Two main parties, both with members of all races in their ranks, and both sponsoring African candidates, as well as European candidates, were the main contestants in the recent general election. In Parliament the danger is avoided of either a multiplicity of small parties, some based on European, and some on African membership, or a two party system, one party being European and the other African.

It is worth examining the matter further. During the first five years of Federation, the party political system has crystallised out into two main parties, based on the European pattern, and the African National Congress parties. Membership of the two main parties is open to members of all races. These parties naturally wish to make a bid for the election of African candidates, as well as European candidates. They must therefore attract the best African material they can find. The African candidates in turn are pleased to join political parties, where they can pit their brains against Europeans, and learn from their established procedures and traditions.

Thus, at Party congresses, conferences and other meetings, there will be found Africans amongst the Europeans; they will have the advantage of listening to the best European political debaters, of participating in the debates themselves, and of influencing the thoughts of European political leaders. On the other hand, European party members will come into lively contact with the aspiring African politician. Political congresses will have in their membership African delegates, candidates and members of Parliament. At the tea and lunch intervals, they will be seen discussing matters freely with their European counterparts.

But the matter does not begin and end with the annual party congress. Each member of the Party, who is a member of Parliament, whether or not he is an African, will probably be given opportunities to attend branch meetings in his constituency.

Let us examine the relationship of the general voter and the African candidate. In some cases, the European voter is inclined to refuse to exercise his vote for the African candidate. In the 1953 Federal General Election, many European voters abstained from voting for the African candidates. In the 1958 election the percentage of abstentions was probably lower. (The so-called spoilt papers were almost entirely blanks).

The political parties direct considerable propaganda at the voters designed to get them to exercise all their votes and this will become increasingly effective. Even those Europeans, who at first boggle at voting for Africans, can usually be persuaded to do so. Having decided to vote, they will take an interest in the platform performances of the candidates. The African candidates in some cases attracted much larger European audiences than their European fellow candidates. It was up to them to make a good impression and many of them did so.

Each African candidate's constituency consists of a group of general constituencies. A comparison of the votes cast for the general member and the African member on a constituency by constituency basis shows that, in some cases, the successful African candidates polled more votes in certain general constituencies than the successful general member. In these cases, the unsuccessful African candidate no doubt polled less votes than the unsuccessful European candidates.

In voting for an African candidate, the European may be said to "break the ice", and it may well be that in the future, with the experience he has gained of African candidates, he will more readily accept an African candidate who stands on his merits in open competition with European candidates.

Once elected under the auspices of a political party, of course, the African member has within that party the same rights and privileges as any other member of Parliament. He comes under the Party whip and has the opportunity of attending the Parliamentary party meetings, where he can gain and contribute. Freedom of speech is perhaps greater in such circles where discussion is confidential, and he has a valuable opportunity to influence European opinion.

Surely it is vastly better for the African politician to get his political training under the auspices of political parties with the best traditions of British Parties, with the opportunity of influencing and being influenced by European political leaders, rather than to be hived off into political parties of Africans only.

The operation of the system described above has led to the election of 9 African members in the United Federal Party, amongst 37 European members, and to one African member in the Dominion Party, amongst seven European members.

Appendix VI

Declaration of April 1957

Joint Communique issued simultaneously in Salisbury and London on 27th April, 1957, between the Governments of the Federation and of the United Kingdom

1. Discussions were held in London from 12th April to 17th April, 1957, between Sir Roy Welensky, Prime Minister, and Mr. J. M. Greenfield, Minister of Law, of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, and Lord Home, Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, and Mr. A. T. Lennox-Boyd, Secretary of State for the Colonies, about certain aspects of the constitution of the Federation.

2. They reviewed the progress made by the Federation since it was established in 1953. They agreed that this progress had justified the hopes of its founders and provided a sound basis for further development of the policy of partnership between races which the Federation is pursuing.

External Affairs

3. The Federal Constitution provides that matters of External Affairs may, from time to time, be entrusted to the Federation. The Federal Prime Minister represented that the time had come for the Federation to assume more responsibility in this sphere, particularly in the field of relations with other countries, and the appointment of representatives of the Federation in such countries. The United Kingdom Government have agreed to entrust responsibility for external affairs to the Federal Government to the fullest extent possible consistent with the responsibility which Her Majesty's Government must continue to have in international law so long as the Federation is not a separate international entity.

Direct Access to the Sovereign

4. In recognition of the constitutional position of the Federation, H.M. the Queen has been pleased to approve that in future the Prime Minister of the Federation should have direct access to the Sovereign on Federal subjects affecting the Sovereign personally, on the award of Honours for services to the Federation, and on a number of ceremonial matters.

Administrative Arrangements in the United Kingdom

5. There was discussion of a proposal by the Federal Prime Minister that a separate department of the United Kingdom Government responsible to the Secretaries of State for Commonwealth Relations and the Colonies jointly, should handle relations both with the Federal Government and with all three Territorial Governments. United Kingdom Ministers explained that this was part of the general question of the responsibility of different Ministers for relations with the various parts of the constantly evolving Commonwealth. The whole question would have to be examined and in this examination, Sir Roy Welensky's suggestion would be borne in mind.

Legislation

6. The Federal Government having represented that the Federal Legislature should have the power to legislate with extra-territorial effect, the United Kingdom Government have agreed that legislation for this purpose will be introduced into Parliament at Westminster at a convenient opportunity.

7. The Federal Prime Minister drew attention to doubts which had arisen in regard to the purpose and effect of article 29(7) of the Federal Constitution and to the subject of legislation in the United Kingdom for the Federation. "United Kingdom Ministers made it clear that the United Kingdom Government recognise the existence of a convention applicable to the present stage of the constitutional evolution of the Federation, whereby the United Kingdom Government in practice does not initiate any legislation to amend or to repeal any Federal Act or to deal with any matter included within the competence of the Federal Legislature, except at the request of the Federal Government."

Public Services in the Federation

8. Public service questions were also considered. The United Kingdom Ministers said that in principle it was accepted that all Civil Services in the Federation, whether Federal or Territorial, would eventually be locally based and look for their future to the Federal area.

9. Accordingly steps would be taken to work towards this objective and in particular the question of inter-changeability of officers would be examined in consultation with the four Governments of the Federation.

Proposals for the Enlargement of the Federal Assembly and for the Federal Franchise

10. The Federal Prime Minister informed United Kingdom Ministers of the position reached in his discussions with the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia and the Governors of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland in regard to the enlargement of the Federal Assembly and to the Federal franchise. United Kingdom Ministers accepted in principle proposals for the enlargement of the Federal Assembly. The Federal Prime Minister stated that he would not be able to inform Her Majesty's Government of the Federal Governments' definite proposals for the franchise, or to present a Bill on this subject to the Federal Legislature until further discussions had been held in Salisbury. Meanwhile, however, he could assure United Kingdom Ministers that a Franchise Bill would be introduced and would ensure that British Protected Persons otherwise qualified would not be required to change their status in order to be eligible for the Federal franchise, and that the qualifications for that franchise would permit of a reasonable number of such persons acquiring the franchise. United Kingdom Ministers took note with satisfaction of these assurances.

Review of the Constitution

11. The Federal Constitution provides for a review not less than seven nor more than nine years from the date when it came into force (October, 1953). In this connection the two Governments have agreed on the declaration annexed.

Declaration on the Review of the Federal Constitution

1. Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and the Government of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland have already made it clear and take this opportunity of reaffirming that they are opposed to any proposal either for the amalgamation into a unitary state of the Territories now composing the Federation or for the secession of any of those Territories from the Federation.

2. Article 99 of the Federal Constitution provides that not less than seven nor more than nine years from the date of the coming into force of the Constitution there shall be convened a conference consisting of delegations from the Federation, from each of the three Territories and from the United Kingdom, chosen by their respective Governments for the purpose of reviewing that Constitution. The Constitution came into force in 1953, and it is agreed that the conference shall be convened in 1960.

3. The purpose of this conference is to review the Constitution in the light of the experience gained since the inception of federation and in addition to agree on the constitutional advances which may be made. In this latter context the conference will consider a programme for the attainment of such a status as would enable the Federation to become eligible for full membership of the Commonwealth.

27th April 1957

UNITED FEDERAL PARTY* Represented by: P. Duncan, M.P.; F. G. Collins, M.P.; Mrs. M. Rosen, M.P.; C. M. Chipunza, M.P.; R. M. Rich, M.P.; S. S. Sawyer, M.P.

CHAIRMAN: We have read your memorandum with great interest, and perhaps you may care to supplement it for us.

A. (MR. DUNCAN): The first thing I would like to draw your attention to is a certain wording in the terms of reference, that is to advise the Government on the constitutional programme and framework best suited to the attainment of the objects in the Constitution and Preamble. I would like to run through these objects laid down in the preamble, to see where we have succeeded in meeting them and where we have failed, together with the reasons for the successes and failures.

I would first like to define a term which I shall be using, the African Congresses. When I refer to the congresses I mean essentially African political parties which use force, intimidation and violence to attain their ends.

I shall be critical about the Colonial Office, but I would like to make it clear that my criticism is not directed towards individual civil servants. We are fully aware that many of them are of the highest calibre. It is really a criticism of the system.

The first object contained in the preamble is to conduce to the security, advancement and welfare of the people. As far as security is concerned, the Federation has established its forces and increased them, and during the last year or two it has been able to assist in Imperial defence, with air forces sent to Aden and Cyprus; and we feel it is a necessary function for a country which feels it is capable of getting independence.

The vital issue on internal security is a Territorial matter, and as you know there have been emergencies in the last few years in all three Territories. It is significant that in Southern Rhodesia very prompt action was taken when threats of intimidation and violence were causing disruption in the country. This was done without any loss of life whatever, and today we are in the position where there is virtually no violence or intimidation. Unfortunately the action taken in the Northern Territories was not so prompt, and it led, as you know, to considerable loss of life in Nyasaland before law and order were restored. We believe this is due to vacillation caused by the fact that the Governments of the Northern Territories aren't really able to take the action they would like promptly because they have to consider all the time the effect on public opinion in Britain and in the British Parliament.

We feel that is most detrimental to the administration of the country and therefore, if we are really to establish law and order satisfactorily, the Governments of these Territories must be established here so that they can take the best possible action without having to worry about the political effect elsewhere.

The next object in the Preamble is to conduce to the advancement and welfare of the people. Here we are faced with a grave problem which is perhaps not fully understood, and that is the vast increase in the African population. The increase is terrific, and in 25 years' time it is expected to be doubled. The increases up to now have been absorbed quite satisfactorily on the land by the African people remaining there and cultivating it. Only a certain proportion came out into the urban areas.

In Nyasaland the land is very largely occupied, and the increased population is going to have to find employment elsewhere; and that is happening now in Southern Rhodesia as a result of the Land Husbandry Act.

During the next 25 years a great deal of employment will have to be found for many Africans, and unless we can meet this demand by increased industrialisation we are going to be faced with an unpleasant problem, which may well cause the starvation of a large number of people. Comparing the Territories again, we would point out that Southern Rhodesia on the whole has made very much greater progress in providing employment for the indigenous population. A large number of African workers come from Nyasaland in particular, and also from the borders outside, to Southern Rhodesia to work. We believe Southern Rhodesia, with its local government, has gone much further ahead in providing opportunities for employment and has also made greater progress than the Northern Territories in employing a greater number of the indigenous population.

To solve this problem of industrialisation, first of all we need political stability and also confidence in the countries to enable us to borrow large sums of money and to encourage new enterprise to come and establish itself here.

*See also evidence by A. T. Adams, General Secretary of the United Federal Party, at Salisbury, on 21st April, 1960, p. 161.

As regards the advancement and welfare of the people, the economic side is essentially handled by the Federal Government, and we submit that great progress has been made since Federation in this direction by sound government. The Federal Government has been able to borrow large sums of money and has been able to encourage people to come here and establish industries.

By contrast, the activities of the African Congresses, which have been disruptive activities and endeavours to thwart the rule of law, have led to a lack of confidence, particularly in the Northern Territories. It is very noticeable today that new industries coming in are reluctant to go to the Northern Territories. Most of the industries are coming into Southern Rhodesia. There are other reasons, of course, but the lack of confidence engendered by the congresses in the Northern Territories is having a serious effect there.

The Congress leaders are inclined to ignore this economic problem. We are well aware that there are many other political problems, but if one ignores the economic problem one is going to be in a serious state within a very few years, particularly in Nyasaland where there is this surplus population. If Nyasaland, by any chance, should cease to be a member of the Federation there may be very serious consequences to that country. There are at the moment almost 200,000 Nyasas working in Southern Rhodesia, but Southern Rhodesia is now having a certain trouble with unemployment in the African field, and quite recently legislation was passed preventing foreign Africans coming to work in Southern Rhodesia. That does not apply to Nyasaland Africans, as members of the Federation, but it would almost certainly if Nyasaland ceased to be part of the Federation.

If we are to progress at a great rate in this economic sphere, we believe it is vital to increase health facilities, education, and so on so that the utmost confidence can be established in the Federal Government. We believe it is necessary at this stage for the Federal Government to be granted its independence in the Federal sphere, to make it perfectly clear that Federation is here to stay and the Federal Government is a permanent government. Otherwise should this vote of confidence not be granted, the impression given is that it is a temporary government—and who is going to lend large sums of money to a temporary government?

The next object contained in the Preamble is to foster partnership and co-operation between the inhabitants. Many different views have been given on the meaning of "partnership". The two words "partnership" and "co-operation" are synonymous, and they mean working together to build up the state. We do not think it means what the extreme European element would like: it is not the same form of government as exists in South Africa.

Our conception of partnership in the political sphere has been put to you already by the General Secretary of this party, and what we are trying to do is to get the branches of the party, both African and European members, or African branches or European branches, to come together at the policy-making decisions at our congresses, so as to represent a party of people of all races. At our last congress in Lusaka we had a considerable number of people of non-European race: I think 25 per cent of the genuine delegates were non-European. In our party caucus we have managed to work together very well, and 25 per cent of our members are Africans.

It is very encouraging to know that we have never once had a discussion in that caucus on a basis of black versus white. We have found that all members examine the problems before them in the Federal House purely on the merits of the problem and not on a racial basis.

As you are aware, our conception is to establish a limited democracy, that is to limit the franchise to persons who are considered to be civilised and responsible. I am aware that is a very difficult conception to put into practice. We have drawn a line and we say that people above that line are considered to be responsible and civilised. I know, of course, that is a conception that can be challenged, but wherever you draw that line there are always going to be hard cases below it. This franchise has been established, and I would like to remind you that when it was introduced we of the Federal Government were the first to enable the protected persons of the Northern Territories to be considered on an equal basis with British citizens. The previous discrimination by the Colonial Office in those Territories, which did not allow the protected persons the same rights as a British citizen, was removed by us.

In laying down that franchise we have undoubtedly opened the way for a large number of Africans to go on to this roll, as the economic growth of the country proceeds, together with the educational growth of the people. We see a time not so far distant when there will be many Africans on that roll, and in due course there will be more Africans than Europeans.

What we aim to do in the meantime is to get people to work together politically in political parties of mixed races, so that when they appear in the Federal Legislature you will have both black and white on the parties of each side. Our aim is to get rid of this purely racial division of black versus white.

There are many racial discriminations in Southern Rhodesia. If you look at the situation today without knowing what it was a few years ago, no doubt many of you will be appalled at some of the discriminations you see. I would urge you to look at this not as a static situation but as one which is moving all the time; and to those of us who live in this country the change of thought among Europeans in Southern Rhodesia is most marked, and the advances that have taken place in the last few years are considerable. We shall undoubtedly go on removing these racial discriminations at an increasingly fast pace, because the thought of the European people has changed enormously in this direction. However, in the present politically uncertain state, particularly in the Northern Territories, Europeans are wondering what is going to happen next; and this is not an atmosphere likely to give them confidence and to get agreement for rapid removal of racial discriminations. What is required is to sort out the political uncertainty and then it will be much easier for the Government of Southern Rhodesia to remove these racial discriminations.

I would point out that the African Congresses of the Northern Territories appear to be completely opposed to partnership or co-operation. On many occasions they have stated they require those Territories purely for the Africans. We, as a party, are the one major political force in these Territories working genuinely for this co-operation. There is a long way to go, but we believe we have started on the right track and have laid a good foundation for better and faster progress in this direction.

One aspect of the British Government's policy for the Northern Territories which I believe interfered considerably with the working together, is the habit of inviting or encouraging African politicians from those Territories to deal direct with the British Government, over the head of their own local governments. This is undermining the authority of those governments, and does not encourage the politicians to work with the people in this country. This is one of the reasons why we are most anxious to obtain independence for the whole of the Federation, so that the people in the Federation shall work here together without the feeling that there is a right of appeal over the shoulders of local Governments. So long as that persists we feel the people will look elsewhere instead of trying to work together here with one another.

The next object in the Preamble is to enable the Federation, when the inhabitants so desire, to go forward with confidence towards the attainment of full membership with the Commonwealth. I look upon this as an injunction to all the governments to work towards that end. This immediately raises the difficult problem of consent. I believe it is possible for a government to govern a country with the passive consent of the people, provided that there is no active opposition; but where there is active opposition there also must be active consent: you cannot function without it.

To deny that there is opposition in the Northern Territories would be ridiculous. There is considerable opposition. In my opinion it could be divided into two types, the genuine opposition of the African people who, when they were presented with a scheme for Federation, felt that the racial practices of Southern Rhodesia would be extended to the Northern Territories. This fear was based on failure to understand the nature of Federation. At that time I would say it was not understood by many people. I remember Mr. Todd, who was then Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia saying that its basic object was to do Southern Rhodesia out of a job in four years. They were thinking in terms of a unitary state. It took some time before even Europeans also understood the nature of Federation, which is quite different from the unitary state. There was undoubtedly a genuine reason for this apprehension of the people of the Northern Territories that the practices might spread, but when the nature of Federation was fully understood it was found that instead of those practices spreading from the south, the far more liberal practices of the Northern Territories have spread to Southern Rhodesia. It was not clearly explained to the Northern Territories that matters which affect the day to day life of African do not come under the Federal Government but are purely the prerogative of the governments of the Northern Territories. It was a reasonable fear, based on the normal conservative approach of the African people. They distrust change until they see how it works. When they find it is all right they will accept it.

The other aspect of this opposition is that it has been deliberately stirred up by the Congress politicians. They have said as I mentioned, that discriminations practised in Southern Rhodesia will now be passed to the north, land will be taken away, and so on. One politician—and it was brilliantly done—even gave the impression that Southern Rhodesia is now governing Nyasaland, which, of course, is entirely contrary to the facts.

My opinion is that we must do much more about the genuine fears of the African people. It is a question of making contact with them. The Federal Government is in a difficult position here because the only sphere in which it really has direct contact with the people is in health. Nearly all the spheres where government officers have contact with people come under the Territorial Governments, so that a large part of the explanations of Federation on the government side lies in the hands of the Territorial Governments.

However, the Federal Government have taken steps, through its information service, to try to get across to the African people its conception of Federation and what it intends to do.

It has had very good co-operation from the Governments of Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, but virtually none from the Government of Northern Rhodesia. The other method of getting it across is through political parties. Here, we need to do much more to make this contact with the people. In the Northern Territories it is different; considerable steps have been taken, particularly in Nyasaland, to explain the matter but efforts have been thwarted every time by the intimidation and violence used by the Congresses. Many times in Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia, where Africans have understood the position and agreed to come out in support of us, immediately they have been clamped down on, either by Zambia, as it was in Northern Rhodesia, or the Nyasaland African Congress. The only way to get this across is by working through Africans of the same point of view as our own and spreading the doctrine, as it were, like ripples on a pool.

It is absolutely vital to stop this intimidation and violence, and when it is stopped we must make the greatest possible efforts to get across to the people as a whole the meaning of Federation, the fact that the Federal Government is there to assist them and not to take away any of their rights.

Those are the objects contained in the Preamble. We believe that in nearly all these cases the object can be attained far better by governments based here than elsewhere. I have already pointed out the question of internal security.

As far as the advancement and welfare of the people is concerned we believe it is our task to get on and do it; and we suggest that the Southern Rhodesia Government, apart from its racial practices, has, in fact, taken great steps to further the advancement and welfare of the people. Education is a particularly good example.

We believe the Federal Government's record of government over the past few years really entitles it to higher recognition. In its own sphere it has done a good job of work, and we maintain that at this stage it should receive independence in its own sphere, because events are emerging now which mean that it cannot stand still, but must either go forward or else Federation must disintegrate. We cannot remain indefinitely in a state of tutelage because it gives the impression to outside people that the Federation is a temporary thing, and we cannot satisfactorily govern in those circumstances.

The question is often asked: "Why do you want Nyasaland in the Federation?" "Why not get rid of it? It is just a nuisance to you". We here do not believe that to be the situation. If one looks further ahead, the other territories in Africa who have received their independence when they were in a very undeveloped state economically, and also as regards knowledge of government have either developed a dictatorship structure or the possibility of the whole thing disintegrating into tribal warfare. They are already established in the Sudan, and Ghana appears to be going rapidly in that direction. The possibility of tribal warfare is very great in the Belgian Congo. The other possibility is that, in the search for funds with which to develop the country, you will have Communist infiltration in this part of Africa. This is a real threat. There are already Communist activities in Liberia and the Sudan. A similar thing has happened in Eritrea. The Russians have started a technical school in Ethiopia which will include in its teaching Communist doctrines as well as other subjects. There is also the same thing happening in Guinea.

It is very probable that if Nyasaland leaves the Federation it will rely on Russian assistance. It is often said: "Britain will lend plenty of money should we get independence", but it is not very likely. Britain did not bolster up the Sudan when she got independence; Britain has now withdrawn her assistance from Ethiopia; and I do not see that she is liable to give unlimited sums of money to Nyasaland for a long time. If Nyasaland ceases to be a member of the Federation, the country would soon be in an appalling state. We are opposed to handing over any part of the Federation to a Congress-type government. What is more, should that occur in Northern Rhodesia we should be faced with a line on the Zambesi, with black nationalism to the north, and white nationalism to the south. That may lead to a situation where you have a major war between these two ideologies.

We believe that by making Federation work we will be able to prevent that. We are strongly opposed to the fact that where the British Government has handed over territories to people who are inexperienced there has been trouble. They have completely betrayed every loyal supporter in those territories. This is something which many African people in the Northern Territories fear at the moment. They are afraid the British Government may well hand the thing over to a Congress-type government and they fear the consequences.

As regards our plan for achieving independence, Dominion status is sometimes talked about. We do not like it because it is confusing. We prefer to talk of complete membership of the Commonwealth, which is self-explanatory, or independence in the Federal sphere, which is what we seek now.

At the moment the Federal Government in practice is very largely dependent in its own sphere; but there are certain reservations in the constitution, such as the power of veto by the British Government, which in actual law has the power to legislate for the Federation, if it wishes. That has been qualified by the 1957 declaration stating that it will not legislate for the Federal Government. However, on one occasion the Labour Party said they would not recognise that if they got into power. The Colonial Laws Validity Act, also applies to the Federation; the British Government appoints the Governor-General at the moment, who has considerable power under the Constitution. We are asking now that those restrictions be removed, and that the Governor-General be appointed on recommendations from here.

This does not do much more than give legal effect to what the present position is; but it is nevertheless important because those powers are there, and we consider the time has come when they should be removed.

We do not envisage at this stage that the Federation shall be entirely independent, inasmuch as it will be able to declare war on someone without the consent of the British Government, or conversely, that the British Government might declare war on someone but the Federation could opt out of it. In the sphere of international affairs we are not asking for complete independence, but a continuation of the present arrangement, whereby the Federal Government establishes its own High Commissioners in certain cases but in other matters deals through the British Foreign Service. There is no intention of the Federal Government to take over the powers of the British Government in the Territorial Governments. That is most important. A lot of confused thought has arisen on that. Many people thought the government wanted to take over Colonial Office powers in the Northern Territories. That is not so: We ask that the Federal Government should be independent in its own Federal sphere.

As far as the Territories are concerned, we believe that Southern Rhodesia should obtain its independence straight away. Regarding the Northern Territories, we advocate that the type of constitution to be introduced in Northern Rhodesia should be as nearly as possible similar to that granted to Southern Rhodesia in 1923. That is rather a vague term; but the intention is that Northern Rhodesia should be governed by a Cabinet and Prime Minister, in the same way as Southern Rhodesia is today, but with certain legislation to be subject to veto by the British Government, with restrictions in the Northern Rhodesia constitution similar to those we had in Southern Rhodesia in 1923, enabling the British Government to have considerable powers of veto.

One of the chief points here is that we are extremely anxious that the Civil Services of the Northern Territories and here should be locally based. It should not be recruited in Britain and it should look to this country as its home. We consider that to be of considerable importance.

We advocate a scheme for Nyasaland whereby an Executive should be nominated within Nyasaland. At the moment it is a purely nominated Executive; but again we try to get away from the Colonial Office because we feel the system of government which enables the day to day administration of the country to be the subject of questions in the House of Commons and publicity in Britain is not conducive to good government in the Territory itself. Therefore we advocate the system of an appointed Executive within Nyasaland, with a Legislative Assembly which is advisory but which could also have certain useful functions, such as Select Committees, to advise on legislation and suggest amendments to it.

In all these types of government, safeguards are obviously required. I will deal purely with the Federal Government at the moment: the powers we are asking to be removed from the British Government should be put into the hands of somebody here in the Federation which is representative of the people, to prevent the Legislature passing discriminatory measures; to delay, if need be, the alteration of the franchise; to make it more difficult to tamper with the franchise; and to make it considerably more difficult to alter the Constitution. We believe similar bodies should be established in the Northern Territories so that the British Government, in the first place, through nominations on these bodies, still has its ultimate power of control over the basic rights of the people, particularly in such matters as land.

From the party's point of view, we do not mind which type of safeguard is used though a strong safeguard is necessary; but if the British Government hands over to some body to safeguard those interests, then we are very much in favour of the thing being a really powerful body, to exercise a genuine stop on any discriminatory legislation which it may be wished to introduce. The real safeguard, however, is in the Federation itself—the fact that the Territorial Governments in each Territory deal with the matters that affect the day to day life of the Africans. It is correct to say that the Federal Government does not interfere in these matters; it has no power and it is purely up to the Territory to deal with them.

In the terms of reference we are also asked to suggest a constitutional programme. This was a difficult one on which to reach a conclusion. If one could ignore the events elsewhere in Africa and just consider a programme on the state of development of the people of this country, then one would logically spread out the programme over many years; but events are marching so fast elsewhere that we consider that this is quite impossible. The object of the programme, or what is required as soon as possible, is the independence of the Federal Government in the Federal sphere; the independence of the Territorial Government of Southern Rhodesia in its sphere; the advancement in constitutional development in Northern Rhodesia to a 1923-type constitution, for want of a better phrase—and the establishment of a form of government in Nyasaland whereby there will be persons appointed from within the Territory rather than persons overseas. That we consider to be the first step. Later on we consider that the reservations in the Constitution of Northern Rhodesia should be removed very slowly, step by step, as certain subjects no longer require to be vetoed. Those matters should come away from being reserved and that Northern Rhodesia will also then gain Territorial independence much the same as Southern Rhodesia; but we do not consider that that should take a very long period of time. We also take the same view of Nyasaland, that the reservations from the British Government in the first place should be removed to somebody within Nyasaland, again in a comparatively short space of time.

I have dealt very briefly with these matters because I think it will be much better by discussion to get to the bottom of them.

Our conclusion then is this: the first thing that we have to do to make this Federation really work is to establish the will to govern. In our view the will to govern appears to have been lost, particularly in Nyasaland, and we feel that by establishing Governments here with people who are really determined to make Federation work that the will to govern can be re-established and we can get on building up effectively, having established that the next point obviously is to establish the rule of law again, and we would point out here, Sir, that one of the things which is making it so difficult to establish rule of law in the North is the established idea in Northern Rhodesia, and it is thought by very many of the inhabitants that the British Government will hand those Territories over to the Congress movements of the North who themselves rely essentially on intimidation to get their own way. They say they speak for the whole of the African people yet they have to use this intimidation against the people they pretend are their supporters. We believe that this rule of law must be established and we believe also that when the rule of law is established that very many more people will be found to be in favour of Federation straight away than at present is apparent, and by going out to obtain the consent of the people by making it apparent how Federation is assisting them we are of the opinion that we can obtain consent of these people. We agree that there is a lot to be done on this point but we also consider that it most certainly can be done.

The next item will be the more rapid removal of the racial discrimination in Southern Rhodesia. I have already made the point that if the future is much clearer, the political situation much calmer, then I believe these racial discriminations can be removed at a considerably faster rate.

When we obtain political stability that we seek, then it will be possible to get on with the economic development of the country. It would be far easier to attract capital to this country and it will be possible to increase the earning power of all the people, which, as I have already pointed out, is so extremely vital in our view and will enable us to improve the educational facilities which in itself would ensure that far more Africans come on to the voters' roll and have a genuine say in Government; and we feel that this increased participation in Government will follow and is vitally important.

That, Sir, is our case fairly briefly. I am afraid it has taken a long time to say but we are convinced that this Federation can be made to work. There are any number of people who see the difficulties, and the difficulties are, of course, enormous in all directions, not only economic but politically as well. The difficulties are there but so many people will say it is too difficult, let us throw up our hands and divide. I do not agree with that because in our view we have not had a real opportunity to make it work as it should work because we believe that this form of Colonial Government of the Northern Territories where this thing is too far divorced does not enable the people to work together to make it a success; and we believe there are enough people in this country with the will to make it work and provided the intimidation and violence is overcome then we will be able to get together and make it work, and make it a great nation for which the potential is already apparent. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN: Thank you very much indeed. I think most of my colleagues will have some questions to ask. There are one or two I would like to put myself.

You deal with the Preamble of the Constitution and in particular you deal with the words "the enabling of 'the Federation, when those inhabitants so desire, to go forward with confidence towards full membership of the Commonwealth'", so that if one has to pay attention to those words in working out the programme, it is not possible to contemplate the attainment of full membership of the Commonwealth until the inhabitants have so desired; is that not so?

A: That is our view, but we are not prepared to say how you can actually measure it, but one must obviously get rid of the definite hostility to it before we can attain full membership of the Commonwealth.

Q: It does not say when the Governments of the Territories so desire, but when the inhabitants so desire; and I suppose you would agree that involves those who act for the Territories and when they are in a position to speak with the assent of the majority of the Africans so far as they are represented?

A: Yes, I agree with that view. I do not think you can actually measure it, but one must think you can do it by a referendum or anything of that nature, but I think the stage will come in actual practice. It is a question of independence given to the Territorial Governments of the Northern Territories which will come when it is apparent that there is sufficient agreement within the Territories that the other stage is desired, and when that stage is desired full membership of the Commonwealth is almost a formality because independence has been achieved.

Q: If you were working out a programme it would be very hard to postulate independence in a full sense for the Federation until the inhabitants have been able to give an expression by some means which had been thought sufficient of a desire for such a move?

A: Yes.

Q: If you are taking independence in the Federal sphere, the same considerations to some extent apply, do they not?

A: They could be made to apply, but I do not think they necessarily do because we maintain that this independence in the Federal sphere, which is merely giving a legal validity to the present practice, is necessary to reach the stage in development where the inhabitants can really progress to the stage where they can, if you like, express an opinion.

Q: I understand the desirability of getting that consent; but I was only wondering on the question of the programme if a good deal of importance would not be attached psychologically by the inhabitants of Territories other than Southern Rhodesia to the grant of independence in this Federal sphere before they can express a view saying it is to happen?

A. (MR. COLLINS): The grant of independence in the Federal sphere is to a large extent a formality.

Q: Why are you pressing for it so much?

A: Because it is of considerable importance in the eyes of the outside world that we should have the status that we believe we deserve.

Q: I am only suggesting to you for your consideration that it is of considerable importance in your attempts to persuade all the Territories to come into this idea of partnership that they should not be faced with a step of such psychological importance, to which as you say there is not very much practical importance at this moment?

A: There is, of course, as Mr. Duncan mentioned, the practical danger that one Party in the United Kingdom has said it will not observe the terms of the 1957 Declaration. That is of very considerable practical importance to us. We admit that on practically all the other issues the practice of the Government in the United Kingdom is such that there is no particular need to worry about it, except from the point of view of our status and the other matters which Mr. Duncan mentioned.

MR. MENZIES: I would like to stress what you have said. We are dealing here with a federal instrument, the instrument of government known as your Constitution, and the words in the Preamble are quite expressive: That the Federation, when those inhabitants so desire, to go forward with confidence towards full membership of the Commonwealth—words could not be clearer, that the move even on the federal plane towards full membership is conditioned upon the desire of the inhabitants, whatever these words mean, and I do not think you can ask for full membership of the Commonwealth unless you can assure some authority that the whole of the inhabitants, not every person, but the full membership of the Federation, desire that move.

A. (MR. DUNCAN): We agree with that entirely. We are not asking for full membership of the Commonwealth at this stage. We maintain that you can only have full membership of the Commonwealth when the Territories of the Northern Territorial Governments are independent of Britain, and we are not asking for that at this stage. We grant that one must obtain a reasonable degree of consent before membership of the Commonwealth can be obtained.

Q: How much assured are you on your proposition of full membership of the Commonwealth?

A: Very considerably in the Northern Territories on this line. As we understand it, to obtain full membership of the Commonwealth, it would be necessary for the Territorial Governments of the North to be virtually independent, as we are asking for Southern Rhodesia to be at the moment. Under our proposals now we are not proposing that the Northern Rhodesia Government should be independent of Britain. We are proposing that Britain should still have considerable powers of veto and right to legislate in Northern Rhodesia, and that they should also have considerable say in Britain on Nyasaland, so we are not asking for full membership.

Q: How does full membership of the Commonwealth come down to the Territorial sphere? You are in the Federal domain now and one of the Commonwealth of Nations?

A: We maintain that Federation as a whole cannot be maintained until its Territories are also independent, almost totally. I am aware that in Australia I think the Colonial Laws Validity Act works in some of the States but that is a comparatively minor reservation, but at the moment under our programme there are major reservations in the Northern Territories to the British Government. We maintain we cannot become a full member of the Commonwealth until this reservation of the Territorial sphere is also removed. So at this stage we are asking for independence of the Federal Government in the Federal sphere which we maintain is not the same as full membership of the Commonwealth, and we feel this is necessary and would go on building up the Federation to the extent that the consent of the inhabitants can be acquired for the eventual full membership of the Commonwealth.

(MRS. ROSEN): I would say what we are asking for is legislation of the position as it is at the moment. The full independence, that is restrictions are taken away from the Federal Government which in fact operates under the 1957 Agreement, for the two reasons which have been given: (1) possibility that a change of Government in Great Britain might not accept this or might turn against this; and (2) to give certain status and to give strength to the Federal Government, and in the view of our Party this is taking steps forward to a stage where the agreement of the people to full membership of the Commonwealth can be attained. We read this Preamble as meaning that we should do everything within the Federation to lead to a state within the Federation where all the people will desire us to have full membership of the Commonwealth, and to have that we feel there must be stability in the Federal Government. People must realize that within the Federal sphere the Federal Government has strength and has status and is able to carry on its work within the Federal sphere without interference. I do not think this in any way cuts across the desire of any lawful inhabitants. I think it is simply a step towards realization of what Federation is and after all we have been operating under this for the last seven years and nobody has suffered from it.

CHAIRMAN: As I understand it, Health is a concurrent subject under the Constitution and in fact the Federation has moved into that sphere as it was fully entitled to do. In that sphere which they will have adopted they would get independence under your wish?

A. (MR. DUNCAN): Yes.

Q: Supposing under that independence they were to pass a law in relation to Health which was thought to be discriminatory against Africans. What steps would be open to you?

A. (MR. COLLINS): That is where we erect some form of superior body which we have mentioned.

Q: On this assumption there would be nothing which the United Kingdom could do?

A: No, but before we reach that stage the superior body in which the United Kingdom Government would have had to have confidence would have been erected.

Q: If that is going to happen, you would then suggest, among others possibly the Senate?

A: Among others.

Q: Let us take the Senate which is dealt with more concretely, but the Senate would be a body of which there would be not more than half Africans; is that right, fifteen I think the number was?

A. (MR. DUNCAN): Yes, one of each.

(MRS. ROSEN): That was a suggestion.

Q: Of course there is one thing, the way in which the Chairman or Presiding Officer of the Senate would be selected, but I gather he would have under this proposal a casting vote. There is not very much certain security in that if their majority is unlikely to be other than a Government majority?

A. (MR. COLLINS): That is why Mr. Duncan, in his opening remarks, stressed that we did not mind how stringent the safeguards are, and if you find that objection in the suggestion of a Senate, we do not feel strongly. All we suggest is that some body which is based out here should exercise these powers.

Q: I gather that the body in the form which you put it to us would be prepared to follow but not to prevent legislation if it was discriminatory?

A. (MR. DUNCAN): That is the form it is in at the moment but as we have already said we are perfectly agreeable to go further in this matter. We consider basically that the higher authority whichever it is—and personally I think that I would prefer a Constitutional Council, but that is purely a personal matter—should have genuine teeth, and it should definitely be able to stop anything that is discriminatory. We are perfectly agreeable to that because we feel that it is undoubtedly our duty to produce some scheme whereby that body does have this power purely to get away from the accusation that we are trying to usurp powers from the United Kingdom Government.

Q: Discrimination is a very important part of this thing, and it would not do to assume that all discrimination ought to be avoided. There are elements of discrimination in a particular case which in the general interests of the public would have to be retained.

A: Yes. I think that is a good argument possibly against the Bill of Rights, because whatever the highest body is it must be able to decide whether it is to the advantage of the people. As you say, many discriminations are to the advantage of the people and if you have a body locally elected on which there could be just as much African representation, if not more, they very likely will have to agree to legislation which is discriminatory because it is in favour of the people. What one has to produce is terms of reference whereby they prevent discriminatory legislation which is harmful to others.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: I am sure you want your approach to this matter to be a thoroughly logical one.

A: As logical as possible.

Q: I hope you will not mind if I try to follow that up for a little and see how it works. You have told us that you consider the present form of government in the Northern Territories to be unsatisfactory, that the remoteness of the Colonial Office in London is one of the reasons and that the Territorial Governments have failed to enforce law and order. What worries me a little about this is the enforcement of law and order, establishment of the rule of law as you call it, is the responsibility of the Territorial Governments. Nothing that you have said this morning suggests that there is going to be any change in their powers, so how are you going to carry out your first essential objectives that you stated in your conclusions—to establish the will to govern, to establish the rule of law? How is the Federal Government going to do that when the powers are in the hands of the Territorial Governments?

A: No, I am sorry, I was not meaning to say the Federal Government was going to do it. Granted we are speaking for the Federal Standing Committee of the United Federal Party, but I have gone very much further and put the Party's view of Territorial matters in the Territories. I am not suggesting that a Federal Government should interfere with the establishment of law and order in Territorial spheres. We believe as a Party that if Territorial Governments in the Northern Territories are based here and are free from the difficulties of having day-to-day administration dealt with in Britain and the appeal of African politicians over the heads of the local Governments, if those Governments are established here and work here, that they will in fact have a greater interest, if you like, in being perfectly certain that they establish law and order by the Territorial Government. We realize that this is going to be a very great task, no matter who has the task of establishing law and order. Particularly in Nyasaland it is going to be a very considerable task, and we fail to see how a considerable degree of force will be avoided. But we would point this out, and that is endemic in the situation today, whether Colonial Office governed or locally appointed Government, that action will have to be taken or else the thing will have to be handed over to the Congress Parties who themselves rule by force. There is force in this. You cannot get away from it, the Congress Parties impose their will on the people by force.

Q: It is an essential part of your programme if you are to reach those objectives that you stress very strongly at the end of your speech, it is essential that there should be certain changes in the Territorial Governments?

A: Yes.

Q: Then you may have to consider what those are because you must proceed on certain assumptions, and I think we are clear that in order to get the situation in hand so that the Federal Government can proceed on the lines you want to see it go on, you have to have some alteration in the Territorial Constitution?

A: Yes.

Q: I want to clear one matter out of the way. In paragraph 172 of your bible, I thought you might be referring to that because it is there suggested that in the case of emergency: "In a Federal emergency, Territorial laws may be suspended or temporarily amended and in a Territorial emergency, Federal laws may be similarly dealt with unless the Federal Government objects." It is quite clear that when you are talking about establishing the will to govern and rule of law, you were not contemplating that?

A: No, I was not. I was contemplating the establishment of the Governments in the Northern Territories locally essentially. I gather these emergency powers come under what has been tested by the West Indian Constitution.

Q: I am much obliged. As regards this assumption we must make as regards the alterations to the Territorial Constitution which I think you have told us is inherent in your plan, in this document you do refer to a programme in paragraph 12 as regards the Constitution in which the Territorial Governments have progressed to full self-government, independent of the United Kingdom, in the spheres of government that are territorial. That is the machinery that would have to be dealt with in the law and order situation?

A: Yes.

Q: Then in paragraph 84, substantial changes which ought to be made in the 1960 Review in the Constitution of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland in the direction of responsible or representative government. Could you tell us what form of Territorial Government you are assuming which would be independent of the Colonial Office, and yet also independent of the Federal Government and would achieve the objectives that you want to see?

A: In Northern Rhodesia—and after all the Government of Southern Rhodesia has had it since 1923—that is a locally elected Government with franchise similar to the federal franchise with a Prime Minister and Cabinet locally.

Q: Northern Rhodesia now?

A: Yes.

Q: Next year?

A: As soon as possible.

Q: And in Nyasaland?

A: A completely different type of government because we maintain in Nyasaland the persons there have had no training in the form of democratic government, virtually no training, and we foresee that it will be necessary to have a type of appointed government at the moment. At the moment the Government is an appointed government, appointed by the Colonial Office. Our idea is that it should not be appointed by the Colonial Office. In the first place the Governor should be in charge, that there should be a Constitutional Council drawn from people of the highest standard there, and that the Executive Council should be appointed by these bodies, by the Constitutional Council and Governor. The Legislative Assembly should be the elected Assembly which in the first place should operate as an advisory body, advising on amendments to Bills and policy, working on various forms of Select Committee but without power to veto actions of the Executive Council.

Q: You contemplate a Government of that kind should be operating next year, with the power of life and death in Nyasaland and with no control whatever from the United Kingdom?

A: No direct control but the Governor will be the king-pin in the procedure.

Q: The local dictator?

A: Yes.

Q: Thank you.

A. (MR. SAWYER): I think in any event the United Kingdom can still grant independence we seek in the federal sphere even before the various Governments have achieved the position. I think it is quite clear that no such thing as Dominion status, full membership of the Commonwealth, can be granted until the territories have attained independence. I do not think we can argue that independence in the federal sphere, can await the setting up of these Governments.

CHAIRMAN: As I understand it, some of the argument addressed to us this morning was a little critical of control from 6,000 miles off, and I wondered to whom the Governor would be responsible?

A. (MR. COLLINS): At the moment he is presumably still responsible to the United Kingdom. I do not see how that can be avoided.

Q: I do not see how questions in the House of Commons are going to be avoided.

A: It is a difficult one, I admit.

(MRS. ROSEN): I think questions in the House of Commons would be limited in the same way as questions in the House of Commons were limited as far as Southern Rhodesia was concerned from 1923, and if you establish in Nyasaland this Constitutional Council and legislative body which is based in Nyasaland, there will have to be some constitutional way by which the Governor again will have a right of veto or reference on certain matters and not on everything, probably on discriminatory matters again. We want to get away from the fact that the Federation or any part should be a political football in the House of Commons.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: Again I am not sure that you appreciate that I am not being critical or still less discourteous, but we are trying to understand. Is it not the really logical answer to the whole of your problem, as you put it to us this morning, that there should be amalgamation and not federation, so the Federal Government has complete control over what goes on in Nyasaland?

A. (MR. DUNCAN): No, we do not agree with the unitary State because the various territories are at different stages of development and they develop along their own lines, and that is one thing that we have been accused of all the time by African politicians in the North, that the white settler is to take over the Northern Territories. We have no desire to do that and we maintain that the territorial spheres of the Northern territories are developing according to their particular composition.

MR. ROBINSON: May I devolve a little further into the interesting question of the proposals you are making for the new Constitutions for the two Northern Territories. I would like to begin with Nyasaland. It always has been an established principle in the Commonwealth that a Government is either responsible to the Secretary of State or the Government is responsible to an electorate in that colony. I do not think that it has ever been contemplated that you are going to create more or less an independent dictator in the form of a Governor, but that is apparently what you want to do in the case of Nyasaland in the immediate future. It is suggested that he should be advised by some kind of Select Council of wise men, and they are apparently to help him in choosing Ministers or Executive Councils from Nyasaland. Have I got that right? This is a new idea.

A: Yes, that is correct.

Q: When something happens in Nyasaland, to whom is the Governor and his Council responsible?

A: The Governor eventually is responsible to the British Government in that he is appointed by the British Government for his period of office. But, as Mrs. Rosen has said, this is an attempt to get day-to-day administration of Nyasaland away from the influences it has had to suffer over the last few years in Britain. We maintain with the present set-up in Nyasaland the Government has really pretty well ceased to function, and it is not surprising when you have a Commission of Inquiry, such as the Southworth Commission into the manner in which the Police handled the crowd, it completely destroys confidence of the Police, and it has become almost impossible, we believe, for the Government of Nyasaland to operate under the present circumstances. We therefore produce these proposals to try and overcome that particular difficulty, and the idea was that the Governor should be appointed by the British Government and that certain specified measures should again be subject to the veto and so on, as is contained in the other Constitutions. I am aware it is a novel system of government, but we maintain that the present system of government has failed and something stronger must be replaced.

Q: I am only anxious to see whether the new system is going to work. Let us take the important case of the arrest and subsequent release of Dr. Banda. That was a matter of the very highest importance. That was a political issue which was of the greatest importance to the whole Federation and which attracted attention in other parts of the world. Under your system presumably the Governor will continue to act under the orders of the Secretary of State?

A: No, not in day-to-day administration.

Q: Are you going to call the arrest of Dr. Banda and release day-to-day administration?

A: I think the arrest of anyone who deals with intimidation and violence undoubtedly comes under the day-to-day administration.

Q: This is a matter of the highest political importance and it is quite obvious that the British House of Commons would certainly not agree to a matter of that kind being dealt with by a Governor who was not responsible in doing so to anybody, and I am not able to find out what other body it would be other than the Secretary of State?

A: Ultimately I agree he would be responsible to the Secretary of State; but we do not agree that matters such as the arrest of anybody who deals in criminal activities should be a matter for discussion in the House of Commons.

Q: Exactly how are you distinguishing between matters which are to be considered in the House of Commons and those which are not?

A: I think you draw up a legislative list of those that are.

Q: The arrest without trial of somebody who is considered to be dangerous is not one of the matters that should be discussed in the House of Commons?

A: I agree under this system I do not like arrest without trial any more than anyone else; but if you are to have legislation to deal with these people, and a proper charge brought against them, and deal with cases of trouble in Nyasaland, there appears to be no way of dealing with the situation.

Q: I will leave Nyasaland but I think it will be a little difficult to establish a Constitution to work satisfactorily. Coming to Northern Rhodesia, there your proposal is immediately a Constitution similar to that of Southern Rhodesia of 1923 should be introduced. Is it your proposal that there should be no considerable widening of the franchise?

A. (MR. RICH): We do not feel that the franchise should be widened at this stage. It is the basis of the future of the Territory, the whole idea is to keep government in the hands of responsible, civilized people, and we feel that the franchise as at present framed achieves that end. The African in the last Territorial election had considerable sway in two instances, in fact it resulted in the defeat of one European candidate in one case; in the other, it undoubtedly resulted in the election of a European candidate.

Q: Are you aware that the proportion of votes of Europeans in Southern Rhodesia is 68%, and the total of the European population is approximately 3% of the total population?

A: Yes.

Q: You are really suggesting that constitutional Government responsible to the Legislature should be set up there with all the same powers which the Southern Rhodesia Government enjoys at the present time, and it should be responsible to an electorate of which 68% are European, and Europeans are only 3% of the population?

A: That is the effect of it at the moment, but those figures will undoubtedly vary as times goes on and the number of Africans will undoubtedly increase.

Q: But you are insistent that this Constitution should be introduced next year?

A: I feel personally there should be steps towards it. In three or four years' time that will be the situation.

Q: It is the intention of the United Federal Party that a constitution should be introduced analogous to that which was introduced in Southern Rhodesia in 1923?

A: Surely there are similar situations in Northern Rhodesia to the situation as it was in Southern Rhodesia at that time: In Southern Rhodesia there have been important improvements in a very short time.

(MRS. ROSEN): You are thinking in terms of Africans and Europeans, whereas we are thinking in terms of responsible people, people who have the vote and can exercise discrimination when going to the polls. We are thinking in terms of people who can select a government which can rule for the benefit of the people, which is part of democracy, it is not just rule by the people but for the people. We believe we have developed a system which is good, although we have had to create an arbitrary line, just as the age of 21 in other countries is an arbitrary line. There must be this line somewhere in every franchise, and we have drawn it where we believe people have acquired discrimination, to distinguish them from those who are not yet at that stage. We feel it is wrong to think about these matters in racial terms. We are trying to build up a country of Rhodesians and Nyasalanders, not a country of black and white. The whole conception of the United Federal Party is to go along those lines. We do not think it matters whether it is 68 per cent European or 68 per cent African, so long as the people on the voters' roll are people who can choose the right type of legislators, who will help the country along towards whatever system the country wants.

Q: Do you think that will appear to be an entirely reasonable arrangement for the great majority of the people in the Northern Territories, and that a system of that kind is likely to reconcile them to Federation?

A: In Northern Rhodesia there is the arrangement of values and votes which has allowed for special representation. I think the franchise arrangements there could be carried on in a similar manner but with a properly elected government. We do not want to get away from the slightly artificial arrangement whereby Africans have got into the Northern Rhodesian Government; but we want to feel there is a government there elected by the people with its own Cabinet and Prime Minister, running its affairs within the country.

MR. JUSTICE BEADLE: Have you paid enough regard to the statement which has been repeatedly made by the British Government and which was re-affirmed by Mr. Macmillan in Salisbury a few weeks ago, that Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom will not remove her protection from the Northern Territories until the Government is satisfied that the mass of the people so desired? If you are suggesting a government in Northern Rhodesia similar to the Southern Rhodesian Constitution of 1923, Her Majesty's Government will in effect be removing her protection from Northern Rhodesia without in any way ascertaining the views of what most of the people desire. How do you meet that one?

A. (MR. CHIPUNZA): The United Federal Party has taken heed of this statement by Mr. Macmillan. There has been no attempt whatsoever to remove the protection of the people from Britain, but what is important at this juncture is that within these Territories there must be enough confidence instilled in the people; and that can only come about when you have a locally-based government that will breathe the spirit of the land. You can only do it by trying to organise things in such a way that the people on the spot have a greater say in their affairs without necessarily removing the protection the people have had. There is no other way you can bring about confidence and stability unless you have the people themselves having a stake and a much greater say. At the moment one of the most disturbing things is that our lives here have virtually become a permanent period of emergency, because we are always at the mercy of whoever is in power in Britain. I think we would all agree that the various Ministers of State in Britain have never been consistent: things have been changing all the time, and people feel we cannot go on like that. We must give the people a greater say. One may complain about the franchise, but when Northern Rhodesia had its first election African voters had a say. In Southern Rhodesia, although there is not a single African in the Southern Rhodesian Legislature there is no doubt that any political party today cannot ignore the wishes of the African people. Although there are few voters, no party or politician can ignore that.

Q: What I was asking was how can you reconcile giving Northern Rhodesia a constitution similar to Southern Rhodesia with the statement made by Mr. Macmillan in Salisbury; because unless you can reconcile those I cannot see how you have any reasonable possibility of getting it. It is no use recommending something which is going to conflict absolutely with the statement made by the British Prime Minister.

A: (MR. DUNCAN): It depends on the interpretation of "British protection". My view does not necessarily mean to say that the Colonial Office has to have a majority in the Government of Northern Rhodesia. Surely the British protection is there when you have still in the Constitution the right of the British Government to legislate for Northern Rhodesia, a complete right of veto, and so on. We are not asking for Northern Rhodesia to have complete independence in the Territorial sphere. That would take it out of British protection, I agree; but as long as the British Government has the final say in the form of veto and the right to legislate, the protection is there.

Q: But is not British protection in the sense that it was used by Mr. Macmillan a term meaning that those states would in effect remain British Protectorates until such time as the people in those countries wished otherwise. I am trying to find out whether you could get something which you are asking for without asking the British Government to go back on an undertaking. Unless you can do that we are chasing moonbeams.

A. (MR. SAWYER): My reading of Mr. Macmillan's statements in Salisbury was not that there would be no further advance in the Northern Territories constitutionally, but that he would not hand over British powers to a Dominion in the Federation until such time as there was evidence of consent. What we are proposing is an advance short of full independence.

Q: Surely what he meant was that the ultimate responsibility must rest with the British Government? There is a fundamental difference in a government like the Southern Rhodesian Constitution, one which is responsible to an electorate and not responsible to the British Government in the United Kingdom. The suggestion you made for Nyasaland would not conflict with what Mr. Macmillan said because in such a situation the Government must remain responsible to the Secretary of State, and that must remain a Protectorate form of government.

A. (MR. DUNCAN): In its normal working, a government such as that of Southern Rhodesia is responsible to the electorate, but I maintain that if the United Kingdom retains the right of veto and the right to legislate for those Territories, it still retains the ultimate right of government there. It would be a locally elected government which deals with normal administration, so long as the British Government has the ultimate power to legislate for it, if it wants to.

Q: You maintain the Southern Rhodesia constitution of 1923 still left it in the position of being a Protectorate?

A: No, it was declared a colony before that. That may be splitting hairs; but I do not think the Southern Rhodesia-type government would necessarily have been inconsistent in a Protectorate. You could still have a Protectorate with that degree of self-government.

CHAIRMAN: That is to remain until it is quite clear that the expressed wish of their peoples is to enter into and form an independent Federation?

A: Yes, sir. That is not inconsistent with what we have said. We are not asking for full and independent Federation at this stage. When you get that you get to the stage of full membership of the Commonwealth.

MR. GONDWE: As regards Nyasaland, the United Federal Party do not want to see a government of Africans. They feel such a government would cause trouble, as there was in 1953.

A: No, what we are opposed to is not African government in Nyasaland but a government led by a party which gets its support by intimidation and violence. We are opposed to the government being handed over in Nyasaland to a party which intimidates people and will not allow freedom of expression.

Q: If the Legislative Council in Nyasaland is going to be an elected body, how are you going to avoid electing members of the Malawi Congress Party, or some other party?

A. (MR. COLLINS): You cannot avoid it. That is the whole purpose of the suggested Constitution; so that for a period of years there shall be some restraint on the powers of the elected legislature, to give time for political parties and for political responsibility to develop, in Nyasaland. That may be hopeful, but it is after all the only hope. You undoubtedly will get members of the Malawi party in the Legislature: you cannot avoid it.

Q: You want to have an Executive Council which is nominated. Is there any precedent anywhere at all for this?

A: The present one.

Q: The people of Nyasaland would like to see a responsible government. I quite understand the United Federal Party would also like to see that; but are you aware that opposition to Federation in Nyasaland is based on this point, that the continued presence of Federation or Nyasaland being in the Federation for all time, would mean there would not be any self-government for Africans?

A: No: the question, as postulated, was not correct. We are opposed to self-government in Nyasaland at present because we do not think that Nyasaland has reached a stage where it is possible, but we are not opposed to it in principle; we recognise it must and will come. If it is the case that the Nyasaland African objects to Federation because he believes that it is standing in the way of achieving responsible government there, I do not believe it is. I see no reason why it should.

PROFESSOR CREIGHTON: Referring to the general objectives set out in paragraphs 93-95, item 1 in the Federal Legislature list is "External Affairs". Then you go on to other items. In fact, the measure of freedom inside that has been limited, has it not?

A: Yes, But we consider the present arrangement works well whereby, by agreement between the Governments, the Federal Government deals with certain aspects of foreign affairs, for instance, there is the establishment of the High Commission in certain places; but we do not want Her Majesty's Government to take over completely in that field. We consider there should be no basic alterations in that field.

Q: So that for practical purposes in external affairs the position would remain exactly the same as it is at present under your proposal?

A: That is correct.

Q: Dealing with internal affairs in paragraph 98, you set out a list of restrictions on the constitution upon its freedom of action. As regards (1), within the history of the Federation only two statutes have been reserved. The United Kingdom, in fact, restored them to validity, so that no validity has been impaired by that?

A: That is correct.

Q: As regards (3), have you in fact bumped against the Colonial Laws Validity Act in any respect?

A: No. It is not a major item.

Q: Then (4), referring to the appointment of the Governor-General, in point of fact he is appointed with your approval, is he not?

A: Certainly the advice of the Federal Prime Minister has been taken, but the ultimate responsibility lies with advice from the United Kingdom Government.

Q: I assume that approval is generally sought in advance?

A: Yes.

Q: As regards (2), this convention which has been recognised in fact meets your requirements, and the only difficulty is because of the implied threat of the Labour Party that it might not abide by the terms of this agreement?

A: That is correct.

Q: In all other things you have nothing to say at all as regards internal legislation. You are, in actual fact, as free as you want to be in theory?

A: Yes.

Q: Then it boils down to this item. I suppose constitutionally the Labour Party would be just as ready to repudiate a statute as to repudiate a convention, would it not?

A: I imagine constitutionally it might be able to, but I am not a constitutional lawyer.

Q: But this is the only ultimate objective you have, to increase the stability of the Federation and to promote the confidence of its citizens and advance the respect of the outside world?

A: Yes, I think the respect of the outside world is very important. The whole position of confidence at the moment, due to political uncertainty—there is great talk of disruption of Federation. We want to make clear that there is no question of disruption and that the Federation will prosper. By granting independence in these matters—as you point out, there is not any great practical difference between the present situation—it will give that confidence and authority to the Federal Government.

Q: It puzzles me to see how far this objective can be obtained by the mere legislation by what is in fact the continued existence of present arrangements. You are legalising the existing state of affairs in internal affairs. You attach very considerable importance to this achievement?

A: Yes.

Q: But you must also be aware that there are sections of opinion in the country which view it with considerable alarm. Why then do you press for something which in reality is nugatory when it may, in fact, divide the population of this country very seriously?

A: As I have already said, we consider this question of the vote of confidence in the Federal Government to be of vital interest to us. It is opposed by the African political leaders who wish to disrupt the Federation. This is the crux of the matter—is the Federation to continue and to build up, or is it not? We maintain it must do, and we want it clearly declared by the British Government that it is going to do so. We believe that when it is made abundantly clear to all it will be very much easier to work the Federation internally because confidence will be there that Federal government is here to stay. These uncertainties create a very difficult situation with the indigenous population, because they do not know what is going to happen next and they become perturbed, which leads to political turmoil.

Q: It is difficult to understand how you can in fact create confidence and have increased stability when in fact you will be exacerbating a division of opinion which exists over this matter. The people in the north really believe that the achievement of your objectives would limit or restrict the guardianship which they believe is essential to their existence. In actual fact the argument is over a comparatively trifling number of things.

A. (MR. SAWYER): I would not agree these were trifling things or just a legalisation of the position. The resident of any particular Territory in the Federation would normally look to his own Territorial Government and then to the Federal Government. The whole thing is bedevilled by having a further loyalty to yet a third government. As Mr. Duncan pointed out, it has led to extreme confusion in people's minds. If there were only two loyalties, more permanency and stability would be attained.

Q: Other Federations have grown up inside the Commonwealth with this double or treble loyalty between the internal states and the United Kingdom. Australia was past the quarter century before it achieved the things you wanted in seven years, and Canada was nearly 60 years. Why are you in such a hurry?

A. (MR. DUNCAN): The rest of Africa is in such a hurry.

Q: Do you want to emulate them?

A. (MR. DUNCAN): No, but if we are going to be left behind and the British Government is not prepared to grant even this degree of independence to the Federal Government, it merely gives the impression that the Federation is a temporary state. We maintain it must become permanent.

Q: You want to build a British Dominion in Central Africa, do you not?

A: Yes.

Q: Is this not one of the best ways of building it?

A: I do not know that it is. It does not help to have another government looking over your shoulder to see that you govern properly.

MR. CRAWLEY: You claim independence for the Federal sphere in order to emphasise that the Federation is permanent. How do you reconcile that with what Sir Edgar Whitehead said that if changes were agreed in the constitutional conference which Southern Rhodesia did not like, she would feel able and entitled to leave the Federation?

A: I cannot agree that Sir Edgar has actually said Southern Rhodesia would be entitled to leave the Federation. I am fairly familiar with his thinking on this point.

Q: I am not referring to his thinking but to what he said.

A: You will have seen the press report of what he said, presumably—I do not know what it does say.

Q: No. I have it from the Federal News Letter.

A. (MR. SAWYER): I do not think Sir Edgar ever said he would go back and hold a referendum on the basis of secession. The broad import was that if there were two black nationalist states in the Northern Territories, which would lead to reactionary troubles, the whole thing would be untenable.

Q: But he nevertheless maintained the right of Southern Rhodesia to leave the Federation?

A. (MR. DUNCAN): No, I cannot agree. I was at a meeting when Sir Edgar was asked whether Southern Rhodesia had a right to secede. He said that by law it had not, and the only way secession could come about was by agreement between the governments. That is our interpretation.

MR. MOLSON: The full text of the speech is here, and the first is the report in The Times; "He did not believe that if the Governments in both Northern Territories were operated on a nationalist basis by African nationalists the Southern Rhodesian electorate would consider remaining federated with the two governments on that basis." When he was speaking later in the Legislative Assembly he said, "That is why I said the other day that if African nationalists"—and the emphasis was on nationalism—"take over in both the Northern Territories I thought it would be almost impossible for us to remain in the Federation." Those are the two texts, and the second one is authentic because it comes from Hansard.

A: I think that is compatible with what Mr. Sawyer said. He is not stating that Southern Rhodesia can unilaterally secede in either of those cases: he has merely said the electorate would be thoroughly opposed to being joined with two Congress-type governments in the north. When asked whether Southern Rhodesia had the right to secede unilaterally at this meeting, he said quite definitely that it had not. The only way was by agreement between the various Governments. That is the position.

MR. ROBINSON: It may be of interest to the Commission to know that I heard Sir Edgar Whitehead on Saturday night in an interview on the B.B.C. and he made this statement: "I have deliberately never used the word 'secede'. I have merely indicated that certain circumstances might not make it work." That was in answer to a question on the B.B.C. on Saturday night which was relayed here.

MR. CRAWLEY: He may not have used the word "secession" but he used the words "not be able to remain in the Federation." There may be a distinction there but I cannot see it. As regards your proposal in Nyasaland, you said the Governor could be appointed by the United Kingdom. If a Governor can be appointed, he can also be removed?

A: Yes.

Q: You re-defined partnership. Would you say from your experience that the use of the word "partnership" has been misleading and would you like to substitute in a new Constitution some other word?

A: I think the word "co-operation" is more satisfactory, because when the word "partnership" was first used it was considered to mean immediate equality. I am perfectly willing to agree that partnership will mean equality as an aim. We are aiming at getting individuals, no matter what race, treated entirely equally, but when you start with a position where everything is unequal you cannot make it equal overnight. I think the word "co-operation" is a more satisfactory one.

MR. TAYLOR: Regarding the proposed Constitution of Nyasaland, we received a paper there explaining this form of Legislative Assembly, and as I recall it the suggestion was made that the Legislative Assembly would be elected on the basis of a very wide franchise—almost one man one vote—and the Executive Council would be nominated. Only the Executive Council had the power to introduce Bills into the Legislative Assembly, and the Legislative Assembly had to approve, in the normal parliamentary manner, all such Bills as were presented to it, except that if it refused to pass a measure which the Governor, as the head of the Executive, considered should not be delayed in the public interest, such as a money bill or a budget, he would exercise a more or less United States presidential veto on the right of the Assembly to hold up the passage of that legislation. That I think is rather different to the Legislative Assembly having only advisory powers, which we have been told they would have. Have I summed up accurately, very briefly, the sort of constitutional arrangement that you want in Nyasaland, or has there been some change in the memorandum?

A. (MR. COLLINS): With the greatest respect, I have the memorandum before me which was submitted to you by the Nyasaland division, and some of the things which you have just said are an extension of the memorandum. For instance, there is nothing in this memorandum to suggest anything approaching the "one man one vote" franchise. There is nothing here which talks about a very wide franchise. In fact the position of the party is that the franchise should be based roughly on the present Federal one.

Q: Does the memorandum say that this legislative body is only advisory, or does it make provision for it to axe Bills which were introduced by the Executive?

A: It could not stop a Bill presented by the Executive, if the Executive wished to insist on it.

Q: Yes, otherwise it had to pass them in the ordinary way?

A: It has power to amend, and legislation will then go back to the Executive Council for reconsideration, and the Bill in due course would be submitted either with or without amendments to the Legislative Council. In the ultimate issue the Legislative Council has not power to obstruct the passage of a Bill if the Executive insists. Of course, I am not stating what they said to you in evidence but only what the memorandum says. As far as we are concerned we adopt the memorandum.

MR. CHIRWA: The United Federal Party wishes to have independence in the Federal sphere. Of course, there is a Convention of 1957, and you know that some people are pressing this Convention in that it does reduce the powers of the Constitution. Suppose you had this independence within the Federal sphere, in spite of what has been done, if there was legislation to that effect, or a clause in the coming Constitution, do you think yourselves you would be winning the support or co-operation of Africans if you insisted on it?

A. (MR. DUNCAN): If it is explained to them carefully and if the explanation reaches them properly, the safeguards we are quite willing to have in will give the African a very strong say in stopping anything that may be discriminatory, and we think Africans would accept the position. So long as it is thought we are just taking the powers away from the British Government so that we can do anything we like with basic African rights, there will obviously be strong opposition to it. I would like to make it clear that we are agreeable to any form of safeguard for these rights and we do not mind how severe it is. Once that is appreciated and the body is there with African representation on it and those rights will be preserved, the people would be prepared to accept it.

Q: You have virtually said in this memorandum you would not like to see any change in the present composition of the Federal Assembly.

A: Yes.

Q: You are suggesting that you want these powers for a government which is mainly European?

A. (MRS. ROSEN): With the safeguard of an Upper Council—or whatever the constitutional lawyers suggest as the best safeguard—with that safeguard superimposed to take the place of the British Government. We do not ask that the Federal Government should take over all these powers and that there should be no safeguards against discrimination.

Q: You would agree the present composition of the Federal Assembly is mainly white?

A: Yes.

Q: You are actually suggesting that the British Government should surrender these powers. What is really important is the body which makes the laws and prepares legislation. In this case the most important body is the Federal Assembly, which is at present European. Do you not think that if that was accepted the British Government would get into more trouble from the African people in view of the fact that the Africans at present distrust the Federal Assembly? Do you think you would improve the situation of the Federation in the eyes of the African people?

A. (MR. COLLINS): The question is not really sound basically. There must be a misconception that the powers of the British Government, referred to in paragraph 98, will be surrendered to the Federal Assembly. It will be surrendered to somebody, and we hope you, as a Commission, will be able to advise on the appropriate body. It will be surrendered to somebody quite different from the Federal Assembly and, as far as dealing with discriminatory legislation is concerned, superior to the Federal Assembly. It is not a surrender to the Federal Assembly, but a handing over to an entirely separate body. If it is going to be represented to the African population in the manner in which Mr. Chirwa put the question, I entirely agree with him that we shall meet with trouble; but if it is put correctly and honestly I am sure it will be accepted.

CHAIRMAN: It would have to contain a provision that the powers of this so-called superior body would be limited to delay. That is what is in your document.

A: I am not so sure we are absolutely adamant about that.

(MR. SAWYER): Would it not also be subject, as a body, always to the pressure of public opinion? All governments have to take this terrific weight of opinion into account.

MR. CHIRWA: You have said that some of these people have to be nominated by the Prime Minister of the Federation. Obviously he must take into account the people who put him into power and you must accept the fact that at present the people who did that are Europeans. Therefore the members of this body must be people who are acceptable to the majority of voters?

A. (MR. DUNCAN): What we have put down here are various suggested alternatives. The fact that one of these is a senate and that various people should be nominated by the Prime Minister or the governments of various territories is merely a suggestion. We are quite agreeable for some other form of body to be brought about. If you have a senate which is dealing with ordinary legislation as well as discriminatory matters, you are in a difficult position because if the country is to be governed at all you somehow have to have some form of agreement between the Senate and the Federal Assembly; otherwise, you get no legislation passed at all, or else you have delay, which makes the operation of a country's government very difficult. I am inclined to agree with Mr. Chirwa that if you have a senate on that basis, his argument is sound. I said I personally preferred a constitutional council which would be appointed and I think you can devise a means of appointment completely divorced from the political parties. I would like to see quite a small body, representative of all races here—African, European, Asian and Coloured—who are appointed in some way out of a panel drawn up by persons of an independent point of view, possibly the Governor and the Chief Justice of each territory. The final choice might be made by someone as impartial as possible, but I like the idea of an appointed body of that nature because it is not then under the influence of the political situation. It would be very much more independent.

SIR VICTOR ROBINSON: If I told you, as a constitutional lawyer, that the only satisfactory way of appointing such a Council of State would be to place the authority to make the appointment with the United Kingdom, would you be happy?

A: If that appointment could be made indirectly through the Governor, I would be happy.

Q: That would be first class. The Governor would then act on the advice of the United Kingdom Ministers?

A: I do not know about that, but if he is the Governor-General, and the representative of the Queen, I think one can say he is the most independent-minded person you can find.

Q: And he would not act on the advice of any local Minister?

A: We would be agreeable to that. As we say, this body must have teeth to be of any value.

(MRS. ROSEN): I would also like to draw attention to paragraphs 139-141, where we have put suggestions as to the manner in which difficulties and disagreements could be dealt with.

MR. ROBINSON: Perhaps one of the weaknesses of the document you have put in is that you talk about the body, whatever it may be called, having powers of delay, and in paragraph 135 you say the party believes that a power of delay, but not to prevent, is all that should be allowed for. In South Africa there has been a Constitution which contained two entrenched clauses and, though it was not possible to alter those clauses, it did not prevent other statutes being altered, as a back-door method of achieving the same purposes. Whatever the constitutional device is that is created to prevent discrimination, are you agreeable that the method of its composition and anything to do with its establishment should become fixed and unalterable, because if some such arrangement was not arrived at eventually, by some device or by alteration in the appointed body or something of that kind, you could destroy the whole purpose of its appointment.

A. (MR. SAWYER): It would have to be a final body. You could not run the risk of having it distorted. Obviously we are mainly concerned with the independence of the Federal body. We put forward the suggestions to assist the Commission in their task.

Q: Do you want the United Kingdom to transfer powers whether or not you can have some such instrument established that is not fixed and permanent, because you may have a white majority today but you tell us you will have a black majority tomorrow; if we accept that, surely all races want protection for evermore?

A. (MR. DUNCAN): I personally agree it should be fixed and permanent, but I think you should make the constitution as difficult to alter as possible, so that it cannot be chopped and changed. My opinion is that your Constitutional Council, or whatever is established, should be established in a permanent way. That is not the view of the party. The view of the party is that all this is for discussion so that the best arrangement may be arrived at. But we think that this device, whatever it is, must be a potent device. It would be quite useless if it were something that could be fiddled with and changed overnight.

MR. JUSTICE BEADLE: Are you now suggesting you should substitute for the African Affairs Board, which is a locally elected body, a Constitutional Council, which should be a nominated body—in fact, nominated from Whitehall? Would you regard that as a constitutional advance?

A. (MRS. ROSEN): Yes, the African Affairs Board, although it is an elected body, does not have the final say but only the power of deciding what is discriminatory and sending that forward to the British Government for final veto or otherwise. We suggest the Council as it has been suggested here—but one might need a select committee of the House or an African Affairs Board or something like that—should decide on which basis it should go forward. The Constitutional Council is the final arbiter in the discussion of whether this is a good law or not, and not the British Government.

(MR. DUNCAN): I did not agree the Constitutional Council should be appointed by Whitehall; I said by the Governor-General who is the most independent man one could find to do it.

Q: But he would be a nominee of Whitehall?

A: He is appointed by the Queen. I was considering him in his personal capacity as Governor-General. He would be the most independent-minded person.

MR. MENZIES: Surely the Governor-General is guided by his own Ministers? When he is appointed to a Dominion he is advised on constitutional practice by the Ministers with whom he functions?

A: Again these are suggestions, to get the most independent-minded person possible. My personal suggestion was that the Governor-General and Chief Justice should do the appointing, but I was not considering appointment on advice from the Prime Minister, because then immediately it becomes political.

MR. CHIRWA: How can you avoid the Prime Minister having access to the Governor-General on the matter of the constitution?

A: If it is given to the Governor-General in his own discretion, I do not see that he has to take the advice of the Prime Minister. The Chief Justice does not get the Prime Minister's advice on how to conduct cases in the Supreme Court. The whole thing is to get someone of independent mind.

Q: Why are you afraid of people being nominated from Whitehall?

A. (MRS. ROSEN): That would mean relying on the opinion of a government 6,000 miles away. Would not the Governor-General have a better knowledge of the people in the country than Whitehall? Obviously the Governor-General and the Chief Justice, living with the people and seeing them, have a better opportunity of knowing which people are most suited to carry out an appointed Upper Chamber.

MR. ROBINSON: Would you have any objection to the local authority, whoever it might be, appointing representatives from the Commonwealth, including the United Kingdom—a certain number of appointees?

A. (MR. DUNCAN): That point has not been considered by the party, but I do not think we would necessarily object to it.

(MR. CHIPUNZA): It might not be a practical thing to have men appointed to a council that is functioning here who may have to be away from the country for many months.

SIR DONALD MACGILLIVRAY: In paragraph 191 of your memorandum you said that the United Federal Party believes that Europeans in the Federation as a whole recognize the need, not only to promote the material, cultural and educational advancement of Africans, but also to allow them to take a share in the government of the country which should increase as the Africans demonstrate their ability and sense of political responsibility. They believe that the best way for Africans to develop politically and economically is in association with the Europeans. I imagine when you talk of ability you mean ability in public affairs, not ability in other fields. Would you tell us what opportunities there are in Southern Rhodesia for Africans to demonstrate their ability in public affairs and their sense of political responsibility?

A. (MRS. ROSEN): Yes. They have African councils in the rural areas, advisory boards in the towns and in certain towns they have a form of residents' associations. The councils in the rural areas are built up towards independent management of their affairs within these areas, and I think the whole of the Southern Rhodesian system is built on bringing the African forward. Perhaps Mr. Chipunza would enlarge on this. The system of bringing the African forward into the capability of being able to manage first their own affairs and village affairs.

Q: Do you suggest that there is there an opportunity to develop a greater sense of responsibility? In village councils the Native Commissioner is invariably the chairman and by and large I suggest that the members of the council are advisory to him. In the townships there are these bodies but they are, as you say, advisory bodies. There is no executive authority vested in them and it does not give great opportunity to exercise responsibility. Of course, in the central government there is not a single African in the legislature.

A. (MR. DUNCAN): First of all, I think you said the Native Commissioner was invariably the chairman of the rural Council; that is not correct.

(MR. CHIPUNZA): My experience in local government in the council from which I come, which is in the African Purchase Area, is that the position of the Native Commissioner there is more of adviser, the whole of the responsibility being carried by the people. It is true that in the Legislature of Southern Rhodesia there are no Africans but when you take the day-to-day councils through the country one has only to go out and see these things in action and see the part the people are playing. There is much to be done but at the same time these things are there. One does not have to talk about them. One has only to go and see what the people are doing.

MR. CRAWLEY: We have had evidence from chiefs and other councillors that the Native Commissioner does not consult them over the majority of the decisions he takes. Would you say that evidence is untrue?

A: In some cases that does happen but in others, where you have a council which has been going for some time and you have a man with understanding, they are playing a greater role.

(MR. DUNCAN): One should not look on this as a static position. The thing is changing all the time. Gradually there are more opportunities for taking responsible action which are coming forward. In the political field I think you are really getting on to the question of the Southern Rhodesia House not having any Africans. That is due to the common voters' roll and to there not being sufficient Africans in any particular constituency for an African candidate to put himself forward. There is no legal bar to it. But as we see it, wages and education are increasing, we maintain, quite quickly now and large numbers of Africans should be able to come on the voters' roll, and if we can keep on building it up at the pace we would like, more and more will come on, and in a comparatively short space of time a considerable number of Africans should be in the Southern Rhodesia House.

SIR DONALD MACGILLIVRAY: Are there ways of demonstrating responsibility in the Southern Rhodesia Legislature other than the common voters' roll? Would it be possible to devise other means whereby they could be given these opportunities to demonstrate that?

A. (MRS. ROSEN): I think they are demonstrating political ability through the political parties. Mr. Duncan pointed out at the beginning that 25% of our last Congress was non-European through the political parties. African people are quite definitely demonstrating their development of political thought. It is rather significant. I have some figures here which show that there is a potential of somewhere in the region of 25,000 who could have registered on the Southern Rhodesia roll who have not done so. Admittedly there are 14,000 Europeans who are not registered. There is political apathy amongst peoples in Southern Rhodesia. Had the Africans enrolled as they should have done, it is quite possible by now there would have been at least two African members sitting, and we hope it will emerge at the next election that in at least two constituencies political parties will put forward African candidates knowing they will have an opportunity to win. Obviously no political party is going to put forward a candidate where there is no possibility they would win the seat. It will be a pity at this juncture to alter this development in Southern Rhodesia which has always been on the lines of a common voters' roll and the ability for the people to get on to it if they desire to do so. I think it would be a pity to bring contrived artifices into this.

Q: In dealing with the electoral franchise, you say the main principle underlying the Electoral Act of 1958 is the retention of voting power in the hands of civilized and responsible persons. Do you regard those qualifying for a vote on the General Roll as civilized and responsible persons?

A. (MR. DUNCAN): It is a very difficult line to draw, but that is the best we have been able to do about it. Some people who are meant to be civilized do the most extraordinary things.

Q: Do you regard those who are qualified for the Special Roll as civilized and responsible persons?

A. (MRS. ROSEN): Those that are on the Special Roll are taking a step towards the full conception of the civilized and responsible person.

CHAIRMAN: Independence within the Federal Roll

A: Quite definitely. I feel these people are learning it is giving them a step up and having not reached quite the arbitrary line, which I mentioned before is an arbitrary line, but they are beginning to develop responsibility and therefore they should have some say in the election of the people who are representing them in the Federal House.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: You say that the special voters are uncivilized and irresponsible people?

A: I did not say so. I said they were people who are well on the way to being civilized and responsible.

SIR VICTOR ROBINSON: They are not sufficiently civilised to go on the General Roll?

A: It is not a question of civilization in that sense because if you talk about people being capable of voting you might say that Germany was civilized under Hitler, and you would probably be wrong, but it is a question of discrimination. Surely where we talk about civilized and responsible people we are thinking of people who have powers of judgment and discrimination and a knowledge of balance in the party sense of responsibility, and until a person has had a certain amount of education he has not got powers of discrimination; they can be half-way towards it.

MR. KATILUNGU: What about in the Northern Territories where you have very powerful Native Authorities with Councilors around them who do advise, and they have not had any education. The same applies to village headmen who administer those particular areas. Would you think they are not civilized?

A: I am not saying they are not civilized. Would they be able to discriminate in party politics?

Q: That is the point I am raising.

A. (MR. SAWYER): You have Southern Rhodesia with all its terrific level of development and advance in health and education. I do not know what proofs you may see in that particular situation. There is certainly lots of room for improvement but you can see the proof of the systems here.

Q: I have a few questions to ask. I think, arising from Mr. Duncan's opening remarks when he was dealing with the preamble to his memorandum, much has been said of trying to win the confidence of Africans in regard to their loyalty towards the Federation of Central Africa, and in this memorandum you have raised the question of safeguards. With your experience and information that you have as a representative of the United Federal Party, are you aware that one of the demands of the African politicians in the Northern Territories is that they will only recognize that they have been afforded the best safeguards when they find themselves with a good number of representatives in their Legislature, otherwise any other safeguards are not acceptable to them?

A. (MR. DUNCAN): I am not all that familiar with the view of the people of Northern Rhodesia. I accept that.

Q: Would you agree that some of the people who have given evidence—what I might call very uncompromising evidence—saying we people in the Northern Territories would be prepared to consider the continuation of Federation only and only when we achieve self-government in which a majority of Africans will rule. Will you agree with that proposition?

A: I accept that they say that; yes. Are you asking us to accept that we should only go forward to full membership of the Commonwealth once there is an African majority?

Q: Not at all. I was dealing with the questions of safeguards and the uncompromising attitude which has been expressed through a certain amount of evidence given that Africans in the Northern territories—I am talking particularly for Northern Rhodesia—will be prepared to consider that responsibility, continuation in the Federation of Central Africa, only if there is to be an African majority in the Legislative Council. Would you accept that?

A: Surely a majority of Africans in the Legislative Council actually is not a conception we should work on. We want to see a majority of both black and white in Government, not a mixture of black versus white. In the Territorial sphere we are not proposing at the moment that those spheres should become independent but we are in agreement that further time is required to enable more people to come on to the voters' roll and the evolution of the political stability in the Northern Territories; and I think in the Territorial sphere of Northern Rhodesia we shall undoubtedly see more Africans coming on and getting elected to the Legislative Council fairly soon. We are not at the moment pressing that the Territorial Governments of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland should immediately become independent.

Q: But you do not object to Northern Rhodesia immediately becoming a self-governing country before attaining the full independence?

A: We say it must become self-governing before full membership of the Commonwealth can be attained. That is a prerequisite to full membership of the Commonwealth being attained but I am not prepared to say that Northern Rhodesia will necessarily have more Africans in the Legislative Council than Europeans, but we look upon it in the general political evolution of the country.

Q: When you were dealing with the question of the strong opposition you said you recognized the genuine needs expressed by the Africans in the Northern Territories, and you went on to say that the Federal Government should do something to overcome this kind of thing. You went on to talk about African Congresses as nationalist organisations. Are you not aware that in the two Northern Territories they have already merged two different political organizations, you may call them nationalist organizations, but I do not. They are really genuine political organizations whose principles are quite different. One says they would like to see self-government in which both Europeans and Africans would participate, and the other one is the one which says they would like to see complete black Government. Which one do you support?

A: We support any person who wants the political evolution to be on a non-racial line; that there should be both black and white working together, but we do not support any political party that uses violence as one of its political weapons.

Q: While you do not support the latter body, do you agree that the opposition in order to overcome the complete political difference between European and African politicians is that they advocate a wider franchise system, would you allow them to proceed with that?

A: For the Territorial Government of Northern Rhodesia?

Q: Yes.

A: Our general point of view is that it should not be broadened. Actually here we are speaking about the Territorial one of Northern Rhodesia, not Federal. We believe, generally speaking, that our basis of franchise, although as I say it is extremely arbitrary, does enable government to remain in the hands of responsible people; but then there are all the special provisions in the Northern Rhodesia Constitution. Are you suggesting they should be lowered considerably?

Q: I thought so.

A: I do not think we would agree that they should be lowered further. It is a question of drawing this arbitrary line. It is extremely difficult to know where to draw it. What we are opposed to essentially is that the political power should be vested in people who do not understand the workings of a democracy and are probably very susceptible to the emotional appeal and particularly that it can be done on this basis of violence and intimidation.

Q: Let us leave intimidation and the question of what has happened aside. We are dealing with the Constitution of the two Territorial Governments in the North. Under the present franchise, there are quite a number of Africans who are perhaps qualified economically but have not sufficient education to enable them to fill in the forms—I am dealing with the question in the most interesting area with which I am quite familiar, that is the mining industries, the secondary industries on the Copperbelt—you have a big number of Africans who have served in industries over 20 or 30 years and whose economic qualifications can give easily £300 to £400 per annum in accordance with the present statistics, and the question of copper bonus, etc., and annual income. These people could not write English but are able to write in the vernacular. In view of the economic qualifications and responsibility they have in industry it is very complicated, would you deny them the participation in electing the Government of the country in which their economic responsibility is expressed so practically?

A. (MR. RICH): You have cited a specimen block of people who can come into the arbitrary group who suffer hardship on the arbitrary line. I personally have sympathy with them, but it is a further demonstration of what happens when you have to draw a line somewhere. Because they earn a considerable salary, obviously it indicates that they have skill and ability. Because of their upbringing years ago there were not the facilities to obtain education and because of this they are debarred from getting on the roll. They are the sort of people for whom personally I have a great deal of sympathy, but it underlines the fact that the arbitrary line has to be drawn somewhere. Wherever you draw it you strike those who fail to make it.

(MRS. ROSEN): You have the anomalies of the university student, particularly the man who is studying to be a doctor, who probably under the Constitution will not be able to get a vote until he is about 28 because he will not start earning until about 26, although he might have the highest educational qualifications. He will not achieve the monetary stability which is required. There are anomalies and I think we concede that it is very difficult to know what to do; but these people have qualified under the Special Roll in the Federal Assembly and in Northern Rhodesia so they already can get one step forward.

Q: Having recognized the strong opposition to the Federation, whether the reasons for opposition are genuine or not, the opposition is there in so far as the two Northern Territories are concerned, do you think even at the time when this Federal Constitutional review is being made and this opposition being continued, you are still going to insist on the existence of the Federation incorporating the three Territories, and if so have you any means of insisting against this strong opposition?

A. (MR. SAWYER): The first one is the grant of independence in the Federal sphere in which for the reasons you have indicated you first of all have to establish law and order in the North, at least in one Territory the Government has ceased to govern. Secondly, we have to improve—and I agree with Mr. Chirwa and Mr. Katilungu there is room for improvement—our relations with the African as much as the Federal Government can. Thirdly, I think we have to show the African in the North mistakenly believes that the discriminatory measures of Southern Rhodesia are going to be imposed in the Northern Territories. They have to be taught that the wind of change in Southern Rhodesia has been quite extraordinary in the past ten years. So they have no fear of either losing their land or of having discriminatory matters passed against them. Fourthly, probably even more important, we should for the first time have the active support of the United Kingdom Colonial Government. Through the civil service administration of the Territories we have been considerably hampered, in the initial stages of Federation, by their being precluded from giving advice to people who all their lives had looked to them for support. If we had practical support we could get Federation across; we recognize the opposition.

SIR DONALD MACGILLIVRAY: In considering the possibility of an Upper House, you would propose that there should be equal representation of the three Territories. Would you also be in favour of equal representation in the Lower House?

A. (MR. DUNCAN): No, we are not in favour of altering the proportionate representation. I imagine it was done on that basis because it was thought that Southern Rhodesia for one thing would be able to produce more people of experience to assist in the Federal Government. After all, the chief sphere of operation of the Federal Government is an extremely complex economic sphere and I think that arrangement was come to probably largely for that reason, and we do not favour the change in the composition of the Federal Assembly.

Q: I am just wondering why you distinguish between the two Houses. You say the right proportions are 30 members of whom 15 would be African and 15 non-African in the Upper House, but not the lower.

A. (MR. SAWYER): Where appropriate, black and white.

Q: I am not saying equal numbers of Europeans and Africans; I am talking about equal representation from the three Territories.

A: Some situation will arise where you will really be creating artificial representation on that basis—20, 20, 20; that is twenty from Nyasaland at the moment? Would you not be artificially creating something instead of letting the ordinary terms of franchise apply.

Q: You say there would not be enough men with sufficient experience and ability in economic matters in the Northern Territories?

A. (MR. DUNCAN): I think the possibility of obtaining people for the Federal Assembly with the knowledge and experience and potential was considerably greater from Southern Rhodesia than from the Northern Territories, and I suggest the number is probably much the same today.

Q: In the course of time that situation may change?

A: We have provision for amendment of the Constitution which presumably could be changed to accord.

(MRS. ROSEN): The numbers of voters in the Territories must have influenced the division.

MR. ELLMAN BROWN: I think you have admitted that there is tremendous intimidation. You have also admitted as far as Nyasaland is concerned law and order has broken down. Evidence has been led that the opposition of the Africans in the Northern Territories to Federation is so deep-rooted that it could only be maintained by force. Do you (a) agree with the opposition—that is the way to do it—or do you (b) agree that a looser federation based more on what I call the strong economic ties can be devised, and that that will bring about more co-operation in the Federation? Which would you prefer?

A. (MR. COLLINS): I do not believe if we can re-establish law and order that the opposition is so deep-seated that it cannot be overcome. I do not believe that. I do submit to you that it is extremely easy for a witness to say control and one must show one's position, but there is a certain amount of cogent evidence on that issue. For instance, the effect of the declaration of the emergency last year in Nyasaland and the subsequent recruitment of a large number of Africans to the United Federal Party. This is not a Party matter but that did say something in favour of Federation. I believe that if conditions can be established where the African is able to judge for himself what is the true situation, and that involves a large measure of information, a large measure of removal of these things which are preventing him forming his own opinion, unless these things can be established, I am myself fearful that we cannot overcome it.

MR. HADLOW: Without the use of force?

A: I do not believe the situation has got to such a position in Nyasaland at the moment that it might be necessary to use force to re-establish law and order. What measure is anybody's guess; but the alternative must be faced squarely and that is that you are going to hand over to force which has been used against us. You either are capitulating to the use of force against the established law and order and handing over to lawless people or else you have to face it squarely and say we may have to use force to re-establish law and order, but I believe that having re-established it, it would not be necessary to maintain the position by the application of force.

MR. ELLMAN BROWN: The second part of my question: if you can get greater co-operation in the North by a slightly looser federation with strong economic ties, if that could be arranged, would that be acceptable or are you determined to keep the status quo?

A: I would prefer to keep the status quo, but that is an answer right off the cuff, and I do not think that we can be expected to give a considered answer to that question without having put before one a detailed statement of the proposed arrangement. I am not ruling it completely out. My preference is for the status quo because I believe the status quo can be made to work, and as far as Nyasaland is concerned it has been so beneficial in many respects that I would wish it to remain, but I do not think I can answer on a general proposition of a looser economic tie without knowing what the implications are.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: Do you appreciate there are two different kinds of force that can be involved? One is force you mention to restore law and order and the other is the continued application of force in order to impose something on people that they are not willing to take. Have you taken both those things into consideration—

A: Yes. I specifically said I did not think it would be necessary to continue application of force to maintain law and order.

MR. ELLMAN BROWN: You have dealt fairly fully with the constitutions of the two Northern Territories. In Northern Rhodesia the policy is to maintain the power of the chiefs and build it up. Apparently in Nyasaland the idea is to break it down. Which do you really feel is the better way to do it?

A: I heartily disapprove of the Nyasaland attitude towards the Chiefs as stated by you.

(MR. CHIPUNZA): That could be supported here in Southern Rhodesia. In any district the chiefs have power and influence and as a result it is not possible for anyone to walk into any reserve and make a nuisance of oneself.

MR. CHIRWA: Mr. Collins says that it would be possible to continue Federation and maintain law and order without any force at all. Can he explain why the Government still finds it difficult at this stage to release all the detainees that have been detained without any trial at all? Do they not feel that the security situation is settled?

A. (MR. COLLINS): I said quite clearly it may be necessary to use force to re-establish law and order, and in saying re-establish what I meant was it was not being maintained at the moment and until it is properly maintained it may be a security risk to release these particular gentlemen who are in detention. That is a matter for the powers that be in Nyasaland. But my answer is that the first and most immediate necessity is to re-establish law and order and re-establish the will to govern which appears to be lacking in that particular Territory.

Q: You are suggesting in Nyasaland what should be done is to detain more people. If you continue Federation you are bound to have more troubles and then you have to use force to break that resistance. After then, what next? Are Africans going to give up because after the 1959 emergency the position has become worse, the resistance has grown more and more; how are you going to combat that resistance?

A: The whole point is that we have admitted this morning that we have not been able to get adequately at African opinion today. My contention is, having first re-established the maintenance of law, the second step—and that, incidentally, implies the removal of intimidation which is a major problem, having done that, the second step is to fortify and reinforce our efforts to educate the African in the true benefits of the Federation which are not at the moment reaching him. It is a big problem. I believe not only that it can be done but I see no alternative but to attempt it. One has to attempt it.

A. (MR. CHIPUNZA): Is it not true that if Africans to a man were solidly opposed to Federation, there would be no need for many Africans to be so frightened and to live in fear through threats of intimidation, because if Africans were solid to a man nothing could be done here to force them to accept Federation; but the position at the moment is that in order to get Africans to be on the side of opposition it is necessary to use these threats of intimidation and all things that are unacceptable in any organized community.

CHAIRMAN: You would make a great mistake if you assumed that everyone who was intimidated against giving evidence was against Federation. We have had plenty of evidence to the contrary.

A. (MRS. ROSEN): We have assumed there that intimidation would not be needed if the forces of the Congress Party had such solid support that it would not be necessary.

Q: The intimidation is to prevent people coming to us and a lot of people who, in spite of intimidation, have come and have told us they did not like it.

A. (MR. RICH): The question of intimidation is wider than this Commission.

(MR. CHIPUNZA): African opinion which is against Federation should have the opportunity of expressing this opinion.

MR. CHIRWA: You are suggesting that with regard to the Nyasaland Constitution we have an Executive that is nominated by a body of wise men.

A. (MR. COLLINS): By the Government with the advice of wise men.

Q: Shall these be from within the Executive Council, shall they be from the Legislative Council or from outside?

A: They can be picked from anywhere. If they are picked from Legislative Council they lose their seats on the Legislative Council and there naturally follows a by-election and the vacancy is filled. If they are ministers, the proposal is that they have the right to address the Legislative Council on any Bills coming before it, but not to vote.

MR. GONDWE: It has been said here that the Government of Nyasaland has lost authority in the country, and that there law and order has broken down. What does the United Federal Party suggest in order to restore all law and order immediately?

A: With greatest respect, I think we have answered that. Firstly, the establishment of a Constitution such as we suggest, that obviously will take a little while, but we do not believe that with the present governors—and I did not say Governor—governors governing people in Nyasaland there is the will to govern. It appears to have been lost certainly in some quarters and I think the only immediate solution is to substitute somebody for those people; somebody who is willing to govern. That is the short answer.

Q: Thank you very much. What you suggested at first was a bit difficult. You suggested that force would have to be used again—who by? By the present Government or by another government?

A: I have answered that.

Memorandum DOMINION PARTY*

A Summary of the evidence to be submitted regarding the Constitutional future of the Federation Failure of Federation

We are of the opinion that Federation as at present constituted has proved a failure, in that it has not fulfilled the objects as set out in the Report by the Conference on Federation held in London in January, 1953 (Cmd. Paper No. 8753). These were to achieve security for the future and to ensure the contentment and well-being of all its inhabitants.

We do not specifically desire any abandonment of an association of the Territories comprising the Federation and our proposals, if adopted, will enable it to remain intact as an economic and to some extent political entity. It should be pointed out, however, that conditions within the Federal area are so unsatisfactory and uncertain that a situation has been created whereby, unless a constructive step forward is taken this year at the London Talks, complete disruption may well result.

The Desire for Independence

There is strong feeling in the country regarding our right to control our own affairs. This feeling has been accentuated by statements made during the recent British General Election criticising and deriding the Europeans in the Federation. It is true that this type of attitude was confined to certain sections in Britain whose views did not prevail at the polls; but there is an ever increasing body of opinion that a continuance of control from London may well, at some future date, deliver us to the mercy of a government in Britain unsympathetic to and contemptuous of the rights of Europeans in the Federation.

Statements made during the British General Election have given rise to a feeling of insecurity. This factor has been so well appreciated that more and more people are leaving to seek their future elsewhere, while the rate of immigration has fallen rapidly.

The Attitude of the African

It can be argued, and doubtless will be argued, that the above views reflect the Europeans' attitude of mind and are not representative of African opinion. As the Dominion Party attaches great importance to the rights of the African in these issues we would like to deal with this aspect. We feel that African opinion should be given every consideration provided it is in a reasonable and comprehensible form and not simply blind antipathy to change. We would point to the need to differentiate between the views of ordinary Africans and those belonging to the "agitator class", the views of Africans in Nyasaland as opposed to Africans in Southern Rhodesia, the views of one tribe as distinct from the views of another, and so on.

*The Dominion Party pamphlet entitled "Central African Alliance" a copy of which was received from the Dominion Party in Salisbury, has been reproduced under Evidence at Lusaka, Northern Rhodesia, on 15th March 1960, Volume II.

Having differentiated between different African viewpoints as far as this is possible, it will be necessary to ascertain whether such viewpoints are based on facts and correct information or are the result of local or imported propaganda.

It had to be borne in mind that the political and economic advancement that the African has so far achieved in the Federation is almost entirely due to the activities of the European, who has taken the African from a state of barbarism to one of semi-enlightenment within a few generations, has given the weaker tribes protection against the stronger and created a system of impartial justice. It is most significant that within the borders of the Federation the African has advanced most where the European population has been largest, and that where the Europeans are few, primitive conditions have remained practically unchanged.

African opinion deserves full recognition; certainly when it is informed opinion and based on the facts; it must be borne in mind, however, that where an area is almost entirely composed of a homogeneous African community, the opinion of that community, in political matters, must inevitably carry more weight than one in which the component parts carry a substantial section of other races. In some cases it will be necessary to make decisions contrary to expressed African opinion, in the knowledge that the overall benefit of the country, and indeed of the African himself will be greater, although the latter is unable to appreciate it at the time.

A large, friendly European community is an essential in the Federation. Without the European there will be a strong tendency to revert to practices belonging to another age. The African in the Federation has not yet reached the stage where he does not benefit from European assistance and guidance. He (the African) must continue to advance, but without, at this juncture, being called upon to shoulder responsibilities beyond his capacity.

A Central African Alliance

Having given due regard to the rights of both sections, we propose that the Federation be converted into an Alliance which would comprise the Dominion of Rhodesia, an independent state, and certain African protectorates subject to a measure of control by the United Kingdom on a basis and for a period to be agreed. We accordingly attach an explanatory pamphlet.

The Franchise

The franchise question in the Federation is becoming more difficult and explosive every day. In order to implement the preamble to the Constitution, important electoral concessions have been made to Africans and they now have a considerable say in the running of the country. But the danger now arises of the European being eliminated as a political factor, which, as has been pointed out, will not be desirable even from the African point of view.

Under the Alliance, the pressure would be greatly relieved as the majority of the protected Africans would have political rights in their own protectorates while the remainder of the African population could enjoy reasonable franchise conditions within the Dominion.

It is true that the Copperbelt would be within the Dominion, but here it is suggested that an arrangement be made for the protectorates to receive their fair share of the revenue.

We submit that the Central African Alliance is fair and reasonable and likely to attract both African and European support.

The Senate

The function of the Upper House would be primarily to preserve the rights and privileges of the inarticulate masses and to assume the protective functions previously exercised by Her Majesty's Government. The African Affairs Board should be abolished as an undesirable political instrument and its functions transferred to the Senate, but instead of protecting the rights of Africans only, it should safeguard the rights of all.

Democracy

The temptation to assume that the answer to our problems lies simply in a straightforward introduction of Western Democracy will, we feel, have to be resisted. It is our considered opinion that democracy in its Western European form does not work in Africa. The African is not ready for it and there is nothing in his political history to suggest that he is adapted to popular rule. Should undue extensions to the franchise be introduced resulting in African political domination, dictators will emerge who will have little respect for the rights of the people as understood in a Western sense, and the ordinary African will be much worse off than he is today.

We contend that the European has the moral and mental equipment to provide the best guidance to the inhabitants of the Federal area, while the African's share of control is gradually increased in proportion to his increased capacity.

The decisions to be taken on the future of the Federation should not ignore the national characteristics of its inhabitants, and their genuine interests. They should not be based merely on some imported political theory which has no practical significance in these surroundings.

Bantu Nationalism

There is a tendency in certain quarters to assume that an irresistible wave of black nationalism is sweeping down the African continent and that the best way to meet it is meekly to capitulate to its demands, however unreasonable and impossible they may be.

We feel that such a view is distorted and exaggerated. While African nationalism is increasing and is a force not to be despised, it is not as trenchant a factor as may be imagined. A great deal of Bantu nationalism appears to be imported from across the seas, a further proportion comes from the Press which exploits the more sensational utterances of African politicians and, of the remainder, some is genuine and the rest comes from agitators.

From our observation the ordinary African, who has not been subjected to ceaseless incitement and propaganda, would seem not to be imbued with quite the thirst for political advancement with which he is often credited. We believe he realises that continued European guidance is likely to be a more stable and progressive factor than a sudden upheaval under which he may be the first to suffer.

Strategic Picture

It would be idle to ignore the importance of the African continent in the struggle against Communism. A weakening of the position of the European in Central Africa, and consequently of British influence, can have important strategic repercussions. One thing is certain, that the African Continent could not be held as a bulwark of the West without Europeans.

Secession

If the Central African Alliance Plan is not accepted, there is no alternative except complete independence for Southern Rhodesia. This in turn means the severance of the Federal link, which means secession. An unwilling partnership is doomed to failure, and it would be better to agree that it should be dissolved before the stress becomes intolerable. We believe that any financial disabilities which may or may not arise from the severance of the Federal link will be offset by other factors, and in any event, the people of Southern Rhodesia would be prepared to make sacrifices for their future, but it is doubtful whether they would be prepared to do this to perpetuate the present unsatisfactory state of affairs.

Decisive Recommendations

The Dominion Party considers that clear cut and decisive recommendations within a reasonable period are essential. Unduly protracted deliberations, arriving at no definite conclusions, will aggravate the present atmosphere of insecurity and, apart from their political effects, will cause the Federation enormous financial damage at a time when it is least able to withstand a depression.

We believe that the early creation of a Rhodesian Dominion will have the opposite effect. Confidence will return, new hope will be born. The developed portions of the Federation are ripe for independence and to retard or impede a natural process will benefit no one.

Oral Evidence

THE DOMINION PARTY. Represented by W. J. Field, M.P., W. J. Harper, M.P.

CHAIRMAN: Would you like to say something in supplementation of your memorandum?

A. (MR. FIELD): If I may, I would like to give the background to the comparatively short memorandum which we have submitted. I would like first to trace very briefly the history of the Dominion Party, in so far as it affects the work of this Commission.

After the referendum had been held in Southern Rhodesia and it had been decided to embark on this experiment of Federation, those who had opposed it and some who, like myself, were in favour of it in principle but opposed it on the terms of the constitution, decided the only thing we could do was to co-operate in every possible way to try to make the experiment work. This was proved later to be an entirely wrong tactic, in so far as it lulled the Government into a sense of omnipotence and made them extremely slack in pursuing what should have been their first task—to sell the Federation to the Northern Territories. You must remember that only Southern Rhodesia had been asked about this, and not the other Territories. No effort was made to liaise with the ordinary people of the two Northern Territories.

We saw that the Federation, in our opinion, was not going as planned and that nothing was being done, particularly by the British Government, to prove that Federation was a good thing. No directive had been issued through the administration of the two Northern Territories to prove to the African population in the main that Federation was beneficial. I am not blaming the ordinary officials: it was a matter of direction from the Colonial Office.

We also saw there was no easy passage whatever to independence, which we looked upon as our goal, either with or without the consent of the peoples of the Territories. Also, more was being read into this Federation than had been intended, as we understood it from the referendum campaign. It was meant to be an economic union and an economic union only. Of course, it was intended to be more than that, but not what was read into it as time went on, which was a political union as well. Also certain promises were made during the campaign in the Northern Territories. What was said was this: when the architects of Federation were questioned as to how long Southern Rhodesia would have to wait before she got the independence she would have got a number of years ago—and she would have got it very soon after 1952, there is no doubt about that—the reply was that the two Northern Territories would be advanced to that state in which they would enjoy comparable status, after which the three Territories would advance to complete independence in the British Commonwealth together.

So far as we could see, no move was taken to implement the promises with regard to the two Northern Territories. This was a serious thing from their point of view, and still more from the point of view of Southern Rhodesia, whose independence was going to be withheld before these steps were taken. The Dominion Party was then formed. This was the basic reason for forming it—as far as I am concerned anyway—and we had one thought in common, that a new approach had to be made and quickly, to Federation if it was in fact going to survive in any form at all.

We appreciated that whatever plan we made must comply with that requirement. First, there must be a willing association, not one maintained by force; because everybody knows that is impossible nowadays. Now, of course, you cannot please everybody. It must be an approach, we thought, which would fulfil the original conception of economic advance, and so on, rather than make it a tight political association which it appears we are attempting to do at the moment. It must also be one which would maintain Western standards in those areas which have already achieved them, so that there would at least be a good example to follow. It must retain government in the hands of civilized, responsible people: it must retain independence for the Territories. That applies particularly to Southern Rhodesia.

Historically, no territory really begins to develop economically or in other ways till the hand of the Colonial Office has been removed from it. From the point of view of the Northern Territories, it is also important, but it is particularly important to keep good faith with Southern Rhodesia. It must also be one that complies with the requirement that neither the Northern Territories together will dominate Southern Rhodesia, or vice versa: that, again, was promised. It should be a plan which could be published, and which every one could chew over and have ample time to study. We have wasted so much time over this, when something of this sort should have been started seven years ago and gradually enabled people to learn about it bit by bit. Incidentally, I might mention that if this association is going to succeed in any way, the name "Federation" must be changed.

We had all this in mind, as we felt we should publish this as soon as we could bring it into some sort of shape. Time was not on our side. The Northern Territories should have something positive before them, instead of taking the negative attitude of no association between the territories at any time.

I would like to refer once more to the importance of the time factor. That is, in relation to the fact of these things being published and known as early as possible. The sort of approach that might be taken to, say, a Geneva Conference, when at our Conference either at the end of this year or early next year, people may come and spring surprises on the various Territories—this idea shows a complete ignorance of African thinking and psychology. We are now suffering from this lack of being sensitive to the right approach.

That was another reason why we put out our plan so quickly. Now you have the Central Africa Alliance plan, designed as a basis for discussion. I do not intend to go through it now, because I understand you have already put questions to various people, and particularly to my colleague in Northern Rhodesia, Mr. Van Eeden. You know that is based on the old Stewart Gore-Brown plan. Constitutional law is not my job, of course, but I will answer questions as best I can.

We thought this plan was one which would offend the least and please the most. There is no attempt to please every one: it is not appeasement. I have discussed it with African political leaders and others in Nyasaland, and not on one single occasion have I not found them perfectly prepared to discuss it. I have communications from African leaders—they can be produced at any time if you wish—saying that they look upon it as a reasonable basis upon which to start discussions. I have been able to persuade Africans from their idea of a blank refusal, because Federation is completely useless. They cannot leave or come back as they wish. Once out, they would be out for keeps. I found them not unreasonable about it at all. Unfortunately I have not had the same opportunity of discussing it in detail with leaders in Northern Rhodesia, although I have toured that territory more than Nyasaland.

Constitutional law had to devise a means of doing what the country wants. It was suggested to me in London recently by people very experienced in these matters that you could not possibly run such an affair with a Commission. I do not accept that. Of course there are difficulties, but on the other hand they do run vast affairs in this world with Commissions, and that is how the European Common Market—the association of the Six, and also I believe of the Seven, is run. N.A.T.O. is also run on a similar basis. So I do not accept it is impossible to do it here.

I will not talk about secession or the possibility of it, because Mr. Harper will deal with that. As a party we are not for it, and we do not want it, but do not rule it out, because people can do a lot if they are pushed far enough. If it comes about, do not assume that an association with South Africa is out. I personally do not like it, but it might become necessary. Do not let people tell you that the Afrikaans-speaking people and the English-speaking people bitterly dislike each other. It is not right: it is not right for the younger generation. They play games together and they think in the same way. With the changes that may occur in Southern Africa, it should not be ruled out as an utter impossibility. I am not suggesting this is a good thing or that we support it as a party, but it could take place.

We do not expect to attain all our objectives at once. It would be possible to do it by degrees, after confidence and trust were established which do not exist today. That is the first thing to do. One of the greatest problems we are faced with today is lack of trust and fear of the unknown, which is one of the most prevalent features in Africa. Once confidence is established we should be able to progress by degrees. The Central African Alliance plan is one which could lead to a defence union with other countries. We have heard some talk of joining the Congo.

As regards the two Northern Territories, and their attitude to Southern Rhodesia, it is said that 3,000 Europeans own and occupy 51 per cent of the land in the country. In the first place, it is true that about 5,000 Europeans do own and live on this land, but to say they live there exclusively is nonsense. According to the figures, there are well over a million Africans there, and they live there permanently, many of them. On our particular holding we have 23 Europeans. There are 900 Africans living there, and we get a very small turnover. Many of them come from Nyasaland voluntarily and they are very happy, and I would be delighted if you have time to come over and see them, and see the African living in his natural conditions. I might add that what they would be able to tell you about Federation could be got on half of a cigarette card. The African had never heard of it.

Finally, there is no body of people more loyal to the Crown than the members of the Dominion Party. We have no loyalty whatsoever to the Colonial Office or any other Ministry. Our loyalty is to the Union Jack and the Crown. I would suggest it would be unwise to make any suggestions as regards a solution which are going to push us too far, because there is no doubt that the first result will be Southern Rhodesia's secession from this Federation. I speak purely as an individual now, but I would rather be like the people of, say, Southern Ireland—a poor independent—than to be here under a system which I disliked and distrusted. I would not do it. I would resist it with every bit of influence that I have or shall have.

(MR. HARPER): Sir, I am a political leader, and it is my task to sum up and estimate public opinion in this country, apart from moulding it to some extent. It is my estimation at the moment that conditions in this country are right for the electorate of this country, if the matter is put to them fairly and squarely, to vote for a break up of this Federation and for secession. As Mr. Field has already said, as a party we would prefer to avoid that, and so one comes to the position of trying to look for a suitable compromise. In party documents the matter of secession was raised. In the first paragraph it says, "if this plan is not accepted there will be no alternative but complete independence for Southern Rhodesia." The plan is a somewhat elastic document, but there are certain fundamentals in it which, if they were not agreed to, would call for perhaps a different view of what we should do.

For some time we have felt that the British Government is somewhat intractable in their approach regarding the retention of power in the Northern Territories. Bearing in mind that we prefer to avoid a complete secession, I have prepared certain proposals which I have just brought here. These are my private and personal proposals, and though I am here as Leader of the Opposition—of the Dominion Party—in Southern Rhodesia there has not been time as a party to have these proposals looked into and accepted. They are put forward entirely as my personal ones. They are in the last paragraph—Document handed to Commission.

The first objection of Southern Rhodesia, as I understand public opinion, is the possibility that their affairs will be dominated in due course, through the medium of the Federal Government, by the electorates of the two Northern Protectorates. That is a very real objection, and weighs very strongly with the public today. We should try to avoid the situation where one Territory dominates another. We were promised in 1952, at the time of Federation, by Mr. Hopkinson when he was here, that the question of domination of South by North or North by South would not be allowed to take place. But that was not really in keeping with the situation as we knew it, because, under a parliamentary system, if for example a substantial number of Southern Rhodesian seats were to go into the hands of a party which was not the government party, it must be quite apparent that if the majority came from the Northern Territories, plus a small nucleus from the south, it would obviously be unpleasant. That was the basis on which Federation was sold. It must be put right. The proposals have to take this into account.

If my first point is accepted, that there should be no central Federal Government, one then goes on to the question of civil and military services. I have suggested they should be absorbed by states which are parties to Federation, except in so far as certain of them would be acquired by the staff of what one might term a Central Africa Administrative Commission. This Commission would have as its heads political appointees of those governments subscribing to the Commission. The views would be reflected right through the government into the Commission by virtue of their being political appointees. If they were permanent, the electorate would have no say in what they were doing. A scheme of this sort would commend itself to perhaps Tanganyika, with whom it might be mutually acceptable to join.

The next point was that the functions in each area must be a matter for the members of the states, and not superimposed. Where it was impracticable for one state to accept it, obviously it would not accept it and there would be no friction to that extent. Under (f), I have suggested that the matter of legislation should be dealt with by the states themselves, where requested by the Commission. You will see the link between the state and the Commission and political appointees, so it would channel through to the government, and the legislation would be accordingly brought forward. The main feature which fits the sort of objections we are having at the moment would be that no state would be forced to operate under legislation which was not instituted of its own free will. As regards (g), this implements the points raised by Mr. Field, and it runs throughout the whole of this—people in an alliance on a basis of free will, which was the fundamental idea behind our Central Africa Alliance. The next point (h) states that member states will be politically independent.

This is in broad outline and is put forward as a general idea. This is what I feel, as a political leader, would be politically acceptable in this country. It would have the benefit of keeping the Federation together and, if necessary, increasing it without treading on the toes of the individual states.

Q: Thank you very much. I would like you to explain a little more about the geographical set-up. I see from the plan that Barotseland is under a High Commissioner, out on a wing as it were, and similarly with Nyasaland. On what principle is Northern Rhodesia dealt with?

A. (MR. FIELD): That was dealt with on the principle that, if we were given sufficient time, we would be able to show that development there would be so advanced, by comparison with the territories not part of the Dominion, that at the end of a period to be decided upon, they could decide themselves whether they wished to remain part of the Dominion, join with Nyasaland or form a Dominion of their own. From your visit there you will know it is a pretty loosely-knit country and not a composite unit like Nyasaland, and to suggest they could govern themselves in the near future would be foolish. It was purely an accommodation, if you like, on the part of the Territory itself.

Q: You felt there was sufficient difference from the rest of the Northern Territories to make it come in later if it wanted to?

A: It would be part of it, enjoying all the development and advantages of being part of it, with the knowledge that it could, at the end of a specified period, quit if it wanted to. We have no specific period in mind but we thought perhaps about 10 years. However, that is a fit subject for discussion.

Q: And the whole basis of this approach is that, as the Federation now stands, it cannot successfully continue?

A: Sir, that is our opinion and this is our approach to enable it to continue. We would not have bothered you about this sort of thing at all if we had not wanted to keep it. This is our approach to keeping it.

Q: If there is now a referendum in Southern Rhodesia on the question of whether they should remain in the Federation or let it break up, they would be more inclined to let it break up?

A. (MR. HARPER): I think if it was a bald proposal of that sort, public opinion is such that, provided it could be backed by financial statistics, as regards the position of Southern Rhodesia on its own, the balance of opinion today would let the Federation break up.

Q: There would be some anxiety as to the size of Southern Rhodesia?

A: There would be anxiety as to the reduction of demand.

Q: And I suppose on the loan side, considerable loans are being made to the Federation, backed no doubt by the resources of the Federation?

A: That would obviously weigh, though just how tangible that argument is, one does not know. Against it must be weighed such factors as the country being on its own, having stability, which would weigh against the instability of the present situation.

Q: But from the point of view of the economic future of the Territories at present comprising the Federation, there would be something to be said, if we could get it politically stable, for the larger unit, the whole of the territories?

A: If the common factor is that there is still stability in the larger unit, yes; but your hypothesis is shaky, of course.

Q: Yes. The basis of your paper is that it should be an alliance on a voluntary basis of economic units, each politically independent? That is what you want—an economic unit?

A: Yes.

Q: And that raises the point I was putting, that you need more security to get finance for all the Territories?

A: Yes.

Q: You do not contemplate any sort of political nexus, except what is described here?

A: I would suggest it is better to have a position from which you can grow, rather than one which would deteriorate, as the present situation has. In other words a small beginning always lends itself to development, because it is progressive.

MR. MENZIES: This scheme which is printed is somewhat different from what Mr. Harper said.

A: Yes, those are the proposals I have put forward. In my preamble I made it clear that these proposals dovetail to some extent with the Central Africa Alliance, because they are also proposing what I have put forward. They are only put forward in the event of the Central Africa Alliance plan being found unsuitable, and also in the event of the electorate of Southern Rhodesia desiring secession.

Q: So the printed plan represents the party's view, and the other plan represents your own view?

A. (MR. FIELD): The printed leaflet is what we want. Mr. Harper is the Southern Rhodesia Territorial leader: therefore, if things reached an impossible stage, he has brought these suggestions today to meet those conditions. They really do not contradict each other at all.

Q: But you have put up your document as a practical thing?

A: So far as we are concerned, federally, that is all we want.

Q: As it involves the government by what is to be called the Dominion of Rhodesia, the whole of Northern Rhodesia with some sort of control over what you call the Northern Territory, all that is left really out of the contentious elements that face us, as a Commission, is Nyasaland. Nyasaland goes out of this concept of yours?

A: Yes.

Q: And you are still left with virtually the whole of Northern Rhodesia to handle, together with Barotseland; but that is a peaceful place and has not got the same objection to Federation as we discovered throughout Northern Rhodesia. How is it conceived by your party that there is going to be any greater acceptance of this scheme than of Federation today?

A: In the first place they have got something before them that they can consider. The bulk of the country is taken, except Barotseland and the Northern Province, the Fort Jameson area, Kasama, and all round. Geographically it is a big area and represents about half. It only leaves a little over 500,000 permanent Africans resident in the so-called Dominion of Rhodesia. So it would not be right to say we are taking the whole of Northern Rhodesia. I think it would give confidence for the Africans to know that, if at the end of a certain specified period the thing was not working out, they were then entitled to leave. At the moment they have no such entitlement; and the same is true of Nyasaland. They have been told categorically that there is no machinery by which they can leave. It must be remembered they were never asked in the first place. Well, here is the machinery for them. If I lived there, I would be the first to admit it was impossible to govern that Territory on their own. They have no people trained in the art of government or administration, and it would be a time to think it over. Afterwards, if they wanted to go, they could go.

Q: What you call at economic association seems to me, looking at this document, to be only Federation of a restricted area in another form. First of all you have to get rid of the present framework of Federation. Then you substitute a body which has very considerable legislative powers. Its revenues are ill conceived, if I may say so, because the only source of revenue which is mentioned is Customs—no income tax or revenue from any other source is mentioned, and yet you say it has to provide all services.

A: The answer is simple: the whole of the revenue, to all intents and purposes, comes from this area anyway, apart from Customs.

Q: How do you propose to collect it—what is the legislative machinery?

A: Exactly the same as in Australia: a Dominion of Rhodesia with a Dominion government. It is intended that the Dominion of Rhodesia should be capable of collecting its revenues. It will collect its revenues in exactly the same way as any other Dominion.

Q: Between whom is the economic tie-up?

A: Between Nyasaland, the Dominion of Rhodesia, for the time being with the Northern Territory and Barotseland, plus any territory which cares to join it.

MR. CHIRWA: Have you discussed this scheme with some of your constituents?

A. (MR. HARPER): These are my own personal ideas, and nobody else has any responsibility for them. I have discussed them with others, not only with constituents but with other people. In the formulation of ideas.

Q: It is an economic union, based on economics?

A: I do not know whether that means a complete economic union. It could quite easily be that, arising from a proposal of this sort—there might be a limited economic union. I have nothing particular in mind. I left it open. This is a plan, and that is a matter between economists to decide as to what is possible.

Q: Do you think the European inhabitants of Southern Rhodesia would agree to an economic union with Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland without having political ties with those countries?

A: Yes, in exactly the same way as we have an economic union and trade agreements with South Africa without political ties. That is, a trade union.

CHAIRMAN: In the original blue print, at (f) it says: "Bearing in mind the relatively greater development and stronger economic position of the Dominion of Rhodesia, and the desire of the Dominion to see the other territories reach full development, both economic and political, within the British Commonwealth, the Dominion will, from its revenues, make a grant in aid towards the development of the other territories." So that in the plan formulated by the party they are assuming that. You are now being asked if the Europeans in the south would accept it?

A. MR. FIELD: I recall Mr. Chirwa's words well, if I may repeat them, when he was a Member of Parliament. He asked me if we would approve of Nyasaland having internal independence as a country, as we have in Southern Rhodesia, and at the time he prepared to continue economic help. My reply was categorically "yes". This was before we ever published this in blue print form.

MR. ROBINSON: In paragraph 4(a) of your blue print of the Alliance, you say that the approach of the British Government is frankly along racial lines, whatever lip service they may pay to other ideas; and in paragraph 4(b) you say, "Encouraged by the British Government, the Africans in those areas of the Federation where European interests are small, have rejected the vague and undefined policy of 'partnership'." Would you say why you feel your first statement to be true and also what evidence you have that they have encouraged the Africans to reject the policy of partnership?

A: Yes. It is because the British Government made no attempt whatever at the beginning of Federation to sell the idea of Federation, and also of partnership—though I dislike the word. I consider that is the encouragement they have given. In the past, whenever the Africans in the Protectorates went to their District Commissioner for advice they got it, except on this one point, and that made them suspicious: without any doubt that quite definitely encouraged them to reject it. As regards the other point, I did not write the piece you quote: it was based on the Stewart Gore-Brown plan, and the basis of it was worked out by Mr. Van Eeden and myself.

Q: Under (e) it says that Europeans are determined, even though they express liberal views, to remain in control and secure their own survival. In this Dominion of Rhodesia which you are contemplating you will have something in the order of three million Africans, if we take the figure of half a million which Mr. Field has mentioned as being in the northern section. Do you think that by all these arrangements—you have now shed large areas and are left with the Dominion of Rhodesia according to your plan with three million Africans and roughly three hundred thousand whites—do you suggest to the Commission that the constitutional arrangements and franchise arrangements should be so devised as to ensure permanent European control?

A: No; the words could be interpreted that way, but it should be, as our party policy states quite definitely, for the foreseeable future. It would be quite absurd for any one to try to legislate for posterity indefinitely, and nobody who says this or that situation will exist at such and such a time can be right. We have no policy in view that will be devised to bring such a state of affairs about. In fact I do not think it could ever be done.

Q: In other words, these words must be read in the light of your policy?

A: Yes, quite definitely.

MR. JUSTICE BEADLE: Mr. Harper, you state at the end of your précis of the Commission that the member States will be politically independent. Do you mean by that that the member States would no longer be under the control of the Colonial Office?

A. (MR. HARPER): Not necessarily. For example, if one took the case of Nyasaland, which happened to join a Commission of this sort, it does not necessarily mean that it would be run by Nyasalanders, but it would be relative, for example, to Southern Rhodesia.

Q: You mean independent of Southern Rhodesia, not politically independent—they could still have the same governments as they have now?

A: That is right.

Q: Is there anything fundamentally different in your suggestion from the old Central Africa Council? I have just been looking at the Constitution, and they seem to be identical. That was the arrangement we had in 1953. Have you based your Commission on the old Central Africa agreement?

A: No, I have never read that agreement, and apart from hearsay, I have no knowledge of it. I have based this purely on the demands of the situation as I see them, arising from the unhappy state of things in the Federation.

Q: This was exactly the same as the agreement we operated on prior to Federation.

A: Perhaps there might be a difference in that your Commissioners, for example, would be political appointees.

Q: In the old agreement they consisted of two from each state, the Prime Minister and the Governor of Southern Rhodesia, and the Governor and Chief Secretary of each of the Northern Territories; so as to some extent they would be political appointees also?

A: That is quite right.

MR. McCLELAND: I have been looking at this map here, and in drawing the boundaries of your Dominion in Rhodesia you appear to discard the northern province and eastern province. They cut across to the Northern Territories. Is that correct?

A. (MR. FIELD): There is no actual discarding, but there is an open invitation for them to continue as part of the set-up.

Q: But nevertheless, as far as this is concerned, they are treated as a portion of separate Territories?

A: No, they are treated as part of the Dominion, at a time to be decided.

Q: I assume you have excluded the Eastern Province because of its geographical situation, and it fits closer into Nyasaland; and you have excluded the Northern Province because it is predominantly an African state and likely to remain so. There is little European development.

A: No; but there is very little European development, apart from Fort Jameson, in the other part. It will be part of the Dominion of Rhodesia for a specified period. That is stated quite definitely. They could opt out of it, if they wished, after a period. Because of this lack of European population and political development they would be treated separately in the Parliament of Rhodesia. This is rather important. We felt that here was an opportunity to try to make co-operation—which I prefer to use rather than the word partnership, which means so many things to so many people—to show how an association of this sort can work favourably for the African territory concerned, as well as to the benefit of the area as a whole. We would like the opportunity to try to do this. Whatever is thought and whatever bitterness there is at the moment in Nyasaland, say, I believe that if we have an opportunity of proving that this can work we should be given that opportunity. It is quite possible that this bitterness which exists on the part of certain political leaders in Nyasaland—they are the people who get seen and heard, of course—would be mitigated. I believe that here is an opportunity to make it work.

Q: I can understand the reason for this separate treatment of this particular portion, but, if you accept the theories that apply to that one, I cannot understand why you have included the North-Western Province, which basically is in exactly the same position as the Northern Province—that is the section going up towards Mwinilunga. It contains some of the northern province and a large chunk of the Central Province.

A: The general idea was that this is not a firm and fixed idea but a basis for discussion. We have never suggested at any time in our various publications on this that we are set on these absolute boundaries as marked here. It is possible that during the drawing of them we may have included some sort of area to which may apply the same terms and conditions; but in general terms I do not accept what Mr. McClelland is saying. I know Northern Rhodesia very well, and had business interests there long before the war. The general line of rail is what we are referring to, based on the old Stewart Gore-Brown plan, and if there are adjustments to be made, obviously they can be made.

MR. CRAWLEY: As I understand it, the north-eastern Territories, to begin with, will be under the Dominion of Rhodesia; and the United Kingdom will have no rights within them at all?

A: No.

Q: On the other hand you visualise the possibility that they might secede within x years if they wanted to. What guarantee would you have, let us say, if your opponents achieved power within those years, that they would not alter the constitution and remove the right of secession?

A: You seem to have less faith in our political opponents than we have. An agreement of that type is the sort that should be made right out of party politics. I would suggest that neither party in Great Britain could guarantee something of that character. I would prefer these things not to be on a party political line at all: or else the Dominion Party and the Federal Government Party should approach this and try to get together. That is the only possible solution.

Q: You would not like any reference to the United Kingdom on that point?

A: I do not want any interference from the United Kingdom in our affairs.

LORD CRATHORNE: Am I right in thinking that the great majority of your support in the Federation comes from Southern Rhodesia, by and large?

A: Yes, we actually got more votes in the Federal election, strangely enough, than in the territorial election, where we got a majority of the votes. I think we actually got 35 per cent of the votes in Northern Rhodesia but only one seat; and to all intents and purposes none in Nyasaland. I think we would have had some more had there been some Africans on the voters' roll.

Q: So the bulk of it is in Southern Rhodesia; there is a certain amount of support in Northern Rhodesia; and very little in Nyasaland. In the blue print you say that the situation is so uncertain that complete disruption may result. That is your considered view?

A: Yes.

Q: Am I right in thinking that your real fear is that unless something very definite, of a different nature from the present situation, takes place there will be no chance of keeping Southern Rhodesia within a Federation or association, which you and your party think is in the interests of the whole?

A: That is so.

Q: So really, from that basis you have put up this as a cock-shy, which is a reorientation of the Gore-Brown proposals, to try to fit into the modern age—to try for some idea by which you will be able to have an association between the Territories without a complete breakdown which would drive Southern Rhodesia out?

A: That is so.

MR. KATILUNGU: Looking at the map it seems that the Dominion of Rhodesia would cover the Southern Province, Western Province, North-Western Province as well as part of the Central Province. In these areas which are indicated to be covered by the Dominion of Rhodesia are situated hereditary Native authorities who perhaps settled on either Native trustee land or Native reserve land. When a situation of this nature had been created, where do you think these Native areas would be transferred to and what will come out of the title of the land on which they are settled today, since you indicated that this land which you have indicated to be embraced by the Dominion of Rhodesia comprises European settlement as such?

A: Yes, we have considered that and quite obviously existing rights must be continued. There would be no expropriation of Chiefs' land—we look upon this as a question of detail, but very important detail indeed—but we would continue exercising such authority probably even more than now if it was looked upon us to do so, but there would be no interference with people's way of life.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: In regard to your commission, you say "(a) there will be no central or Federal Government" but you say nothing about any kind of Assembly. For instance, in the East Africa High Commission or the Council of Europe you do have some kind of Assembly, and even in the Common Market there is something of that nature. Would you contemplate that something of that kind would be required?

A. (MR. HARPER): No. If by Assembly one meant a body capable of legislating, I would say "No", because you are straight back to your Federal Government.

Q: Something in the case of the East Africa High Commission, for example, that was only capable of acting as a Legislature when there had already been agreement?

A: I have no adequate knowledge of it, but as I understand it the East African High Commission was capable of imposing taxation.

Q: That merely enabled it to act as an agent to the people who had already agreed.

A: I relate taxation to great power; that if you can tax, you can govern.

Q: The Council of Europe is merely a talking organization.

A: Yes. My suggestion would be that they might make regulations with regard to the matters they have to administer, but they would not make legislation; their legislation would be in terms of legislation made by the States as far as this proposal is concerned.

Q: When they had agreed upon something in their discussion, then it would be necessary for the component States to introduce the necessary legislation?

A: That is right, and their channel of arrangement would be by virtue of their political opponents.

MR. JUSTICE BEADLE: I want to see whether it is possible to reconcile your scheme and the people concerned with certain pronouncements which have been made by Whitehall; if it is not possible, please say so. Your scheme virtually amounts to amalgamation into a unitary State of the central and wealthiest part of Northern Rhodesia with Southern Rhodesia. In 1950 a joint announcement that was made by the Federal Prime Minister and by the Secretary of State for the Commonwealth Relations Office specifically said that the two Governments were against amalgamation. That appeared specifically in that statement, that they were against amalgamation. They were in favour of continuing Federation. Can you start with that one? Can you reconcile that joint announcement with your scheme?

A. (MR. FIELD): I cannot reconcile the announcement with the scheme but, after all, governmental announcements at the highest level have been made in the past, though not all have been adhered to. I have heard it said that this Federation would not be allowed to break up, but if any particular territory decides it is going to get out, no agreement or Government is going to stop it. I cannot reconcile it, but on the other hand I do not count a pronouncement like that as making it impossible to bring some such scheme as we suggest, maybe in a slightly different form or in a compromised form. I think it is still possible. Let me put it this way: No such pronouncements would put us off setting out to do what we think is right.

Q: The next one to reconcile is this: A statement has been made from time to time on at least two occasions I can recall by Mr. Macmillan in Her Majesty's Government, that the Government would not remove her protection from the Africans in the Northern Territories until such time as those people wish it to be removed. If you amalgamate into a unitary State which has the full status of a Dominion, are you not removing Her Majesty's protection from the Africans in that state before their are being consulted or able to express an opinion in the matter?

A: That, of course, is one of the reasons why where the bulk of the Africans live, which is in the shaded State, we have left that question completely open.

Q: Half a million are in the middle?

A: That is so, but if you try to find somebody who is going to satisfy everybody, it is absolutely impossible. You are bound to offend somebody somewhere.

MR. CHIRWA: May I put a question to Mr. Field. I know of course, that you have travelled many times to these territories of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland and I think among the European political leaders; I wondered if you had the opportunity of meeting many of the nationalist leaders, including Dr. Banda? Are these views of yours based on the views you had received from those Africans and Europeans?

A: No, Mr. Chairman, we put this out long before we had ever heard of Dr. Banda. The only time that I discussed it with Dr. Banda was when he came to see me with one of his lieutenants in Blantyre and we certainly have not been influenced in our views by Dr. Banda; either Mr. Chirwa or Dr. Banda or any other African leader that I have met. We put this out with the knowledge of the peoples of the country in general as what appeared to us to be a fair and reasonable solution, but if the question is, was I put up to this by Dr. Banda, certainly not.

Q: What about the reaction of these leaders?

A: I remember what yours was, for one.

Q: I remember, too. What about the others?

A: It would be wrong for me to say. I am quite prepared to do it in private. This part of what I am going to say is not to be published later.

The discussion was continued in private for several minutes.

MR. GONDWE: Mr. Field says that he met African leaders in Nyasaland. Could he inform this Commission whether he met European leaders as well at the same time, and, if so, what was their reactions?

A: I did not meet European leaders then, but apart from Sir Robert Armitage, with whom I discussed it, I did not discuss it with European leaders. I found European leaders in Nyasaland prior to this had been so blind to the future that it looked to me to be a complete and absolute waste of time. They did not appreciate realities. What I had tried to put over to them before was this: If I were a European farmer living in Nyasaland, I would very much rather have this sort of set-up with assurance and guaranteed protection, and people on hand who could carry it out if necessary, than I would the very uncertain situation that exists at the moment. No, I did not discuss it with European leaders, apart from Sir Robert Armitage. I will say our difference on this point was that I considered Nyasaland's future as a territory must be decided before her association with the other territories was decided. We did not want a pig in a poke again.

Q: I am asking this question because I think it is known by everybody that Africans in Nyasaland are dead against the present set-up and that the Europeans in the territory would like to continue this association as we have it at present. Are you not betraying your own kith and kin when you do not make an attempt to discuss this thing with them, because they are part and parcel of the country of Nyasaland and the whole aim is partnership. I think you subscribe to that, though you say "No", that the word itself is somewhat unfortunate because it cannot be given any interpretation. But surely you would like your own kith and kin in Nyasaland to participate in something which is to the benefit of them as well as to the benefit of the country as a whole?

A: First of all, of course, it is quite wrong that I have not attempted to discuss it with them. I did so fully at the time of the election. I addressed several meetings in Nyasaland, putting our ideas in general before them, and I made this statement which I have repeated. I consider that, given the type of ideas, they would be very much better off. As for betraying them, we are saving them. This is the only guarantee they have got of permanent security. The Colonial Office does not make the guarantees we are prepared to make. I believe that if I was a Nyasaland farmer I would feel very much safer under these conditions than I would at the present moment.

MR. TAYLOR: I wonder if Mr. Winston Field would enlarge on that—the thought of protection? You said just now that if you were a European farmer living in Nyasaland you would feel a lot happier than you would feel under anything else.

A: Not under anything else, but under the present set-up.

Q: Why would you feel happier? What guarantees are you giving, what protection are you giving? Supposing the State of Nyasaland passed discriminatory legislation against you or tried to expropriate your land or do something, what clause of your treaty with that territory would enable you to be given that protection?

A: Whatever clause was put in for that purpose. Quite obviously there would be clauses to the treaty before they got independence, including a clause safeguarding the rights of the Europeans. At the moment there is turmoil in Nyasaland where rights have been threatened. Whether to the same extent as publicised or not, we do not really know; but under these conditions, with an association of the territories with the necessary authority on hand to see the clauses were carried out, would be a very much better state of affairs than it is at the moment where they have no such guarantee whatever.

Q: Mr. Harper's independent proposals on the last page: "Such legislation as the Commission may require will be made". What sort of legislation do you envisage the Commission may require the member States, the Dominion of Rhodesia, for example, to make?

A. (MR. HARPER): As you see in (e) in the plan the functions and areas in which the Commission would administer would be a matter for agreement between its members. One has assumed that certain functions have been agreed to and certain legislation would be required without putting that back to the Government, and in order to make this work it is necessary that the legislation should be passed.

MR. MOLSON: I have one or two questions about Southern Rhodesia. It was pointed out in the Northern Territories that the chief unwillingness for them to be members of the Federation was due to colour bar and discriminatory legislation in Southern Rhodesia. I thought I saw in the paper while we were travelling around that the Party which Mr. Harper leads divided against the Bill to make it possible for the hotels to become multi-racial. Is that the considered policy of the Dominion Party, and, if so, on what is it based?

A: The policy of our Party is to support the Land Apportionment Act which has been an Act in this country for many years and it is our historic way of life. Certain areas are African, certain areas are European areas. As chance has it, there has been a substantial amount of development in the European areas. Our feeling is this, that while there is necessity for facilities of a multi-racial nature we feel that the rights of those who do not wish to live in multi-racial conditions are equally as important as those who do. That is why we insisted that at Bulawayo Fair all the facilities should not be multi-racial; we insisted there should be one facility for Europeans only and one facility for Africans only. We are prepared to support it.

Q: I quite follow that. Indeed, I should be disposed to agree that to repeal the Land Apportionment Act would be a very wrong thing to do, but does your Party oppose all of it?

A: My Party does not oppose all of it without envisaging what those proposals were.

Q: At the present time all the large urban areas in Southern Rhodesia are included in the European areas and none of them is included in the African areas?

A: Historically the position was this: When the Europeans came here they found the Africans were substantially living in the areas in which they are living now and their statement was that they were not driving them out. They have developed in the areas in which they settled. Development has followed the European.

Q: Are we to understand your Party would be opposed to any amendment of the Land Apportionment Act which would enable Africans to share in the financial, commercial and industrial development in the urban areas that are now included in the European areas?

A: Financial, urban? Is the suggestion that the Africans should take part in the existing business areas?

Q: Yes. Your answer, as I understand it, was this: That I think you used the words it has happened that the development of the urban areas, Salisbury and Bulawayo, and so on, with all industrial concerns, their shops and so on, have, in fact, and by chance taken place in the European area. I am asking whether we are to assume that your Party would always be opposed to an amendment that would enable the Africans in future to take some part in those urban areas?

A: The assumption, of course, to start with, that the Africans do not take part is quite wrong, because as a matter of fact in their own urban areas it is entirely a matter for them. There facilities are entirely for the African. For example, if I wanted to open a store in an African area, I am not permitted to do so. There have been proposals which we have supported that there should be urban areas set aside for Africans to purchase freehold property, and we support the proposal that in those areas where they purchase freehold property all the facilities should be theirs.

Q: But you would be opposed to their being entitled to purchasing any land or any freehold which is in the existing European area?

A: Yes, we would be.

Q: Does the same apply as regards rural areas? I think I am right in saying that 42 million acres are reserved for the great African majority and 48 million acres for the small European minority. Would you be opposed to any amendment of the Land Apportionment Act which made some of the European land available for the Africans?

A: The broad figures as I understood is 48 million for the African and 51 million for the European minority, but one has to bear in mind, as Mr. Field has said, that a very substantial number of Africans are in European areas and the question as to whether one would be permanently opposed to it is answered by saying one would not be permanently opposed to anything. The question is whether it would be reasonable to do so, and that would be considered at the time the proposition came forward.

Q: Until 1930 there was nothing to prevent Africans buying land in what are now European areas?

A: That is quite right, and there was nothing to prevent Europeans buying up all the African land.

Q: It is because of that I did not suggest it was desirable to repeal the Land Apportionment Act, but I did want to know how far your Party was prepared to go in the way of making amendments, taking into consideration the changes since 1930.

A: All amendments would be based on reason, and one would have to see that the reasons were sufficiently cogent for us to accept them.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: If you walk out of here and go across the square you see they have seats and they have "Europeans" on them. Do you think that is a necessary thing to do?

A. (MR. FIELD): I very much doubt whether you are right, unless some of the old paint has been rubbed off. They are not meant to be there.

MR. JUSTICE BEADLE: It has no legal effect?

A: I would tell you this: I would certainly like to see seats there reserved for elderly Europeans where Africans would not be allowed to sprawl on them and take up three places where one would do.

SIR CHARLES ARDEN-CLARKE: The Central African Alliance in (4), "under the Treaty, the Dominion of Rhodesia will recognise that, for a period of time, it has certain responsibilities and obligations", and one of those obligations is to make a grant-in-aid towards the development of the other Territories. That period of time will expire, or the treaty may be revoked. Meanwhile, the whole of the revenue-earning part of what is now Northern Rhodesia has come in the hands of the Dominion of Rhodesia. The possibility, not a probability, but Her Majesty's Government must surely envisage the possibility of getting landed with all the rest—the Protectorates and possibly the Northern Territory as you have shown in here, and having to subsidise them, having no local revenues to do it with; how would you meet that objection?

A. (MR. FIELD): It is a very difficult thing to meet unless one accepts that these are acknowledged in all good faith. After all, when you enter into an agreement you enter into it in mutual trust, with the anticipation that you must stick to the points you have agreed on; and after all, if one follows it through to the logical conclusion, under present conditions it is saying that the Federal Government has to spend the extra money they do in fact spend in Nyasaland over and above that which they receive from that Territory. I believe the balance is somewhere between £3 and £4 million at the moment. I believe they should have spent more than that, and it might have had more effect in other ways, but it is very difficult to guarantee that certain obligations that one has undertaken will be carried out by somebody else. I can only suggest that when these things are undertaken, as I have suggested before, they will be adhered to in the spirit in which they are entered into.

Q: Apart from revocation, shall we take "for a period of time"? That time will expire, and at the end of that time supposing it is not renewed?

A: I see no reason why it should not be renewed, providing the economic alliance was satisfactory. Our idea is this, that will go on until development in Nyasaland reaches that stage where the country can be self-sustaining as a result of the extra moneys expended there.

MR. ELLMAN BROWN: I would like Mr. Field to say if he has based his plan that it is quite impossible to force Federation on Nyasaland if it does not want it. That is fundamental, it just won't work. I will admit that probably you decided your plan before the troubled days of last year and the year before. Would you say, firstly, as a result of the agitation that has gone on in Nyasaland—and if this plan were to be put into practice and if Dr. Banda got virtually what he wants with financial help it will not have a corresponding effect in Northern Rhodesia, and would he be perfectly happy with the Africans coming in within the Dominion of Northern Rhodesia—that they will be prepared to accept the position? Is there not a likelihood that Nyasaland, having got what it wants, will encourage the Africans in Northern Rhodesia to take stronger steps to achieve what they think they should have?

A: That is, of course, a possibility which one cannot deny, but you say first of all, would I be perfectly happy? Of course I would not be perfectly happy about it, and it is impossible to be perfectly happy if you do not please everybody. Northern Rhodesia is a very much more complex problem than Nyasaland. It is not a composite country in the same way, in my opinion, as Nyasaland is. I appreciate that there are certain tribes that they have on the Fort Jameson side that should belong to the Nyasaland side. There are minor adjustments which should be made. I believe it would be possible to put this over as an idea provided we sow seed very quickly; it might even now be too late. Of course I would not be perfectly happy about it.

Q: But try and overcome another difficulty. Mr. Justice Beadle asked whether this idea could be reconciled with certain political statements by British Ministers. One of those statements was that they would not do anything in the two Northern Territories without the wish of the majority of the people there. Would you consider a scheme like this? Instead of having a Dominion of Rhodesia you had your Government of Rhodesia proceeding as it is bound to do on the present thing there in the form of a Federation between the two Rhodesias, leaving what I call the political aspirations of the Africans in the North to deal with functions which affected their daily lives. Do you see any advantage or do you feel that is completely unacceptable to Southern Rhodesians you represent?

A: You are asking me to suggest that we are prepared to accept defeat before we have started.

Q: Defeat of your plan, but I am just assuming that knowing the pronouncements that have been made there are going to be difficulties of getting, shall we say, the British Government and Whitehall to agree to this. Is there any thought or any value in working out a possible federation with Northern and Southern Rhodesia with some of these parts on a High Commissioner basis?—If you are suggesting would we consider it possible to work a federation of the white portion of Northern Rhodesia with Southern Rhodesia, obviously it would be possible to work it, but we have to consider various things from the Southern Rhodesia point of view, and I discussed this with Mr. Harper. Obviously some of the objections of the Federation would be removed, but I do not think it would be such a workable plan as the others. But, of course, it has its possibilities and nobody is foolish enough to refuse to consider whatever proposals are put forward as alternatives.

A. (MR. HARPER): The proposition, as I understand it from

Mr. ELLMAN BROWN, is surely we are still carrying on with Federation but we knock off bits of the territory?

Q: Keep the alliance—But you will have the Federal Government, that is three Governments still. You have not altered the picture except in regard to the size of the pieces of land; you have not fundamentally altered the form.

MR. ELLMAN BROWN: No.

MR. ROBINSON: Following on Mr. Molson's question, perhaps you would be good enough to tell us in the new Dominion of Rhodesia would it be his policy to extend the application of the Land Apportionment Act to the towns in Northern Rhodesia and the towns on the Copperbelt, and would it also be the policy of the Party in respect of those hotels and restaurants and public places in business areas which have become multi-racial to de-multi-racialise them?

A. (MR. FIELD): The Dominion Party policy is quite clear. We want no laws against integration. If people wish to do so, we want no laws segregating people. We wish people to do as they individually wish, so if you say to a certain hotel this is multi-racial, then you can do it; that applies to anybody. If you do not wish, you need not follow. That is the basis of our thinking in our laws. I have travelled this world a lot and wherever I have seen any attempt made to force people to mix, it builds up resentment, and that is what our thinking is based on. Of course it would not be possible to extend the Land Apportionment Act in the way you are suggesting; there would be no intention of altering the status of hotels, that kind of thing, it would be morally wrong. We are quite certain a system can be worked out that such-and-such can apply in Southern Rhodesia, but, again, that is the type of case which I would look upon should be discussed round a table. I have no doubt at all that the problem you put up can be overcome.

Q: In the last sentence of your pamphlet you refer to your Senate and you say it will have special powers which will provide safeguards in respect of Native lands, discriminatory and presently reserved legislation. You have told us that the Dominion of Rhodesia would be a completely independent, self-governing sovereign State. In creating that constitution, would your Party be prepared to have built into the constitution a fixed and unalterable system of safeguards which might include the non-application of the Land Apportionment Act in Northern Rhodesia?

A: Yes, we would. On the point of detail we have not discussed it, but, speaking without discussing it with my colleagues, I think we would be prepared to. Incidentally, as Mr. Justice Beadle will remember, this idea of a Senate was decided upon some considerable time ago without any dissenting voice in the Southern Rhodesian Parliament, a body to look after the interests of the people who are never protected, and our idea of a Senate was carried on from what was agreed upon by all Parties in the Southern Rhodesian Parliament some time ago.

MR. KATLUNGU: In your Dominion of Rhodesia, you have not indicated what would be the form of your franchise qualifications to embrace those rolls?

A: I think we have said here that it would be based on the present franchise laws.

MR. CHIRWA: May I ask Mr. Field whether he has read these proposals of Mr. Harper and what his reaction is?

A: Mr. Chirwa can ask me but I have only just seen them. I did discuss them with Mr. Harper yesterday. He asked me if I had any objection to him putting them forward today and I could see nothing objectionable in his putting them forward.

Q: Following that question, what was the policy of your Party towards Africans owning freehold land in the African areas in the locations?

A. (MR. HARPER): We have supported it in the House. As a matter of fact the proposals which have been put forward by the Southern Rhodesian Parliament have been substantially those which members of the Party have agreed.

MR. WOODROW CROSS: Apparently you have sounded opinion in Nyasaland about the reaction to your plan. You have been many times to Northern Rhodesia and have no doubt sounded opinion there. Do you think you would get substantial support from Africans in Northern Rhodesia to your plan?

A. (MR. FIELD): I did say at the outset I had not been able to sound African opinion in the North to quite the same extent, because Mr. Kaunda and certain others have not been available, but certainly I discussed it with the two African Members of Parliament and they did not like the idea. But as far as I can find out they do not like any idea, and they had no positive idea of their own to put forward. I have discussed it with Chief Kazembe and his Council, and Chief Mushota. It was looked upon as a basis for discussion and I think in their case, at least, somebody has put something out and we know where we are. We have the idea some people have in mind instead of utterly disgraceful secrecy.

MR. GONDWE: I think the African leaders that Mr. Field wanted to meet, like Kaunda and Nkambula, would never have been sympathetic to this idea because they would have been included in the Dominion of Rhodesia. We in Nyasaland would be out of this Dominion and we would welcome it.

CHAIRMAN: I am sure we are very grateful to you for coming and helping us. I hope we have not harried you too much.

A: Not at all; we enjoyed it.

Memorandum

RHODESIAN NATIONAL ASSOCIATION (Representing Coloured and Eurafrikan Interests)

G. T. Thornicroft—President, A. J. Pillay—General Secretary

We have the honour to submit a memorandum hereunder for consideration by your Commission.

We wish to give oral evidence to the Commission in due course when we hope to be granted sufficient time to enable us to elaborate on the points raised in our memorandum.

We understand that the main concern of your Commission is to enquire into the position affecting all sections of the lawful inhabitants of the Federation in relation to the Federal Constitution for the purpose of advising all the five Governments concerned.

1. We beg the Commission to study more carefully and in detail the political situation as it affects the Eurafrikan and Coloured Community as a minority group.

According to the present set-up the Commission will find that the Eurafrikan or Coloured Community are placed in a position where for the foreseeable future, if not for ever, they will be without direct and effective representation in both the Federal and Territorial Legislative Assemblies.

2. The present Federal Constitution provides for the protection of political minorities to enable them to obtain direct representation in Parliament in the following manner:—

(a) There is provision for three Europeans who are elected or nominated by special arrangement, one from each Territory, to represent what is styled as Special African interests.

(b) Twelve Africans, four from each Territory, are elected and/or nominated by special arrangement to represent African interests.

(c) Over and above this, there is nothing to stop any of these specially elected and/or nominated members, as mentioned in (a) and (b) above, or any member of their race to stand for election and/or to vote for any candidate seeking election in what is generally regarded as an ordinary Constituency. It is therefore abundantly clear that the Federal Constitution guarantees that in any event there shall be direct representation for Africans while they remain a political minority.

As a minority group, politically and numerically, we are amazed and dismayed to discover that similar arrangements have not been provided for us in the Constitution.

(d) We are entirely in agreement with the political provision made for the Africans, even though this provision may be a temporary measure.

In the Federal Constitution we are grouped neither with the Europeans nor with the Africans. In fact we are not mentioned at all in the Constitution (vide judgment Thornicroft vs. Malcolm Barrow, Federal Minister of Home Affairs), this places our section of the Community in a difficult and false position, and it is, therefore, essential that we, as a minority, should be specially provided for in the same manner as already expressed.

Both the British Government and the Territorial and Federal Governments have continually refused to acknowledge and/or consider our claims, and have shown an utter lack of interest and sympathy in our political aspirations.

(e) Whenever we raise this issue we are misunderstood and accused of wanting to introduce race-politics. We must however, make it quite clear that we ask for this provision not as a separate racial group, but as a minority group seeking protection from being swamped by the powerful majority groups in the Country.

3. We further attach herewith, for the study and consideration of the Commission, copies of the following Memoranda:

(a) To the Federal Prime Minister, dated 3rd June, 1957;

(b) To the Right Honourable Earl of Home, Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, dated 30th September, 1957;

(c) Letter addressed to the Chief Secretary, Government of Northern Rhodesia, dated 28th March, 1958.

These documents speak for themselves and we submit them as part and in support of our evidence (see Annexures below).

Finally, we wish to emphasise the fact that without direct political representation in the Country, we have become frustrated, politically ineffective and lacking in that sense of "belonging".

We therefore make a strong appeal to the Commission to view our case and position with special care and consideration.

Salisbury

18th January 1960

Annexure I

Letter from the Rhodesian National Association to the Federal Prime Minister

P.O. Box 524,
Salisbury,
3rd June, 1957

The Secretary,
Department of the Federal Prime Minister,
Causeway.
Dear Sir,

Proposed Amendment to the Federal Constitution

I have the honour to submit hereunder a memorandum on the subject above which I shall be glad if you will kindly place before the Honourable Prime Minister, for consideration.

It is noted in this amendment that it is proposed to increase the number of seats in the Federal Assembly for both the European and African members. We are disappointed, however, to find that no provision is made for the election of Eurafrikan or Coloured members to the Assembly.

When Federation was being negotiated we requested that provision be made for the election of special members to represent Eurafrikan and Coloured interests in the Legislative Assembly of the Federation. Both the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Sir Roy Welensky and the Secretary for Commonwealth Relations in the United Kingdom Government should be aware of and should have on record the reasons for our request. We were told at that time that our interests, rights and/or privileges would be the same as those applicable to Europeans. We regret to have to state that this has been proved not to be thus. We find ourselves placed in a worse position politically than both the Europeans and the Africans.

We have no voice in the affairs of the country and are without safeguards in the political and economic structure of the state.

We are a minority and shall remain forever as such. It would appear to be unjust and unfair, therefore, to suggest that a community which numbers well over 20,000 souls in the Federation should remain without direct representation. While we do not wish to appear ungrateful for what certain European members of Parliament and the Government have done for us, we regret that we cannot accept this as sufficient reason for denying us the necessary means and right to be elected and to represent our own interests in Parliament. It should be realised that the first duty of any European representative in Parliament lies with his own race and it is most unlikely that a European member go against the wishes of his own people in favour of the interests of the Coloured people or any other race for that matter.

The Government is aware of the position that the Federal Constitution as at present framed, makes no mention of Eurafrikan or Coloured people in any way, while it is true to say that special mention and/or reference is made of both the Europeans and Africans.

The Government may not realise and appreciate the special problems affecting Eurafrikan and the Coloured people as a whole and the fact that in the Federal Constitution we as a community or a group form a part of the inhabitants of the Federation are completely ignored and are given no status whatsoever.

We are in fact without any effective representation in Parliament of the country which is equally our motherland and permanent home.

We are not prepared to accept the theory that we are grouped with the Europeans for the purpose of this Constitution, when in fact there is no mention on record of evidence to this effect in the Constitution. It is clear and true that we are denied the economic and political privileges and rights, which are enjoyed by the Europeans.

In view of this insecure and ambiguous position, we beg to submit that it would appear necessary to include in the proposed amendment of the Constitution the following:—

(a) Special arrangements for the election to the Federal Assembly on the same pattern as is provided for the election of African representatives.

(i) Two Eurafrikan or Coloured members for Southern Rhodesia.

(ii) One member for Northern Rhodesia.

(iii) One member for Nyasaland.

(b) Special safeguards to be entrenched in the Constitution for the political rights of Eurafrikan and other members of the Coloured community against any attempt at any time in the future to remove such persons from the Common Voters Roll and/or to deny them any political rights or representation in the Legislative Assembly.

(c) The position of the Coloured people to be made clear and secure in the economic and social structure of the country with particular reference to employment in the Public Service.

(d) Whilst it is not in our power nor it is our intention to express an opposition to the proposed amendment, we would respectfully point out that our position in the economic, social and political set-up of the country is far from being satisfactory. We, therefore, beg the Government not to ignore our request merely because it is based on a racial pattern, but to appreciate the facts which we submit cannot be reasonably and justly disputed.

We make our recommendation with no desire for sectional gain or interest but with a sincere and earnest desire to take a more practical and effective part in the political affairs of the country, and thus be able to make our contribution to the political stability and honest and just representation in the Parliament of the State which is intended to represent all sections. In support of our submission we would point out that the present plan of representation as set out in the Constitution is already based on a sectional and racial pattern, in that seats in the Legislative Assembly are allotted on a proportional and racial basis. The Coloured community is entirely excluded from this plan.

As a minority group and in view of the racial set-up and policies of the country, we can see no other solution to our political problems, and as a point of fact, there is no other practical way or method which could enable members of the community to take a realistic and effective part in the political affairs of the country. We therefore, respectfully appeal to the Government to give our case as stated in this memorandum serious and practical consideration. We feel assured that all reasonable thinking people in the political field of the country will agree and support our aspirations.

Letter from The Rhodesian National Association to the Right Hon. The Earl of Home

P.O. Box 524,
Salisbury,
S. Rhodesia,
30th September, 1957.

The Rt. Hon. Earl of Home,
Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations,
c/o Government House,
Salisbury.
Sir,

On behalf of the Eurafrikan and Coloured persons of mixed descent who number approximately 20,000 souls in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, we have the honour to greet you, and in common with other inhabitants of the Federation extend to you Sir, a very cordial welcome.

We are aware of the purpose of your visit, which we understand is to study the views of the people in relation to the general development of the Federation. We believe that your study also concerns the general relationship between the different races and/or groups comprising the inhabitants of this Federation.

(1) We respectfully wish to make it known to you, Sir, and through you to Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom that there exists in this Federation, a community which is quite separate from both the European and African communities. This community known as "Eurafrikan" or "Coloured" is not provided for within the framework of the Federal Constitution, and which, we are of the opinion, is entirely unknown, as a group, to you and to Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom.

(2) For administrative and general purposes we are in this country grouped as a separate community, but for some convenient reason or purpose we have been left out of the Constitution conferring Federation on the three Central African Territories.

(3) We submit that as a minority group, our economic, political and social status is very unreal and far from being satisfactory.

(a) Politically we find ourselves in a very awkward position, in that it is impossible in the present circumstances to elect a member of our own community to the Federal Assembly to watch or advance our interests, and to enable us as a community to take an effective part in the affairs of the country in general.

(b) Our position in the economic set-up of the country is not recognised and/or accepted by the Federal Government.

(c) We are not allowed to qualify for positions in the Public Service, and whenever our services are accepted in certain minor Departmental positions, it is on a differential basis in regard to pay and conditions governed mainly on the ground of race-colour, and not on merit.

(4) We would respectfully beg the Secretary for Commonwealth Relations to study very carefully the special problems affecting the Eurafrikan or Coloured people of mixed descent, and to realise that this community which forms part of the inhabitants of this Federation as a separate entity, has been ignored and denied recognition by Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom when granting Federation upon the Central African Territories.

(5) As a minority group which is very poorly provided for, we are not prepared to accept the theory daily being put to us, that we must wait for the day when we could be elected to the Legislative Assembly of the country in the ordinary way on merit. We regard such unfair and unrealistic presumptions as a mockery to ourselves as a community and out of keeping with the British sense of justice.

(6) In view of this insecure and ambiguous position in which we are placed, we beg to submit that it would appear necessary, in order to protect the interests of a minority, that when the time comes for the revision of the Federal Constitution in 1960, the position of Eurafrikan or Coloured people of mixed descent, be clearly defined and the following provisions made:—

(a) The formulation of a plan providing for the election of at least four members of the Coloured or Eurafrikan community to the Federal Assembly in the following order:

- (i) Two for Southern Rhodesia,
- (ii) One for Northern Rhodesia, and
- (iii) One for Nyasaland.

(b) Special safeguards to be entrenched in the Constitution for the protection and guarantee of:

- (i) Economic and social rights,
- (ii) Political rights of the Eurafrikan or Coloured persons against any attempt at any time in the future to remove such persons from the Common Voters Roll and/or deny them political and economic rights or representation in the Legislative Assembly.

(7) Whilst it is not in our power to oppose effectively any change in the status of the Federation, we wish to express our fears and very grave concern at the granting of any further powers upon the Federation when our position remains insecure and without definite and positive clarification.

(8) My Lord, we have no desire to exaggerate our claims, but we would like you, Sir, to know the real position in which we are placed in regard to the affairs of this Federation. We do not believe that it can be the wish of Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, that because we are a minority we should remain without direct representation, and thus be denied the opportunity of participating and contributing in a direct and effective manner in the affairs of the State of which we are a part.

(9) We wish to add, that although we are a minority, we have never been found wanting and are always ready to offer ourselves for service in time of war, and in any cause which affects the Country and the Commonwealth as a whole. We served as a unit in the last World War. Our loyalty and devotion to Her Majesty the Queen has never been at any time in doubt or found wanting in any way.

(10) In conclusion, My Lord, we would suggest for your serious consideration, that a special and independent Royal Commission be appointed by Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, in order to verify what we have said and to investigate and report on:—

(a) The political disabilities and disadvantages of the Eurafrikan or Coloured persons of mixed descent and origin who are at present a separate entity in the Federation.

(b) The economic and social problems affecting the general progress and welfare of such persons as a group.

(11) We appeal to you, Sir, to study our humble submissions carefully and most seriously with a view to finding a remedy for the removal in a practical constitutional manner our fears and concern in regard to our position and the points raised in this memorandum.

Annexure III

Letter from the Rhodesian National Association to the Chief Secretary, Government of Northern Rhodesia.

P.O. Box 524,
Salisbury,
S. Rhodesia.
28th March, 1958

The Chief Secretary,
Government of Northern Rhodesia,
Lusaka.

Dear Sir,

I respectfully beg to submit hereunder, comments and suggestions in connection with the proposed Constitutional Reform and/or arrangement for the composition of seats for representative members of the Legislative Council, of the Government of Northern Rhodesia. I shall be glad if you will kindly submit this Memorandum for consideration by His Excellency the Governor and your Government.

(1) In this connection the main issue appears to be concerned with the composition or ratio of representation between Africans and Europeans.

(2) No doubt your Government, Sir, is aware of, and must acknowledge, the existence in the Territory of Eurafrikan and/or Coloured persons of mixed descent, as a separate and distinct racial group or community. No mention appears to be made regarding the representation of this section of the community, and it will be very much appreciated if you will kindly advise as to:—

(a) What arrangements are made or included in the proposed Reform for the representation of Eurafrikan in the Legislative Council of the Territory.

(b) What measures, if any, are provided for the economic and political advancement for this section of the community.

(c) What number of seats in the Legislative Council is recommended for Eurafrikan in proportion with seats allocated to the other racial groups.

(3) It will be highly appreciated if you will kindly furnish us with a copy, if available, of the plan dealing with the proposed Constitutional Reform which is to be submitted to Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom.

(4) According to reports we understand that seats in the Legislative Council are to be formulated so as to provide representation for two groups classified as "Africans" and "non-Africans". If this is so, we beg to submit that this plan appears to us as vague and misleading, and places members of the Eurafrikan or Coloured community in a false and ambiguous position.

(5) It may be realised that Eurafrikan cannot be classified as "non-Africans" nor can they be described as "non-Europeans", because they are the product and/or descendants of both the "African" and the "European". As such they have become, and it is true they are classified and recognised as a separate group or race on their own. It would therefore appear necessary that this position be accepted in full and in practice by the creation and inclusion into the Constitution of the Territory of at least two (2) seats to which members of this race could be elected on the Legislative Council. Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom should be made well aware of this unavoidable new situation in the political structure of the country.

(6) Eurafrikan in Northern Rhodesia are very appreciative of, and value the interest being shown in their welfare, by the Government, but fear that their political advancement and aspirations cannot be realised if arrangements are not made for their inclusion in the proposed pattern providing for the election of representatives on the Legislative Council of the Territory.

(7) The principle of direct representation for all racial groups has been approved of and accepted by the British Government in almost all the British Territories. As a minority, particularly needing safeguards and protection, we are in agreement with this policy, because we believe this to be the only practical way of ensuring fair and adequate representation for all sections of the community in a country with a multi-racial population. We further believe that this form of representation is the only genuine guarantee for the representation and protection of the interests of the minorities such as ourselves.

(8) If acceptable by you, Sir, I am prepared together with leaders of the Eurafrikan Association of Northern Rhodesia, to discuss this matter with you and your Government in Lusaka at a place and time convenient to you.

Oral Evidence

RHODESIAN NATIONAL ASSOCIATION—Represented by G. Thornicroft and Messrs. Selous, Raftopoulos and Ascroft.

CHAIRMAN: In one of your enclosures to your memorandum dated June '57, you mention a figure of 20,000 souls—that is throughout the Federation?

A. (MR. THORNICROFT): Yes. It is not exactly up to date, it would be slightly more now. You will get them from the census, which is as nearly accurate as possible. One must take a broad estimate of the people.

Q: Can you give us a rough breakdown as between the three Territories?

A: Southern Rhodesia should consist of at least between 14,000 and 15,000 souls, with 2,000 to 3,000 in Northern Rhodesia; and Nyasaland is confused, I am afraid. When we say Coloured people we mean people with mixed blood, between Asians and Africans and Europeans. Asians have no objection to their own kind being classified as Indian, because sometimes it is difficult to tell the difference between a pure Indian and a mixed Indian. Therefore in Nyasaland the number of Asians is larger than Coloured: and that is because a large number of half-caste Indians classed themselves for census purposes as Asians, whereas in fact they should be grouped with the people known as Coloured. I took it from the census point of view. Taking Asians and Coloured people together in the Federation, there are well over 30,000, but there are more now, because it is not up to date. You cannot say specifically how many may be properly called Indians or Asians, of mixed blood. These people are a cosmopolitan group which, for administrative purposes, are taken as an entity and grouped as a single unit.

Q: Your main contention is that there should be political representation of the community. You have suggested that that should be achieved through a special seat in the Federal Parliament?

A: For the time being, yes.

Q: Would not those Federal seats be filled by election on the common roll?

A: Not under special circumstances. No Coloured or Asian could hope to win a seat in the ordinary way in the present circumstances, because the racial grouping of the country is a natural one.

Q: You suggest that there should be reserved seats for Coloured persons as there are for Africans. How would they be filled—by election on a common roll, not just election by the Coloured people themselves?

A: No, we would prefer the same system and methods as used in the election of special European representatives and special African representatives, not necessarily elected by any special group.

Q: Because of the small number of Asians, those would be put in on the vote of other communities. Would you regard that as representation?

A: Yes, at least they would get an opportunity of taking part in the affairs of the country. Assuming that we did not provide special seats for Africans who are elected now, as we may say, by Europeans because there are very few Africans on the common voters roll, you will find that if that was not provided for—I say this emphatically—there would not be an African in the Federal Assembly. I will go further and say that at least some Africans choose to join in a party which has more European voters, if they wish to get to Parliament, because they are dependent on a mainly European vote, so much so that in some cases it makes the position complicated. There is nothing to stop any other African standing for an ordinary constituency. That is the point.

Q: If there were such special seats, do you think it would be right that there should be special seats for Asians?

A: Yes.

Q: You think, perhaps, there should be a total of four such special seats, two for Southern Rhodesia, one for Northern Rhodesia and one for Nyasaland?

A: Yes, we go on the numbers.

Q: Would you think that was a large number, having regard to the fact that there are only 20,000 plus throughout the Federation, in proportion to the others?

A: It is essential that there should be at least one representative in each Territory. For that matter, if it suited those who are making the constitution, we ourselves would not mind having a representative for Southern Rhodesia and another representative for Northern Rhodesia and one for Nyasaland. It is a matter of having each Territory represented in the Federal Assembly. For instance, you have one African from each Territory representing special interests for Africans. You have four Africans from each Territory, and yet some of the Territories have more Africans than others. I do not know on what methods the computation was based in giving equal numbers to each Territory. We say that we have no direct representation at all, and some of us have tried to stand for an ordinary constituency only to find unfortunately, under the present set up, that Europeans will not support such a candidate. I have been one of those who have tried in many ways.

Q: This system would mean you would have one member representing the 2,000 souls in Northern Rhodesia. I suppose that is men, women and children?

A: As I have said, those people would be representing 2,000 souls. You will find some members of the Coloured community who are as white as a European, in this case they classify themselves as Europeans, due to the discriminatory conditions in the country. I do not criticise the census. No one is going to tell someone who looks light that "You are not European". Therefore as far as we are concerned we regard the census as a little misleading and not quite exact. There are more Coloured people than 2,000 in Northern Rhodesia.

MR. CHIRWA: When you put these representations to the Commission, did you consider the Territorial legislature as well?

A: Yes, as far as Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland were concerned, in those two Territories the pattern of the constitution is based on a racial representation. You will find in one of my annexures I have included a letter written to the Government in Northern Rhodesia, during the reconstruction of their present constitution. There again we got nowhere, and were ignored in the usual way. We do not consider the Southern Rhodesia Legislative Assembly in this matter, because the Southern Rhodesia Constitution in its present form is non-racial; so we are not the only people being penalised. It is open to all. It is when you come to share representation on a racial pattern, once you provide separate seats for certain groups, you must give the same thing to everybody. We claim we should be given representation in the Federal Assembly and in the Territorial assemblies of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, and perhaps when the time comes that the constitution of Southern Rhodesia is amended to provide representation on a racial basis, Southern Rhodesia as well. At present we are not justified in putting our case as regards the Southern Rhodesia Legislative Assembly. We suffer the same fate as Africans, who are in the majority and because of the pattern of the Constitution nobody is debarred from standing as a candidate, but when you are in the minority of voters you cannot hope to get representation in Parliament.

Q: Do you think the present Federal franchise satisfactory from the point of view of your community?

A: Not quite. It is a bit too high. That is due to many things, but the economic position of other people is not equal to Europeans: also there is the educational standard. Some people are not qualified on that because the educational standard is higher for Europeans than for other people. Because of these disabilities, the present franchise of the country is not in our favour. Even if it were, assuming all of us in our community were earning good money and had good educational facilities, the principle would be against us. We are a minority group.

Tanganyika is going to get self-government. They have six ordinary seats: they are open to everybody, but it is clear that the majority of people who get those seats will be Africans. Because of that they have provided specially ten seats for European minorities, and eleven seats for Asian minorities. If they failed to get any seats in the ordinary way they are guaranteed at least those 21 seats, so as to have a say in the affairs of the country. If that can be done for the European minorities, who are in a far better position than ourselves, surely we are justified as a community—not because we want to cherish ourselves or to go to Parliament to shout about ourselves—but we belong to the country and we would like to take part in the affairs of the country, and contribute towards them.

MR. KATILUNGU: Coloured people belong to certain political parties and will therefore be able to contest any seat in any constituency throughout the country, and possibly can expect to be voted for by those few Eurafrikaners on the Roll.

A: This is a matter best answered by illustration. In the last election I personally tried. In 1953, before Federation came into effect, I was told there was no need to give a special seat for Coloured people because they were in fact Europeans and would enjoy the same privileges. When the election time came I was chosen by some friends to stand in the same way as European members to represent African interests. I was turned down through the Attorney-General because it was ruled that the word "European" meant European on both sides and did not apply to Eurafriicans. I took the matter to Court, and to Appeal Court, and was told that according to the dictionary a person of African and European descent could not be described as a European. He was a Eurafriican; and because there was no mention of Eurafriicans in the Constitution, my case was ruled out. In the last election I was allowed to stand for an ordinary constituency. I did so, not because I thought I was going to win. I approached a big party, but was told I could not be nominated by them because I was not sure of winning, and therefore would lose the party one seat. I wanted to stand as an Independent. A small party, the Constitution Party, approached me to stand on their behalf. I knew they were a small party and were only making use of me for their own publicity purposes, but I took a chance and stood as their candidate. I put up a big battle, but against odds. It is true that I got a majority vote of non-Europeans, Africans, Asians and Coloureds, but I did not get many votes from Europeans; in fact even the members of the party to whom I belong, the Liberal Party, voted against me because they said, "Don't vote for Thornicroft: he will lose." They judged me beforehand, you see, although I defeated the Dominion Party.

Why should I depend on the non-European vote? I should depend on my own ability. If I am good, I am good for the country and not for a particular race. We hope to do away with the racial problem as we go along, but under the circumstances people are still racially minded. We want to help with affairs and with racial problems, but as long as we are shut out and told to wait until things get better, it will take us a long time to get where the other people are. I have gone into these things, and it has cost me a lot of money.

MR. CHIRWA: Are you suggesting the European voters who are in the minority vote on a racial basis?

A: I am quite positive of that. When I stood for the Liberal Party, I know that Europeans belonging to the group for which I was fighting actually canvassed for my opposite number. They told their European people "Vote for the U.F.P. because by voting for Thornicroft you are letting the Dominion Party in." It is a matter of races. I wanted to recruit two or three Europeans just for going about with me. I was going to pay them £150 a month. I could not raise one person, because they said they would be ostracised for having supported a member of the Coloured people. I went from individual to individual, offering money if they would assist me. None of them would volunteer to do the job. In the end I did it single handed, with a few Eurafriicans and Coloured people.

MR. MENZIES: What is the practical value of having a Eurafriican representing particular interests? What are the particular interests that you anticipate would be represented in Parliament?

A: Our particular interests are no different from the interests of any other race. Each group of people has certain particular domestic problems which affect them specifically, and anybody who lives in Southern Rhodesia knows that, but generally apart from particular interests of the section, there are national interests. It is desirable in a multi-racial country such as this that every racial group should be a party to whatever we do in the country. It makes everybody feel that whatever law is passed is agreed to apply to his section. There is no point in asking me what is my particular interest. If I have to say that it will take a large book.

CHAIRMAN: We understand, I think, that there would be a European representing the interests of Coloured people in Parliament. I understand that would be a reserved seat for a Coloured man to represent your interests.

A: Yes, we have Europeans who are voted for by all races. It is true they do certain services which we appreciate, but there comes a time when there is a clash of interests between Europeans and other races, when the European is morally bound to side with his people. It is not because we think that man is no good: it is a natural trend of things. Certain things are applicable to us and not to Europeans. We want to be with Europeans, and we want there to be one Coloured person in Parliament as well as 20 Europeans. He would be doing a good job for the people. He will convince the other European members, in a quiet way, of the disabilities which his people are suffering, and he can also help them to win the cause of his people. All these things are lacking to us. We want to be amongst people who are doing the work of the country on merit, not because we happen to belong to a certain race. We cannot go against the Africans or Europeans. We belong to both of them. We accuse them both of being irresponsible.

MR. SELOUS: We would like to try to build up the Federation for our younger generation so that this land will be a happier land for our children, not for any one particular race, and so that they can render equal service to the state, as any other man, without a fear of being legislated for by any other members of different races. About the Federal franchise, the Coloured community as a whole recognises the qualification of education, but we get worried with the monetary qualification.

CHAIRMAN: Thank you. That is your primary point, political representation in the way you have described?

A. (MR. THORNICROFT): Yes. I would like to read a letter to you received from the Governor of Northern Rhodesia in reply to a letter written by myself. At one point he was left with two seats, apart from those allocated to Europeans and Africans. He was entitled to nominate two persons for those seats in the Legislative Council, one for an Asian and one for a Eurafriican. To our surprise, the Governor nominated one Asian—which is to the good, because they are in the same position as we are—but rather than nominate a member of our community, he nominated an extra African. So I wrote him a letter and accused him of having no interest in the welfare of Eurafriicans. His Excellency then replied to me and said that I had failed to recognise that the major principle behind the constitutional provisions was the object of building Northern Rhodesia into a non-racial state—but you see, we wanted to be a party to that non-racial state, and were not allowed. The Governor went on to say that he felt confident that those members who had been elected and nominated, together with the ex-officio members, would regard themselves as representing the interests of all four groups of people in the country, their supporters as well as their opponents, of whatever race.

We are not doubting the ability of these people, but although His Excellency mentioned four groups, he has dished out seats to three groups and left us out. Unfortunately, the Government is not sympathetic to us, so even where there is a pattern of racial grouping—and you will notice that in Northern Rhodesia the people are talking only race, why cannot we talk race? We may be a bridge, and might bring about peace between the Africans and the Europeans. You can never tell about that; but at the moment we are simply counted as nil.

CENTRAL AFRICA PARTY—FEDERAL EVIDENCE

I. Introduction

1. It is desirable and right that the eight million people of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland should be governed in such a manner as would "conduce to their security, welfare and advancement". To achieve this a Federation was established in 1953 and a Constitution was given. The drafting of any Constitution "is a work of so great difficulty, that no human genius, however comprehensive, is able, by the mere dint of reason and reflection, to effect it. The judgements of many must unite in the work; experience must guide their labour; time must bring it to perfection, and the feeling of inconveniences must correct the mistakes which they inevitably fall into in their first trials and experiments".*

2. Just as important as exercising the utmost care in the framing of a Constitution, is the need to have it accepted by the people whose lives it is to affect. It was not enough to postulate that the Constitution was a good instrument and that it would eventually bring the country to full membership of the Commonwealth. It was fundamental that its terms should apply to all our people and that the benefits it promised should be enjoyed by all, without distinction of race or colour.

3. In 1953, those in authority believed that the African people in general were not sufficiently advanced to be able to understand what Federation meant or what great benefits it would bring. If those responsible believed that it was right, or at least practicable, to impose the Federal system without its immediate acceptance by a majority of the people, then they should have recognised that the only way to make it succeed was to make its advantages manifest to a majority of the people without delay, and also to ensure that those benefits were experienced in the actual day to day life of the people.

4. Six years of Federation have brought considerable economic development, particularly in the Rhodesias, but while such advancement is of great importance, it is limited to a small section of the wide field of "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness". Only when economic progress is accompanied by the extension of liberty, by the growth of security, and by the strengthening of bonds of partnership and co-operation, can it fairly be held that the Constitution is fulfilling its purpose.

5. Some plead that more time must be allowed before judgements are made. Many people hold that an expanding economy itself meet the needs of our people: bread, not votes, can save the Federation.

6. If, with economic development, there had been no deterioration in other spheres of our life, then a case might have been made for patience and a continuation of things as they are. In the past six years, however, liberty has been substantially reduced; the people are rapidly losing any sense of security; growing racial feeling is threatening the existence of the Nation and the position of government itself has been brought into jeopardy; because our Governments have failed to gain sufficient support from the people to provide stability.

7. If the consent of the people is not won, then it can be only a matter of time before authority comes into disrepute and the future maintenance of law and order will degenerate wholly into a police and military exercise.

8. The vital test of the good faith of the European is his readiness or otherwise to remove colour from politics. The Constitution provided that qualifications for the Federal franchise should be decided by the first Federal Parliament, in which the majority of Members was European. Here was the acid test of partnership, here was opportunity to show good faith by extending the franchise as widely as possible within the limits of literacy and responsibility. If this had been done, the whole course of Federation would have been changed. In 1957, however, Parliament flouted the danger of denying political rights to Africans, and while making a pretence of non-racialism, it used the device of the artificial economic colour-bar to maintain a political colour-bar. Only a few hundreds of Africans were able to vote alongside the 80,000 white electors at the following election. The Electoral Act of 1957 is the greatest single blow to a possible unity and it is designed to hold almost all power in European hands for the foreseeable future.

9. Our Federation was based, not upon a community of men, free, equal and independent; but was placed in the hands of 80,000 white electors, the majority of whom would, at the most, admit that Africans in general might sometime in the distant future become capable and responsible fellow-citizens. In these circumstances government can hardly escape appearing to be completely arbitrary in the eyes of the majority of the people. In our Federation men of only the one race have consented together, and this is our great weakness.

10. But the African people as a whole, while not having consented together with the white population, believe that they have rights, inalienable rights, which are being denied to them.

11. History teaches us that power corrupts and our Europeans, because they hold all political power, should therefore be very careful in its use, especially when they find themselves in conflict of opinion with almost all our African people. We hold that the Government did not recognise the necessity of winning the confidence of the majority of the people because Europeans in Central Africa have become so used to being able to impose their will. Nevertheless, to those who felt this way, the future remained uncertain while Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom continued to bear responsibility for the Federation and to hold defined powers. The Federal Government therefore decided to demand that the British Government should relinquish all responsibility relative to the Federal Government itself.

12. To African people this move appeared to seal their fate and to condemn them to the position of second-class citizens in the land of their birth. Locke held that no man or society of men has "a power to deliver up their preservation, or consequently the means of it, to the absolute will and arbitrary domination of another", and such a spirit is becoming increasingly observable amongst our African people. They hold that they have a "right to preserve what they have not a power to part with", and that the plans of the Federal Government threaten their position as men who desire freedom and opportunity.

13. A serious omission from our Constitution is a Bill of Rights. Some of the most important aspects of human relations cannot be determined by law but it is essential that a standard be set, and that every individual be guaranteed liberty, security and opportunity to the extent that the law can provide. So much of our present distress and uncertainty stems from fear, and if people could be shown that their fears were unfounded, we would banish most misunderstanding.

14. Our immediate task is to show that the terms of our present Constitution do not meet our need, to submit evidence which will convince you of our danger, and to impress upon you that we can become a great nation only if the artificial barriers of race and colour are removed from us, and every individual is guaranteed those rights which should be inalienable in a British country.

15. We have come to the time of our decision and, in the ultimate, it will have to be made in the hearts of our people. Nevertheless, that decision could be determined by the outcome of the 1960 Conference; although we recognise that no matter how adequate the Constitution may become, its success will depend upon the spirit of those who direct it.

II. The Constitutional Issues

16. The Statement of Policy of the Central Africa Party starts with five principles and the first of these is to build a united nation of all our peoples under the Crown. We also declare that unless a genuine non-racial policy is accepted without reserve and applied without compromise Federation cannot succeed. In the six years of Federation, this has not been done. As a result the main problem now is not how to improve this Constitution, but how to get any Constitution accepted.

17. Federation was established in spite of strong opposition from all African leaders in Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia. We accept, however, that the United Kingdom Government believed that Federation was in the true interest of all our peoples and that opposition to it would die out when the benefits became apparent. Because it was founded on a policy labelled "partnership", which implied removal of disabilities based on race, the British Government had every justification in believing that the policy would prove acceptable and that fears would disappear.

18. These fears did not disappear; they grew and became more general and more bitter. Had the Federal Government shown in its early years a firm determination to apply the policy to which it was pledged, opposition might have died down. Not only did it fail to do this but by its actions it intensified the original fears and convinced the Africans that their original suspicions were justified. Race tensions have increased with alarming speed during these years. In Southern Rhodesia this is probably only a manifestation of a state of mind which is appearing throughout the continent, but in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland it is far more than this. There they consider Federation to be a menace which will certainly delay and may even prevent their attaining self-government in their own lands. The actions of the Federal Government provided much justification for this attitude. For example, the threat of its leader to "go it alone" was interpreted by all Africans as a direct threat to their security and the demand that Northern Rhodesia should no longer be subject to Colonial Office influence as a direct attempt to deprive them of British protection and to halt the pace of their political progress.

19. The degree to which the Federal Government can be held responsible for the present situation is a matter for individual assessment but the implacable hostility of the African population to this Federation is all too apparent in the two protectorates and it is to this fact that future action must be related. So great is this hostility and fear that the very word "federation" has acquired a potent emotional content and any scheme with this label would be rejected by Africans without further examination.

20. The present Federal Constitution was prepared under the handicap of African opposition and because those who drafted it were well aware of its defects and believed that the opposition would cease they made provision for this revision in the hope that the later conference, freed from this handicap would make substantial alterations by agreement. This cannot happen because the coming conference will suffer the same handicap. In this respect the purpose of this conference cannot be served.

21. The conference at the end of this year has now a far heavier task. Not only must it completely alter the Federal set up to a form of association acceptable to the majority of the people, but it must do so in such a way as to save us from the bitter racial strife which now threatens to a degree far greater than the Nyasaland troubles of last year. This implies facing unpleasant facts which Europeans in the Federation would like to disregard.

22. The first fact is that whereas it was decided at the original Federation conference to disregard African opinion on the incorrect grounds that it was based on ignorance and would disappear when the benefits of Federation became apparent, we cannot do so now. Further, this opposition which was spontaneous but less well organised by the A.N.C. then, than at present, is being now channelled into powerful African Nationalistic movements. At the time of Federation, violence was never contemplated; now many leaders are convinced that it is desirable because they believe that it would lead to independence outside the Federation in only a fraction of the time that any other course would take. Added to these and other factors there is the example of what has been happening in the rest of Africa since Federation was established. Countries more backward than ours are well on their way to African self-government and the Africans of the Protectorates are well aware of these developments.

23. The state of emergency in Nyasaland with near revolution and the stringent laws passed in Northern Rhodesia in January show that African opposition to Federation requires little more to lead to violence. Developments in Tanganyika and the Congo will also have a marked effect on Nationalist sentiment in both Protectorates.

24. The Central Africa Party believes that the experience of the past six years shows that hostility to Federation cannot now be removed by any minor modifications or by merely adjustment of functions between the Federal and Territorial governments. The entire Federal concept must be examined anew. In this coming conference the basic error of the original one must not be repeated. It is essential that whatever plan the conference adopts must be accepted by any reasonable African leader who attends the conference and at some stage it must also be accepted by the people as a whole. The original conference which drafted the Constitution underrated the opposition and by creating a powerful central government augmented those fears. Had we been content with a demonstrably innocuous Government then, it might have been possible to add to its powers now.

25. If it is acknowledged that the revised constitution must win the support of the majority of our peoples within a reasonable time then the form it will take will be the best and most powerful organisation which can be established by popular agreement. But because of the fears and race tensions which have become so great in recent years it is possible that no agreement of any kind would be reached and it is certain that if agreement is reached, it will be to some kind of association between the three territories with only a fraction of its present powers.

26. Certain preliminary matters could do much to help agreement at the conference. African opposition to Federation is based primarily on the belief that it is an organisation to maintain European dominance. If they could be reassured on certain points their attitude to some kind of association between the three territories might be modified. Nyasaland should be given a constitution giving Africans sufficient power for them to safeguard their own interests and a promise of responsible government by a stated date. A marked constitutional advance in Northern Rhodesia is also needed. Both Protectorates should have the pledge renewed that protectorate status would be retained until the people themselves indicate that they no longer desire it.

27. Even if these alterations are made, agreement will still not be possible unless there are entrenched in the constitution of the Federation and each member State those rights which are recognised as basic human rights, and unless the Federal franchise law is drastically revised. Until there are sufficient African voters in each constituency to swing the result away from candidates who are hostile to them, they cannot accept the franchise system nor the Government elected under that system.

28. This memorandum is concerned with African fears because it is the African population of the protectorates which opposes Federation and which will break it in violence unless the opposition is removed. But it is necessary to bear in mind that races other than African also regard their future here with anxiety. The proposal to entrench basic human rights in the constitution should reassure them also.

29. A few constitutional matters are considered individually below:—

Preamble to the Constitution

Efforts have been made within and outside the Federal Assembly to water down the meaning of the Preamble in two respects

- (i) by assuming that the protectorate status of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland can be modified by treaty or by some other arrangement between the Federal and United Kingdom Governments without reference to the protected peoples themselves and
- (ii) by declaring that the Federal Government would get Dominion Status in 1960 and that the expression "when those inhabitants so desire" did not mean "inhabitants" nor was their approval required.

30. There two examples of expressed intention to proceed with a gross breach of faith have done more to cast suspicion on the motives of the Federal Government and to confirm African fears and rouse their hostility than any other factors. The meaning has been clarified in recent months and this must be established in the revised Constitution beyond any possibility of misunderstanding.

African Affairs Board

31. The original Franchise law provided for two African members to be elected by wholly African organisations in Northern Rhodesia, and two in Nyasaland. Each Territory had one nominated European member to represent African interests. All these members would tend to be non-party. In Southern Rhodesia, the two African and one European were elected by the voters who were, for practical purposes, almost wholly European. The method of their election made it practically certain that they would belong to the political party which polled most votes and thus became the Government. One African and one European from each Territory became members of the African Affairs Board. This meant that under the original provisions it was probable that the two members of the Board from Southern Rhodesia would belong to the Party in power; it was practically certain that the four members from the protectorates would not.

32. When the Franchise law was altered and the membership greatly increased, the number of African seats was doubled but all the six additional Africans were elected on the voters roll which was practically all European. This meant that while in the original House four of the six African members were elected by Africans, in the new House only four out of twelve were so elected. As a result the Board now consists of three Africans and one European who are members of the governing party and two nominated Europeans who are not.

33. The African Affairs Board was established at the insistence of the United Kingdom Government. Until it reserved the Constitution Amendment Bill and the Franchise Bill which followed the Board probably served a useful purpose and it was of some value in reassuring the African peoples their interests were being watched.

34. When the two reservations by the Board were disregarded, belief in the Board died and Africans no longer refer to it. Now that it is packed with Government supporters it bears little resemblance to the Board as originally created. It serves no useful purpose and should be abolished. The function which it is intended to perform would be more effectively served by the entrenchment of basic rights in the Constitution.

Federal Franchise

35. The standard of education or income to qualify for franchise can be set to achieve what the Government considers to be the optimum proportion between White and Black on the voters roll. It is reasonable to presume that the present qualifications were set with that object in view, and the result is then a guide as to what the Government considers the ideal proportion to be. If this is not the purpose then any educational or income qualification (other than ability to fill in the application form) is purely arbitrary. When three States on widely differing standards of education and wealth federate then any level of qualification deemed fair in one Territory will be unfair in the other two. The only sensible plan is to permit each Territory to elect its members to the Federal Assembly on the qualifications it requires for election to its own Legislature. It is absurd that a citizen should be a voter in one election and be told he is not fit to vote in the other.

III. Constitutional Safeguards

Introduction

36. The most important fact which has emerged from the experience of Federation during the years since its inception is the fact that significant interests and feelings in the country are inadequately reflected in the Parliaments of the Federation and the Territories. The result has been that actions which have tended to undermine rather than increase the confidence of large sections of the people have been taken by Government often in ignorance of what it was doing, and the feelings of those aggrieved have tended to seek expression outside the ordinary political system.

37. The Party is prepared to substantiate this contention by facts and examples when oral evidence is given.

38. In the interests of peaceful progress and good government it is vitally necessary that political participation should be extended widely enough and soon enough. This is the most important single problem to be solved in the course of the 1960 constitutional review.

39. The essence of the problem is the fear of the European minority, which may for this purpose be defined as a fear that, if political power is extended, things may be made so unpleasant for them that they will want to get out but will find themselves only able to do so stripped of all their possessions.

40. We believe it is possible to meet this fear by means of constitutional safeguards entrenched in the constitution.

41. If this is done, and government in fact becomes sufficiently representative, necessary reforms will come about by the process of conciliation and agreement which is the essential basis of our Parliamentary system. However, there will be an interim period during which the fears of non-European people, arising from certain of the present and past laws and administrative practices, must also be met. The safeguards in the constitution must be designed to meet these fears as well.

42. The details of the safeguards to be entrenched and the method of entrenchment require, and merit, the fullest possible investigation, by trained persons, in relation to the actual fears which exist and in relation to attempts at entrenchment made in other constitutions. We have not had sufficient opportunity to make a complete study, but we put forward the following proposals to serve as a starting point.

Proposals

43. In the revision of the Constitution of the Federation provision must be made to the following effect:

(1) Subject to the provisions of paragraphs (2) and (4) no law of the Legislature of the Federation or of any of the Territories, and no regulation or enactment of the government of the Federation or of any of the territories or of any local authority, passed after the date of the revised constitution, shall be of any force and effect, and no such law, regulation or enactment passed before the date of the revised constitution continue to be of any force and effect, if and to the extent that such law, regulation or enactment—

- (a) Imposes or directly or indirectly has the effect of imposing on a person of one racial group any disability which does not apply equally to persons of another racial group or racial groups.
- (b) Imposes or directly or indirectly has the effect of imposing on any person who abandons his domicile in the Federation or his domicile in any of its constituent territories any disability in regard to the removal of his property from the Federation or from such constituent territory as the case may be.
- (c) Renders any property of any person liable to expropriation save in return for just compensation.
- (d) Renders any person liable to imprisonment without due trial or without the right of appeal from a Court of first instance.
- (e) Increases or directly or indirectly has the effect of increasing the qualifications which for the time being exist for voters, for members of the legislature of the Federation or for members of the legislature of any of its constituent territories, or reduces or directly or indirectly has the effect of reducing the effectiveness of the votes of a person for the time being qualified.
- (f) Abridges the freedom of speech or of the press or the right of the people peaceably to associate together, to assemble and to petition the Government.
- (g) Denies to any person born or naturalized or lawfully resident within the Federation the right of free movement within the borders of the Federation.

(2) (a) Notwithstanding the provisions under Proposals—sub-paragraph 1, the Commission established in terms of sub-paragraph (c) of this paragraph may, on the application of the government of the Federation or of any of the Territories or any citizen of the Federation or any British protected person domiciled within the Federation, made within three months from the date of the revised constitution, rule that any law, regulation or enactment passed before the date of the revised constitution and relating to education or the ownership or occupation of land shall for a period not exceeding five years continue to be of force and effect after a period of two years shall have elapsed from the date of the revised constitution, notwithstanding that such law regulation or enactment would otherwise become null and void in terms of sub-paragraph (1).

(b) If the Commission shall make any such ruling then such law regulation or enactment will continue to be valid for the period determined by the Commission, and the Commission shall have power on the application of any government or person referred to in sub-paragraph (a) of this paragraph to extend the period of validity of such law, regulation or enactment for a further period, or further periods, not exceeding five years.

(c) The Commission shall consist of five persons none of whom shall be citizens of the Federation or domiciled within the Federation, appointed by the Secretaries of State for the Colonies and Commonwealth Relations, and in considering any application made under this paragraph the commission shall primarily take into account the interests of the population of the Federation, or the Territory concerned, as a whole, but shall also pay due attention to the legitimate interests of minority groups.

(3) The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated and no warrant shall issue except on probable cause supported by oath or affirmation and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be searched.

(4) The provisions of Paragraphs 1 and 2 shall not apply in the Federation or in any of its constituent territories for so long as, but only for so long as, there is in existence a State of National Emergency declared in the Federation or in such territory as the case may be, provided as follows:—

- (a) No State of National Emergency shall be continued in existence for any period in excess of 30 days without the sanction of a resolution passed by a two-thirds majority vote of the legislature of the Federation or of such territory, as the case may be.
- (b) It shall not be competent for the Government of the Federation or of any of its constituent territories to pass a law indemnifying itself against any claim or proceedings by a person aggrieved, as a result of any act done by such Government, in the exercise of any emergency powers.
- (5) The Federal Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction to hear and decide any matter arising out of any contravention or alleged contravention of Paragraphs 1, 2 and 3.

(6) A person shall not be qualified to be appointed as the Chief Justice of the Federation or as a Federal Justice unless—

- (a) he is or has been a Judge of a Court having unlimited jurisdiction in civil and criminal matters in some part of Her Majesty's Dominions; or
- (b) He is practising, and has for a period of periods totalling not less than 10 years, practised as an Advocate in a Court or Courts having such jurisdiction and
- (c) He is one of a panel of candidates recommended by the Chief Justice and existing Justices.

(7) The provisions of Paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 above shall not be rescinded or amended save by an Act of the United Kingdom Parliament passed after resolutions requesting the same have been passed by a two-thirds majority vote of the legislature of the Federation and the legislatures of each of its constituent territories.

Notes on the Foregoing Proposals

Note 1. The safeguards in sub-paragraphs (b), (c) and (d) of paragraph (1) are designed with the special object of meeting the fears of Europeans, and those in sub-paragraphs (e), (f) and (g) particularly with the object of meeting the fears of Africans, though of course each to some extent cuts both ways. Sub-paragraph (a) is designed to meet the fears of both groups. As far as Europeans are concerned it will for example protect their rights and interests with regard to the ownership, occupation or use of property, and with regards to their trades, businesses and employment.

The safeguards in paragraph 3 repeat the wording of the fourth amendment of the American Constitution and are a matter of administration as well as legislation.

Note 2. These limitations on the sovereignty of Parliament have been designed to meet fears which arise specifically from the situation in the Federation, and they do not include certain principles which it has been found necessary to entrench in other constitutions. For example, the so-called "Bill of Rights" comprised by the amendments to the American Constitution cover such principles as freedom of religion; the right in criminal prosecutions to a speedy and public trial, to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with witnesses, to be entitled to compulsory process for obtaining witnesses and to Counsel for the accused's defence; the right to "the equal protection of the laws", and other matters. It would be as well to consider the advisability of including such principles.

Note 3. The purpose of paragraph 2 is to enable any existing discriminatory law or enactment to continue if it is desirable that it should do so. The exact method of dealing with this problem would have to be determined by experts in constitutional matters. The paragraph is worded on the assumption that under the revised constitution the control of education will no longer be divided between the Federal and Territorial governments on a racial basis.

Note 4. The method of entrenchment proposed in paragraph 4 assumes that the jurisdiction of the United Kingdom will be maintained, at least so far as these basic safeguards are concerned, until such time as the Government of Northern Rhodesia and the Government of Nyasaland are based on a franchise which is wide enough to give representation to all significant interests amongst the people in each of those territories. When that time comes, and a fully independent constitution for the Federation becomes possible, the stipulation for an Act of the United Kingdom Parliament contained in paragraph 4 will fall away, and the Party thinks it likely that a mere veto in the hands of any one of the territorial governments and of the Federal Government will be found to be an adequate entrenchment of the safeguards, provided the basis of the constitution remains Federal as distinct from unitary in its form.

Constitutional safeguards such as those proposed in this Memorandum, as well as being intrinsically necessary, also represent possible common ground as between the aspirations of Europeans and of Africans, for even those Africans who resent most strongly the existing political position generally recognise the need for development and the fact that development requires the presence of non-Africans living securely in Africa.

IV. Territorial Representation and Franchise Reforms.

44. At the time of preparing these notes it is still not clear to the general public whether the Commission will, or will not, have the power to recommend either the break up of the Federation into separate states or some new form of "close association" between the Territories; or whether the Commissioners will construe their terms of reference as allowing them only to make recommendations relating to specific changes in the present constitution.

45. The broad Central Africa Party viewpoint on this central question is presented elsewhere. It may be summarised as a belief that the Federation in its present form cannot continue except by force of arms and then only for a limited period; that any close association of the three territories, to be successful, must be based on the freely expressed wish of each component country to come together in a close union; and that only when each of the three territories enjoys a government which is truly representative of the significant interests of the inhabitants in that territory, will it be possible accurately to determine that it is the "free" wish of each territory to enter a close union with the others.

46. The Central Africa Party further insists that an urgent constitutional reform required in each of the territories is the introduction of a "Bill of Rights" administered by our courts but with a final right of appeal to the Judicial committee of the Privy Council.

47. Against this background we would emphasise that in any close association of the three territories it will be necessary for each territory to have equal numerical representation. For various historical reasons this was not provided for in the present constitution and in retrospect it is clear that the practical domination of the Federal sphere by Southern Rhodesian representatives (both European and African) of the overwhelmingly European electorate in that Colony coupled with the siting of the Federal capital at Salisbury has been an important factor in increasing the fears of Federation felt, before and since its inception, by the majority of the inhabitants of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland. On no grounds can it be equitable or acceptable that one of the three territories should have a greater say in the affairs of the others which fall within the sphere of whatever body administers the close union than the others. No one can say with certainty whether in the years ahead Northern or Southern Rhodesia will make the biggest economic contribution; and should conditions of living change it is quite possible that the present population pattern might change. Only equal numerical representation is acceptable.

48. It has become clear (as it was clear to the Bledisloe Commission) that there was deep-rooted and legitimate fear in the northern territories of the sort of Federal Constitution imposed upon them in 1953.

49. This fear must be removed if any successful form of close association is to survive. Hence the necessity for "built in" Constitutional Safeguards with an ultimate appeal to the Privy Council in which the majority of inhabitants of all races will have confidence.

50. Equally important to the success of any close association is the need for it to be entered into by free, independent and representative states. Of the three territories Southern Rhodesia is largely free and independent, but its government cannot be described as representative, whereas Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland have Governments which are neither free, independent nor representative.

51. The ultimate goal of the Central Africa Party is adult suffrage coupled with an educated electorate. The speed of progress towards this goal will depend upon many external and variable factors such as the amount of money available for education (rate of industrial expansion, etc.). The actual rate of progress is, we believe, far less important than the need for the government at any particular stage of the country's development to reflect the significant interests of the people—and to provide franchise which will enable this to be the case. To meet their requirement at the present time we believe that a franchise based on access to the vote of all adults with literacy in English is necessary in each sphere.

52. In Nyasaland, when up to the end of 1938 only 145 African had passed Standard VI, the number of non-Europeans who might qualify to enrol on a literacy franchise for adults is estimated as between 5,000 and 7,500 in 1960. A subsequent political annual increase of 5,000 rising to 9,000 by 1970 is likely. Consequently elections held this year on such a franchise in conjunction with the transferable vote system would be likely to result in multi-racial representation in the Legislative Assembly and probably in the governing party as well but with a slight preponderance of African members. It may well be advisable to follow, in Nyasaland itself, the Tanganyika precedent of insistence on voters voting for candidates of each of the three main racial groups—provided that this arrangement is limited to the first election only and applies only to Nyasaland Territorial elections. As in the transition period in Ghana and Tanganyika ultimate control should remain in the hands of a British Governor for a further 5 year period.

53. Our Northern Rhodesia Division will have given you evidence on the situation in that territory.

54. In Southern Rhodesia the introduction of a literacy franchise for adults would result in an estimated 25,000 Africans as well as several hundred other non-Europeans becoming eligible for the vote in 1960. Thereafter an average of 7,000 additional African voters per annum, it is estimated, would be eligible for enrolment. Taking into account the number of Europeans who have not bothered to obtain a vote together with the apathy factor amongst other races (particularly if the resulting Government were in tune with the people) it is extremely unlikely that racial parity between Europeans and non-Europeans would be achieved in less than 10 years. On the other hand the immediate increase in the proportion of non-Europeans on the roll—coupled with the retention of the transferable vote—is likely to be sufficient to ensure that the majority of elected members would need the votes of all sections of the community to be elected. In other words, the resultant Government would be representative of the significant interests of the people.

55. In what is now known as the Federal sphere we suggest that in addition to parity of territorial representation there should be election based on the territorial roll of each member state and the abolition of special representation. As an immediate step, the Southern Rhodesia Government should relax the regulations for enrolment as a voter and should employ special registering officers to tour rural areas. Furthermore, it should be sufficient to fill in the form in front of a magistrate, Justice of the Peace or Commissioner of Oaths.

56. The Federal Voters Roll is divided into A and B rolls; a list of the main qualifications for these two rolls is set out below. Of the 59 seats in the Federal Assembly, the 44 ordinary seats are elected by the A roll voters only. Of the remaining 15 special seats, 13 are elected by the A and B roll voters and so cannot be said to be solely representing the B roll voters, and the other two are for appointed members. There are, in fact, only 5,571 B roll voters out of a total of 97,022 for both rolls combined. Therefore the influence of the B roll voter is in practice negligible.

57. The reasons for this state of affairs are:

1. The antipathy of Africans to the patent flooding of their own special seats by the A roll voters.
2. The dislike of being second-class voters.
3. The natural degrees of apathy in any community where positive steps to encourage enrolment are not taken by the Government.

58. This is borne out by the fact that only 974 (out of an estimated 25,000) Africans have registered on the B roll in Southern Rhodesia compared with 2,074 (out of a potential 17,000) on the Southern Rhodesia Common roll qualifications. This has happened even though applicants for the Southern Rhodesia roll are automatically put on the Federal B roll unless specifically stated to the contrary. However, the drive by the Northern Rhodesia Government to encourage the enrolment of voters resulted in 4,301 Federal B voters in Northern Rhodesia.

59. The Central Africa Party therefore recommends:—

1. There should be a common voters' roll for federal elections with no special seats.
2. The qualifications for the federal franchise should be those pertaining in the territory in which a voter resides.

Qualifications for enrolment as a voter, at present

"A" Roll
Income	or	Property	plus Education
£ 720		£ 1,500	Nil
480		1,000	Primary, e.g. Standard VI
300		500	4 years secondary, e.g. Form 4.
"B" Roll
150		500	Nil
120		Nil	2 years secondary, e.g. Form 2.

V. The Ministries of Home Affairs and Posts General

60. A genuinely non-racial approach has not been, nor is being, applied to most of those functions of Government which have been examined and which affect all sections of our people in the Federation. If we are to stand a real chance of achieving a united nation of all our people under the Crown, these must be so revised that their future administration will not only become genuinely non-racial but will be seen to be genuinely non-racial. This we believe to be the necessary criterion whether, upon revision, these functions are to be administered by the Federal or the relevant Territorial Governments.

Ministry of Home Affairs

61. Our evidence is restricted to those functions of the Federal Ministry of Home Affairs which we consider should be the subject of Constitutional reform.

Registration of Births and Deaths

62. The situation has remained virtually unchanged since before Federation. The only registration of Births and Deaths for which the Federal Ministry now holds itself responsible is that of non-Africans in Southern Rhodesia. It is the expressed intention of the Federal Government, as it has been since the advent of Federation, to ensure complete registration of all Births and Deaths. The fact remains that no practical steps to this end have been taken.

63. The absence of compulsory registration of African births is often cited in Southern Rhodesia as justification for the continuance of those provisions of the pass laws which are humiliating and repugnant to the majority of our people.

64. In considering the practical difficulties of compulsory registration we conclude that Government representatives are sufficiently within reach of the mass of the people for it to be practical. Again, mainly on practical grounds, but with political considerations in mind, it is felt that compulsory registration should revert to being a Territorial responsibility.

65. To prevent undue hardship the period within which all new births must be registered should be one year, whilst the period between the occurrence of death and its notification should not exceed one month.

66. Finally, it is desirable to empower the Territorial Governments to compel those not already registered to become so during the period of adolescence in the interim years until compulsory registration or a complete population census renders such registration unnecessary.

Information

67. The Federal Government Information Services have been used for the preparation and distribution of material used to explain political action taken by the Federal Government. In a revised Constitution the Information Services should be restricted to the production of factual information with explanation confined to technical matters. As an illustration, it would be right and proper for these Services to disseminate information on the Federal franchise covering such items as qualifications, means of registering and method of voting, but quite improper to set down the political reasoning which led the Party in power to adopt that particular form of franchise; for whilst the former is factual in content and technical in explanation the latter must inevitably be political in nature.

68. The Allied subject of Government-operated newspapers has also been considered in view of the relationship between such papers and the Federal Information Services. The conclusion reached is that it is unsound for Governments to publish newspapers which contain political opinion and comment and that they should be prevented from doing so by their respective Constitutions, as private enterprise is now in a position to meet the demand for newspapers at an economic rate in most areas of the Federation. In case events disprove this belief it is suggested that governments be empowered to publish factual news, free from political comment and controversy, for a period not in excess of five years.

Immigration

69. At present certain classes of persons, e.g. South African Natives and Asiatics, are classed as "undesirable immigrants" on grounds of race alone and only in exceptional circumstances is a person so classified permitted into the country as an immigrant. The ability of the Federal Government to make and enforce such a classification is both an affront to human dignity and entirely contrary to the twin concepts of partnership and racial harmony upon which the Federation is supposed to be founded.

70. Under a revised Constitution, no person should be denied immigration opportunity on the grounds of his race alone. The criteria for the acceptance of an immigrant should be his ability to provide capital, skills, knowledge or experience which will contribute to the advancement and well-being of the peoples; and that disqualification should be limited to those with bad records of health and criminality, those whose presence would deny advancement to our own people and those who are known members of organisations which have been proved willing to adopt criminal or unconstitutional means to achieve ends inimical to our country.

Deportation

71. The Constitution should be amended to prevent either deportation or extradition being effected on the grounds of race alone.

Movement of Persons; issue of Passports and Travel Documents

72. The issue, refusal or withdrawal of a passport is a matter for consideration for the State in relation to each individual case. For that reason the State should be prevented, constitutionally, from being able to issue, refuse to issue, restrict the period of, or withdraw passports on the grounds solely of race or colour.

73. For so long as the issue of passports and travel documents remains the responsibility of the Federal Government, there should be entrenched in the Constitution absolute freedom of movement within its boundaries for all inhabitants of the Federation save those who are the subjects of court orders, criminal proceedings or restriction on medical grounds.

Race Affairs

74. The Office of Race Affairs should be abolished. The circumstances in which this Office was set up coupled with its purely advisory function and lack of either executive or investigating powers, tend to make it an ineffectual body. Furthermore, its very existence tends, psychologically, to reduce the responsibility to foster good race relationships which rests upon each individual. Finally, if the Constitutional reforms suggested by the Central Africa Party are accepted, the need for such an office would automatically fall away.

Ministry of Posts

75. Because this Ministry is concerned with technical rather than political matters there is little that, within the terms of the Commission, will merit its scrutiny. However, the following are three examples of the operations of this Ministry which Constitutional changes might help to improve.

(1) In recent months a young Rhodesian of Asian stock and matriculation standard of education sought to enter the Post Office as a career. Although, at the time, the relevant authorities admitted that there was a severe shortage of recruits of his standard of education, he was refused employment. The reason given was that his presence would be a source of resentment and embarrassment to Europeans alongside whom his qualifications would fit him to work. It seems that an amendment to the Constitution is needed to prevent applicants for posts in the Public Service from being debarred on racial grounds.

(2) Advanced training schools for Post Office employees exist in all three territories and the schools in the Northern territories cater only for Africans, whilst the training in Southern Rhodesia is available to Europeans only at these schools. This situation, unchanged since Federation, seems to make a mockery of the term Partnership.

(3) An example of the apparently pointless discrimination which is preventing unity amongst our people: in the urban areas of Southern Rhodesia an African who goes to collect a registered article is made to produce his Registration Certificate. This document, if lost, involves its owner in much inconvenience before it is replaced. Consequently it is not normally carried by Africans, whereas the Town Pass which carries all necessary Registration Certificate details, is. The Post Office will not hand over a registered article to an African on production of a Town Pass although it will hand over registered articles to non-Africans without any proof of identity whatsoever.

We ask permission for a non-racial delegation to appear before the Commission to give oral evidence in support and amplification of this written evidence.

Appendix to Federal Memorandum

Principles and Federal Policy

The Principles

The Principles of the Party are:—

To build a united nation of all our peoples under the Crown.
To eliminate the root causes of economic and political instability, of poverty and personal insecurity; and in so doing to eliminate the conditions in which the seeds of racial unrest can grow.

To remove from each race the fear that any single race might dominate for its own benefit.

To ensure for every inhabitant of the Federation the right and the opportunity to progress economically, politically and socially according to his character, qualifications, training, ability and industry without distinction of race, colour or creed.

To ensure that all the great freedoms which are acknowledged as fundamental human rights are accepted here as the rights of every inhabitant of the Federation.

The Federal Policy

1. Constitutional Development

There is an increasing demand by some people that the Federation should be dismembered either by the excising of such portions as are at present wholly African or by a reversion to three separate States. Those who advocate such courses do so not because they consider federation to be an objectionable form of government but because they believe that it increases the danger to their own survival or decreases their prospects of general advancement.

To build a united nation under the Crown we must first remove this danger and abolish these fears. We believe that only by so doing can we establish a Federation which has the support and loyalty of all its peoples. When our object is achieved it will become obvious, even to those who now genuinely fear Federation, that association of all in one large and powerful unit is to the benefit of all. It follows that unless a genuine non-racial policy is accepted without reserve and applied without compromise Federation cannot succeed.

In order that every inhabitant of the Federation may look forward to the future with confidence, the Party intends to entrench in the Constitution of the Federation and of each member State those rights which are recognised as basic human rights. Every man must be free to exercise these rights without interference from the State, provided that he does not infringe the rights of his fellows under the law nor undermine the authority of the State to maintain order and good government and to administer justice impartially.

Among these rights are: equality of all persons before the law; freedom of movement, of assembly and of association; freedom of religion; freedom of speech.

There are certain further rights which are recognised as fundamental to ensure that justice may be done and may manifestly be seen to be done: the Rule of Law, which gives every man threatened with penal sanction the right to be tried by the courts of the land; the right of habeas corpus; the principle that penal sanctions cannot be imposed in respect of acts which were legal when they were done.

The entrenchment of these rights will reassure the unenfranchised that they will be protected against discrimination while they lack political power; those inhabitants in the minority which now governs will also be reassured by the knowledge that their individual rights will not be endangered when political power is more widely shared.

2. Status of the Federation

The party will oppose any substantial increase in the constitutional status of the Federation or in the powers of the Federal Government until the desire of the majority of the inhabitants has been manifested. Such approval can only be properly expressed by the inhabitants of a territory after a fully representative government has been established.

The Party will urge the British Government to amend the constitutions of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland so as to achieve as soon as possible fully representative governments in those territories.

It is only when such governments have been established in all three territories that the time will be appropriate for the Federal and Territorial governments to make a joint approach to the British Government for the achievement of full independence for the Federation within the Commonwealth.

3. Franchise

The Party believes in the principle of government by consent and the maximum extension of the vote on the basis of qualifications of income and education.

The Party will amend the Federal franchise to conform with this principle and favours the adoption of Territorial franchise qualifications for elections in the federal sphere.

Coupled with the extension of the franchise, there must be a constitutional entrenchment of safeguards to prevent the abuse of power for racialistic purposes.

4. Discriminatory Legislation and Practices

The Party will examine the whole of the Federal and Territorial legislation and will amend the laws towards the abolition of unfair racial discrimination.

The Party will take positive steps to make discriminatory practices, based on colour alone, illegal in all places and establishments to which the public at large has the right of access, or which hold themselves out to serve the public.

5. Industry

To promote the rapid and diversified industrial development essential to the survival of the Federation, the conditions must be created which will attract industry on a large scale. The most important of these conditions are economic costs of production and large assured internal consumer markets.

Both these conditions will be created with the development of an efficient labour force. As efficiency increases, costs of production will be reduced and the purchasing power of the nation increased.

In the same process the climate will have been created which will enable the country to raise the large sums required for public works and services.

The Party will develop an efficient labour force by measures in two main channels:—

(a) by removing the industrial colour bar.

(b) by providing greatly increased educational facilities, particularly for technical and industrial training.

The Party will encourage industry by all measures open to government, including the fostering of efficiency and expansion by sound fiscal policies, a rational protection of developing industries, and special tax remissions for such projects as the training of workers within industry.

The international goodwill generated by the adoption of the Party's policy will lead to the loan, grant or investment of those large sums which are required for the capital projects the Federation urgently needs and which it is not now receiving. Such projects include housing, hospitals, schools, technical training establishments, transport and power.

This policy will raise the standard and lower the cost of living of the whole community; it will create substantial internal markets and will enable industries for both internal consumption and export to complete successfully with overseas manufacturers.

The Party will maintain close liaison with the territorial governments and will ensure in its Federal economic and fiscal policies that it serves their best interests.

6. Financial

The Party's financial policy will aim at attracting capital from outside sources for the essential development of the Federation. To achieve this, income tax will be maintained at the lowest possible level required to provide sufficient funds for the purposes of good and economic government.

The Party will aim at the abolition of super tax and undistributed profits tax, which are deterrents to investors and to enterprise generally.

The Party recognises that the present division of income between the Federal and Territorial Governments requires revision, largely because the methods of raising revenue which are available to the Territorial Governments are unsatisfactory. An amendment to the Constitution will, therefore, be sought in order to make the division of income more rational and to enable the Territorial Governments to impose taxes in a more equitable manner than they can at present.

7. Education

The Party accepts the principle that every person should have the right to a free primary and secondary or technical education of the kind for which his talents fit him and the Party undertakes to implement this principle as rapidly as finances permit.

The control of education should not be divided as between the education of Africans and the education of non-Africans. The Party will investigate the possibility of setting up an education commission independent of but financed by the four governments, and comprising representatives of the four government education departments and of those Churches that are working extensively in the educational field.

The Party pledges its support to the continued growth and development of the University College of Rhodesia and Nyasaland as a free and independent institution in accordance with the best traditions of British universities.

8. Health

The Party favours the establishment of a Health Corporation in close consultation with the medical profession and other professional bodies directly concerned. This corporation would be independent of government control. It would co-ordinate the activities of the medical aid societies, the Workman's Compensation machinery and other beneficial services; and by thus creating a single comprehensive insurance scheme it would ensure increased benefits for the same contributions.

Every member of the population whose income exceeds a given minimum would contribute a specified amount, but contributors would at their option be able to pay higher contributions and thereby receive higher benefits.

For those of all races whose incomes are less than the given minimum, medical services and hospitalisation will be provided free.

The Party is deeply concerned by the standard of treatment and training in hospitals and will give these problems intensive attention in the light of the findings of the Commission of Inquiry which was established in 1959 in response to the criticism made by the medical profession and other interested bodies.

It believes that private wards, on appropriate payment, should be made available to all.

9. Agriculture

The present division in administration as between European and African agriculture will become increasingly illogical as the practice of agriculture by Africans is modernised. The Party recognises that there are a number of obstacles to unification at the present time, and will oppose the placing of African agriculture under the Federal Government without the freely expressed consent of the inhabitants of the territories. Subject to this proviso the Party will strive towards a system of administration under which the three territories, each with its European and its African agriculture, is treated as a unit.

Even while the systems are separate, they are complementary. A most necessary step, for instance, is the co-ordination of marketing and the achievement of a high standard of production from both European and African farmers.

The Party will actively foster progress in these directions, in co-operation with the recognised representative organisations.

The Party recognises the importance of scientific research both for primary production and for secondary industries processing agricultural raw materials.

10. Transport and Communications

A first-class system of transport and communications is essential for the development and expansion of the industrial, commercial and agricultural economy of the country.

It is the function of government to provide services which will attract industry and keep the cost of living to a minimum, and one of those services is speedy and efficient transport for raw materials and finished goods at economic rates.

Rail and Road Transport

The uneconomic operation of the Rhodesia Railways, which the Party considers is due to inadequate planning and inefficient and top-heavy administration, is a matter of the deepest concern. The Railways represent an important factor in the cost-of-living index of the country, and the Party's government would maintain a close and detailed control of expenditure and working, costing and administration.

In order to promote maximum efficiency and productivity of the Railways' labour force, the Party will introduce into the legislation governing the Railways the same principles of industrial conciliation on a non-racial basis as those recently adopted in Southern Rhodesia in the latest Industrial Conciliation Act.

The Party recognises the value to the national economy of private transport undertakings and will encourage them as part of an overall aim to provide the country with cheap and efficient services.

The Party considers that road communications with Nyasaland are entirely inadequate, and will give high priority to a main road to that territory.

Water Transport

With the completion of the Kariba Dam, the possibility becomes a real one that the Zambesi can be made navigable. The Party proposes to confer with the government of Portuguese East Africa and fully investigate this possibility.

The Party promises full scale development of Lake Nyasa and the services thereon.

Tele-communications

The Party believes that tele-communications can and should be made self-supporting services. The Federation, as a modern developing state, should be equipped with the most modern systems of radio-communications for telephone and telegraph.

The Party will examine the possibility of transferring the tele-communication services of the Federation to the control of a statutory commission, and so enable them to develop free from the limitations imposed by year-to-year budgeting for development funds.

11. Defence and Internal Security

The Party will provide, within the framework of Commonwealth defence requirements, mobile ground forces combined with self-contained air striking units for the defence of the Federation, and to contribute to the needs of Commonwealth and allied countries.

It will also ensure that the training, calibre, numbers and mobility of the armed forces are adequate to deal with any unlawful attempts to disrupt internal peace.

The Party believes that compulsory military training should not be confined to a section of the community, and will consider ways and means of providing trained regular and territorial armed forces, according to the needs of the country, on a non-racial basis.

12. Information

The Party will ensure that accurate information on the Federation is readily available both inside and outside the country and believes that a complete revision of the functions of the Federal information and public relations services is required.

13. Immigration

The Party categorically rejects any policy of immigration designed merely to increase the numerical strength of any one race but accepts that the economic expansion of the Federation requires the immigration of those persons who can provide the skills, knowledge or capital which the Federation needs for its own expansion but cannot itself provide.

14. Tourism

The Party will promote and maintain a continuous campaign to stimulate tourist traffic to the Federation, and in particular will co-operate with travel organisations and airways corporations to publicise the national tourist attractions.

The Party will do all in its power to encourage residents in the Federation to get to know their own country; for this purpose it will construct more rest camps at places of national interest and make them available to sight-seers and holiday-makers of all races.

Financial encouragement will be given for the establishment of publicity associations to provide local information services for visitors.

The Party will simplify border formalities for visitors and will co-operate with adjoining territories in promoting a tourist "through traffic".

CENTRAL AFRICA PARTY—SOUTHERN RHODESIA TERRITORIAL EVIDENCE

I. Introduction

1. That there is need for a drastic revision of the Federal Constitution is very apparent. The causes of the opposition to the present regime are not far to seek and stem largely from a profound dislike and distrust of Southern Rhodesia which has recently been expressed very forcibly by the peoples of the two Northern Territories. This distrust has been brought about first because of the discriminatory laws and regulations which are in force in that country and by the segregation which is practised there. This, added to the fact that the franchise laws of Southern Rhodesia would seem to ensure that the European electorate would have control of the Government for a very long time, and that in the Federal sphere this same control would be maintained, has caused such dissatisfaction to develop that it may cause the break-up of the Federation.

2. The Central Africa Party is of the opinion that some form of association between the three territories is essential for the proper development of Central Africa and firmly believes that if this association is broken up completely and each of the constituent territories becomes independent, Southern Rhodesia would probably find itself in the worst position of the three. It is therefore of the utmost importance that some way out of the present impasse should be found.

3. It is clear that if any agreement is to be reached between the three territories, Southern Rhodesia will have to make considerable changes, and give practical demonstration that her leaders' support for partnership is not merely lip service.

4. The Central Africa Party believes that there are three main obstacles to a better understanding between the races, obstacles which must be removed if we are to bring about co-operation and harmony. The first is the lack of adequate political representation, which means that the African and other coloured races are not able to express their political views and problems except by means of demonstrations or other anti-democratic methods.

5. The second obstacle is the discriminatory practices embodied in our legislation and municipal regulations and bye-laws. While these exist, while the colour bar continues to humiliate the coloured races and causes incidents which heap on them gratuitous insults, the Northern Territories are not going to look favourably upon an association which makes them fear that similar restrictions may be inflicted upon them.

6. The third obstacle is the system of segregation which divides the country on a racial basis. The primary object of this system was a laudable one, in that it endeavoured to provide for the primitive African land on which he could reside and live undisturbed by any European encroachment. When it was first introduced there was nothing to prevent an African from buying land in a European area but his own area was protected. Later, as European farming developed, it was decided to restrict the Africans' entry into the European area and this was embodied in the Land Apportionment Act. With the rapid increase of the African population the inequity of this Act is becoming more and more apparent. Today we have the situation where two and a half million Africans are asked to reside in an equivalent area to 200,000 Europeans, of whom only approximately 8,000 are landowners. This disparity between the two is even more marked when it is realised that the bulk of the land in the African areas is very low in fertility, and much of it is in tsetse-fly country, whereas the European area is mainly in the healthy tableland of the country.

7. It is clear that to bring about such fundamental changes as would be necessary to remove these discriminations from the country great objections would be made by those in control, but the Central Africa Party believes that whether we remain in the Federation or not these disparities will have to go if we are going to be able to live in harmony with one another, and it would be far better to remove them voluntarily than to have their removal forced upon us.

8. At a Congress held on March 12th and 13th, the Party adopted as its policy that simple literacy in English should be the qualification necessary to gain a vote. The repeal of all discriminatory laws and regulations was also accepted as a part of its policy, and, finally, the repeal of the Land Apportionment Act. In regard to the latter the areas of the country known as Native Reserves are provided for in the Constitution and Letters Patent of the Colony and therefore could not be touched. This would enable all those who still lived under a tribal system to be protected but all other areas such as the Native Purchase Areas and the Special Native Areas and the European areas would be available for sale and purchase by anyone who wished to. In order to protect those who occupy or lease land in the native areas from exploitation by unscrupulous persons it is recommended that these occupiers or lessees should be given an option of purchase to acquire such land for a prescribed period to enable them to raise the money to buy it if they want to.

9. The result of these policies being introduced must mean that ultimately there must be an African majority in the Territorial Assembly and in order to allay the fears of any minorities that they may in their turn be discriminated against it will be necessary to entrench in the Constitution a Bill of Rights, and also a clause to protect minority groups. Such protection would be of little account if the Constitution were capable of amendment as a result of political jugglery, as has happened to the Senate in the Union of South Africa. It is therefore of the greatest importance that the constitutional lawyers should give this matter their very close attention.

10. It is obvious that whatever happens the time must come when the African people will have a majority on the voters' roll of Southern Rhodesia and indeed on the Federal roll as well. The question is whether it is better for the European to retain political control until forced to give way or for plans to be made now for the gradual political advancement of the African so that when the time comes and he does have this majority, his experience of political life will have fitted him for the assumption of that control. From figures which have been obtained from official sources it can be proved that even with as low a qualification as literacy in English the number of Africans who could qualify are still materially less than the present number of Europeans on the voters' roll. When it is appreciated that at this moment there are as many as 20,000 or 30,000 Europeans not on the roll but who qualify for registration, it can be seen that there need be no fear of the European control being jeopardised at the moment.

11. In any case it has been proved over and over again that the greatest cause of disturbance or unrest is due to the unenfranchised peoples. As soon as a person has a vote he or she is prepared to fight for his rights in a democratic way, and that is what would take place in Southern Rhodesia.

II. The Political Disabilities of Africans

12. The African population of Southern Rhodesia suffer from many disabilities affecting their participation in normal political activities. If these disabilities were removed—and most of them can be—there would be far less of a tendency for moderate African opinion to participate in mass movements such as the African National Congress. As many Africans are highly politically conscious, they would much prefer to play their part in the normal political parties provided that there was some hope of their opinions being listened to, which is not the case at the moment.

13. It is estimated that under the present Southern Rhodesia common voters' roll, there are 17,000 Africans who qualify; of these, only 2,074 have enrolled. The reason for this is usually ascribed by European politicians to apathy. If Africans were apathetic, would the A.N.C. ever have achieved the strength it did or the National Democratic Party the support it is so quickly achieving? The real reasons are to be found in the regulations governing the enrolment of voters.

14. First, rural Africans can only enrol in front of the Native Commissioner or a Police Sergeant, as distance prevents them visiting a Magistrate's Court or the Registration Office in Salisbury. It is often the case that there are long queues at the Native Commissioner's office and lengthy waits are inevitable. Further, the Police and Native Commissioners are associated in people's minds with trouble. As a registering officer has said, guilty consciences stop many potential voters from registering. By this, he meant association with trouble. This should not be so and is not so with enrolment on the Federal roll which can also be done before a Justice of the Peace or a Commissioner of Oaths. These latter are not controlled by the Government and can be brought to where potential voters wish to register. Neither are they associated in people's minds with the forces of law and order, which, since the emergency of 1959, tend to be associated with thoughts of repressive action. It is therefore considered that the Southern Rhodesia regulations should be brought in line with practice in the Federal sphere.

15. The question of taking registering officers into the rural areas referred to above is a matter the Party has so far failed to solve. Some Native Commissioners periodically tour their districts and are available to applicants. Others do not do so. It is believed that it was the intention of the Act that registering officers themselves should be available to tour when required, but the only application the Party has made, was refused on the grounds of unjustified expense. It is the Party's opinion that this attitude is indefensible and that the regulations should specify the Government's responsibility clearly.

16. There are many other interpretations of the regulations which deter Africans from enrolling—oral evidence will be given on this subject.

17. It is generally recognised by Africans that the Federal B roll is a political swindle (see our Federal evidence) and they are therefore generally not prepared to enrol. However, it is the practice to enrol automatically on the Federal roll those who qualify, when they apply to enrol on the Southern Rhodesia roll. The reverse is not the case. A series of advertisements is being put in the African press encouraging people to enrol, although it is not stated that it is in fact put in by the Federal Government for enrolment on the Federal roll and is very misleading. The confusion engendered by these and other perhaps intentional practices causes people to refrain from enrolling at all, especially when allied to the slogan, "Federation means a happy future for everyone".

18. We have already referred to the fear amongst Africans that the forces of law and order are repressive following the 1959 emergency when people were arrested for offences which were legal at the time they were committed. At nearly all Central Africa Party meetings with Africans, the question is asked: "If we join your Party, will we be arrested?" This very real fear has prevented Africans from participating in normal political activity. Even those who do, are prevented from having meetings by municipal bye-laws or deterred by obstacles put in their way by government servants and regulations. It is quite impossible in any African area to have a political meeting without advance approval—this is not so in European areas.

19. Finally, owing to economic factors, the majority of the real leaders of African opinion are in government service, either as civil servants (which includes messenger grades) or as teachers. All government employees except temporary grades, are debarred completely from any political activity. Teachers are in a somewhat better position as they are allowed to join political parties and attend meetings, but they are not allowed to take office or to ask questions at meetings. It is not our intention to advocate complete political freedom of speech at all times and in all places for civil servants or teachers, but it is felt that by depriving the Africans of nearly all their educated political leaders, active encouragement is being given to less educated, less responsible so-called leaders.

20. It is estimated that there are today 25,000 Africans over 21 years of age, who have passed Standard VI in their education. Of this number, 12,000 are teachers, perhaps 1,500 in Government employment, 2,000 in the B.S.A. Police and an unknown number in the armed forces. So at least 65% of the educated Africans are immediately debarred from taking any part in political leadership. Assuming that literacy in English is essential to all those taking active part in politics, this leaves only 0.36 per cent of all Africans in Southern Rhodesia who can do so.

21. It is therefore considered that temporary amendments should be made to the Public Services Act and to the Unified African Teachers Scheme to allow the lower grades of government employees and all African school teachers to take an active part in politics provided that this is done outside their working hours.

III. Discriminatory Legislation

Introductory

22. There are a great many Southern Rhodesian Statutes which contain provisions which discriminate against the non-European, particularly the African, sections of the population (and a few which discriminate against the European section). There are also numerous local authority bye-laws and statutory regulations which are racially discriminatory. Some of these laws were justified at the time when they were passed; very few are fair, or serve any useful purpose, today.

23. It is obviously unjust to impose disabilities on a particular racial group unless there are cogent reasons of public interest for so doing, the onus of establishing which should rest on those alleging such reasons. Accordingly, this memorandum will contain little argument on the undesirability of unfairness of the discriminatory laws which it mentions. Most of them speak for themselves.

24. The examination of the discriminatory laws of Southern Rhodesia is relevant to the Commission's inquiries because:—

(1) One of the objects contained in the preamble of the Constitution of 1953 is "partnership" between the races. Such partnership cannot be achieved as long as people in Southern Rhodesia suffer disabilities because of their race.

(2) Proposals will be made to the Commission that a Bill of Rights should be added to the Federal Constitution, or for some form of entrenchment of fundamental rights. The extent to which people in Southern Rhodesia are deprived of fundamental rights by racially discriminatory legislation is evidence of the need for such constitutional safeguards.

(3) The hostility of the Africans of Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia to Federation is to some extent the result of their hostility to the racial discrimination practised in Southern Rhodesia. The removal of this discrimination would correspondingly lessen that hostility.

Land

25. Under the Land Apportionment Act, 1941, the Country's land is allocated as follows:—

Africans (population: 2,630,000)	41,878,000 acres
Non-Africans (population: 230,000)	47,989,000 acres
Forest land	4,000,000 acres
Game reserves and national parks	3,000,000 acres
Undetermined land	57,000 acres

26. The broad effect of the Act is to prohibit any non-African from owning or occupying land in the African areas (with exceptions), and any African from owning or occupying any land in the non-African areas (with exceptions). The result is that approximately half the available land is set aside for the use of approximately 1/12 of the population. Moreover all the towns are in the European areas (where indeed Africans may reside, but with very limited rights of occupation). Much of the African areas has poor soil and low rainfall, and some is in tsetse-fly country. On the other hand most of the European area has more fertile soil.

27. Apart from the fact that land segregation is inconsistent with the concept of partnership, the division of land is clearly unfair on the African section of the population. In the rural areas, the African areas are overcrowded and will become more so as time passes, while much European land is undeveloped. In the urban areas, the Act, supplemented by other legislation, is no longer in keeping with actual conditions. Many thousands of Africans are permanently settled in the towns in the same way as Europeans, but, because of the Act, without any real security of tenure, or any absolute right to remain there. (In this connection the Commission is referred to the Report of the Urban African Affairs Commission, 1958, particularly at Pp. 20 to 46).

28. There is some measure of protection afforded to Africans by the Land Apportionment Act in that the less advanced among them who are not yet integrated into the modern economy, or able to compete on equal terms in that economy, have rural land available to them free of the danger of European encroachment. This kind of protection will remain necessary for some time. Of the 42 million odd acres of African land, some 21 million acres are set aside for exclusive African occupation by the Southern Rhodesian Constitution. African rights in this land could be preserved while for the rest land segregation is abolished.

29. For useful background information on the land question in Southern Rhodesia, the Commission is referred to: "Agricultural Policy in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. Report to the Federal Minister of Agriculture by the Federal Standing Committee on Agriculture Production in collaboration with Professor Sir Frank Engledow, C.M.G., F.R.S." G.P. & S. The Central Africa Party does not necessarily agree with all the views and recommendations contained in these reports.

The Pass Laws

30. The various pass laws impose numerous disabilities on the African population, subjecting them to a stringent system of administrative control over their residence and movement. The statutes which form the basis of the pass laws are the following:—

1. Natives (Registration and Identification) Act, 1957.

2. Natives Urban Locations Act (Chapter 84).
3. Natives Registration Act (Chapter 76).
4. Natives (Urban Areas) Accommodation and Registration Act, 1951.

31. The Natives (Registration and Identification) Act is of application in urban and rural areas. It requires every male African to register on reaching the age of 16, and requires him thereafter to be in possession of and carry a certificate of registration. (Provision is made for the exemption of certain Africans from carrying a certificate of registration. Instead the exempted African must carry an identity card. He is also exempted from certain other disabilities imposed on Africans.)

32. The other three Acts apply only to the urban areas. (For their working the Commission is referred to the Report of the Urban African Affairs Commission Pp. 42-46 and 111-113.)

33. Besides making provision for the accommodation of Africans in urban areas these Acts provide for the following passes which must be carried at different times and in different circumstances:—

- (a) Pass to seek employment. Every African entering the urban area to seek work, or whose employment in the area has terminated, must obtain and carry such a pass. In certain circumstances this pass may be refused him by the municipal official concerned (for example, where he previously failed to find work, or where the official on satisfactory evidence believes that the African has no genuine desire to get work), in which case he will be compelled to leave the urban area.
- (b) Visiting pass, to be obtained and carried by any African visiting the area at night other than to seek work. In certain circumstances this pass may be refused him.
- (c) Certificate of Service, which contains particulars of the African's employment in the urban area, and must be carried about with him. It serves as a record of the contract of service, and is to some extent intended as a protection to the African employee.
- (d) Certificate of self-employment, which must be obtained and carried by an African who is self-employed. This is issued by the official concerned in his discretion if he is satisfied that the applicant is a fit and proper person. It is an offence for an African to carry on business on his own account without such a certificate, so that a man's right to choose his own calling may be subject to administrative decision.

34. The Acts make it an offence for an African to be found in the urban area at night without one or other of the above passes, and on conviction he may be expelled from the urban area for a period of up to six months. It is also an offence for an African to be found at night in the urban area without a written permit from his employer or the superintendent of a native urban area. (Under a recent amendment the extent of the curfew hours in each urban area will be determined by the Minister in consultation with the local authority concerned.)

35. The Acts and regulations under it also provide for the compulsory vaccination, medical examination and finger-printing of Africans residing in or visiting the urban areas.

36. These Acts impose a system of control over the African population to which non-Africans are not subject. Their personal freedom is hampered by their continuous duty to carry some pass or another, or if they do not have such a pass, not to be in or move in certain areas at all. Their right to remain in the towns is subject to administrative discretion and control. Such a system is obviously inconsistent with traditional ideas of personal liberty, and while it continues the African people (11/12 of the population) cannot feel themselves full citizens of their own country.

37. Such a system needs the clearest justification. The Commission is referred to the Report of the Urban African Affairs Commission (pp. 42-46 and 111-113), where some of the arguments advanced in favour of the system are examined. As far as the urban areas are concerned (with which only the Commission was concerned), it concluded, both on principle and because of the ineffectiveness of the system in achieving its objects, that the whole system of control should be abolished, except for the compulsory registration of contracts of service, and the certificate of service.

Other Examples of Laws Inconsistent with Traditional Notions of Personal Liberty

38. (1) The Native Affairs Act (Chapter 72) provides that no African shall move from one district to another without the consent of the Native Commissioners of both districts.

(2) The Migrant Workers' Act, 1948, prohibits Africans from going to Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland without the prescribed pass or permit.

(3) Regulations restrict the holding of public meetings in African areas without a permit.

(4) The Native Affairs Act makes it an offence for an African to be guilty of insolent or contemptuous behaviour towards any government official, chief, headman or head of kraal.

(5) The Native Affairs Act provides that all Africans shall promptly obey and comply with any lawful or reasonable order, request or direction of any headman, chief, Native Commissioner or other officer administering native affairs.

(6) The Native Juveniles Employment Act (Chapter 89) empowers a Native Commissioner to order the summary whipping of an African male juvenile who disobeys his orders.

(7) The same Act empowers a Native Commissioner in certain circumstances to contract an African juvenile into service.

(8) The Native Labour Regulations Act (Chapter 86) empowers an Inspector of Native Labourers to impose a summary fine on labourers he finds to be guilty of breaches of discipline.

(9) The Immorality and Indecency Suppression Act (Chapter 36) makes it an offence (for both parties) for an African man to have illicit intercourse with a white woman.

Penal Sanctions Imposed on Africans for what are normally regarded as only Civil Breaches of Contract or Civil Wrongs

39. There are a number of instances where acts performed by Africans are criminally punishable where they are not so punishable if performed by non-Africans. Examples are:—

(1) The Natives (Registration and Identification) Act, 1957, makes it an offence for an African to enter a contract of service while already under contract of employment with another employer. It is also an offence for a person to employ an African in such circumstances.

(2) The Native Labour Regulations Act (Chapter 86) makes it an offence for an African labourer to desert or absent himself from his employment, or to fail to enter on or carry out the terms of his contract, or unlawfully do or omit to do anything which causes or is likely to cause injury to person or property. (The Masters and Servants Act (Chapter 231) contains similar provisions and is applicable to persons of all races. But in practice it is mostly Africans who come within its scope, since it is restricted to persons doing domestic or manual labour, but excluding skilled workmen.)

(These Acts also contain provisions designed to protect African employees as against their employers.)

(3) The Natives (Registration and Identification) Act makes it an offence for any African to trespass on the property of any other person, unless he is in his employment, or has his permission, or unless he is seeking work at a reasonable time, or has other reasonable excuse. (A clause in the Police Offences Act, which applies to all races, only makes it an offence to trespass after the trespasser has been ordered to leave the premises and fails to do so.)

The Police

40. Under the Police Regulations, 1956, non-European policemen occupy an inferior status in the Police Force. A clause in the Regulations states, "All European members shall take preference over non-European members". The conditions of service discriminate against the non-European member in respect of rank and promotion (the highest rank open to a non-European is Station Sergeant), pay and allowances, leave conditions, pensions and in other respects.

Local Government

41. Local authority bye-laws and regulations contain numerous discriminatory provisions.

The effect of the Municipal and other local authorities Acts, and the Acts dealing with Africans in the urban areas, is to exclude Africans from urban local government, or any effective control over their own affairs there.

Miscellaneous Examples of Discriminatory Laws

42. (1) The Liquor Act, 1953, and the Native Beer Act, 1953, discriminate against Africans in respect of the kinds of liquor they may consume, the sources from which they may obtain liquor, and the places where they may drink it.

(2) The Firearms Act, 1956, restricts the possession of firearms and ammunition by non-Europeans, and the Possession of Explosives (Natives and Asiatics) Act restricts their possession of explosives.

(3) The Native Tax Act (Chapter 78) imposes a poll tax on every adult male of £2 per year. It is a criminal offence to fail to pay such tax. (Africans are also subject to the ordinary Federal Income Tax Laws.)

(4) The Children's Protection and Adoption Act, 1949. That part of the Act relating to the care of "protected" infants (those living apart from their parents or guardians) does not apply to African children. Also no adoption order can be made where either party is an African.

(5) The Entertainments Control and Censorship Regulations make special and different provision for Africans.

(6) The Migrant Workers' Act, 1948 and the Foreign Migratory Labour Act, 1958, contain special provisions relating to non-indigenous Africans.

(7) The Native Labour Supply Commission Act, 1956, sets up a Native Labour Supply Commission whose main object is the recruitment and supply of African labour to employers. The Native Labour Regulations Act, (Chapter 86) provides for the licensing and control of persons engaged in the recruitment of African labour.

(8) Certain archaic discriminatory laws still remain on the Statute Book, for example the Supply of Assagais to Natives Prohibition Act (Chapter 96) and the Settlement of Colonial Natives in Native Kraals Prohibition Act (Chapter 95).

Conclusion

43. The above is not an exhaustive list of the discriminatory laws of Southern Rhodesia. There are other Acts besides those mentioned which contain discriminatory provisions, and besides there are numerous regulations and other subsidiary legislation which are discriminatory. Moreover, because European education and agriculture are Federal functions and African education and agriculture territorial, there is considerably different treatment of the races in these respects.

44. The total effect of these discriminatory laws, especially the Native Affairs Act and the Acts dealing with Africans in the urban areas, is to establish a separate system of government for Africans within the ordinary government of the country, the latter being regarded as mainly concerned with European affairs. The separate system of government to which Africans are subject works largely through the control and discretion of officials of the Native Affairs Department and its sub-departments, and of the local authorities. There is thus a divided system—normal democratic government mainly for Europeans, and executive and administrative control for Africans.

45. The reasons behind these discriminatory laws are various. A few forms of discrimination arise from genuine difficulties in the way of equal treatment (for example the discrimination under the Children's Protection and Adoption Act). Some forms of discrimination create or preserve privilege for the European section of the population (notably the Land Apportionment Act). For the rest an examination of the provisions of the various discriminatory laws seems to reveal a belief that the Africans must be subjected to disabilities and control (and sometimes protection) in the general and particularly the European interest by reason of their alleged primitiveness and ignorance, tendency to violence, inclination to drunkenness, unhygienic habits, idleness and incompetence.

46. Whatever the reasons behind these laws, and it should be remembered that most of them were introduced at a time when the African population was on the whole much less advanced than now, they are clearly inconsistent with the idea of partnership. So long as they remain, the African people will be second-class citizens, and no common patriotism, or genuine racial harmony, will be achieved.

47. It is true that in recent years certain forms of discrimination have been removed or relaxed, for example by the new Industrial Conciliation Act, Apprenticeship Act and Workmen's Compensation Act in the field of labour, minor relaxations in the pass laws, the liquor laws and the Land Apportionment Act, and the removal of discrimination in the sphere of gambling. Legislation for a non-racial civil service has been promised. But the main body of discriminatory laws remain.

48. The only authority which has the power to abolish these discriminatory laws is the Southern Rhodesia Legislative Assembly. The United Kingdom and Federal Parliaments cannot do so. But the Commission is concerned with the achievement of the objects contained in the 1953 Constitution and Preamble, and it is therefore submitted that it is open to the Commission, and would be desirable for the Commission, to point out in its Report:—

1. That the said objects cannot be fully attained while racially discriminatory laws exist in Southern Rhodesia;
2. That it would therefore be undesirable for the Federation to be granted increased status or powers until this discrimination is abolished;
3. That accordingly the Southern Rhodesia Government should repeal its discriminatory laws if it desires that the Federation should gain increased status and powers; and
4. That African hostility to Federation in the two northern territories will not be removed until the discriminatory laws of Southern Rhodesia are abolished.

IV. Internal Security Background and Principles

Good Government necessarily means enforcement of laws which are for the benefit of the majority of the people. The more popular the Government—in its widest sense—the less coercion is required. Conversely, the less sympathy and interest in Government policy by the people, the greater the enforcement necessary. The degree of force required is, therefore, a direct indication of how much faith the people have in their "governors".

The police are the agents of government, specifically charged with law enforcement, and internal security. In turn, they bring wrongdoers to the Courts for the administration of justice. Ordinarily, this process is required to deal with individuals or minorities who transgress the law of the majority, and the degree of force required is sufficient to deal with relatively small numbers.

As soon as the available force becomes inadequate as a result of the numbers to be dealt with, it is a clear indication that the desire of the majority is being ignored. The use of troops or the abandonment of the processes of justice are clearly manifestations that the Government in power is endeavouring to force its will against the wishes of the people.

The only justification for the use of armed forces in aid of the civil power is when:—

- (a) A concentration of a minority group temporarily exceeds the local police strength.
- (b) Brutal or violent behaviour endangers the life and property of law-abiding citizens.
- (c) It is necessary to defend National Facilities and Installations in certain circumstances. This does not include their use in aggressive role as armed "policemen".
- (d) The masses ignore the process of democracy which provides machinery for the change in laws and/or the persons elected to govern. This condition is most unlikely when the Government themselves do not ignore the same democratic processes. Mass insurrection is only resorted to by desperate people who have little to lose and much to gain by such action.
- (e) National non-violent emergency, e.g. earthquake, when the organisation and equipment of the armed forces can be used in a benign capacity.

Apart from circumstances noted above, the armed forces should only be used when civil power has lost control either locally or in toto to the extent that order can only be restored by killing.

Police Forces

The Police should not be armed as their role does not require weapons except for self-protection. If they are, they become feared by the public as are the "strong-arm squads" (the mobile units) of the Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland police.

The Police must be strong enough to enforce the law strictly but fairly, maintaining the confidence of the people at all times.

The present strength of the regular police would appear to be adequate, but police reserves drawn from all races are not sufficient. The present policy of using Europeans only with a smattering of pensioned African policemen denies the law-abiding African the opportunity of fulfilling a civic duty. There are ample Africans who are trustworthy enough to enrol in this reserve force, in fact such confidence in them would make them even more proud to demonstrate their reliability.

Killing to policemen is anathema except in extreme cases of self-defence.

Federal Co-ordination Territorial Police Forces

With local traditions, native law and customs, and differences in legislation, this is best left under the present system of territorial responsibility. In any case African opinion will never tolerate a Federal force.

The policy of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, based on the policing problems of the earlier part of the century, is open to question.

There is, therefore, a case for a Federal inspectorship and some co-ordination of policy, but this would have to be carefully worked out.

Criminal Investigation

There is much more of a case for some Federal responsibility in criminal investigation. It is recommended that the American system should be explored.

Special Branch

With the undoubted suspicion at present existing between Federal and Territorial Governments, the present system of territorial Special Branches (though Southern Rhodesia has none) with a Federal liaison bureau, is open to question. If, however, the principle of territorial responsibility for police security is conceded, it is probably best left as it is.

Nevertheless, it is a very difficult problem since it depends so much on mutual trust, and it is of great importance that the Federal Government should be fully and accurately briefed in any matters subversive to authority. Should any Government withhold information it could be very awkward.

Reserves

If the principle that law and order is a police responsibility is conceded, and that it is vital to avoid bloodshed and riot, the question of reserves is of great importance.

The comparatively innocuous incidents in Nyasaland in March, 1959, clearly demonstrated the manpower needs.

It is important that police reserves should embrace all races; only thus can all be given a direct share of responsibility in maintaining law and order.

It is logical, therefore, to conclude that some compulsory training of young men irrespective of race should be on police lines rather than on the present system of purely army training for Europeans, Asiatics, Coloureds and Eurafrians only.

V. The Southern Rhodesian Emergency

Introduction

The question of the success of Southern Rhodesian policies has assumed, as a result of Sir Edgar Whitehead's press conference on Friday, 21st January, a Federal as well as a territorial significance. It has long been claimed that the principles of Southern Rhodesian Government which may be briefly defined as "partnership" and "the maintenance of civilised standards" have created a prosperous, just and stable society in the territory, and these claims have recently been endorsed by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Colonial Secretary, Dr. Reginald Bennett, M.P., who described Southern Rhodesians as "very peaceful and contented with no suppressed tensions". It is now claimed that these principles are of wider application, that they provide a "middle way" between African and European nationalism, and that they should be applied to the Federation as a whole. Indeed, Sir Edgar Whitehead has gone so far as to say that Southern Rhodesia could not remain within a Federation which did not recognise the primacy of these principles. The Federal Government must, he has said, remain in "civilised hands" and the principles of "partnership" must be safeguarded by the prevention of governments in the North "operated by African nationalists on a nationalist basis".

It is important, therefore, that the Southern Rhodesian claim should be examined. It may well be thought, of course, that no matter how successful the principles of civilised standards and partnership are in Southern Rhodesia, their application to the Federation as a whole would be inadvisable because of the different conditions in the other territories or because of the evidently justified suspicion in the North that Southern Rhodesia wishes to export her way of life. But fundamentally the Southern Rhodesian claim needs to be examined on its home ground. Have these principles really produced a stable society in Southern Rhodesia? In particular has the principle of partnership really provided enough satisfaction to each race to prevent the growth of African and European nationalism and has attention paid to the maintenance of civilised standards really meant that the basic principles of sound law and good government have been preserved?

Relevance of the Southern Rhodesian Emergency

We believe that a study of the Southern Rhodesian emergency, which was declared in February, 1959, the events which led up to it and the consequences which sprang from it, will provide some of the answers to these questions. It is our contention that the Southern Rhodesian emergency shows:

- (a) That there is widespread and deepseated discontent among Southern Rhodesian Africans—in other words that partnership has failed.
- (b) That the Government is unable to preserve the principles of sound law or good government in its efforts to deal with this discontent—in other words, civilised standards are not being maintained.
- (c) That if the same methods of handling African discontent were to be employed elsewhere in the Federation the result would be disastrous rather than beneficial.

The Case of the Southern Rhodesian Government on the Emergency

The Southern Rhodesian Government makes the following claims about the emergency:—

- (a) The emergency was necessary to prevent the breakdown of the Southern Rhodesian experiment in partnership and the Southern Rhodesian maintenance of standards;
- (b) The threat to the experiment did not come, however, from a massive popular discontent but from a small number of "agitators";

(c) The emergency was handled in such a way as to demonstrate the efficiency of Southern Rhodesian Government and in such a way as not to impair the principles of sound justice and good government.

(d) That as the result of the emergency the conditions for the success of the experiment are more prosperous than they were before.

It will be seen that our view contradicts that of the Southern Rhodesian Government at every point. We do not think that the emergency was necessary although we think that African discontent was much more formidable than the schemings of a few agitators; we do not believe that the handling of the emergency demonstrated efficiency or left untouched law and good government; we believe that the consequences of the emergency have been profound and perhaps disastrous. In the narrative which follows we attempt to explain why we believe this.

Background to the Emergency

(1) The Formation of Congress

The Southern Rhodesian emergency was directed at the Southern Rhodesian African National Congress and the men arrested were all men thought to be office-bearers or members of Congress.

The Southern Rhodesian African National Congress was formed on Occupation Day, 1957. Its formation was the result of the amalgamation of two organisations—the Salisbury Youth League and the remnants of the old Congress in Bulawayo. The Congress adopted a statement of principles and a constitution which we append to this memorandum. In line with these documents speeches at the inaugural meeting of Congress laid great stress upon multi-racialism and co-operation. Congress was addressed by African speakers, by an Indian speaker, by a Coloured speaker and by a European speaker. Subsequently some Europeans, attracted by the apparent moderation of Congress, joined its ranks.

(2) Leadership of Congress

The President of the new Congress was Joshua Nkomo. Mr. Nkomo was a Bulawayo business man. His personal history is interesting and not irrelevant. He was chosen by Sir Godfrey Huggins, now Lord Malvern, to accompany him to the London talks on Federation as a representative of African opinion. Southern Rhodesian African organisations, who were at this point combining to oppose Federation, objected to Nkomo's presence at the talks on the grounds that he was not representative—particularly prominent among the objectors being Isaac Samuriwo, now Dominion Party M.P. in the Federal House, and Charles Mzingeli, the Trade Union leader. Mr. Nkomo, however, found himself in disagreement with certain aspects of the Federal proposals—particularly the lack of definition of the word "partnership"—and left London. Later he returned to England to put the African viewpoint on the Federation issue. Once Federation was agreed, however, Mr. Nkomo accepted the decision and sought the Federal party nomination for the first Federal election. The nomination went to Mr. Hove instead and Mr. Nkomo fought the election as an Independent Federalist, accepting Federation but opposing certain aspects of Federal Party policy. He was defeated but was kept in the public eye by his selection for various government inquiries and commissions. In other words, up to the time of his election as President of the S.R.A.N.C., Joshua Nkomo had a "moderate" record. He was also an established business man in Bulawayo. He could not have been less of an agitator—nor did he fit the pattern of the Government's allegations against Congress leaders after the emergency when it was said that they were men who could not hold down a job nor make good in any other career and men also with criminal records. Mr. Nkomo continued to take a moderate attitude as leader of Congress. He would not join in condemning the Federal structure and he was ready to have informal talks with the then Prime Minister, Mr. Garfield Todd.

The other significant Congress leadership was provided from Salisbury. Mr. Chikerema was elected Vice-President; Mr. Nyandoro was elected Secretary-General; Mr. Mushonga was elected Treasurer. These men were younger than Mr. Nkomo and with a different political reputation, having made their names through the militant Youth League. Mr. Nyandoro was a qualified book-keeper; Mr. Mushonga a trader in Highfields.

(3) Nature of Congress

Congress was not a political party. It did not put up candidates in the one general election in Southern Rhodesia which occurred during its existence. It voted against becoming a party in March, 1958. It was not very interested in persuading Africans to vote. All this did not mean that Congress had decided to work outside the existing political system in order to overthrow it and thereby gain political power. It meant that Congress, for all its political slogans, gave first place to social and economic grievances and sought to present them and to remedy them within the existing system by means of pronouncements, demonstrations, law suits and so on. Congress was in essence a pressure group for certain African interests. This meant that Congress had none of the central and coherent drive of the Nyasaland Congress which was aiming at a specific political goal: Congress was a loose combination of various groups, each of whom was more interested in its own problems than in the over-all political situation. This meant that the significance of Congress in Southern Rhodesia was that it mirrored basic African grievances rather than nationalist political aspirations. In so far as it was strong, its strength was an indication of the existence of these grievances for the expression of which it provided some outlet.

(4) Support of Congress

The novelty of the organisation of Congress lay in its combination of rural and urban support. Previous African political organisations in Southern Rhodesia had been urban-based and closely linked, for instance, with Trade Unionism. The new Congress retained this urban support and this trade union link but added to it widespread support in the Reserves. As far as rural support was concerned, Congress made no secret of the fact that it derived mostly from hostility to the Land Husbandry Act. In those Reserves where the Land Husbandry Act was most resented, Congress was most strong—in Sipolilo, for instance, or Mrewa. (It is no coincidence that so many of the men still restricted or detained come from these rural areas.) The evidence submitted by the Central Africa Party on land problems will indicate clearly the reasons for this hostility to the Land Husbandry Act—which was, of course, really hostility to the Land Apportionment situation as a whole. We will merely say here that Congress was able to exploit this hostility sometimes in ways which taken by themselves and out of the context of the general situation appeared designed to sabotage African rural prosperity. Sometimes, however, Congress was able to expose irregularities and improprieties in the working of the Act and to defeat the government at law. This was the case in Sipolilo when Congress won a case on appeal which not only invalidated most of the implementation of the Act in that area but also throughout the Reserves generally. Congress also issued statements attacking the Land Husbandry Act and calling for the repeal of the Land Apportionment Act in much the same terms as the Central Africa Party is now using.

Congress also found much support in urban areas where many Africans had to face a permanent future now that the Land Husbandry Act had forced them off the land. Urban housing, schooling, wages, the non-recognition of trade unionism, the pass laws, the segregation apparatus—all these were grievances channelled into Congress. Thus Congress enjoyed wide and growing support among the African peasants in the Reserves and among the workers in the town. It also enjoyed the sympathy of “emergent” Africans who resented the colour bar. All these interests were represented but hardly welded into a coherent whole by Congress.

(5) Congress methods

Congress methods were pressure methods. We have already seen that they did not attempt to use political methods proper. Nor did they ever attempt to use localised or general strikes or wide passive resistance campaigns—not because they had rejected them but because their organisation was not adequate to conduct them successfully. Congress, therefore, used haphazard pressure methods. It appealed to the local and overseas public by press statements. It organised protest marches and demonstrations. It organised protest meetings. It took the government to law. It encouraged Africans to stand by their “rights”—in some instances Congress leaders were successfully prosecuted for incitement to disobey legitimate orders or to break laws. Also in the earlier stages Congress leaders made informal approaches to the Government.

(6) The Government and Congress

A wise government, in our contention, would have recognised Congress as a valuable, even if disturbing, indication of deep-felt African grievances and attempted as rapidly as it could to remedy those grievances. This was to some extent the attitude of the government of Mr. Todd, or at any rate of Mr. Todd himself. Mr. Todd felt obliged to “warn” Congress because of the pressure upon him from European public opinion, the Opposition and his own colleagues to take firm action. But he was prepared to meet Nkomo—this forming one of the charges against him at the United Federal Party Congress which elected Sir Edgar Whitehead as leader—and he recognised the force of Nkomo’s plea to him to make concessions which would allow Nkomo to keep the “young men” in control. Mr. Todd was not in a very good position to make such concessions but he held off prosecutions of Congress and tried to move as rapidly as he could towards remedying some of the basic grievances. There followed Mr. Todd’s overthrow and the government of Sir Edgar Whitehead. Immediately there was a change in government policy.

One of the charges against Mr. Todd—which was made by Mr. Quinton, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Native Affairs—at the United Federal Party Congress, was that he aimed to overthrow the Native Affairs Department. Mr. Todd’s own overthrow was, therefore, a victory for the N.A.D. and for those who believed that it understood the rural African and was still capable of handling the situation. One of the inevitable effects of Congress’ activity in the Reserves was that the authority of the N.A.D. was questioned and the N.A.D. was Congress’ bitterest enemy. (It is worth noting that the N.A.D. was upheld with the utmost vigour by the opposition Dominion Party which repeatedly called for the banning of Congress.)

In the view of the N.A.D., Congress was the expression of a few agitators, not of the grievances of the bulk of the African people, and this became the view of the Government. Instead of attempting to remedy the situation revealed by Congress activity, the Government attempted to silence Congress either by bringing cases against them or by restrictions on meetings or by giving new powers to the Native Commissioners. This was merely bottling up discontent.

(7) The failure of partnership

The rise of Congress and its wide support showed that partnership had failed to give sufficient satisfaction to the aspirations of the African people in Southern Rhodesia. One of the targets of Congress attack was, in fact, the concept of “partnership” which they described as hypocritical and as illusory. Whatever the justice of these criticisms it seems clear from the narrative above that the concept of “partnership” had not produced in the Southern Rhodesian Government or in the Southern Rhodesian electorate a sense of the need to pay attention to the partner or to pay attention to his interests. At best, even where it was most sincere, partnership had produced gestures of racial goodwill, irrelevant to the real problems which were worsening instead of improving. At worst, “partnership” disguised a complacency which felt that well-intentioned paternalism on the old model and the continuance of old policies would suffice. Clearly they did not and so far from removing the danger of nationalism this sort of partnership increased it.

(8) The movement of Congress to the left

As a result of the events described above, Congress itself—or more properly certain Congress leaders—began to adopt new lines. At the beginning, as we have seen, Congress, tried to attract European members, adopted a moderate policy, welcomed overtures of government and so on. The fall of Todd changed this. Though Todd could not be recognised by Congress as a “liberal”, his fall was certainly recognised by them as a rejection of liberalism. At a protest meeting in March, 1958, Mr. Nkomo made his most outspoken speech to date when he exclaimed that Europeans were not prepared to accept even the degree of liberalism which Todd represented. Even then, although he realised that Todd’s fall made it likely that the “young men” would capture Congress leadership, Nkomo attempted to take a “reasonable” line. He was firm in refusing to attack Federation as such and consequently in refusing to co-operate with the Northern Congresses. At the Accra Conference, his behaviour led to charges of “multi-racialism” from Nkumbula and Banda. And Nkomo’s stand was supported by many members and sympathisers of Congress right to the end.

But among the other leaders of Congress there was a different feeling. There was no longer any hope of concessions by the Government. Instead there was a threat of constant prosecution and hampering. They feared that they could not hold their followers unless they could show some achievements. Naturally they began to turn to the powerful and successful Congresses in the North for inspiration and assistance. These Congresses were very different from the S.R.A.N.C. They had an over-riding political aim which bound together in a common purpose all their followers. More important still, they faced Colonial Governments upon whom it was not ridiculous to suppose effective pressure could be put. Although they also faced many difficult problems—which are clearly enunciated in the Devlin Report—they had great efficiency and confidence compared with the S.R.A.N.C. and a very much greater degree of political sophistication. A few Congress leaders in Southern Rhodesia were much influenced by the Northern Congresses, especially after the Accra conference, and especially after Dr. Banda had scored an unprecedented popular success in Salisbury with a dramatic speech made there on his way back to Nyasaland from Accra. Greater co-operation between the Congresses was agreed upon and preparations made for meetings between officials. (See the Devlin and Beadle reports.) Meanwhile, Joshua Nkomo was still out of the country, not having returned from Accra, and his influence was no longer felt. Thus some of the younger leaders of Congress had moved far to the left by the beginning of 1959.

(9) The situation in Southern Rhodesia before the emergency

A number of points need to be made to qualify the impression of a rapid and dangerous drift towards violence by Congress. In the first place the number of Congress leaders or members who were actually involved in contacts with the North was very small. Whatever they agreed upon was not published to branch officials; still less was it circulated to ordinary members. There was never anything like the discussion by branches of proposals for action which the Devlin report shows happening in Nyasaland. Nor has there ever been any evidence—certainly there is none in the Beadle report—that instructions were given to a hard core of Congress. Even if some leaders of the S.R.A.N.C. knew of plans for defiance of the law in Nyasaland and even if they gave guarantees that they would stand by the Nyasa Congress, they had no clear plans or expectations in Southern Rhodesia. Even if it is accepted, the Beadle Report gives no more evidence than that there were confused—almost pathetically confused—discussions and day dreams among certain people about what might be done if only In fact, any guarantees given to the Nyasas were worthless and the men involved must have known it.

For the great mass of Congress officials and members in Southern Rhodesia were not only ignorant of these negotiations but would neither have approved of them nor have been able to act upon them if they had known what was happening. We have already said that many members of Congress were loyal to Nkomo's moderate line to the very end. Many more, who were perhaps impatient of Nkomo's caution, were in no sense urging violence. We state categorically that the great majority of Congressmen would have rejected any suggestion of violent action had it been made to them. This, we think, is borne out by the release of so many of the original detainees before the Beadle Tribunal began to hear their cases. In fact there was beginning to grow up in the rural areas a good deal of criticism of the Salisbury Congress leadership on the grounds that money was being wasted in their defence against Government charges. The rural supporters were very little concerned about the wider Federal issues. Moreover many of the rural leaders were men of substance, school masters and storekeepers and clergymen, who stood to lose much and gain nothing from any kind of violence. In the towns, also, "moderate" men who sympathised with Congress aims were alienated by the intolerance and extremism with which they were now expressed.

Finally, every member of Congress if he thought about it at all must have known that Congress could not have organised any effective action against the Government on a national scale, whether it was a general strike or a passive resistance campaign or a rising in arms. The difficulties before any of these courses were immense and Congress was nowhere near organised enough to tackle them. Joshua Nkomo had held, indeed, that Congress would need at least three years before it could even begin to organise strikes or boycotts. Even the radicals in Salisbury, though they were happy to talk as if they could organise a general strike for the benefit of the European population, knew perfectly well that they could not do so.

In January, 1959, the situation was something like this. Congress which was essentially a pressure group for genuine grievances had taken on something of the appearance, but little of the reality, of a conspiracy. A few leaders were in touch with Nyasaland and knew what was planned there. They may themselves have had the idea of calling a strike or a demonstration in sympathy; more likely, that they were willing that the idea that they might be able to do so, should do their work for them and in itself have a diversionary effect. It seems supremely unlikely that they were planning violence as such. They are not fools, as the evidence on violence quoted in the Beadle Tribunal report leads one to suppose. They knew perfectly well that they stood to gain nothing from violence. Nothing was likely to happen that the Southern Rhodesian Government could not control.

(10) The Emergency

There was, then, no need for an emergency in Southern Rhodesia. There had been a profound and serious worsening of the racial situation; the basic problems had not been tackled; the suppressed tensions of Rhodesian society were achieving an alarming intensity. There was every need for anxiety and reappraisal of the success of the policies of the government but there was no need for an emergency. The Government had brought cases against the leaders in the most radical positions and had won them. The police were amply capable of taking care of any trouble there might be and there were the territorials in reserve in the supremely unlikely event of a more serious outbreak. What was needed was a realisation of the real causes of the situation and some concessions to African moderates which would have broken the power of the extremists. Instead, Southern Rhodesia got an emergency and a refusal to admit that anything was wrong.

On February 25th, 1959, an emergency was declared in Southern Rhodesia. Some 500 men and two women were arrested by police and special constables and taken to prison. The S.R.A.N.C. was banned and so also were the Congresses of Nyasaland, Northern Rhodesia and South Africa. Effective censorship of the press was established and special penalties prescribed for the spreading of alarm and despondency. The Southern Rhodesian Reservists had been mobilised prior to the emergency and some of them were standing by in case of need.

(11) Reasons given for the emergency

Many reasons were given at the time of the emergency and many have been given since. In judging them we must remember that the Southern Rhodesian emergency was declared before the Nyasaland emergency and that it was important to conceal the plan for dealing with Nyasaland. It had in fact been decided to send Southern Rhodesian troops North to deal with the Nyasa situation but it would not have been possible to explain the emergency by saying that it was intended to break the Nyasaland demonstrations by using Southern Rhodesian troops and that no chances could be taken while they were out of the country. This may well have been the real reason for the emergency and there are a good many indications that it was the real reason. If it was, we may comment in passing that the emergency provided an admirable example of the sacrifice of Southern Rhodesia's real interests to the desire to dominate Federation. Southern Rhodesia need not have sent troops to Nyasaland; in many people's opinion she should not have done so. But the Federal and Southern Rhodesian Governments wished to show that they could handle the situation without calling on British troops and so the reservists were sent North.

However, Sir Edgar Whitehead had no difficulty whatever in persuading the electorate and the opposition that there were sound internal reasons for the emergency. The Opposition had been urging the Government to ban Congress for several months: the electorate were getting increasingly panicky and nervous and there had been a strike scare in Salisbury, in which many Europeans had rushed to buy guns, only a month before the emergency. The Opposition was ready to believe more than the Government could prove or even wished to assert and called for protection for European farmers as though a second Mau Mau was about to break out. The internal case the Government actually did make was finally summarised in the general charge against Congress presented by the Government to the Beadle Tribunal and found by them substantially correct.

The general charge read as follows:

"The following were the principal objects of active Congress members:—

- (1) To excite disaffection towards the constitution with the object of altering the constitution by unlawful means.
- (2) To excite disobedience and hostility to the laws and lawful authorities of the country.
- (3) To excite racial hostility and disseminate subversive propaganda.
- (4) To coerce the Government by:
 - (a) Demonstrations
 - (b) Processions
 - (c) Strikes.
- (5) To ridicule and undermine the authority of:
 - (a) Native Commissioners
 - (b) Land Development Officers
 - (c) The Chiefs
 - (d) The Police
 - (e) African Members of Parliament.
- (6) To organise boycotts.
- (7) To misinterpret and falsify facts with a view to bringing the Government and Europeans into disrepute.
- (8) To intimidate people to join Congress by threats of boycotting business and threats to life.
- (9) To give out that Congress was more powerful than the Government.
- (10) To co-operate with the Nyasaland African National Congress, the Zambia African National Congress, and the Northern Rhodesian African Congress and to co-ordinate its activities with those other organisations.
- (11) To infiltrate into and obtain control of other African organisations."

In addition to these charges, various others have been made in speeches by Ministers and M.P's. It has been said that Congress was acting on a plan laid at Accra and encouraged by Russian influence. It has been said that Congress was alarmed by the progress of "partnership" and sought to sabotage it before it was too late. Throughout all the Government speeches it has been emphasised that the law as it stood was inadequate to deal with the threats presented by Congress. It has also been emphasised that the men arrested represented only a small minority of self-seeking agitators and that once they have been removed nothing remains to hinder the achievement of the partnership ideal.

We do not, of course, accept either the Government's case for the internal necessity of the emergency or their interpretation of the nature and significance of African opposition. We do not wish to say more on this point except to recommend that the Commission asks to see the evidence given before the Beadle Tribunal and in particular the evidence led by the defence team on the general charge which will, we believe, support our contentions.

(12) The Emergency and "Civilised Standards"

The Southern Rhodesian Government holds that the emergency was undertaken in defence of "civilised standards" of government and society. By "civilised" government they mean efficient government based upon respect for the law; and government which bases its administrative actions upon a respect for the rights and needs of all. Elsewhere, it is recognised, these goods are achieved through the "democratic" system. But in Southern Rhodesia, it is urged, only limitation of representation and responsibility can safeguard them. It has been argued by opponents of this thesis that in fact the limited nature of representation and responsibility has produced grave distortions of these goods. It seems to us that the executive conduct of the emergency and the legislative results of it go far to justify this critical view and that far from safeguarding, the emergency has endangered the principles of sound justice and good government.

We hold, of course, that it is a most serious offence against both sound justice and good government to declare an emergency unless it is absolutely necessary to do so for an emergency by definition suspends the normal processes of law and government. But in addition to this fundamental charge against the Southern Rhodesian Government there are others which can, and have been made by those who feel that the emergency itself was justified. These charges can be divided into two categories: first, those which arise out of the executive handling of the emergency and of the detainees and restrictees; second, those which arise out of the permanent legislation which was enacted during the emergency.

(13) The Conduct of the Emergency

The actual arrest of the 500 detainees on 25th February has been widely praised. The Devlin Report makes favourable reference to it in contrast with the Nyasaland arrests and there has been much satisfaction in the Rhodesian Parliament with the efficiency of the operation as a whole. Nevertheless, there were some serious blemishes. In the first place, the Native Affairs Department and the Police had prepared the list of the men to be arrested. The intention was to round up all Congress office-holders or men supposed to be influential in Congress. In general this was what did happen. But there are two grounds for criticism. One is that far too many people were arrested—that is to say that the police should have known that most of the local Congress officers were in no sense dangerous. Eventually some 400 of them were released before the Beadle Tribunal began its hearings and we may presume that there was found to be no case against them at all, not even the sort of case that could be made to a Tribunal rather than a court of law. This is not merely a question of natural caution on the Government's part: it demonstrates a fundamental misunderstanding of the real situation on the part of those who actually have to administer which is profoundly disturbing.

The second ground for criticism is that among the men arrested were some who were not members of Congress at all. The most outstanding case here was that of Moses Makoni, a cobbler of Mabvuku township and a member of the Central Africa Party. Mr. Makoni was arrested by mistake for someone else but was held in prison for 28 days before the mistake was recognised and he was released. The disturbing part of the business was that Mr. Makoni received no apology for his improper detention and no compensation. Although the matter received some press publicity there was no government statement on the matter and no questions were asked in the Southern Rhodesian House. All this suggested a disregard for individual rights which was hardly compatible with "civilised standards" of government.

But this was of a piece with the treatment of the detainees generally. They were not badly treated as detention goes but they were treated with little regard for their individuality. Their names were not published in the press, for instance, for several weeks. It was not until the 400 had been released and 100 remained for hearings before the Beadle Tribunal that a full list of names was at last released. This made it impossible for any interested persons to discover whether the families of detainees were being adequately cared for or, indeed, whether the men detained were members of Congress or not. Nor was it without significance that Government figures of the number of men detained varied quite considerably from statement to statement.

Meanwhile the Government was setting an example of generalised vilification of these men which was followed by the Press. In his broadcast on 25th February Sir Edgar alleged that they were mostly ne'er-do-wells with criminal records and this was taken up with intemperate language by the press. No proof was ever offered for these allegations made against men who could not defend themselves and who were not to be tried in open court. And although 400 were released and although it has been amply demonstrated that in the great majority of cases the allegations were untrue, no apology has been forthcoming.

All this demonstrated a lack of proper consideration for the elementary rights of the individual. Other aspects of Government policy manifested an equal disregard for the principle of equal treatment. We are thinking here particularly of the offer made to Mr. Clutton Brock that he would be released if he undertook to stay out of the Federation and the actual release of Patrick Matimba on similar conditions. Mr. Matimba was one of the 100 awaiting hearing before the Beadle Tribunal but he was released before the decision of that body, the Government thus making a mockery of the judicial processes it had itself set up.

Again the Government's handling of the welfare of the detainees' families has demonstrated an insufficiently acute sense of the obligations of good government. The principles which should have been followed were these. The most efficient provision should have been made to ensure that the families of men detained were provided with enough money to buy food and necessities and to pay rents. The Government should have taken care to see that the men who were detained—who were not being punished by the Government but merely being detained for the public safety—did not suffer from their detention. Care should have been taken to ensure that insurance policies and hire purchase agreements did not lapse, that the schooling of children was continued, that jobs were returned or found for men released without charges having been laid against them. These principles have not been followed.

In the first place, Government made inadequate provision for the welfare of families. There was no centralised control of the business and its administration was left to individual native commissioners. The result was that the scale of allowances paid varied widely: that some families were not paid allowances for many months: that children were often unable to remain at school and that severe loss was caused to the detainee by the lapse of insurance policies and hire purchase agreements. It was not until 1st January, 1960 that clear instructions were sent out for a consolidated allowance scale and that regularity was at last introduced. (An appendix to this memorandum deals with allowance scales and shows that the new consolidated allowance also has grave defects.) These things are not of minor importance and it is all the more necessary to remark upon them because the government thought that it was making adequate provision by leaving things to the Native Commissioner. This was the Government's normal way of doing things and its complete failure must give rise to considerable doubt about the fitness of governmental machinery to cope with modern African administration. We may note two other things: one, that no Native Commissioner has, as far as we know, received any reprimand for failure to pay allowances to families. The other is the general and inevitable conclusion that in African administration the Southern Rhodesian Government will tolerate a degree of inefficiency and a degree of partiality which it would not for a moment tolerate in European administration and which is incompatible with good Government.

Finally, we must notice in this section the inadmissible policies now being followed by the Government with regard to the detainees and restrictees. The Government should regard these men as held for the convenience of the state. It should not regard them as criminals since it has no warrant by trial and conviction to do so. But it does so regard them. The eight detainees at Selukwe were explicitly being "broken": the restrictees at Gokwe and Lupani are being "rehabilitated". (This question is discussed more fully in an appendix.)

(14) The Emergency Legislation

While the actual executive conduct of the emergency gives little ground for confidence in the efficiency or regard for the individual of Southern Rhodesian administration the legislation enacted during the emergency shows how "civilised standards" could be undermined in an effort to suppress African opposition. Protests were made against this legislation by those who might reasonably be thought of as guardians of "civilised standards": by the Salisbury Bar Council; by the Churches; by the University Staff. Protest was also made by the Central Africa Party, through its leader, Mr. Garfield Todd, and other prominent members; and by one newspaper, the Bulawayo "Chronicle". It is known that the Minister responsible received numerous letters protesting against the legislation. These protests were dismissed by Government, in some cases with an open contempt for legal arguments which moved the Federation's Chief Justice, Sir Robert Tredgold, to make a public protest.

We wish to make only a few points here in addition to the weighty criticisms appended to this memorandum. Thus we would like to point to the generally un-noticed Amendment to the Land Husbandry Act, which retrospectively declared valid the sort of transactions which the Appeal Court had declared invalid in the Sipolilo case—an example of direct action by Government to make its past actions legal. Similarly, we would like to point to the Unlawful Organisations Act which makes membership of Congress on the day it was banned a criminal offence and thus retrospectively makes the past actions of its members illegal. We would also like to point to the very wide protection given to public servants under these Acts from challenge at law. Finally, we would like to point to the limitations upon African political activity contained in the Acts and in particular to the restrictions placed upon the expression of opposition through passive resistance.

It is our contention that the Southern Rhodesian Assembly has shown itself by this legislation no fit guardian of the "civilised standards" of government. It is clear, indeed, that so long as a minority electorate has reason to fear a challenge from the unrepresented majority these standards will be in grave danger.

15 Aftermath of the Emergency

Sir Edgar Whitehead said frequently in his speeches on the emergency that the Government had been given five years' grace in which to tackle the real grievances of the African people and that by the end of that five years there would be no danger of specifically African protest movements or of African "nationalism". It was anticipated by Government that when Congress was banned many Africans, hitherto intimidated by Congress, would come forward to work through the existing system. It was also anticipated that the implementation of the Land Husbandry Act would go forward smoothly.

It must be said frankly that none of these expectations has been proved true. The Government have not yet managed to tackle the real problems and basic conditions have not improved. Moreover far from Africans working within the system to a greater degree and African opposition slackening, the opposite has occurred. The emergency and the consequent legislation and the Beadle Tribunal Report have all alienated "moderate" African opinion and helped to drive it into a position of much more intransigent opposition to Government. Far from working more through the existing parties, Africans are beginning to resign from them and to withdraw from multi-racial groups. Two new African political parties have been founded which are openly or tacitly supported by "moderates". In the Reserves, opposition to the Land Husbandry Act continues. Southern Rhodesia is a country of "suppressed tensions". Since the emergency the failure of the Southern Rhodesian Government to deal with African aspirations has been more and more marked.

16 Conclusion

From all this we draw the conclusion that the principles of Southern Rhodesian Government, which Sir Edgar Whitehead wishes to extend to the Federation as a whole, have been disastrous in application rather than successful. They have concealed the real problems and thus merely irritated African opinion. They have led the Government to misunderstand and mishandle African opposition. They have not enabled the Government to achieve its particular aim of preserving standards—indeed, as we have seen, they have been responsible for a grave deterioration of standards. If these principles were applied to the Federation as a whole the result would be more disastrous still. The concept of "partnership" would give Nyasaland, for instance, nothing that she wants or that is relevant to her situation. The attempt to hold power in the hands of a minority on the test of "civilisation" would lead to devastating explosions in the territories. The maintenance of the Federal Government in perpetuity in civilised hands would lead to more and more drastic departures from civilised standards of government. Finally, there would be a massive and tragic miscomprehension of the strength of African aspiration and of its quality. The real answer is not to extend the Southern Rhodesian shibboleths but to abandon them.

Appendix A to the Southern Rhodesian Emergency Allowances

At the beginning of the emergency it was laid down that in urban areas dependents of detainees should be paid an allowance at the rate of 1s. 6d. a day per recognised dependent. After some weeks the more complicated urban practice which continued until December 31st 1959 came into effect. Urban dependents were divided into two categories—those whose husband or father had been earning more than £20 a month and those whose husband or father had been earning less than £20 a month. In the first category each dependent was paid at the rate of 2s. 3d. a day and in the second category each dependent was paid at the rate of 1s. 6d. a day. The Government also decided to pay rents and other charges and to suspend collection of home ownership payments. Later it was decided to pay for school fees and other school charges. Despite the application of the Southern Rhodesian Detainees' Legal Aid and Welfare Fund Committee, who sent a delegation to Mr. Simkins of the Native Affairs Department in July, the Government refused to pay pensions instalments, hire purchase agreements and insurance premiums and as a result many such agreements have lapsed. In the towns, allowance payments were made regularly and school fees were paid.

In the rural areas, however, the situation was very different. There, dependents were from the beginning paid, or supposed to be paid, on an elaborate sliding scale. Full details of this have not been provided by Government but its principle was similar to the sliding scale now in operation for all dependents which is given below. The amounts allowed at each point on the scale, however, were very much lower than on the present scale. Moreover there was a rural means test operating in an opposite direction to the urban one, whereby more prosperous families got less money. The rural situation is illuminated by a letter from the Native Commissioner, Enkeldoorn, of February 20th 1960. Writing of the dependents of Mr. Egypt Patsika (R.C. X20193 Charter) who had complained to the S.R.D.L.A.W.F. Committee that their allowances differed widely for different months in 1959, the Native Commissioner explained that this was because for some months they had in the town at Marandellas and for some months in the country in his area. While in the country, this family of six was entitled to "1s. 10d. per diem basic family allowance"—that is 1s. 10d. for all six—as against the 9s. a day which they received in the town. In addition, according to the Native Commissioner, they could have received another 1s. 10d. per diem ration allowance if in his opinion they were "in necessitous circumstances and had no food stocks nor means to acquire food". Mr. Patsika's dependents made no application for this additional allowance since they did not know of its existence and were accordingly not granted it.

It is clear, then, that rural allowances were very low and also that an invidious sort of means test based upon apparent ability to eat was also applied at the Native Commissioner's discretion. But in addition to this, payments of allowances were made very irregularly and sometimes not made at all for several months in rural areas. A large number of detainees released in March and May of 1959 found that their families had been paid no allowance and five men in the Umtali area have still not been paid for the period of their detention. (They are: Messrs. John Zvinoera, Zvidepi Mukozhiwa, Herbert Chikose, Gideon Machari and Garawani Katsidzira. The Secretary of the S.R.D.L.A.W.F. Committee wrote to the Chief Native Commissioner about their cases on 10th February and 5th April 1960 but no reply has been received). In some cases no payments of allowances were made until several months after detention. On 27th July 1959, for instance, the Native Commissioner, Buhera, wrote to the S.R.D.L.A.W.F. Committee about the dependents of Mr. S. M. Ndhlovu (18816 Buhera). "The dependents referred to" he said "have not as yet received maintenance: however arrangements have been made for this to be done". In this case Mr. Ndhlovu's two dependents were eventually paid £34 1s. 6d. which was evidently intended to cover the whole period from February to November 1960. (The Secretary of the S.R.D.L.A.W.F. Committee wrote to the Chief Native Commissioner about this case also on February 10th 1960. No reply has been received). It would be tedious to give further examples of tardy or confused payments, it may suffice to say that the files of the S.R.D.L.A.W.F. Committee are full of such cases and very real evidence of hardship as a result.

In addition to the very low allowance paid, the means test and the irregularity of payment, dependents in the rural areas suffered from the lack of knowledge on the part of Native Commissioners and schools that Government would pay school fees. Hardly anyone in the rural areas had their fees paid, even although the question was brought up by the Detainees' Committee in its interview with Mr. Simkins in July and again at an interview with Mr. Morris and Mr. Quinton on November 11th 1959. In a letter to the Chief Native Commissioner of February 10th 1960, the Secretary provided details of 38 cases where school fees had not been paid by Government, in addition to roughly as many cases submitted separately previously. On 14th March 1960, the Welfare Officer of the Committee wrote to the Chief Native Commissioner to say that "it appears from information received by us . . . that even now not all Native Commissioners are aware that all school fees incurred between 26th February and 31st December 1959 are payable by Government". No answer has been received to these letters.

Throughout 1959 the Committee and various other organisations urged Government to standardise the allowance scales. In July, they were told by Mr. Simkins that the rural means test would be abandoned and that rural Native Commissioners would be circulated with an instruction to pay school fees. Neither instructions appears to have been effective. On January 1st 1960, however, a new consolidated allowance scale came into effect for all dependents whether rural or urban and whether resident in the Gokwe Restriction area or outside it. (Prior to January 1st restrictees and their dependents at Gokwe had been given no cash allowance.) This new scale, which is worked on a sliding principle, is given below:—

Allowance Scale laid down by Southern Rhodesian Government for Payment to Dependents of Detained Persons
Schedule B, January 1960

Size of Family	Monthly Allowance Payable
1	3	5	0
2	6	10	0
3	8	15	0
4	11	0	0
5	12	2	6
6	13	5	0
7	14	7	6
8	15	10	0
9	16	2	6
10	17	15	0
11	18	17	6

Rate: 1 & 2	£3 5 0	(2s. 2d. a day)
3 & 4	£2 5 0	(1s. 6d. a day)
5 & on	£1 2 6	(9d. a day)

Maximum: £20 per month per family

It will be observed that a family of six would get £13 5s. a month on this scale, where previously a rural family of six on the "basic family allowance" would have received less than £2 a month. Thus rural families are better off. On the other hand it will also be seen that where dependents were receiving 2s. 3d. a day in the towns they are worse off from the very beginning of the new sliding scale and that where large numbers of dependents were receiving 2s. 3d. a day each, their allowance could be halved on the new scale. Moreover the new allowance is "inclusive"—that is to say it is supposed to provide for schooling, rents, home ownership payments etc. as well as subsistence.

On January 30th 1960 the Secretary of the S.R.D.L.A.W.F. Committee wrote to the Chief Native Commissioner to represent to him the hardship which would fall on urban dependents under the new scheme. "We need not stress" he wrote "the difficulties confronting an urban family of the more prosperous type which finds its allowances suddenly halved, its rents or home ownership payments suddenly demanded and the Government no longer willing to pay for fees or uniforms". The Secretary asked that either the allowance be increased or rents and home ownership payments be waived. This request was refused.

Since the beginning of this year many cases of hardship have arisen as a result of the new allowance scale. These have in some cases been increased by inaccurate demands for payment of rents etc. for the period before December 31st 1959 and in one case a restrictee's total allowance for the month of March 1960 was withheld from him by the Native Commissioner, Lupani, in order to pay home ownership arrears for 1959.

It is the Central Africa Party's contention that the above narrative of allowance provision amply demonstrates not only the refusal of Government to make adequate welfare arrangements for dependents but also the inability of the Native Affairs Department machinery to put into effect the arrangements actually made.

Appendix B to the Southern Rhodesian Emergency Conditions at Selukwe and Gokwe: Rehabilitation Selukwe

As soon as the Beadle Tribunal had made its first recommendations in the middle of August 1959, the 43 detainees concerned were removed from Khami prison, Bulawayo. One was released; five were brought to Salisbury to prepare for their move to Gokwe restriction area; 37 were taken to the tiny jail at Selukwe there to await decisions on where they should be kept in continued detention. During the days that all were at Selukwe there must have been great chaos since the jail has since proved hardly large enough for six men. But after some days, the majority of the detainees were moved to Marandellas leaving at Selukwe the following men: George Nyandoro, Robert Chikerema, Paul Mushonga, Daniel Madzimbamuto, Raymond Mhizka, Josias Maluleke, Peter Mtandwa, and Edson Sithole. These men were all prominent Congress or Trade Union leaders. With the exception of Daniel Madzimbamuto, who was moved to Marandellas after some months at Selukwe, they all remained at Selukwe from mid August until Thursday, February 11th 1960. Some of them during that time served sentences in other prisons but while they were officially in detention they were kept at Selukwe.

Selukwe prison has no facilities for exercise and the men detained there are normally not allowed out of the prison yard which is itself very small. Conditions generally are very poor and during 1959 representations were made to Government about them by the Red Cross Representative in Southern Rhodesia, by the representative of the Friends' Service Committee and by the Southern Rhodesian Detainees' Legal Aid and Welfare Fund. As a result of these representations and of protests from the detainees themselves, the Government planned to move the detainees from Selukwe to various other places or alternatively to enlarge the prison areas at Selukwe itself. Although Mr. Julian Greenfield admitted on a visit to Selukwe that conditions there were bad none of these changes were in fact made.

The atmosphere of tension at Selukwe as a result of these conditions and possibly as a result of the belief that the men detained there were "hard core" was evident to all visitors to the prison. This tension broke out in a number of minor incidents leading to prosecution for breach of prison regulations. Robert Chikerema, for instance, has been charged three times and twice been found not guilty. As a result of this situation more representations were made by the Detainees' Committee and Mr. Michael Haddon had an interview with Mr. Cameron, Director of Prisons, early in January 1960. During this interview, Mr. Cameron remarked that the detainees would remain at Selukwe until they showed signs of "co-operation" and that if necessary prison officials would be moved every three months or so to ensure that the atmosphere "did not get on their nerves". In fact a new Superintendent, Mr. Payne, had been appointed in December.

Later in January 1960 a second charge was brought against Mr. Chikerema in association with Mr. Mtandwa. The S.R.D.L.A.W.F. Committee instructed its Secretary to represent to the Government the unwisdom of their policy at Selukwe and he wrote to Mr. Cameron in the following terms:—

"We appreciate that the detainees are subject to prison discipline in theory and that in practice adequate control must be maintained. However, it is allowed for a good deal of proper relaxation at Marandellas, presumably on the assumption that though the detainees are in prison they are not in fact prisoners in the normal sense and that in so far as prison regulations are punitive or exist for administrative convenience they should be relaxed. The same thing is true, of course, for the detainees at Selukwe. . . . We would like to point out, however, that conditions at Selukwe are not favourable to the establishment of discipline and morale. We regret very much that plans for moving the detainees have apparently been abandoned and ask that you reconsider them. We believe that under other circumstances you would not need to enforce prison regulations in so strict a way. As it is at the moment you are inevitably leaving yourself open to the allegation that Selukwe has been deliberately chosen to "break" these men and that the prosecutions are part of the process".

This letter was written on January 30th. No reply had been received by February 11th when serious trouble broke out at Selukwe; one detainee was charged with assaulting the Superintendent; other charges were brought against two others; and police trucks were summoned to remove most of the detainees from the prison. Subsequently cases were brought against three of the detainees. Two were dismissed and the case of assault was not concluded because the magistrate hearing it withdrew before its conclusion. Two of the detainees who were at Selukwe—Mr. Paul Mushonga and Mr. Josias Maluleke—are now in prison at Fort Victoria. Mr. Sithole is now at Marandellas. Messrs. Chikerema, Nyandoro, Mhizka and Mtandwa are now back at Selukwe under another Superintendent. On March 1st 1960, the Secretary of the Detainees' Committee received the following reply from Mr. Cameron:

"I must apologise for the delay in answering your letter, but I fear that it seemed to get pushed on one side. . . . As you know, steps have been taken to transfer the detainees from Selukwe, and the whole thing is still under consideration and I hope the whole matter will rectify itself as far as it is able."

Gokwe

As we have said above, six detainees were recommended for restriction at Gokwe in mid August 1959. They were followed by large numbers of others until finally the number restricted either at Lupani or at Gokwe totals 60 men with their wives and families.

From the beginning the concept of rehabilitation was applied to Gokwe. In August 1959 Sir Edgar Whitehead announced that he was satisfied that "those who are keen to rehabilitate themselves can make an extremely good living in the place that has been provided". On Wednesday, November 11th, a deputation from the Southern Rhodesian Detainees' Legal Aid and Welfare Committee met the Chief Native Commissioner and the Parliamentary Secretary for Native Affairs to ask permission for its members to visit the Gokwe area, as up until that time no permission had been given for press or welfare officers to enter. During this meeting there was a long discussion on the question of rehabilitation. It was explained that each restrictee was given land to plough and seed to plant. It was expected that he should cultivate this land or else take up one of the "rather restricted" other opportunities of employment in the area and so be able to maintain himself. There was no question of any restrictee being forced to plough but "if a man did not co-operate with his rehabilitation the Government would take a very dim view". It was pointed out by the delegation that there was no warrant at all for the concept of rehabilitation in the emergency legislation.

It may have been because of this criticism that when reporters were at last allowed in to Gokwe on 7th December, the Chief Native Commissioner told them that he did not like the word "rehabilitation". But, as the Rhodesia Herald reported "Mr. S. E. Morris, . . . admitted that his department's aim was to try to guide the steps of the restricted on to the road of rehabilitation". Mr. Morris was quoted as saying that it was "the accepted policy of the Government that the persons restricted must first prove that they are willing to play their part in communal life as ordinary, normal citizens before they are returned to everyday life".

In practice the question of rehabilitation came down to the question of ploughing, though it also involved "co-operation" with the Government at all levels. (The Government terminology for the two factions at Gokwe is "Co-operators" and "Non-Co-operators"; the restrictees' terminology is "Conservative" and "Labour"). The atmosphere comes out clearly in a letter from the Native Commissioner at Gokwe to one of the restrictees in December 1959. "When we visited you on the 30th November 1959 I was asked by the Chief Native Commissioner to advise you that the length of your stay at Gokwe depends entirely on yourself, i.e. on your behaviour and the way you settle down here. I would suggest that instead of making frequent requests to be released, you show that you are prepared to do as much as possible to help yourself, e.g. planting your lands. If you feel that you are too sick to do this yourself you can easily arrange to employ a few local people to do it for you. When the time comes for the review of your case it will no doubt be to your advantage if you can show that you have made a determined effort to rehabilitate yourself."

Very much more could be said about conditions at Gokwe. The Central Africa Party wishes only to point out the irregularity of the concept of "rehabilitation". The concept of restriction, as embodied in law, is designed merely to provide a place where men thought dangerous if released can be isolated from their fellows but re-united with their families. There should be no pressure of any kind put upon these men to "co-operate" except in so far as the maintenance of discipline and order is concerned. As it is, very considerable pressure is put upon the "non-co-operators"—i.e. those who will not plough—and use is made of government officials of various kinds, messengers, police, C.I.D. men, to apply this pressure. Life at Gokwe has been made so intolerable for them that they have applied to the S.R.D.L.A.W.F. Committee for an approach to be made to Government for their removal from the area and their restriction elsewhere in a "non-co-operating" unit. All independent observers who have recently visited the Gokwe area have reported that there is much tension there as the result of Government policy.

Southern Rhodesia African National Congress
Statement of Principles, Policy, and Programme

Principles and Policy

The African National Congress of Southern Rhodesia is a people's movement, dedicated to a political programme, economic and educational advancement, social service and personal standards.

Its aim is the National Unity of all inhabitants of the country in true partnership regardless of race, colour and creed. It stands for a completely integrated society, equality of opportunity in every sphere, and the social, economic and political advancement of all. It regards these objectives as the essential foundation of that partnership between people of all races without which there can be no peaceful progress in this country.

Congress affirms complete loyalty to the Crown as the symbol of national unity.

It is not a racial movement. It is equally opposed to tribalism and racialism.

It welcomes as members all of any race who are in sympathy with its aims and are prepared to fulfil the conditions of membership.

It recognises the rights of all who are citizens of the country, whether African, European, Coloured or Asian, to retain permanently the fullest citizenship.

It believes that this country can only advance through non-racial thinking and acting, and that an integrated society provides the only alternative to tribalism and racialism.

Congress believes that individual initiative and free enterprise are necessary to the life of a young country and must be fully encouraged, but that a considerable measure of Government control is necessary in a modern state.

The immediate economic concern of Congress is to raise the standard of living of the under privileged. The peaceful development of the country demands above all things that the gap between the lowest and highest in the social and economic order should be greatly reduced.

Congress believes that in the whole of Southern and Eastern Africa there are three outstanding needs which it is supremely important to meet:—

- (a) the standard of living of millions of people must be raised in a short space of time through their rapid social, economic and political advancement;
- (b) this is only possible with the aid of skills, techniques and capital from overseas. These must be attracted to this country not only by the offer of material advantages but also by appeal to the altruism and sense of service prevalent in the world. This is a challenge to the more advanced and privileged people in the world whose help is required in the interests of world peace and the total development of mankind.
- (c) In view of the inevitable uprising of national feeling among the peoples of Africa and the need to enlist the full co-operation of the mass of the people in this great enterprise, full participation of African people must be provided for in Government, and the legitimate political aspirations of the people be thus fulfilled.

Congress realises that to meet these three needs is a task of gigantic proportions, but believes that nothing short of this can ensure the peaceful development of this country for the benefit of all its inhabitants. Congress is therefore dedicated to the fulfilment of these needs and regards it as a matter of the most urgent necessity.

Political Programme

(1) Land

Congress believes that the land belongs to the people. Thus the use of land must be controlled and administered by Government. Government must ensure that the use of land is not limited by undue speculation in land values. Government must promote the fullest freedom for the economic use of land by competent people regardless of race, and must provide for this now largely through the system of freehold land tenure. It is, however, both uneconomic and also socially undesirable that land should be apportioned racially. Congress believes therefore that the Land Apportionment Act must be repealed and the land of this country freed from racial restrictions for economic development in both rural and urban areas. Unjust distribution of land is one of the fundamental causes of social discontent, and Congress regards measures of land reform as of the utmost importance.

(2) Agriculture

Congress believes that this country must become self-supporting in all agricultural produce and may well become an exporting country. It recognises the need for large-scale agriculture, but does not believe that this should be confined by law to a particular racial group. A rural economy for the country must be founded primarily on the small farmer. Government must therefore support the peasant farmer strongly with land settlement schemes, research, and the provision of capital so that his farming may develop along modern lines. Agriculture will benefit greatly if racial restrictions are removed and the large and small farmer are permitted to farm side by side to their mutual advantage. Agriculture must become increasingly intensive and undeveloped land in any area must be freed for economic use. Farming must become as attractive an occupation as industry and a proper balance must be maintained between rural and urban development. Government efforts to open up overseas markets, arrange for orderly marketing schemes and regulate and maintain price levels and a price structure in the interests of both the producer and the consumer must be motivated by economic considerations alone. The change-over to modern intensive farming methods requires the utmost encouragement from Government for the benefit of both producer and consumer regardless of race.

(3) Urban Areas

Congress believes that urban areas must be freed from racial restrictions and that industry and housing must be planned according to the best modern considerations in the interests of the community as a whole. Every effort must be made to promote the development of industry, but also to decentralise it, and to avoid large agglomerations of population. Government must promote the development of housing estates on an economic, not a racial basis and, whether through ownership or tenancy, security of occupation must be provided for people of all races who elect to live and find employment in urban areas.

(4) Local Government

Congress believes that the same pattern of local government must prevail in all areas and for all races, and that separate communal administration must cease. The Ministry of Native Affairs must be abolished and government by "Native Commissioner" and the "Native Affairs Department" must give way in all areas to a system of local government authorities elected on a democratic franchise. Local government services must develop, and the fullest opportunity must be open to all people according to ability and regardless of race in the local government service.

(5) Social Services

Congress aims at the rapid development of modern social services, including social insurance, and their application to all people regardless of race. It regards community development and adult education services as of great importance in the task of enabling the adult population to develop rapidly in both urban and rural areas. It believes not only in government initiative in the provision of social services but also in voluntary effort. Voluntary Associations must be encouraged and given the fullest freedom in the religious, cultural and social spheres. The initiation and extension of social services is most necessary for those in the lower income groups, who are predominantly African, and Congress is primarily concerned to promote them there. The cheap labour of the African and Non-European is the major source of the wealth of the country, and it is from that accumulated wealth that provision must be made for full social security for all workers, for unemployment pay, for sickness allowances and for adequate pensions. Until such facilities are available, it is a dangerous step for any African to leave the Reserve and opt to become an urban worker, for he has thereby forfeited his right to return to and live in the Reserve, and in unemployment, sickness or old age no provision is made for him in the town.

Full social security must be the terms upon which the African worker contributes to the development of the country.

(6) Education

Congress wholly supports the principle of free compulsory universal primary education on a non-racial basis. No child must be deprived of educational opportunity from which he or she will benefit. Secondary education must be greatly expanded but with no lowering of standards. New secondary schools must be established on a non-racial basis and must accept pupils on grounds of academic ability alone. In this way the younger generation will be educated for an integrated society. Technical Colleges must be started on the same non-racial basis, offering equal opportunity to all with the ability to make use of it. Education at the University level must be unrestrictedly available to all who attain the required standards and if this involves a quicker growth of the University College than is at present planned, this growth must be facilitated. Opportunities for further education, study and training overseas must be opened up by the generous establishment of state bursaries and scholarships awarded to qualified ability without distinction of race. Government must provide equality of opportunity in education regardless of race and colour and a single educational system taking no account of race must be the objective.

Government should at the same time give the greatest encouragement to private schools maintained by voluntary bodies so that they may make their contribution to education in co-operation with the state.

Congress realises that education is expensive and must be paid for. No state can make light of the difficulty of doing so. But it is the most important single need confronting the country and must have top priority in its claim on revenue and resources. This is not a poor country; it is prospering greatly, and the redistribution of resources required to finance the educational programme will prove the best possible investment for the prosperity of citizens of all races.

(7) Health

Congress believes that in order to provide adequate health services throughout the country for the whole population, provision must be made for greatly increased medical staff, for training doctors, nurses and medical orderlies. The selection, training and service conditions of these must be without discrimination, as to race if enough competent candidates are to be received into the medical services.

The difficulties of financing increased health services are not to be underestimated, but the increase in production to which this would lead would rapidly offset the cost. Congress believes that a further way to meet this cost is by making all hospitals multi-racial, and the savings effected by ceasing to maintain separate institutions can be used in the provision of the additional services required.

(8) Industry and Trades Unions

Congress believes in the necessity of the rapid development of industry, yet under such conditions that rural economy and social life will not be destroyed but improved. In particular, secondary industries must be based on the products of the primary industries of the country. Conditions must be promoted under which the establishment of industry will be encouraged; these conditions include appropriate financial arrangements, provision of efficient transportation, of cheap power, of adequate housing for employees and of an efficient labour force. Capital, skills and techniques must be attracted from overseas, yet it is necessary to make the fullest use of the capital resources and potential of the population of the country. Education and training in crafts and trades must therefore be strenuously promoted by Government through training schemes and through the encouragement of apprenticeship. Opportunities to acquire skills must be open to all people equally regardless of race and according to ability. Trade Unions must be encouraged to participate in these schemes so that they may fulfil the role of maintaining and increasing the efficiency of industry as well as that of improving the working conditions of their members. Congress believes in collective bargaining and in the Trade Unions and Employers' Organisations which make this possible; these must be organised on an industrial and not a racial basis, and must not exist to maintain an artificially high standard of living for one class of persons at the expense of another.

(9) Cost of Living

Congress believes that the basic costs of living should be controlled and kept low. A reasonable basic standard of living must be assured for all people, and to this end capital must be applied to the increase of productive effort within the country and not to the import of luxuries from overseas. There must therefore be, in the present stage of development of the country, a strict control of imports. Congress believes in the full development of natural resources, both human and material, within the country so that the basic costs of living may be reduced for all people.

(10) Taxation

Congress realises that more widespread social services mean a higher rate of taxation but regards such services as a necessary insurance for the future. It believes in indirect taxation falling most heavily upon luxuries, in the present situation of the country where necessities have yet to be spread widely throughout the population. It is against Poll Tax and Hut Tax and favours direct taxation according to means through income tax, which must begin at a low income level in order to raise income from the majority of citizens of all races.

Taxation must not be levied nor its proceeds spent on a racial basis; both collection and spending of revenue must be administered to meet the needs of the people of the country as a whole.

(11) Foreign Investment

This country greatly needs capital investment from overseas. Congress recognises that to obtain this, security must be provided for both public and private investment. Government must therefore establish conditions under which capital may be invested and industry established with sufficient security to encourage investors. Congress believes that solving the racial problem by developing a fully integrated society on non-racial lines will give the greatest encouragement to investment from overseas.

(12) Immigration

Congress believes that any policy of immigration aimed at increasing the non-indigenous population of the country for political reasons or for relieving other parts of the world of their surplus population is economically, politically and socially unsound and dangerous to peaceful development. Yet Congress recognises that people with capital, skills and techniques which are not available in this country in sufficient quantity are needed from overseas. Those who have such assets must be encouraged to bring them into this country as and when they are needed provided that these immigrants are people of good character, prepared to enter fully into the life of this country on a basis of equality with the existing population, and to become integrated into a society in which there will be no discrimination as to race or colour. Immigration must therefore be strictly regulated and immigrants be very carefully selected both for their character and their abilities. In this way the country will become populated as fast as it can be developed and the immigrant population will become absorbed gradually and integrated in a stable social order.

(13) Freedom of Movement

Congress believes that, while a system of registration of all citizens of all races is necessary there must be freedom of movement for all people on their lawful business throughout the country, without regard to race and without special passes. To make this possible, the Pass Laws must be repealed and ordinary administrative measures used for controlling the population.

Visitors to this country from overseas and from other African territories must be encouraged, and inhabitants from this country must only be refused permission to travel out of it or their movements otherwise controlled on grounds which can be challenged by appeal to the highest judicial authority.

(14) Police

Congress believes in the necessity of a police force but considers that the growth of the modern state and the political conditions of the mid-20th century have given the police and security services an influence which too easily becomes a threat to individual freedom. No modern country is free from this danger. Congress therefore believes that an emerging modern democratic government must take the most careful precautions to control the activities of the police and security services and to make them subject in all things to the prompt scrutiny of an independent judiciary.

(15) Political Representation

Congress can see no justification for continuing any limitation of the franchise on grounds either of income, educational standard or race. The only form of government now acceptable to the vast majority of peoples in the British Commonwealth is parliamentary democracy, based on universal adult suffrage, since this alone can produce a government responsible to all inhabitants of the country and aware of the needs of all. Further, only by this system can the enthusiasm of the whole people for government enterprise and national development be evoked; and only by this system can we arrive at that fully representative government which, in the eyes of the United Kingdom and the world, is the condition of complete national independence. The real danger to future stability lies in keeping the majority of the people voteless, not in extending the franchise.

Congress believes that the present electoral arrangements are designed to keep political power in the hands of one small racial section of the population, and that the continuation of a racial alignment of political forces will be disastrous. The vote must be cast for the good of the whole country, not to promote the sectional interests of any one race. Racial politics will be disastrous for all. They can be avoided by universal suffrage now.

(16) Citizenship

Congress believes that full citizenship must be extended to all those of any race or colour who are lawful and permanent inhabitants of the country, and have demonstrated this through their satisfactory residence and integration in the life of the country over the course of 5 years residence in the country.

(17) Racial Discrimination

Congress totally rejects the whole idea and practice of discrimination or segregation according to race or colour. It believes that this country can only develop peacefully as a society in which the different races become increasingly integrated in social, cultural, economic and political life, and in which there is no discrimination according to race, colour, creed or political opinion. Congress believes that such integration is both practicable and urgently necessary. It is in fact not an idealistic dream but the only practical way through existing racial problems. Present discriminations which exist, and which are a grave menace to society, must be strongly discouraged by government and government publicity services, and must be eliminated from all public institutions. All clauses in legislation which are directly discriminatory or are discriminatory in effect, must be repealed, and racial discrimination must be abolished entirely throughout the field of public administration. It must be made illegal by statute for racial discrimination to be practiced in any institution holding a public licence. If such measures are taken, backed by a widespread government propaganda campaign, such racial discrimination as is of significance can be eliminated from society within a short space of time.

(18) Federation

Congress believes that the Federation of Central African territories against the will of the vast majority of the inhabitants was both a moral and political error. It recognises the need for consultation and closer association between neighbouring territories, but believes that a Federation can only endure in so far as it is acceptable to the majority of the population and is voluntarily entered into by governments representative of the people of the territories. Such governments can only be elected on a wide franchise through which the will of the people can be expressed. Congress is primarily concerned to promote the establishment of popular representative government in Southern Rhodesia. When this is achieved, questions involving Federation can be faced, and will then be found to take on a quite different aspect.

(19) Independence within the Commonwealth

Congress believes that at present any question of granting greater independence to Southern Rhodesia, either directly or through the Federation, is wholly premature. Until racial problems are completely solved and an integrated society is well advanced, the Government of the United Kingdom must be strongly discouraged from relinquishing any further control over the affairs of this country or any of the territories incorporated in the Federation. It should, in fact, be strongly encouraged to exert its influence to the utmost in favour of the creation of a non-racial integrated society with a government responsible to the people, as the first essential step towards the granting of greater independence.

(20) Defence

Congress believes that history has shown in modern times that the best form of defence against external aggression is internal strength. The settlement of the racial problem through the provision of equality of opportunity for people of all races in all spheres will produce an integrated society, which is the essential foundation to defence policy. In any form of conscription for necessary National Service for defence, recruitment and conditions of service must be according to ability and without regard to race or colour.

Defence forces must at no time be used either in this country or beyond it to silence the legitimate aspirations of the uprising peoples of Africa or elsewhere.

(21) Foreign Affairs

Congress believes that this country should remain within the British Commonwealth of Nations playing such part as is appropriate and practicable in the affairs of the Commonwealth and in the relationships of the United Kingdom Government with foreign powers and the United Nations Organisation.

Social Programme

Congress encourages hard voluntary work for the development of community life. It will attempt to promote the following social organisations and will co-operate in their formation with all other bodies interested and devoted to non-racial principles:—

Community Associations, Neighbourhood Centres and Settlements, to develop improved facilities for education, recreation, housing, health, and social, moral and intellectual advance in co-operation with local authorities and voluntary organisations.

Adult Education facilities including literacy classes, evening classes, courses and discussion groups.

Public Libraries and Reading Rooms to make available good books, periodicals and general information to local communities.

Mens' and Womens' Clubs for educational, social and recreational purposes.

Youth Clubs and Youth Organisations for the provision of healthy leisure occupation for young people.

Childrens' Nursery Schools and Play Centres to aid parents in the upbringing of their children and to provide facilities for early education and play for children.

Personal Programme

Congress encourages all members in their daily lives to offer to all people, regardless of race, colour, creed class or political affiliation, a good example in habits of:—

Friendship, Courtesy, Good Manners and Respect in all dealings with individual people.

Honesty in all dealings with other people and in all money transactions.

Hard Work with hand and brain in industry, agriculture and all services of benefit to the community.

Temperance, Economy and Simplicity in personal living.

Avoidance of Violence or provocation to violence in all relations with other people or organised bodies.

Vigorous Effort to promote the social, economic and political welfare of all men and service to the community as a whole.

Congress will take all possible action in the social, economic and political spheres to establish these principles, pursue these policies and carry out these programmes.

It will co-operate with all other bodies pursuing similar aims, in the belief that through co-operation advance will be made towards that society in which peace, security and progress will be assured for the whole population, regardless of differences of race, colour or tradition.

CENTRAL AFRICA PARTY SOUTHERN RHODESIA DIVISION

Appendix I—Land and Land Settlement

Historical Notes

1923—Responsible Government for Southern Rhodesia. Entrenched 21 million acres of Native Reserves (1920 Order in Council enshrined in Constitution, land vested in Board of Trustees). All other land open to all races. "The African could still acquire, own and encumber and dispose of land on the same conditions as a person who is not a native." (Plewman Report, pages 121/2.)

1925—Carter Commission report, resulting in Land Apportionment Act, 1930, and later consolidating Land Apportionment Act, 1941. "Separate" development visualised and land divided into "African" and "European" areas, forestry reserves, and unassigned and undetermined land. Africans' rights of occupation and ownership of non-African areas were removed by this Act. The sections of the Act dealing with racial restriction of rights in land are:—

1. Section 6: "No person other than an indigenous native may acquire, lease or occupy land in the Native Area" subject to certain exceptions.
2. Section 26(1): "Subject to the exceptions provided in this Act (a) no native shall acquire, lease or occupy land in the European area."
3. Section 40(1): "No European other than the Governor or the local authority may own or occupy land in a native urban area except with the permission of the Governor granted in terms of sub-section (2) of this section", i.e. educational, religious, administrative, or other purposes for the benefit of the native residing therein.
4. Section 41(1): "From and after the establishment of the native urban area no native may lease, use or occupy any land outside such area which falls within the area under the jurisdiction of the local authority, unless such native" and various provisions follow.

Note that in terms of Section 2 land includes any buildings or any other erection on land.

The Act makes no distinction between European and Asian, EuroAfrican or Coloureds, but many title deeds contain clauses restricting ownership or occupation to Europeans.

Present Position

July 1959. Native areas total 41,878,000 acres, European areas total 47,989,000 acres, plus 4 million acres Forest Land and 3 million-odd Game Reserves and National Parks. There is no unassigned land left, and only 57,000 acres of undetermined land (at present European-occupied but destined for eventual African occupation).

Population: (30.9.59)	European	215,000
	Asian	5,600
	Coloured	9,600
	<hr/>
	Total non-African...	220,000
	African	2,630,000

i.e. approximately one-twelfth of the population has sole rights over more than half the land. All the towns lie in the European areas and most of the communications, roads and railways pass through them. The majority of the Native Area has poor soil, much classified as Class III, while the European area contains nearly all the areas of fertile soil in the country. Much of the Native area has a very low rainfall and some is in tsetse-fly country.

Rural Areas

European: Standard holdings: 750 acres. Average farm very much larger. The Parliamentary Select Committee on Development of unimproved land (23.4.57) states that "out of 30 million acres, 1 million are under crops. It is suggested in evidence that 30% of land in European occupation is arable. This figure is undoubtedly too high but it is clear that the present percentage of total European-held land under crops, that is to say approximately 3-4%, is deplorably low."

The Engledow Report* says "there is much unused land in the European areas". Many farms are undercapitalised and farmers might prefer to sell surplus land and use proceeds for capitalisation of the remainder but average farming land is not easily saleable.

There are at present approximately 9 million acres of "unoccupied" Crown land in European areas, of which approximately 3 million acres are tsetse infested. In the past, Crown land has been leased under certain conditions (good farming methods to be used, etc.) to farmers under land settlement schemes, and those fulfilling the conditions can purchase at half the open market value of the land. Leases run for twenty-five years at a rental covering the total purchase price at the end of that period, so that no deposit is necessary. These schemes are still operating. Production costs are high. The Engledow report states: "It is impossible to forecast with certainty the long-term future export value of maize, but there is no strong reason for supposing that it will rise above the present range of 20s. to 30s. a bag f.o.r. Salisbury and it could fall below. Present costs of production by European farmers in . . . Southern Rhodesia average around 25s. a bag f.o.r. Salisbury . . . to these costs must be added marketing costs comprising the bag (3s. 3d.), transport from farm to the rail head, which on the sample farms averaged 9d. per bag, and the Grain Marketing handling costs. On the basis of these costs there is evidently little prospect of most farmers producing profitably for overseas export under normal conditions".

African: (a) Reserves—21,000,000 acres.
(b) Special Native Areas—12,878,000 acres.

These were held under communal (tribal) tenure until the Land Husbandry Act of 1951. This Act, intensively implemented from 1955, has its object "To provide for the control of the utilisation and allocation of land occupied by Natives and to ensure its efficient use for agricultural purposes", and a basic provision to ensure this is that "no native shall cultivate any land in any prescribed farming land unless he is registered as the holder of a farming right in respect of such land". This provides a form of individual title but not a freehold title to land—the right may not be given or taken as security, it may not be disposed of by will and it expires on the death of the holder. Moreover, in certain prescribed circumstances the right may be cancelled by a Native Commissioner. (Plewman Report, page 27.) Thus it breaks away from the traditional communal tenure, dividing the land into individually-held Standard Holdings, size depending on rainfall, whose "owners" have grazing rights in communal grazing areas. For example, areas with a rainfall of over 24 in. have Standard Holdings comprising 8 acres (6 acres for crops, 2 for grass ley) and grazing rights for 6 head of cattle. (Total, say, 80 acres.) These holdings are proving uneconomic in many areas, barely providing subsistence for a family, and soil erosion is continuing as a result of intensive, undercapitalised farming on poor soils, in spite of the best efforts of Land Development Officers.†

Even so, there is not enough land available in Reserves and Special Areas to provide Standard Holdings for people entitled to them now.

As at July, 1959, 338,000 individuals are entitled to Standard Holdings, and when the Act is fully implemented there will be only 212,000 Standard Holdings available in total in the whole Native Reserve and smaller even than the Standard Holdings. Holdings may be purchased if owners are willing to sell, up to a maximum of three times a Standard Holding, as may grazing rights. The Native Department, represented by Native Commissioners, have absolute jurisdiction and executive powers in the areas. (See Appendix II).

(c) Native Purchase Areas: 8,000,000 acres.

Farms ranging from 50 to 300 acres each (average size approximately 200 acres) are being cut up for sale to approved African farmers (i.e. men who have had two years training at an approved school or who hold Master Farmers' Certificates). Freehold title with certain restrictions can be obtained after a probationary period consisting of three years. The areas are Crown land, controlled by the Native Land Board, consisting of the Chief Native Commissioner as Chairman, three members nominated by the Governor and one nominated by the Secretary of State.

To date allocations have been made as follows:

1931-56	4,669	alienated properties
1957	382	" "
1958	632	" "
Total	5,683	" "

These 5,683 farms total 570,000 morgen, or, when "waste" land is included, approximately 1½ million acres, leaving 6½ million acres still unalienated. The waiting list of approved farmers wishing to purchase farms in these areas was closed at the end of 1955, when 5,174 names were listed. The waiting list had been reduced to 3,707 at the end of 1958, and although no new names are taken onto the list, the policy is to allocate 1/6th of the annual allocations to new applicants, taking the remaining 5/6ths from the waiting list. No accurate figures can be given, but the Chief Land Officer estimates that approximately 25,000 families are "squatting" on unalienated Purchase Area Land, and the African population "squatting" still (after many thousands have been removed) on European Crown Land is given as 25,912.

The price of land in Purchase Areas varies from 10s. to £1 per morgen. The same disabilities regarding type of soil, communications, access to markets, rainfall, etc., apply to many Purchase Areas as to Reserves.‡

The Engledow Report says:—

"We therefore regard it as a first principle that all tracts of good agricultural land lying wholly or partially undeveloped should be developed as rapidly as possible. A second principle would be that, as industry expands, relief from excessive population pressure in country areas should be obtained by encouraging movement from country to town through ensuring that home ownership facilities and satisfactory family living conditions exist in towns for urban dwellers belonging to all income levels. No obstacle should be allowed to remain which impedes the voluntary and permanent resettlement of families from the overpopulated areas into other agricultural areas or the main industrial and urban centres". (Page 34.)

"Sociologically the significance of the present distribution of farm size (European) is that the graduation from small through medium to large farms which offers good young recruits a chance to work their way up is lacking and with it the constant infusion that any healthy industry requires . . . Whether it would be practicable and in the general interest for such farms to be provided, by encouraging or ensuring the sale of undeveloped parts of very large farms is a question which long-term policy must be deemed to include. There are many large European-owned farms of which, for various reasons, there are large parts which remain unused but which the owners do not wish to sell. Such unused areas could in many instances provide useful farms for renting by people working their way up in farming. . . . The most numerous farming class in the Federation will be the African family farmer from whose ranks mainly will emerge the larger-scale African farmer. For both sociological and economic reasons allocation resources to the development of the larger African farms as opposed to the ordinary run of small holdings in the Native Area, needs fresh thought." (Page 35.)

"It seems that the principle should be to encourage more European farms by reducing the size of the largest, and to encourage more, larger African farms employing labour . . . Agricultural development may have to be fostered in unpropitious physical conditions simply because an area is already heavily populated. Every such expedient action, however, is incipiently a crisis of the next decade. For the sake of soil conservation and to allow higher crop yields and greater regard for labour, the population in many African areas should come down steadily for a considerable time to come, with the number of Africans in industry increased accordingly." (Page 29.)

This Committee considers that the chief obstacle which "impedes the voluntary and permanent resettlement of families from overpopulated areas into other agricultural areas or the main industrial and urban centres" is the Land Apportionment Act, and that it is essential, if healthy rural development is to take place, that that Act be repealed.*

Urban Areas

The "Report of the Urban African Affairs Commission, 1958" (the Plewman Report) gives a most excellent and detailed analysis of the position in Urban areas; the following extracts should be "filled out" by reference to the Report itself.

Present legislation provides for five types of urban areas for Africans (residential areas):

1. Native Townships. Purely African urban centres, which can be established in Purchase Areas. Native Reserves and Special Native Areas. "Stands or sites within a township may be acquired by Africans on registered freehold title for residential, trading or industrial purposes. Alienation or encumbrance of such land is subject to approval by the Native Land Board. . . . Administration is carried out by the Native Department. . . . Without being critical of what has influenced the establishment of these township areas, it is plain that there is an air of artificiality in their creation. . . . it seems unlikely to us that they will ever become thriving settlements in the foreseeable future. . . . Of the five townships listed, only three have been developed to any extent . . . it seems obvious that one important reason why these three were initiated was because of their relative proximity to . . . main centres of European urban settlement (23, 13 and 11 miles from Bulawayo, Salisbury and Umtali respectively)". (Plewman Report, pages 55/56.)
2. (a) Native Urban Locations.
(b) Native Urban Areas.
(c) Native Village Settlements.
(d) Railway or Statutory Commission Native Areas.
- (a) Native Urban Locations ordinance made provision for the establishment of native reserve locations in or near urban areas (1906). The control and management of the area may be vested in the local authority concerned but "no land, building or hut, situated within the limits of such location shall be deemed to be a rateable property for the purposes of any local authority".
- (b) Native Urban Areas: establishment provided for by Land Apportionment Act, 1941, inside or outside boundaries of a municipal council or T.M.B. for occupation and other reasonable requirements of Africans ordinarily employed within the local authority area and their families. Existing Native Urban Locations under the management and control of local authorities by proclamation are deemed to have been established as Native Urban Areas administered and controlled by Local Authorities or by Government; inhabitants have no voting rights on Local Authorities.
- (c) Native Village Settlements: Crown land in the vicinity of a town where large numbers of Africans are employed, set aside by the Governor for occupation by Africans and their families. Administered by Government, but may have Native Council with Native Department's approval.
- (d) Railway or Statutory Native Areas: land within or outside Local Authority area for accommodation of Africans and families in the employ of Railway or Statutory Commission.

The following comments from the Plewman Report are informative:

"It is clear from the summary of legislative policy relating to the rights of tenure of Africans on land set apart in separate areas in or in the vicinity of cities and towns in Southern Rhodesia that a permanently settled community has no real place in such area. The tenure is essentially one to meet the needs of the urban worker as someone distinct from the urban dweller. Employment is a pre-requisite to getting accommodation in all these areas except Native Village Settlements. The Commission concludes that whereas in the climate of the times when the legislation was passed mere occupation of premises may have provided an adequate sense of security to the occupier, the evidence it heard establishes on the contrary that occupation of premises on existing terms quite definitely now gives rise to a sense of insecurity". (Page 126.)

"To make provision for a stable urban population implies having an urban community in which married and single persons, old and young, can seek to establish themselves permanently in homes and in a way best suited to meet their changing requirements as individuals, families and community groups." (Page 128.)

"There is no doubt the African is looking for some measure of security in the new urban society of which he is becoming a part. What is important is that every encouragement should be given to Africans to become fully responsible and settled urban citizens." (Page 130.)

"A healthy urban population is in continual movement, a movement which arises from the fact that the occupational and age structure of the population are always changing, not only for demographic reasons but because as the community becomes wealthier the nature of its work changes. . . . If houses are to be built by private enterprise there must be a proper market in house property. Every obstacle to the process of buying and selling restricts the market and the process of matching the demand with the supply of houses." (Page 131.)

"Home ownership provides a great incentive to saving as well as to pride in the maintenance and accumulation of property. . . . It follows that the contraction or closure of opportunities for home ownership is a serious denial of opportunity and freedom. . . . The solution (to the problem of urban growth) lies in a determined effort to throw off those shackles which prevent Africans from becoming normal urban dwellers with the same security of property which is afforded to other citizens in urban areas. . . . Once the rights of Africans in urban areas are safeguarded in the same way as the rights of all other urban dwellers, a large part of what appears to be the housing problem will be solved through the normal channels of building activity and finance." (Page 132.)

"One of the basic principles of the Land Apportionment Act is the protection of African interests. It is possible to argue that this general public policy does not always achieve its objective in fact. . . . A protective policy involves restrictions on individual freedom of action and it should always be a matter for scrutiny how far the protection which it seeks to provide is obtained at too great a price." (Page 133.)

"The greater part of the labour which is employed is migratory and that is a system which operates against any substantial improvement in the productive efficiency of the labour employed." (Page 136.)

"We would urge most strongly that the question of the minimum wage should be considered not as a thing in itself nor as a means of bringing about some artificially conceived standard of real income, but as a part of a more general movement to provide the conditions of security which will encourage African labour to settle in industrial areas and at the same time promote the greater economic expansion of the country. . . . The possibility that excessive numbers might be attracted to the urban areas beyond what these areas could employ and accommodate may be a greater danger if it is due to economic deterioration in the non-urban areas, including the native reserves, than if it is due to conditions in the urban areas themselves. . . . An increase in wage rates does not always mean an increase in labour costs. If (such) increase leads to or is accompanied by an improvement in the efficiency of labour, there may be no increase in . . . of the labour employed". (Page 138.)

"There is room for experimentation so that private entrepreneurs might be attracted to the development of African urban areas or to financing such development. Suitable legislative adjustments would have to be made to permit this." (Page 140.)

"The economic and social insecurity which daily confronts urban Africans, by reason of their inability to have any real rights to land in the towns, must be mitigated if they and all other racial groups are to benefit jointly from the modern economy. Our conviction . . . is . . . that in matters of administration the aim of policy should not be towards separation of urban communities on a racial basis . . . and consider that some realistic approach to the problem must be devised for the future." (Page 146.)

"It was represented to us in evidence that the system of registration prescribed in the Native (Registration and Identification) Act 1957 is basically a system of rural registration and that the effect of this is to perpetuate an official outlook that the African has no real home in towns. We think there is substance in the statement . . ." (Page 149.)

The foregoing extracts from the Plewman Report, if carried to their logical conclusion, can only lead to a recommendation, amongst others, to repeal the Land Apportionment Act. We consider that the only reason the Commission did not so recommend was because "it has acted on the assumption that the underlying principle of land apportionment between African and European is to continue as accepted public policy". (Page 133.)

Appendix II—Land and Land Settlement

Notes of Land Husbandry Act Southern Rhodesia

Act passed 1951.

First Guinea Pig Reserve (Chinyika) proclaimed 1953.

Every family of whom a member was cultivating land at the time of the proclamation of the area concerned is entitled to a minimum standard holding.

Holdings vary according to local conditions and rainfall, people in lower rainfall areas being entitled to larger land holdings and greater grazing rights than those in higher rainfall areas.

Act is implemented as follows:

1. Aerial survey of whole Native Reserve areas (cost 2d. per foot).
2. Proclamation of implementation of Act. (It was found necessary to proclaim all areas at once to prevent exodus of town dwellers back to Reserves to stake claims by cultivating.)
3. Propaganda by Native Commissioners and staffs to persuade local inhabitants that the Act is advantageous to them.
4. Detailed study by experts of conditions in area: rainfall, soil, pasture research, forestry, arable versus grazing land, etc., number of beasts grazing areas can support. Boreholes sunk in dry areas. (3 miles apart.)
5. Assessment Committee appointed, consisting of:
 - Provincial Commissioner (Chairman), District Commissioner and Field staff;
 - Government agriculturist, land and animal husbandry and pasture research officers, local Native chief;
 - If Native Council already exists it may elect a member to the Committee.

This Committee allocates individual holdings and grazing rights, Land Development officers lay out contours and direct farming operations once individual owners have taken possession. Grazing areas are in blocks separated from arable holdings.

The Land Development Officers and other staff are answerable to Native Commissioner. Any individual complaints lodged with the Land Development Officer, who in turn can protest to the Native Commissioner, District Commissioner and eventually Provincial Commissioner, if not settled. The whole scheme is under the Native Department and Minister of Native Affairs.

Minimum Standard Holdings laid down: (per land holder) (Single women, widows, etc., get proportionately less; these are married family allocations):

Rainfall p.a.	Standard Holding Acres	Acreage for Grass Ley	No. of cattle allowed in grazing area
Over 24 in. ...	6	2	6
20 in.-24 in. ...	10	3	10
16 in.-24 in. ...	12	-	15
Under 16 in. ...	15	-	20 (Cattle Economy)

Areas under 16 in. depend mainly on a cattle economy and many are over-grazed. Individuals are now being allowed to keep more than the standard number of head in return for payment of levies, which fees are used for improving the carrying capacity of the area.

In many areas there is not enough land to provide standard holdings or grazing; in Chiota, for example, a family may get only 4 acres of arable (including ley land, which under these circumstances is not put down to grass but intensively cultivated ad infinitum) and grazing for 2-4 head of cattle.

Wet Land Holdings: (where surface water is present, as in Chinamhora Reserve): 1 acre wet land = 2 acres dry land.

Acreages Available: Special Native Areas ... 12,878,000
Reserves 21,000,000

Total number of Standard Holdings ultimately available: 212,000.

People entitled to receive Standard Holdings: 338,000.

Unallocated areas: Nil.

Extracts from Annual Report of Director of Native Administration, Salisbury Municipality, for the year ended 30th June, 1958:

Trading Premises:

Total number of businesses carried on by Africans from premises situated within the Council's area of jurisdiction at 30th June, 1958 = 229.

Trading from Dwelling Houses:

In addition to the above, a further 29 businesses are engaged in by Africans from residential premises. (Page 117.)

Schedule of Independent Businessmen:

Africans permitted to engage in businesses, trades or callings on their own account, and in respect of which certificates were issued during the year ended 30th June, 1958, totalled 512. (Page 121/2.)

(Of these 512, 179 are charwomen, 22 painters, 36 wood-vendors, 22 street woodvenders, 10 Omnibus Service operators, 10 laundresses, 10 taxicab service, 2 Ministers of religion. It must be presumed that the majority of these people work in the European areas as well as (or instead of?) the Native areas.) (Committee's comment.)

Two doctors of medicine, an advocate, and two free-lance journalists, all of them are possessors of letters of exemption, practice in the City without documents of this kind. (Page 121.)

Extract from Memorandum submitted by Charles Mzingeli (a Harare businessman) to the Select Committee on Resettlement of Natives (1959):

"Critics of our proposal (to repeal the Land Apportionment Act) ask what would happen to traders in places like Highfield. We think that already the traders there are meeting stiff competition from Europeans who trade under the cover of Africans. African traders have stood remarkably well against this competition, and the same thing applies in Harare Township also."

Appendix IV—Principles and Southern Rhodesian Territorial Policy

The Principles of the Party are:

To build a united nation of all our peoples under the Crown.

To eliminate the root causes of economic and political instability, of poverty and personal insecurity; and in so doing to eliminate the conditions in which the seeds of racial unrest can grow.

To remove from each race the fear that any single race might dominate for its own benefit.

To ensure for every inhabitant of the Federation the right and the opportunity to progress economically, politically and socially according to his character, qualifications, training, ability and industry without distinction of race, colour or creed.

To ensure that all the great freedoms which are acknowledged as fundamental human rights are accepted here as the rights of every inhabitant of the Federation.

The Southern Rhodesian Territorial Policy

Introduction

In none of the three territories of the Federation is it more important to apply these principles fully than in Southern Rhodesia, where the two main sections of the community have gone farther along separate roads than in the other territories.

To promote the rapid and diversified industrial and agricultural development which Southern Rhodesia needs it is essential to produce both political harmony and stability within the country and a highly productive labour force and large internal markets.

Only a party which will meet this national need on a non-racial and non-sectional basis—which will refuse to allow the national interest to be sacrificed for the benefit of individual groups or sections, whether financial or racial, white or black—can hope to produce these conditions and that measure of confidence overseas which will attract industries and loan capital on the scale the country requires.

The Central Africa Party is such a party, a party of and for all sections of the people. It is a party for Rhodesians in which there is no room for sectional nationalism, white or black.

This is the true meaning and spirit of the preamble to the Federal Constitution: where racial discrimination does not exist and every man is assured of equal rights and equal treatment; and where all sections of the community, instead of working against one another for their individual advantages at the expense of other sections, will work together for the peace and prosperity of the country as a whole.

Constitutional Development

The Party believes that an association of the two Rhodesias and Nyasaland can be of great economic benefit to each. It must be recognised, however, that in the face of the present widespread and often bitter opposition, Federation in its present form will not survive. Nevertheless, the Party believes that it will still be possible to build up a powerful association of the three territories provided each territory has substantial autonomy concerning its domestic affairs. The functions of the Federal government should be confined to

- (a) those matters which must by their nature be dealt with at Federal level; and
- (b) the provision of essential liaison between the three territorial governments.

The Party is firmly opposed to the removal of the reserve powers retained by the British Government until the government of Southern Rhodesia is sufficiently representative to ensure that any request for this full autonomy reflects the wish of the majority of the adult population.

The Party will press for a revision of the Constitution and a curtailment of the functions and powers of the Federal government.

Franchise

Parliament today in Southern Rhodesia is dangerously divorced from feelings and interests amongst the people which legitimately seek expression. The Party believes that there can be no stability, either political or economic, until the government is truly representative of all sections of the community.

To this end a substantial extension of the franchise—a real move towards the ultimate democratic ideal of universal suffrage—is urgently necessary. At the same time, in order to meet the fears of the minority now holding political power of the consequences of sharing it, the Party will entrench in the Constitution inviolable safeguards for the protection of individual and minority rights.

The Party opposes any special rolls and special qualifications. It will amend the franchise laws to introduce a common roll with uniform qualifications.

The present income and education qualifications, because they are applied universally to a country in which there still exist widely differing economies and wage structures and educational facilities, result in a completely unrepresentative government. In revising the franchise law the Party will introduce the following qualifications:

1. Citizenship of the Federation
2. Age of twenty-one years
3. Two years residence in the Federation and three months in the constituency
4. Literacy in English.

The failure of any significant number of Africans to register under the existing qualifications has been due largely to the difficulties created by the Electoral Regulations and by the Administration. The Party will amend the regulations and remove these difficulties.

Discriminatory Legislation and Practices

The Party's Federal policy states that positive steps will be taken to render illegal discriminatory practices, based on colour alone, in all places and establishments to which the public at large has the right of access or which hold themselves out to serve the public.

The Party in the territorial field fully supports this policy and will introduce the necessary legislation. In addition the Party will amend the whole body of Southern Rhodesian Statute Law to repeal all provisions which unfairly discriminate against any race.

Some of this discriminatory legislation is referred to in the various sections of this policy. The Party, in dealing with the subject in a separate section, wishes to underline the fact that, while it appreciates that certain isolated discriminatory provisions afford a measure of protection for uneducated and backward people, it regards as wrong and dangerous that such discrimination should be put on the basis of race rather than education or qualifications.

Examples of the many discriminatory laws which the Party will repeal are:

- those which restrict free movement of persons;
- those which prohibit public meetings without permit;
- those which attach penal sanction to certain conduct by African employees which, on the part of Europeans, would be nothing more than civil breaches of contract;

those which restrict the type of liquor which may be consumed by Africans, the persons from whom they may purchase it and the places where they may drink it;

those which appear in regulations framed under the Municipal Act and other Acts dealing with local authorities.

Much of this discrimination infringes personal liberty to an unwarranted degree, and some is directly and quite unnecessarily humiliating.

The Party will abolish the Pass Laws. It believes that the registration of births and deaths should extend to the whole population. Until that stage is reached the Party will require registration at the age of sixteen of all those whose births were not recorded.

African Affairs

The Party regards it as wrong both in principle and in practice that, within the same sphere of life, separate departments should exist to administer the affairs of different sections of the community.

There are seven departments within the existing Department of Native Affairs. These can and should be absorbed into the various European counterparts, as was done with the Department of Native Labour in 1955.

The Party does not overlook that experts on African Affairs and customs will be indispensable in the various government departments; the elimination of the separate departments will, however, serve two important purposes: it will ensure far closer liaison between the various officials than exist at present; and it will reduce administrative costs.

The Party will encourage the setting up of rural councils, whose representatives will have direct access in the ordinary way to the appropriate minister.

Agriculture

The policy in this field is closely linked with that on Land and Land Settlement. The Party appreciates that African agricultural productivity must, for the sake not only of the farmer himself but also of the national economy, be raised very substantially from its present sub-subsistence level; but it appreciates also that little improvement can be effected while the vast majority of African farmers are limited to sub-economic holdings of inferior soil.

The Party regards it as undesirable that European and African agriculture should be under the control of different governments. The Party will press for all agriculture in each territory to be brought under the control of the respective territorial governments.

In the field of African agriculture, to which the territorial government is at present restricted, the Party will:

1. Extend the advisory services, by appointing more Land Development officers and setting up more experimental stations.
2. Abolish the present system of levies on African agricultural produce, and ensure that European and African farmers are treated alike.
3. Encourage the formation of co-operative societies for the bulk purchase of farm requirements, and for the more orderly marketing and more efficient production of food-stuffs.
4. Encourage local markets in all the large towns for the supply of vegetables and foodstuffs for the needs of the urban populations.

Land and Land Settlement

The retention by a small section of the population of the greater portion of the land is more than merely morally indefensible; it has given rise to one of the greatest and most pressing problems facing the country today, the over-population of the rural Native areas.

The Land Apportionment Act is a major obstacle to harmony between the races and to the development of the country's resources.

The main aims of the Party are:

1. In the Rural Areas
 - (a) to relieve the present dangerous pressure on land in the existing Native areas by making available other parts of the country for use by African farmers
 - (b) to encourage efficient development of farming lands and bring unused lands into use
 - (c) to increase the size of poor soil sand veld farms to economic holdings and to encourage the maximum use of "better-type-soil" farms to produce intensive development without soil deterioration
 - (d) to adopt a system of incentives, loans or taxation to ensure that underdeveloped land is made available for full development.
2. In the Urban Areas
 - (a) to provide security of tenure of property for all inhabitants

- (b) to establish a permanent settled urban community with reasonable standards of living and easy access to places of employment
- (c) to reduce migrant labour to a minimum and increase the efficiency and productivity of the labour force
- (d) to relieve the pressure on land in the rural areas.

To these ends the Party will take the following steps:

1. Repeal the Land Apportionment Act.
2. Render illegal racially restrictive clauses in transfer deeds and leases.

The repeal of the Land Apportionment Act will not affect the Native Reserves entrenched as such in the Constitution, but will release twenty million acres of the Special and Special Native Purchase areas from the present restrictions of the Act; when the rural African has advanced to the stage of no longer requiring special protection, an amendment to the Constitution will be sought.

The repeal of the Act will make it possible to apply the principles of soil conservation without the accompanying hardship and resentment now caused by attempting to implement the Land Husbandry Act in conjunction with the Land Apportionment Act.

The repeal of the Act will provide the legal basis for a sound system of tenant farming which could enable farm owners to derive revenue from land they cannot use, and enable persons to farm who would otherwise be unable to do so through lack of capital.

The Party will introduce all necessary safeguards to prevent any possible disruption of the economy of the country. Such safeguards will include the stipulation of minimum costs of houses in particular areas. The Party realises the necessity for a period of five years to protect the present tenants of rural and urban land and to offer to the sub-economic groups of the population every opportunity to continue in their occupancy.

Labour

Another of the greatest and most pressing of the country's problems arises from the disproportionate rewards which different sections of the labour force receive for similar work.

The rates of wages paid to the labour force have been established in the past by reference to the standard of living of the race of the worker performing each job, and not—as they should be—by reference to the relative skills of the jobs themselves. As a result there exist today two economies and two wage structures; the one containing a number of grades of unskilled and semi-skilled work which are paid at a rate above the economic worths of the jobs concerned; and the other containing, almost exclusively, grades of unskilled and semi-skilled work which are paid at rates very seriously below the economic worths—rates which are no longer adequate to meet the rapidly increasing requirements of a people in contact with a more advanced civilisation.

The depressed wage structure of the African labour force is the greatest single obstacle to the industrial and general economic development of the country. It prevents the growth of internal markets, and it prevents the creation of an efficient and productive force.

The main aims of the Party are:

- (a) to ensure that every worker is able to maintain himself and his dependants at a reasonable standard of living
- (b) to develop to the full the country's great labour potential
- (c) to increase the purchasing power of the labour force and widen internal markets
- (d) to ensure that all jobs are open to all workers, irrespective of race, who are qualified to do them
- (e) to ensure truly representative collective bargaining within the framework of the Industrial Conciliation machinery.

To these ends the Party will take the following steps:

1. Ensure that there shall be established in every industry and undertaking, within a maximum of ten years, a single wage structure for all workers. The Party believes that the present level of wages of skilled workers is a sound level to which the wages of semi-skilled and unskilled workers should be related.
2. Amend industrial legislation so that every industrial agreement and employment regulation, and every other instrument of wage determination, besides laying down its current scale of wages on present standards, shall be required to set out a new single wage scale to be achieved within a maximum of ten years (subject to fluctuations in the value of money), and to set out also the steps by which the adjustment from the current to the new scale will be made by that date.
3. Amend the Industrial Conciliation Act so that the registration of a Trade Union for more than one industry will be permissible. Industrial Council representatives would continue to be elected by persons employed in the industry concerned.

4. Ensure that there shall be the widest possible facilities for apprenticeship and training within industry.

Social Welfare and Security

Social Welfare

There are several societies and organisations engaged in welfare work, and a great deal of excellent work is done. The Party feels, however, that Welfare services, both professional and voluntary, could achieve even better results if there were greater liaison between the various services, and if the public were aware of the help offered and how to take advantage of it.

In the fields of legal advice and aid there is a serious need. There are no facilities for free legal advice; and the qualifications for free legal aid for the purposes of a High Court action are so stringent that very few people can establish the necessary degree of poverty. In the Magistrate's Court no machinery exists at all for free legal aid.

The result is that many people with perfectly sound claims are unable, for simple financial reasons, to pursue them.

African Welfare is badly neglected. In the past, African tribal customs catered for these needs; a person in distress returned to his home in the reserves, where he was housed and clothed; relatives cared for the orphans and the aged. But the implementation of the Land Husbandry Act and the growth of a permanent urban African population has resulted in the security of tribal life disappearing, and there is urgent need for some other form of welfare to take its place both in the rural and urban areas, but particularly in the latter.

With these main aims in view the Party will take the following steps:

1. Legislate for the establishment of a co-ordinating Council of Social Agencies and for the registration of Welfare societies, which will be represented on the co-ordinating Council.
2. (a) Invite the Bar and Side-bar to co-operate in setting up Legal Advice Bureaux.
(b) Review and amend the existing law to provide adequate free legal aid in proper cases.
3. Establish Citizens' Advice Centres, to be administered by local authorities in close liaison with the Council of Welfare Societies, the Social Welfare department of the government, and the Legal Aid Bureaux: these centres will act as "clearing houses" where people in need of help will be told where they can get it.

Social Security

At the present stage of Southern Rhodesia's development it becomes necessary to remove unemployed persons from the sphere of welfare societies and to set up a proper unemployment insurance scheme on a compulsory contributory basis.

There are therefore four aspects of minimum security for which good government must provide:

- (a) Sickness
- (b) Injury at work—Workmen's Compensation
- (c) Unemployment
- (d) Old Age pensions.

A major feature of the system envisaged will provide for the transfer of benefits on change of employment.

At present (a) and (b) and (d) are provided for inadequately in three separate ways, and (c) is not provided for. The Party believes that if all four of these matters were to be included in one composite contributory insurance scheme, far greater benefits could be provided in return for the contributions than are possible under the present machinery.

The Party therefore intends to examine, in conjunction with the Workmen's Compensation Commissioner, the medical profession, employers' and employees' organisations, government departments and other interested bodies, the cost, practical implications and benefits of introducing legislation for compulsory contributory security for the four contingencies set out above.

The Party intends that the scheme be operated through private enterprise, and that it should apply to people of all races.

Local Government

The rapid growth of Salisbury and Bulawayo has given rise to new problems of local government. The City of Salisbury, for instance, has surrounding it peri-urban areas whose population is larger than that of the city itself. These peri-urban areas make use of all the facilities of the main city centre, yet have no responsibility to it; the smaller municipalities on the other hand, without their peri-urban areas round them, are tight units.

It becomes clear that a new unit for administrative purpose must be introduced to take into account the special problems of the larger urban areas. The pattern will then be:

1. The Country type of Town Management Board.

These will continue their administration under the existing Town Management Board Act.

2. The smaller municipalities.

These will continue their administration under the existing Municipal Act.

3. The areas known as Greater Salisbury and Greater Bulawayo, and any other that should in the future present a comparable situation.

These areas will be administered by "Metropolitan Councils", one of whose duties will be to levy rates for financing all local authorities in the area. Representation on the Metropolitan Council will be non-racial and through ward or township local elections.

Any owner or occupier (and spouse) of any premises which are rated in any manner by the Metropolitan Council (rates, electricity, water or sewage shall be deemed to be a rating) shall be entitled to vote. Also a nominee of any business venture so rated.

Town and Country Planning

The necessity for the proper control and planning of land use in urban and rural areas has long been accepted, particularly in rapidly developing countries.

However, delays caused by cumbersome procedure, unnecessary formalities and shortage of qualified staff have in the past created high land values due to a false scarcity of building sites, which has in turn contributed to the high cost of housing. The Party will remove these administrative difficulties and ensure that such a state of false scarcity does not recur.

The Party will extend the application of the Town and Country Planning Act to African townships in the reserves.

Housing

The main aims of the Party are:

- (a) to ensure that there will be adequate housing, both in quantity and in quality, for the whole population.
- (b) to encourage the maximum development of home ownership
- (c) to ensure that even the lowest paid worker shall live under reasonable conditions.

To these ends the Party will

1. Furnish financial assistance, if private enterprise cannot meet the demand, to enable local authorities to provide houses and flats for renting.
2. Encourage low-cost housing, and co-operate with Building Societies and other finance houses to enable as many people as possible to buy their own homes.
3. Ensure that the planning of housing schemes and the standards of housing design, while naturally varying to meet the needs of different income groups, will be on a common basis regardless of the race of the occupants for whom they are intended.

Education

The Party believes that every person, whatever his level of academic ability, his race or his means, should have the right as a citizen to a free primary and secondary education of the kind for which is talents fit him, and the Party will aim at compulsory primary education for all children. This is fundamental to the raising of the standard of living, and to the development of a widely based democracy. To achieve these objects the industrial, commercial and agricultural skills of the African population in particular must be increased as rapidly as possible.

In the Federation there are many diverse groups of all colours who have little feeling of common nationhood and patriotism. The forging of a nation can be achieved in part through an education system which acknowledges common ideals and standards for all people. The present separation of education in all the three territories of the Federation into European, Coloured and Asian education on the one hand, and African education on the other, means that an opportunity for the creation of common bonds is lost.

The Party believes that the education of all the people in each territory should be in the hands of Education Boards in those territories, whose activities would be correlated by a liaison committee drawn from the three boards.

One of the most pressing problems facing the government in the field of education is the wide-spread incidence of illiteracy in the indigenous population. The Party intends to institute a massive drive to end illiteracy, and to this end the Party will study, and adopt where suitable, those measures which have proved successful in the newly independent countries of Africa and Asia.

Finance and Taxation

The Party and its Federal policy has proposed an amendment to the Constitution to enable a more rational division of income between the Federal and Territorial Governments to be made.

On the assumption that such an amendment will be introduced, the Party in the territorial sphere will be able to impose more equitable taxes than at present.

The Party will repeal the discriminatory poll tax at present levied on Africans. It will introduce a graduated tax applicable to all races.

The Party will abolish death duties, which produce little in the way of revenue and deter the introduction of private capital into the country.

Administration of Justice and Police

Administration of Justice

The Party will restore the Rule of Law and the status of the Courts of Justice. It will not permit detention without trial and allied repressive acts

The Party will repeal the Preventive Detention Act of 1959, and will review the security legislation and the administration of the Department of Justice to ensure that violence and intimidation of any threat to internal security will be dealt with speedily and effectively by the ordinary process of law.

Police

The Party will establish municipal traffic police forces in the larger centres, and so release members of the B.S.A.P. for their more important function, the prevention and detection of serious crime.

The Party will ensure both in the regular and reserve police forces that conditions of pay and service and opportunities for promotion to all ranks, including commissioned rank, will be the same for all their respective members.

Mining

To encourage and increase the efficiency of the exploitation of the country's mineral resources the Party will establish:

1. A drill core library, as in the U.S.A. Much invaluable information is lost to the country for the lack of any system of recording drill cores.

The results of water boring will be included.

2. A Mining Court system to be attended by the miner, farmer, a Government Mining Engineer and Conservation official under a Natural Resources Board Chairman. This will ensure that miner and landowner meet to discuss development plans which they need not do at present.

The Party will investigate the establishment of Mining co-operatives on the lines of those now operating in Tanganyika.

Roads and Road Transport

The Party will co-operate with the Federal Government and other Territorial Governments to secure the proper co-ordination of all forms of transport in the public interest.

Irrigation

The Party recognises that the provision of large scale irrigation schemes presents tremendous problems of a highly technical nature, and that research is proceeding in an effort to solve these problems. The Party will continue to encourage this research and the development of water supplies; and will establish a Water Research Board.

Propaganda and Information

The Party believes that ignorance, prejudice and widely held misconceptions aggravate the friction between the main racial groups in the country. The territorial Information and Public Relations Organisation will make available to each section of the community through all available modern methods of communication, factual information on the achievements, customs and outlooks of other racial groups.

Particularly in the rural areas, the Party will ensure the widest possible dissemination of accurate information concerning day to day affairs, new Acts of Parliament and other matters of importance.

The Party will make the greatest possible use of mobile cinema units in order to provide educational material, relating for instance to agriculture, in the rural areas.

The Party re-affirms its belief in a free Press.

CHAIRMAN: We are very grateful to you for coming to help us. I think a great number of my colleagues would like to ask you some questions. Is there anything you would like to add before we ask questions?

A. (MR. GARFIELD TODD): I have one matter in introduction and that is we regret, as a Party, that at the last Congress there were more non-European delegates than European and that we have with us this morning no actual African members, but the men who should have been with us committed themselves at the time the Monckton Commission was announced and have not been prepared to come. We have tried as a Party to support the findings of evidence and the presenting of evidence to the Commission. However, we cannot do anything more about it than that. We do recognise at this particularly important time that in so far as your report at the end manages to give some unanimity for important points then what we have regretted perhaps as a weakness in the structure of the Commission would in fact turn out to be a very great strength and we hope it may go that way.

Q. I think we all understand the reason for not having African members here.

I would like to ask one broad question before we begin. In the opening paragraph of your Southern Rhodesia part of the book you point to the importance of a close association being maintained between the three Territories which make up the Federation. May we just assume for the purposes of this question that everyone is agreed that the economic development of the Federation requires that there should be some close association on the economic front. The great problems arise as to the political front, but it has been represented to us by a number of witnesses that in their view, to use the language they use, if Nyasaland was firmly governed they think that the Federation, either in its present state or with some modification, would come to be accepted there; that what is wanted is a firm lead backed by force and I would like to hear what you say about that?

A. You say in Nyasaland a firm Government backed by force?

Q. If necessary.

A. You have not suggested the character of the Government.

Q. No. What has been said to us is this: Here is the Federation. It could go ahead, you need it on the economic front and it should have some political content in the Federal centre, and some of us have pointed out the difficulties of persuading the African majority in Nyasaland to accept the Federation in its present form or even greatly modified. They say all that is wanted is firm government.

A. I think in all the Territories for the Central Africa Party we would completely agree that force is not the answer, that our biggest problem today, and the real tragedy of the situation, is that the Government is not representative of the people. For so long they have had the acquiescence of the people, but now I am afraid it has not even the acquiescence of the people, and this, of course, is the central problem, so force is out.

Q. When do you reckon that they began to lose the confidence of the people?

A. I think you would have to take the Territories one by one.

Q. I mean Nyasaland?

A. I think probably at the time of Federation the Government had to a large extent the confidence of the people, but I think that the problems in Nyasaland were not so much the problems of the state of government, it was the problem of a Federal policy, and the Governor of Nyasaland and his men have had to face up to the problems which were not really of their own making, that as the call for Dominion status became quite clear, the African reacted very violently. From my own personal experience of the position in Nyasaland, by September, 1958, it was quite clear to me, in speaking to members of Congress and leaders of Congress that they had no longer any faith in the British Government as a protector of their interests against the whites in the Federation. At that time it was quite clear to me that having lost faith in the British Government, and being quite convinced that the Federal Government would be given anything they asked by the British Government, the people of Nyasaland, or at least the political leaders, had decided that they would have to take fairly strong measures and I was sure that in 1959, though I didn't expect it would be quite so early, that there would be definite trouble in Nyasaland as an attempt to bring the British Government to an understanding of the fact that the African people were not prepared to allow the Federal Government to get what was called Dominion status.

Q. Thank you. I do not know how it would be convenient to take this memorandum. I think the first passage to which I wanted to draw attention is in the Federal Evidence 4. "Territorial Representation and Franchise Reforms", para. 45, there is the sentence "the broad Central Africa Party viewpoint on this central question is presented elsewhere". Everyone, I am sure, has studied that, and you go on: "The Central Africa Party further insists that an urgent constitutional reform required in each of the territories is the introduction of a 'Bill of Rights', administered by our courts but with a final right of appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council". You know what is said sometimes about direction from 6,000 miles away. Do you think that politically it would be acceptable?

A. I would like to refer that question to Mr. Jaffey.

(MR. JAFFEY): It is our opinion that it would be essential to have a final right of appeal to the Privy Council, not because there are any grounds for a fear that our courts would not interpret matters fairly, but there might be a fear that that would be the case. Certainly if you try to administer the Bill of Rights which will largely affect the interests of Africans, the Africans will feel more confidence in the system if final appeal lay in the hands of the Privy Council which is quite impartial and has no axe to grind in the matter.

Q. You think by and large it would not be open to the very greatest political objection here?

A. We have appeal to the Privy Council even now, and as far as I know that has never been made an issue.

Q. I had some experience and similar suggestions made at the time of the Indian and Pakistan Independence, and they both regarded it as unacceptable to have appeals which both Prime Ministers would personally have been glad to see, because it looked as though it were a clog on their independence. I wondered if there would be objection on that score?

(MR. PEDDER): I think there obviously would be objection from a number of people here, particularly like the white nationalist element, if one can so describe them here, but we feel it is more important that this safeguard should be included than left out.

(MR. BARON): The suggestion is, it might be possible to consider instead of appeal to the Privy Council sited in London something on the lines of Lord Justice Denning's recent proposals, a more or less Circuit Court or something on those lines. The extent of litigation in this country is tremendous, and to consider from a practical point of view taking appeals to a constitutional Council is one aspect, but if a Privy Council were in this country from time to time it would be of tremendous assistance.

Q. Just going ahead from there, to paragraph 54, when you come to Territorial representation and franchise reform, "In Southern Rhodesia the introduction of a literacy franchise for adults would result in an estimated 25,000 Africans as well as several hundred other non-Europeans becoming eligible for the vote in 1960." Where does that come from?

A. (MR. PEDDER): It is and can only be an estimate. In arriving at these figures I went to Government sources on this to find out numbers, but on the basis of a literacy franchise which would be roughly equivalent to primary education in English language, the number of those people who could be estimated to have passed that standard, one just had to apply various other factors, age factor, etc., and we arrived at what can only be a guess. In recent times Salisbury Municipality has done a sample test of the African population here and the figure that they reached was very near this one, in that they reached a figure of 20,000 people in the major urban areas, Salisbury, Bulawayo and Gwelo, leaving 5,000 for the rest of the country. We might be wrong by a thousand or two.

Q. And in the same way I suppose 7,000 a year likely to be added was arrived at?

A. Yes.

Q. An informed guess, but it checks up?

A. Yes.

Q. That leads up to this. It is extremely unlikely that racial parity between Europeans and non-Europeans would be achieved in less than ten years—a similar estimate?

A. That is correct, Sir.

Q. I think we might want that as a footnote in our minds.

A. (MR. TODD): That is not significant for good government, but significant only to people who are not prepared to face the situation.

Q. I just want to draw attention to paragraph 59, where you will see in (2)—Recommendations on Franchise—there should be a common voters' roll for Federal elections with no special seats; the qualifications for the Federal franchise should be those pertaining in the Territory in which a voter resides. Of course one fully understands the earlier part why you have point (1). Would you like to develop point (2) a little, the qualifications should be those pertaining in the territory?

A. We would have liked to have seen abolition of Federal franchise as such and just maintenance of three Territorial laws and the three Territorial rolls. To put it one way, the embarrassment of finding that the local Government has decided that 10,000 or 100,000 people should have the vote and publicise the names of those it agrees should have a vote, and then finally the Federal Government says No, 80% of these only can have a vote on the Federal B roll and so on. I think that is quite an impossible situation for any self-respecting Territorial Government to find itself in.

Q. In paragraph 47, you say in the third line: "It will be necessary for each territory to have equal numerical representation." I imagine that might be rather a prickly one. What you are saying, I suppose, is in each of the territories there is approximately similar population, it is very difficult to justify thirty for the two Northern Territories as against twenty-nine for Southern Rhodesia in those circumstances?

A. Yes, and if the Federal sphere had fewer responsibilities, the few responsibilities of Government left in the Federal sphere, the easier to get agreement on a fair and more equal representation in the Federal House, but the more important thing is the Federal Government is in the life of the people and the more powers it has in general the more difficult it is to get the Territories to agree to anything like equality of representation.

Q. They say, I suppose, you have power over a person, and if that is going to happen, we want a bigger share?

A. I think it is economic power to a large extent of the Federal Government, and if the big proportion of the Southern Rhodesia Government held a big proportion of the economic interests in the Federation, in some ways you can see a justification along certain lines for the attitude they take. The line is general. "These are our holdings, we are the ones who have so much to lose, therefore we should have a larger say in the Constitution".

Q. The argument that has been put on the other side is that it is not merely a question of counting heads to see what the proportion should be in the Federal Assembly, but the wealth produced or the economic strength.

A. Of course, we are concerned particularly to see a viable solution. We do not think Nyasaland is likely to co-operate unless they see a much greater determination to have a reasonable equality of representation.

(DR. RANGER): That applies also to the question of the Territorial franchise as being used for the Federal franchise. It occurred to us that if Nyasaland advances to responsible government at Territorial level, the Nyasaland Government would find it intolerable to have a much more restrictive voters roll to elect Nyasaland representatives to the Federal House. The main thing is that it should be at least as wide as the Territorial roll. This is one easy way of ensuring that.

Q. In paragraph 70, talking about immigration opportunity, you suggest that those whose presence "would deny advancement to our own people" should be disqualified. Would you enlarge on that?

A. (MR. GARFIELD TODD). We have had a good example of that in the way in which some very uneducated and low-class Italians have been brought in to become firemen on railway engines. Obviously our own people could have done the job just as well.

Q. Africans are being denied employment of this kind, and the Italians, while being no better, are being employed?

A. That is in fact what happened.

(MR. PEDDER): This applies not only to Africans but to Coloured people too, who are also being denied opportunities to work, and start factories and businesses, and so on.

Q. Dealing now with the Southern Rhodesia Territorial evidence, in the second paragraph you say that if the association were broken up, probably Southern Rhodesia would be the greatest loser. Would you enlarge on that?

A. (MR. PALMER): If Southern Rhodesia were to secede from the Federation or if the Federation was to break up, the immediate result would be a very severe recession in the economy of this country. As a result of that there would be a large amount of unemployment. Obviously there would be very difficult conditions with regard to African employment. Therefore the difficulty before the country would become continuously greater, until we could re-establish ourselves on our own economy. At the moment we benefit considerably from revenue from the Copperbelt. We should lose that, and any break-up of the Federation would mean that the national debt of Southern Rhodesia would have to be allocated to the governments; and that would be a millstone round our necks.

Q. Nyasaland, of course, would stand to lose a bit, apart from its revenue deficit being annually supported.

A. It would, but as a Crown colony and under British protection it stands a much better chance of being helped out than Southern Rhodesia.

(MR. GARFIELD TODD): But surely they all stand to lose. There is no doubt that strength still lies with union. On the long-term view, each territory would lose.

Q. If the Federation were broken up, do you think the Nyasas who come down here now, or go further south, to work would find it more difficult to get work here?

A. I do not think so, because not so long ago we had 600,000 African workers in daily employment, of whom we could only find about 300,000 under our conditions at that time. We simply could not get enough labour so we brought in Portuguese and people from Tanganyika. Recently, of course, we have had this quite considerable depression, and for the first time for many years we have a surplus of labour. If the Federation is to go ahead at all, we are obviously going to need the labour from Nyasaland, and it is obvious that Nyasaland is going to have spare labour for many years to come.

Q. Somewhere in the memorandum you have referred to the importance of there being freedom of movement. Is there any reason why, if Federation ceased, and freedom of movement were stopped, the Nyasas might find themselves in difficulty?

A. We would be only too glad to have their help if we needed it, but if Southern Rhodesia went into a period of economic depression because of what happened, obviously the first people to go home would be the Tanganyikas and the Portuguese, followed by the Nyasas. One has to recognise that many employers here have had Nyasaland labourers and clerks for many years, and it is not a case of whether he is a Nyasa, but he is a man in his own right, and is a very good servant of the firm: naturally they want their own men.

(MR. PALMER): A large number of Nyasas are prepared to work on farms, whereas the local Africans are not keen on this work. If there was a shortage of labour the farmers in this country would insist that the government of this country should not deprive them of this labour.

Q. There is a real need, not only for labour, but for their labour?

A. Yes, and as regards the prospects of Southern Rhodesia if Federation broke up, industrial expansion and so on, the country cannot exist without it, and industrial expansion cannot take place unless you have a market. That market lies in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland as much as in Southern Rhodesia itself; so that to cut them off from us would be quite disastrous.

Q. Whatever may be the economic weakness of Nyasaland at the moment, when you come to borrow, as you have borrowed, any large sums, you would want to try and have the security of the larger and not the smaller unit?

A. (MR. GARFIELD TODD): It would be difficult if we started to come down from Federation to single states.

(MR. BARON): One of the ways in which Southern Rhodesia will suffer if the Federation broke up would be that she was intending to pursue a policy of continued white supremacy, shall I say. If the Federation disintegrated, that would mean the Northern Territories would be moving towards responsible government in their own spheres and the sort of government which could borrow and be able to lend money as re-invested capital from overseas, but the very fact that Southern Rhodesia were to secede would mean that in Southern Rhodesia the trend would be the opposite. We would be moving in the direction of South Africa. That would make the ability to borrow money for necessary expansion and industrial development more and more difficult. So, independently of any other consideration, we would begin in an economic recession, from which it is difficult to see a recovery. Until the economy of Southern Rhodesia is based on the whole population and not merely on the white population, the recession is going to continue and grow worse.

Q. In paragraph 8, referring to the Land Apportionment Act, you talk about a repeal. Is it desirable to repeal it in toto?

A. (DR. RANGER): It is the Territorial policy of the C.A.P. to repeal the Land Apportionment Act, but to take certain steps to ensure that there shall be no dislocation. I have here a report of the sub-committee which made the recommendations upon which our policy is based. As far as the rural areas are concerned, it is suggested that present occupiers and people entitled to holdings in the special native areas and purchase areas—the reserves, as you will appreciate, are not affected by the repeal of the Act—should have first option to purchase economic-sized farms in these areas for, say, five years at the current purchase price of ten shillings to one pound per morgen; and thereafter free sale of economic units would be permitted. In other words, for five years there is no possibility of an invasion from outside into those areas.

Secondly, the establishment of a Land Development Trust should be made to provide funds which would enable the purchase by the Trust of economic-sized holdings for resale or rental to approved farmers; for loans for farming development to approved farmers; initial financing of co-operative farming and market projects; and also the establishment of trust-owned co-operative farms designed to be self-supporting training schools and research stations. By advancing loans to approved farmers, qualified farmers who have not the capital to invest or to buy land, this would overcome the difficulty. We have also discussed in the party the possibility of imposing a tax on unused land that is privately owned. But I think it would be wiser to omit mention of that at present.

The government should have the right to declare that badly farmed land can be put out of cultivation for specified periods, in order to conserve and improve soil conditions. Land settlement and agriculture should be brought under Territorial Government control, under one department; and land agricultural officials will be responsible to that department. Those are some of the various ideas which the sub-committee thought would have to be introduced. That is just in brief. There is a set of similar things for the urban areas. It is suggested that present leaseholders in native village settlements will be given first option to purchase land in those areas for a period of five years at a reasonable price (say £10 per acre). Proceeds from the sale of such Crown land would be invested in the Land Development Trust, and after five years resale would be unrestricted. That would affect Highfields, for instance.

Local authorities would be declared responsible for establishing and financing sub-economic housing for members of all races, and present urban locations and native urban areas would be classified as sub-economic schemes. That would mean that the City Council would be responsible for the housing in those areas, and there could be no question of sale to speculative builders, and so on.

All persons paying rates, including water and electricity, in local authority areas would have the right to vote for local authority representatives. Areas outside the present local authority jurisdiction as, for example, native village settlements, would be administered by T.M.B's responsible to the Local Government and Housing Department—not to the Native Department.

Trading licences would be allocated by local authorities, and refusals to grant licences on grounds of race alone will not be permitted. Aggrieved applicants will have the right of appeal to the courts. There are other things also mentioned, such as the repeal of all pass laws, and some kind of attempt to make restrictive clauses in private leases impossible.

(MR. TODD): As with any party, there are differences of opinion; and in our party there are too. I would like to put one other point. In connection with the sub-economic housing schemes, a number of us feel that if the economics are right and wages are right there is no need for sub-economic housing in general, but it is so difficult to get things clearly in one's thoughts. One thinks against the present background. If we had a new background we should not need this provision.

(DR. RANGER): In the immediate future we want to repeal the Act—that is against the present background—it would be necessary to take these measures.

CHAIRMAN: On the constructive side, one has got in mind presumably the constitution and the requirement of trying to get the inhabitants you describe there as soon as may be into a position where they have responsible government. That is part of your policy. Are there changes of a fundamental nature in the division of functions between the Territories and the Federal centre which you suggest be made?

A. It is suggested there should be a re-distribution immediately from the Federal Government to the Territorial Governments of those areas which are politically sensitive. I have already mentioned agriculture. Another obvious one is education. Those are the two most important. In addition, the party suggests there should be various non-governmental corporations. Education, for example, is going to be controlled not by the Territorial Government but by an educational foundation or commission, and the same is true of health; but the control of these two would be removed from the Federal sphere.

Q. It would not then remain on the Territories without the creation of some commission—they would go Territorial anyway?

A. (MR. TODD): In paragraph 16 of the Federal evidence, at the beginning of our memorandum on constitutional issues, there is a general statement on the line we would take. We feel we have to find out what is acceptable to the people. This memorandum puts it strongly, and would go so far as to say—in paragraph 24—“The original conference which drafted the constitution under-rated the opposition and by creating a powerful central government augmented those fears. Had we been content with a demonstrably innocuous government then, it might have been possible to add to its powers now”.

Here, I may say in relation to this that the African members of the party have co-operated fully in preparing the evidence. The committees have been non-racial and representative of all races. I think that if there had been the power generally in the central government and if the central government had done the right thing and produced the conditions that we would have liked there would have been no difficulty in winning over the confidence of the African people. But we had a strong central government which became very unpopular, and things were made very difficult. Faced with this experience, we are, almost by force of circumstances, swinging to the other extreme and saying we must get down to the maximum which can be agreed as to satisfactory representation for the three territories.

It appears to me that if things reach the point when the Central Government no longer has any power at all, you may wreck the whole thing because it is quite innocuous; so I agree with the statement as it is put there. Whilst we feel that agriculture, education, health and so on might be taken from the Federal Government and either put to commissions or Territories, the important thing is to gain the confidence of the people. It is because of what has happened that we are now swinging away from the old line; this is to make it politically acceptable to a large extent. I think we would all say, in our party, that in principle the Central Government is too strong. There are some of us who would go even further than we would like, because we feel the position is now prejudiced, and we have to go even further than is perhaps desirable in order to get the confidence of the people. At that point, provided you do not sacrifice all your powers, you can then build up again, with the agreement of the people after they have had experience along certain lines.

Q. If, between 1953 and now, the Federal Government had established the confidence of the people you could have gone forward at once? You may find that if you do more than you think desirable you will be able to build up afterwards, when confidence is re-won?

A. Yes. I feel myself we should not go beyond a certain point where it is not viable. Then there would be sound arguments for not going forward with this sort of Federation, because it cannot deliver the goods.

Q. Have you any considerations in detail, apart from agriculture, and health and education, as to a transfer of functions?

A. (MR. PALMER): No, we have not gone into detail, but, of course, agriculture was Territorial in the old days, we imagine it would be merely a transfer of those functions back to the Territories. With regard to marketing, we appreciate it is quite essential that it should remain Federal, because it is obviously essential to co-ordinate all the products of the territory. As far as the productive side of agriculture is concerned, it means it should go back to the Territories and a non-racial system could be introduced, which cannot very well be done if agriculture remains Federal.

(DR. RANGER): The same is true of education. There is a barrier at the moment in the division between European and African education.

(MR. PEDDER): The difficulty is the question of timing. The longer the present deterioration is allowed to continue the more powers will have to be left. Our difficulty is to say exactly what power should be transferred at any one time, as against the background of what is going to come out of these recommendations. What may be valid for this month or this year may no longer be valid next month or next year.

Q. Have you considered to what irreducible minimum it should be broken down to?

A. (MR. TODD): Yes, we have a difference of opinion on the taxation side. If one is to reduce the size and affairs of the Federal Government then the finances of the Territories will be stronger. They will have more responsibilities; but whether they will collect the taxes and hand on their necessary quota to the Federal Government, or whether the Federal Government should continue to collect taxes, we are not sure. One cannot just visualise the set-up that will evolve. External affairs, defence, post and telegraphs, communications—those are so obviously Federal subjects that one could not take them away on any political argument. In general, we believe as a party that it would be reasonably determined by experts, as to which things cannot be efficiently looked after by the Territorial Governments.

Q. I suppose mainly economic things would be in the Federal sphere?

A. We are worried about that. This worries the Nyasaland people, with reason. They feel that an independent development corporation, set up by the Federal Government, is automatically manned by people largely from Southern Rhodesia, and while one must take into account the full economic facts, and one does not want to set up industries in Nyasaland just for the sake of doing that on a sub-economic basis, on the other hand it is very difficult if Nyasaland does not have a bigger say in things. For example, there was the possibility of setting up a cotton spinning mill, and there was a pretty strong claim for it to be set up in Southern Rhodesia. So many of us would have been concerned with the decision that it could well have come here; but there would have been strong arguments with us to how it would be set up in Nyasaland.

Q. What about the seat of government? Do you think it is possible to conceive moving the Federal capital from Salisbury?

A. There are many arguments in favour of that and if, for example, you were cutting down the responsibilities of the Federal government considerably, it could be done much more easily. If you were considering the removal of its present accommodation and civil service, and so on, it would be very difficult. We have to recognise that very deep prejudices have now been established, and we have to go a long way, even going as far as spending what may seem to be unnecessary money and going to perhaps unnecessary trouble in the eyes of some people. I think the removal of the capital should be considered.

(MR. BARON): The physical moving of the Federal capital at this stage would not have a tremendous effect. I do not know enough about feelings in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, but I believe the objection to the Federal Government is not that it is in Salisbury and decisions are taken so far away from Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia, but that the Federal Government, simply because of its proximity to the Southern Rhodesian Territorial Government, is regarded merely as an extension of it. That is just an impression one has, but I do not think that physically moving it would be important if, in fact, its functions were administratively limited so that the various territories had substantial autonomy in their domestic affairs.

Q. If you were making considerable changes in Federal power, I wonder whether it might not be psychologically good, removing suspicion of the domination of the south?

A. (MR. TODD): I think that six million people would say yes.

(MR. PEDDER): This comes under the heading of justice being seen to be done, I think.

SIR DONALD MACGILLIVRAY: Referring to paragraph 36 and the following paragraphs with regard to constitutional safeguards, you have proposed that legislation, both existing and intended, of certain natures should be outlawed by provisions in the constitution. You suggested there should be a commission of five persons, none of whom were citizens of the Federation or domiciled here, to be appointed by the Secretary of State. Is that commission to deal solely with applications for extension in time of discriminatory legislation?

A. (MR. TODD): You have probably heard of Mr. Hardwick Holderness. I was hoping he would be here this morning to give you his personal evidence, but nevertheless the Commission may be able to see him in London because he is going to be there. If it is possible for you to hear him, I would recommend that he be called for oral evidence.

(MR. JAFFEY): The object of the memorandum is to outlaw all future discriminatory legislation, and also to automatically invalidate the existing discriminatory legislation. Perhaps some of the existing legislation is advantageous to the country as a whole, and the idea is therefore that we should have some outside body, unconnected with the Federation, to decide whether it is, in fact, advantageous. The sort of thing we have in mind is the land laws. You cannot, without any qualification, abolish the Southern Rhodesia Land Apportionment Act; and it applies even more so in the Northern Territories. Difficulties might also arise about education.

Q. The Commission would not itself decide what is or what is not discriminatory?

A. That is a question of definition. It is not difficult to solve. Any legislation which makes reference to one section of the population as against another would come in the category.

Q. Certain legislation has to be discriminatory, and will always have to be so, because of different communities. The essential thing is to decide whether it is unfairly discriminatory and operates to the disadvantage of one community; it would be up to the commission to decide whether legislation was, in fact, operating unfairly or fairly.

A. Yes.

Q. You propose there should be no expropriation, save with just compensation. Who is to assess what is just compensation?

A. This applies to future legislation, over which this commission would not have any jurisdiction at all. This would be decided by a court of law of the Federation, and eventually by the Privy Council.

Q. In sub-paragraph (5) of paragraph 43 (Proposals), you say that the Federal Supreme Court would have jurisdiction to hear and decide any matter arising out of any contravention or alleged contravention of sub-paragraphs (1), (2) and (3). I take it that it would be the Federal Supreme Court which would decide whether legislation was or was not of a discriminatory nature and therefore should be barred, or not; and also that the Federal Supreme Court would decide whether there had been any contravention.

A. Quite, without appeal from the Federal Supreme Court to the Privy Council. That is in the next memorandum.

(MR. BARON): The intention was to suggest that the Federal Supreme Court should have jurisdiction in the first instance over matters of this kind, but it was not intended that the Privy Council should not have a right of appeal. My own view is that it is not going to be practicable for the Federal Supreme Court in the first place to have jurisdiction over all matters. I can visualise certain disputes, particularly on the criminal side, which would normally go first of all to the magistrate's court, where a defence might be raised on a constitutional issue. I think the machinery is going to be somewhat cumbersome. I do not think it is fully enough stated, but it is really a matter of mechanics only.

(MR. JAFFEY): This commission will have no jurisdiction over future legislation. That will be a matter for the courts.

PROFESSOR CREIGHTON: On the same point, connected with this Bill of Rights you have attempted to prevent discriminatory or prejudicial or confiscatory legislation, and your method of doing this is by a Bill of Rights with certain limitations on the sovereignty of Parliament entrenched in the Constitution; and these are to be enforced by the courts. You have abandoned all attempt to prevent such legislation—that is correct, is it not? You permit your Parliament unlimited rights, and then the individual or the afflicted person will seek redress against this, basing his appeal on the Bill of Rights. The courts, in due course, will declare it valid or invalid, according to the Bill of Rights: but you make no attempt to stop this legislation at the beginning by a special Federal institution—or a Territorial institution—which might hamper, delay or stop this legislation altogether.

A. (MR. TODD): We have experience of the African Affairs Board, if that was the sort of body you were thinking of.

Q. There might be other bodies.

A. If they were of the same nature, they would be just as unacceptable.

Q. But they might be different. Have you considered the possibility of a Senate or Upper Chamber?

A. We have considered it, but we have not found a great deal in its favour, under present circumstances anyway. For example, the Southern Rhodesian Prime Minister's idea at the moment of substitution of a Senate for the restrictions in the constitution, I think, would be quite unacceptable for the people, because they want to control the legislature—two or three Africans or two or three Asians in a body which can only delay, we do not really think is good enough.

Q. This is just a suggestion. Suppose you had a Constitutional Council or Council of State which would have to deal with some of these matters, and discriminatory legislation in particular; and suppose you put that to the authority of your Territorial Governors, do you not think this might be the more effective method of preventing the kind of legislation you have in mind?

A. If the Territorial Governors today set up any body of that kind, it would be quite unacceptable, because, for example, the Governor of Southern Rhodesia takes his instructions—not recommendations—from his Cabinet.

Q. You think that, in fact, the politics of the constituent territories of the Federation would prevent that being a really non-partisan body?

A. Yes, automatically.

Q. This would not be true of the two Northern Territories at present.

A. I am not so sure of that. Perhaps in Nyasaland it would be more acceptable. In Northern Rhodesia I do not quite know what power the government or the executive has over the Governor, or whether it has any power whatever. So you would want to be quite sure that the Governor's recommendation, as far as personnel was concerned, would be acceptable to the African people.

Q. You think the provision in the Statute ought to be at the personal discretion of the Governor and not, in fact, binding?

A. It would be no use in Southern Rhodesia, from my experience of Governors here.

(MR. JAFFEY): We think that to entrench rights in the constitution, and to leave it to the courts, is by far the best way because the Constitution will say "You cannot do something or other", and if Parliament tries to do it it is prohibited from doing it because the courts will prevent it.

Q. This is a relatively new kind of development in the Parliamentary system?

A. It is traditional in America, is it not?

Q. But not in the parliamentary system. You are relying on something, and this is putting a burden upon your Courts which they have not so far been called upon to bear.

A. It is quite a common situation with regard to the division of powers in the Federal sphere.

Q. Yes, indeed, but not in this other sphere. I wonder whether you would not strengthen your case by trying to devise some kind of body which would prevent or delay the kind of legislation which you have in mind.

A. (MR. TODD): I think there is something to that. If the governments were representative of the people, the suggestion for example that Commissioners and so on should be set up by the Secretary of State or whoever it might be, is by no means ideal. We look forward to the establishment of governments that will really represent the people at this point. If the governments represent the people, then their nominees to a Council of State would be acceptable to the people in general. The courts still are, I am glad to say, and so we turn to the one body which still stands in high estimation of the people.

(DR. RANGER): Such a body as is suggested would in itself be something of an innovation in the modern parliamentary system.

MR. JUSTICE BEADLE: Is not one of the weaknesses in your statement the possibility that an illegal law might remain in force for years and years before it was challenged. As an example, there was a bye-law in Bulawayo that Africans could not walk on the pavements, which was quite illegal. That was in force for nearly 30 years before someone took it before the courts, and then it was ruled that it was illegal and was set aside. Are you not afraid of that happening in your system.

A. (MR. JAFFEY): Yes, we are. But as far as your point is concerned, if there are in the constitution specific clauses which say that such and such a law is illegal, a law could not go on being a law of the land, because people did not realise it was illegal, I appreciate that it happened in the past, but it was a case of bye-laws ultra vires and not obvious to the public—not obviously illegal; whereas if it was in the constitution the idea of going to the courts would come very readily to the persons concerned.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: Is it not most undesirable that the courts should be involved in politics?

A. Most undesirable.

Q. Do you think the judges might be extremely unwilling to undertake this kind of task?

A. We hope it would not be a political task. If you define your prohibitory legislation in the constitution sufficiently closely, the court's duty would be simply to see whether a piece of the constitution is illegal or not. They would not have to go into whether it was desirable or not or fair or not: it would simply be their task to go into seeing whether it is valid. I agree it is not an easy thing, but one would try to make it as unpolitical as possible, and at least the judges would not have any political affiliations.

Q. But you do agree it must be guarded against. On a political point, I would like to know the real view of your party as to the practicability of maintaining Federation, and the form in which it should be maintained. In your printed document entitled "Principles and Federal Policy"—is that the present "Bible" in which one may find your party's principles? In other words, if someone wanted to join your party, would they look there to see what the intentions were?

A. (MR. TODD): Yes.

Q. There is no suggestion there that you are contemplating any substantial change, far from any break-up, in the set-up of the Federation. For instance, Section 2 says "The party will oppose any substantial increase in the constitutional status of the Federation . . ." There is no suggestion of any decrease. Therefore, if I was interested to join your party I would assume from this, on the face of it, you are not concerned with any substantial changes in the set-up.

A. (MR. TODD): In the first place I would ask you to take the four policies and to take them together. There are two of them in this particular folder. I think it would also be right to read the whole policy through and get the general distillate. For instance, the whole of those three paragraphs under (2) show we are really going right ahead on the present Federal set-up, but we also recognise that while we faced the situation as it actually stood, we realise that if the British Government is going to go ahead and consult with responsible governments in the Federation there are going to be wide changes. We have not endeavoured to foresee what they will be. In actual fact the evidence before your Commission is much more recent thinking of what may happen to the Federation as such; but it is true to say we would like to see the economic unit kept right, and in the same way to get the political situation to the point when people will feel it is their Federation—and it will in effect be their Federation.

Q. Although you have told us you are in favour of the transfer of these very important functions of agriculture, education and health, there is nothing about that in the pamphlet.

A. (DR. RANGER): If you look at the Territorial party booklet at the end of the evidence, which was adopted much more recently than the Federal policy, you will see under the heading "Constitutional Development" a similar statement to the one made this morning—"The party believes that an association of the two Rhodesias and Nyasaland can be of great economic benefit to each."

Q. I was referring to the Federal, of course. Looking at your present Federal memorandum, paragraph 19, you make a strong statement there: ". . . the implacable hostility of the African population to this Federation is all too apparent in the two protectorates. So great is this hostility and fear that the very word 'Federation' has acquired a potent emotional content and any scheme with this label would be rejected by Africans without further examination." That is a very difficult picture, is it not?

A. (MR. TODD): It is, but you must realise we have had an emergency and many other things happening in the last year, and this is an up-to-date statement in the light of recent happenings. What is actually meant by this Federation, I would like to make clear. One is more concerned there with the political situation than with the powers of the Federal Government on economic lines, and so on. This Federation, to the people of Nyasaland—and I have been speaking to some of them—is a Federation in which they have no adequate representation. When one says the peoples of Nyasaland, one is speaking of almost all the people there. They feel this Federation is not their Federation, but if it were they might want many of the same powers to be held by the central Government. Psychologically, no doubt you would have to change the word to "Association" or "Commonwealth". But in speaking to many African people in all three Territories about Federation one finds the objection is not the Federation—they are quite prepared to have it between Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia or between Nyasaland and Tanganyika—but they do not want a Federation, which they feel is one governed by a white government, the seat of which is in Salisbury; so it really comes down the colour bar and white domination. That is what we mean by this Federation.

Q. In paragraph 24 there is an even stronger statement: ". . . hostility to Federation cannot now be removed by any minor modifications or by merely adjustment of functions between the Federal and Territorial Governments. The entire Federal concept must be examined anew". That is rather a general statement.

A. I would myself take that out. I know what is meant by it, but not as actually put there. The entire Federal concept, of course, would mean the whole idea of a union of any kind between the three Territories. What is meant there is that the situation at the moment is so unacceptable to African people that you have to look at it from the point of view of who is going to vote, who is going to be at the constitutional conference, what rights there are going to be in the constitution, and so on—all of which could actually be fixed up without changing the Federal functions.

Q. In paragraph 45, you say that the broad Central Africa Party viewpoint may be summarised as a belief that the Federation in its present form cannot continue except by force of arms, and then only for a limited period.

A. Yes, that is our view. We think that under the present situation the Federation is held together at the moment by force of arms, and we were very much criticised a year ago when we were asked the direct question by a Nyasaland detainee here in Salisbury as to whether the Central Africa Party would be determined to maintain Federation somehow or other. This African elicited the answer that if it came to the point that if the only way to maintain Federation was by force of arms then it was quite impracticable and one would have to dissolve the Federation, because you could not foresee holding a Federation together year by year by force of arms.

Q. Assume therefore you are going to have some form of Federation, perhaps a looser form, everyone agrees that if we are going to maintain anything of that kind there must be economic co-operation; otherwise this whole thing will be disastrous. To what extent is it practicable to have an effective economic co-ordination without central political power?

A. There must be that. It is a case of defining how wide that power has to be, but taking a body such as the East Africa High Commission, for instance, it would not be satisfactory in Central Africa, in my opinion.

Q. Going back to paragraph 19 and the "implacable hostility", is not the real difficulty there? Could it not be said it is impossible to remove that merely by altering the label?

A. I quite agree. The last thing to be done, after you have made all the right changes, just as you hand the document over is to change the label. It is not the first or the important thing at all, psychological importance.

Q. But you have that in mind?

A. All the fears and prejudices, and so on, that have become associated with the word Federation would largely remain if the name remained.

Q. In such a concept of a Federation which was essentially economic, with some political control, you would regard a Federal Assembly as an essential part of it?

A. If you were going to have political power centralised, I would say there must be some Federal Assembly. There must be a coming together on the political field of the representatives of the three territories. The idea of the Central Africa Council we have had experience of, and it would not be at all useful from the point of view of launching the Kariba scheme, for example.

Q. Why did it not work?

A. I was not a member of the Central Africa Council, but the general feeling was that the representatives of three territories came together with all sorts of good ideas, but they had to go back and put those ideas to their parliaments. There was not enough cohesion among the people of the three Territories. There was the Colonial Office in the north and the Southern Rhodesian Government in the south: so they found it very difficult to get their plans implemented.

MR. ELLMAN-BROWN: I would like to go back to paragraph 2 of the Southern Rhodesia section which has already been touched on by the Chairman. It deals with the opinion in the party which is to form some sort of association. I would like to analyse that down a little. Mr. Todd has said he does not think for one moment the East African scheme of things is anything we should have here in building up an economic State.

A. If my understanding of it is right.

Q. Yes, I agree with that. You have two very important statements of this association, (1) that there should be equal representation of the three territories, and (2) that the franchise laws should be governed by the territories themselves. From a practical point of view, I think you will agree, that will be difficult for Southern Rhodesia to agree to under the present situation?

A. For the present Government of Southern Rhodesia.

Q. Would you agree that the economic strength of the Federation is fundamentally Southern Rhodesia and Northern Rhodesia?

A. At the present moment, as far as one can see for the future.

Q. Would you agree we should try to build on that economic strength and try to build on that politically as well?

A. I do not quite know what you mean by building politically.

Q. The point at issue is that there is difficulty in getting equal representation at the present time, there will be naturally opposition to it. The economic strength of the country is fundamentally Southern Rhodesia and Northern Rhodesia?

A. Yes.

Q. Would a strong economic union with political equality coming in for those two, with a possible looser federation of those other territories that form part of the Federation and might form part of the Federation in the future, be a possible solution to bring together the strong economic side and at the same time political cohesion?

A. I think economically you may be right in what you say, but I think politically that would be so unacceptable to Nyasaland that from the point of view of a stable government for the future and harmony would not get it across, but I see your point and I think there is strength in it, but I do not think it would be acceptable in Nyasaland.

Q. Provided that Nyasaland is financially supported by a subvention?

A. I would like to know first of all whether you visualize a very wide franchise in Northern Rhodesia which would actually almost immediately mean a majority of African voters?

Q. Political development of Northern Rhodesia must develop as time goes on?

A. No, I think as time goes on . . .

Q. Must develop as the country develops. I am just asking whether you just say an association here; you do not attempt to say what that association is. You admit that the East African Association is no good, you admit that the Central African Council is no good, but you say that economics must be kept together on the same political tie?

A. I think you have to come down to what would be agreed not by the present Governments nor by the 1960 Conference constituted as at present envisaged, but what is going to be acceptable to three lots of people, and there could be compromise on that. It might be that under certain circumstances, with all sorts of powers given to the Nyasaland Government and so on, and money guaranteed, that they might be prepared to accept for a minimum space of time a smaller representation in the Federal House. That I think would have to be by agreement, and I do not think that it would prejudice the future development of the Federation if they would not agree because if there was strong agreement between Northern Rhodesia and Southern Rhodesia they will have plenty of power to put forward their proposals.

MR. ELLMAN-BROWN: Thank you.

MR. MENZIES: I am still very confused about what the real proposal is on the constitutional side. It is in paragraph 24 of the Federal Memorandum, it is full of apparent contradictions from my point of view and some of them have been referred to by Sir Lionel Heald, but it speaks of an entire federal concept—"the entire federal concept must be examined now". That is the conception. We are speaking of the organic structure of the Federation, I take it there, because you have just said that no mere adjustment of functions will be sufficient. Then later on in the page, in the second last paragraph, "some kind of association between the three territories with only a fraction of its present powers". Surely you have either an organic entity, a unity called Federation, or whatever name it may be called, or you have a fresh start with a number of units which may themselves of their own free will agree to come together in some economic consortium. There surely is no middle course. Do you accept the federal system, a federal constitution with attenuated powers, a Government that will become in your own terms an innocuous Government, because that is what you postulate here, you indicate it might have been adopted at the beginning, an innocuous Government—that is one with very few powers? What is really the objective of the Party with regard to this structure of Government?

A. First of all, Sir, the objective of the Party is to get a new consultation between the peoples who ought to be representing the three Territories. We feel that under ordinary circumstances if three Territories had decided to come together as in 1952 or 1953 we decided they should, that the people who represented those Territories would have been able to have spoken for the inhabitants in general of the country, and we feel, because that did not happen for perhaps very good reasons—I am not arguing about whether or not the reasons are valid or not—but because it did not happen, because it was perhaps a conglomeration not an agreed federation that resulted, that we have to get right down to the beginnings again, if that is possible, and get agreement and build up. The Party feels that it should be a Federation, but you would not be able to call it that because of the psychological problem. We believe that some sort of federal system could still under certain circumstances be made acceptable to the bulk of the people of the Federation. We still believe that, but I may say we do not think that could be done just by bare political decisions. We think it could probably be put across with an economic plan to go with it. In other words, it would not just be a political matter but with the assistance of the British Government there could come a completely new deal in Central Africa. On the one side I may say education is of enormous importance as a rallying point, as a lever to get things accepted. On the other side, economic progress is of enormous importance, particularly to the European people of Southern Rhodesia. I think that in any new plan it might be possible to make it viable if it were wide enough to include economic considerations as well as political considerations or if the two balanced, came out in some way alongside each other. I do not think that even if we had some economic progress over the next few years and things were right here that we could actually generate enough wealth to provide educational facilities widely enough which we ought to have, and I think if the British people were concerned with the success of this Federation or similar Federation and feel that the establishment of a non-racial State in Central Africa is of real importance to the Commonwealth and to this country, and might be prepared to make up what is necessary to make sure that we could see that all the children of the territory are afforded a sound education over the next few years—you may think this is off the point, but I think it is tremendously on the point in that it could be a very strong lever towards getting reasonable proposals accepted and would overcome prejudice and unwillingness on the part particularly of African people. On the other side we have the Industrial Development Corporation with £1 million as capital. If it were known that we would be able to get something in the order of £5 or £10 million on loan per annum for the next few years, so that the people who are particularly concerned with economic development, and who hold political control of the Federation, were able to foresee real development within the Federation, I think also they might together with the guarantees in the Constitution of things such as that, they might be prepared to accept terms which on the face of it they would not accept at the present moment. So I think we go right back as far as the Party is concerned to a reconsideration and the expectation, knowing what we do about federal things and the necessity to keep the economic unity, the expectation of building up something which would have powers within the centre but with the handing back of as many powers as possible to the States. I think the picture is quite clear in our minds although perhaps not in the words we have here; there are different facets in different papers and it has not been brought forward as clearly as it might on one particular page.

Q. With all respect, that does not meet my particular difficulty that at some point of time you have to get away from your present structure if you are going to create something new, a new kind of association, and that is emphasised very clearly on page 22 of the memorandum, where it says: "Federation in its present form cannot continue except by force of arms, and then only for a limited period; that any close association of the three Territories, to be successful, must be based on the freely expressed wish of each component country to come together in a close union; and that only when each of the three Territories enjoys a Government which is truly representative of the significant interests of the inhabitants in that Territory, will it be possible accurately to determine that it is the 'free' wish of each Territory".

A. That is the point, is it not?

Q. That surely postulates a fresh start?

A. Yes.

Q. I think that is what you have been indicating, but to get a fresh start you have to get rid of what you have got. At what point of time do you get rid of your present federal institution with its legislative, executive and judicial functions?

A. No, Sir, I do not agree that we have to get rid of what we have got, to get a fresh start. I think that while we are making up our minds in consultation on what we want, the present situation must continue, in general it must continue. Therefore what we are wanting now really is to get your report or suggestions, possible suggestions, for the British Government on the economic side as to what it might be, a properly constituted conference, and it will not be the 1960 one, a properly constituted conference or convocation where the people can really state what they want, and it appears to some of us that what the 1960 Conference ought to do is find a way of extending the franchise within the Federation and then after the people are on the roll and they have had an election and they have brought back the Governments that the people want, that then we should discuss what the future of the Federation will be. There are many of us who feel that no 1960 Conference, even if it brings out some jolly good ideas, is going to meet the situation because it will be composed of the wrong people, and the prejudices are so great against those representatives of Government that any good suggestions are going to be cast aside unfortunately because of the unsatisfactory structure of the Conference or what seems to us is going to be an unsatisfactory structure of the Conference.

A. (DR. RANGER): It seems to me that the antithesis is the unreal conference. I agree it sounds logical but our emphasis is on the fact that no kind of association, whether you call it federation or otherwise, can really hope to succeed unless it has the overall assent of the people. We also say we do not feel this can be expressed satisfactorily until there are three responsible Governments. In the interim our suggestion is some kind of association should continue and certain necessary steps should be taken to make it more likely that when responsible Governments emerge the people will wish to continue in association. It is impossible for this Commission or anybody else to say that association shall continue and when these people get responsible Governments they shall not secede; it is virtually impossible. If you believe that this kind of association is necessary, what you have to do at this point is to say the intervening period between now and the emergence of responsible Governments we must take such steps as will reassure people by redistribution of functions, change of Southern Rhodesian way of life, building in a Bill of Rights and so on. Even this probably may not do it, and if this does not do it, nothing will. That seems to me to be the logical point of view.

Q. But you speak of some kind of association still which is something you are not prepared to accept at present, a federal structure with emasculated powers, with transfer of powers with improved franchise. You have some objections still to that?

A. Do we?

(MR. TODD): No, we have no objections to that in theory. But we say that just doing it tomorrow is not going to win the confidence of the people. We think we have to have the confidence of the people and then we would hope that the sort of thing you suggest would be what is decided upon.

(DR. RANGER): This quotation on page 9 says that hostility to Federation cannot be removed merely by adjustment of functions and that we believe hostility to Federation can only be removed by the whole apparatus seeming to show a different spirit, that is why we have suggested that Southern Rhodesia is relevant in an essential sort of way to what happens. We could make the adjustments of which we have been talking and still not remove the hostility unless there were general signs that the whole idea of the whole Federation was sincerely meant or more widely based. What it says in paragraph 24 of the Federal Memorandum is that: "Hostility to Federation cannot now be removed by any minor modifications or by merely adjustment of functions". There must be something else. We suggest a number of things in this paper, a Bill of Rights, repeal of discriminatory legislation and so forth, and if all that were done and meanwhile the territories were advancing to responsible Government, there is a chance that the association could survive.

(MR. BARON): My feeling about this exact nature of the structure is that it is not of fundamental importance in this interim period to which Dr. Ranger and others have referred. The problem, as I see it, in the Federation at the moment is that the attitude of Southern Rhodesia is the key to it. If the present attitudes of the peoples of the various territories continue, it does not seem that there can be any future for the Federation because where in the North you have the African people fearing domination by Southern Rhodesia, and here in Southern Rhodesia you have the electorate fearing the influence of Governments with African majorities, so long as that continues there is no meeting point; they cannot come together. I do not think there is any disagreement in general that in the long term the Africans in all the territories will be in the majority on the voters' roll. It is not a question of whether in Southern Rhodesia there will ultimately be a Government elected by an electorate, the majority of which is African. It is only a question of when and how that is going to take place. The policy of the Central Africa Party is designed to ensure that the transitional period is a smooth one, that we do not have upheavals such as are feared in the Congo and are said to be occurring in Ghana. I do not know how accurately one can take what one reads in the newspapers, but the impression that is given is that the Government of Ghana tends to excesses at the moment and that sort of thing. That is likely to happen in any country where you get a sudden handing over of powers. If the handing over of power, which I believe most people recognize as inevitable both in Southern Rhodesia as well as in the Northern Territories, were a smooth one, and it can be, that is clearly the ideal. The most important single factor in achieving that end is to write into the Constitution a franchise in Southern Rhodesia which will ensure that at some measurable point in the future—and it must not be too long from the point of view of African pressures—the Africans will be in the majority on the voters' roll in Southern Rhodesia. If that is not done now, then in just a few years the pressures are going to be so great that something more drastic still will have then to be done. If we had started five to seven years ago in doing what ought to have been done in this country then we would not be faced today with having to do today a little more than is strictly desirable, and the longer we delay the greater will be the extent we have to go beyond what is strictly desirable in order to achieve that smooth transitional period, and I believe very strongly indeed that the fundamental thing is to satisfy the African people in the three territories that ultimately they will be in the majority on the voters' roll. I believe not only will that probably be the only way of keeping Nyasaland within the Federation but it will also be the only way of preventing the conditions in Southern Rhodesia deteriorating very seriously within the next few years.

CHAIRMAN: Thank you very much.

MR. CHIRWA: I just wanted to find out from the Central Africa Party this: suppose the conference was held this year and there was no agreement among the delegations that might go from the three Territories, what was going to be the answer to that?

A. (MR. TODD): Who will be at the conference? Are you visualizing a conference of government representatives or the 1960 Conference as we visualize it.

Q. I presume that from the speech made by Mr. Macleod, I think it indicated that the conference would be representative not only of Members of Parliament and Legislative Councils but also of organizations which are not represented in those Legislatures.

A. I think my answer to that will be simply that at the conference which would be held in 1960 one could not break up or should not break up the Federation, that that conference would hardly have the authority which should be necessary to take any major step because it would still have behind it in its home countries Governments that were not elected by the people. In other words, we visualize the only sort of conference that would have real authority as being a conference being drawn from the three Territories after they have got a wide franchise and are able to express themselves through their own Governments.

Q. That may be so, that may be an ideal way of thinking, but in practical politics and in the general interests of the country in the matter of economic stability and development which is required would it not mean, according to your plan, if these people do disagree they would go back to the Territories and tell the people they stand by secession? You come back with the idea that the proposals of the British Government are unacceptable to us, therefore we stand by secession, but they say we must carry on for a period of three to five years and the Nyasaland people come back and say the same, Northern Rhodesia does the same, is it not possible then that you will be frightening the investors in these Territories during that period, you will be starving the countries of the very economic development you want to come forward?

(MR. PEDDER): It seems to me one cannot have a blanket answer to that. It would depend so much on what the disagreement were based upon, how far apart they were, what the attitudes were, but in general one would go through the period as we are going through now, it would be an extension of it and exacerbation of it. But the future will and must depend on the causes of that disagreement.

(MR. TODD): We have taken a fairly general line in our Party that the first step must be to get the Nyasaland Government and the Northern Rhodesia Government adequately represented, and we have felt on that point that after you get your three Governments, that these people should have at least three years' experience of self-government to get an idea of the feel of self-government and its responsibility before any conference was called. It would be given the powers and decide whether the Federation was really going to break up or not, and after all you are expected to do things in a practical way, but if you are going to break up Federation, which I hope will not happen, it will take a number of years to put that into effect. It could not be done by deciding one day and the next day the whole thing broken up; it will take some years to break it up.

Q. My next question is on the question of the appointment of the Supreme Court, appointment of Judges; that appears under Proposals, paragraph 43, sub-paragraph 6(c). The suggestion made there would appear to me to be a departure from existing practice in Southern Rhodesia. I think you are suggesting that these people who will be appointed should have the recommendation of existing Justices. I suppose these would be represented to the Minister in charge of Law and Justice and he will appoint them from the panel; is that what you had in mind?

A. Yes.

Q. Is that not a departure from the present practice whereby the Minister in Southern Rhodesia can just appoint, you are suggesting a departure from the present position whereby Southern Rhodesia says that appointments are dependent on the political influence?

A. It is a Federal matter.

(MR. JAFFEY): We recommended a departure, the purpose is to make quite sure there can be no possibility of political appointment to the Bench whose functions will be to safeguard basic rights.

Q. That is a criticism of the present?

A. No, not criticism of anything that has happened, but it is a safeguard which we feel is necessary considering what has happened in other countries and what could possibly happen, although there is no evidence that it has ever happened.

MR. MENZIES: On that very point, what happens on the death of a Chief Justice under that proposal?

A. (MR. PEDDER): Other Justices are there.

Q. But the appointment is to be made by the Chief Justice?

A. No, it is one of a panel of candidates recommended by the Chief Justice and existing Justices.

Q. A panel of who—outside people?

A. No.

(MR. JAFFEY): The idea is that the Judges will nominate a group of candidates, one amongst whom the person responsible will appoint the Judge.

Q. Recommended by the Chief Justice, a panel of candidates, and you have no Chief Justice?

SIR LIONEL HEALD: A panel of candidates.

A. (MR. TODD): An existing panel that will always be there.

Q. A permanent panel?

A. Yes.

(MR. BARON): It is possible also in that context to interpret "and" as "and/or".

Q. I thought the panel of candidates would only appoint when you had particular vacancies.

MR. CHIRWA: My next question is under Section V of the Territorial Memorandum, sub-paragraph (11) referring to the Beadle Commission. You say: "We do not wish to say more on this point except to recommend that the Commission asks to see the evidence given before the Beadle Tribunal and in particular the evidence led by the defence team on the general charge which will, we believe, support our contentions".

A. (DR. RANGER): I was responsible for the writing of this section, the Southern Rhodesian emergency. It is difficult to justify having written about it at such length since Southern Rhodesian internal concerns cannot directly be the business of this Commission, but as Mr. Baron has already said, the Central Africa Party feels strongly that the structure of society and attitudes of individuals in Southern Rhodesia have been the greatest single obstacle to the federal unity. It was on that basis and also as an open attack upon Sir Edgar Whitehead that this evidence was submitted. It may well be that the Commission does not feel it necessary to investigate this background. The suggestion here was intended to suggest how it could be investigated if they so wished.

Q. A suggestion with which you do not agree?

A. That suggestion is entirely agreed. I do not think that the Beadle Tribunal Report was adequate or correct or justified on the grounds of the evidence in so far as I know it presented to it, but I do not wish to say anything more than that.

Q. You are drawing our attention to this, which is important, and I thought we should perhaps get some more points.

CHAIRMAN: I hope that some members of the Commission will feel we have plenty on our plate without having a re-examination of that.

MR. CHIRWA: You refer to the 1960 Conference representation in the delegations, but I do not think you put forward suggestions as to how those delegations should be composed?

A. (MR. TODD): No, we have not put forward definite suggestions on that. It is going to be very difficult, I quite admit, to get a satisfactory delegation. We would think that acting in the best interests of the Federation the 1960 Conference should really concern itself with one thing, and that is the fact that the Governments do not adequately represent the people and how to get that fixed up, because that is the starting point of the new future for the Federation. We believe that if they were prepared to do that they could very easily take over to London or have here people representing all political Parties. By all political Parties I mean, of course, the ones that are not represented in the House but which are obviously getting a following amongst the people, to determine what would be reasonable and acceptable franchise conditions acceptable to the majority of the people. I know that practically there are such difficulties in seeing this being done and we wonder whether it can be done, but we recognize that unless something like this happens not very much else is going to be successful anyway, and we would like to see that Conference find ways in which people would be able to elect Government which would represent them and then, and only then, should there be a constitutional review conference.

(MR. PALMER): We think it singularly unfortunate that the conference is to be held before the amended Constitution for Nyasaland is implemented. It does seem to militate against the successful outcome of this conference if you think that the representatives from Nyasaland will be more or less Colonial Office delegates and you have not got a proper constitution and representative government which can give its own views to this conference. It would seem to me that it would be far better if the conference had been postponed for the ten years of the Review instead of seven. Then I think it would have given an opportunity for the Northern Territories to get themselves on a better basis regarding representation so that they could have given more adequate views at this conference.

SIR DONALD MACGILLIVRAY: You have said the 1960 Conference should concern itself entirely with the question as to how the three territories should have adequately representative Governments, and you also said that those adequately representative Governments, if they came into being, should have at least three years of responsible Government before they could be asked to express their views on the final form. Can it be inferred from that, then, that Federation should remain in its present form until the final conference is held at least three years or more, it would be, after the 1960 Conference?

A. (MR. TODD): It would not remain in its present form if we are going to get Governments which adequately represent the people. That immediately to the African people would mean a change in the form of Federation as they think of it, because they think of Federation as a Federation which is governed by the European people of Central Africa. If that change was made, it would be perhaps in some ways the most significant change that could be made, so no longer would it be a Federation in its present form.

Q. The constitutional form of Federal Government would remain for three or four years as it is without any change?

A. Yes, that would have to be.

Q. Because the constitutional Conference of 1960 would deal only with the Territorial Governments' Constitution.

A. If it is accepted that Territorial Governments be allowed to have their own franchises, but, of course, if it was decided that they are still to have a Federal franchise and that was used to bring enough people on to the Federal rolls, if that was the decision it would be another matter. But at the present moment we are going to a conference when Nyasaland has no adequate Constitution, the people will not feel that they are represented satisfactorily from Nyasaland; the Northern Rhodesia Constitution is not acceptable, to the bulk of the African people in Northern Rhodesia, and when it is suggested that changes be made, the reason for not making changes is that changes were made only a year ago. It does not matter if they were made only last month. If they are not satisfactory they ought to be looked at again, in our estimation, and in Southern Rhodesia, whatever people may have tried to do to widen the franchise has been unsuccessful to a large degree, and that has been very deliberately done by Government policy so that the people are blocked from sending representatives that they would like to have at the 1960 Conference.

Q. I appreciate that, but if the 1960 Conference dealt only with the form of Territorial Governments, then your Federal form of government must remain for three years or the African Affairs Board would remain as it is for three or four years more.

A. Yes.

(MR. PEDDER): That would be an unfortunate outcome of this.

(MR. TODD): I do not know, there is again a difference of opinion. If they were able to change the franchise so that within a year we went to an election with an adequate number of people of the country on the voters' roll, that would be a pretty big bite to take in the first twelve months, and I think it would be a very satisfactory situation from the point of view of the general feeling in the Federation amongst the majority of the people.

MR. MOLSON: May I follow up Sir Donald MacGillivray's question by another one. If I understand Mr. Garfield Todd's answer correctly, it is that he is proposing that as a result of the forthcoming review, the Federal Constitution should for the time being remain virtually as it is at the present time and that the two Northern Territories should obtain more or less democratic Legislatures?

A. Yes, and Southern Rhodesia, too.

Q. In view of the rising pressure of African agitation against Federation during the last seven years, would not the first action of those two democratic Northern Legislatures be to vote themselves straight out of the Federation?

A. I do not suggest that they should be given complete self-government and I am not a constitutional lawyer. I do not know how they could vote themselves out of the Federation if they were given self-government within the Federal set-up at the moment. That would be the degree of self-government they would be given.

Q. It might not be constitutionally possible, but it would be an extremely explosive state of affairs where you left the Federation as it is at the present time, where it has been the chief object of attack from African politicians for the last seven years, and without making any change in the Federal Constitution you gave them the power to express very strong views, at any rate in the two Legislatures. I should have thought that was almost a constitutional device for creating a new kind of atomic bomb.

A. I have not made myself clear, apparently. I visualize the conference meeting, and I do not know how this would give such pressures brought to bear on the Government here that it would immediately open the rolls to a wide number of people, and that elections should be held within twelve months and that immediately after that the conference be held—in other words, that the real conference be delayed.

Q. I heard you say that they should have three years of working under the old system?

A. Yes, but I think I can make that clear. There is no confusion in my own mind; there is in my speech apparently. It is this, that this conference is being called to adjust the Constitution and so on, to make adjustments and recommendations and so on. At least, not to make adjustments but to make recommendations I suppose. I suggest that this conference be delayed a year or two, as Mr. Palmer suggested, and that in the meantime the people be given the opportunity of electing their representative Governments. Then they go to that particular conference, but I made it quite clear, I thought earlier, that that conference was called for a specific purpose, and that it would not be able to exceed the purposes for which it was called, and that the conference on whether Federation should be maintained at all or whether it should be broken up should not be allowed to take place until three years after the people had their own Governments within the territories.

Q. Politically and economically, Central Africa is going to be left in a state of doubt for quite a long time under this proposal?

A. Yes, I know that.

(MR. PALMER): On the other hand, if the conference proves abortive in 1961, the political and economic situation in the Federation is going to be infinitely worse. At the present time you have complete opposition to Federation in the Northern Territories and Southern Rhodesian leaders of the Government have expressed certain terms in which they are going into the conference from which they will not depart. That means to say the conference is going to start off in a most incredible atmosphere of hostility. You have one side completely opposed to Federation at all, and the other side saying they will only continue Federation under certain conditions, which means more or less the status quo. If you are starting a conference on those lines, it is doomed to failure, and I cannot see anything successful coming out of it. Therefore it is far better to postpone the conference for three years to give Africans in the North better representation and to give them the changes, that they are really responsible for their own Government, then you will find that the atmosphere at this conference will be vastly different and you may get something out of it which is going to be of benefit to everybody. But if we go into the conference of 1961 in the atmosphere in which it has been mooted today, then I fear that the thing is doomed to failure.

MR. CHIRWA: Taking into account the views expressed by Sir Edgar Whitehead, the conditions under which we would remain in the Federation, are you going to be prepared to accept the waiting period, knowing that what you are actually doing by giving the people a greater share of representation is exactly what he does not want himself?

A. (MR. TODD): If those terms were the final word of the electorate of Southern Rhodesia, then, of course, there is not any hope for continuing Federation, but we can only hope that they were spoken for some particular purpose and not really to express the deep beliefs of the electorate. I do not know why they were spoken. But since then, of course, the South African situation has so deteriorated that I am more hopeful that many of the people who would have looked for some sort of agreement, if not union with the Union of South Africa, will not feel that it is now worth while looking there for the strength they might have got, and I think the situation has changed to that extent. I do not, for example, foresee the Union of South Africa being prepared to accept us into a union with themselves. Nor do I foresee that the world, thinking as it does, would allow us to have a referendum of 50,000 whites and 2,000 Africans in Southern Rhodesia and just decide that we were going to take 2½ million people, most of whom are African, who would be most unwilling to go into the Union of South Africa. I should have foreseen—and it was very apparent in recent months—that the Chirwa Government wanted a white-dominated Government, this body would have been very glad to give the economic assistance we needed, and so we could continue in Southern Rhodesia as a viable State with a white-dominated State.

(DR. RANGER): I cannot really believe the Party occupies the contradictory position we now seem to be in. We have said in our evidence we want a Bill of Rights, different federal franchise and so forth, and as I understand it we want those things in the interim period as soon as possible in order that the Governments of the North may choose the new continued association. It seems it is impossible to restrict any kind of improvement to the territory concerned. The changes our Party suggested at federal level must be introduced. I am sure this is not a real disagreement with my leader.

(MR. TODD): It is just a case of which is the interim period. As far as I am concerned I would hate that this particular pattern, which I do not think can be successful, could have been postponed until, say, for a year until we got the right representatives at that conference. On that point they would make the changes we all want to see changed. At a further point ahead, after self-government has been afforded them, they could then make final decisions.

(MR. JAFFEY): We would like this conference to be postponed but it probably will take place next year. In that case we want, as Mr. Todd has said, a very important aspect of it to be the discussion of representation. But also we would like the changes that we have recommended in the interim period before final conference which because of the change could be a more harmonious and agreed solution rather than would be more likely if the Bill of Rights were left in and other changes we mentioned were made.

CHAIRMAN: I think we understand the points of view that have been put to us from different quarters.

MR. MOLSON: It was about these constitutional safeguards that I did want Mr. Jaffey to clear my mind. In paragraph 43 it is said that there should be a Bill of Rights. I gather that normally that is to be interpreted by the courts, and any Act which in fact infringes those would be declared ultra vires by the courts, and the Commission which is to be appointed by the two Secretaries of State is to deal only, as I understand it, with the temporary survival of existing legislation which in fact does violate those principles?

A. Yes.

Q. As Sir Donald MacGillivray pointed out, discrimination as such is not necessarily a bad thing. It is only unfair discrimination which is a bad thing.

A. Yes.

Q. As I think Sir Lionel Heald pointed out, the courts are not well adapted and are certainly most reluctant to give decisions on anything that does involve a matter of opinion of what is fair and unfair. They prefer to keep to something which is a justifiable dispute. Do you not think it would be wiser to give the whole of this question of unfair discrimination to a non-judiciary body to decide rather than to the courts? Do you not think there is a danger of involving the courts in political controversy and have you given thought to the Council of State in the Kenya Constitution which is empowered to deal with these matters and does not consist of Judges, and certainly does not refer to the courts?

A. I would like to answer it this way. The reason why we suggested the Commission should consider existing legislature and not Judges is the question of the fairness and unfairness which arises, but we cannot really imagine any future racial discrimination that could be fair.

Q. This does not only deal with the racial thing. It might be a matter of taxation. It is extremely difficult to know whether a measure of taxation is in fact discriminatory or not.

A. The proposal under paragraph 43, sub-paragraph 1(a) deals with discrimination. Any enactment which imposes on a person of one racial group any disability which does not apply equally to persons of another racial group, that is racial discrimination. The other paragraphs are what are commonly regarded as being fundamental rights.

Q. You are not then covering a case where they might be very unfair discrimination which would be based on taxation?

A. Without regard to race?

Q. It might have that effect. It is extremely easy, I am sure the Central Africa Party will agree, to see that the criterion of income, for example, laid down in the franchise, although purporting to be a financial qualification, does operate in a racial manner?

A. (MR. TODD): The present situation of two wage scales, that is quite true.

(MR. BARON): The point really is this. The Commission is designed to interpret, or should we say to give its opinion, on the fairness or otherwise of existing legislation. The future legislation is put before the courts rather than before the Commission because it is for the legislature to say what the provisions of any particular piece of legislation should be, and it is not then for the Justices of the Courts to say whether it is fair or otherwise. That is a matter for the draughtsmen. Once the draughtsman has set down what the particular Act in question is to provide, then it is for the Court to say whether there has been an infringement of that Act, and it is for the Court to say whether that contravenes the Constitution as a matter of law without passing any opinion whether that is fair or unfair. That is the distinction between the functions of the Commission and of the judiciary subsequently. So it will not have the effect of asking the Courts to offer an opinion as to what is fair or unfair. It is only a question of the Court interpreting what the Legislature has said.

Q. In that case you have no fear that at some time in the future it might be desirable to pass discriminatory legislation and that it really would be to everybody's advantage to do so, and under this, as I understand, it would be impossible for the Legislature to do so?

A. (MR. JAFFEY): These rules of the Constitution could be amended, we have a very restricted means of amendment, it will have to be approved by two-thirds of the Legislature of each of the territories and also would have to be approved by the United Kingdom Government. If any discrimination was obviously to everybody's advantage, it would take place. The fact is that the Constitution would have to be drawn by experienced constitutional experts to try and cover every possible aspect. This is our picture of the sort of thing which has to be done. There may still be omission in it. I think it gives the picture of what we try to do and evils we are trying to avoid.

(MR. BARON): Taking the point it might be desirable in the future to pass legislation which is in fact discriminatory, we recognize for a certain period it may be necessary to discriminate for the benefit of certain sections of the community. Our aim is to arrive at a community where no discrimination of any kind can have any justification, so these measures to deal with discrimination are only interim measures.

MR. JUSTICE BEADLE: What about provision in the Income Tax Act where wives of a polygamous marriage, according to Native custom, should be entitled to the same rate as a wife married by Christian custom? That would be a discriminatory measure strongly in favour of the African. Would you say that would be undesirable?

A. (MR. JAFFEY): I cannot answer that question. I just repeat that we do not regard this as a final document, and people more competent than us have to consider all these points. We would say it is a practical possibility to have something like this in the Constitution.

(MR. TODD): Maybe doing away with discrimination to the point that Europeans could be included in those that had polygamous marriages!

MR. TAYLOR: In paragraph 6 of the Southern Rhodesian section of this memorandum, towards the bottom:—

"Today we have the situation where two and a half million Africans are asked to reside in an equivalent area to 200,000 Europeans, of whom only approximately 8,000 are land-owners".

Does that not ignore the fact that a large number of Africans reside in the European areas in employment in industries; something upward of about one million Africans, I suppose, reside outside the reserves or the land which has been apportioned to them? Does not that give a slant to what is in point of fact happening?

A. (MR. PALMER): From the point of view of the Land Apportionment Act, the African is only allowed in the European areas for the benefit of the European, and the European is only allowed in the African area for the benefit of the African. The whole question of land ownership is one which a large proportion of the Africans obviously are living in a very limited area, but even if there are Africans in the European areas, which I very much doubt, they are people who are not permanent residents. They are almost constantly going back to their own homes and residing there.

(MR. TODD): Three hundred thousand are aliens, of course.

Q. You have got to the point where it looks like standing room only in Native areas, but a large number of them reside outside and even though they move around and do not stay permanently at any one point, nevertheless at any one time there are those numbers residing outside the Native areas.

A. (DR. RANGER): That is completely so, and this is perhaps loosely worded. You could make this point vis-a-vis the Europeans as well. When our Right Wing politicians talk about giving Europeans certain rights, it is very few Europeans who actually hold land in the rural areas. The other Europeans may well be having to pay more for their food, as compared with others. Africans who reside in the European area have at the moment no permanent rights there. Land Apportionment provides an area in which they have permanent rights, which is only the area covered by the Land Apportionment Act, and this Act makes it more difficult for the Africans Mr. Taylor mentions to reside in towns. There is not the degree of overcrowding in rural areas which this would suggest on the face of it, but Mr. Taylor would no doubt agree that there is a great deal of overcrowding: the Land Husbandry units are not in themselves economic, and also a large proportion of them are occupied by squatters from tribal areas and cannot be allocated to Native farmers. That is really a problem.

MR. ELLMAN-BROWN: Have you studied the position in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland on that very point?

A. No.

MR. TAYLOR: Going back to the Bill of Rights, in paragraph 43, paragraph (b), of the Federal evidence, which provides that no laws shall place any disability in the way of a man wishing to remove his property from the Federation if he no longer wishes to live in it—how is "property" defined there? Does it include money, for example?

A. (MR. JAFFEY): I should imagine it would include money.

Q. And would you concede the necessity for seeking a guarantee from some other power to make sure that the money was freely transferable across the exchanges, because the situation which might require the people to leave the territory and take their property with them might well be the result of such mismanagement of public affairs that the foreign exchanges of the country they wished to leave were bare, and although in point of fact they had a suitcase full of Rhodesian pound notes, they could not be transferred or exchanged into any other currency.

A. (MR. TODD): The law cannot entirely cover an economic situation; it can only go so far as to say that the money is there and that it is able to be transferred; but so far as the country is concerned, they will not attempt to stop it being transferred.

Q. And as you cannot take land with you, or a house, but only money's worth, would you agree that in such a position a Bill of Rights would be worthless?

A. (MR. JAFFEY): We naturally hope and believe this situation will not arise, but if there is a possibility of it doing so, we would try to put in the Constitution what can be done legally to prevent it. The purpose of this Bill of Rights is to give, say, the European population confidence in the future, so that it would prevent such a situation arising.

(MR. PEDDER): Surely no Government, good or bad, can provide for mismanagement in its affairs. It is a situation you could not cover by constitutional means within one country.

Q. They thought that was what the Bill of Rights would secure because the justification for it appears to be that the European minority—things could be made so unpleasant for them that they would want to get out.

A. (MR. TODD): The law can only go a certain distance, but we would want to see it going as far as it can in order to ensure fairness.

Q. In only wanted to make the point that the value of these Bill of Rights concepts in any circumstances have very limited application.

A. On the economic side, you have chosen the point that is very important, and I think you are right: but from the point of view of freedom of speech and movement, it is difficult.

(MR. PEDDER): Even so, the economic instance given is a very extreme one.

Q. You may have a circumstance in which, for example, there is an exchange control regulation in force for perfectly normal and reasonable reasons. We have all been through an era when exchange control regulations have been in force, and we might be again. For instance, emigrants wishing to leave the United Kingdom after the war and go to Canada could not take their whole possessions with them. They were allowed to take £5,000 with them, and thereafter receive remittances up to a total of £5,000. That law was imposed for quite valid reasons, but it would be a disability in the case of anyone leaving the Federation and wishing to take his possessions with him.

A. (MR. BARON): The circumstances put forward do not suggest that the property would have to remain in the country permanently. It would be a question of the possessions remaining temporarily while the exchange control regulations existed. There could be no justification for this as a permanent measure: that is what we are saying.

MR. GONDWE: In paragraph 67 of the Federal memorandum under heading B. Information. You say you would like to see dissemination of factual information without any political reasoning being given or being attached to the information given to the public. Do you not think such dissemination may be not quite satisfactory as far as the public is concerned, and that something on which these facts are based ought to be gone into so that people have a fuller knowledge of what these facts are based on?

A. (MR. PEDDER): Quite clearly that is so, but also clearly that is the function of the political Party. The political justification for a measure is surely the responsibility of the political Parties, and not a Government responsibility. We had in mind various so-called fact papers which were produced. A current advertisement, for instance, in the African Press urges people to join the voters' roll and finishes up with what is nothing more than a political slogan about Federation. We think that Government funds should not be spent on promoting what is after all a political concept.

Q. Going to paragraph 70, you say at the top there that the Constitution should be amended to prevent either deportation or extradition being effected on the grounds of race alone. Is that the case at present?

A. In some cases.

Q. I would have thought it was not based on race alone. We have experienced cases where, say, Europeans have been deported from this Territory or from the Federation, as well as Africans.

A. But we say that deportations should not be possible on grounds of race alone. We do not say that has not happened. Mr. Travers can give us a case in point, of the gentleman from South Africa who wished to start a factory. He was not allowed to because he was in the class of undesirable or prohibited immigrants.

(MR. TRAVERS): I am conversant with the case. This gentleman applied for a resident's permit in Southern Rhodesia, and he brought with him capital of £5,000. He wanted to stay here and build a shoe factory. He was refused a resident's permit because he was a Coloured person. As such, according to the Constitution of this country, all non-Europeans outside this country are undesirables. Therefore this gentleman could not start his factory and went back to South Africa. I believe that if he had been a European this would not have happened.

Q. I quite agree with you, but do you not think this should come under immigration and not deportation?

A. (MR. PEDDER): Quite possibly, yes.

Q. Then in paragraph 74, under Race Affairs—to what extent is this Office of Race Affairs failing to meet the need of the Federation?

A. I should say in every respect. It is a body which has no power but is purely advisory. One of the chief contentions is that it tends to remove the burden upon each one of us for the improvement of race affairs to that body. We tend to say, "Yes, we have an Office of Race Affairs: this body can look after that", whereas in fact it has no teeth. So we shrug off our responsibilities in that respect, and the body itself has no power.

Q. The body should have power, because it is a Government body.

A. But the body itself is specifically deprived of power, intentionally.

MR. CHIRWA: Would it be a fair comment to say that can be verified by the fact that the Under-Secretary is in an African township. He is the man in charge of it, but he cannot find his way to build a house.

A. The speed at which individual Ministers' houses are built are merely symptomatic of the general political plan in the country.

MR. GONDWE: On education, Dr. Ranger suggested that it should not be based on racial grounds and that it should neither be Federal nor Territorial but that a certain statutory body or commission should be set up. Is that correct?

A. (DR. RANGER): Yes, but I would rather not attempt to explain it because I am in no sense an expert on the educational policy of the Party. It merely occurred to me while I was talking about the transfer of education that in fact we were not suggesting it should be transferred to the Territories just like that, but our policy contains a suggestion that there should be an educational commission. I cannot tell you how that commission would work.

Q. But you are aware that this would be well nigh impossible? I think Africans would not accept that education should be placed under a commission. The difficulty would be that this commission would have to come under one Government. Every function such as education must be either federal or territorial in the final resort.

A. We see this as a combined thing and not entirely under one or the other; and we see it on the financial aspect having access probably to the federal sphere—almost certainly to the federal sphere—and not necessarily administratively responsible to the Territorial Government.

Q. My point is that the commission must have funds at its disposal to run this service, and the funds must be supplied to it by a Government.

A. (MR. TODD): Not exclusively by a Government. We were hoping that in the formative stages of our Governments here a commission of that kind should be able to raise funds from foundations. Central African Airways, in another context, is an example of that sort of thing. It does not only raise its money from one source.

MR. ELLMAN-BROWN: Which Government would debate the expenditure in the House?

A. We had in mind it would be the Federal Government.

MR. ROBINSON: Under V. Southern Rhodesian Emergency, Sub-section (11) of your Territorial document, you talk about the emergency providing an example of the sacrifice of Southern Rhodesia's real interests. You say that Southern Rhodesia need not have sent troops to Nyasaland. I suppose that is a typographical error: it was really the Federal Government which sent troops to Nyasaland, and in fact is not the position that Federal troops were sent there at the request of the Nyasaland Government?

A. From Southern Rhodesia, but they are not Southern Rhodesian troops. That is correct.

Q. Mr. Todd has explained to us that the policy of his Party in broad outline is based on the doctrine of consent, and he has really set up these proposals which seek to bring a large number of people into that field. But according to the franchise proposal as made here, one would imagine that in Southern Rhodesia for at least ten to fifteen years there is a likelihood of a continuing majority of Europeans in the Legislature, if you take literacy to mean something like Standard VI; and that possibly for some time to come in Northern Rhodesia you might well have a majority of European members in this responsible Government that you talk of. What would be your Party's view if, in that event, nationalist leaders rejected the pace of your proposals and demanded that there should be immediately nationalist-dominated Governments; and let us assume that you were asking for, but it was not rejected out of hand in Nyasaland, and possibly in Northern Rhodesia, by Right Wing nationalist movements, and in Southern Rhodesia by a group of Africans who said they were not prepared to wait? So you would have a new situation arising in which these proposals were intolerable. Would your Party then acquiesce to the demands of the new nationalist proposals forthwith, or seek to enforce by some means the new arrangements which you have proposed and which have been accepted by the Government?

A. Mr. Robinson has put forward a certain picture of a definitely stated situation. We believe that if the franchise was reasonably extended at the present moment—and that means fairly quickly, because the African attitude particularly is deteriorating on this—that the people returned to the House would be acceptable in general to the bulk of the population, even though—taking Southern Rhodesia—there was nothing like a universal franchise. Therefore you could not say that all the adults, or even a majority of adults, in Southern Rhodesia have had a say. I think it is true that in 1954, 1955 and perhaps 1956, even with the limited franchise which is nothing like enough, the Government had the consent of the people. However, you missed out one point—there would be a strong white nationalist concern and antagonism as well as a strong black nationalist concern and antagonism; and the Government, provided it has a fairly wide support from the people, must maintain law and order and it must not give in to either extreme but continue as rapidly as possible to achieve the circumstances in which eventually there will be a universal franchise.

Q. So you would say this as far as you would go in implementing the doctrine of consent for the foreseeable future, that if all the things outlined under charges against Congress Members (V. Southern Rhodesian Emergency, Sub-section (11)), shall I say, arrived in two or three years from now, after the acceptance of your broad outline of proposals, then do you feel you would be obliged to protect the majority of the community against this?

A. Yes, we would; but we would give our assurances that where we imprisoned people we would have them brought to trial in public. Where justice is seen to be done and the Government has the backing of the people in general, then the situation is acceptable.

Q. I would like Mr. Todd to comment on whether he still holds the view that the ultimate aim is the unitary State. Some years ago he expressed an opinion on those lines, saying he felt it was his duty to try and work the Southern Rhodesia Government out of office and out of its functions. I understand the reason why he has changed his views: the circumstances have changed. But let us assume you have now got your state of affairs here as you envisage it, with African majorities in the three Territories. Would you then work towards the creation of a unitary State?

A. I hold that a unitary State would have been simple and efficient and economical, but I had to change my mind completely under the present circumstances. I am not sure that I can foresee now the desirability of changing back again from the Federal set-up. On the other hand, if we should ever move towards the unitary State, it will be in the day when the people are fully represented in their Governments, and if such a movement came along it would be with the consent of the majority of people; so it would be safe at that time. I was, of course, a very strong supporter of one Government, but I have changed and I just cannot see it at the moment. I do not see it is viable to be a unitary State, but I still say it would be more simple, more efficient and more economical.

MR. CRAWLEY: To go back to your franchise proposal for Southern Rhodesia—literacy. We have had some evidence that a high proportion of this population is under thirty and it is that proportion which would mainly qualify for your literacy qualifications. Would not your proposal mean that a very large number of people, particularly Africans, who have a stake in the country but who are not literate and yet hold responsible jobs, would be left out of it?

A. MR. PEDDER: Quite clearly, yes, but we are more concerned at this stage that the Government should be representative of the people as a whole. We believe that by bringing these people onto the franchise now the effect would be that the majority of Members of Parliament would need the support of members of all the racial groups to be elected. We believe that is very much in line with a multi-racial or non-racial society, and whilst the percentage is anywhere from 30% to 70% racial, that must obtain. At the same time we argue that to lower the franchise below literacy is dangerous and inadvisable, because there are not means to disseminate adequately a knowledge of affairs of Government in languages other than English—there are not the facilities for people who were not literate in English to generally appreciate the problems and needs of Government. There is an attendant risk that such people could be the prey of irresponsible agitators, without a wide spread of factual information.

(MR. TODD): You have put your finger on the weakness. There are many sound Africans who will not be able to vote, but there will be weak points all the way through until you get a universal franchise—and even then there will be a weak point.

(DR. RANGER): In the past when efforts have been made to get responsible older people on, and a property or monetary qualification has been given as an alternative, nevertheless literacy in English has been a basic qualification. Our franchise is in no sense more restrictive than others which have been adopted. The only way of dealing with it would be literacy in English or a land qualification.

Q. In paragraph 70 of the Federal document, in your immigration policy you say that disqualification should apply to those "whose presence would deny advancement to our own people". Is not that opening the door for discrimination as widely as possible? It is surely the prerogative of any country enjoying a representative Government to safeguard the interests of its own citizens in the first instance. There is no doubt that in the past, as Mr. Todd pointed out earlier, certain measures on immigration, and deportation of the people who live here has in fact been carried out and people have been allowed to come in, when with a little care and trouble local people could have been found to do the jobs the immigrant were doing. That was the purpose of this.

(MR. TODD): If racialism is abolished within the country, then this has a different meaning.

Q. Could you not look at the methods adopted by other members of the Commonwealth in this regard?

A. Yes, we could do that.

Q. Supposing the members of the Commission approved your proposal and they were introduced into the Constitution, if we took this document and it was taken as a basis also by the British Government and the constitutional conference as a basis, is it not a practical fact that it would result in the immediate break-up of Federation?

A. No, I think if our document were taken as a basis, there are not only certain political things to be changed but I would hope it would be possible for the British Government to look at our financial situation as well. After all, we cannot go forward economically without a tremendous lot of assistance from outside. I should think that the British Government, realising how important it is that this situation should be met successfully here, might be prepared to look at the wider aspect, including the economic. I believe that if those went forward, our proposals are the only satisfactory ones for the future.

Q. There is not a chance that Southern Rhodesia would accept such a proposal.

A. This is the point; that the suggestion by some that Southern Rhodesia might secede from the Federation shows that they do not know of the changes that have come in the minds of the people in these last two or three years. The situation here will never be the same again and if anybody thinks we shall have Southern Rhodesia dominated by whites, dominated by South Africa, it would be intolerable to three and a half million of us. Then the situation would not be viable anyway. It is not only us putting forward ideas; there is nothing more impracticable than the idea that Southern Rhodesia is going to be able to break away from the Federation and maintain a white supremacist Government.

Q. Have you considered the structure of the European Common Market and in particular the pilot scheme of the iron and steel market in Europe?

A. I am afraid I do not know anything about that.

Q. The High Authority of the Steel community had delegated to it certain sovereign powers. It took decisions without waiting for the member governments, and its decisions were subject to ratification by the member Governments. In fact, though decisions were taken which were awkward for many of the members, no decisions were revoked. Is this not another form of structure which might be worth consideration?

A. We, as a Party, would be delighted to consider this as a proposal, and later put our views to the Commission if you would wish it.

(MR. PALMER): Most people are agreed that whether Federation continues or breaks up, the fact remains that the African is ultimately going to be in the majority on the electoral rolls of the territories, and it does not matter whether Sir Edgar Whitehead secedes from the Federation or not. As long as we have a voting system, which I cannot see is likely to be changed, whereby the African is given the vote, he must ultimately be in the majority in these territories. Under our policy we visualise that ultimately the African has control of the Governments. Therefore you must direct your policy to that goal, so that when the goal is reached there is harmony and co-operation between all the races. It is a waste of time to sit and wait for a boiler to blow up: surely it is far better to direct the steam to the engine of State, to make it work properly. We feel that providing there is proper enfranchisement for the non-enfranchised peoples today, we are going to achieve that object.

MR. KATILUNGU: In paragraph 37 of the Federal document, in the first paragraph, you say "The Party is prepared to substantiate this contention by facts and examples when oral evidence is given". That is on constitutional safeguards.

A. (MR. TODD): I think we have covered it in the Southern Rhodesia emergency paper. What is in there is more or less the general line.

Q. In paragraph 9 you deal with the question of the European minority having the intention of domination over the African population in Central Africa. It has been suggested time and again by certain people in evidence that the fear expressed by Africans in the two Northern Territories was about domination being the intention of the present federal concept, and the franchise scheme was based on this. Do you think Africans have not justified the facts—has there not been ample demonstration of this?

A. Yes, I think there is no doubt that we, as white people, at the time of Federation believed we would continue to dominate for a good many years. In fact the Minister of Law at that time said we could go forward into Federation, confident that the British Government would not interfere in our affairs. He also said that in the unlikely event of interference by the Secretary of State, we would be strong enough to overcome him. That has been the general line, I think. Until the emergency in Nyasaland, it was generally held that the Federal Government would get its way, and I believe it was generally believed also in the United Kingdom by members of the British Government, on the basis of all the success stories which had been turned out from the Federation for six years, that Federation was going well; race relations were improving; partnership was the real policy. On that basis I believe that the Federal Government, if it had not been for the riots and troubles in Nyasaland and throughout the Federation, would have stood a good chance of getting most of what it asked for at the 1960 Review: in fact, there would not have been this Commission of Inquiry. The people in Britain realised during the emergency, when the reports from here were not satisfactory, that it was essential to find the facts. There is no doubt that the European people believed that we would, as in the past, and for very good reasons, be able to get our way. We had not realised the situation had changed so radically; many still have not realised it. Sir Edgar Whitehead said quite recently that white supremacy is dead, but there are still many white people who do not believe that in the Federation. I do not know what he is going to do to impress upon them what he now obviously believes, that the days of white supremacy are over.

Q. Supposing the strong opposition and the considerable fears in the two Northern Territories that you have referred to continued, regardless of the suggestions you have made that the Territories should be given responsible Governments, in which probably the result would be an African majority in the two Legislatures—if this strong opposition continued against the Federation, would you wish to maintain the Federation by force?

A. No, it cannot be maintained by force; and what is more, there is no opportunity of maintaining it by force if the electorate is widened sufficiently, because then the people will have their way, and if they (unfortunately, in my estimation) want to break up the Federation, they would so do. I think myself that would be sad. There is not much difference between Africans and Europeans: there are a few unimportant differences like colour of skin, but in general there are no differences between us. My experience of Africans is that they are just as responsible as white people. When Kariba was to be built, I happened to be Minister of Labour, and the African Congress said they would stop labour coming down. Well, of course, there were Africans working at Kariba and they went home with more money in their pockets than they had ever had before, and within a month or two the Nyasaland labourers knew there was far more money at Kariba than anywhere else, and Congress was sensible: it stopped saying it was going to stop everything at Kariba. It could face the facts. Therefore, if the true facts were known about Federation, we would get co-operation from Africans.

Q. It has been said that if Nyasaland broke away from the Federation she would land herself in disaster. Do you think the same would apply in regard to Northern Rhodesia?

A. There is no doubt that from many points of view it will be best for us to stay together, because we would all, over a long period of time, benefit. But as long as copper keeps up, Northern Rhodesia is fairly well off; but when copper went down a year ago, Southern Rhodesia put her shoulder to the wheel and helped considerably. It is difficult to get figures, but I am not sure that copper will always be at its present high rate; and therefore, from the point of view of a satisfactory economic situation, if the politics were right, we should stay together.

MR. CHIRWA: With regard to Nyasaland, you want immediate African majority. What is the policy about Northern Rhodesia?

A. You have had the evidence of our Northern Rhodesia people, and I think we should leave it at that.

(MR. PEDDER): It is not that we want an immediate African majority as such in Nyasaland; we want a representative Government.

(MR. TODD): Which means the same thing.

Memorandum

SALISBURY CONSTITUENCY COUNCIL OF THE UNITED FEDERAL PARTY—C. W. Meredith, Chairman.

This Memorandum is submitted by the Salisbury Constituency Council, which is formed under the United Federal Party Constitution, and consists of two representatives of each of the following Branches:

Arcadia, Braeside, Gardens, Harare, Manica Road West, Salisbury Central, Salisbury City.

Of these Branches three are completely representative of distinct racial groups, namely Arcadia (Euro-African/Coloured), Harare (African), Manica Road West (Asian).

It is probable that the Salisbury Federal Constituency is the most representative in Southern Rhodesia of all races, and in consequence the Constituency Council provides an excellent example of multi-racial co-operation.

Four Branches presented Memoranda which were considered in detail at a recent Constituency Council meeting.

It was decided that these Memoranda (attached as appendices A, B, C, D) should be forwarded in their original form, but with a covering Memorandum setting out the views of the Constituency Council in the commentary which follows.

Braeside Memorandum

Generally speaking the Constituency Council supports the recommendations as set out at the end of the Memorandum.

Recommendation 1

Is already being implemented and furthered by the Southern Rhodesia Government.

Recommendation 2

Is supported in the sense suggested in the recent Jack Report (Pages 43-45).

Recommendation 3

An African middle class is already rapidly emerging consequent on steady improvement in economic conditions generally, and a desire to see African advancement. Any attempt to establish a middle class of any racial group, other than by natural evolution consequent on economic development is not practicable and is doomed to failure.

Recommendation 4

As the African Affairs Board has not proved successful owing to the distrust of it by the Africans, and the fact that it is inherently discriminatory against other racial groups, it should be abolished and provision made for an elected Upper House.

Recommendation 5

This is a reference to some remaining discriminatory measures in the Southern Rhodesia field which are legacies of the past and which are rapidly being removed.

Harare Branch Memorandum

The Constituency Council agrees that suspicions as described by Harare Branch do exist, but the United Federal Party is doing all in its power to remove the causes thereof, and within the Party these suspicions do not exist as the Party is genuine in its desire for partnership.

As regards the broadening of the franchise the Constituency Council feels that this will automatically follow rising economic and educational standards, and the removal of discrimination, all of which is now occurring.

Manica Road West Memorandum

While appreciating the desire of Manica Road West Branch to entrench minorities in the Constitution the Constituency Council feels that this could result in serious complications, and therefore, prefers to aim at the removal of all reference to races in the Constitution with the object of referring only to Citizens of the Federation.

All inhabitants of the Federation at present owe willing allegiance to Her Majesty and it is essential in our view that all inhabitants should share a common citizenship. The present distinction between citizens and protected persons is merely a legal fiction which causes unnecessary confusion. Not only does it cause confusion but it did, before Federation, prevent the British Government from extending a franchise to the people of the Northern Territories, and now has a similar impeding effect.

With regard to amendments to the Constitution as discussed by Manica Road West Branch the Constituency Council is of the opinion that any amendment to the Constitution should be within the legislative competence of the Federation only.

On the matter of the appointment of the Governor-General as set out by Manica Road West the Constituency Council is of the opinion that the restrictions in the present Constitution should be removed.

Referring to paragraph 6, while Manica Road West's proposal is in accordance with what we have said about the removal of racial concepts from the Constitution, the Constituency Council feel that the Upper House presents a special problem, and thought will have to be given to the oppression which might arise if agitators amongst the majority race managed to fill it with members of their own race.

The Constituency Council does support the removal of the British Government's power of veto.

Salisbury City Branch Memorandum

The Constituency Council considers that the first 13 paragraphs of this Memorandum are very sound and supports them, but, in relation to the paragraphs numbered 14 to 17 it considers that an Upper House will be adequate. It is doubtful whether the writing into the Constitution of basic human rights will attain the result intended. Rather must every effort be made to ensure that the public opinion behind all legislation favours fairness, justice, and all the other concepts without which no constitution can succeed.

The following persons will be prepared to present oral evidence in support of memoranda should the Commission so desire:

Salisbury Constituency Council

Mr. L. M. N. Hodson, C.M.G., O.B.E., Q.C., Advocates Chambers, Harvest House, Salisbury.
Sir Charles Meredith, P.O. Box 57, Salisbury.

Harare Branch

Mr. Charles Mzingeli, 25 Harare Community Centre, Harare, Salisbury.
Mr. Amson Nyzika, 6 New Bazaars, Harare, Salisbury.

Salisbury City Branch

Mr. M. M. Boaler, P.O. Box 3883, Salisbury.
Mr. A. A. Peck, c/o Brown, Hoffman and Diamondis, 2nd Floor, Pockets Building, 30 Stanley Avenue, Salisbury.

Manica Road West Branch

Mr. M. Essof, P.O. Box 569, Salisbury.

The Braeside Branch feel that their views are sufficiently set forth in their memorandum as presented.

Appendix A

Memorandum—Submitted by the Braeside Branch

Introduction

In considering the evidence to be submitted to the Commission the Braeside Branch of the United Federal Party has felt that its evidence should be more of a political nature than a documentary and statistical one. The Branch was guided in arriving at this decision by the belief that it would have been impossible to gather material in the time available and that other people, better qualified, would submit evidence making use of documents and statistics. A further, and more important, consideration was the fact that this Branch belongs to a Constituency which in itself forms a "Federation in Miniature", as within its boundaries it contains Branches consisting of all races found within the borders of the Federation. Therefore, it was felt that more importance should be given to the human aspect, together with its political, social, and in some cases, legal implications.

Analysis

One of the chief criticisms levelled against the Federal Government and the Federation as a whole has been on racial grounds.

The insertion in the Federal Constitution of extensive safeguards for African interests would, indeed, have led one to suppose that such criticisms were to be anticipated. Such "safeguards" included, amongst others, the African Affairs Board, despite the fact that the Constitution expressly excluded African Affairs from the sphere of Federal responsibilities. In arriving at an intellectual, as opposed to a purely emotional, assessment of the Federation, legislation involving racial issues passed by the Territorial Governments cannot be disregarded. The Southern Rhodesian Industrial Conciliation Act is one such piece of legislation. Amendments to the Land Apportionment Act, usually passed in the teeth of bitter opposition, are other indications of how racial issues are tackled by the Southern Rhodesian Government. In this connection it would probably not be out of place to remind the Commission that the actions of the Southern Rhodesian Government and the Federal Government are inter-related by virtue of the two Governments having been formed by the same political party.

Strong objections have been voiced, both within and without the borders of the Federation, to the moderate "middle of the road" policy of the U.F.P. The right wing Dominion Party objecting to the, in their opinion, too rapid an advancement of the Africans and the left wing Central Africa Party to the "too little and too late" fragments of the same issue. In the welter of conflicting ideas, the most important aspect, however, is usually overlooked and this is, in terms of practical politics, the alternative to the moderate policy of the U.F.P. In these terms there is no doubt that the only alternative Government to one formed by the United Federal Party would be one formed by the Dominion Party. What then would be the likeliest result of a right wing, almost exclusively European, party taking the reins of Government. The most obvious move would be to entrench white Government to such a degree that non-white participation would either be non-existent or at best restricted to Coloureds and Asians and even this kept at an absolute minimum. In practice this would almost inevitably result in the Coloured and Asian communities looking to the African Nationalist movement for fulfilment of their political aspirations, as, indeed, the Northern Rhodesian Euro-Africans are already on the way to doing. Whether these aspirations would, in fact, be tolerated by a victorious black Nationalist Government is doubtful. The most serious result, however, would be the growth of a white Nationalism constantly fed by African opposition. Under these conditions, and in spite of the numerical strength of the Africans a successful revolt against such rule would not be possible, as a study of Communist tactics and practices would confirm. The fond hope of some C.A.P. politicians that an initial victory by the D.P. would, ultimately, result in a swing to a far more liberal outlook than hitherto would also be proved fallacious.

There is, of course, a possibility that black nationalism may carry the day in Nyasaland and in Northern Rhodesia. (It would not be too wild a surmise to say that one would follow the other.) In this case a different set of circumstances would prevail. Again the most obvious reaction of the European electorate would be a swing to white nationalism in Southern Rhodesia, with an even stronger feeling regarding the desirability of a closer union with South Africa. The consequences of such a step are too well known to warrant a closer examination. What would, however, be of more interest is to examine the probable tactics the African Nationalist Movement would employ to bring about an African State and its subsequent behaviour pattern towards its racial minorities and, indeed, towards its own fellow Africans.

The first requirement would be to have a national leader who can excite the imagination of the masses, as Messiah—or more properly—a black Hitler. This man exists for Nyasaland in the person of Dr. Banda. At this stage it should be illuminating to quote from Ward Price's book "I Knew These Dictators". By changing the plural to the singular we have a pretty accurate description of Dr. Banda:—

"They are leaders who rose to supreme authority by embodying the national desire to escape from a condition of inferiority. Their functions are defined by the titles of Fuhrer and Duce that they bear. Both of them have the support and approval of a much greater proportion of their fellow-countrymen than has ever voted for the Government of any democratic state."

The second requirement is to organise a sufficient number of thugs to put into operation a campaign of intimidation to kill any possible opposition on the part of moderate men. These tactics are by no means new. They have been employed by most national revolutionary movements in the past and in Africa less than a year ago.

Even if Dr. Banda should not wish to be an ipso facto dictator, circumstances would very soon force this role upon him.

The position of the non-black minorities would then, inevitably, become intolerable. Their rights would, at best, become privileges to be withdrawn at the whim of the party leaders. The mass of Africans, would, however, have no say in the running of the country. Western democracy would die a swift death.

To moderate men of whatever colour, the existence of "Storm

Troopers", be they white or black, can only be distasteful, if not actively injurious to their person.

Recommendations

This Branch requests that in order to foster better race relations the following recommendations be considered:

1. That African home ownership and security of tenure be made available to a greater number.
2. That individual African farm ownership be encouraged and extended on the pattern of the Southern Rhodesian Native Purchase Areas.
3. That the extension of an African middle class be promoted.
4. That the African Affairs Board be abolished and a more efficient body be created—possibly a Senate.
5. That the Coloured, Euro-African and Asian communities be given immediate emancipation.

Appendix B

Memorandum—Submitted by the Harare Branch

This Branch is prepared to contribute in evidence to be submitted to the Monckton Commission by the Party.

1. Since the coming of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland much effort has, and is being made to bring about the practice of partnership between the races in the Federation. We are well aware of the opposition by our northern fellow-men and we believe that, that opposition is born out of a fear, whether it is justified that is a point for them to make out.

In our submission the Federal system of government is one of which the three territories cannot afford to do without. The territories are complementary to one another, this has been the case long before the Federation was planned. Southern Rhodesia with its advancing industry has supported both Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, financially and economically and this is still the case today.

2. Obviously when a slogan of Partnership was launched both people who opposed and supported the Federation anticipated a full co-operation of all the races to bring about the partnership into practice. Record has it, that efforts were made even through the Federal Parliament but these efforts did not produce the complete desired result. We recognise the fact that this failure is due to a fear complex by the majority of Europeans, particularly in Southern Rhodesia, and we believe that this fear complex is without a foundation and to the minds of the African people is a desire of the white people to maintain the principle of white supremacy at the expense of the Africans. It is upon this point that the African finds himself labouring under a very strong suspicion as to whether the white man is genuine in his doctrine of partnership. There you have two opposed views between Europeans and Africans.

The first opposition is created by the Europeans whose supposed fear of being swamped if practical partnership was brought about, goes a long way to provoke suspicion on the African side. They feel, rightly, that the whiteman is not sincere with his partnership proposition. Under circumstances this branch is completed to draw the conclusion that it is a sincere desire of all responsible citizens of the Federation to maintain the system of federal government in Central Africa, and to work for a genuine partnership, but again we point out that this will only come about in the long run when persons on the both sides of the colour line have sorted out the present fear complex. And to end this we suggest as a first step:

- (a) the broadening of Franchise.
- (b) raising of the standard of living of all the citizens of the Federation.
- (c) adoption of compulsory education of all children irrespective of colour, creed, religion or sex.
- (d) immediate repeal of all discriminatory laws in the Federation, e.g. Pass laws, Land Apportionment Act, and Urban areas act, etc.

To end we say again "Love among the citizens of the Federation of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland irrespective of colour is the strong root of success to the Federation, and hatred among the citizens of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland is the poison to the root of success to the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland".

Appendix C

Memorandum—By The Manica Road West Branch

1. This Branch of the United Federal Party is by far the largest and most influential body of organised political opinion among Rhodesians of Asian origin in Salisbury.

2. This Branch is in support of an advanced status for the Federation and has very definite views as to provisions in the future Constitution which should accompany an advance in status.

3. In the first place the amended Constitution must cut across all Territorial Constitutions in such a way as to entrench the rights of all minority groups so that existing Territorial laws which differentiate against such groups, and existing Governmental practices, whether in the Federal or Territorial or local Government fields, which have such a differential effect are immediately abolished and the re-introduction of the same or similar laws and practices is for all time made impossible. In this connection we would point out the Europeans will, on the basis of existing franchise arrangements, be a minority group among the voters within the foreseeable future. But that time has not yet arrived, and we consider it imperative that, at the present juncture, when such differential laws and practices operate against the minority groups of the present date, such groups should be mentioned by name in the Constitution, so that no doubts whatever are left. What happens now is that, under the Federal Constitution, there is express mention of Africans. All others are, in theory, put together into another category. In practice, however, the present minority groups are subjected to many disabilities. These arise chiefly under Territorial laws, but have their consequences in the Federal sphere, because inter-racial co-operation in that sphere is gravely affected when liquor laws, laws relating to places of entertainment, etc., etc., differ for different groups. The names we wish to have mentioned are Federal Citizens who are of Asian origin, or are coloured persons or Euro-Africans or Euro-Asians or Afro-Asians. We definitely fear the possible progress of legislations and practices such as those of the Union of South Africa, with its Group Areas Act, etc., etc. We think it will be wise and farsighted to mention Citizens of European origin also in this general protection of minority groups. They are, even now, a minority group in numbers, though not in political power.

4. We have witnessed, in the Union of South Africa, what can happen to entrenched clauses in the Constitution for a Dominion, and because of that, recommend that control over changes in the Constitution be vested in some body quite above currents of opinion which may develop along racial lines, such as a powerful and reliable Upper House, or the British Government itself, as at present. According to the latest edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, Vol. 4, page 712, the fundamental law of the Canadian Constitution could not, until 1949, be changed except by enactment of the British Parliament, and in 1949, the Canadian Parliament was given power to amend the Constitution in matters lying solely within the Federal jurisdiction. Apparently the provincial constitutions are still subject to British Control. There does not seem, therefore, to be any need to rush this particular aspect of the Federation's improved status. It is understood that the Canadians themselves were reluctant to give up the advantage of having an outside impartial body to control changes in their Constitution.

5. The Branch is also opposed, and believes that most other Branches, including predominantly European Branches, will be opposed to alteration to the present system whereby the Governor-General is appointed by the Queen, with due attention to any recommendation by the Federal Government. According to authority previously quoted, this is still the position in Canada. There is a positive reason for retaining the present practice. Anyone here of sufficient standing to be a Governor-General is likely to have earned fame in the political field. Further, the British aristocracy and the British public schools and the oldest British Universities can provide persons who are particularly well-trained in matters of ceremonial, which we consider to be important.

6. The main direction in which the Federation can advance is by the removal of the British Governments power of veto over legislation which does not affect the Constitution. This control should be abolished. As an accompaniment to this, we ask the Commission to advise an Upper Chamber which will be strong enough and talented enough to provide a real safeguard against hasty and illconceived legislation. We recommend most strongly that no more racial representation be provided, but that provisions for the Upper House or Chamber should be framed that real worth, in whatever race it may be found, is employed.

Appendix D

A Memorandum presenting a Review of certain existing conditions in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland and submitting Recommendations thereon

Prepared by the Salisbury City Branch of the United Federal Party

Introduction

1. The appointment of the Commission is wholeheartedly welcomed as clear indication on the part of the British Government of its intention to submit the foundations of the welfare of the Federation to empirical study rather than to legislate for the Country in the light of abstract principles which, however admirable they may appear to be in the abstract, do not always bring desirable consequences when uncritically followed in particular political situations.

2. Overseas opinion, being often not cognizant with local conditions, is sometimes uninformed concerning such matters as the unconditional desirability of a universal franchise, or the "unwillingness" of portions of the populace to accede to particular constitutional measures, and a critical evaluation by the Commission of such questions as—the desirability of a universal franchise in the Federation under present conditions, and the weight that should be accorded to the opinions of certain sections of the community; in short, of popular overseas presuppositions—will be of enormous value in clearing the air and in creating a sane and reasoned public opinion, both here and overseas, in preparation for the constitutional talks.

3. More particularly, the Commission will have the advantage of being able to present to the British public and to world opinion conclusions based upon the best informed and best balanced opinion available. In this it will be in a far better position than the British public itself, which unfortunately, quite unwittingly, is often led by press reports to have regard only to numbers of opinion rather than to quality of opinion; and also not realising that sometimes, the masses in Africa, notwithstanding the vociferousness of self-appointed "leaders", may in fact have no opinion at all of their own on many issues. The sensible and reasoned opinion of the statesman tends to be drowned by the clamour of the mob; and, in this connection, the inhabitant of the British Isles has not the inestimable advantage afforded to the Commission of being able to consider the possible ulterior motives of witnesses, and to take into consideration the utterances and conduct of witnesses on other occasions elsewhere—considerations which may well cause the Commission to regard the opinions of certain witnesses as of little worth; and the Commission will be in the fortunate position of being able to cause these considerations to become generally known.

No abuse of Political Power by European

4. The question of the constitutional advancement of individual Territories is not a matter of primary concern to the Commission, and perhaps it would be just as well were the Commission not to pay the question too close attention, since, otherwise, the Territories might find themselves to some extent limited as a result to the rate of advancement of the Federation as a whole. Nevertheless, considerable evidence of the goodwill of the European may be gleaned by a consideration of conditions within particular Territories and within Southern Rhodesia in particular.

5. A cautionary note which might be sounded in this connection is that any hardships that may today be suffered by the urban African in the larger centres of Southern Rhodesia are due to the march of events rather than to any European ill-will. The Native Reserves were adequate when originally established, and they have only become overcrowded and hence inadequate as a direct result of the enormous increase in the African population, which is in turn itself due to better health brought by European medical facilities, and to the cessation of internecine warfare—also due to European influence. Until quite recently the urban African had his roots—his kraal, his wives and family, his fields and his livestock—in the Reserves. He was a relatively temporary sojourner in the town, and he so regarded himself and was to be regarded by the European. It is a misfortune that the once temporary sojourn has now become relatively permanent, and that amenities adequate for the temporary town-dweller may be inadequate for the permanent town-dweller. Similarly, a governmental "two-pyramid" policy was followed in this country, whereby the European could rise to supremacy in his own sphere, and the African in his. It was laid down, with great fairness, that each could only venture into the sphere of the other for the benefit of that other. It was not foreseen that the vast increase in the African population and the magnetic effect of European-introduced industry and commerce should lure the African into the European areas in large numbers.

6. However, many of the sociological and economic difficulties experienced by the African, should prove to be self-righting. African poverty, for instance, is due to the poverty of the country as a whole; and the rising national levels of productivity—to which the Kariba hydroelectric installations will contribute—will tend to eliminate this automatically with the passage of time. Equally, the African provides the mass market in the Federation and any social disadvantages he may have to endure at present will inevitably be eliminated by the necessity for the European entrepreneur—in all fields—to adapt his enterprises to the requirements of that mass market or otherwise suffer economic submergence. There is therefore less need for legislation to remedy such economic and social hardships that he may suffer than may perhaps be imagined.

7. Certainly the dominance of the European in Southern Rhodesia has in no way hindered the progress of the African. Such progress has been great, and has been occasioned by no external coercion whatever. Figures indicating the enormous advances of the African in many spheres are readily available; and statistics reveal, for example, that African incomes have increased in a greater proportion than those of the European.

8. The extent of African education may be specifically mentioned, since education is not only important in itself but is widely recognised as a good yardstick of the general advance of a people; and the extent of African education in Southern Rhodesia is also a striking example of the bona fides of the European since, by choosing to educate the African, he is enabling him to qualify for the common voters roll and is so hastening the day when the European voter will be outnumbered by the African voter. Although the extent of African education is small, it is nevertheless a fact that it is larger than in the two Territories under the control of the Colonial Office; and larger, indeed, than in any other country in Africa. For the year 1958/59 12½% of the entire Southern Rhodesia budget was spent on African education, and this expenditure would have undoubtedly been greater had more funds been available. It may be remarked in this connection that it is most desirable that the Federal Government should continue to be responsible for European education and the Territorial Government for African education.

9. To sum up this section; it is indeed noteworthy that, in the one Territory politically dominated by European citizens, African progress has been greater in many respects than in the other two Territories, if not in fact greater than in any other country in Africa.

The Distribution of the Franchise

10. It is quite clear, historically, that true democracy rests upon national character—the character of the individual wielding the vote. In Britain, for example, the voter holds certain beliefs almost unconsciously; and it does not occur to him to act otherwise than in accordance with those beliefs. Such beliefs are reverence for one's fellow man, derived largely from the Christian tradition, an unconscious allegiance to the rule of law, a sense of tradition and of responsibility, and a sense of fair play.

11. Experience has repeatedly shown that where such qualities are lacking in the national character, democracy can be at best but intermittently successful. Disregarding Africa itself, numerous examples in Europe and South America spring to mind where democracy had readily given place to dictatorship. Hence, when the question of the franchise is considered, the qualities of those sought to be entrusted with the vote should be examined critically indeed.

12. The Commission will no doubt note that the qualities listed are almost completely alien to the mentality and outlook of large numbers in the Federation. It should be seriously considered whether a customary mental habit of unquestioning allegiance to the unfettered despotism of tribal chiefs, sometimes exercised in an arbitrary and cruel manner, might not, if those with such a habit of mind were accorded the franchise, inevitably lead to dictatorship rather than to democracy. Equally, a mentality still imbued with notions of witchcraft and gross superstition—such phenomena as ritual murder are still not unknown, completely illiterate and uneducated, and with little but the dimmest apprehension of western institutions, of science and of industry and commerce, can hardly be one to be entrusted with the destiny of a thriving and progressive westernised economy. Such mentality can have but little idea of the worth of various constitutional relationships and of the dangers of entrusting unqualified power to cliques and groups of people. It may be remarked in passing that, even in Britain, a universal franchise was only a relatively late development; and that even highly intelligent and educated British women only obtained the franchise after 1918. Britain may be further contrasted with the Federation in that the literacy rate is very high indeed in Britain and very low in the Federation.

13. Freedom is like the air we breathe; not noticed until lost; and the individual in a western society often becomes so accustomed to it that he sometimes fails to realise how easily it can be lost and he thus tends to overlook the need for its jealous safeguarding. It would be indeed a disaster were such freedom to be lost by the ill-considered entrusting of the franchise to those unfitted to exercise it.

The Constitutional Safeguarding of Basic Human Rights

14. It is quite clear that some form of safeguard is required for certain fundamental human rights otherwise there is a very real danger that those rights may be taken away by those wielding political power. (It is now unknown, for example, for an existing vote to be taken away from certain sections of a community.) Such provisions are not only desirable in themselves, but they are needed to allay fears on the part of various groups in the Federation of unscrupulous political domination by other groups with consequent penalising of individuals.

15. It is not felt that sufficient safeguard can be achieved through the provision of an Upper House, since such a Chamber can normally only delay the passage of legislation, and experience shows that such a Chamber can be "packed".

16. Neither is it felt that continued positive control by the British Government is desirable, since the British electorate is in general ignorant of local conditions, it is apt to approach local problems with preconceived notions which, however valid they may be when applied to conditions prevalent in the United Kingdom, are certainly not sound within the context of the Central African environment; and, further, such a position would expose the Federation to becoming the victim of political manoeuvres that could be rightly stigmatised as little more than electioneering "stunts".

17. The correct solution to this problem would, it is submitted, be the writing into the Constitution of certain basic human rights, these particular clauses to be subject to amendment only with the consent of all of the five governments that will be signatories to the Constitution. The British Government would thus be left in a position to protect these basic individual rights, but not to impose measures upon the Federation that reasonable local opinion might rightly regard as undesirable. It is the nature of these provisions that will no doubt be the most anxious problem confronting the Commission.

Oral Evidence

SALISBURY CONSTITUENCY COUNCIL OF THE UNITED FEDERAL PARTY. Represented by: L. M. N. Hodson and Mr. Rose.

CHAIRMAN: Would you like to enlarge on any of the documents you have submitted to us?

A. (MR. HODSON): I am afraid we have no authority to speak for the other branches outside. They used us as a pillar-box to send in their memoranda.

Q. We have had the main body of evidence from the United Federal Party here and from the main centres we have visited. Taking the City of Salisbury Constituency Council, which recommendations belong to them?

A. We presented ours as a commentary on the four branch ones, and we noticed some differences among the four memoranda: as we could not wear five hats, we decided simply to put this memorandum forward as a commentary on the other memoranda. I do not think there is anything in particular that I or Mr. Rose would like to add. We are of the opinion that the branches should properly have been called to speak before you.

Q. If they want to come separately, they had better apply. In the meantime, have you something you would like to add?

A. No, Sir; I personally have nothing to add to what the Constituency Council document says.

MR. ROBINSON: Were you invited to come here today, or did you volunteer to give oral evidence?

A. We were invited.

Q. There has probably been some misunderstanding as to your role in this matter.

A. I have a feeling there has been. It is difficult for us, because we are in fact purely a post-box; and there has been some misunderstanding somewhere along the line in regard to the submission of this and the asking of us to come here.

MR. GONDWE: I would have thought that these branches here are part and parcel of your organisation, and you are the central body, are you not?

A. The position is briefly that though, under the United Federal Party constitution, there is provision made for constitutional councils, very few exist. In the case of Salisbury there happens to be one, and the branches sent their memoranda through us to be sent on to the Party office, and from there to the Monckton Commission.

Q. But one would have thought your coming here was to represent all these branches, which are affiliated to the centre. One would have thought you could have answered questions on any one of these memoranda that have been submitted through you.

A. No, you see they are different and have different points of view; and we have no authority to speak on their point of view to the Commission.

CHAIRMAN: At the end of the memorandum, on the third page, you say that the following persons would be prepared to give oral evidence in support of their memoranda, should the Commission so desire—obviously you have been written to, but the others have not necessarily been contacted.

MR. ROBINSON: Have you any desire to take the matter further?

A. Not really.

CHAIRMAN: It is difficult for us to ask and for you to offer anything of this sort of memorandum. I am sorry you have been troubled to come. You can assume we have very carefully listened to and examined the witnesses on behalf of the United Federal Party here, and indeed at all the places we have been to. We have all that collected and we will look at this again; but if there is something here which you think is at variance with the main body to which our attention should be drawn, perhaps you would do so.

A. No, there is nothing in the Salisbury Constituency Council: I think you will find slight variations in the branch memoranda.

MR. CRAWLEY: Have the branches seen your recommendations or comments?

A. No, the branches have not seen them.

Memorandum

RHODESIA NATIONAL FARMERS' UNION

1. The Rhodesia National Farmers' Union wishes to draw the attention of the Commission to the chaotic state of affairs which exists in the organisation of agriculture in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

2. The Rhodesia National Farmers' Union is itself only directly concerned with the interests of European farmers and landowners in Northern and Southern Rhodesia, but European agriculture cannot, at the policy level, be discussed in isolation from African farming, and it will therefore be necessary to refer to the latter in this memorandum.

3. Agriculture in the Federation, as in most other countries, is subject to considerable state intervention and control: on the one hand, the Government supports and controls prices and marketing arrangements for many farm products, and on the other hand the farmer has certain obligations concerning land conservation and good farming practices, and accepts price limitation in exchange for price and market guarantees. In addition, there is Government intervention on land utilisation and international trade in agriculture products, though in many instances the farmer's obligations are now to the territorial Governments, whilst the Federal Government provides the price supports. The Rhodesia National Farmers' Union has always supported a reasonable degree of Government intervention in agriculture, but is becoming seriously concerned about the effectiveness of this intervention, owing to the dispersion of authority in relation to agriculture between the four Governments in the Federation.

4. To the farmer, the land on which he grows his crops, the crops and animal products he produces, and the marketing of his production, are indivisible. Also, to develop and administer a coherent agricultural policy, the land, its production, and the sale of that produce, must be considered as an entity. With the present dispersion of authority, this is not possible. It is indeed surprising, and to the credit of the civil services concerned, that some semblance of an agricultural policy and its implementation has, in fact, been maintained, but insurmountable difficulties exist both in the fields of long term overall planning and in dealing with urgent short term problems. In this latter field, in particular, agriculture is extremely vulnerable to climatic and seasonal factors, neither of which will wait whilst four Governments sort out their respective views and spheres of responsibility.

5. The dispersal of authority on agricultural matters between the four Governments is, to a major extent, inherent in the Constitution, with certain powers specifically reserved for the Federal and territorial Governments. Some agricultural matters are on the concurrent list, and although legally they could, subject in some instances—e.g. Item 10—to the concurrence of the territorial Governments concerned, come entirely under the Federal Government, the present position is one of complete confusion, with powers held by the Federal Government in one territory, and by the territorial Governments in the other. Even where the Federal Government holds the powers to legislate, it can be impossible to use them owing to Section 42(2) of the Constitution, unless the Federal Government can provide the staff to enforce them. Since law enforcement is a territorial responsibility, and much of agricultural administration is also territorial, the effectiveness of Federal legislation can be entirely dependent on the willingness of the territorial Governments to enforce it, which co-operation can be refused under Section 41(2).

6. In this section, the Rhodesia National Farmers' Union endeavours to set out the distribution of powers concerning agriculture between the Federal and territorial Governments. The analysis may not be complete, and it may not be entirely accurate, since it is based only on the Rhodesia National Farmers' Union's own experience since Federation. However, this very qualification is, in itself, an indication of the doubt and confusion which exist in present agricultural legislation.

- (a) Land. The main responsibility lies with the three territorial Governments who, to a degree, operate through agencies such as the Natural Resources Board and Land Settlement Board in Southern Rhodesia, and similar institutions in Northern Rhodesia. The conservation of non-African land is, however, the responsibility of the Federal Government in Southern Rhodesia and in Northern Rhodesia, through the Conservation and Extension Department of the Ministry of Agriculture, though it theoretically administers a policy laid down by territorial Governments. Conservation in African areas is a territorial responsibility, but on Crown land, which may eventually have European settlement, the Federal Government may have to meet the cost.

Land settlement schemes are a field in which there is much confusion over Government powers. African settlement is a territorial matter, but European settlement is a responsibility divided among the territorial Departments of Land and the Federal Ministries of Agriculture and Immigration.

- (b) Water. The Meteorological Service are Federal, Irrigation is a territorial matter—including Irrigation Research—but the effect of applying irrigation water to crops is a Federal research subject in Southern Rhodesia, and Water Conservation and Irrigation Advisory work are Federal matters in Southern Rhodesia and Northern Rhodesia, except that Water Conservation subsidies are territorial in Northern Rhodesia. Agricultural water rights are, however, a territorial responsibility, though large scale irrigation schemes might be Federal.
- (c) Crop Production. This is a Federal responsibility for non-African agriculture in Northern and Southern Rhodesia but not in Nyasaland. However, in Northern Rhodesia the Federal responsibility is not complete, since research and specialist services—but not advisory services—remain a territorial function. African crop production is territorial throughout the Federation, except for research and specialist services, which are Federal in Southern Rhodesia.
- (d) Livestock Production. This is a Federal responsibility for non-African agriculture in Southern Rhodesia. In Northern Rhodesia the responsibility is jointly held by the Federal and territorial Governments, with the territorial Government retaining powers over veterinary services, animal health, research and specialist services. In Nyasaland it is a wholly territorial responsibility. African livestock production is a territorial responsibility except in Southern Rhodesia, where responsibility is shared with the Federal Government who control veterinary services, research and specialist services.
- (e) Tsetse Control is Federal in Southern Rhodesia, but game control, with which it is closely associated, is territorial. In Northern Rhodesia it is entirely territorial, and presumably so in Nyasaland.
- (f) Red Locust Control. This is Federal throughout because it comes under an international agency and external affairs are Federal.
- (g) Flue Cured Tobacco Production is Federal in Southern and Northern Rhodesia, where production is confined to Europeans. It is territorial in Nyasaland.
- (h) Turkish Tobacco Production. All four Governments are concerned, but their relative spheres of responsibility are vague.
- (i) General Production Policy. For non-African agriculture in Northern and Southern Rhodesia, this is theoretically a Federal responsibility, but the territorial Governments control the production policy on leasehold Crown land farms, and run independent policies for African agriculture in the three territories and for non-African agriculture in Nyasaland.
- (j) Agricultural Price and Marketing Policy. The present Constitutional position concerning marketing policy is probably the main single factor responsible for the unsatisfactory state of affairs in the agricultural industry. It is governed by Item 10 of the Federal legislative list. Theoretically it is a Federal responsibility, but the double proviso concerning laws relating to animals and poultry and the subordination of the whole section to Part III of the schedule, results in the territorial—the junior—Governments having an effective veto on many price and market policies, without them having any responsibilities for these policies. The present position may be summarised by saying that whilst the Federal Government attempts to take responsibility for marketing and price support policy in Northern Rhodesia and Southern Rhodesia, it has not to any material extent intervened in Nyasaland.
- (k) Agricultural Co-ops. Closely linked to general marketing policy is the responsibility for co-operative legislation. African Co-ops. are reserved for the territorial Governments, others are on the concurrent list and are Federal in Southern Rhodesia, but not in the other two territories.
- (l) Land Banks. These are also closely tied to agricultural economic policy, but are on the concurrent list, and only in Southern Rhodesia have they become a Federal responsibility.

7. The above is an attempted summary of the present apportionment of powers between the Federal and territorial Governments on matters directly affecting agriculture. It may be incomplete, and in some instances there seems to be doubt concerning the responsible Government.

8. As an example of the confusion which can arise as a result of the distribution of powers outlined in Section 6 above, the Rhodesia National Farmers' Union would draw the attention of the Commission to the position which has arisen as a result of the construction of the Kariba dam. Leaving aside its prime purpose of the provision of power—itsself a divided responsibility—there remains the general development of the area, which should flow from the building of the dam. Much of this development should be connected with agriculture and lands, and the following problems all need examination: (a) irrigation potential; (b) Land settlement; (c) agricultural production suitable for the area; (d) tsetse control; (e) game reserves; (f) freshwater fishing; (g) tourist potential. Bearing in mind that the area concerned is both in Southern and Northern Rhodesia and that the problems involve both African and European interests, it is hardly surprising that so far no serious attention has been paid to the project, in view of the complete chaos which exists in relation to Governmental powers for the development of the area. With the distribution of powers set out in Section 6 above, it would appear virtually impossible for any Kariba Development Authority to function properly, or indeed for any co-ordinated approach to be made to the development of the area. This example has been chosen, not because it is of immediate concern to the Rhodesia National Farmers' Union, but because of its possible potential importance to the Federation and its intimate connection with agriculture, lands, game and fisheries. As an exercise, the creation of a Kariba Development Authority, its membership, powers and the ultimate authorities for reference in the event of disagreement, is strongly recommended as an object lesson in the problems inherent in the present Federal Constitution.

9. It is the opinion of the Rhodesia National Farmers' Union that a comprehensive and progressive agricultural policy is not possible whilst the present chaotic apportionment of legislative and administrative powers continue. It is further the opinion of the Rhodesia National Farmers' Union that to retain the present position in the hope that powers on the concurrent legislative list will gradually accrue to the Federal Government cannot result in an acceptable or effective solution, since the potentially Federal powers contained in the concurrent list are themselves totally inadequate.

10. The Rhodesia National Farmers' Union therefore requests that a thorough review be made by the Commission of the Constitutional position as it affects agriculture, with the aim of so altering the spheres of responsibility of the various Governments as to enable a comprehensive agricultural policy for the Federation as a whole to be developed.

11. The Rhodesia National Farmers' Union has itself examined the problems of developing agricultural policy in a Federal state. The present position has been outlined above; a summary of our examination is set out in Sections 12 and 13 below, and our recommendations are made in Section 14.

12. It appears that the apportionment of powers in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland is very different from that adopted in other countries with a Federal Constitution, both within and without the Commonwealth.

In Canada it appears that under the British North America Act, the powers of the Provinces to legislate are effectively limited to matters which cannot affect other Provinces or the country as a whole. Thus, all the broader policy making powers are effectively held by the Federal Government. Similarly, in Australia the Federal Government, through its Ministry of Primary Industry, effectively controls the broad aspects of agricultural policy. In both countries it appears that all powers concerning price supports, marketing, exports and production development are effectively and exclusively held by the Federal Government. The Provincial and State Governments appear to be responsible to a certain extent for agricultural research and extension work, but in both countries this work is partly financed by the Federal Government and in Australia the State policies are co-ordinated through the Federally controlled C.S.I.R. In both countries responsibility for Crown land alienation is held by the State or Provincial Governments. A roughly similar apportionment of powers exists in the U.S.A.

13. The alternatives open in this country are either to concentrate as much power as possible in relation to agriculture in the hands of the Federal Government or to let agriculture revert in toto to the territorial Governments. The Rhodesia National Farmers' Union is utterly opposed to a reversion of agriculture to the territorial Governments for the following reasons:

- (a) In the context of free trade within the Federation, which is essential for any State, it would be impossible for the territorial Governments, acting in isolation, to operate any policy of price support or marketing organisation.
- (b) There would be a tendency for each territory to aim at territorial self-sufficiency, instead of making the best use of the resources of the Federation as a whole.
- (c) The problems of developing export markets for agriculture would be greatly increased if in the hands of three separate Governments. Already one of our main disadvantages on the world market is the small scale of our agricultural export trade, and this would be greatly aggravated.

- (d) The problems of moving surpluses and meeting shortages within the three territories would be increased.
- (e) The expense of running three separate organisations would be excessive.
- (f) The present stage of development of the country is such that it is difficult to find sufficient civil service administrative and executive talent to carry out Government policies. For all practical purposes there is as yet only the European population of less than 300,000 to draw upon, as the African in his present stage of emergence has not as yet shown any pronounced administrative ability. From this very small population, approximately that of Nottingham, has to be found four Governments and ten major Municipal Councils, as well as the qualified staff to administer them. It is essential, therefore, that the administrative procedure of Government be simplified as far as possible and the complicated problems of co-ordination resulting from a reversion of agriculture to territorial control should at all costs be avoided. A similar comment could be made concerning the present division of responsibilities.
- (g) In general terms, the reversion of agriculture to the territorial Governments would be a negation of Federation.

14. The Rhodesia National Farmers' Union strongly recommends that all powers relating to agriculture be concentrated in the hands of the Federal Government. It is appreciated that this recommendation goes beyond the position which exists in the Federal states referred to above, but it is considered that the territories in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland are at present to undeveloped each to be able to carry out its own complete research programme, whilst the Federal state should be able to do so. If it is accepted that at present research could be more effectively operated on a Federal basis, then it follows that the conservation, advisory and specialist services which, particularly in a small country, are very closely associated with agricultural research, should also be Federal.

This leaves only the problem of land. It is accepted that, particularly in the Protectorate areas, it may be necessary for the territorial Governments to retain the basic control on Crown land. It is considered, however, that once that land has been assigned, the responsibility for its alienation, conservation, occupation and development could perfectly well pass to the Federal Government, who alone have the necessary administrative machine to ensure its proper use and development. By adopting this procedure African land rights could be fully protected, whilst at the same time permitting proper development and use of all land in the Federation.

15. In conclusion, the Rhodesia National Farmers' Union would draw attention to the importance of the problem posed in this memorandum. Agriculture has an estimated value of production of £130,000,000 per annum (three year average, 1956/57/58), over one third of the total net production of the Federation. In addition, directly or indirectly, a very major proportion of the Federation's commerce and industry is dependent upon agriculture. Also, agriculture accounts for some £38,000,000 per annum (three year average, 1956/57/58) of the Federation's exports, or about 25% of the total, and this percentage has steadily risen over the last three years. Finally, and most important of all, is the problem of the general low standard of nutrition in the Federation, a problem which can only be solved by a concerted policy for agricultural development.

Oral Evidence

RHODESIA NATIONAL FARMERS' UNION—Representatives: E. B. Evans, President; P. Boenders, Secretary.

CHAIRMAN: I gather from your paper that your primary interest is the European farmers and landowners in Northern and Southern Rhodesia?

A. (MR EVANS): That is correct. The Rhodesia National Farmers' Union represents the European farmers of both Northern and Southern Rhodesia, but not Nyasaland.

Q. When you come to your recommendations in paragraph 11 onwards, am I right in assuming that these changes are meant to be changes applying throughout the Federation?

A. That is correct, Sir, yes.

Q. It is more difficult, is it not, to contemplate in relation to Nyasaland?

A. That is correct. It would be more difficult. If I could just make a point; originally the European farmers, certainly when we saw Federation coming up and having already had some experience of one Territory being played off against another in marketing and in various other directions, we decided to get together on the grounds that staying together would be a good thing, the two Unions were joined before Federation to anticipate what was coming. The four Governments cannot fight the peculiarities that can happen on commodities between the four Governments. I endeavoured at that early stage to get the European farmers in Nyasaland to join the Rhodesia National Farmers' Union and unfortunately at that stage they were against it. I may be wrong, but the situation is a little different there. There are not as many and, of course, there are a large number of estates and companies as against the ordinary straight farmer which you find, certainly over 5,000 of them, in Southern Rhodesia and over 1,000, I think, in Northern Rhodesia. I have the feeling today perhaps they would rather have come in, that is as things are now.

Q. But there are fewer of them.

A. Much fewer.

Q. Of course, the effect of these recommendations would be to put the whole subject of agriculture in the Federal field?

A. That is so, Sir.

Q. And that would be in relation to Nyasaland a biggish change?

A. A very large change indeed.

Q. You are not anticipating that African opinion in Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia would want it?

A. I must assume that obviously in Nyasaland they would be opposed to it, and in Northern Rhodesia; only one Territory of the three has an organized African union which is in Southern Rhodesia and we have a very strong liaison with them, and in fact we have helped them considerably. In my discussion with Unions, it would appear that they themselves would favour this.

Q. What you say is from the point of view of efficiency and the growth of the idea of partnership if the thing is to be run really efficiently this is the way to do it; that is your case?

A. That is the main case plus the point that I have been President of the Union for four years and the more I look at it, it is obvious that the present set-up, of course, cannot be maintained. Even in our preamble on the situation there is some doubt on all sides on what really belongs to whom. It seems to be an answer against its return to the various Territories within the Federation, much as we would prefer it, quite frankly, as our own elected Government, the Federal Government, and under a system by which we have already started the ball rolling. It has been the policy of my Union over the last four years to gradually get to our system of marketing, certainly as far as the European is concerned, bring it together under the one Union, under one system of marketing, under one Government. On the whole it has worked reasonably satisfactorily and we would view with a little alarm the prospect of going right back to where we started, right back within the three Territories. Whatever new scheme would be mooted, there is extreme difficulty in handling produce and handling it throughout three Governments. The prices concerned, the whole question of research, export, it is extremely difficult,—almost impossible—having had a little experience of it.

Q. Of course, you do see the political difficulty?

A. I see it very well indeed. As you have said, there is the political difficulty from the point of view of the Africans in Northern Rhodesia and particularly Nyasaland, I would think, under the circumstances.

Q. I think I will ask Lord Crathorne if he would like to ask some questions.

LORD CRATHORNE: On the question of facts, as far as your Union is concerned, what sort of total is your membership?

A. At the present moment in Southern and Northern Rhodesia it is about 6,400.

Q. Can you divide them up?

A. Yes, about 1,000 in the North and 5,400 in Southern Rhodesia.

Q. As you told the Chairman, Nyasaland is at present out?

A. Yes.

Q. Could we come to your memorandum. In the first paragraph you refer to the chaotic state of affairs which exist in the organisation of agriculture, and that is because of not knowing quite where the thing is? In the fourth paragraph you come down to say: "It is indeed surprising, and to the credit of the Civil Services concerned, that some semblance of an agricultural policy and its implementation has, in fact, been maintained." In ways they are contradictory. What I want to ask you is that we have now been around for three months and would it surprise you to know how amazingly few complaints we have had, although many of your members with whom we have had meetings admit that logically the position as it is now is untenable but in fact it is working?

A. That is reasonably correct. It is working, but if we are going to look ahead the whole situation of agriculture is changing. We are moving very fast. We are in surplus. We have been asked, and have done so, to feed a vast Federation; and there is not the slightest doubt about it, to a large number looking at it, the fact that they get their grants and see their Extension Officers may make it look that the situation is working all right. But if you happen to be at the top of the table where you are endeavouring to get prices and get rid of surpluses, the personalities that crop up between one set of services and another set of services, general disagreements that can take place, while it may seem to the layman to be working well, perhaps I take it rather as a compliment, to those at the top it does not work always so well.

Q. Paragraph 13, is it in fact as easy as that? You say really the question is whether everything goes back in toto to the Territorial Governments or whether it goes Federal. Have you turned your mind if for, say, political reasons—I do not say it will happen—but say in the event of that day-to-day working on the farms' production side seemed to be put down to the Territories themselves, on the other hand keeping the marketing Federal, would that be a feasible proposition?

A. Of course, we have envisaged this one. My own idea of it is that it could work, but in the long run it would be an interim method, it would be another of these changes and changes that go on. Once again, I have had quite a little bit of experience of this, not altogether different, still under agriculture, if everything has to work it is like the Army; you have one man at the head, Corps Commanders and Company Commanders who make it work smoothly. I still believe from what I have seen already of differences of opinion in the Federal Government just from the Union in the Territorial Governments, many of the people are from England, all with different views and still within agriculture. You would still have this division, and I am convinced that even if we did work it for a few years once again, with respect, there would be another Commission or some other Commission seeing how we could change the thing or improve it. In my opinion and in that of my colleagues we say why not put it down now and put it under one, and if it is under one Government, there is only one Government, the Federal Government.

Q. If you did put everything under the Federal Government, do you think it would work if you did it overnight, if you did not have the goodwill of individual farmers of all the different Territories who said they are not going to operate that? Would it work under those circumstances?

A. You have mentioned all the farmers in the Territories—I must make it clear whatever individual evidence you may have received that this particular document carries the full support of the R.N.F.U. in every Branch of Northern Rhodesia and Southern Rhodesia. When you say every farmer, there must be the African view from the farmer's side, which I accept. Already in two areas there would be opposition. There is the odd man amongst our own ranks at this stage who is on his own bat. The Northern Rhodesia Government is taking a strong line in view of finances. Northern farmers are hard up and they are beginning to think they will get more from the North than they would from the Federal Government. In Southern Rhodesia, again, you will find the odd man who will give evidence because he is worried to the extent it is political. In Southern Rhodesia certainly the Colonial Office is not exactly popular and the way some of them view the future with the politics of the Federal Government, and as a final point their own Territorial Government, is the last ditch stand. You may get the odd man who may want to take it back to the Territorial Government. On the overall basis I feel this document must be accepted as having the general support of European farmers and I would believe possibly the support of the organised African farmers in the Southern Territory.

Q. May I go on to the African farmer. In paragraph 2 you really suggest there that you cannot go on forever discussing agriculture in Nyasaland away from Europeans, away from Africans?

A. That is totally correct.

Q. How are you getting on with them? At the moment they have an organisation of their own?

A. Correct.

Q. How close is the liaison, first of all to Federal and then Territorial, and what are your plans and your feelings on that?

A. The position is simple. This paragraph says we realise other people are in the game as well. We do not see a lot of Africans who are in African areas like reserves, they come very much under the Territorial Government, who are very jealous of them. We have attempted to make liaison with the one official Union in Northern Rhodesia but we point out to them that the R.N.F.U. has nothing to do with politics; agriculture is not political. We do not get to the stage of trade unions like miners and railway men, and once anybody becomes a politician he is removed to more exalted spheres. That clamped down a little bit on the African gentlemen in the North who envisaged something like a body which would move politically and we saw no more of them. In Southern Rhodesia our Union has done much to bring forward the African Farmers' Union in Southern Rhodesia and in fact it is almost historical information that the whole of their future and their constitution was drawn up in the Board-room of the R.N.F.U. and we did very much to help them draw it up. We have a permanent Committee that liaises directly with the Committee of the African Farmers' Union.

Q. Which is Southern Rhodesian?

A. Yes. We do not like politics and it became fairly apparent that the gentlemen in the North were looking for a further political body amongst numerous other bodies, we did not go very much further with it. But we would give them all support to form a Union.

Q. Take it to the other extreme—if you got everything you want in your memorandum, all agriculture was Federal, would it be your object then to get very close relationships?

A. Most certainly. It is the policy of my Union which is entirely in favour of full liaison with the African Farmers' Union or Asiatic Farmers' Union or Coloured Farmers' Union. We believe in organised agriculture we have to work together to get the best results for everybody.

Q. What sort of calibre are the Africans who are your opposite numbers?

A. They are what we call largely in the African Purchase Areas in Southern Rhodesia where they are landowners and potential landowners. I have not found among them any of real calibre to carry a presidency with all the peculiar things it entails in being a President of the Rhodesia National Farmers' Union. The men who are actually running their Union at the present moment are of very useful and good standard. When we finalized that constitution there were about eighteen of the gentlemen with us and I found there in the standard of debates and their determination to learn was first class. As a matter of fact, if they had been an association of the R.N.F.U. I would have thought their standard of debate was very much better than some of my own associates. I think they still quite naturally are faced with their biggest difficulty which will be to find a number of men to organise them on the ground that they are for the benefit of agriculture on an overall basis and not to go gallivanting off on a soap-box with little hope of moving into politics, because once that happens then there would be no further co-operation.

Q. Paragraph 8, what is your conception of the Kariba development authority? You put it clearly in your memorandum. Is it really something like the Tennessee Valley Authority, an independent statutory body?

A. This is something we are not putting forward as any views of what should be done with the Kariba scheme. We have merely introduced it as an example if such a thing would develop, the extraordinary chaotic conditions which would ensue. If you look at this particular scheme, it will be one of the biggest problems you have ever seen in your life. Any scheme like that, in my opinion, will have to be run by the Federal Government.

Q. There would be a Kariba development authority which would be a statutory body independent in its day to day working but under the overall guidance of the Federal Government?

A. We produced this merely as an example if it took place; we are not making any recommendations. We merely used this as an example to you as this Territory develops something like this obviously would take place, an extraordinary muddle could occur if it were done.

SIR DONALD MACGILLIVRAY: Could I ask something further on this matter of the African and European Unions. If Agriculture were to be under a single administration in Southern Rhodesia, whether it was Federal or Territorial, would you think it would be desirable, and if desirable do you think that it would come about that the Unions should merge, both European and African Unions, into a single Union?

A. This is a place where we have got to say what we think. You gentlemen have been round the Federation and obviously it does not take me very long to tell you the general feelings that possibly are envisaged. My own personal opinion is simply this: it has taken me four years to develop this Union into a reasonably strong, and, if I may say so, powerful Union. We have to be powerful because we are few, there are only 6,000 of us in the country, and the Federal vote comes from the town and industry; the farmer is in the minority. If I were to say that at this stage to merge the two together, I would rarely have a Union of so many Europeans and so many Africans and a vast wedge of the Europeans would go out, and I think the vast wedge of the Africans would not join, and all the power I have for the benefit of Europeans or even of the Africans would be lost, and I have no sign in any way from the African Unions that they would wish to join the European farmers. It is definitely at this stage and I think at least for the interim period we are probably right to do so.

Q. You see separate Unions for some time?

A. Yes.

Q. If that were so, when it came to price negotiations with Government or making representations to Government, would you say that the Unions would come together before going to Government to speak with one voice?

A. I think it is very wrong under a system like this where the African would be working under a similar system to ours, he has also a Licensing Act, on the ground of whether we would foregather, I am certain there would be discussions as to the actual policy and what we wanted.

Q. If there was to be split up, that Agriculture should be administered by Territorial Government, not by the Federal Government, would you say that a single European Union for Northern Rhodesia and Southern Rhodesia would continue or would there have to be a split in the Union?

A. Of course we would try to keep it together on the ground, again, that unity is strength, but inevitably where you get a young country, with the ideas of partnership and the large areas, I should see developing in that Union the North and South becoming a Mason Dixon line and at this stage there is the key of the North and South. In Southern Rhodesia there are Bulawayo and Salisbury, which are two bull-terriers I went back to handle, but there is no North and South. But inevitably, if it went back to the Territories, however much we stood as one Union, I can see the Northern delegates of Congress on one side, and the Southern men on the other and that division would come. That is one of the reasons why I should prefer it with the Federal Government.

MR. CHIRWA: What facilities can the Africans use of the Land Bank?

A. Yes, there is a Land Bank in Northern Rhodesia and Southern Rhodesia. (MR. BOENDERS): I think the position in Southern Rhodesia at any rate is that the African Purchase Area farmers do have full access to the Land Bank in the Southern territory. I am not certain of the position in the North, but I do not think as yet the Land Bank makes loans to the African Farmers' Union in Northern Rhodesia. (MR. EVANS): I would say, of course, that where the African has reached the stage, as he has in the African Purchase Areas, he is faced with the same trouble we have, cost of production and labour, we would be entirely giving him the same facilities, and he must have them. I think the time has come when he gets officially the same price, but various percentages are deducted from the various commodities, I think he has to get the same price, grade for grade, and he must learn to handle it himself and pay for it himself instead of being overruled from the other side.

Q. I do not know whether the question of title deeds for Africans has come before you?

A. No.

Q. Whether you have heard anything about it, I do not know?

A. No. I would again make the point that that is the sort of thing that would go before the African Farmers' Union, and if they were at all worried about it, they will have every right to come on to us, we will use legal men, and economists, to help them. We have already done so on a specific point.

Q. The third question is political, contained in the memorandum at paragraph 13 (f):—

"For all practical purposes there is as yet only the European population of less than 300,000 to draw upon, as the African in his present stage of emergence has not as yet shown any pronounced administrative ability."

The question I wanted to raise was what opportunities are given to Africans in this country to acquire this administrative ability because a person can only acquire ability if he is practising it?

A. That is a political one. I might also say, what have been my opportunities for acquiring administrative ability? I have learnt as I went along. I am quite certain the Africans will learn as they develop their administrative ability, there will be openings for them. The R.N.F.U. is not in a position to offer or suggest political responsibility for anybody.

MR. ROBINSON. You made a statement a little earlier about the difficulties prior to Federation that agriculture faced, and you did make a comment that amongst those difficulties there were the difficulties or clash of personalities as between Territorial Governments. I am not interested in the clash of personalities except in so far as they affect the overall efficiency and working of any system. My question does not seek to ask you to disclose what personalities are engaged in differences or anything of that nature, but what I would like you to enlarge slightly upon is what practical difficulties did you have prior to Federation in terms of efficient marketing of your product and the conduct of agriculture as between the Governments?

A. The Cattle Marketing Board in Northern Rhodesia and the whole question of cattle. The Cattle Marketing Board was a Territorial Board—I had the privilege of sitting on it for a while. This was before federation with Southern Rhodesia. There was the question of cattle coming from Bechuanaland to Northern Rhodesia and a lot of us felt that as Southern Rhodesia was one of us, even if there was no federation, more attention should be paid there. The whole question of allocation of stock was discussed and on the veterinary side and individual sides of Government there were clashes of individuals, and one of the reasons why we never got together was in my case as a farmer in Northern Rhodesia with the Territorial Government there was somebody in senior command telling me what to do and what not to do instead of having an organisation of my own to formulate my own policy, and we were not getting anywhere because there were personalities on two sides of the line running into each other.

Q. In the maize industry?

A. Again we came up against a similar thing. Northern Rhodesia had a good year and a surplus, Southern Rhodesia had a bad year and a shortage, and vis-a-vis, there is no main contact of the two sides of Government to manoeuvre it. You had one typical example composed of the Secretariat in the North which was the biggest one and was mostly drawn from Home, many of them may not have had a true agricultural view. On the Southern side there were many senior people drawn from the Union, and again on a question like that time and time again there was quite definitely a clash between the two sides and often in many cases we could not get anywhere. To me it is still a reason apart from even a political one why the Federal Government should have control where I believe something along the line I made earlier, you must have somebody sitting on top of it. It was there and I can only say it was.

MR. HADLOW: I think you will agree Nyasaland is right outside your consideration?

A. I am afraid it is.

Q. Except in the case of a certain kind of cotton which comes for spinning, and groundnuts?

A. Yes.

Q. Cold Storage, of course, has started up there and is doing very well. I think it is the best thing that ever happened to Nyasaland, but apart from that there is no co-operation.

A. We have the Nyasaland Farmers' Union, of course, which is a very small body indeed, it might have fifty members, and, of course, all sorts of other Associations, Tea Associations, etc.

Q. But there is no co-operation between you and those Associations?

A. At the present moment there is liaison. From time to time in our paper we print something that the other papers will not print. We print it for them because they are in the farming economy the same as ourselves. We give them every backing that we can. I regret I am not able to bring them into the block.

Q. The Nyasaland Government decided about six months ago not to pursue the question of federalising the European agriculture because there was the African position today.

A. The only point, when I suggested that they came in, because if they did not, exactly what has happened would happen.

MR. WOODROW CROSS: May I ask Mr. Evans to enlarge upon the Maize Marketing and Dairy Board as it affects the Federal set-up and the Territorial Governments?

A. As you know, the key from the producer's point of view is price and how he markets his produce, and it has been a policy of the R.N.F.U. to try and develop an orderly marketing scheme, the same for both Territories. What we call orderly marketing does mean a guaranteed price over a number of years, and, what is most important, a guaranteed buyer. The long-term prices are first class but it is no good until you see the cheque in your pocket, and only one person can do that, and that is the residual buyer, and we have endeavoured to produce a standard system of marketing in the Territories which strengthens our hand. At a certain period we were alarmed in the North, particularly as far as beef was concerned, and I was negotiating for the future of the farmers' prices. The North could never have a guaranteed price because there was no guaranteed buyer such as the statutory bodies down here, so the obvious thing we had to do was to give the North what Southern Rhodesia had, and we moved the Cold Storage into Northern Rhodesia. It was the only body which could guarantee any price. The Grain Marketing Board went in much earlier and I would submit if there had been two Grain Marketing Boards we would have been in considerable trouble. It is still R.N.F.U. policy to bring the Grain Marketing Board in control in Northern Rhodesia. The original system was all right while it was working on the question of whole milk, but now they have moved into surplus milk, and the surplus milk is getting less in Southern Rhodesia. We believe the simplest way is to get one standard system for the two States set up. From the R.N.F.U. point of view it gives us a further hand on these statutory bodies. From our members we are allowed to nominate onto them. Sometimes you are working with a Board which you have not so direct a say. We do have a fairly liberal scheme where we agree to prices and policy and we have a statutory board controlled by that Government which implements that policy on which we have some say, and we have tried to develop that. Cattle has put Northern Rhodesia on the map as a beef country and I am convinced that the Grain Marketing Board is going to facilitate the extraordinary rise in surplus milk which is going to produce far more for Northern Rhodesia than for Southern Rhodesia.

MR. GONDWE: In the second part of paragraph 14, you say:—

"It is considered, however, that once the land has been assigned, the responsibility for its alienation, conservation, occupation and development could perfectly well pass to the Federal Government, who alone have the necessary administrative machine to ensure its proper use and development. By adopting this procedure, African land rights could be fully protected, whilst at the same time permitting proper development and use of all land in the Federation."

Could you amplify that last bit?

A. It is simply this: in a country like this where you have conservation, one thing is to have correct government for growing your crops; the second thing we believe under one general system for the Federation under one body it could be better done than by individual Governments and individual people having all sorts of different ideas and having a crack at it.

Q. How is the African land to be protected?

A. By protection do you mean from the conservation point of view?

Q. No, from being taken away, land rights.

A. (MR. BOENDERS): It is not suggested here that the assigning of land should pass into the hands of the Federal Government, that would remain a Territorial responsibility, but once that land has been assigned into areas, assuming the existing basis, the actual problems of settlement and development of that land can well become a Federal subject without in any way interfering with the African land rights because the assignment would remain entirely in the hands of the Territorial Government.

Q. Who is going to assign the land?

A. The Territorial Government. (MR. EVANS): Once that land is assigned, from that stage onwards the development of it on the right lines, the co-ordination of it lies with the Federal Government.

MR. HADLOW: It is not understood in Nyasaland at all.

MR. GONDWE: Not at all?

A. The whole assignment of land is something into which we will never push our nose nor would we suggest the Federal Government should do something about it. All we are interested in, once that land has been assigned, whoever makes the demarcation is not our job, nor should we suggest that the Federal Government should do it. But the method of that conservation we feel is better done with one Government than having one Government in Northern Rhodesia, one Territory for the African, one for the European, another in Southern Rhodesia; it leads to gross expenditure, actually paying four Governments to do the job of one. That was the point. There is no suggestion from our side in any way that assignment of land or handing over of land should be handed to the Federal Government at all. All we want to see, whatever demarcation is made which is done on a Territorial basis, whoever the farmers are, whether they are European or African, the best systems are developed for the development of their crops, use of that land and conservation of it.

MR. CRAWLEY: Are these problems of research in the Territories particularly similar or do they differ?

A. Particularly they are similar. There are still variations on an original theme here and there. On the whole basically they are similar. One thing we didn't expect which does not naturally work in Africa, and as you remember the R.N.F.U. handed the remains of its income tax rebate over to a research council to enable scientific research to be done in the Federation instead of importing ideas from outside which do not necessarily apply fundamentally. Maize production is very much the same in Northern Rhodesia, Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland; there might be variations in Nyasaland but there are areas there in the higher altitudes which might be a little more in common with our friends in Kenya, but on the overall basis it is generally applicable.

Q. If your suggestion to place all agriculture under the Federal Government did result in greater increased opposition to Federation as a whole in the North, then would you revert to your alternative suggestion and prefer to see it all under the Territorial Government?

A. I do not think I have made an alternative suggestion, except to say either they must revert or go under one. I can visualise what sort of trouble would result in Northern Rhodesia if it were done. My own opinion is I do not think it would be so much trouble. I think as long as it is clear that there is the demarcation of land, it is merely there for the benefit of agricultural production, I personally do not see there would be any trouble. It is pretty obvious a scheme like this would create serious trouble. It is very difficult for me to say quite what I would do about about it.

MR. HADLOW: That has already happened in Nyasaland as a fact, and that is why the Government have put it off.

A. Quite. That takes me rather on to the political one where you have disturbances in the country. I have my own ideas on that; but no doubt you have had plenty of evidence and I think I would be wasting my time if I attempted to give them.

LORD CRATHORNE: Are you satisfied with the fertiliser position? There seems to be a big build up here. Is it too much of a monopoly?

A. There is no argument about it. We have what I would call two cartels in this country and one, of course, is petrol and the other is fertiliser. One has to be fair. We cannot break through, naturally our job would be to break it, and if we could play one off against the other they are sensible enough to know as long as they close their ranks they are safe. They give a service, and we had quite a debate on this the other day because of the action they took in this particular case of moving the fertiliser depots and not unnaturally the debate mentioned the extraordinary power which these people have here. The first thing we would like you to appreciate is the shocking price they charge us. The comparison began on our economic side. It does seem that their charges of fertilisers are fair and comparable compared with the Union of South Africa and with the Old Country as well. They certainly do an excellent job, they give us all the fertiliser we want. If you are not satisfied with the prices, you can go and find somebody else; that is where they have you. There is nobody else to buy from anyway. The fertiliser comes in, they have it neatly tied up. The only place you can go is Japan, and Japan is a shocking country to deal with on your own. They are a powerful group. Even with that power within reason they do give us two points outright within their services, and within reason their prices are reasonable.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: Have you read the Monopoly Commission Report on fertilisers in the United Kingdom?

A. I regret I have not.

Q. You might find it interesting.

CHAIRMAN: Thank you very much.

Memorandum

CAPRICORN AFRICA SOCIETY (Central Africa Branch)

This memorandum is presented as an expression of the convictions of the Central Africa members of the Capricorn Africa Society.

We believe that the future of the Federation of Central Africa with its many potential advantages, can only be ensured if bold and even drastic changes are effected in the immediate future.

1. Self-Government in the Northern Territories

Before the Federal Constitution can be finally settled and Dominion Status achieved, it is essential that both Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland shall each have achieved a form of responsible government in which it is possible for all significant interests to be represented, and which enjoys the support and recognition of all its people. Until such governments are fully functioning, there should be no attempt to determine the final form of the Federal Constitution.

We, therefore, suggest that a date be agreed upon for the further review of the constitution and that the 1960 review be concerned mainly with determining those changes both in Territorial and Federal legislation whose achievements during the intervening years will give reasonable grounds for hope that all three territories will at that date freely endorse their determination to continue in federal unity. It is obvious that these will be concerned chiefly with the establishment of such safeguards as will serve to promote confidence both in the majority and the minority groups. There must be solid grounds for hope, both that the European minority will not seek to entrench its present monopoly of political power, and that when an African majority on the Voter's Roll is achieved, there will be adequate constitutional safeguards for the rights of the individual.

2. Some Immediate Changes in the Federal Constitution

(a) We recommend that each territory shall be accorded the right to determine the form of franchise under which it shall elect its own representatives to the Federal Parliament. There is precedent for this procedure, both in the U.S.A. and in Nigeria.

(b) We regard it as essential that there shall be incorporated within the constitution a Bill of Rights. For the reasons indicated above it is important that at least the outline of such a bill shall be drawn up now and its general acceptance indicated by all parties. However we recognise that its immediate implementation may not be possible (e.g. in the removal of entrenched land rights). We, therefore, recommend that the incorporation of the Bill of Rights within the Constitution shall be made a necessary precondition before the granting of Dominion Status.

In Appendix A, there is set out a draft of our proposals for a Bill of Rights, based upon the Capricorn Contract. We would draw attention specially to the Preamble. A Bill of Rights can only become a bulwark of civil liberties if, in addition to being a binding legal document it also succeeds in becoming a population affirmation of faith—a sort of civil creed, known and respected by all the people. This was achieved by some of the great charters of liberty in former days. For example, the Preamble to the Constitution of the U.S.A. is learned by heart and repeated regularly in every school and has played no small part in keeping alive the tradition of civil liberty. We need such a creed to guide the future growth of this young Commonwealth and a most appropriate place for it is in the Preamble to the Bill of Rights.

3. Safe-Guarding of Fundamental Human Rights

The Federal Supreme Court should be charged in the first instance with the task of interpreting the Constitution and upholding its provisions dealing with fundamental human rights. Every citizen who conceives his fundamental rights to be infringed or threatened by the act of any Government or Local Authority should be guaranteed access to the Court with the right of further appeal, if need be, to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

4. Changes needed in Southern Rhodesia before the next Review

We fully recognise that the future of the Federation depends in large measure upon the extent to which immediate changes are effected in Southern Rhodesia. These must take place, not only in the amendment of discriminatory and outdated laws, but also in outdated barriers to social intercourse. Unless there can be some quite massive demonstration of the fact that within the next few years this territory is determined so to amend its discriminatory legislation as to ensure all its peoples an equal status as citizens, there can be no hope, either of maintaining present goodwill or of reclaiming the goodwill of those who at present desire the dissolution of the Federation.

In Appendix B there is set out a list of discriminatory Acts at present upon the statute book.

(a) Franchise. Even without an acceleration of the present rate of education, it is obvious that before many years there can be a majority of African voters in Southern Rhodesia. The African people, fear however, and with a measure of justification that, rather than allow such a transition, the European Government of Southern Rhodesia would further amend the franchise qualifications in order to ensure a continued majority of white voters. We regard it as being absolutely essential that the most solemn assurances—with safeguards—shall be given that the course of African advancement shall be allowed to proceed unimpeded and at the most rapid speed, compatible with the economic and human resources available, towards the natural and inevitable goal of an African majority in the Southern Rhodesia Electorate.

We would stress the fact that the dilemma of Southern Rhodesia, when it considers the universal franchise is not that the African is less ready for the vote in this territory than in other parts of this Continent. On the contrary we are proud of the fact that in many respects there is in Southern Rhodesia a higher level of literacy and general development than elsewhere in Africa. Our dilemma is that the rapid approach towards an African majority is liable to plunge the country's politics into a bitter struggle between parties, based upon the rival claims of race, with the consequent danger that the extremist who makes his appeal to the fundamental racial fears and emotions of his electorate is the most likely to win at the poll. It will be the task of the Commission to consider whether any scheme of phased development of the franchise can be devised which will make possible within a reasonably short time a transition towards universal franchise that avoids this danger of extremism. We have been impressed with some of the proposals already placed before the Constitution Commission by the Kenya Party to meet the needs of that country.

(b) Land reform in Southern Rhodesia. The general effect of the Land Apportionment Act, 1941, is to limit for the exclusive use of the European population of Southern Rhodesia, which constitutes about one-twelfth of the total population, approximately one-half of the total land available. Moreover, all the towns are in the European areas where Africans may reside but with very limited rights of occupation. Much of the African Area has poor soil and low rainfall and some is infested with Tsetse Fly. On the other hand most of the European area has more fertile soil. All this has given rise to an acute problem of over-population and consequent pressure upon the soil in the native rural areas, which is one of the main obstacles to racial harmony and the planned development of the country's natural resources. As immediate steps towards the solution of this problem we would advocate:

(i) The repeal or substantial amendment of the Land Apportionment Act, and

(ii) The rendering illegal of any statutory enactment, regulation or Bye-Law or any condition in a title deed or contract of sale or lease which restricts the ownership, acquisition use or occupation of land by any citizen on the grounds of race or colour.

In conclusion, we would commend to all members of the Commission—and especially to our own representatives—an examination of the principles of the Capricorn Contract, as providing the only firm foundation upon which a society of many diverse races can hope to build in unity in Central Africa.

Appendix A

Draft Bill of Rights

Preamble: As citizens of the Federation of Central Africa we are resolved to work for the establishment of a society free from racial discrimination and upheld by a system of law and Government based upon the principles of Christian democracy. We acknowledge our common human destiny under the providence of God and our common allegiance to the Crown. We hold that:

1. All men despite their varying talents and their diversities of race and colour are born equal in dignity before God and have a common duty towards Him and towards one another;
2. The stability of a community depends upon the recognition and fulfilment by each individual of his responsibilities towards his fellow men;
3. It is the obligation of the State to ensure the conditions under which every individual shall have equal opportunity of developing his natural gifts to their fullest extent and to make his maximum contribution to the common weal.

We accept as a principal condition of full self-government the adoption by the nation of a written Constitution drawn up in the spirit of the Preamble and incorporating the following Articles:

Article I: Subject to the exigencies of legislation necessary for the preservation of law and order, no enactment of the Federal Legislature or any subordinate authority shall be valid if it infringes the rights set out in this Bill.

Article II: All citizens are guaranteed equal standing before the law and are entitled, subject to the law, to freedom of religion and expression and freedom of movement, association and peaceable assembly.

Article III: No law of the Federal Legislature or of any subordinate authority shall be of any force or effect if:

- (a) It imposes or directly or indirectly has the effect of imposing on a person of any one race any disability which does not apply equally to persons of other races in respect of:
 - (i) the acquisition, ownership, occupation or use of property;
 - (ii) undertaking or engaging in any profession, occupation, trade, business or employment;
 - (iii) access to public institutions and services provided by the state;
 - (iv) the qualifications for enrolment on the voters' roll for any parliamentary or local authority elections.
- (b) it renders any person liable to deprivation of life or property without trial under due process of law;
- (c) It renders the property of any person liable to expropriation without just compensation;
- (d) It exposes any person to arrest or search without warrant issued upon reasonable and just cause and under proper judicial authority;
- (e) It renders a person liable to prosecution and conviction for an act or omission which was not an offence at the time of its perpetration;
- (f) It permits the detention in custody of any person for a longer period than twenty-four hours without his being brought before a magistrate and furnished with the grounds for his detention.

Article IV: All citizens shall have access to the legal machinery provided by the State for the protection and enforcement of these rights.

Appendix B

Discriminatory Legislation in Southern Rhodesia

1. Introductory

There are a large number of Acts on the Statute Book as well as Statutory regulations and Local Authority Bye-laws which discriminate against non-Europeans (mainly Africans) and which will have to be repealed or subsequently amended before it can be fairly said that partnership is being implemented in Southern Rhodesia in the spirit of the preamble to the Federal Constitution. In this Appendix it is proposed to list only a few of the more important discriminatory Acts and Regulations and to add a short explanatory note about each.

2. Land

The Land Apportionment Act, 1941. This is dealt with in the body of the Memorandum itself (see page 4 paragraph (b)).

3. Laws restricting Movement and Personal Freedom

(a) The Pass Laws.

These Laws which subject Africans to a strict system of administration control over their movement and residence, not applicable to Europeans, are to be found in the following Acts:

- (i) Natives (Registration and Identification) Act, 1957. This obliges all male Africans, except a limited few who are granted special exemption, to register upon reaching the age of sixteen years and thereafter to carry with them Certificates of Registration.
- (ii) Natives Urban Locations Act (Chapter 84).
- (iii) Natives Registration Act (Chapter 76).
- (iv) Natives (Urban Areas) Accommodation and Registration Act, 1951. For the practical effect of these three Acts which apply only in the urban areas the Commission is referred to the Report of the Urban African Affairs Commission, pages 42-46 and 111-113.

(b) The Native Affairs Act (Chapter 72) provides that no African shall move from one District to another without the consent of the Native Commissioners of both Districts.

(c) The Migrant Workers Act, 1948, prohibits Africans from going to Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland without the prescribed pass or permit.

(d) There are extensive Regulations published under the Land Apportionment Act or in Municipal Bye-laws restricting the holding of public meetings in African areas without a permit.

(e) The Native Affairs Act makes it an offence for an African to be guilty of insolence or contemptuous behaviour towards any Government official, Chief, Headman or Head of Kraal.

(f) The Native Affairs Act provides that all Africans shall promptly obey or comply with any lawful or reasonable order, request or direction of any Headman, Chief, Native Commissioner or other officer administering Native Affairs.

(g) The Native Juveniles Employment Act (Chapter 89) empowers a Native Commissioner to order the summary whipping of African male juveniles who disobey his orders, and empowers the Native Commissioner, in certain circumstances, to contract an African juvenile into service.

(h) The Immorality and Indecency Suppression Act (Chapter 36) makes it an offence (for both parties) for an African man to have illicit intercourse with a white woman.

4. Clauses imposing Penal Sanctions on Africans for what are normally regarded as only Civil Wrongs

There are a number of examples where acts performed by Africans are criminally punishable where they are not so punishable if performed by non-Africans, for example:

(a) The Natives (Registration and Identification) Act, 1957 makes it an offence to enter into a contract of service while already under a contract of employment with another employer.

(b) The Native Labour Regulations Act (Chapter 86) makes it an offence for an African labourer to desert or absent himself from employment or to fail to enter on or carry out the terms of his contract, or unlawfully do or omit to do anything which causes or is likely to cause injury to persons or property.

(c) The Masters and Servants Act (Chapter 231) contains similar provisions which apply to persons of all races but in practice it is mostly Africans who come within its scope since its operation is restricted to persons performing domestic or manual labour and it does not extend to skilled workmen.

(d) The Natives (Registration and Identification) Act makes it an offence for any African to trespass on the property of any other person unless he is in his employment or has his permission, or unless he is seeking work at a reasonable time, or has any other reasonable excuse.

5. The Police

Under the Police Regulations, 1956, non-Europeans occupy an inferior status in the Police Force. The conditions of service discriminate against the non-Europeans in respect of rank and promotion, pay and allowances, leave conditions, pensions and in other respects.

6. Local Government

There are numerous discriminatory provisions to be found in Local Authority Bye-laws and Regulations while the general effect of the Municipal Acts and other Acts dealing with Africans in the urban areas is to exclude Africans from urban local government, or by any effective control over their own affairs there.

7. Miscellaneous Examples of Discriminatory Laws

- (a) The Liquor Act, 1953, and the Native Beer Act, 1953, discriminate against Africans in respect of the kinds of liquor they may consume, the source from which they may obtain liquor and the places where they may drink it.
- (b) The Firearms Act, 1956, restricts the possession of fire-arms and ammunition by non-Europeans and the Possession of Explosives (Natives and Asiatics) Act contains similar restrictions in respect of explosives.
- (c) The Native Tax Act (Chapter 78) imposes a poll tax on every adult male of £2 a year. It is a criminal offence to fail to pay such tax. Africans are also subject to the ordinary Federal Income Tax Laws.

8. Conclusion

As already stated above, this List is not exhaustive and there are other Acts, as well as a host of Statutory Regulations and Local Authority Bye-laws which contain discriminatory provisions. The general effect of these discriminatory laws, especially the Native Affairs Act and the Acts dealing with Africans in urban areas, is to establish a separate system of government for Africans within the framework of the ordinary Government of the country, the latter being regarded as mainly concerned with European affairs. There is thus a divided system—normal democratic Government for Europeans and executive and administrative control for Africans. It should be noted that these discriminatory laws, regulations and Bye-laws have been passed despite the provisions of Section 28 of the Constitution, Letters Patent, under which any laws whereby natives may be subjected or made liable to any conditions, disabilities or restrictions to which persons of European descent are not also subjected or made liable, are reserved for Her Majesty's pleasure. This indicates the need expressed in the body of the Memorandum for additional safe-guards in the form of entrenchment clauses in the Constitution limiting the legislative sovereignty of Parliament.

Oral Evidence

CAPRICORN AFRICA SOCIETY—Representatives: Rev. F. B. Rea, Mr. C. D. J. Lewis and Mr. Leopold Takawira)

THE REV. F. B. REA: The only introduction we would wish to make would be a brief reference to what the Capricorn Africa Society is. Some may have heard of it, others may have not. It is a society that had its inception in this country about ten or eleven years ago, largely through the meeting together of Mr. David Stirling and Mr. T. J. Hlazo, and at that time as they considered the way in which things were shaping in Africa, with a certain amount of prophetic foresight they saw a constitutional phase was about to emerge not only in Southern Rhodesia but in all the territories in the Capricorn region. As you all know that is what has happened, and the constitution making has been very much in the air. The Capricorn Africa Society came into existence, and when it came to see its goal more clearly it realised that the most valuable contribution it could make would be an attempt to prepare people in their thinking for the constitutional changes that were likely to take place, and their hope was that there might be established a sort of blue-print for constitutions generally, laying down basic principles with their specific relationship to Africa. Land and education and certain other matters require a special emphasis and a special place in any constitution and inter-racial aspects are of great importance. The Society set out to try and draw up a contract which would be acceptable to peoples generally and then set about the task of trying to soften up the thinking of the peoples in preparation for the day when these matters would have to be the focal point in political action. That, of course, brings the Society very close to being a political Party, but at the same time we have always rigidly maintained that we are not a Party in the strict political sense of the word. We are attempting to develop what you might call education for citizenship amongst the peoples as a whole, not through any Party medium and not through any Party political action. We hoped that we might give birth to Parties, and I think that has taken place to a certain extent, but broadly our aim was to keep to the main first principles of political change.

We would like you to have that in mind as you ask us questions today because it is quite likely, almost inevitable, that some questions will arise to which speaking personally we might be very happy to give answers, but speaking as a society which embraces all Parties of this country we would feel were outside our province.

CHAIRMAN: This memorandum you have put in says early on that you think the future of the Federation can only be assured if bold and even drastic changes are effected in the immediate future. Then a little later you talk of a date that ought to be agreed upon for a further review of the Constitution. You regard the review that will be taking place at the end of this year or the beginning of next as a preliminary review?

A. Yes, the drastic changes we felt were on the Territorial level, because we have said that before any permanent change was made at the federal level, it would be essential in our view that both Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland had their own constitutions and were functioning under a form of self-government.

Q. I asked the question because fundamentally what we have got to do is to review that Federal Constitution, and I wanted to be sure that you thought we had to look at the Territorial Constitution first, and at a later date one could then look at the Federal Constitution. I just want to follow that. If you look at the second paragraph under heading 1, you have said in the first paragraph, "Until such Governments are functioning"—those are the Territorial ones—"there should be no attempt to determine the final form of the Constitution. We therefore suggest that a date be agreed upon for the further review of the Constitution, and that the 1960 Review would be concerned mainly with determining those changes both in Territorial and Federal legislation whose achievement during the intervening years will give reasonable grounds for hope that all three Territories will at that date freely endorse their determination to continue in federal unity."

A. The operative word there is "final form". Our opinion was that it was within the scope of this Commission not to indicate what type of Constitution would be made out Territorially for either Northern Rhodesia or Nyasaland, but at any rate to say that it was not expedient and wise that there should be any attempt to crystallise the final form of the Constitution until a greater measure of self-government had made it possible for those territories to have a more active and more representative voice in the final shaping. That was our main point.

Q. What I want to know is this: are you suggesting that we should make recommendations in the interim period for changes in the Federal Constitution?

A. Certain changes we have indicated, yes.

Q. What is the most important one?

A. Our thought was that in the main this Commission should make recommendations as to phases of transition. I think that would be the thing we would emphasise most, and we felt rather strongly that one of the first transitions would be the delineation of a Bill of Rights and the indication of how that Bill of Rights might be safeguarded. One has to be realistic enough to realise that if a Bill of Rights were incorporated in the Constitution in 1960, anything that could be introduced in the year 1960 might be very much less than what we want it to be; but anything that could be firmly and solemnly agreed upon in 1960 would have to include complete equality with regard to access to land. Now, as we said in our memorandum, we did not feel that that change could immediately be implemented in 1960 but that the Commission could recommend a Bill of Rights which would indicate how steps might be taken towards the attainment of that end. We recognise the incorporation of a Bill of Rights within the Constitution and its implementation should be the necessary pre-condition of granting Dominion status. It is in that sense we feel the Commission could do its most valued work by indicating the steps towards final completion of the Constitution.

Q. Apart from the Bill of Rights, you say a good deal about changes, first of all giving us a list of discriminatory Acts in the second Appendix, and then turning to the franchise. Is there anything you would like to add about the franchise?

A. We have two things about the franchise. One concerns the three Territories. We have suggested that each Territory should have its own rights to determine the mode by which it elects its representatives and not simply that it should be within the power of the Federal Government to determine how voting shall take place in all three Territories. That is one thing that we emphasise. Then we gave indications as to what is the particular dilemma with regard to franchise in Southern Rhodesia. We felt that that was one of the major questions with which we were concerned in speaking from this part of the Capricorn Society.

Q. In paragraph 4, near the end of sub-paragraph (a) Franchise; you say about Southern Rhodesia, "It will be the task of the Commission to consider whether any scheme of phased development of the franchise can be devised which will make possible within a reasonably short time a transition towards universal franchise that avoids this danger of extremism". Have you any more precise ideas of the times or the steps?

A. I do not think we stated anything, Mr. Chairman, because time and one's estimates of time change from month to month at the present period. That is one of our dilemmas. We would not like to set dates.

(MR. TAKAWIRA): As members of the Capricorn Society we do believe in the qualitative franchise, and of course the task will be while retaining qualitative franchise at the same time to widen it sufficiently to ensure that Governments are sufficiently responsible to all sections of the population, so that significant interests are not left out.

Q. Have you any more precise idea of what ought to be done?

A. (REV. REA): There is the Kenya model and the setting aside of multiple constituencies, where you can elect one representative of each of the three major racial groups—that might be an intermediate stage. This would be combined with open constituencies by which either one of the three races would elect a representative, depending upon the preponderance within a particular constituency. That would be with a view to gradually expanding the representation on a wider basis.

Q. I think I follow that. Then in your Appendix B, you deal with legislation in Southern Rhodesia. Of the various points which you have mentioned, apart from the Land Apportionment Act, the pass laws are the most important, are they, or is there anything of equal importance?

A. I would say pass laws are the most important as being the greatest irritant.

Q. Do you think it would be enough to have one pass for a man to carry; is that what you suggest?

A. Yes, insofar as it was necessary for administration or reasons of obtaining employment and so on.

(MR. TAKAWIRA): We feel that the African section is being burdened by these passes, that while we agree that all citizens in a country should have one form of identification or another for the good of the country, there should be one system of pass which would embrace all peoples and not one system for Indians and another for the Africans and a third for Europeans. We feel it is possible for us all to have one type of identification throughout the country. If these two or three systems were applicable to all races, this racial strife which we are experiencing would not exist. The fact that one section carries more than one identification and another does not, does cause irritation.

Q. You recognise the desirability of there being a pass, do you?

A. Yes, we do.

Q. That is essential?

A. Yes.

Q. You think one would do?

A. For all the citizens of the country.

Q. Is there any administrative necessity for the Europeans to have passes?

A. We think so.

Q. I see the argument that in order not to discriminate it is better for everybody to carry a pass; you recognise that if it is necessary for the African, is it equally necessary for the European?

A. I do not quite know what is operating amongst the Europeans, but we have been told that even Europeans in this country have a sort of pass, and all the working citizens should have this one type of identification.

Q. Can you tell me if the draft Bill of Rights comes from any one source? Was it a document which has been prepared by the Society or is it taken from other models?

A. (MR. LEWIS): I was asked to draft this and also at the same time one for the Central Africa Party. I think you will find a lot of similarity.

Q. I notice that.

A. (REV. REA): When we were working on this we, of course, paid a lot of attention first of all to the Capricorn Charter, then to the considerable amount of work that was done in Kenya. But we thought that that one was a bit long and wordy so we endeavoured to modify it. We also had a lot of help from an American constitutional lawyer who was with us at the time. Both the American and the Indian Bills of Rights were before us as we thought about the problem.

Q. Is there any marked point of difference between the Central Africa Party proposals and this?

A. (MR. LEWIS): I have not seen the Central Africa Party one; I worked on an earlier draft, I have not seen it since then.

MR. McCLELAND: Could you tell us what support the Capricorn Society has in the Federation? Does it represent the views of a considerable portion of the population?

A. (REV. REA): No. The scope of and the influence of the Society has varied a great deal from time to time, partly depending upon the availability of staff to promote the movement. At the present time we would say it does not represent to any degree the Nyasaland peoples; and only to a very small degree indeed the people of Northern Rhodesia, though there were one or two who consulted with us and who gave their own personal approval to what we have produced. In Southern Rhodesia it represents, I suppose, a membership of about 2,000. It functions as a movement that has its nucleus of active people and its larger fringe of well-wishers.

CHAIRMAN: Has it gone up and down? I gather from you that it has? Has it been much higher than that in membership in earlier years?

A. I am afraid I could not answer that question, I am not sure.

(MR. TAKAWIRA): It is not really that it had gone up and down in membership, but, for instance, round about 1956 enthusiasm was very high indeed among Europeans and Africans, particularly in Southern Rhodesia, but as Mr. Rea has pointed out the number of staff dwindled to about two people. Then the enthusiasm of the members also has gone down, not that they have resigned from the Society, they are still on our books, but they are not as enthusiastic as they used to be.

MR. GONDWE: In Appendix B, you say the Native Affairs Act makes it an offence for an African to be guilty of insolence or contemptuous behaviour towards any Government official, Chief, Headman or Head of Kraal. You have surely discussed this with Government officials—people responsible for the drafting or the implementation of this law. Why is it that such legislation came to be passed?

A. (MR. LEWIS): We have merely noted that this provision does exist in the Act, and we regard it as discriminatory. We have not taken any action in relation to it.

(REV. REA): I think purely accidentally I could answer the question as seen through the eyes of, I think, the Chief Native Commissioner at the time when this Act was a Bill. I asked him personally about why it was being brought in. It happened to coincide with other forms of emergency legislation. The Bill itself had been drafted only eighteen months or so before and it arose out of the difficulties that Chiefs and Headmen were experiencing at that time, when there was the beginning of the upsurge and unrest which eventually led to the emergency. He claimed that this particular Act was partly at the request of the Chiefs, that was what he said. I do not know to what extent that represents the whole position. I am simply quoting.

Q. I think you are not really the right people to whom to address these questions; I think they should be put to those in authority, the Government officials. It is very difficult to understand why such laws should have been passed at all.

SIR VICTOR ROBINSON: I think this was in the High Commissioner's Proclamation of 1910, and it was merely carried over into the Native Affairs Act of 1927.

A. This has nothing to do with the Act of 1959?

MR. GONDWE: This law could be applied indiscriminately. A person possibly answering an official in a way which the official may think was contemptuous would be punished for it.

A. (MR. TAKAWIRA): In fact I am a bit surprised to hear that this has nothing to do with the 1959 Act because when this was still a Bill we petitioned the Prime Minister in the presence of the Chief Native Commissioner, and they definitely said they were bringing this Bill in because the Chiefs were worrying them. They were complaining that the chaps were giving them a hard time and such abuse should be reduced. It is quite true that the law could be used indiscriminately, because for a long time Native Commissioners had a free hand in the reserves and no native ever questioned them at all. Anything they wanted was carried out. With the coming of the emergent African, the young type of African with education, they began querying some of the actions the Native Commissioners were taking, and to the Native Commissioner this was insolence. They had not been used to such a thing. With the coming of the young generation, who thought anyone could make a mistake, the Native Commissioners took it as insolence, and they wanted it to be framed into law so that those insolent youngsters could be chided.

MR. CHIRWA: May I know from the members of the Capricorn Society whether they seriously think that if the London Conference of 1960 to review the Constitution did not decide on a permanent solution, there could be development in these Territories during the interim period?

A. (REV. REA): Yes, during the subsequent period.

Q. The interim period, because you are suggesting that that will not have had the progress?

A. In other words, if it is not finalised in 1960, is there any hope that there would be a later date when the Federation could be finalised? Is that the question?

Q. No, that is not my question. Let me put it this way. It is felt that there is no development taking place in Nyasaland and obviously in Southern Rhodesia there is a great deal of unemployment according to reports from the Administrators of African Affairs in these towns. In Nyasaland we know there is hardly any employment. Therefore these countries are in a very difficult position. What you are suggesting here is that there should be a London Conference held but that one must not take a final decision, one must take an interim decision. What I am trying to find out is, whether your suggestion would not result in lengthening the period of uncertainty and therefore the period of unemployment among the peoples in these territories?

A. We recognise that danger. The basis on which we drew up our memorandum was the continuance of Federation. I think that our feeling was that we should stick to it; but our point was without prejudice to the question, should the Federation survive or should it not. We have stated the view that if it is to survive then it is our conviction that finalising in 1960 is really impossible. We recognise that if it were finalised in the sense of saying this is Federation and this is its Constitution, and that was determined in 1960, at any rate things would be definite, but probably there would be even more trouble and more unemployment than by taking the risk of postponing the final decision.

MR. GONDWE: In other words, you are not in favour of the Federation being broken down, you would like it to continue, and you can see no hope of it continuing if the final decision were to be taken at the 1960 talks?

A. I think that sums up our position.

MR. CHRWA: You are suggesting in paragraph 1 that there should be self-government for the Northern Territories, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland. No doubt you must have read or have heard that Sir Edgar Whitehead has stated clearly that if that took place Southern Rhodesia would not be a member of the Federation. How do you reconcile this with the statement you make?

A. I do not think that Sir Edgar Whitehead consulted us when he made that statement.

(MR. TAKAWIRA): To add to what Mr. Rea has said in regard to the first question of Mr. Chirwa, I would say that there is a minority group in the Capricorn Africa Society which feels that the work of the Capricorn Africa Society is to prepare the means whereby all races here would be happy, whether there is Federation or no Federation, that whether Nyasaland secedes or not that will happen, and therefore that the concept of the Capricorn Africa Society will be as important after Federation as it is now. Therefore some of this minority group feels that in order to bring about this spirit of good understanding and harmony it is no use trying to build up this Federation because it will never work. Why not let it go by and let people in peace? We realise that, if Nyasaland or Northern Rhodesia were to be given self-government and if their territorial franchise was to be applicable, Southern Rhodesia would be faced with a very difficult problem to solve. For instance, in the Federal Assembly today Southern Rhodesia is represented by more people than Nyasaland or Northern Rhodesia put together, which is because Southern Rhodesia claims it has more voters on the voters' roll than Nyasaland or Northern Rhodesia. Supposing the franchise of Northern Rhodesia was extended and more people came in, then Northern Rhodesia would say that they also should be represented by a number that is equal to Southern Rhodesia, and I could not see Southern Rhodesia agreeing to that. Whichever way you look at it, it seems that Federation cannot stand. This is a minority feeling in the Capricorn Africa Society.

MR. CRAWLEY: This question of the different franchise in the different Territories—do you think that an African in Southern Rhodesia would be satisfied with an Assembly in which their African friends in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland were fully represented and in which no Africans from Southern Rhodesia were represented at all?

A. No.

Q. Is not that the effect of the proposal you are making?

A. No, it is not that. That is only one side of the question, because the agitation for the breaking down of the Federation is more from the North than from here. If the maintenance of the Federation is likely to upset and interfere with our race relations, it will do so more in the North than here. But coming down to Southern Rhodesia, people will not be contented if the franchise is left where it is. Although it is open to all people in theory it has not been possible for the Africans in practice to come on the voters' roll. As you see, since 1923 when self-rule was given, there is not even a single African in the House of Assembly.

Q. It has been suggested that Africans down here are more interested in economic development than political development?

A. In fact that is the greatest insult the African is suffering from today. If there is anything which is going to make a nationalist movement grow more quickly it is statements of that kind.

SIR CHARLES ARDEN-CLARKE: I am not clear on the effect of these two reviews which have been suggested. As far as I can see you suggest that there are two main conclusions which should be reached in the 1960 Review. The first is that the two Northern Territories should achieve their own Constitutions, giving them responsible Government in the shortest possible time. The second is that there should be agreement in principle on a draft Bill of Rights which will in due course be incorporated. Meanwhile the Federation is to continue. I think it would be reasonable to assume that that period during which the Northern Territories are getting their responsible Government would not be less than four to five years. It is suggested that during the course of those four to five years Federation should continue in its present form with the Federal Assembly and the present Federal functions or what? I would like to hear more about that.

A. (REV. REA): That is a very good question and our memorandum, as you will observe, has not gone into detail on that point. I think it would be fair to say that we feel that probably control would have to be loosened up, possibly the handing back of certain powers; how much, I do not think we are prepared to say. There may have to be a handing back of more powers to the two Northern Territories, and some form of self-government, but under a different franchise to that which exists here in Southern Rhodesia; in other words, a transition from direct Colonial rule to a real government by the franchise in those two Northern Territories. We would be inclined to believe that probably even the existing position and existing powers held by the Federal Government would not be entirely acceptable to the two Northern Territories, and there would have to be some give and take on that point. But the thing we would emphasise is when this memorandum was drawn up, the question of Dominion status in 1960 was much more in the air than it is now, and what we emphasise is that we could see no possibility of even thinking about that, that to have Britain as a referee within the Review is essential for a longer period of transition than would be envisaged by European people in Southern Rhodesia.

Q. You refer to a loosening of the Federation. Having regard to the very strong opposition in the two Northern Territories of the majority of the African population to Federation in any form, that loosening might have to be very considerable, might it not?

A. That is a question we hoped you would be able to guide us about.

MR. TAYLOR: Going back to the pass laws for a moment, has Mr. Takawira any idea about the desirability or otherwise of the registration of births and marriages and deaths among the African population?

A. (MR. TAKAWIRA): There is not much demand for those two things. The bulk of the African people are not saying that those things should be enforced amongst the Africans as they are with the Europeans. But one can say that if they were introduced the Africans would not mind at all. You will notice some of the things that are being done are pin-pricks just because they are directed towards one section of the community while the other section is free from carrying those out. If the registration of births and deaths was applicable to all races, I do not think the African would mind at all.

MR. KATILUNGU: In fact, does that not operate in the Municipal areas where you have clinics and so on? We saw Mpilo Hospital for instance where there is a big delivery section.

A. If one's wife gives birth in that type of place, then the Government takes all the steps and the child is registered, but that registration is not an official one. There is no law about it.

MR. CRAWLEY: Does your Society support any particular political party? Your documents are rather close to the Central Africa Party. Does that mean you are morally behind them?

A. (REV. REA): The answer would be that I suppose a very high percentage of our members were favourable to the Central Africa Party at the last elections. The Society itself is in no wise identified. To take a simple example, I am the Chairman and I met Mr. Todd once in the last three years. That was by accident; we just happened to be in the same place. We have no contact as a Society, and there are a number of members of the United Federal Party who are in our movement. We are not really identified with any party.

Q. Do you include members of the former Congress?

A. I think we have some. We certainly have members very close to us of the National Democratic Party.

MR. CHRWA: Do not answer this question if you do not want to, but to what extent would the National Democratic Party accept your suggestions, especially in view of the fact that Mr. Takawira is Chairman of the Party? I am referring to these proposals put forward on the franchise.

A. (MR. TAKAWIRA): In many cases, especially on the franchise, they would not agree. The N.D.P. stands for one man one vote—as simple as that—whereas the Capricorn Society suggests a qualitative vote, and the Society has not gone into the question of how qualitative this vote should be. If, by a qualitative vote, one means that at least before a man becomes a voter he should have attained the age of eighteen or twenty, it is a qualification of some sort, and if you want a qualitative vote of that kind, then the N.D.P. would agree. But if it means that you must be able to earn £9, or even £5, a month before you can become a voter, the N.D.P. does not agree because one does not become a human being the day one starts getting £6 a month.

SIR CHARLES ARDEN-CLARKE: I understood Mr. Rea to say the Society hoped it would give birth to political parties. Has any political party been born legitimately?

A. The Constitutional Party, when it came to birth, took the Capricorn as a basis. It was, however, short-lived, and transition took place into the Central Africa Party. In Kenya a party was similarly formed.

SIR VICTOR ROBINSON: You mentioned the Native Tax Act as being discriminatory in that it provides for criminal prosecution for non-payment of tax. Are you suggesting that should be altered, and, if so, how will you ever collect any money from any African for his tax?

A. (MR. LEWIS): I must say I have not noticed it as being a condition applicable to native tax on its own. Whether or not, administratively, it would be possible to abolish it is another question. I do not say that all these laws should be automatically abolished.

(REV. REA): This is a tabulation of Acts which happen to be discriminatory.

CHAIRMAN: You make no implication that they would, in all cases, necessarily have to be changed?

A. (MR. LEWIS): They would have to be considered very carefully in all their implications.

MR. KATILUNGU: Regarding the Land Apportionment Act, which is regarded as discriminatory, we are led to understand that the native has thereby been protected against economic competition with Europeans, because if Europeans were allowed to compete with the African he would automatically be doomed. How far is that true, Mr. Takawira?

A. (MR. TAKAWIRA): I suppose that the members of this Commission know that there are two or three types of land in this country: we have the Reserves, the Native Purchase Areas and the European areas. When we talk of the Land Apportionment Act we are not talking of the Reserves; they are not affected by the Act. So if anything was altered in the Land Apportionment Act, that alteration would have no bearing whatsoever on land in the Reserves, as many Europeans think. As to the Native Purchase Areas and the European land, if that distinction were indiscriminately removed, it is true that many Africans would be bought out and would not be able to buy land later on. But in such circumstances a protection of some sort (and how it should be done I do not know, because it is a most difficult problem we have created in this country) will have to be introduced so that Africans will not be easily bought out by Europeans who are financiers.

Q. Would that not still be regarded as some form of discrimination?

A. There are two types of discrimination, one which is made to protect the unfortunate or less fortunate people (that kind of discrimination is moral and acceptable because it is there to protect those who cannot protect themselves) but there is another type of discrimination which does not protect; for instance, no African is allowed to have a business in the centre of Salisbury or in Bulawayo. When the legislators brought that in, they were not actually thinking that by allowing an African to come to the centre of the town he would be a danger to the business of the white man, because even if he was allowed, not many Africans could have a business in the centre because they have not the money. So one has to think of the two kinds of discrimination, the protective and the purely discriminatory.

MR. TAYLOR: What type of discrimination would you consider this to be—the African not being allowed in the centre of the city?

A. It is not beneficial to the African because most of the Africans who come from the Reserves and come to town to shop have no time to come here and do their shopping.

Q. Do you think it is good or bad?

A. It is bad.

MR. KATILUNGU: On political participation by Africans in the administration of the country, we understand that there are a great number of Africans qualified to register on the voters' roll but do not come forward. Could Mr. Takawira give us the reasons why? Are there any material difficulties, or physical difficulties, to stop them?

A. In the first place I am not in complete agreement with the statistics given. Actually, how many people could have qualified if they chose to? Their number is unknown and nobody can say for certain. In Southern Rhodesia here, in order to register as a voter you must appear before a Native Commissioner or an officer of the Police Force. The nature of our reserves makes this very difficult for Africans. They have to travel a long distance to get to a Native Commissioner or a Police office. The relationship in the country between these two Government groups and the Africans generally is not a healthy one. When Africans get there they are told to stay outside, and then they may be there from two to four hours before being allowed to see the officers. With all these troubles and the humiliation one goes through, they are absolutely discouraged from going there. I remember the Central Africa Party employed a person to try and bring African would-be voters to the officers concerned, and this man came out with a report that on many occasions he had to say some very unpleasant words to the officers, because the people he had taken there to register were made to wait for a very long time. On some occasions he saw Native Commissioners doing absolutely nothing but reading newspapers, just to keep people outside waiting, when they were not busy.

Q. In other words, the Government has deliberately created that situation so as to discourage Africans?

A. I am afraid we feel so.

MR. CHIRWA: Can you make any suggestions for improvement?

A. If it is the duty of every citizen to practice civil obligations, and if it is a good thing that all people in the country should vote, then the Native Commissioners and whoever is responsible should take an active interest in bringing people to become voters.

MR. MOLSON: Is it the case that there are less formalities for an African to become enrolled on the Federal roll than on the Southern Rhodesian roll? I think it is different for the Federal roll—an African can register before a Justice of the Peace or a Commissioner of Oaths.

A. I was not aware of this, I am sorry.

MR. MOLSON: I believe there is a difference in the formalities, and I will seek to find out whether there is any reason for this different procedure, or whether it is that the additional difficulties are made under the regulations of the Southern Rhodesia Government, which do not apply under the regulations of the Federal Government.

MR. ROBINSON: It has been suggested to us that if there was a relaxation of these discriminatory colour bar practices, and if there was a lowering of the franchise such as has been discussed this afternoon, the right sort of climate might be created within the Federation to make the whole thing work. Mr. Takawira, would you think this would be sufficient to create the right sort of climate? You have told us one of the principal Parties of which you are a member has an adult franchise as its objective. Supposing other things were corrected, such as relaxation of the colour bar, lowering of the franchise (but still keeping it qualitative) what do you think the climate would be? Do you think the demands would go on undiminished for one man one vote?

A. It could be taken as an interim measure, which would definitely ease the tension until such a time came. If the franchise were lowered, there would definitely be more Africans than Europeans on the voters' roll.

Q. Supposing it was lowered to something like Standard VI—I do not know what the result would be, but assume that is a starting point, that you had primary education.

A. I do not want to speak there for my political party, but I think myself the tension would be eased. It would not, however, be acceptable as the final thing.

MR. CRAWLEY: Would you co-operate in working such a constitution?

A. (REV. REA): I do not know that is quite a question that we could answer, as Capricorn.

MR. ROBINSON: Would you, as a Society, urge Africans to co-operate?

A. As a Society, the answer would certainly be yes, because of course if you made the level as you have indicated it there now, and if one took it as accepted that the present rate of growth of African education to Standard VI level would continue unchecked, my guess is that within a decade there would be an African majority of voters.

Q. Let us assume your guess is right, do you think that would satisfy, by and large, the aspirations of the nationalist movements within the Federation as an interim measure?

A. (MR. TAKAWIRA): Not the period given; that would be far too long.

CHAIRMAN: You mean it would have to be less than a decade?

A. There would be steps, and one could start by saying that from now for such-and-such a period we will try this method, and from then we will try something else; and provided this agreement was arrived at at a round table conference, if the African nationalists were consulted and if, out of the arguments, they arrived at that, then one would say yes. However, if it was just announced without Africans being consulted, they would not be satisfied.

(REV. REA): The African would want safeguards.

MR. KATILUNGU: Would you say that in Southern Rhodesia Africans had no adequate representation in 1952 when initial discussions took place on the Federal Constitution? I understand you had African representatives in London at that time who in fact participated. Would you call that not being consulted?

A. (MR. TAKAWIRA): They were Africans of the European choice. The same argument is being used that Africans cannot legitimately say they are not being represented in the Federal Assembly, because there are Africans there; but they are not Africans of African choice, and they do exactly what Europeans want. That is not what their people want.

Q. As a result of that you are trying to arrange for racial representation?

A. No, speaking not as an individual but as a member of Capricorn, we are not advocating racial representation but a system which would make it possible, on a common voters' roll, for let us say a predominantly African section to vote for a candidate who was an Indian, if he was of the best quality, or for a European. That is what we want.

Memorandum

CITY COUNCIL OF SALISBURY

The City Council of Salisbury is concerned lest representations should be made to the Commission that the seat of the Federal Government should be moved from Salisbury to some other Centre in the Federation.

This Council wishes to represent the inadvisability of such a step. The Council recalls in 1954 the Report of a Select Committee of the Federal Assembly recommended that the site of the Federal Capital should be in Salisbury after the fullest investigation.

The Council suggests that it is not for the City of Salisbury to adduce evidence in support of its claim to remain the Federal or Territorial Capital but rather that the advocates of any claim to the contrary should be called upon to produce unquestionable proof that the advantages which would accrue to the Federation as a whole, and not one City, Town or Territory, outweigh the disruption which would inevitably result from such a move.

In the first instance, the cost of such a move would be prohibitive even if the resources of the Federation were not fully committed for the development of the Federation and the betterment of the African population in particular.

Secondly, the consequence of any move of the Federal or Territorial Capital from Salisbury would have dire economic effects on the City and Country where development of Municipal activities has been geared to the City's position as the Capital and, as a result such activities have been unequalled elsewhere in the Federation. Development in the Salisbury area has been accelerated due to the siting of the Federal Capital. This has made the area attractive as a business and commercial centre and business concerns have established their headquarters in the Area at very great cost on the strength of the earlier decision of the Federal Government that the Capital should be sited there.

If the Capital City were now transferred elsewhere a very considerable number of business premises, offices, shops and homes including flats would become vacant due to the depopulation which would inevitably take place. This development would have a most serious repercussion not only upon Salisbury itself but upon the whole country. It would be cautious to assume also that any such change at this stage would influence most adversely the country's credit potential overseas. A change now could, besides being economically disastrous, constitute a serious breach of faith on the part of public authority with those many business concerns who were encouraged by Government decision to accept Salisbury as Capital.

In this connection, it is considered that much of the opposition which is expressed to Salisbury being the Capital City, is not well-founded. It is considered also that many who have voiced objections are not sufficiently appreciative of the economic and administrative aspects of this matter. Some have probably never visited Salisbury.

The City of Salisbury has, by virtue of being Capital, undertaken the development of services and facilities which, although unremunerative, are essential in a modern Capital City.

In this connection the attention of the Commission is drawn to Appendix I which is summarised the position which the City Council has assumed in respect of its capital commitments and its servicing and loan charges. Also set out are the figures of income and expenditure and rateable value. That appendix is designed to indicate the transformation which has taken place during the years 1954/1959.

The City of Salisbury is well served with rail and road communications with all other parts of the Federation, and has a large modern Airport capable of accommodating all modern high powered aircraft. It has an equable climate, and an abundant water supply.

In 1954 the estimated population of Greater Salisbury for all races was 180,000. The estimated population in 1959 had risen to 277,000.

Indicative of the progress of the City are the statistics covering the sales of electricity and water by the Authority between the years 1954 and 1959 which are set out in Appendix II to this memorandum. From these figures it will be noted that in the period under review, sales of electricity have increased by 116% and sales of water by 138%.

In 1953/4 the rateable value per head of population was £312 and in 1959 this had increased to £618 per head.

During the period under review, the confidence shown in the future of the City of Salisbury can be judged from the value of building plans passed by the Local Authority amounting to some £42,000,000—a figure unequalled even by any other Territory in the Federation.

Oral Evidence

CITY COUNCIL OF SALISBURY. Representatives: Councillor Posselt (Mayor), Alderman C. Olley, Mr. Neale (Town Clerk), Mr. Stewart (Asst. City Treasurer)

The Delegation said that they wished to present the case for the City of Salisbury in relation to the question of the site of the Federal Government. They wished to advise against the removal of it from Salisbury. The Mayor then read out a memorandum, with financial appendices, which is reproduced above. The Mayor concluded by saying that they felt that any move which might be suggested would be undesirable because of its economic repercussions, since there would be greater adverse economic effects than there could be political advantage. It was very necessary to think of cost, particularly as they had seen changes in the last twelve months as a result of the impending Constitutional Review. Unemployment was already considerable both among Europeans and Africans. A move of the Federal capital would result in increased unemployment, particularly affecting the lower income groups.

Ald. Olley said that he wished to support what the Mayor had said. He had originally disagreed with having both the capitals in Salisbury. But two enquiries had been held and had decided that the Federal capital should stay in Salisbury. It would be ruinous to shift the capital now. Three to four thousand civil servants would have to be moved together with those connected with them. In fact such a move would adversely affect the whole of Southern Rhodesia. Consideration also had to be given to the large Salisbury water scheme for which £2½ million had been expended on pumping apparatus, pipes and so on. There was also the new electric generating plant costing £4 million. All this should not be given up just to satisfy the jealousies of others of "Bambazonkie". People now had confidence in Salisbury. After Federation had been brought in there had been a quiet period, followed by an upsurge of activity, taking the form of multi-storey buildings and other development. Firms had invested in this development largely because they knew that Salisbury was to be the capital. Salisbury had therefore been growing steadily. There had been a slight drop because of Mr. Macintyre's famous credit squeeze. But in the view of the City Council this progress would continue and land values would go up. There was also the question of psychology. Salisbury was now regarded as the right place to go to. He went to conferences every year in South Africa and made contacts, and always took the opportunity of boosting Southern Rhodesia and in particular Salisbury. It would be ridiculous to place the capital in some out of the way place in the bundu, such as Lusaka, Ndola, or Kitwe. Que Que, and even Marandellas, a little place, had laid claim. It would have been all right if the capital had been placed at one of those places in the early days, but it would not do to change now.

Mr. Olley referred to the original idea of placing the capital at the Warren Hills Farm, which the City Council had given to the Federal Government. But since the upheaval over the craze for Dominion status, there had been a lack of enthusiasm about the Warren Hills scheme. Because of the foreign consuls and others who would have to live in the capital, it would not be 100 per cent white. The City Council had transferred 750 acres to the Government, and they wanted them back if the Government was not going to build. They were suspicious now that Sir Roy Welensky might want to build elsewhere. He would conclude by saying, "Do not shift the capital".

The following further points were made:—

(1) In reply to a question whether the City Council would agree to give up all racial discrimination as the condition of the capital remaining in Salisbury, Mr. Olley replied "No". Mr. Posselt said that there was a difference of opinion on this matter. The outlook had changed, particularly in the last 18 months. He felt that the Federal capital should be in Salisbury and be one community. Many pin-pricks should be removed, but they could not be removed over-night. Progress had been made. Ald. Olley and his older friends were holding on to the old ideas, and he respected them for it; but the majority of the Councillors were now inclined to be more progressive.

(2) In reply to a question how discrimination in the capital could be squared with the idea of partnership, Mr. Olley said that partnership was a myth. Mr. Posselt said that since the end of the last war the minds of many people had changed. Federation had brought things closer together. Old feelings and ideas were deeply engrained, but he felt that his children had a better outlook than he had and that he in turn had a better outlook than his father, who was a pioneer.

(3) The City Council could help this process by making an endeavour to improve African conditions of living, employment and the elimination of the various pass laws. This idea had been introduced entirely by the two City Councils of Salisbury and Bulawayo. There was not much time in hand. But large numbers of African labourers were concerned more about their wages than about passes.

(4) The feeling about Southern Rhodesia in the Northern Protectorates was regrettable. Africans from there who came down to work in Southern Rhodesia could see the conditions for themselves.

(5) It was put to the witnesses that if the doors of discrimination had in any case to be opened within 20 years, they might as well be opened now: would the City Council agree or not. Ald. Olley said that it would not and Councillor Posselt that it would, although by a narrow majority. He thought that the African people themselves must play a more definite and a more willing part.

(6) Ald. Olley said that anything they did in Southern Rhodesia in the way of discrimination they also did in Northern Rhodesia: he knew Northern Rhodesia and had a business there. They did not have any trouble with Africans in Southern Rhodesia, and had had none since 1896. That was until the Nyasaland revolution last year. Northern Rhodesia, on the other hand was always in turmoil and so was Nyasaland. Even today 25 per cent of the people in Great Britain were not civilised after 33 generations. Yet they expected the black proletariat to become civilised in two generations. This idea only leads to turmoil in Central Africa. Any changes of the sort proposed would require referendum to the people, by which he meant the rate-payers of Salisbury, the Europeans.

With a few exceptions the natives did not understand anything about democratic government. Civilisation was not merely a matter of scholarship. Jesus Christ had never heard of examinations. It was a question of refinement of mind and body.

(7) Even for the sake of keeping the Federation together, he would not agree to the removal of the social colour bar immediately.

(8) Councillor Posselt made the point that businesses tended to follow the government wherever it went. There was the example of the Wankie Colliery. The removal of the capital would not merely mean the removal of Ministries and a few civil servants. Business people would tend to follow the government even if it went to Fort Jameson.

(9) If it was essential to move the capital it ought to be done gradually.

(10) In reply to a question whether it would not help the City of Salisbury if racial discrimination were made illegal by a single clause in the Constitution, Mr. Olley suggested that this would start a revolution. Against this, Mr. Stewart said that when this was done in relation to the Post Offices, almost immediately Europeans and Africans were mingling together without any difficulties.

Memorandum II*

B. G. PAVER

A PAPER ON THE ECONOMIC SIGNIFICANCE OF THE PROPOSED CONSTITUTION FOR NYASALAND SUBMITTED TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES

(At the suggestion of Mr. Macleod, this Memorandum was submitted to Members of the Advisory Commission on the review of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland).

In dealing with a territory devoid of any significant manufacturing or mining potential, the living conditions of its agrarian population are to a great extent dependent upon the knowledge and efficiency of its multi-racial Executive and Legislative Councils and its administration.

In common with other under-developed territories in Africa, Nyasaland will, during this decade, continue to attract the attention of world opinion. The significance of the years 1960-1970 therefore lies in the fact that these years will provide irrefutable proof as to whether the constitution now under consideration was deliberately designed to ameliorate the living conditions of the population or whether this constitution merely provided an expedient dictated by political factions and personalities.

The facts which determine this unequivocal approach to Nyasaland's constitutional problems are and will continue to remain as follows:—

1. The Food and Agricultural Organisation in the course of its 1950 World Census of Agriculture divided Nyasaland's 36,000 square miles as follows:

1,000 square miles suitable for tree crops
2,000 square miles of permanent pasture
10,000 square miles suitable for arable cultivation
5,000 square miles of marginal agricultural land
18,000 square miles of non agricultural land
36,000 square miles total land area

2. The statistical density of a total population of 2,800,000 in 1960 to a total land area of 36,000 square miles is 77.6 persons per square mile.

The true density of this agrarian population in relation to 10,000 square miles of agricultural land plus an 80% potential from 5,000 square miles of marginal agricultural land, and a 50% potential from 2,000 square miles of pasture land, i.e. a total of 15,000 square miles, is a density of 186.6 persons per square mile of agricultural land. This is a density approaching that of semi-industrial countries practising advanced and partially mechanised agricultural methods.

3. The de facto population of 2,780,000 Africans, as at 31st December, 1959, has, at the estimated annual increase rate of 2.2 per cent per annum, been rounded off to a conservative 2,800,000 quoted in paragraph 2 above. The African population of Nyasaland has nearly doubled itself during the past 25 years. The immediate significance of the 2.2 per cent per annum increase is, however, the fact that the productivity of each square mile of arable land must be increased by 30% during the years 1960-1970. This is due to the fact that during this decade, density in relation to the food productive area will rise from 186.6 to 235 persons per square mile.

4. A 30% increase in productivity would merely maintain the status quo of a basically subsistence economy. It makes no allowance for improved living conditions. Yet an increase of even 5% in the present productivity of every acre of arable land can only be achieved with the aid of the essential motive of personal gain, reinforced by individual land rights and individual responsibility for the enrichment of the soil of individual holdings.

5. A strongly entrenched social system, practised by more than 75% of the total population is, however, an almost insuperable barrier to individual land rights on anything approaching a territorial scale. Although African trust land, which comprises 87% of the total land area is vested in the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and is administered and controlled by the Governor, "for the use or common benefit, direct or indirect, of Africans", the right of Africans to cultivate separate holdings on African trust land (except when the land is the subject of a lease) is determined by the "mwini dziko".

The land allocations of the "mwini dziko" who is usually the hereditary village headman, are determined by matrilineal inheritance. More than half the population practice uxori-local marriage in which the husband goes to live with his wife at her village. It follows therefore, that the man's security of tenure of his holding is normally dependent upon the continuance of his marriage.

Uxori-local marriage is not a particularly stable institution, and the fact that economic conditions cause nearly 25% of the adult male population to become migrant labourers, contributes to the instability of marriage ties. These factors all add to lack of continuity of land tenure which, in other parts of the world, is the very foundation of agrarian community life.

6. In Nyasaland's largely matrilineal society, the part played by women is clearly of fundamental importance. In African education, however, there is clearly no indication that this fact has been appreciated or related to the inevitably disastrous consequences of a combination of factors enumerated in paragraphs 1 to 5. In 1948, the enrolment in Junior Primary schools was 56,413 boys and 27,650 girls, a ratio of 1 girl 2 boys. Ten years later, there was no change in this ratio, since 1957 enrolment figure was 69,498 boys and 38,416 girls. In the Senior Primary Schools, the 1948 figures were 2,207 boys and 190 girls, and the 1957 figures, 13,211 boys and 2,711 girls. The figures for full secondary schools indicate that the education of females is little more than a token gesture with an enrolment of 329 males and 24 females at all African Government and Government-assisted schools in 1957.

In the above half-dozen paragraphs on the lack of agricultural land, the pressure of population, the inevitable need for increased productivity and the accompanying absence of incentive, the dead hand of an archaic social system and the total failure of three decades of African education to carry females to full Secondary education, I have done no more than delineate the economic problem of Nyasaland.

Quite apart from the customs and suspicions of the African, or the violent reactions of the religious, the question of birth control is no more than a debating point. Furthermore, any grandiose scheme of re-settlement in the open spaces of adjacent Northern Rhodesia, on a scale commensurate with the magnitude of the problem, would present administrative difficulties of even greater magnitude than the problem they attempt to solve.

Nor can substantially increased industrialisation provide Nyasaland with anything more than a palliative. Assuming that a massive drive to attract manufacturing industry resulted in affording employment to an additional 60,000 Africans, this figure, if we exclude those at present employed in processing tea and tobacco, would represent a 1500% increase in the 1957/58 employment figures for manufacturing; yet these employees would only equal one year's increase in the population, and because of the age factor of these imaginary industrial workers they, together with their dependents, would account for little more than 3 years' natural increase.

Nyasaland is an agrarian territory, and there is only one answer to its problems. In this fact there is entrenched the basic economic significance, as distinct from the purely political problems, of the present review of the constitution. In an inter-related complex of factors peculiar to Nyasaland, both the Government and the people of this territory face one of the gravest situations any administration in Africa has been called upon to resolve.

The present review of the constitution affords the opportunity of securing the concerted efforts of Government and people to undertake the vital task of far-reaching agrarian reforms. If this opportunity is neglected, then in the present decade, the unchecked cumulative effects of the country's inherent disabilities can only result in lower and yet lower levels of a disastrous subsistence economy.

The agrarian reforms which the situation demands can only be achieved with the full co-operation of African leaders. It is, therefore, essential that Africans should, as fully as possible, participate in the conduct of the territory's future. It is, however, of the utmost importance that all those now engaged in negotiating a new constitution should be made fully aware of the enormity of the country's basic problems. There can be no deferment of these aspects. Special attention must be given to the task of ensuring that there is full realisation of the heavy burdens and responsibilities which Africans will be called upon to bear. This need is underlined by the fact that during the recent disturbances, the Government's agricultural effort on behalf of the African people was demonstrably the special target for attack by the officials of the Nyasaland African National Congress.

If there is a positive appreciation of Nyasaland's economic hazards, and the opportunity for launching agrarian reforms is fully integrated into the present review of the constitution, then this common target should provide a multi-racial rallying point of fundamental importance.

With this in mind, and conscious as I am of the African's profound faith in the availability of outside financial aid as an easy solution to all problems, it is nevertheless obvious that although there has been an encouraging rise in Current Expenditure on Agriculture from £285,000 in 1954/55 to an estimated £440,000 for 1959/60, and a Capital Expenditure rise from £27,000 to £430,000 over the same period, these figures bear little relation to positive agrarian reform.

To have any lasting effect an expenditure at least equal to that now being incurred in the implementation of Southern Rhodesia's Native Land Husbandry Act would appear to be essential. In Southern Rhodesia the amount involved is £12,681,000 over a seven-year period, and while the acreage in Nyasaland would be considerably less, the costs would be far higher.

This is largely due to the fact that during the past six years, Southern Rhodesia's total expenditure on African agriculture on her population of 2,800,000 totals £14,225,000 as compared with Nyasaland's total Current and Capital Expenditure of £3,374,000 for the same period, and for a population of almost identical size. As an approximation, a planned expenditure of £14,000,000 spread over a seven-year period would therefore appear to be a minimal target.

This is no easy solution to the problem of Nyasaland's future. It demands insistence on an even higher standard of administration than has been possible in the past. It requires a gradual change in the structure of African society, a great degree of control over individuals and an increasing standard of individual responsibility and effort. There is no escape from these realities. The new constitution should not merely facilitate measures to preserve the future well-being of the entire population. It must demonstrate to this continent in particular that this is its overriding purpose.

Note

1. It is worth noting that in order to increase the productive capacity of a single copper mine by 50% the Rhodesian Selection Trust propose to bring their Mufulira West development project into operation by 1962 at a capital cost of £14,000,000. This brings into perspective the suggestion that during 1961/67 a sum of £14,000,000 should be devoted to African agriculture in Nyasaland.

2. It should also be noted that in reporting to the United Nations Economic and Social Council, the President of the International Bank of Reconstruction and Development stated that "a particularly interesting" aspect of the new loans in Africa concerned two projects for the development of Agriculture—one in Southern Rhodesia, and one in the Congo—and predicted that other "grass roots" loans would follow, designed to further the transition of African farming.

3. In common with trends in other countries, Nyasaland Africans will react to increased agricultural activity by a substantial drift to such urban areas as are available to them. They will also react to higher education by demanding avenues of employment other than those provided by agriculture. As the populations of neighbouring territories increase, employment of Nyasaland Africans will tend to diminish. It will therefore be prudent to accept as an integral part of agrarian reform the need to foster industrial and commercial employment in the Blantyre/Limbe area.

Memorandum III*

B. G. PAVER

A Survey of African Primary Education according to Sex and Age Groups

This Memorandum presents the first comprehensive stock-taking of African educational attainment since the commencement of educational endeavour on behalf of the indigenous peoples of Central Africa. It does so in terms of all Africans throughout the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland who have passed Standard 6, and who have therefore successfully completed the eight-year Primary School Course.

*For Memorandum (I) by B. G. Paver, on Constitutional evolution see under evidence at Salisbury on 21st April, 1960 (p. 167).

To complete and present this survey, the Central African Statistical Office was asked to enlist the co-operation of the African Education Departments of the Governments of Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, and to obtain records of every African who had passed Standard 6 since the inception of these Departments.

Armed with this information, the Statistical Office was then requested to relate the total number of Standard 6 passes in each year to the correct sex and age groups of the total population of each territory. Allowance was made for mortality rates and population increases, and in this manner the total number of Africans who have hitherto passed Standard 6 was, by sexes, accorded to each age group of each territorial population as at June, 1960.

On the same basis, but taking into account the availability of teachers and financial resources, the 1960 data was projected by 5 and 10 years in order to determine estimates of the Standard 6 educational level for each age group in each territory for the years 1965 and 1970.

In the absence of any recent census of the African population, the resulting statistical tables are naturally rough estimates. The present total of Standard 6 passes is, however, a recorded figure the results of past decades and present educational resources are both known factors and the statistical tables therefore constitute a co-ordination of the most authoritative sources of information available today.

Choice of a Standard 6 pass as the essential yardstick of this stock-taking of African educational attainment is due to the following reasons. In the first place, the Southern Rhodesia Standard 6 is recognised in both Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, and Southern Rhodesia in turn gives full recognition to the Standard 6 examination given by both the Northern territories. In the second place, this examination, if passed, gives entrance to any post-primary course. For example, in Southern Rhodesia a pupil may enter the Primary Teacher's Lower Course, a Building, Carpentry or Agricultural Course at the post-primary industrial schools, or proceed to full Secondary Course.

The third reason is the fact that in the absence of compulsory African education which would carry with it compulsion to remain at school for a fixed number of years, a Standard 6 pass signifies the completion of eight years of schooling. Under existing circumstances, a Standard 6 pass therefore represents the stage in African educational attainment at which the pupil is no longer merely a unit in a subsistence economy, enjoying a transitory educational benefit. Having passed Standard 6, the African pupil can, and frequently does, become in his or her own right, a contributor to the general advancement of the community and the territory in which he or she resides.

For these reasons, this survey of Standard 6 passes in terms of sexes, age groups and territorial populations is of fundamental significance to any economic, sociological or constitutional review of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

In reading this survey of African Primary Education, it will be noted that the information compiled by the Statistical Office presents each territorial survey in 5-year age groups with separate columns for the sexes and for percentages. These tables are of such importance that easy reference is essential. For this reason, each territorial survey is accompanied by a simplified presentation. This simplification is accomplished by the omission of the percentage columns and by a smaller number of readily distinguishable age groups in which the totals for the years between 20 and 29 have been taken together and those for the years 30 to 39 have also been grouped together.

The significance of this re-grouping has been emphasised in the following manner. Statistical presentation of population data normally commences with the youngest age group at the top of each column. In the simplified version, our immediate concern is to secure a concise presentation of the overall results of decades of educational effort and, in particular, the extent to which the older age groups have shared in full Primary education.

For this reason the age group 0-14 years, which has been labelled Infancy and Childhood, appears at the bottom of the simplified presentation. This group is followed by the 15-19 Adolescent age group who, wherever authority is inept, act to the detriment of their own advancement as uncontrolled adolescents always do.

At this stage in reading this survey, it must be noted that the combined Infancy and Adolescent age groups number 4,419,000 out of a total population of 7,810,000. They therefore represent 56.5% of the total African population of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. This inordinate preponderance of juveniles is a charge on African society which, even at a basic subsistence level, African society is quite unable to sustain without substantial assistance from European society.

The next stage in this upward sequence of age groups comprises those between the ages of 20 and 29 years. To describe this group as the age of Immaturity is no reflection of the African. Even in far more advanced and privileged societies, to 20 to 29 age group provides the floating wage earners, the unstable element in agriculture, commerce and industry, and adherents to any form of emotionalism, the pyjama parties, and all kindred post-adolescent activities. It is therefore unfortunate that this age group numbering 1,351,000 represents 17.3% of the total population since this leaves only 26.2% in the Over-30 age groups of African society.

The next age group is that of persons between the ages of 30 and 39. In all societies, this is the Transitional period between Immaturity and Maturity, and this Transitional group is 10.1% of the total African population.

The final age group of 40 and Over is, for all humanity, the age group which supplies to society as a whole that measure of Maturity permitted by the circumstances in which each race finds itself. In African society this age group represents 16.1% of the total African population of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. If allowance is made for those of extreme age and infirmity, then the effective Maturity age group is less than 15% of the total population.

Against this fundamental background of population age groups, the pattern of educational attainment is clearly discernible. In both the territorial and in the overall Federal presentation, it is possible to trace the gradual infusion of Primary education as it moves up from age group to age group across the intervening years to 1965 and 1970. It must always be remembered, however, that this is a survey of Primary education. A similar survey of Secondary education would be infinitely less encouraging.

Each Member of the Commission will draw his or her own conclusions from the information presented in this survey. Nevertheless, the survey itself would be incomplete without some reference to the following four basic deductions.

The first of these deductions is the tremendous strain imposed upon the economic viability of each separate territory and upon the Federation as a whole by the age group composition of the African population plus the inadequacy of educational attainment.

The second basic deduction is the fact that this survey of Primary education puts the apparent tardiness in the implementation of African political advancement as a partnership of African preparedness and European goodwill in true perspective.

The third deduction concerns the educational qualification for the franchise. In the Immature 20-29 age group alone, over two hundred thousand Africans should have completed their Primary School Course by passing Standard 6 by 1970.

The fourth and most significant deduction to be drawn from this survey concerns the educational attainment of African women. For 1960, there is a total of 51,900 adult Africans who have passed Standard 6. Of this total, only 10,800, that is 20.8%, are females. By 1970, the total of adults who will have passed Standard 6 should be 243,300 of whom approximately 28% will be females.

These figures, however, require further analysis. Of the 10,800 adult females with a Standard 6 pass in 1960, 8,800 were educated in Southern Rhodesia, 1,500 in Northern Rhodesia and approximately 500 in Nyasaland. For the year 1970, the approximate figures will be: Nyasaland 6,500 adult females with a Standard 6 pass, Northern Rhodesia—9,000 adult females, and Southern Rhodesia 54,100 adult females with this educational qualification.

It is not necessary to attempt to calculate that in Southern Rhodesia the general educational effort on behalf of the African is some ten years in advance of that now being made in the two Northern territories. Nor is it necessary to estimate that in the education of African women Southern Rhodesia is some 20 years in advance of Nyasaland.

What is important is the fact that, under twentieth century conditions, this ill-balance in the education of the sexes will, unless it is checked, lead to a seriously malformed African society. This is not merely a sociological problem. It has the very deepest economic significance.

It is a well established fact that in any country with a healthy economy, between 60% and 70% of the internal market for consumer goods is due to woman's desire to improve general living conditions of her home.

In the Federation, the elementary needs of over a million mud-floor homes, presided over by apathetic and uneducated women, offer no such inducement to industry. This estimate of a million mud-floor homes is based on the fact that some six million African people (with an average of six persons per home) are still very closely allied to the conditions of a primitive subsistence economy.

Yet 56.5% of African society is today in the under-20 age group. These 4,419,000 Africans will soon be seeking the fields of employment which only a broadly based and soundly administered economy can give them.

As has already been stated, this survey contains elements which cannot be ignored in any sociological, economic or constitutional review of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

Rough Estimates of the Proportion of the Indigenous African Population of Southern Rhodesia which has passed Standard Six by Age Groups

Note: (1) Migrants from neighbouring territories, who number about 400,000 in 1960, are omitted.

(2) It is assumed that there will be no change in the age distribution of the population between 1960 and 1970. A change in the age distribution would not affect the proportions in individual age groups but would affect the overall proportions for all age groups slightly.

Summary of Memoranda. Nos. I, II and III.

B. G. PAVER

Circumstances conspired to necessitate the submission of three separate though interlocking memoranda. A summary and co-ordination of the evidence contained in these documents therefore appears to be desirable.

The Introduction to Memorandum I traces the present opposition to Southern Rhodesia and the Federation to the factors of its original source.

Evidence that this analysis of the origin of the opposition to Federation on the part of Africans in the Northern territories is factually correct is provided by the Bledisloe Report of March, 1939.

Voters' Qualification and the Rate of Constitutional Evolution (Part I) states that there is no valid reason for lowering the present franchise qualifications since neither educational nor financial qualifications are too high to permit of a steady and substantial increase in the number of African voters.

Evidence to support this is contained in the Survey of African Primary Education (Memorandum No. III) which demonstrates the fact that by June 1970 a total of 243,000 African adults will have passed Standard 6. This will allow a large number of Africans to meet the Special Voters Roll Qualifications and, with the accompanying financial qualifications, Standard 6 is also the educational qualification for two of the seven alternatives for the General Voters Roll Qualifications.

Evidence that the financial qualification is not an unduly high barrier is contained in the June 1959 Monthly Digest of Statistics quoted in Memorandum No. I. This table which gives wages, Self-Employment and Rural Subsistence, was presented in this form in order to draw attention to the existence side by side of cash and subsistence economy. If the income from Wages and Self-Employment of Africans is combined and compared with the figures for the income of Europeans over the same period, then it is clear that African Income (excluding Rural Subsistence) in 1959 was approaching the figure achieved by Europeans in 1954, and that the income of Africans is rising at a greater rate than that of Europeans.

Approximate National Income

Figures in Millions

	1954	1955	1956	1957	1958	1959
European ...	112.3	127.4	135.5	157.8	158.7	164.0
African ...	64.6	72.6	85.4	96.1	97.5	110.0

In support of the statement that no lowering of the Federal franchise qualification is desirable, I state that more than 30,000 Africans who possessed the necessary qualifications failed to register because of apathy and intimidation.

Evidence that this statement is substantially correct is furnished by comparing the present number of adult African males who have passed Standard 6 with the actual registration of voters on the General and Special Rolls.

Territory	African Males with Std. 6 pass	Federal Electoral Roll as at 3.8.59	Not Registered as Voters
S. Rhodesia ...	24,000	General Roll 1,211 Special Roll 949	21,840
N. Rhodesia ...	12,200	General Roll 639 Special Roll 4,301	7,260
Nyasaland ...	4,900	General Roll 9 Special Roll 23	4,868
Total	41,100	7,132	33,968

After making an allowance of 3,396, i.e. 10%, for voters unable to register for reasons such as ill-health, isolation, etc. there remains a total of 30,000 males who, if the vote is as much sought after as we are given to believe it is, would have overcome all obstacles to register as voters. That they failed to do so can only be due to apathy in Southern Rhodesia and intimidation in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

In Part I it was also categorically stated that at the root of the constitutional problem lay the fact that 75% of the population is composed entirely of African peasants living on the basis of a subsistence economy which is supported by the efforts of 25% of the population who are contributing to the maintenance and development of a money economy, which is the true foundation of the country's future.

I am aware that in the confidential Survey of Developments since 1953 on page 300 the distribution of the African population between the Subsistence and Money Economy works out at 63.5% attributed to the Subsistence Economy. Nevertheless, in terms of positive contribution to the Money Economy, I am satisfied that the assessment given in Memorandum No. I, Part I, is correct.

Evidence of this is supplied in the Rural Subsistence figures quoted in Memorandum No. I.

Evidence is also supplied by Memorandum No. II on Nyasaland's agrarian problem which with a population density of 186.6 persons to the square mile of productive land clearly demonstrates the fact that constitutional changes which do not materially strengthen the administration can only result in an ill-balanced diet becoming a starvation diet.

Evidence is also supplied by Memorandum No. III in which the tables on Primary Education and Age Distribution demonstrate a general unpreparedness which, if not aided with honesty, firmness and patience will prove disastrous to the financial structure upon which the future well-being of the entire population of the Federation must depend.

Constitutional Evolution and a Council of State (Part 2) emphasised the overriding need of constitutional evolution as opposed to attempts to appease emotionalism due to ignorance and immaturity. In support of this approach, your attention was drawn to the tremendous consequences which have stemmed from the arrest of infantile mortality and the African's inordinately low life-expectation. It was stated that because of the tax imposed upon each able-bodied African male by an unprecedented percentage of juveniles, African society would, owing to incautious constitutional reform, collapse more rapidly, more completely and more disastrously than any impact which undue haste could have on non-African society.

Evidence as to the correctness of these facts is supplied in the simplified tables contained in Memorandum No. III, in which the percentages of the basic age groups are clearly set out. The full significance of this evidence is revealed by comparing the 1960 African Age Group percentages with those of the populations of England and Wales for the year 1955.

Population Age Group	African Population Percentages	England and Wales Population Percentages
40 and Over ...	16.1	44
30-39 ...	10.1	14.2
20-29 ...	17.3	13.1
Under 20... ..	56.5	28.7

If this comparison is carried to its logical conclusion, it will be noted that in African society 73.8% of the total population is under the age of 30 as compared with 41.8% for England and Wales. Furthermore, in the Transitional and Maturity Age Groups of 30 and Over, England and Wales has 58.2% of the population as compared with 26.2% for the African population.

In the African Transitional and Maturity Age Groups there are approximately one million males, but due to age and infirmity, the toll of endemic tropical diseases and the diet factor, the effective total in these age groups is probably not more than 750,000, which is less than 10% of the total population of whom 56.5% are under 20 years of age. Added to this, there are the disabilities of tribalism, as yet inadequate educational attainment and the agrarian problem of subsistence economy practised by the overwhelming majority of the population.

Understandably, ignorance has been allowed to abet emotionalism. With the facts before you, you will, however, be aware that without a great measure of imposed self-discipline and outside aid, no human society suffering from the basic structural weaknesses of African society could sustain itself without imposing untold hardship on the vast majority of its members.

A Federal Council of State (Part 3) stated that in view of the complexity of the problems facing the peoples of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland there exists today an urgent need to set up permanent machinery to allay fears. These fears of discrimination in land rights and political rights are so closely associated with the continual constitutional adjustments inherent in a Federation such as this that they cannot be satisfied by a pious resolution to enshrine in the Constitution a declaration of Human Rights. To do so without providing an unassailable impartial Court of Appeal would be as honest and effective as issuing a cheque without first ensuring that there were funds to meet it.

For this reason, it was stated that to bring about constitutional evolution which ensured the continuance of impartial protection to both the majority and minority interests as a new ratio of voters emerged, there should be a Council of State divorced from the electorate, yet carrying the authority of all five Governments now directly and indirectly associated with the fulfilment of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

Oral Evidence

B. G. PAVER*

CHAIRMAN: We have had the other memoranda which you sent in. I would like to express our gratitude for this analysis you have produced and into which you must have put a great deal of work; the compilation of figures will be very valuable to us, particularly those in connection with African education. The sources of information have been government sources, official sources?

A. Yes, they are authoritative.

Q. We can take all these figures as official figures?

A. Yes.

MR. JUSTICE BEADLE: Your figures are taken for the Federation as a whole and not a particular Territory?

A. Yes.

Q. When you talk about 30,000 Africans who could be on the voters' roll but have not been on the voters' roll, does that relate to the whole Federation?

A. Yes. On the Federal voters' roll, not to be confused with the territorial ones.

Q. The Federal voters' roll but for the whole Federation?

A. Yes, and the date at which the numbers were given is given at the top of the column and that is authoritative.

Q. What is your source of information for these figures?

A. That is from the Survey.

Q. How do you get the figure of 30,000 Africans who could have registered and did not?

A. That is taken from the number of Africans who had passed Standard VI who would have been able to qualify on one or other of the rolls.

Q. Including income qualification people too? How do you relate the age to the income? I am asking you about this figure because I tried to get it from the Statistical Department and they told me they could not give it to me.

A. That is based on my own rather intimate knowledge of the whole thing.

Q. That is why the Statistical Department were very chary about giving it to me; they said they could estimate how many people had passed Standard VI and how many earned so much but they could not marry the two.

A. That is correct. The Minister of Law gave the figure of 70,000 at one stage but I think my figure is right.

Q. You have attempted to marry the income qualification to the educational qualification?

A. Yes. It is through our experience and contact with the Press that you find that at the educational level the monetary side marries more or less automatically.

Q. I follow.

A. I would like to emphasise, if I may, what I have tried to do is to put whatever information I could at the disposal of the Commission on four points which I feel really need a lot of consideration. The first is the actual origin of the opposition to Federation. I do not know whether anyone wants to ask for any elaboration on that aspect; I could have made it much lengthier. There were historical aspects in the early days which emphasised this misunderstanding on the administrative aspect in Southern Rhodesia. For instance in the Umvukwes area the mica mines packed up in 1924 and quite a number of Africans from Nyasaland were not paid; there simply was not the money and the whole thing collapsed. There are aspects which I wished to emphasise and I wanted to be sure I had really put the historical origin as faithfully and objectively as possible.

The other aspects are the tremendous significance of the age structure which I think is the one which needs the greatest consideration. The next aspect is the educational attainment level, and the fourth aspect is this rather blurred economic aspect of subsistence and money economy.

The sum total of all this really means that I have felt it was absolutely essential that the Federation should continue but I feel that its continuance might possibly be served by this idea of a Council of State which I have not elaborated because once I start producing memoranda I cannot stop and I purposely have avoided getting involved in constitutional issues. I have tried to simplify the fears relating to political and land rights; those are the two basic fears and a Council of State with each of the five governments participating would, in my mind, be the medium through which a final solution in allaying those fears could be found.

MR. ROBINSON: In that connection you do say that this Council of State requires the authority of all five governments behind it in order that a Bill of Rights is firmly entrenched and presumably this impartial court of appeal would remain as such. How do you envisage this authority being effectively brought into being and kept in being?

A. It would have the authority at present entrenched in the Colonial Office; it would not simply be a handing over. I cannot see that with our economic situation, the realities of this subsistence-cum-money economy, that the Federation could go it alone either in the economic or the political field. If the interests of the Africans in the Northern Territories are to be safeguarded it presupposes some form of continuance of United Kingdom participation in this part of the world. By the same token if anything was going to come of the economic difficulties with which, for instance, Nyasaland has been faced that also presupposes a continuance and I must confess that very deliberately I have not tried to work out the whole of any pre-conceived plan because one gets bogged down in details and I have only gone into a lot of detail in fields with which I am familiar.

Q. These are really generalisations?

A. The sum total is the conclusion that you have a situation in which quite obviously the economics will take all the goodwill and all the co-operation in the world to meet, that is particularly on the Nyasaland side. The constitutional evolution could not possibly be settled in one bite at the cherry; it will have to evolve and I personally feel that the conclusion one comes to from that is simply a continuance of as much co-operation as the Federation can possibly secure, that a Council of State would remove one big difficulty and that is remote control and it would be more closely associated with the evolution of the problems as they develop.

CHAIRMAN: I would like, if I may, to go back to a point I think I raised before and that concerned the failure on the part of many Africans who are qualified, to register. In the summary you have said that you attribute it to apathy in Southern Rhodesia and to intimidation in the two Northern Territories?

A. Yes.

Q. I will not perhaps question that a large part is due to intimidation in the Northern Territories but there are a lot of people who have come to us and have given evidence that it is not just a matter of apathy in Southern Rhodesia, or if it is apathy it is due to a complete failure to take any steps to rouse people to any degree of political consciousness or duty to register, that it has not been explained and, moreover, quite apart from that, no effort has been made to get the people to register, to go out and explain to people why they should register. You might say it should be left to political parties to start for the first time. Other people may regard it as the duty of government to go out and explain to people.

A. I think I can answer that very quickly because, as you know, I am Chairman of an African newspaper. We are rather intimately concerned in trying to inculcate a political consciousness. It was done in two ways. One, quite definitely through the ordinary editorial columns in which our African editors, with the interests of their own people at heart, really went out of their way to try and emphasise it. From the point of view of the Federal Government they not only produced some tens of thousands of pamphlets—unfortunately I am not in a position to say how many—but I do know that we, with a circulation of round about $\frac{1}{2}$ million copies per month, ran a campaign for three months on the importance of voting so that through our hands about $1\frac{1}{2}$ million messages were distributed, and very widely.

MR. JUSTICE BEADLE: To encourage people to vote?

A. Yes. There was an absolute sustained campaign and it was paid for by the Government, in other words they took steps but they expected us to co-operate editorially, as one would.

Q. How many messages went out?

A. One and a half million through our hands. That was Federal-wide. I could supply factually what was beamed at Southern Rhodesia, in other words, the messages which were published in our publications which were devoted almost entirely to Southern Rhodesia and that is why I can say with a great deal of authority that unlike the Northern Territories where it really took a lot of courage to go against certain political views, that in Southern Rhodesia the basic reason was that a great many of the potential voters have reached an economic stage in which, quite frankly, their own personal bread and butter occupation, where they are running buses and where they are in employment in industry, put them in the same category as the average European in a City Council Election where, as we all know, it is not any reflection on the individual, the people are occupied with their own activities and just a small group of people with a civic consciousness have really got to do all the work.

Q. Less than 30 per cent. of the people who are qualified to vote, vote?

A. I am not sure but I do know that this is no dis-service. I have for thirty years given my life to African advancement. I know that we did all we possibly could and that the response was extremely poor. I must be absolutely fair. When you come to compare the effort which was made in Northern Rhodesia to get voters on their voters' roll there was far more, shall we say, administrative activity. The local District Commissioner pretty well put the pen in the man's hand and said "Now you fill this in". I would be quite wrong in giving the impression that in Southern Rhodesia that was so. It was really left very much to the individual, but the actual effort made by the Federal Government was a very, very sincere one and I am speaking really on behalf of my own African editors too. They felt very strongly about it and they simply implored people, but if a man is improving and he is moving into a new niche then quite frankly it is a very human characteristic and it is not correct to say that there were other factors. I am quite certain that I could prove that, should the Commission want the copies of the papers and things which will be available, it was overwhelming.

Q. Would your African editors agree with you in saying that the failure to register was largely due to apathy, would they support that?

A. They would naturally say it was more due to intimidation because there was a certain amount of intimidation throughout.

CHAIRMAN: In the South?

A. Yes. When I say intimidation it was that some of the political parties were saying "Don't vote". It was not intimidation, but in other words the African National Congress, to be specific, was not unalike to the democratic significance of the individual voter and that did to a large extent detract from the effort that was being made to get Africans on the voters' roll. In other words I should say there was resistance rather than intimidation, but in Southern Rhodesia that really is the pattern.

Q. Would you agree perhaps the greatest influence in this matter would be that of the African political parties?

A. No, I would not say that. I have been trying to give you a bird's eye view of what in my honest opinion are the contributory factors and in bringing that one I have merely brought in a supplementary, but not the major one.

Q. If the African political parties took the reverse attitude and went all out to get the qualified Africans to register do you think they would have any greater success than that of a publicity campaign by African newspapers?

A. Perhaps I am over-simplifying it but if they were to attempt it and the Federal Government, for instance, and African newspapers and other bodies were stopping it, the result would be the same. But were the African political parties to attempt it they would not meet with resistance, they would meet with co-operation so obviously the answer would be an improvement. I think that sums it up.

Q. You still think they would have great difficulty in overcoming the apathy?

A. Yes, they would still meet that apathy.

Q. They might say if we can get all the Africans to vote we shall get the seats and therefore we will go all out?

A. They will meet with less apathy because an African political party acting in that field would be comparable to the efforts made by the district administration of Northern Rhodesia.

Q. Would be comparable?

A. Yes, because it would be more personal.

Q. Might they be more comparable in that they would be prepared to use methods of intimidation? If they use methods of intimidation to prevent them voting they might also use methods of intimidation to make them vote?

A. Yes.

MR. JUSTICE BEADLE: I spoke to an African in the industrial field who was well qualified to vote and I asked him if he was a voter. He said that he was not a voter. He knew all about it. I asked him why he was not a voter. He said, "I have not registered because the various political parties will never stop worrying me to vote for them and I want to be left alone by political parties." How general is that attitude?

A. Quite a number feel that but that is a variation of apathy, in a sense.

Q. It is the very negative of apathy. He is not apathetic. He does not want to be on the voters' roll. Is that at all general, do you think? Do you know whether there are many who feel it is a nuisance to be on the roll, they only get bothered?

A. There are quite a number. There are quite a number in Nyasaland too who feel that. After all said and done, if you have some sort of business and you are not partisan, your customers are not restricted to one particular clique and it does make a difference. It is the same factor in almost anything. It is so strong a factor in European make-up that it is the background to so much of what happened in Nazi Germany, for instance. The policy of drift, when it is the individual drift, is an understandable one, it is a very human one.

CHAIRMAN: We have also been told that there was another factor in this, that many Africans were deterred from voting by the difficulties of voting. We were told that because they are required to register in the presence of the Native Commissioner or Police Officer, Sergeant, they had either to travel great distances to find a Native Commissioner or wait until he came out to the reserve or special native land unit and that when they have got there they have had to wait for long hours and queue and it has been made generally very difficult, onerous and unpleasant to register so they said, no, they would not. Is there any truth in that?

A. In my summary I put that down to about 10 per cent. Intimidation and isolation which is a brief way of saying that.

Q. There is something in that, some percentage?

A. There is some substance, yes, but that is not a factor which is readily resolved. I should imagine it is implicit in almost anything.

Q. Presumably it could be made easier if one had travelling registering officers?

A. It could be made easier but I do not know that it would be more effective.

Q. At least it would remove the excuse for not registering.

A. It is an excuse more than anything.

MR. ROBINSON: I would like to raise a completely different matter. As you are with us perhaps you can assist the Commission on what I think is an important question. You mentioned a Bill of Rights. Would you include in your Bill of Rights any provision which would make it an offence to indulge in race slander in any way or race libel? You are the editor of a newspaper and why I ask you this question is that it is my experience that very often newspapers indulge in or print matter which can definitely be said to inflame racial feelings.

MR. JUSTICE BEADLE: It is an offence now to do anything that stirs up racial hostility, but how often an offence is prosecuted one does not know.

A. It is extremely difficult. I do not think you can do any more than is implicit now. It is very difficult to pin point that and I think it would be almost impossible to bring a conviction.

Q. Under the Sedition Act it is an offence to stir up hostility between the races. You do occasionally get people prosecuted for it. I think there is something in the Public Order Act also.

A. Yes.

MR. ROBINSON: Thank you. I will acquaint myself more fully on that. Another question in regard to the Press I would like to ask you. In this country it is customary in the Press to refer to persons in news items as Africans or Europeans. A person does not get killed on a railway crossing, an African gets killed or a European gets killed on a railway crossing and then, of course, once you get on to other things, some of the offences like rape and human relations and so on, it takes on a different significance because you have a big headline, it says that a European woman has been subjected to this by an African male. Would you say it is conducive towards racial harmony to permit that sort of thing to continue?

A. No, it is not, but it is in the process of righting itself. I think going back over a number of years the tendency now more and more is to give names and eventually I think the race tag will fall away. In going back about ten years in memory the European Press were very prone to simply talk about a native or an African, they never gave any further details. Now more and more the tendency is to say Mr. or Mrs. So-and-So killed on a railway crossing. That is a very big step forward because before it really was a racial distinction. Now it is becoming blurred and I think over a period it will simply be treated as news and the name of the person and it will become less and less common to differentiate. I do not think you could change that legislatively. I do not see how one could because it has a news value. It is a service to the reader at this particular stage.

Q. Could your opinion in any way be affected by virtue of the fact that the entire National Press—I am now talking about English Press—is owned by a company with external affiliations and associations? Do you think that these trends are going to march with events within the Federation at quite the pace they might be because of the association of the National Press?

A. I am not quite sure that I get the question.

Q. May I put it another way. Do you think by virtue of the fact that our National Press is owned by South African interests, with the political trends within the Union and the attitude of some of the group that own our National Press in South Africa, the political affairs are having any impact or effect within the Federation?

A. It is bound to have to some extent at this stage. It is one of the reasons why I anticipated the march of events in the Union and separated my own company entirely from the Union. The link, I think, exists in two practices. One, it is becoming less obvious today but at one stage an editor looked for promotion to a larger paper in the South but I think as the papers have run on the line of succession to promotion is new within the Federation so there is less of a tendency for an editor to look over his shoulder and not blot his copy book here. I think that has almost gone. In my own knowledge there are very few instances of transfer but up to five years ago it was very common to serve in the Union and here it conditioned their thinking obviously. The other factor, the South Africa Press Association, the SAPA News Agency Distribution is on its way out. It is quite obvious that the constriction of freedom of news in the Union is having a disastrous effect on SAPA and in a very short time there will have to be a reorientation of our news. It has broken down because the SAPA News siphoning through the Union has met with a bottleneck through restrictions on what could and could not be passed on; it made a nonsense of the whole structure and it is only a matter of time, I should say eighteen months, and that very strong link will cease to have any significance and then you will have irrespective of whether it is one group or half a dozen groups, the basic factors are your succession, your promotion of your top men and your source of news, and since SAPA is entirely of South African origin and the National Press have seats on the board and virtual control of it, it is quite obvious that in self-defence, whether there is a financial control or not, the newspapers here will insist on a source of news which is not constricted; that is quite definite.

I can say that with a certain amount of authority because in the Union the company I started there was prevented from becoming associated because of apartheid. My papers were African papers so I was not persona grata, but being on the board of the F.B.C. right from the very beginning, knowing that, we have started to build up our own news services, as you probably know.

Q. With great success, if I might say so.

A. Thank you. I anticipated that events were going to make that absolutely essential. Because of the financial association, the Rhodesian Printing and Publishing Company has not been as alive to these factors as much as an independent person would be. It is quite obvious if they do not do something soon, economics will put that right and as I say in the next eighteen months the source of news will not be siphoned through the Union and that will make a very big break.

CHAIRMAN: Thank you very much. This has been very useful to us.

A. Thank you once again.

Memorandum

C. M. KAMHUNGU

I have the honour to inform you that I personally want to see the Monckton Commission and presently express all my views before its selected members.

The following are my points I would like to say to the Commission:—

1. If it is true that the Government is responsible for the education of its subjects, but why does our Government not build us Government Schools in the rural areas (Reserves)? Our today's education comes chiefly from the Missionaries who sometimes expel children who do not belong to their churches.

2. We appeal to the Government to build us hospitals and clinics in the rural areas.

3. We appeal to the Government to amend the Land Apportionment Act and Land Husbandry Act in which we find difficulties within Southern Rhodesia.

4. The Act which declares landless to any one who has not paid tax for 5 years should be amended immediately.

5. The Act which gives District Commissioners power to declare landless to anyone in Southern Rhodesia who fails to pay his annual tax should be abolished immediately. It is far better for the Government to arrest such people who do not pay their annual taxes.

6. Headmen as Government employees should be paid salaries and should be provided with free uniforms and bags in which they put money (taxes) they collect from their people.

7. I appeal to the Government to abolish the word "Native" in Africa which is frequently used by whites to denote (black) which is extremely wrong.

Oral Evidence

C. M. KAMHUNGU

Mr. Kamhungu said that he did not wish to add to the memorandum he had submitted but, in answering questions from the Commission, he stated that difficulties arising out of the Land Apportionment Act and the Native Land Husbandry Act came from some people being given poor land and much too small an acreage. In the result, they were able to produce only very small crops and keep very few cattle. He said the average African farmer after destocking was left with no more than three or five head of cattle which were quite useless for the purpose of supplying milk and tilling the land. The Land Husbandry Act applied in his area and the average size of the plots was something like eight acres. He himself was permitted to hold nine head of cattle. He agreed that on this basis, with communal grazing for his cattle, his holding could be regarded as a farm of a minimum area of 98 acres (8 plus 90) based on ten acres of grazing for each beast. He stated that his income from the farm in 1959 was £25.

The Act he had mentioned resulted in considerable difficulties being encountered by families. If a man had more than one child, the eldest son would succeed to the property on the father's death but what were the other people to do?

Mr. Kamhungu criticized the Government's African educational policy and said that the only education they received was that provided by the missions. They found it difficult to educate their children. He disapproved of the practice of instituting difficult examinations when a child had to pass from his lower primary schooling to Standard IV. He said that there should be more schools to provide more places in Standard IV and upwards, but he considered that the Government simply did not want to build further schools. He was unaware of the vast sums of money set aside for African education but whatever it was they found it impossible to get the necessary school accommodation. In the result, after going through Standard III, most of the children stayed at home and only a few went forward to the upper primary and secondary schools. He also criticized the lack of teachers and said that very few teachers were available.

Mr. Kamhungu went on to say that people who did not pay tax expected to be deprived of their land. But, in answer to a question, he was unable to assert that this had in fact happened. He understood that it was contained in an Act of Parliament that people who had not paid their tax for five years were rendered landless. Subsequently, he changed his evidence to say that it was probably the case that it was necessary for a man to have been a taxpayer for not less than five years before any allocation of land in a Native Purchase Area would be made to him. He added that the Land Apportionment Act itself was not an evil measure; it was its implementation that was evil. The witness handed in a cutting from the African Daily News of some time ago and asked the Commission to take it to London and have it published in order to support the grievances the Africans faced in Southern Rhodesia. The cutting which was headed "What will happen to those who cannot get land?" is in the following terms:—

"The off-asked question as to what will happen to those Africans who, because of the Land Husbandry Act, will find themselves without land when they need one, has been answered by the S. Rhodesia Government in a pamphlet just published, which is entitled "Please Tell me; I would like to Know".

Says the pamphlet: "Those who are not allocated land or livestock at the time the Land Husbandry Act is implemented, have the right to inherit their parents' allocation eventually, or they can buy land or stock from those who wish to leave and make their living from commercial or other employment. In certain areas there is vacant land after allocation is complete, which can be applied for by those who have not received land allocations.

Those people who are not successful in acquiring land in this way must then obtain employment elsewhere. until they have saved sufficient money to buy the land they want."

The pamphlet containing this and other information is printed in three languages Shona, English and Sindebele.

Memorandum

A. F. ROUSE

Introduction

The evidence I wish to give will be put forward in a personal capacity.

It will be based on my experience whilst Director of the Latin American Office of the International Labour Organization of the working of the Federal Constitutions of Brazil, Argentina, Mexico and the U.S.A., in so far as constitutional questions and those related to non-African primitive peoples are concerned.

On specifically local questions it will be related to my experience here during eight years as a farmer and as a member of Native Labour Boards, and to the researches I have conducted into African intelligence and educability as a Senior Research Fellow of the University College of Rhodesia & Nyasaland.

The Outlook on Federation of the Various Groups Concerned

1. It is, of course, one of the most difficult tasks of the Commission to evaluate the views of the various groups on Federation and to determine how far such views are representative. The notes which are added are personal and intended to put into the pool of knowledge some individual experience and judgments.

2. The views of the three main political parties—the United Federal Party, the Dominion Party, and the Central African Party are well known, and need not be repeated. A note of caution should be sounded on the strength of the Central African Party. It has secured control of most of the Press, and its views are given prominence far outweighing its electoral strength. In fact it does not hold any normal seats with mixed voters in either the Federal or Territorial assemblies (Lusaka, a town mainly inhabited by transient officials is peculiar; probably this town and Zomba will need special electoral arrangements as has Washington, D.C.). The same Press gives undue prominence to the views of small and unrepresentative groups in the African townships.

3. The Commission will be aware that most of the Africans in European employment in the Federation are employed in agriculture and a high proportion of those in Southern Rhodesia are from Nyasaland. The European farmer working in the lands with his African labourers normally talks to them on current topics, and is in closer touch with them than either officials or missionaries.

4. Since early last year I have endeavoured to obtain through their employers the views of Africans engaged in agriculture on Federation. The groups covered involves something like a thousand Africans living in the Salisbury farming area. The conclusions reached may be summarized as follows:—

1. few Africans knew what Federation was, but all from Nyasaland were in favour of any association which would make it easier for them to work in Southern Rhodesia.
2. the disturbances in Nyasaland last year were said to have been stirred up by the Scottish Mission which was said to have abandoned normal missionary activities for trouble making. It was said that when the authorities took action the Africans were left to face the music themselves.
3. most Nyasaland workers do not wish to return home because of the "troubles". Many are illegally endeavouring to obtain "white" situpas (the registration certificates proper only to local Africans)
5. (4) It should be added that the most enterprising of the population of Nyasaland is that at work in Southern Rhodesia. It is not unnatural that among the less capable who remain in Nyasaland there should be some with extremist views (the parallel with South Wales when it was a depressed area is obvious.) In the two Rhodesias the Nyasalander has the reputation of being both industrious and particularly law abiding.

African Intelligence

6. It has become the fashion to relate the granting of political responsibility to Africans to the agitation of particular groups (including those with left wing views) and to the wishes of the United States. No realistic assessment has been made of African capacities for Government inside a European type constitution (the training ground provided by equal African participation inside political parties with a European membership, as is the case in the Federation, also tends to be ignored.)

7. No research on the above point has been carried on in depth in the Federation. The conclusions of research carried on elsewhere in Africa is, however, instructive.

8. The researches of Fick in South Africa (see the South African Council for Educational and Social Research Annual 1939) lead to conclusions which are much more pessimistic than those of Dr. Banda. The Tomlinson Report, however, (also published in South Africa) speaks highly of African potentialities in the economic field. Carothers (The African Mind in Health and Disease—London 1948) dwells on the lack of mental stability and perseverance. The work in the Congo of the late Professor Ombredane and of Professor Maistriaux (L'Intelligence Noire and Son Destin—Brussels 1958) has been the most thorough and comprehensive. By a wide series of tests they have established the African lack of powers of mental abstraction which in fact corrupts his moral judgment. To put it in its simplest form Professor Maistriaux concludes that the African finds great difficulty in realizing the abstract categorical imperative of giving his due to a bad man as much as to a good man. Training in the arts of government where this blind spot is an obvious handicap is the only answer, but such training must inevitably be prolonged.

9. In all three territories the African has the right to run his own affairs in Local Government through Native Authorities or Native Councils; in addition he can qualify for the Federal or Territorial franchise by very low educational income or property qualifications. Valuable training grounds are thus open to him. In fact, however, few of the African politicians who have secured some newspaper reputation have been chosen by their fellows to start even on the bottom rung of this kind of training. None have been elected by any substantial group. Nevertheless it is one of the ironies of the policy of the U.K. Government to give recognition to the most vocal individuals or oligarchic groups without regard to their status among their own people, in fact respectable Africans in responsible positions (the ones I know best are foremen) speak of them with contempt.

Economic Considerations of Federal Administration

10. It is not proposed in this note to develop the economic pros and cons of Federation, but only to deal with the limited aspect of the cost of administration if a dual system is maintained.

11. On seeing in operation the Federal systems of administration in South America, the United States, and in Central Africa, I have been struck by the expense of the overlapping of functions involved, and (what is nearly as expensive) the avoidance of overlapping by constant consultations between the Ministers and officials concerned. After seeing the straightforward administration from Whitehall where functions are relatively clearcut, the expense of a dual system is most noticeable. It must be remembered that the cost of administration bears heavily on underdeveloped territories, and what taxable resources they have should be used as much as possible for development. An instance in the other sense, is Nyasaland where the administration (not altogether economical) was till Federation only financed by taxing imports, e.g. agricultural implements and fertilizers which are needed for development. This is partly responsible for the present poverty of Nyasaland.

12. It follows that any amalgamation which can be made within the Federal system would be to the good of the Federation. There seems to be no reason why the two Rhodesias should not be amalgamated from the constitutional and administrative point of view and for the resultant unit to be in federal relationship to Nyasaland. A close and realistic examination will show that the obstacles to amalgamation of the two Rhodesias are no greater than their incorporation in one effective Federation.

13. If such amalgamation is not possible, an effort should be made to make the divisions of functions between the Federal and Territorial Governments much more clear cut. In particular the implementation or non-implementation of functions on the concurrent list should be made the basis of clearcut agreements, to last for specified periods of years.

14. Though it is not a fashionable concept the future of the Federation may well best lie in a strong unitary state, with the extensive development of local government at the municipal and native authority level. Such a form of organisation could well lead to a better and more flexible system than the present. Economic and social policy could flow from the Federal centre and much of its implementation be effected at the local level where the ordinary citizen (white or black) could have the maximum say in its application to particular circumstances. With the present territorial governments, particularly those in the Northern Territories where they are comprised of non-resident officials local government is largely suffering from a sense of frustration as well as lack of a policy lead.

Compatibility of Government inside a Federation

15. Federal systems have been a commonplace recipe to associate territories which are otherwise divergent. Whether they are constituted on the Statenbund or Bunderstat principle such federal systems do not work where the divergence between the constituent states is too great. The United States of North America is an obvious example. It is not necessary to look back as far as the American Civil War—Little Rock is a modern instance. There are many other examples which are less open to the gaze of the public. I know of a number of fields where the U.S. Federal Government has deliberately kept its eyes shut to shortcomings on the part of individual states even when it has meant the non-fulfilment of international obligations such as the conventions of the International Labour Organisation.

16. Brazil can also give numerous parallel instances. Though they are featured only in the local press the Federal Government has a constant struggle to maintain its continuity in its own fields in some of the "black" or "semi-black" states of the North of Brazil. The use of force, including the despatch of cruisers has become almost an annual necessity to secure even the payment of Federal taxes. It follows that in Central Africa it is quite unreasonable to expect the Federation to continue, still less to develop, if the two Northern territories are made too heterogeneous from Southern Rhodesia in their type of government. There is a clearly dishonest intention on the part of the British Government to hasten constitutional "reform" in these two territories while the review of the Federal Constitution is proceeding. This amounts, in fact, to sabotage of the whole Federation principle.

Allocation of Functions to the Federal and Territorial Governments respectively

17. Agriculture

Agriculture in the two Rhodesias was made a Federal responsibility at the inception of Federation. Early in 1959 a promise was given by the territorial government to the European farmers in Nyasaland that the same would shortly apply there. This promise has still to be fulfilled; it should be honoured without delay.

18. The European farmers in Northern Rhodesia have expressed great appreciation of the development of technical services and marketing since Federation. Clearly a unified Federal service can provide such services on a much better scale than several smaller-sized units.

19. African agriculture was retained as a territorial responsibility in all three territories, largely on the insistence of certain political interests, particularly some outside the Federation. A certain amount of hysteria was raised over land rights, which have, of course, nothing to do with the functions of a modern Ministry of Agriculture (Incidentally the same interests have had the hypocritical effrontery to complain of discrimination against the African in that the territorial departments of agriculture are so much smaller than the Federal Ministry.)

20. Quite clearly the services of the Ministry of Agriculture such as research and other technical aids and marketing, should be available to all agricultural producers. Equally the small territorial departments can never attract the outstanding man. It should be added that the African Farmers' Union in Southern Rhodesia has already asked to come under the Federal Ministry.

21. Education

Similar considerations apply to education, where the Federal Government is at present solely responsible for the higher education of all races, and the general and technical education of Europeans, Asians and Coloureds. Recent events in Northern Rhodesia have shown up the weaknesses of the African educational system in that territory. It comes back to the point that small fragmented educational services have a poor chance of attracting good staff.

22. Labour

Even in times of high level prosperity the skilled worker needs to be mobile over the whole Federation if he is to secure continuous employment in his particular line. The machine for placing him in employment needs to be effective over all three territories. A Federal employment service is the only realistic answer. The matching of details of those seeking work and of vacancies can never be done effectively otherwise. This is also of prime importance in regard to the control of immigration into the Federation which is of course already Federal.

23. The case for a Federal employment service is even stronger where unskilled labour is concerned. The present un-directed streams of migration inside the Federation are wasteful both to employer and employee alike. Apart from the often fruitless tramp of the African worker in search of work. Many employers in agriculture find their own recruiting arrangements in other territories cost them up to forty pounds per head per worker recruited.

24. It is appreciated that the industrial relations background and legislation of the three territories are different. It is not suggested that at the first stage the whole of the three territorial labour departments should be unified under the Federal government but only their manpower functions. The latter are primarily economic, whereas other labour functions operate in many Continental countries; it was applied in the British Element of the Control Commission after the last war.

Oral Evidence

A. F. ROUSE

Mr. Rouse wished to add to his memorandum by pressing the point about the Federation being expensive. He had calculated that the cost of the Governor-General and his household would be enough to paddock half of the Native Reserves of Southern Rhodesia, which would give a big economic return. He thought that the Governor-General's organisation was important mainly as a gesture.

He had recently returned from spending ten days in the Belgian Congo where he had been struck by the question of the franchise. The African politicians there were all insistent on the vote of confiscation. This was a concept of voting quite alien to English 19th century liberalism. At that time the state had only managed a few limited activities. But in the 20th century there was a different background. The "have-nots" had got the idea of taking away from the "haves" through the instrument of the vote. He therefore felt that the idea of a high qualitative franchise in the Federation was fully justified, and that the present qualifications should not be altered: this did not mean that he did not think that wages were very low. He had recently done research into the traditional African gwazas (i.e. the daily set task), and had calculated that these tasks represented one-seventh of what would be done by an English labourer in the same period, while the cost of each task was about one-sixth of what it would be in England.

He had been informed by a Deputy in the Belgian Parliament whom he had met in the Congo that the new settlement in the Congo had been decided on as part of an agreement between the two main political parties in Belgium. It was on such grounds as these that he considered that the Federation must be removed from the field of party politics in England.

In reply to questions, Mr. Rouse made the following further points:—

1. Paragraph 14 of his memorandum, last sentence, compared with paragraph 4. He was asked whether in fact he favoured a unitary state, and whether he thought this feasible in present circumstances. He replied that the times now demanded a bold lead. Much would depend on how you would constitute a unitary state; but it was significant that Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesian Africans continued to come to work in Southern Rhodesia, even under the controls which were applied.

2. Paragraph 16 of the memorandum. The divergence of states within a federation could not be strained too far. Brazil, as he had indicated, was a good example of this.

3. Referring to Nyasaland and the release of Dr. Banda, he could only suppose that the British Government was giving way because of the rioting which had taken place there.

4. He could not help remarking that the British Government were apparently organising changes in the Constitution of Nyasaland, while the Commission was still sitting, which might make the findings of the Commission out of date before they even reported.

5. The Congolese politicians were threatening the expropriation of large businesses, including the Huileries de Congo and the Katanga Mines without compensation. There were daily reports in the newspapers of this fact. The Belgian Deputy whom he had met had however said that the main troubles in the Congo had been inter-tribal, and not directed against the Belgian Government.

6. Mr. Rouse had lived for over a year in Brazil, and paid several visits there. In that country all racial discrimination had been made illegal by law. Nevertheless, in practice, intermarriage between the races was most unusual. It was noticeable however that the lower classes were darker, and the upper classes were whiter skinned. Universal suffrage existed in the country. Governments had changed through a succession of revolutions, and not necessarily by elections. The whites retained control through their superior organisation and the rigging of elections; thus the 10% of whites were holding on to power through a combination of force and fraud, including control of the press. The army was of mixed race, with compulsory military training for all. He thought that the Federation would have much to learn from Brazil on the side of economic development. In particular, it might teach the Federal authorities to break away from the conceptions of United Kingdom income tax. He had recently given evidence to a Working Party in the Federation under the Ministry of Economics, in favour of a visit by Federal officials to Brazil. He thought that in the Federation people were too prone to take for granted economic conceptions based on the stable economy of England. He believed in particular in the principle of the non-intervention by Government in economic affairs. He considered that in Western Germany it had been proved that a free economy was the best climate for advancement. He contrasted with this the controls which existed in the Northern Territories of the Federation, of which, in his view, inhibited both freedom and competition.

7. In paragraph 2, he was referring to the local press of which the Central Africa Party had gained control.

8. He understood that in Southern Rhodesia any area could establish a Native Council if it wanted to do so, and that such a Council could raise rates, undertake housing, water supplies and most of the normal functions of a Municipal Government.

9. Mr. Rouse was asked if, having regard to the violent opposition to Federation in the Northern Territories, he would nevertheless be prepared to impose Federation by force. He replied that at all stages of the development of government one was liable to get dissidence, and everything depended on the degree of consent which was considered necessary. He did not think that there was any question of force. It was necessary to prepare people's minds to understand Federation there was no programme for this purpose in the two Northern Territories. In Southern Rhodesia the minds of the Europeans were reasonably clear about Federation: they favoured it, but only on certain conditions.

10. Paragraph 22—Labour. He said that the suggested Federal Employment Service would be directed to manpower problems alone, while the Territorial Governments would continue to deal with industrial relations, conditions of service, and other labour matters. This was a common division of functions in Europe. He was fully aware of the two different systems of legislation to govern industrial relations in Northern Rhodesia and Southern Rhodesia. Nevertheless, he considered that where large scale migration took place, the best way to work was through an Employment Service organised federally.

11. Paragraph 8 last sentence. How long should the training of Africans in government be prolonged? He pointed to the example of the House of Commons in London, where many Members had reached politics through long periods in local government or in the trade unions. Similarly, back-benchers did not become Parliamentary Secretaries for a considerable time. He admitted that these might be extreme examples; but they illustrated his meaning. So far as Local Government was concerned he had in mind the Native Councils, and also the various political organisations themselves. He himself was a member of the Executive of the United Federal Party, and today Africans participated fully in its discussions, a fact that was sometimes forgotten.

12. He had referred in paragraph 9 to the "most vocal individuals". He did not know whether they had any real following. But he felt bound to point to the large numbers of Nyasalanders who came to work in Southern Rhodesia, despite their alleged dislike of the politics in that country. In this connection, he thought that the Federal figures were probably an under estimate. He thought that many of the Nyasalanders who came to Southern Rhodesia labelled themselves as, from Portuguese East Africa. If the politics of Southern Rhodesia were anathema, why did they come? He thought that a similar judgment could be made about South Africa. It had also to be borne in mind that if one moved in political circles one tended to over-estimate the interest of the ordinary man in politics. So long as the officials with whom the ordinary man dealt with were reasonable and tolerant, he would not normally bother about politics. But as regards the question whether the people regarded as their leaders "the most vocal individuals", that was one which Mr. Macleod should answer. What basis had he for assuming that Dr. Banda really represented the Africans in Nyasaland?

13. Paragraph 14 last sentence. In Southern Rhodesia there were true Municipalities in the English sense, which were independent and operated with the minimum of government control. They had their own association which dealt with matters of common concern. But in the Northern Territories, for example, on the Copperbelt and in Blantyre/Limbe he had found that there were stringent restrictions on borrowing, which meant that little real authority was given to the municipalities there. He knew that African members of Local Authorities were fully aware of this fact.

14. As to the delay in bringing Africans fully into the Civil Service in Southern Rhodesia, he said that in respect of Local Government he was thinking of elected representatives rather than of civil servants, and of the analogy which he had drawn with conditions in Great Britain where people started their political careers in Local Government.

15. His views on the question of control by the Colonial Office from 6,000 miles away, and whether the elimination of protection by The Crown would upset the Africans in the Northern Territories, were to the effect that a policy of gradualism could be attempted to give Africans a better knowledge of the meaning of Federation. He thought that Federation had in fact done well, and he referred particularly to the free health services, especially when compared with the progress in some other under-developed territories. A programme of gradualism was the really honest way to proceed. He considered that the cost of administering the two Northern Territories from 6,000 miles away was fantastically high.

Memorandum

H. W. FOSTER

Constitutional Change: Two Proposals Stemming from the Need for Security

1. When the Federation was established, the British Government's objectives were clearly stated in the Preamble to the Federal Constitution. They then were, the political advancement of all the inhabitants and their security and welfare. The Commission's terms of reference make it clear that the British Government still retains those objectives. The Preamble also specifically recognised the right to an increased measure of independence for the Federation, within the Commonwealth when the inhabitants so desire. What was not so specifically stated however, was the right of all inhabitants to sound government and personal freedom, although, of course, those rights too are implicit in the Constitution.

2. The purpose of this Memorandum is to emphasise that greater independence, either Federal or Territorial, can conflict with good government and freedom and to suggest safeguards against this potential conflict.

3. There are many pointers to such a possibility. As the Commission is aware, many States have become independent since the war, only to find that they have exchanged efficient foreign tutelage for bad and corrupt government. Their record has been one of instability, of coups d'état and revolution, assassination and judicial murder. It must be noted that all alike, upon the grant of independence, accepted free democratic constitutions, but today autocratic government has been substituted in most of them. This experience is relevant to the problems of British Central Africa.

4. The three Territories of the Federation differ not only from countries stabilised by centuries of political experience but also substantially among themselves.

5. Southern Rhodesia has enjoyed Responsible Government for 36 years. By and large, despite some marked shortcomings, the powers enjoyed have been well used. For some of the shortcomings, the country's relative isolation and the consequent resistance to change shown by some of its less-enlightened inhabitants, can be held responsible. Means must be evolved to overcome these obstacles, but the main point is that existing reservations in the Constitution today have virtually no effect upon the course of events. Thus, there might well be considerable value in substituting for what are now useless irritants, some more general measure, some ultimate form of authority, as a safeguard for the liberty and security of all.

6. The need for such a measure is indicated by experience elsewhere, for although not immediately pressing, who can say that similar dangers will not have become real in 10 or 20 years' time? The Southern Rhodesian Common Roll limits the franchise to those who have some education or a little property. I do not dispute its rightness or value but, quite obviously, it means that the character of the electorate will change. These small voting qualifications do not of themselves confer either wisdom or experience in the management of a modern democratic state. Nor should we forget Newfoundland, which, as an independent Dominion, suffered such corrupt and bad government that in 1933 the British Government was obliged to resume its powers.

7. If these arguments apply to Southern Rhodesia, they apply doubly to Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, where both the people and the politicians are much more ignorant and inexperienced, and where the dangers of misrule are thus much greater. Today, amongst the African population, there is no large body of educated men in either Territory, and it will be many years yet before Africans can begin to provide any significant number of the trained technical men needed for a modern State: not only is there not a single African chartered accountant or engineer, but it is to be doubted whether there is in the whole Federation a single African who could even act as foreman on a large constructional project. Thus, many of the trained men necessary for development, as well as most of the essential capital, must continue to be imported. Neither experienced labour nor investment capital, both of which are prerequisites of the stated objectives of British policy, will be secured unless constitutional safeguards for the maintenance of reasonable standards of government are retained. Indeed there may well be a flight of both capital and men from the Federation instead of the inflow so badly needed.

8. For political and psychological reasons, however, it is inevitable that Africans, especially in the Northern Territories of the Federation, will be given increasing power. But it would seem obvious that, when experience clearly indicates that a mere translation of British democratic institutions is not likely to give satisfactory results, novel forms of government and new institutions should be devised. We must be ready to experiment, especially in the field of constitutional safeguards for the rights of all. Experiments do not always succeed. There must, therefore, be some supreme authority provided, at least until the masses can be educated to a point where they themselves can insist on governmental honesty and efficiency and individual freedom.

Board of Rights

9. Many suggestions to meet this situation have been made. A Bill of Rights, entrenched in the Constitution, and a Supreme Court similar to that in the United States have been proposed; but, in view of experience in South Africa and elsewhere, it is doubtful whether they provide adequate protection. Moreover, the onus would be on the aggrieved to appeal, and they might well be unable or afraid to do so. They might not even realise the need for protest.

10. A Second Chamber suffers from the same disadvantage as the others. But the most important objection to this also is that, once independence is granted, all alike are liable to be thrown overboard with the Constitution. Indeed, Europeans have done just that in South Africa, and some in the Federation would be quite capable of doing so if they felt their racial existence to be threatened; the example has not been lost on the emergent African politician.

11. I suggest that given a change in its functions, the African Affairs Board might offer a solution. Renamed, for instance, the Royal Board of Rights, it would be empowered to protect the rights of the whole community; as such it might well become more acceptable to opinion in this country than heretofore. But to do this, it must be identified with the interests of all, not with those of a single race. The new Board might consist of, say, five men (not Members of Parliament) chosen for their integrity, experience and independence of outlook. The President might be a Judge appointed from outside the Federation; his standing should be equal to that of the Chief Justice.

12. The Board's principal duty would be to watch all Federal and Territorial legislation, or proposed legislation, for injustice done or proposed to any race or group. Its powers would extend to administrative regulation as well as to Statutes, and it would have the right, indeed the duty, to order the responsible Minister to reconsider any measure or regulation and to have the matter debated in the legislature concerned. If there were continuing dispute the matter would be referred to the Prime Minister of the Federation or of the Territory concerned. Failing any satisfactory response, the President of the Board would have the duty to submit the dispute to the Sovereign, who would receive the advice of the Prime Minister concerned, and could be assisted in a decision by a Special Committee of the Privy Council.

13. In this way a supreme arbiter, acceptable to all reasonable men, would be provided; and, indeed the old precedent of the 1867 constitution of Canada would be closely followed. The procedure could also lead to the gradual education of public opinion on the meaning of fair and just government.

14. It must be emphasised that this duty of ensuring constitutional security for all would be paramount. The Board, however, in addition could have more extended functions—in fact, such would seem to be essential in the circumstances, and are outlined, in tentative form, in the Annexure attached.

15. I have not attempted to suggest the detailed administrative and constitutional machinery required: if the principle were accepted, the detailed working out could follow. I am far from oblivious to the difficulties. There is no precedent for the idea any more than there is a clear precedent for the problem; but this circumstance does not make a reasonable solution less urgent.

Constitutional Moratorium

16. Whatever forms the new Constitution or Constitutions may take, some years must pass before results become apparent. Innovations must be given adequate time to become accustomed usage and to be accepted by the general public: if they appear to be only temporary expedients preparatory to further "Advance" and more change, they will not succeed. Then the territories will never know stability; insecurity will grow; all progress, especially economic progress, will be hampered; and indeed everything so far achieved may well be destroyed.

17. It is, therefore, I consider absolutely essential that when the new constitutional arrangements are decided whatever they may be, the British Government should make a solemn declaration and state specifically that it:

- (1) Accepts the duty to guarantee the new constitutions and will uphold them by force if necessary, and will not agree to, nor ignore, their overthrow or their erosion; and

(2) Will not consider changes or any review, such as that now in hand, for at least 15 years (preferably 25), other than minor accommodations and alterations which experience shows to be necessary.

18. Only in this way can constant agitation for more changes be stilled. Everybody would feel obliged to make the best of what has been laid down. In consequence, people as a whole would be able to regain confidence in the future, for they would at least know where they stood. Uncertainty is one of the greatest dangers to progress. Given constitutional safeguards and a constitutional moratorium as suggested, all our citizens would feel more strongly than they do now that they could go about their lawful affairs in security and peace.

Annexure to Memorandum

Suggested Additional Functions of Royal Board of Rights

As stated, the prime need of this multi-racial Federation, and thus the prime duty of the suggested Board, is the ensuring of constitutional security.

The Commission, however, might consider that, in view of known trends and future circumstances, certain other aspects of government and of political and economic development could fall, legitimately and beneficially, within the Board's responsibilities.

In making the following suggestions, I appreciate that there might well be objections on the grounds of infringement of democratic sovereignty; but there is only limited democracy in the Federation at present, for obvious reasons, and the suggestions are designed specifically to meet a situation which will certainly arise if the franchise is substantially extended. Indeed, it is likely to arise in any case with or without an extension of the franchise.

In my view, any solution of the problem of government must lie in the direction of democratic representation limited by an ultimate authority which would prevent abuse of it.

Governmental Incompetence or Corruption

That there is a real danger under this heading no one can deny who has watched events in emergent States in the past decade.

The Board could have the duty of guarding against these evils. There is, for instance, nothing constitutionally repugnant in making the Auditor-General's departments (whether Federal or Territorial) directly responsible to the President of the Board: the Board would represent the State, under the Crown, and the Auditor-General, in theory, is the guardian of the State's finances.

If the Board were strengthened by the addition of an Efficiency Branch it would be able not only to keep the normal operations of government under close observation but would also be able to give much-needed advice and instruction in the art of government to new and inexperienced politicians or civil servants.

Sound Planning

Much more than rather negative precautions is needed if the Federation is to confront with success the many and difficult problems facing it.

It is a commonplace today to remark upon the lack of foresight shown by democratic governments. This apparent inability to think ahead springs in part from the difficulty which Ministers and their senior officials alike experience in finding time for thought: they are too absorbed in urgent daily work. In addition, the information needed for sound planning is often not available, and there exists no means of collecting or collating it. There is the further difficulty that planning ahead—the meeting of problems which, though obviously likely to arise, are not of any immediate urgency—would often involve expense and decisions for which the public was not prepared. In a word, the government might lose votes.

The Board might become the much-needed vehicle for this essential activity. The work involved might be considered under three heads:

Economic

It is obviously absurd that, in a country so little developed unemployment and the fear of unemployment should exist. Yet certainly these are at the root of much of the unease felt by both European and African; the European fears for his job and his standard of living, and the African that his advancement be unreasonably delayed.

Obviously, there should be ample work and opportunity for all. Their achievement, however, depends on long-term planning which would ensure that schemes for development and their financing shall be properly prepared well in advance. Information is wanted on which such plans could safely be based; research is wanted; and overlapping must be avoided.

In particular, the study of the country in its broadest outline needs to be undertaken, and the assistance of international agencies would thus be required. The development problems of the Zambezi basin, for example, need to be studied as a co-ordinated whole: given the constitutional machinery, the unedifying and wasteful wrangle over Kariba and Kafue might have been avoided while as development proceeds the interests of all the riverine states in proper allocation and use of water will become more important and harder to reconcile.

As an impartial body, the Board of Rights could consider these problems and organise the much-needed research and planning activities accordingly.

Social Change

The social problems of Central Africa are unusually difficult because they involve group and race attitudes which arouse strong emotions not amenable to reason. Unless they are tackled energetically and objectively racial partnership will remain a dream. No reasonable man underestimates the difficulties, but there can be no solution in drift.

Here again, an elected government finds itself in difficulty: whatever it does it is likely to encounter fierce opposition, and if it neglects the problem, violence is inevitable.

Time will be needed if any solution is to be found, and time can be bought only by means of a constitutional system, such as that proposed in the Memorandum, which ensures that no single group can dominate another. Within the time gained, the problem can be studied carefully, especially in relation to experience in other multi-racial countries, and the situation may prove far less unmanageable than it appears now. Careful policy might gradually remove causes of friction; and an impartial body, if enjoying the general confidence, might well provide the means towards the true partnership which most thinking men desire.

Propaganda

The most careful forethought is useless, the best-laid plans vain, unless the public can be brought to accept them. In this task of explanation and information, the Board could play a peculiarly useful part: it is not trying to gain power and has no axe to grind.

No government can perform the duty in the same way, because its motives are always suspect to one group or another. Yet the duty must be performed. World opinion also must be considered. Its influence on this continent is already large and will grow. At present it is largely uninformed for little authoritative presentation of facts has been attempted. Nor would purely Government statements necessarily be accepted. Impartial information based on the truth and a study of the logic of the situation, presented by a body whose word would be accepted by all, can alone meet the needs.

As previously emphasised, I do not underestimate the difficulties or the cost. The Board would need a considerable organisation, which would take time and thought to build and, starting relatively small, would have to expand very rapidly as it gained experience. Specialists for other countries would be needed, in the same way as they are needed by the major industries now.

But the cost in effort and money would be small indeed, compared with the cost of failure of the whole Federal experiment.

Oral Evidence

H. W. FOSTER

Mr. Foster stated that after service in the Army and experience in Kenya and elsewhere he had come to Southern Rhodesia twelve years ago, where he was now a Company Director.

Mr. Foster who had presented a memorandum with an annexure, felt that the existing reservations in the Constitutions were unsatisfactory and that what we needed was something very much more immutable. He agreed that the Board of Rights referred to in his memorandum would by no means necessarily ensure a reasonable standard of government; but his main object in suggesting such a Board was to put an end to existing, and avoid future discriminatory measures either in principal or in subsidiary legislation. This would apply not only to the legislation of the Federal Government but also to that of the Territorial Governments.

Broadly, by arrangement or when legislation was presented, the Board could suggest changes if that legislation appeared to be unsatisfactory on the issue of discrimination. If the responsible minister did not agree to the suggested changes, the Bill would have to be debated once more. If nothing was done then it would have to be referred to some special committee of the Privy Council for adjudication, and that Committee in effect would have power to make laws in the Federation and Territories but only, of course, if some injustice was demonstrated. Although the special Privy Council committee would also deal with subsidiary legislation and local government legislation, in practice it was most unlikely that it would have to deal with anything other than major issues.

In regard to the composition of the Board he went on to say that he thought the appointments could be made by the governments of the day but they would have to be acceptable to the Governor-General acting in his personal discretion.

In connection with paragraph 12, the witness agreed that legislation would only be introduced after Cabinet approval had been obtained, including that of the Prime Minister. He did not subscribe to the view, however, that this would be largely a useless sort of protection because for one thing a second debate would have to follow and, for another, once the matter had been raised by the Board outside pressures would unquestionably develop. If no result satisfactory to the Board followed the second debate, the matter would then be transferred to the Privy Council, a judicial body, but in this instance armed, in effect, with legislative powers.

The witness admitted that any Constitution would have to embrace a Bill of Rights, which was the only thing that could provide standards on which the legislature itself and the committee of the Privy Council could operate. But he emphasized that a Bill of Rights was useless on its own unless there was some power behind it, and this was what he was endeavouring to suggest. A veto such as the reference back, or the need for a two-thirds majority were all very well but these sort of things could never safeguard any Constitution. There must be an outside body. At all costs the country must avoid what was happening in the Union of South Africa and Ghana, where in effect the Governments of the day had virtually thrown the Constitutions out of the window. He thought that his suggestion was politically possible, although it was very likely that it would be opposed by the ruling party in this country. He thought there was some precedent for what he had suggested in the Canadian Constitution. The whole problem was a very difficult one indeed.

On reconsideration of the question of appointments to the Board he thought that it might be dangerous to make the Governor-General the arbiter of these. Perhaps it would be better to have the Chief Justice and other Justices; but even so there were inherent difficulties, and it would be necessary for this particular suggestion to be given further consideration.

He thought that the Board he had suggested should be able to intervene at any stage, because this would have the merit of probably being able to avoid controversy. In the country he thought there were numbers of reasonable people and that the Federal Government would be prepared to trade the scheme he had suggested for Dominion status. Having further thoughts about the appointments to the Board, he thought it might be wise if these were made by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council rather than by the United Kingdom and other Governments. He tended to distrust the idea of using the local judiciary.

In response to a question, Mr. Foster said that, while the main function of the Board would be to act as a watchdog, it could perform other functions while not engaged in its primary duties.

Memorandum

MISS B. TREGOLD

The reason why I am presenting this short Memorandum is because as an Anglican missionary, I have worked with and lived amongst urban Africans for some time, and so am bound to have come into contact with much that touches the daily lives of the people.

Much is said of the fears that the Africans of the Northern Territories have for the alleged harsh administration of the Southern Rhodesian Native Affairs Department. It may be that the Commission has had evidence from Southern Rhodesian Africans on the same point.

It must be remembered that the non-indigenous African contact with the Department is usually because of registration or employment or relations with employers, whether in the towns or on mines or farms in the country. He seldom sees the Native Department officials at their best, i.e. in their Districts when they are dealing with men living on their own farms in Reserve homes. Therefore, there is usually a certain amount of stress or tension, either through vast numbers, or the pressure of white opinion in a local area, or the ordinary friction of employer/employee disagreements.

It cannot be denied that there are still too many officials of the Native Department who are out of sympathy and out of touch with the changing situation, and who refuse to acknowledge the need for an ordinary relationship between a responsible Government official and the citizens in his care. It cannot be said that there is brutal physical treatment, but a harshness, officialdom and lack of understanding.

It must be remembered that many of these men are recruited for this very important branch of the Service after leaving school and receive no training as exists for every other similar Service in the Commonwealth. They are expected to learn the intricacies of administration etc. as they work at clerks, and pass examinations through private study. All of this is bound to have a narrowing effect on the policy of the Department and to have a frustrating and disheartening effect on the many men of high quality who enter it. The specialist branches of the Native Department, Education, Agriculture, Engineering, etc., most of whose members have had to receive some further post school training or professional qualification, show a marked difference in their relationship with the people and very fine evidences of co-operation.

A factor that has added to the difficulties and very much to the unhappy reputation of the Department is that the Government not realising the enormous expansion that was about to take place in this country handed a considerable amount of its powers to the Local Authorities and in some cases, particularly in the Federal Capital, this has meant a considerable slowing up of much of the Government's effort to give opportunities and better conditions to the African people and to break down official racial barriers. Naturally to the ordinary African, it is all the Government.

These unfortunate aspects of our country's administration are not permanent and are disliked by great numbers of Southern Rhodesians. They in no way represent the general policy of the Government, but they loom large in the minds of the other Territories, because they are points of greatest contact. The many rapid changes taking place throughout the country are bound to be reflected throughout the Departments of the Government and while one must accept that some of the men in the Native Affairs Department are slow to accept African advancement, it is the hard and self sacrificing work of this Department that has been one of the great contributions to the stability of our country.

The last few years have shown that there are sufficient men and women of all races here with real goodwill and desire to build this country together. Legend and prejudice die hard. Our greatest work must be to win the confidence of the Federation as a whole.

Harare Township, Salisbury

29th January 1960

Oral Evidence

MISS B. TREGOLD

In amplification of her memorandum Miss Tregold said that the Native Affairs Department had fallen behind the times in their handling of the affairs of the African people of Southern Rhodesia. An example of this was that the Department always took the advice of Chiefs in the adoption of children. The fact that adoption cut across certain aspects of tribal law meant that the Chiefs advised against adoption and their advice was taken by the Department. The Chiefs were well aware of the needs of the rural people, but matters of this sort, affecting the lives of urbanised Africans, were outside their scope.

It was vitally important that the Native Affairs Department should attract better men to its service and make sure that they were better trained. She did not wish to make any reflection on their devotion to duty of members of the Department, who were often overworked and had too much responsibility. Unfortunately, they were all recruited in the first instance as junior clerks in crowded offices. Before they could achieve promotion, they had to learn a language and pass law exams, all within the day-to-day pressure of departmental work. This system inevitably led to inefficiency and a lack of sympathy with the people they were administering.

In answer to questions, Miss Tregold made the following further points:—

- (a) There were no Africans in responsible positions in the Native Affairs Department as there were in corresponding positions in the Northern Territories. It followed that Europeans in the Department grew up with the tradition of being Kings in their own domains.
- (b) The impression given in some quarters that the Department was staffed by bullying or arrogant people was not fair. Much of this attitude was the result of overwork and the consequent lack of time to consider cases as sympathetically as was needed.
- (c) Local Authorities, on which Africans were represented only in an advisory capacity, had great powers over the people in urban African townships. She personally lived in an African township; the position whereby the Municipalities were landlords with powers over the domestic affairs of their tenants was unsatisfactory.

- (d) The powers of the Native Affairs Department should be broken down so that matters affecting the lives of Africans were dealt with by the same departments as those which dealt with European affairs. Matters such as social security should not have to be dealt with through Native Commissioners, particularly in the urban areas. These criticisms did not apply with equal force to Africans living under Native law and tribal conditions.
- (e) The fact that matters affecting the daily lives of the people in urban areas were administered entirely by the Native Affairs Department had some very unfortunate results. For example, the divorce of Christian marriages could be carried out under Southern Rhodesian law in exactly the same way as divorce in respect of a lobola or polygamous marriage. So long as the Native Affairs Department retained responsibility for such an enormous range of matters, there was little incentive to bring the law more into line with modern practice.

Memorandum

G. R. PALMER

Gordon Robert Palmer will state

That I am an Attorney by profession who gave up the practise of the Law in order to go farming.

That I have lived in Southern Rhodesia since 1935.

That I left the Union of South Africa, where I was born because I did not like the Nationalist Government in that Country.

That I opposed Federation as I could not see how three territories with such divergent interests could possibly work together.

That I consider that as the United Kingdom, France and Germany cannot even work in a common customs union much less federate to form a Federated States of Europe where all the peoples are on roughly the same plane of civilisation, it is even less possible for the Federation to work.

That Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom is, and was, wrong in endeavouring to impose this unworkable constitution on the peoples of this Country while retaining the say in the territories of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

That the policy of Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom in acceding to African Nationalism at this juncture is wrong and will have disastrous results not only in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland but also in Southern Rhodesia.

That I base my arguments for the statement contained in the last preceding paragraph upon the following grounds:—

1. That during the last 10 years I have employed over 400 different natives.
2. That I realise that the educated native does not usually seek employment on farms, but that the type I employ is certainly representative of the majority of the Native population of the three territories at present.
3. That of the 400 or more that I have employed not one could enforce discipline.
4. That the natives at present have no control over even their own children and do not ever apply any discipline to their children.
5. That the reason why they are unable to apply discipline is the fact that they fear that they will be bewitched by discontented subordinates.
6. That until the Native has acquired a sufficiently high standard of civilisation to be free of the fear of witchcraft he will not be able to accept or dispense discipline.
7. That a democratic state requires discipline and self-discipline to enable it to work properly.
8. That until a reasonable stage of civilisation and consequently discipline is achieved by the Native a democratic form of Government with the Native participating therein is not possible.
9. That in 10 years experience of working with natives I have found one, and only one, that could be relied upon to do the work allotted to him to the best of his ability, and who takes a pride in his work. He is the only one of all I have employed that can be left unsupervised for long periods without disastrous results.
10. That I contend that if only .25% of the vast majority can be relied upon to work properly, without supervision, and that none can instil discipline, it is fallacious to expect democracy to work.

11. That in Ghana where the contact with civilisation has extended over 300 years even the Commissioners of this Commission cannot contend that there is true democracy, so how can one expect it to work in a land where the contact with civilisation has been less than 100 years?

That of the European population of Southern Rhodesia at least 40% are people born in Africa, either in Southern Rhodesia or in the Union of South Africa.

That the majority of the Europeans in this Colony are loyal British subjects who chose to come to this Country because they believed that it had a great future as a Self-Governing Colony.

That the Federation, has in fact, diminished the powers of self-government in Southern Rhodesia and if the United Kingdom Government insists on the continuance of Federation while retaining the absolute power to alter the constitutions of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, the future for Europeans within the Federation is doomed.

That at the time the peoples of this Country were urged to Federate the leaders of the pro-federation party and the British Government implied, that there would be no major changes in the government or constitutions of the two Northern territories, until the Federal Constitution was re-considered this year.

That people believing this to be true voted for Federation.

That this belief was unfounded is only too true.

That if the electorate were permitted to vote as to whether Southern Rhodesia should stay within the Federation it would now vote against Federation with an overwhelming majority.

That five years ago the majority of the Europeans of this Country would have voted overwhelmingly against any association with the Union of South Africa.

That the majority would today welcome such an association because they have seen that the United Kingdom Government is quite prepared to treat the European in Africa as expendable in order to keep the African market "sweet".

That such cynicism on the part of the United Kingdom Government will have the effect of turning the Europeans into Nationalists and the next step from there would be a link up with the Nationalist Government of the Union of South Africa.

That if the United Kingdom Government is set on giving every help to African Nationalism as it appears to be, the best way to achieve this would be to create an enormous fund and purchase the assets of those Europeans who do not wish to be dominated by the African, and so obtain their peaceful retirement from the political scene.

That in conclusion I would point out that if the United Kingdom Government thinks that by assisting or acceding to African Nationalism they will earn the gratitude of the African I should like to stress that in no African language within the Federation as far as I know are there the equivalent words for "Thank You" or "Gratitude". If the United Kingdom Government thinks that in gratitude for "Freedom" the African markets will remain open to British goods they will find their mistake when Africa is flooded with Japanese and Indian goods at prices with which the British Manufacturer cannot compete.

Marandellas

1st March 1960

Oral Evidence

G. R. PALMER

Mr. Palmer said that under Federation the powers of the Government of Southern Rhodesia were continually diminishing. As more African voters came on the Roll, this power would diminish still further. At the same time Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland had more say in the affairs of people living in Southern Rhodesia than they had before Federation.

There had been a change of feeling from three years ago. When he had written his memorandum on 1st March, the majority of people at Marandellas would have liked to go it alone, if necessary in close association with the Union of South Africa. Recent events in the Union had shaken this opinion to some extent, but it probably remained the feeling of a great many people.

In reply to questions, he said that he thought that there was much to be said for some African participation in the Government of Southern Rhodesia, provided that the qualifications for the voters' roll remained fairly high and Africans came on only as they qualified. At the present time, the qualifications for the vote in Southern Rhodesia were too diverse; he thought that they should be simplified by acquiring a fairly high educational standard combined with some property qualification or service to the state. To give Africans complete power immediately would be the end of Southern Rhodesia.

Memorandum

A. M. CLOSE

The World Background

The rate of exhaustion of natural resources is a matter of vital concern. If food supply fails to keep pace with population, civilization will collapse in a fierce fight for food to decide which people will survive and which will die. Today the world population is about 2,600 million people with an annual increase of over 35 million. Sir Charles Darwin was reported to have stated (1st May 1958) that the present rate of increase averaged 90,000 babies daily. The birth rate depends on the number of women between the ages of 15 and 45.

The whole world is at present in a phase of rapid industrial development with an accelerating rate of consumption of non-replaceable fuels and other mineral products. The United States of America has a third of the world's known resources of petroleum (omitting the recent discovery of oil in the Sahara), but this will take place in about 40 years, and in the Middle East in about 100 years. The biggest deposits of uranium are found in the Congo and Canada but no rich deposit will remain after about 30 years. Copper is being rapidly exhausted. Lead will last about 70 years, and zinc and tin about the same. The present sulphur output will end in about 25 years. In the United States, ore reserves with 50 per cent of iron will be exhausted in about 15 years and reserves of above 35 per cent in another 35 years. After that lower grade ores at greatly increased cost will need to be used. In the United States the original virgin forests covered 40 per cent of the land, but today only 7 per cent. About a third of the world's primeval forests have been destroyed. About a third of the original 9 inches of top-soil has been washed away by the rain or blown away by wind.

The world's resources are being exploited with ever increasing diligence. Industrial populations must be kept going with raw materials. One of these consists of fertilizers, some of which is produced by power and some derived from underground. As population increases the world's soil and fertility will disappear, first on sloping land, and world-wide starvation will set in. As the world's resources become used up so will industrial populations be thrown out of employment. When there is no more oil fuel there will cease to be motor transport on our roads and on our farms. There is today an enormous wastage of fuel in the world's cities in advertising signs and unnecessary lighting. There will be little power in countries which have not developed to the full all possible hydro-electric schemes, eked out by tidal, wind, and radiation power. Without raw materials and without power the outlook for future generations is bleak. The larger centres of population will largely become uninhabitable, and the discharge of sewage into rivers or the sea will be and is a crime against humanity.

A direct result of Christian humanitarianism is an expanding population. In the past a large proportion of babies died. The unfit failed to survive—Natural Selection. Now modern science has been brought into play, and every effort is employed to enable the unfit to survive and breed. If the number of women of child-bearing age is doubled one must expect the number of babies produced annually also to be doubled. That is simple arithmetic. Most countries are increasing their populations by 2 or 3 per cent annually.

One result of expanding populations can readily be visualized. Food exporting countries such as Argentina and Canada are filling up with population and in the course of a generation or two will no longer have surplus food to export, the whole produce being required for home consumption. In previous decades the export of food was paid for by the import of manufactured goods, but when full industrialization has been set up, imports of manufactured goods will no longer be required. That means a reduction of overseas trade, and one of the first countries to feel the pinch will be Great Britain. Lack of employment and lack of food is likely to cause the country to dissolve in civil war, unless mass emigration is resorted to in time.

A factor common to all humanity is the Intelligence Quotient. Each individual is born with a certain quotient which is practically constant throughout life. It is uninfluenced by environment or by training. It is an hereditary factor, and one effect of Natural Selection was to eliminate those born with a low quotient. Now they are preserved to breed. The average I.Q. of a population is taken as 100 and most people range about this figure. The I.Q. of a genius will run as high as 150 or over, whilst at the opposite extreme an imbecile will have an I.Q. of 50 or less. Humanity can be divided into two classes—the mentally deficient and the mentally intelligent—the former of which should never be given the power of the vote. Statistics have proved that the average I.Q. of the British and American populations is deteriorating by two or more points per generation. This is partly due to the heavy taxation to which the more intelligent are subjected and to the great expense involved in bringing up their children. They cannot afford to have big families and are dying off in consequence. Those who are mentally deficient, however, hungry, indifferent, and ignorant, wander about begetting themselves. So the proportion of intelligence to deficiency is gradually widening; a ratio of 1 to 10 may become 1 to 30 in a generation and 1 to a 100 in a century, so that in the course of time there will be insufficient people of high intelligence capable of running a country and its industries.

That is the background against which the future of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland should be studied.

The primary object of any government is to tax the population of a country and to expand the revenue so obtained. One of the expenses is self-remuneration. All over the world there are men who seek wealth and power for their own selves by becoming elected to parliament, even if they are quite unfitted intellectually, and many succeed by getting a majority of ignorant voters to vote them into power, particularly by starting some political party for fomenting discord. We thus have a system of political parties under leaders who set the tone. One party with a majority of seats in parliament, though with an occasional minority of total votes, attempts to force legislation for its own benefit on the country. A leader may possibly be of great benefit to a country, but he can equally be a disaster, and in some cases both.

The practice in the past has been to divide a country into territorial districts, some urban and some rural, and the modern slogan is "One Man, One Vote". This commonly results in a very unequal franchise. A rural constituency with a small and largely ignorant electorate will send a Representative (not of their choosing) to parliament, whilst an urban constituency with a large and more intelligent electorate will also only send one. If two races inhabit a country and one is mostly rural and the other is mostly urban, then the proportionate representation is likely to be most unfair. Power is likely to reside with a minority party with a minority of wisdom but which has gained a majority of seats. Such a party is likely to pass laws which will help to entrench itself in power. Recruiting for the civil service and the police will tend to be restricted to those who profess to support the political party in power, and those who don't can say goodbye to prospects of promotion.

Under such a system the far-sighted candidate is likely to be defeated by the near-sighted one, the effective doer by the eloquent talker, and the reluctant expert by the ambitious agitator. Our wisest have no chance under it. The party leader with the majority of seats dishes out lucrative appointments to his own followers, not to the most suitable elected persons available, as a reward for their support. Members appointed by higher authority do not represent anyone. Voting on legislation is not performed according to a members knowledge and conscience, but in order to maintain a particular political party in power (or in order to try and unseat it). A political party system of government is a sham, and it should be abolished in favour of something better. That something is the Guild System.

Instead of dividing up a country into territorial constituencies, let the whole population be divided up into Guilds. There would be a Church Guild, an Education Guild, a Farmer's Guild, a Police Guild, a Railway Guild, a Road Guild, a Servant's Guild, a Trader's Guild, etc., etc. A new country could start with some twenty or thirty Guilds, the number expanding with growth till there may be two or three hundred. It should be noticed that every man, woman and child would be represented in parliament by someone in charge of his interests.

A candidate for parliament should be highly intelligent and well educated, he should be an expert in his calling, and he should be a person of experience. He should be completely independent of political parties and should enjoy sound health, and his character should be above suspicion. He should therefore not be less than 40 years of age, and not much over 60 when his mental and physical powers are on the down grade and he is keeping a younger and more up to date person out of a job. Any person considered suitable to stand for parliament should be subjected to searching tests by a responsible examining body, and if he (or she) successfully passes the tests his name should be included on a panel. Such will be the best men that a country can produce to serve as possible rulers, and it will be a distinction for anyone to qualify and have his name put on a panel. It is suggested that in order to qualify, a candidate must have an Intelligence Quotient of not less than 120. An elected member would to all intents and purposes be a responsible Minister of the Guild he represents. Whether there should be a cabinet or not should be left to evolution.

A voter should have a certain modicum of intelligence in order to qualify for the vote. It is obvious that an imbecile should not have the vote and that it is most unwise to grant the vote to anyone who is mentally deficient. It is suggested that an I.Q. 92 should be the lowest limit prescribed to qualify as a voter. A voter should also have a certain amount of experience of life as an adult, and no longer have a tendency to become a hot-headed young hooligan. It is therefore suggested that an age limit of 30 should be set to qualify as a voter. There is not the same necessity to impose an upper age limit as so few would be affected. There should be no differentiation between one class and another, no first-class citizens and second-class citizens. Either a citizen is old enough and intelligent enough to exercise the vote, or he is not. Obviously the whole population would need to be tested for the Intelligence Quotient, and there would have to be qualified examiners in permanent employment for the purpose. Each Guild would put up a certain number of candidates, and the qualified voters of each Guild would elect one to represent the Guild in parliament. Each Guild would have a head office in the capital and branch offices in the country, which would keep their member fed with up to date statistics, and act as employment bureaus for their members. Should an elected member cease to give satisfaction to his Guild, then a test poll should determine whether he should be replaced or kept on. That is true democracy—the right of the electors to remove their representative if ever the occasion arises.

A change to the Guild System can only take place if it has the goodwill of an existing political party parliament. It will involve the political eclipse of several of its members, and if self-interest is the uppermost of their feelings they will vote against a change. But if national interest is dominant in their minds, then the parliament has to decide the constitution of its Guild successor, what Guilds there should be formed to start with and so forth. Future developments and expansion should be left to the Guild parliament. The Guild parliament will be a "best man" parliament, all experts, all independents, so that there will be no need of a second revising chamber. Each Guild would submit an annual report of its functioning, making for national efficiency.

One of the future duties of a Guild Parliament will be to adopt measures to control the birth rate, firstly, to obviate the reproduction of the hereditarily unfit, secondly, to make illegal the marriage of young people so that the length of a generation shall be increased, and thirdly, to prevent overpopulation. A Guild parliament would probably attain these objects by requiring every new marriage certificate to state the number of living adults that may be reproduced, depending largely on the I.Q.'s of the respective parties, an excess being followed by sterilization. Generally speaking, a million women should only have a million daughters in order to keep a population stationary.

One of the changes that a Guild parliament will have to face is that of capitalist finance which cannot last much longer. Any rise in income is bound to lead to a rise in the cost of goods and services based on those incomes. The value of money is therefore always depreciating. The day will come when the pound will only be worth an A.D. 1900 penny. As population expands and mechanization grows, unemployment will become a permanent nightmare. There will be little overseas trading when the world's resources become exhausted. Heavy taxation of the employed in order to keep the unemployed alive is not a heartening prospect. A change will have to be faced. The upper strata of highly intelligent people will avoid reproducing themselves and will die out, leaving a less intelligent proletariat to face the music.

The Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland must choose between two things; one is the adoption of the Guild system and slow race improvement through the decrease of the unfit and the increase of the well-born. The other is to perpetuate political party politics and to expire in Armageddon. For, unless the numbers of the people are adapted to the capacity of the soil to feed them, then famine, pestilence and war will grind on their ruthless way.

Oral Evidence

A. M. CLOSE

Mr. Close, who had submitted a memorandum, confirmed that his real aim was to have a system of elections for Parliament through occupational guilds, and in reply to questions made the following points:—

(1) In considering who was to decide on the original composition of the guilds he thought that the existing Parliament would have to debate the system and decide what guilds would have to be started. Then at the next Parliamentary election the representatives of all the guilds would debate their own composition.

(2) Each guild would have equal representation at first, but if a guild became too big it could be sub-divided. The guilds themselves and the Parliament would have to agree on the nature of the sub-division. Taking as an example the farmers' guild, all farmers in the whole Federation from Tanganyika to the Limpopo would vote for one representative or more if their guild had been sub-divided.

(3) Political parties should be abolished altogether. They were the cause of all the mischief in the world, and if they were abolished there would be no international troubles.

(4) In the guilds there would be no vote on any policy, but solely on personalities. There would be scores of local guild branches which would each put up a member for election to Parliament. They would thus, for example, vote for a representative of the farmers who would be chosen from among ten to twenty candidates. The vote would not be on a policy, but would largely depend on the experience of the candidates. There would be no election campaign. Voting would all be postal. Lists of candidates would be sent out with a photograph and a statement of the experience of the candidate. Thus all farmers between Tanganyika and the Limpopo would vote for a farmer, and so on.

(5) He confirmed that for the exercise of the vote the minimum I.Q. of 92 would be required. Also because young people were apt to be young hooligans the age limit for the vote should be 30; by that age a person would be able to think sensibly. Everyone would have to be tested for their I.Q., and he understood that the examination would take about one hour for each person. He considered that under this system Africans would have an equal chance of being elected.

(6) The Government would have to appoint the expert examiners on the I.Q. He realised that the Government was appointed by the members of Parliament, the latter by the guild members, and thus there was a "chicken and egg" difficulty.

(7) Africans would be in the same guilds with Europeans and there would be no colour bar. Africans in the Reserves would all be in the farmers' guild. There should be no distinction between natives and whites.

Addendum to Oral Evidence

A. M. CLOSE

I wish to thank you for helping me to give evidence to your Group yesterday, but I feel that I did not prove to be a particularly satisfactory witness owing to my increasing deafness and to a hearing aid to which I am not yet accustomed. I am therefore inditing this letter to provide you with a little more information.

I was educated at Weymouth College (classical) and from 1900 to 1903 at the Royal Indian Engineering College, Cooper's Hill. I was 22nd on the entrance list passing in and 9th on the list in my year passing out, although the youngest student in my year. My drawing work—bridge and survey—were put on exhibition. This seems to indicate that I was educated and had a certain modicum of intelligence. (Intelligence and Aptitude Tests were unknown in those days).

I was posted to the P.W.D. in India and on arriving at Bombay fell foul of the Customs. It was the first time that I learnt that there was such a thing as a Customs and Excise Organization. Several months later I made my first attempt at taking levels and found that I did not know how to work out the calculations. A few years later I used a theodolite for the first time in making a triangulation in the High Himalaya and thought its adjustment was out and I uncorrected it. It was not till later that I became an expert in the use of surveying instruments. At the beginning of 1915 I had difficulty in crossing from Chile to Argentina and boarding a steamer for England in order to join the British Army because I had started without a passport. It was the first time I had heard of such a thing. A little knowledge is a dangerous thing.

I relate this as an illustration that young persons who have left school and undergraduates at universities are really only superficially educated, a large part of whose learning is quickly forgotten, and whose emotions are subject to periodic outbursts when in mobs. Witness crowding into a telephone box, or pushing a bed along a road, or a pram round Cecil Square. It is only after a number of years and young adults have gained some experience and responsibility that they become fit to exercise the vote. If I had ever had a vote I would have automatically voted Conservative because that is what my people would do, not because I knew anything about politics.

Fixing 21 as the voting age, or lowering it to 18 as in the Union, are simply devices by political parties calculating thereby to gain more votes to help maintain themselves in power, and is one of the factors that leads to political disturbances and to second-rate candidates being elected to parliament. If 30 is fixed as the voting age, when most adults are married and settled and have gained some experience and have lost the tendency of the young to hooliganism, then there would be a distinct betterment in election results.

As regards elections by senior adults I would like to bring to your notice what Bernard Shaw had to say on the subject. "Conceive the perplexities of Mr. Everyman at a general election. I have just been convinced by the Labour candidate that if the mines are nationalized I shall be able to buy my coal for what I am now paying. But he has promised Smith next door that he will vote for revision of the Prayer Book; and I could not stand that—flat atheism I call it. The Conservative candidate says he will die in the last ditch in defence of the Prayer Book; but he owns half the coalmines in D. rham and won't hear of cheapening coal; and they tell me he is an Anglo-Catholic which is no better to my mind than Popery, for I, thank God, am a staunch Protestant. I agree to all the Liberal candidate says about liberty and getting rid of all these snooping inspectors coming and interfering in my business with their regulations and all that, but the man is a republican and has the cheek to say so; and I am for King and Country. The Independent seems to me the most likeable of the lot, but he wants to have a negotiated peace and make us all the slaves of Hitler. Besides he hasn't a dog's chance against the Party man, and I don't like having my vote wasted. There was a Communist up last time, and he forfeited his deposit. Robinson voted for him, and I tell you he did look a fool. Fortunately, this is a free country, and I need not vote unless I like. I just won't vote at all. At the club each chap will think I have voted for his pet candidate. Anyhow this election business is all rot."

I divide humanity into three classes—the few with a high Intelligence Quotient, the great majority with medium I.Q.s, and the remainder with deficient intelligence. I also divide humanity into two classes—those who have reached the age of 30 and have acquired some experience of the world, and those who have not. The possession of property, or an income, or schooling do not of themselves fit an individual to become a voter or a candidate for parliament. The essentials needed are Intelligence, Experience, and Character. A highly intelligent and experienced adult can be penniless and propertyless, and a moron can have everything. Hence a person is either old enough and intelligent enough to vote, or he is not.

The whole population needs therefore to be measured, for without measurement we cannot gauge who the competent people are. Only persons who have passed searching tests should be eligible for election to parliament. A high I.Q. (120 or over), a lower age limit of 40 (Tom Mboya is 29), and a higher age limit of 60 or so should be imposed. The higher age limit is needed because however able and well-liked a leader may be, he is keeping younger and more up to date others from rising who therefore tend to become rebels. If all people tended to become centenarians, and heirs did not inherit properties till they were in their seventies, I think there would be a good deal of dissatisfaction prevalent.

Bernard Shaw also wrote, "All men are corrupted by irresponsible power. Sometimes it produces horrible excesses of cruelty and bigotry" and "When democracy began with parliaments we guarded them with a property qualification which secured at least some elementary education for our legislators; but they abused their power so disastrously in their class interests that it was discarded in favour of no qualification at all," and "Our rulers are mostly elected by people who have never seen them and know nothing intimate about them, voting therefore according to Party labels, religious creeds, and social prejudices under pressure of more or less vigorous propaganda and canvassing." Each Guild would elect one of its best representatives and have the power of replacing him if there should arise any dissatisfaction. Since all members would be Independents there would be no vituperation and the population would not be divided against itself. It would be unnecessary to create a Senate and unnecessary to have four parliaments. If any Guild became too big and unwieldy, Parliament would split it into two as seemed best. Thus, mining could be split into coal and other types; farming could be split into European and native, or territorially.

I shall end up with a quotation from G. H. Curle. "But for the almost continuous jibes and retorts of journalists, the nations of the world would hardly ever realize that they hated each other, and nearly all the unpleasant incidents arising from them would soon sink into oblivion. We shall only abolish war when we have a Press which need not earn big dividends."

Memorandum

BRITISH MEDICAL ASSOCIATION—(Mashonaland Branch)

1. Identification. We are representative of the Mashonaland Branch of the Medical Association of Southern Rhodesia (British Medical Association). This is a non-political organization representing virtually the whole Medical profession in a vast area which includes Salisbury, Kariba, Sinoia, Gatooma, Marandellas and all intervening smaller centres. Our Association is open to all registered medical practitioners, irrespective of race or assignment; whether European or African; whether private practitioner or Government employee. We number two hundred and are composed of those born here, those whose ancestors came here and recent immigrants, and we and our children have our homes here and intend to stay, because we have so selected this part of the world.

2. Federation. The growth and economic advantages of Federation have meant that a fuller medical service has become possible. Economic stability has meant Medical Aid Societies acting as insurance against ill health, at the same time safeguarding the doctor/patient relationship.

Federation has attracted Specialists in every field, including Brain, Plastic and Thoracic Surgeons, and men and women of high professional standard in both the General Practitioner and Specialist fields. The Medical Reputation of the Federation is assured. Cases for specialist treatment come to the larger centres of the Federation from surrounding countries.

Should there arise a state of affairs which resulted in the withdrawal of the stiffening influence of devoted European staff from African Health Services, that withdrawal could result only in the disintegration of the services on the rocks of self-interest and corruption.

3. General. We need more doctors, especially for medical work, amongst the ninety-six per cent of the population, who are Africans. Much of this could eventually be done by Africans. It would appear, however, that one generation cannot be sufficient to instil the traditions and integrity usually associated with the Profession. Training must continue, though at present there are only about half a dozen fully trained African doctors in the Federation. We regret that, in spite of an open invitation and a greatly reduced subscription for House Officers, no African doctor has applied to join our Branch of the Association.

The attitude of Africans to "White Man's Medicine" has changed from that of suspicion to an enormous demand. The new forms are slowly accepted, both medically and culturally, and, when accepted, they become part of the African's life. African Hospitals deal with overwhelming numbers, and urban Africans are now demanding Private Practitioner treatment, while we observe that Africans, Indians and members of the Coloured community are to be seen in the consulting rooms of all Practitioners, demonstrating the non-discriminatory nature of medical practice.

We observe that the bulk of the work which has been done for the indigenous population has been carried out by such members of the white population as Government Medical Officers, Missionaries, etc., who have been and are prepared to sacrifice their own interests and financial gain for the good of the whole, devoting their lives to the service of the African. We recognize that the few African doctors—and, for that matter, Africans in the Professions—are the natural mouthpiece for the ambitions of their own people, but we feel that they should not, on that account neglect the professional duties for which they have been specifically trained. Until they achieve maturity in these professions, they are not ready for political leadership.

Europeans: We observe increased anxiety, with its consequent ill effects on health, due to uncertainty as to the future. We urge that that uncertainty cease with all speed.

4. Health:

- (a) Preventive Medicine: Must remain Federal. There are obvious advantages in regional control.
- (b) Curative Medicine: There is a difference of opinion amongst members of the Profession as to whether Curative Medicine should be a Federal or a Territorial responsibility, but the weight of opinion is that the effective control of Curative Medicine should be within each Territory. We would urge that the financing and staffing of this service be placed territorially and locally in correct perspective.

We would stress the necessity for building up comprehensive medical services in the larger centres. Therefore, the Department of Health should give special consideration to the needs, both financial and in regard to hospital facilities, of such centres.

Since the inception of Federation, the two principal medical centres, and particularly Salisbury, have been the most neglected in these respects, despite the fact that they are the specialist centres for the Federation. Large hospitals have been built in other areas and have apparently so drained the Treasury that the principal medical centres, particularly Salisbury, have suffered.

The Salisbury Central Hospital is almost as it was in 1938, despite repeated promises of the erection of a new Hospital; the number of general beds has increased by 40, yet the European population of Salisbury has risen from 10,000 to 85,000 in that time, and from 46,000 to 85,000 since Federation. At the same time this Hospital, having increasingly become the principal Specialist Hospital for the Federation, accommodates large numbers of patients from all areas of the Federation as well as from all neighbouring countries.

Likewise, the African Hospital is grossly understaffed medically, despite repeated offers of assistance made by local specialists and practitioners. These offers have been either ignored or refused, with the result that the African Hospital is grossly understaffed.

The effect of Federation upon the Government Nursing and Government Medical Services has been to reduce recruiting, largely due to the widespread transfer of personnel. Further, the transfer of staff, particularly in the Nursing Service, to other areas of the Federation has deprived the larger centres of much trained staff, with the result that the Nursing Service has lagged far behind the advances made in Specialist fields by the coming to the Federation of Medical men and women of considerable calibre.

Failure to utilize, in African Hospitals, the services of General Practitioners and Specialists, other than the few employed in full-time Government service, has retarded the medical service rendered to the African.

The central Hospitals play a part in the professional or further professional training of Doctors and Nurses, supplying most of the staff to the Hospitals throughout the Federation, and, rather than their being regarded as the Cinderellas of the Service, should be financed and staffed in measure commensurate with their functions. In this respect the Federal Health service has proved inadequate.

The remedy, as we see it, is to decentralise Curative Medicine by the institution of Regional Hospital Boards with executive powers, thus placing the management of Curative Services territorially and locally in representative hands and in the correct perspective. This we would urge if the Curative services are to be of high standard and if local requirements as regards Hospital accommodation and adequate medical services to all races are to be met.

In submitting this evidence we would stress that we are a non-political body which realises, however, that matters affecting the daily lives of the people should be, as far as possible, under territorial or regional control and that our interest is in rendering good medical services to all sections of the community. To attain this, decentralization is essential.

Oral Evidence

THE BRITISH MEDICAL ASSOCIATION—(Mashonaland Branch)—Represented by: Miss G. E. Keith, Dr. Fynn, Mr. Robinson.

Miss Keith said that the British Medical Association Branch which she represented did not advocate the dissolution of Federation; but they thought that the definition of health as a function of Government needed to be redefined. Whether or not primary responsibility for health went back to the Territorial Governments, it was desirable that preventive medicine should be dealt with on the widest possible basis. They were concerned however, at the present organisation of the Health Department. There must be greater decentralisation of control, whether this was done by passing back the curative services to the Territorial Governments or by establishing regional boards under the control of a central Federal Department of Health. The final answer depended on a number of considerations, including the form of Government which emerged in the two Northern Territories. It was difficult to assess the effect of Africanisation in terms of the Health Service.

Since Federation there had in fact been a growth in the Health Services in the Northern Territories at the expense of Southern Rhodesia. If it had not been for Federation, more hospitals would have been built in Southern Rhodesia which had in practice been built in the Northern Territories.

Summing up, Miss Keith said that she felt that the Health Service needed local control by people whose interests were local.

Dr. Fynn said that he had been much perturbed by paragraph 33 of the Morton Commission Report* which turned down the suggestion that regional control should be applied. The Salisbury General Hospital was 20 years out of date, in spite of the fact that it was the centre of specialist services for all races. Salisbury had suffered since Federation because of commitments elsewhere; the emergent African, in particular, had been neglected in the provision of improved services in the rural districts.

At the present stage in the development of the medical services in the Federation, the sudden withdrawal of European help would be disastrous. At present there were only four African doctors in practice in the Territory. He personally had until June 1959 been a member of the Southern Rhodesia medical service seconded to the Federal Health Service. The Federal Service presented personal problems to a number of doctors in so much as most of the promotion existed in the Northern Territories. Many Southern Rhodesian doctors had left the service rather than transfer to Northern Rhodesia or Nyasaland. Before 1953, the Southern Rhodesia Medical Service had had a good response from advertisements in the United Kingdom. The Federal Service still had a good response to advertisements, but many applicants asked for a guarantee that they would serve in Southern Rhodesia. Any change in conditions of service which compelled large numbers of doctors to resign would create a most dangerous and difficult situation.

The witness made the following further points in answer to questions:—

- (a) In order to meet the current shortage of specialists in Government hospitals, particularly African hospitals, certain specialists in private practice had recently been appointed to serve on a sessional basis. Similarly, general practitioners had been appointed to serve as clinical assistants in out-patient departments. Unfortunately, services of this kind on a part time basis were not necessarily adequate for meeting requirements.
- (b) There would be great advantage in setting up regional hospital boards as in the United Kingdom. Large areas could be covered in this way—e.g. Mashonaland, the Copperbelt etc. As a start, a Mashonaland board should be set up in Salisbury. Under such a system, junior appointments could be made by the management committees themselves, leaving only the senior appointments to be made by the central health authority.
- (c) In the interests of medicine, it would probably be preferable to have regional control under a central Federal service than disintegration into independent Territorial services. This applied particularly to preventive medicine which included inter-Territorial and inter-national health control with particular reference to bilharzia, malaria, yellow fever, etc.
- (d) The Mashonaland Branch accepted and advocated partnership in all fields and were doing all they could to assist in the training of African doctors, nurses and orderlies.
- (e) The British Medical Association had advocated the establishment of a large multi-racial hospital in Salisbury which could eventually become a teaching hospital associated with the University College. Unfortunately, work had now been started on an enormous new hospital scheme which was not planned to be multi-racial. This seemed to be contrary both to good sense and to the provision of the Preamble to the Constitution.

Memorandum

THE CHAMBER OF MINES OF RHODESIA. (This organisation applies to Southern Rhodesia only)

1. In the opinion of the Chamber of Mines of Rhodesia, a body representative of one of the major industries in Southern Rhodesia, the establishment of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland in 1953 has given considerable impetus to the industrial and economic development of the three territories. There are numerous indications of the benefits all three Territories have derived from the Federal concept. The broadening of the economic structure on to a Federal basis has resulted in the development of the Kariba project and the expansion of transportation and other services on an inter-Territorial basis rather than a purely parochial basis. It is the considered opinion of the Chamber that the future of the Federation can only be assured by continued industrial and economic development. This development which will result in an increase in employment and an improvement in standards of living for all races, can only be assured if confidence in the future of the Federation is established.

*Report of the Commission of Inquiry into the Health and Medical Services of the Federation, 1959 (ref: C.Fed 139).

2. The need for an expanding economy is probably greater in African countries than in European ones, due to the high rate of increase in the African population which prior to industrialisation existed on a rural subsistence economy. The continuance of a subsistence economy, particularly in Southern Rhodesia, is not a practicable proposition and there has been a very marked migration of the population from the rural to the urban and industrial areas. Unless adequate avenues of employment and advancement in the various fields are provided by an expanding industrial economy, the Federation will be unable to feed, house, and provide for the increasing population.

3. The mining industry in Southern Rhodesia has a genuine sense of its responsibility towards the thousands of Africans which it employs; this aspect can be clearly demonstrated by the enlightened and progressive attitude of employers in their endeavours to advance Africans into more responsible avenues of employment and, further, by its interest in improving the general conditions of living.

4. The two portfolios with which the Chamber is most closely connected are those covering Mining and Labour which, under the present arrangements, are the responsibility of the Territorial Governments. Certainly for the time being, the Chamber recommends that these portfolios should continue to be Territorial responsibilities chiefly due to the varying conditions appertaining in the three Territories.

5. The structure of the mining industry of Southern Rhodesia is very different from that in Northern Rhodesia while to all intents and purposes there is no mining industry in Nyasaland. Mining activity in Southern Rhodesia varies from small owner-operated mines to large enterprises such as the Wankie and Shabanie Mines. There is no concentration of mining activity in the Colony, this taking place throughout the length and breadth of the country. A further point at the present stage which, in the opinion of the Chamber, stresses the impracticability of transferring this portfolio to the Federal field is that in Southern Rhodesia mining title is vested in the Crown while in Northern Rhodesia it is vested in the British South Africa Co. Ltd. The mining laws of the two Territories have necessarily been developed in the light of this fact, together with the geological differences and the greater agricultural development in Southern Rhodesia. The legislation is consequently very different and also takes into account the difference in the structure of the two mining industries.

6. The Chamber also considers that at the present time it would not be practicable for the portfolio of Labour to be transferred to the Federal sphere. The Labour policy of Southern Rhodesia has developed on the National Industrial Council system which has been most successful in respect of Southern Rhodesia conditions, but may not yet be applicable to the other territories with differing histories of labour relations. From information available to the Chamber, it appears that Labour legislation in Northern Rhodesia is gradually becoming more aligned with that of Southern Rhodesia and it is possible that at some later date a common Labour policy could be introduced for these two Territories.

7. Other than in respect of two of the portfolios, Power and, to a lesser extent, Finance, the Chamber considers that there should be no re-alignment of the responsibilities for the various portfolios as between the Federal and Territorial Governments.

8. While the portfolio of Commerce & Industry is allocated as a Federal responsibility, the development of industry is on the concurrent list. Industrial development in Southern Rhodesia stems largely from the mining industry which is exclusively a territorial responsibility. With a view to extending development in this field, the Southern Rhodesia Government has established an Industries Branch of the Treasury and an Industrial Loans Board. The constitution in recognising the differing problems of mining and industrial development as between the three territories, fails, however, to give Territorial Governments authority over power distribution within their spheres. This, in the opinion of the Chamber, is a serious handicapping factor in industrial and mining development which is largely dependent on power. Experience has shown that the existing organisation of the electricity industry is unwieldy as a result of over concentration in the Federal field, and, therefore, not conducive to industrial development, generally, within Southern Rhodesia. The differing problems in the distribution of power can best be illustrated by the percentage consumption of electricity by broad industrial groups during 1958. In examining the following table, it is also necessary to bear in mind the geographical spread, or concentration, of the consumer groups within the individual territories.

(This tabulation has been prepared from the "Monthly Digest of Statistics" compiled and issued by the Central African Statistical Office, and has been reproduced at the bottom of this page).

9. The Chamber considers that there should be a re-alignment of the responsibilities as between Federal and Territorial Governments in the portfolio of Power. The Federal Government should continue to be responsible for the overall direction of generating policy and for the administration of major projects such as the Kariba Hydro-electric scheme and possibly others of a similar nature which may be established in the future. It is essential that the extent of generating capacity to be installed throughout the Federation should be under a centralised Federal Electricity Authority on which the three Territorial Governments should be given adequate representation. The activities and responsibilities in the Federal field regarding generation should be confined to the bulk supply of power, as, for example, from the Kariba project, but that thereafter the responsibility for distribution and management of existing power stations should fall within the purview of the Territorial Governments.

10. In submitting this recommendation, the Chamber has confined itself to the broad principles but would be pleased to supply the Commission, or any other appropriate authority, with details of how these principles should be introduced. The present system under which the portfolio of power is the sole responsibility of the Federal Government is, in the opinion of the Chamber, unsatisfactory and a handicap to industrialisation in Southern Rhodesia.

11. In terms of the present alignment of the fiscal arrangements between the Territories and the Federal Government, the Territorial Governments are hampered in their efforts to raise revenue for their requirements; for example, the Southern Rhodesia Minister of the Treasury has, because of the restrictions under the Federal constitution, been forced to continue a royalty tax on the value of all base minerals produced in the Territory. This taxation, in the opinion of the Chamber, is hampering the development of the mining industry in Southern Rhodesia and, further, is bad in principle in that it represents differential taxation. This is a matter on which the Chamber has made representations to the Territorial Government but without success, due to the limited means available to the Territorial Minister of the Treasury to raise revenue. Accordingly, the Chamber recommends that there should be a review and re-alignment of the fiscal arrangements to permit a realistic allocation of revenue to all the Territories or to permit Territories to raise by direct taxation funds in a manner more equitable to all sections of the community than by discriminatory taxation such as the present royalty tax on base minerals.

Oral Evidence

THE CHAMBER OF MINES OF RHODESIA. Representatives: T. A. J. Braithwaite (President),* R. S. Walker (Vice-president), D. E. Cox (Member of Executive Committee), N. Ambrose (Manager).

In amplification of the memorandum presented by the Chamber of Mines Mr Braithwaite summarized the views of the delegation as follows:—

Federation had been a benefit economically and industrially

*See also evidence of this witness at Wankie on the 15th April, 1960 (p. 92)

Electric Power Consumption in the Three Territories by Broad Industrial Groups Expressed as Percentages of the Total Consumption in the Federation

Territory	Agriculture and Forestry	Mining and Quarrying	Manufacturing Industries	Domestic	Other	Total
Southern Rhodesia	1.65%	12.64%	13.69%	12.28%	5.92%	46.19%
Northern Rhodesia	0.00%	46.46%	1.59%	4.13%	0.97%	53.15%
Nyasaland	0.00%	—	0.29%	0.22%	0.15%	0.66%
Federal Totals	1.67%	59.09%	15.57%	16.63%	7.04%	100.00% to the three Territories, particularly to Southern Rhodesia. But a continued programme of economic development was necessary.

It was considered that in the mining industry in Southern Rhodesia advancement of both Europeans and Africans generally had been achieved in both the industrial and social fields.

It was not desirable or practicable for the functions of Mines or Labour to be Federal but the need for close policy alignment was recognised, particularly as between Southern and Northern Rhodesia.

There should be greater liberty and facilities for the Territories, particularly Southern Rhodesia, for fostering industrial development. For this purpose it was necessary to bring about a re-alignment of responsibility for electric power: the table given in the memorandum was designed to illustrate this. There also was need for a re-examination of the fiscal arrangements in the Federation in order to give greater flexibility in the raising of revenue, and to overcome the existence of differential taxation affecting the mining industry.

Mr. Cox said that while they were mainly concerned to express their belief in the industrial and economic development attributable to Federation, it was nevertheless necessary to consider certain political factors. In the first place, industrial development must depend on political stability, and the tempo of development was at present slowing down because of the current political uneasiness. Instability lay primarily in the two Northern Protectorates, where there existed violence, boycotts, and political intimidation of Africans by Africans.

Political disaffection was not usually to be found in countries which enjoyed development in the economic and social spheres. In Southern Rhodesia before Federation, there were considerable developments in health, agriculture and education; in these respects, the Northern Protectorates ran a poor second and third, and in the political sphere also the Protectorates were lagging behind. In Southern Rhodesia there had been the open voters Roll for a long time. In the Protectorates even the foundations of the electoral system had yet to emerge.

The Colonial Office system of administration was out of date and unable to meet the challenge of Africa today. No doubt a system of benevolent protection by remote control might once have been suitable. But the traditional forms, including the tribal system, were crumbling away, and there was no new pattern to replace the old order. He was not making any criticism of individuals, but of the Colonial system. It had two special weaknesses. Firstly, power to a great extent rested in the hands of officials who were mere visitors to the country. That could not give the same result as would a man who had to live in the country with the results of his decisions. Secondly, it was tragic that the lives and property of people in Africa were subservient to the whims of party political propaganda in the United Kingdom. Without the removal of these links with the United Kingdom, it would not be possible to get more people to come into Central Africa, and thus to get more vital industrial development in the Federation.

In reply to questions Mr. Cox and the other witnesses, speaking in turn, made the following further points:—

(1) They agreed that in the Northern Territories there was no criticism of the Colonial Office system—rather the reverse, there was a fear of losing the protection of the Colonial Office. Nevertheless they felt that there was greater relative stability in Southern Rhodesia, and greater economic expansion. This only followed logically from the Southern Rhodesian system. People did not realise how much had been done in Southern Rhodesia for the whole population.

(2) It was pointed out that in Southern Rhodesia there were at present on the Common Roll 65,000 Europeans and 2,000 Africans. (Mr. Walker said that this would be more properly expressed that there were 67,000 people on the roll with the required qualifications). Was it because of this composition of the Roll that capital had come to Southern Rhodesia from outside? It was not certain whether potential investors made a study of the voters Rolls. It was more likely that they looked at history. In Southern Rhodesia an effort had been made to build up the machine on a multi-racial basis. Many more Africans could have the vote if they took the trouble to register. Everything in Southern Rhodesia had been created by the Europeans who were, nevertheless, willing to bring Africans into the system. They considered the fears of "domination" in the Northern Territories to be unreasonable. In Southern Rhodesia they had tried to build up a democratic system.

(3) The officials in the Northern Territories had no roots in the country. The establishment of a Central African Civil Service was suggested. The prime consideration was residence in the Federation. That system should by stages replace the H.M.O.C.S. Interchange of officers between the three Territories would give the advantage of seeing the other man's point of view, and would also tend to weave a thread of continuity of policy. But it was no use having uniformity of administration unless there was also uniformity in the interpretation of partnership. For example, trade unions in Northern Rhodesia had been deliberately set up by the Colonial Office on a racial basis. In Southern Rhodesia, the trade unions were non-racial. Again, in the new Northern Rhodesian Constitution some parts demanded racial qualifications. That policy was not consistent with criticisms which were made of racial discrimination. These were examples of wide cleavages of interpretation of partnership.

(4) How was it going to be possible to get rid of "whims of party political propaganda in the United Kingdom"? They agreed that the British Government was pledged not to withdraw its protection from the Northern Territories. The problem was how to insulate the Federation from these political tremors. If only the two parties in England were better informed, there might be a realignment and a better approach to the problems on a bi-partisan basis. It was suggested that many Members of Parliament of both parties knew very little about Central Africa.

(5) The two Protectorates were the two weak links in the Federation. Something must be done to strengthen them and their faith in the Federation.

(6) It was the fashion today to think that the vote would confer all sorts of benefits, but most Africans would prefer 10/- more pay each week than a vote exercised once every five years. But they agreed that the value of having a vote was to dispel the feeling that people were unable to express their views in politics.

(7) It was difficult to say if a redistribution of powers from the Federation to the Territories would be an effective remedy for fears of domination by Southern Rhodesia. Such redistribution might allay the fear of domination, but on the other hand, it might be a first step in a gradual dismemberment of the Federation.

(8) Questioned further as to the two alleged weaknesses of the Colonial Office system, and the proposed remedies, the witnesses agreed that the remedies were indirectly steps to full membership of the Commonwealth and independence of the Federation.

(9) It was not practicable at the present time to transfer Labour to the Federation, although there was need for a closer alignment. In future they would like to see both Mines and Labour Federal, but they could not see when it would be possible to achieve that.

(10) Paragraph 9 of the memorandum—responsibility for electric power. The responsibility for power projects such as Kariba should be Federal; but in the supply of power it should be recognised that there were different problems in the three Territories, as illustrated by the Table. This indicated that the needs of industry in Southern Rhodesia were much more diverse than elsewhere, and also in that Territory the geographical distribution of industry on a wide basis was quite different. Thus the development of industry in Southern Rhodesia was on a different pattern, and on a larger scale than elsewhere. That industry must now be expanded greatly. For the immediate future industrial development, including mining development, was very much the responsibility of Southern Rhodesia. Southern Rhodesia labour relations were also on a different pattern. The only really common feature in the three Territories was the availability of markets. Both the labour pattern and the industrial pattern were different. In industry power was a very important factor, and so also that should be handled in a different manner. Distribution of power should be on a local basis, and also the control of thermal stations and tariffs and finance. These should be transferred from the Federal Government to the Territorial Governments. The Territorial Governments should completely re-organise the tariff structure. The Chamber of Mines considered this a very important reform, and very necessary.

They envisaged a Federal Power Authority for large Generating projects, and also control of the policy of generation. This was essential to prevent competition between Federal and Territorial projects. The Authority would supply power on a fixed tariff to the provincial Authorities. Those Authorities would make a charge for the power and would also decide on the tariff structure in their own Territories so as to get flexibility of charges. (It was mentioned by Mr. Menzies that there was an Australian precedent for this arrangement). This conception included Nyasaland, as and when the time came for that development. But the problem would not in fact arise until a physical link existed.

(11) It was agreed that the Territorial Governments were even at the present day in a position to subsidise electric power. Generally Territorial Governments had a better knowledge of the problems of industrial development, and were better able to determine what charges should be imposed.

(12) Paragraph 3 of the memorandum—the witnesses were asked whether the reference to the progressive attitude of employers related to the fields of normal promotion training and apprenticeship for Africans. They replied that it covered social services for Africans as well. The mining companies in Southern Rhodesia accepted full responsibility for both their European and their African labour and this covered the whole of their industrial and social needs. Giving Wankie Colliery figures, Mr. Braithwaite said that over the past ten years 7% of the African labour force had come to undertake more responsible occupations than at the beginning of the period. They also claimed that between 1% and 2% of the Africans were now occupying positions which ten years ago were occupied by Europeans. In relation to Europeans this represented a fairly substantial replacement. The Colliery had accepted responsibility for training Africans and they foresaw the advance of Africans to even more responsible posts in the future. In seven years time they would see Africans in the indentureship trades side by side with Europeans and working for the same pay.

(13) Mr. Braithwaite said that the Colliery was responsible for housing, feeding and wages. Over the past seven years African wages had increased between 80% and 100%. Health and medical facilities, welfare, education, recreation and training facilities, youth service, spiritual welfare, traditional culture, pensions and gratuities were also provided by the Colliery Management.

(14) In such an undertaking as the Wankie Colliery the machinery or negotiations was organised through the Native Labour Boards. There was a Native Labour Board for the mining industry on which the Chamber of Mines was represented. At the more domestic level the Chamber itself had required its members to set up joint committees which included both management and African employees. These had become the medium for industrial conciliation, and had worked well. There were no Africans at present on the Native Labour Boards, however.

(15) Paragraph 5 of the Memorandum. If Labour eventually became a Federal subject they felt that the legislation which the Ministry would apply would probably be a mixture of the legislation of Northern and Southern Rhodesia, although they themselves preferred the latter. There was no point of substance in the omission of Nyasaland from the statement in the memorandum, and they were quite prepared to include Nyasaland when the time came.

(16) During the Nyasaland state of emergency, although there were numerous Nyasalanders on the mines, and on one mine at least 95%, there had been no difficulties at all. The joint committees already mentioned were then used as a means of liaison for the dissemination of news.

(17) Paragraph 11 of the memorandum. The basic principles for the redistribution of fiscal powers would be similar to those for electric power. For example, the basic Federal income tax might be reduced and the amount of the Territorial surcharge increased. The evidence given had sprung mainly from the feeling that under present fiscal arrangements the Southern Rhodesian Government had had to fall back on the Royalties tax which the Chamber of Mines considered inequitable and discriminatory. Their evidence however was merely to the effect that the problem of redistribution should be re-examined. They certainly wanted a greater degree of financial responsibility for each Territory. They wanted the Territorial Governments to have a larger share in financial control and in loan raising, despite the difficulties which they recognised over the powers of taxation. At the same time, they would not want any re-adjustment which would have the effect of weakening the Federation.

(18) Industry should remain a concurrent subject, but the electric power function should be split as they had explained.

(19) The Royalties tax raised half a million pounds per annum in Southern Rhodesia. Gold was exempt from this tax. They felt that the Royalties tax was bound to militate against the development of mining in Southern Rhodesia, as it was a tax on producers selling throughout the world. They did not regard this as a form of special pleading.

(20) The structure of mining in Southern Rhodesia was different from that in Northern Rhodesia, and its economics were different. They thought it noteworthy that they were able to recruit labourers for mining in Southern Rhodesia from places farther north than the Copperbelt.

(21) On the subject of trade unions, the change of legislation in Southern Rhodesia had only taken place on January 1st. The European trade union had now declared itself multi-racial, and was trying to recruit Africans. There had already existed in the past African trade unions in industries other than mining. But there did not seem to be the same scope or pressure for trade unions on the mines as elsewhere. This may also have been due to the fact that there was less cohesion in the mining industry in Southern Rhodesia than on the Copperbelt. Even among the Europeans in industry only about 40% were members of the European trade union. At Wankie Africans had certainly no desire to participate in trade unions, although the Chamber, as employers, would really like to see this participation increase.

(22) The Africans employed in the mining industry in Southern Rhodesia numbered 55,000, a larger number than those employed in Northern Rhodesia. More than half of them came from outside Southern Rhodesia. At Wankie 22% came from outside Southern Rhodesia, and 40% came from outside the Federation.

Memorandum

INSTITUTE OF LAND SURVEYORS OF SOUTHERN RHODESIA—B. J. R. Creasey, President

I am directed by the Council of the Institute of Land Surveyors of Southern Rhodesia to request that the following memorandum be presented to the Advisory Commission on the Review of the Federation's Constitution under the Chairmanship of Lord Monckton:—

1. Introduction

The scope of this memorandum is confined to the subjects of land tenure in and as far as it affects the profession of cadastral surveying.

2. Existing Constitution

(i) In the preamble to the Constitution of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, the Territorial Governments are recognised as being responsible for the control of land.

(ii) The Federal and Territorial Legislatures have powers under Item 67 of Part II of the second schedule to the Federal Constitution to make laws concerning "Geological, Trigonometrical, Topographical and Cadastral Surveys" and, if there is any inconsistency between the two, the Federal law shall prevail over the Territorial law.

(iii) At present, Cadastral surveying in Southern Rhodesia is controlled by the Land Survey Act, (Chapter 244 of the laws of Southern Rhodesia) as amended, and not by any Federal law.

(iv) At present, matters relating to the Registration of Land in Southern Rhodesia are controlled by the Deeds Registries Act 1959 and not by any Federal Act.

(v) The Federal Legislature has exclusive powers in terms of Item 40 of Part I of the Second Schedule to the Constitution, as amended by Section 2 of Federal Act No. 27 of 1959, to make laws concerning "... professions or callings as and to the extent which, the Governor General with the consent of the Governor of the Territory concerned may by order designate."

(vi) The professional qualifications of Cadastral Surveyors in Southern Rhodesia are prescribed in Chapter 244 of the Laws of Southern Rhodesia and the Land Surveyors Registration Act (No. 35 of 1957) and not by any Federal Law.

3. Cadastral Survey Legislation Recommendations

(i) The present system of laws relating to Cadastral Surveys and the Registration of Land which are in force in Southern Rhodesia are without doubt the envy of much of the western world where security of title is often only obtained at the expense of much litigation. Canada and Cyprus have recently favourably examined our system.

(ii) In all of the older "Federations", the United States, Canada, Australia, it has become the invariable practice to decentralise cadastral surveys, even when the systems of land tenure and registration are the same throughout the larger unit. The main reason for this is to avoid delays in land transactions which would invariably result from reference to a central headquarters situated too far away. In the Central African Federation where the systems of land tenure in the three components are not the same, to centralise the ancillary cadastral surveys would be virtually impossible.

(iii) Nevertheless, being extremely proud of our system of cadastral surveying, we see some advantage in gradually aiming for a unified system based largely on our methods, to apply throughout the Federation. We consider this can be most easily achieved by extending the close liaison between the Territorial Government Departments and the Territorial professional societies, rather than by Federal Legislation being imposed upon us.

(iv) We strongly recommend therefore, that, so far as can possibly be foreseen, cadastral surveys shall remain under the control of the Territorial Legislatures subject to whatever laws are in force relating to land transactions in the three Territories.

(v) It follows, therefore, that we are opposed to the provisions of Item 67 of Part II of the Second Schedule to the Federal Constitution in its present form, and would suggest that this Item be amended as follows:—

Part II of the Second Schedule to the Constitution be amended by the repeal of item 67 and by the substitution therefore of the following items:

67. Geological, Trigonometrical and Topographical surveys.

67. Bis, Cadastral surveys, provided that the Federal Legislature may legislate on this matter as, and to the extent which the Governor General with the consent of the Governor of the Territory concerned, may by order designate.

4. Professional Qualifications: Recommendations

(i) We recommend that while the control of the professional activities of cadastral land surveyors remains in the hands of the Territorial Governments, the question of determining suitable qualifications for admission to the profession should also remain in the province of the Territorial Governments.

(ii) In regard to professional qualifications, the Institute of Land Surveyors of Southern Rhodesia is at present preparing a Bill for presentation to Parliament to set up a Board to prescribe syllabuses and set entrance examinations to the Associated Professions, to issue Diplomas to successful candidates. This would enable people to qualify for certain professions without them having to attend universities in other countries.

(iii) While we see some advantage in reaching a uniform standard of qualifications, again we consider this end should only be realised by negotiations between the three Territories and not by Federal Legislation.

(iv) The Federal Constitution at present, provides that the Federal Government may only legislate on matters relating to professions with the consent of the Governor of the Territory concerned. We believe that this consent should not be given in the matter of qualifications for Cadastral surveying.

5. Land Tenure: Recommendations

(i) All matters relating to land tenure should remain under the control of the Territorial Governments.

(ii) At the present time in Southern Rhodesia three distinct types of title exist (a) Freehold Title (b) Communal Title and (c) Restricted Title.

(a) Freehold Title is the full and complete ownership of the land; the right to use, enjoy or dispose of the land at the decision of the owner. In Southern Rhodesia Freehold title has been granted by the Government to considerable tracts of land amongst which are included the majority of European owned farms and town plots as well as many thousand of Native Purchase Area Farms. All these are rigidly surveyed farms or plots, and deeds with diagrams attached are registered for all of them in the Deeds Offices at Salisbury or Bulawayo. The members of this Institute are agreed from personal observation when surveying Native Purchase Area Farms that the owners definitely use and preserve their land more advantageously and with more thought to the future than their brothers in the Reserves.

(b) Communal Title was originally the ill-defined title to tracts of land used by tribes prior to this century. These tracts were normally occupied by the tribes for a few years before the tribe moved on to another tract, thus giving the soil a chance to recover. In recent years the tribes have settled in fixed areas, namely the Reserves as defined in the Southern Rhodesia Constitution. In as much as these areas are owned by the whole tribe but the inhabitants are controlled by a chief a very direct parallel to the Communistic system exists. Here we consider is a basis for the well recognised but not always understood belief that Africa might easily turn to Communism. Possibly the greatest defence that the "Western World" has against this very real threat is that in its sphere of influence, individuals may enjoy the benefits of land tenure systems permitting the freehold ownership of land. We believe that the Southern Rhodesia Government has through the Land Husbandry Act No. 52 of 1951 both appreciated the problem and come to grips with it by instituting the third form of title now existing in Southern Rhodesia.

(c) Restricted Title is a loose definition for the Farming and Grazing rights being granted by the Government at the present time in the Reserves over which the Southern Rhodesia Government has not received ultimate control. As a consequence of Section 43(1) of its Constitution it is unable to alienate freehold farms such as has been effected in the Native Purchase Areas. Whilst we support the Land Husbandry Act because it is a step towards Freehold Title and because the land is better used and preserved here by the individual right-holders than it is by the Community in the Reserves where the Act has not been implemented, it cannot be too strongly stressed that the adoption of a system permitting freehold ownership of land for Africans living in the "Reserves" would result in greater national stability and would enhance the sense of personal security and responsibility amongst these persons.

In short, we believe that there should be no differentiation as far as land tenure systems are concerned between European areas, Native Purchase areas and the Reserves.

(iii) We see evidence that the various territories are moving towards such unified system of land tenure, but are most disturbed lest in order to speed up the issue of title to land, Governments should consider the introduction of sub-standard methods of Cadastral survey practice. This has already occurred in one African Territory outside the Federation and the cost of rectifying this is proving far greater than any saving which originally resulted. We as a profession feel that the system which has been built up here has stood the test of time and consider it most important that our standards should not be relaxed. This Institute feels quite capable of adapting itself to meet the requirements of any sudden expansion in survey which will result if Africans are to be allocated individual land holdings.

(iv) The Federal Government may well take a lead in this matter, thereby gaining the confidence of the African population, which is so vital to the well being and advancements of the Federation. It is appreciated that there are many ways outside the narrow limits of land surveying in which this object may be achieved, but our recommendations as a professional society, are being confined to that subject, and one of the ways in which the Federal Government may assist is stated hereunder:—

If there is to be the need for a vast increase in cadastral surveys, the Federal Government should immediately substantially expand its services in Trigonometrical and Topographical surveying so as to provide an adequate density of trigonometrical control for the speedy execution of such cadastral surveys. Topographical maps will be required for the proper planning of re-settlement schemes, irrigation projects and siting of roads and railways where necessary.

(v) We would like to stress that we are in full agreement with the present policies being practised by the Governments of this Federation in maintaining land registration and cadastral surveying under the auspices of the various Territorial Governments. We consider that the Federal Government has not only its part to play in producing maps etc., but by all means in its power assist the Territorial Governments in the gradual replacement of Communal Title by Freehold Title.

6. A delegation of the Council of the Institute of Land Surveyors of Southern Rhodesia is prepared to give oral evidence in Salisbury within the scope of the above memorandum, if the Advisory Commission so requires.

Oral Evidence

THE INSTITUTE OF LAND SURVEYORS OF SOUTHERN RHODESIA. Representatives: B. J. R. Creasey, President; F. W. Landwehr, Hon. Secretary.

The witnesses who had presented a memorandum, said that they had agreed with the Branch in Lusaka as to their representations, but as to the legislative recommendation on Cadastral survey they had made a precise proposal for the amendment of the Legislative List. They confirmed that as to land tenure they regarded the present position as satisfactory. They reiterated with reference to paragraph 6, sub-paragraph (iii) of the memorandum that they definitely did not wish the standards of survey to be lowered.

The witnesses explained the difference between the Cadastral, Trigonometrical and Topographical surveys. The system of Cadastral survey in Southern Rhodesia had been brought from the Cape at the time of the settlement. All South African survey qualifications were recognised in Southern Rhodesia, but not necessarily so in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland. They explained the difference in the qualifications required in Northern Rhodesia, but agreed that the standards were of a similar high nature as in Southern Rhodesia. The English qualifications which applied in Northern Rhodesia had a different emphasis. Further, Nyasaland accepted the qualifications of other Dominions such as Canada and Australia. They regarded the South African approach as the soundest, involving a very full training.

In answer to questions, the witnesses made the following further points:—

(1) Paragraph 3 (v) of the memorandum. For many reasons they considered that Cadastral practice should be regulated by the separate Governments. Each Territory of the Federation differed widely in its standards, system of education and so on from the rest. There ought to be no danger of the Federal Government overriding the systems of each Territory. They were therefore suggesting a special reservation in the Legislative List in respect of Cadastral survey similar to the reservation in Item 40 of the Legislative List relating to professional qualifications. It was in this respect that their recommendations were more specific than those which had been made to the Commission in Northern Rhodesia. There was close association between the Institutes of Land Surveys in Northern Rhodesia and in Southern Rhodesia, with exchanges of minutes and of delegates.

(2) As to paragraph 5, (ii) of the memorandum (Professional Qualifications), they were making exactly the same recommendations as had been made in Northern Rhodesia, and in Southern Rhodesia likewise a draft Bill was now ready. The Bill to which had referred was a Public Bill to lay down the qualifications. It was of general application, and particularly for the Civil Service, which was looking for an examining body. It was setting up a Board for professional examinations generally. They were hoping that the University College would in due course offer courses in line with the needs of land survey. The general idea was to make it possible for a full survey qualification to be obtained locally. When that happened local certificates would be issued. This system would eventually cover all three territories. They knew of no opposition to this Bill, and thought that it fitted a genuine need.

The qualification would involve a course at the University, a period of articles, and a trial survey set by the Surveyor-General. In South Africa the qualification involved four years at the University, one year in articles, and a trial survey set by the Government, the whole period covering 5½ years or even six years. It was very difficult to compare this system with the English system. The latter was better in some respects, and in others worse. This derived from a fundamental difference in the land conditions in England and in Africa; in England, there were now reliable physical boundaries, but in Africa greater reliance had to be placed on the Cadastral fix related to the minimum number of beacons at the corners of plots. For this reason, the English surveyor in Africa had to learn a good deal about the local system, whereas the South African qualified surveyor could start on his work immediately. The systems of registration were also different in South Africa and in England. From this point of view the English qualifications had recently been considerably improved, and they saw no reason why the new English qualifications should not be recognised. They confirmed that generally South African survey qualifications were recognised in Southern Rhodesia.

(3) Paragraph 6 (iii). They agreed that sub-standard methods of survey had not yet in fact been applied in the Federation. Their recommendation was based on a fear, since they had heard about certain methods of rapid survey for title carried out in Kenya, which had involved the planting of fast growing hedges as a basis for air photography. The hedges had subsequently spread so that the original line of the survey had become arguable. They had also observed that in connection with the implementation of the Land Husbandry Act in Southern Rhodesia there had been a depiction of rights by air photography. They could not agree that this method would be secure if it were related to the granting of title. In short, they did not want more depiction by aerial photography not based on accurate measurements in the field.

(4) There had never been any bar in the Federation to Africans acquiring the qualifications for land survey; but no Africans were at present coming forward. A bar had in fact been imposed by the refusal of the South African Authorities to allow Africans from the Federation to go to South African Universities.

(5) With reference to paragraph 6 (ii) (c), the Institute strongly supported the Native Purchase Area system, and had been involved in surveys of those areas in the last three years. The surveyors had been most impressed by the care and attention given to the Native Purchase Area farms, and had reported favourably. They were also pleased to see that there existed the aim of having "Urban Purchase Areas".

(6) They considered that the Africans definitely aspired to have freehold title. This would be satisfactory so long as everyone had an equal chance. They were definitely in favour of it. They would also like to see Reserves eventually consolidated with individual titles.

Memorandum

THE REV. H. CARTER

Memorandum submitted by Rev. Herbert Carter, C.B.E., 45 years in the Colony; 16 years General Superintendent of the Methodist Church in Southern Rhodesia, 5½ years Secretary of the Southern Rhodesia Christian Conference; Long-standing family and Christian Council connection with Nyasaland; one year resident in Northern Rhodesia and many years Church and Christian Council connections with that country.

Presented in my personal capacity.

1. My general attitude to the question of the maintenance and further development of the Federation is that it is most deeply desirable to find a way in which the scheme may be brought to fulfilment, but the adverse factors are serious and require dealing with speedily. These factors have arisen principally in Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia owing to a deep-seated fear of domination by the politically more mature territory of Southern Rhodesia, which has in their view a wrong attitude to the rights of Africans. The long-standing determination to share in the Government of the country has now become in powerful sections of the Africans of the northern territories a determination to govern themselves: we are now faced with an explosive situation very different in its strength and scope from that which began to appear 8 to 10 years ago and of which little notice was taken when the early Federation talks were going on.

2. While it is true that the majority of Africans in all three territories are not awakened politically and are quite incapable of thinking nationally, the growing number of highly intelligent Africans knowledgeable on political and economic subjects cannot be ignored. They demand full recognition and place as citizens, and are not placated by present economic progress and new advantages secured since the Federation was formed.

3. The Africans of Southern Rhodesia are comparatively easy on the Federal question; the politically minded among them are more concerned with trying to secure more political power in their own territory. They are not satisfied with the degree to which their interests are represented by European members, and regard it as a great blot on the Colony's record that no African sits in the Southern Rhodesia Parliament or holds any very responsible position in Government service. They do however join heartily with their fellow Africans of the other territories in their hatred of legislation which discriminates against them. Colour-bar legislation and practice, which cannot be dismissed as being "pin-pricks", are long overdue for radical modification and in very many instances for complete disappearance.

4. I do not take the view that the Land Apportionment Act is wholly bad and should be totally repealed. Indeed I am convinced from knowledge acquired during 22 years' membership of the Native Land Board that with regard to the Native Purchase Areas the Act is a genuine charter for the African people in the matter of real ownership of farms (as distinct from the holding of "rights" in the Reserves and Special Native Areas). The protection afforded to them by the Act is the only guarantee that any considerable number of Africans will own farms under Title. If the Act were repealed and the whole country thrown open to buyers without differentiation we should rapidly return to the situation which existed before 1931 when Africans could legally buy anywhere but could not in fact do so by reason of prejudice and poverty. Land ownership would in this country as elsewhere where there is considerable land pressure, go with money power. In this regard Africans would not be able to compete with European purchasers, and many Africans at present owning land in the scheduled areas would be bought out—e.g. by tobacco farmers seeking sandy soils. There are already a considerable number of sub-divisions and sales taking place now between Africans, considerable profits being made by the sellers. In a completely open market there could be a flood of sales in the areas now scheduled under the Act as "African", but the prospect of Africans buying in the present European areas would remain at zero.

5. Land Apportionment Act in relation to business and residence. In a large measure the present delimitation of European and Native areas benefits African traders and self-employed business men, in that in the Native Reserves, Special Native areas and Native Purchase areas, Europeans are not granted business sites unless the local Chief or Native Council agrees and the Native Commissioner recommends because the granting will be beneficial to the Africans and is desired by them. A similar protection exists in the African townships. The build-up of African traders is impressive, but were the Native areas thrown open to all it does not seem possible that African business men would be able to compete with the financially much stronger non-Africans whether Jews, Gentiles, Greeks or Asians. This attitude may be stigmatised as paternalistic but I think it makes sense for a few more generations. The argument sometimes advanced that this racial protection given to Africans in "their" areas is well matched by the protection given to European traders and business houses in the cities and towns is somewhat invalidated by the fact that the bulk of the purchasing by Africans in such regions is secured by the very attractive European and Asiatic stores and not by the African traders in the neighbouring African townships. Further it is known that the African traders in the outside districts and in the townships often fail to secure the same wholesale terms as their European competitors. The Land Apportionment Act has had many amendments and many alterations have been made to the regulations framed under the Act. In practically every case the amendment has been made to remove or diminish the force of some anomaly or anachronism in Urban areas. The Act to create multi-racial zones in the cities and towns has been nullified in effect because the Municipalities whose initiation and consent is required by the law uniformly refused to act. No Africans have stable and secure rights of occupation of site or premises in a European town, legally granted, other than Advocate Chitepo and the African students of the University College: I do not know of any others. This situation is painfully and bitterly thwarting to advanced Africans; it is noted very markedly by Africans of the northern territories where no comparable legislation is in force and is one of the major causes of their fears of connection with Southern Rhodesia in the Federal set-up. It seems very unlikely that residential and commercial rights in Southern Rhodesia towns will be granted under existing legislation: this position should be examined. Multi-racial projects which can be freely undertaken in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland lead to all sorts of trouble in Southern Rhodesia and appear to escape 100% prohibition only because of the difficulty in defining "occupation" in legal terms of universal application. It should be noted also that the difficulty extends to private land holders with regard to private and non-commercial matters in both town and country: e.g. it would be illegal for a land-owner or occupier of premises to allow an African friend or professional or business man to "occupy" any part of his house or other premises unless he first "employed" him and signed the African's Registration Certificate. The complaint made by some very "right-wing" Europeans that the Africans are more beneficially protected than the Europeans are, will hardly be justified by examination of the facts relating to the land areas, mining, and financial benefits which accrue under the Land Apportionment Act and analogous legislation. If it were true it would be quite defensible in that the politically and economically weaker sections of the community need the protection. Unless we really come together in equitable partnership the question who will be the stronger and who the weaker at the end of the present generation will be a real battleground. It may come about that legislation protecting the Europeans will be needed. One other important matter must be mentioned in connection with the Land Apportionment Act and its effect on Africans and African opinion about Southern Rhodesia. The total area available for African occupation is just under 42 million acres, and that for European occupation just under 52 million acres, leaving about 3½ million acres Forest and Undetermined. 2 million Africans are domiciled in the three categories of Native Areas, the other 283,000 living in towns and other European areas. It has to be agreed that "the land is at the root of most of the racial disturbances that have occurred in Africa". Southern Rhodesia has 211,000 Europeans, of whom some 123,000 live in the towns (107,000 in Salisbury and Bulawayo), leaving only 88,000 scattered throughout nearly 52 million acres. It is no wonder that Africans throughout the whole Federation, seeing the relatively small use made of vast stretches of the European Area in Southern Rhodesia become cynical and embittered, and see great significance for race relations in the fact that agrarian land works out at 21 acres per African person and 591 acres for each European person. The whole weight of argument both about population density and actual production of food-stuffs is on the side of setting aside more land for Africans, which can only be done by reducing that at present allotted to Europeans. One may with some assurance foresee that the inevitably rising tide of African political power throughout the Federation will lead to a radical alteration in the present land occupation.

6. The Franchise and Parliamentary representation. Even if one were able to deal with background matters in full it would still remain true that the present crux in Federal matters is political. Education, agriculture, housing, medical services, roads and communications, wages and conditions of employment are all advancing and improving year by year, and the acceleration since Federation is most marked—but we do not seem to be getting nearer to a solution of the problem of political power. The interpretation of what the term "civilised persons" means, even among those who more or less accept the idea that power should be in their hands varies a good deal: wider still is the divergence of thought about the proposition that every adult person in the Federation has an inherent right now to be allowed to vote. If one does not accept proposals for "Universal suffrage" now or in the near future as being the right answer—and I do not—then one will try to find a plan of development over a period of years whereby an increasing number of persons will become eligible to vote and to offer themselves as candidates for election. Your Commission will have heard many proposals. Is the present principle of one system for the Federal franchise and other systems for the territories the best that can be found? Is the Federal Government to set the standard, or would it not be better to allow the territories to vote for Federal parliamentary candidates on their own territorial franchise system? That seems to me to be sensible. While one would like to see a non-race conception of parliamentary government it does not seem that the present policy of "Party not race" is getting us anywhere though Africans do belong, in small numbers, to all parties. If the present general temper worsens then parties are likely to be organised on racial lines. The present systems all aim at racial control at the franchise level hence the many arguments about qualifications of voters. May I ventilate the idea that perhaps the control could be better exercised at constituency level? That is, to make every constituency a two member constituency, one member to be European and one African, with Eur-Africans and Asians joining one or the other, voting to be on a common roll with one standard of qualification, and each voter able to vote for one European and one African. Equal numerical representation would not, I feel sure, result in straight racial voting on measures proposed in parliament; voting would be mixed, the party system would have a better chance of surviving, and the system would in all probability give excellent training in taking nation-wide views, and it seems to me to be applicable to the Federal parliament, the Southern Rhodesia and Northern Rhodesia parliaments, but not to Nyasaland where a different proportion of seats would be called for. It should be noted that the parliamentary position in Southern Rhodesia is undoubtedly responsible for a good deal of antagonistic feeling on the part of African politicians in all three territories. They see that on party lines no African is or is likely to be elected to the Southern Rhodesia House. A new delimitation of constituencies to ensure that somewhere there is a constituency predominantly African is not very promising though it might come off: it would mean that a dominant party called upon some European voters to vote for an African against the party's European opponent.

7. Relationships within the Federation. I have long been convinced that there will not be harmonious and mutually advantageous relationships between the territories and the Federation until Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland are advanced to something approaching self-government. If the Federal Government had not been set up the object of attack would have been the Colonial Office. The great divergence in the political maturity of the three areas have, I consider, been the underlying cause of the present Federal difficulties. The one to a hundred chance of success has not come off. There seems reason to believe that a number of Colonial Office officials in Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia were opposed to Federation, some expressing their dislike and others damaging by silence. Detailed and correct information and persuasive propaganda were not put out early enough, and when it put out the emphasis on economic advantages failed to win converts. In Nyasaland the pro-Federation and anti-Congress Chiefs were overcome and silenced: Congress intimidation was extensively used in tribal gatherings and among farm labourers as well as in the towns. To many, the consideration which ought to over-ride all others is the ideal of an ultimate common nationhood, non-racial politically and economically, with the social consequences working themselves out in accordance with natural development and changing sentiment. The prospect of accomplishing such an ideal is conditioned by the settlement which will be made in the near future. The continuance of the Federation as it exists now, without change, is in view of the attitudes taken by Africans in the north somewhat precarious to say the least of it. It may not be found practicable except at the risk of bloodshed or such extensive passive resistance and civil disobedience that the affairs of the Federation and the business of the three territories would be brought to a halt. It is however possible that the extreme nationalist leaders are bluffing somewhat and that some of them would retract a good bit if their followers would let them. There appears to be merit in Sir John Moffatt's suggestion that some more acceptable new form of association be sought, which would avoid the break-up of the Federation and the waste of what has been accomplished in the past seven years, and would ensure the maintenance of the principle of partnership in the territories together. Political sharing on a realistic basis within each territory and in the association of the territories in a sine qua non. Both sides will have to make concessions and to recognise fully the interdependence of all groups. There may be just time enough to persuade sufficient numbers of influential people that the doctrine of interdependence is a true one.

8. Bill of Rights. Human beings in the last resort are concerned with their rights as individuals even more than with national policies, and all too frequently with their claims more than their responsibilities to the body politic. I would hazard a guess that the Commission has heard from Africans that they fear "the slavery of Southern Rhodesia" and do not trust the law-makers who are responsible to the European electorate. Comparisons with Afrikaner legislative in the Union of a repressive and domineering character are frequently made. Some remember the treatment of the opposition in Ghana but generally speaking Africans do not trust Whites to establish and maintain for them anything approaching the U.N. Declaration or any older conceptions of personal liberty. In many fields the Federation is maintaining high British traditions, e.g. religious liberty, public education, medical facilities, rail, road and air travel and vast sums spent on housing. Some rights however have been curtailed by differential legislation. Many feel that the need has been demonstrated to have included in the Constitution in such a way that the Government of the day cannot unilaterally alter it, a solemn declaration that the liberty of each and every person lawfully in the Federation is a sacred thing, entitling him to secure justice without discrimination with regard to his life, liberty, property and home; to be protected against all degrading treatment or punishment, and to possess positively the right of free speech, freedom of association and peaceable assembly; also to have equal opportunity with other men to qualify for employment or a profession and not to be debarred by statute or regulation from such employment or profession by reason of his racial origin. In the light of the emergencies of the last year it appears necessary also to require that the laws relating to subversion, treason, violence, and incitement to any of these things, be so made that any person arrested on suspicion, or charged with any any of these offences must be brought to trial within a reasonable time and not indefinitely detained or restricted without trial. The bitterness caused by the emergency laws and regulations and their application both with regard to time and manner, and the long detentions and restrictions have very much worsened race relations. The utmost must be done to restore a sense of security for all persons to whichever section of the community they belong. Today's position of privilege and security held by us Europeans as such however fully justified by circumstances in pioneering days is now an anachronism. They are foolish who blind themselves to the certainty of rapid changes in relationships—and now is the time to recognise the oneness of the community in the matter of human rights.

9. Territorial and Federal responsibilities. The claim being made in each territory to control the day-to-day territorial affairs is one which needs to be brought into happier relationship with Federal responsibilities. It is suggested that this is an important item for your Commission's consideration. This matter of the possibility of either Territorial or Federal or both legislating on certain matters seems prejudicial to any strong sense of security being enjoyed by the different populations. The right of the Federal law to over-ride territorial law on a certain matter, territorial sentiment being what it is, obviously contains the seed of grave disagreement, however well the system may be working in other countries. Here it is likely to lead to the same complaint as is voiced by the Federal Government itself and the Southern Rhodesia Government about limitation of powers and the evil of ultimate control being held "elsewhere". (Agitation about Nyasaland agriculture and Northern Rhodesia Education are pointers.) Subjects which appear suitable for Federal control include Posts and Telegraphs, Defence, External Affairs, Higher Education, Health, and Power. For Territorial legislation and control, the subjects would include Primary, Secondary and Technical education, Lands and Agriculture, Police, Housing, and "African Affairs" so long as they may remain in a separate category. If Agriculture became territorial, a joint selling organisation might be considered necessary. Immigration is a difficult matter which needs sorting out. Freedom of movement within the Federation is desirable: whether this should be secured by Federal citizenship issuing in control of all immigration without territorial restrictions, or be territorial with well-oiled machinery for transfers I do not know, but present territorial restrictions (e.g. for Asians, and with regard to the permanent settlement of Africans in a territory other than that of their birth) seems to many to strike at the roots of Federal principle and to make Federal citizenship a thing of small moment with the Federation itself.

10. Conclusions

- (1) That, taking the long view, the Federation with some modifications in the relationships of the Federal and Territorial Governments, ought to be maintained, as three independent States of small populations cannot last for any great length of time, nor is there any other federation or affiliation in sight with as good prospects of success as the present one.
- (2) That the Federation will only be maintained by progressively dissociating national origin from place and power, and the free granting of equal opportunities to all in accordance with capability, and with common standards and common loyalties.

- (3) That immediate political advancement and constitutional development should be granted to the northern territories, with clearly defined territorial responsibilities for their internal affairs.
- (4) That there should be a Federal Senate or some form of Upper House with power to revise, delay, and make proposals upon, all legislation submitted by the Lower House and not merely on legislation suspected of differentiation.
- (5) That certain basic human rights be guaranteed by being written into the Constitution in such a way that they cannot be disregarded or abrogated by the Government of the time: possibly safeguarded by the Supreme Court or by Commonwealth guarantee.
- (6) That the Southern Rhodesia Land Apportionment Act be radically amended with regard to non-agricultural areas, i.e. with regard to rights of ownership and "occupation and use" of urban areas, including the participation of members of any race in Municipal affairs.

Oral Evidence

THE REV. H. CARTER

The Rev. H. Carter said that he had nothing to add to his memorandum, and invited questions, in reply to which he made the following points:—

(1) Paragraph 8 of the Memorandum. Bill of Rights. He thought it would be of definite value to have such an instrument. In the memorandum he had only mentioned some of the matters which might be included. These had been mainly prompted by the situation in the Union of South Africa, where people had not known what their rights might be from year to year.

(2) Paragraph 10, Conclusion (1). He thought it very doubtful whether the Federation could be made acceptable. At the Kitwe Conference which he had attended two years ago, he had met a number of advanced Africans, and had been greatly distressed by the extreme views which they expressed. They were quite unconvertible, embittered and outspoken. They thought that Federation in its present form was led by Southern Rhodesia, of which they simply did not approve. Despite this, every attempt should be made to keep the Federation together.

(3) Paragraph 10, Conclusion (4). It was pointed out that he had not provided for the Senate or Upper House to have a veto. He considered that the delay which it could impose would induce the Lower House to reconsider the question at issue, and also the people. There had been experience in Southern Rhodesia of legislation being very quickly enacted. With three Territories which were so divergent, there ought to be delay and the opportunity for the revisions of views. He considered that delay should be a sufficient safeguard.

(4) The population and land figures given at the end of paragraph 5 of the memorandum were derived from pamphlets of the Federal Information Department.

(5) He thought that European opinion in Southern Rhodesia was on the whole moving towards the sort of idea which he held himself. The general attitude had changed remarkably in the last 4 or 5 years. The Europeans were moving in the right direction, and he was not aware of any recent change in their sentiments. The general attitude both in daily life and in public affairs had very greatly improved.

(6) In paragraph 9 of the Memorandum he had stated that Health should be a Federal subject. He had been a member of the recent Morton Commission on the Health Services of the Federation. His own view was that Health, having been federalised, should remain so but with greater powers being given to regional boards, eventually perhaps down to smaller regions; their powers should be wider and freer. But he did not wish to see the breakdown of the Federal Ministry of Health. He agreed that the Commission had not examined missions in the rural areas, although they had seen some mine hospitals. On the question of medical supplies, they had felt that the fault did not lie with the Federal Ministry but with the people concerned with making requisitions for medical supplies. He was referring to the people in the hospitals including the rural hospitals. He agreed that these people were servants of the Ministry of Health. He also agreed that the Commission had heard no witnesses from the "receiving end", but only from officials. People had not come forward to give the Commission evidence, in spite of advertisements in the Press, and very few Africans had come forward. They had not found the Health Services inefficient in Northern Rhodesia, but it had to be remembered that the Commission was tied to restrictive terms of reference. For that reason they had not spread out into the wider areas and examined auxiliary services. There had certainly been complaints about excessive centralisation. The Commission had not conducted its examination further down than to hospitals.

(7) Paragraph 9. He thought that European agriculture should be a Territorial subject.

(8) Paragraph 10, Conclusion, sub para (2). By the reference to "common standards" he meant that the aim should be to have common standards of life for all. At present there was too great a contrast between wealth and much lower standards of living. And this great difference of standards appeared to be on lines of colour. There was still a very great cleavage. It was necessary to work for greater equality. There was no hope for the Federation unless a common loyalty could be achieved.

(9) Paragraph 10, Conclusion, sub para (4). He had not considered whether there might be both a Bill of Rights and a Senate or Upper House. He had considered the Bill of Rights merely to be a step in the law-making.

(10) Paragraph 6. Two-member constituencies. This system should apply both in the Federal and Territorial sphere. He attempted to make no judgment as to how many constituencies there should be, but he was clear that the system would achieve an equality of racial representation. He had noticed that in the Federal House a straight racial vote was seldom seen: Members were becoming more independent. He, therefore, anticipated that on the system he proposed there would be mixed voting. This proposal had been turned down by the Tredgold Commission, on the ground that it might lead to the nullification of votes. But he himself thought that the system would give rise to an African sense of responsibility. He agreed that there was a risk involved, but considered it better to take the risk in this manner than through any rigging of the franchise.

Memorandum

NATURAL RESOURCES BOARD OF SOUTHERN RHODESIA

Introduction

1. Before setting forth the evidence which the Natural Resources Board considers should be provided to the Monckton Commission it would be advisable to set out briefly the functions and duties of the Board as provided in the Natural Resources Act to show how the Board fits into the administrative organisation in both the Territorial and Federal fields in Southern Rhodesia.

Background

The Natural Resources Act 1941, as amended.

The Natural Resources

2. In terms of the Act the natural resources are defined as—
- the soil, water and minerals of the Colony;
 - the animal, bird and fish life of the Colony;
 - the trees, grasses and other vegetable products of the soil;
 - such other things as the Governor may, by proclamation in the Gazette, declare to be natural resources, including landscapes and scenery which in his opinion should be preserved on account of their aesthetic appeal or scenic value.

The Board

3. In terms of the Act the Chairman and Members of the Board are appointed by the Governor with due regard to the special interests concerned. At the present time Members of the Board have been appointed who have particular knowledge and experience in matters relating to Native Affairs, Engineering, Mining, and European Agriculture. No Government officials are members of the Board.

Functions of the Board

4. The functions of the Board, in addition to the powers and duties specifically assigned to it under the Act are—

- to exercise general supervision over natural resources;
- to stimulate by propaganda and such other means as it may deem expedient a public interest in the conservation and improvement of natural resources;
- to recommend to the Government the nature of legislation by it deemed necessary for the proper conservation, use and improvement of natural resources.

Access to Ministers and Annual Report

5. The Act provides that the Chairman of the Board shall have direct access to any Minister and it requires that the Board, in its Annual Report, shall include the recommendations made by it to Government or any Minister and shall show to what extent these recommendations have been accepted.

Technical Questions and Summoning of Witnesses

6. The Board is required to consult experts on technical questions and it has the powers which a Magistrate's Court has to summon witnesses, to cause the oaths to be administered to them, to examine them and to call for the production of documents. Penalties are provided for giving false evidence or for witnesses refusing to be sworn, give evidence or produce documents.

Acquisition of Land and Construction of Works

7. The Act provides for the acquisition or expropriation of land and for the construction of works on any land for—

- the protection of the source, course or feeders of a public stream;
- the disposal or control of storm water;
- the mitigation or prevention of soil erosion;
- the conservation of water.

The cost of works so constructed is in the first instance paid from moneys appropriated by the Southern Rhodesia Parliament from the public revenue and the Board is required to apportion the cost between Government and any other persons who will be benefited by such works (provided that no apportionment shall be made against a "reserve native").

Orders by Board

8. The Board may make orders on the owner, occupier or user of any land within the European area and Native Purchase Areas and such orders may relate to—

- the construction and maintenance of soil or water conservation works;
- the preservation and protection of the source, course and banks of rivers and streams;
- the depasturing or limitation of stock;
- the prohibition or restriction of cultivation of any part of the land;
- the control of water, including storm water;
- the prohibition of the erection of buildings or the making of bricks at any place which the board considers to be too near to a public stream.

There is an appeal against any such order to the Natural Resources Court referred to in paragraph 12.

Orders by Native Commissioners

9. The Act empowers Native Commissioners to make orders on the users of any land in Native Reserves and such orders may relate to—

- the depasturing or stock;
- the method of cultivation and utilization of the land or the crops to be grown thereon;
- the prohibition or restriction of cultivation of any part of the land;
- the control of water, including storm water.

There is an appeal from any such order to the Board which may confirm, vary or set it aside.

Intensive Conservation Areas and Conservation Committees

10. In the European area the Act provides for the voluntary declaration of intensive conservation areas and for the election of Conservation Committees (which are bodies corporate) from owners of land within the area. At the present time there are 93 Intensive Conservation Areas (with the same number of Committees) covering the whole of the European area.

Functions and Powers of Conservation Committees

11. Subject to the approval of the Board the functions and powers of Conservation Committees are—

- to inaugurate and undertake the construction of works and other measures for soil and water conservation and improvement of soil and water supplies in its area; and
- generally to co-operate with and assist the board in carrying out the objects of this Act.
- to construct and maintain such works as it may deem necessary for soil and water conservation or improvement; and
- to superintend or perform, or enter into contracts for the superintendence or performance of, all such acts, matters and things as are incidental to soil and water conservation, maintenance or improvement.
- to make arrangements with any other conservation committee for undertaking on a joint or co-operative basis any works in their respective areas.

Natural Resources Court

12. The Act provides for the establishment of a Natural Resources Court the president of which shall be a Water Court Judge. Any person affected by a decision concerning an apportionment of costs (see paragraph 7) or an order (referred to in paragraph 8) who considers that such decision or order is inequitable, unreasonable or unduly harsh may appeal to the Natural Resources Court. Provision is made, in certain circumstances, for an appeal to the High Court and Federal Supreme Court against the determination of the Natural Resources Court.

Evidence

Conservation of the Natural Resources in Southern Rhodesia

13. Prior to the coming into being of the Federation in 1953 all the Government Departments concerned with the conservation of the natural resources (with the exception of minerals) in the European area of Southern Rhodesia, in particular the use of the land, were concentrated in the Southern Rhodesia Division of Agriculture under one Minister. This organisation was not only satisfactory but a logical grouping of Departments with a basically common objective—the wise and proper utilization of the natural resources.

14. With the advent of Federation the Departments of Conservation and Extension, Research and Specialist Services and Veterinary became the Federal Ministry of Agriculture while the Departments of Irrigation, Lands, Forestry and Game, as did the Board, remained Territorial. Conservation in relation to agriculture became a Federal function in all but the African areas. Some of the difficulties and anomalies that have followed the re-grouping of the Departments referred to are mentioned briefly below.

15. The Natural Resources Act provides that the Chairman shall have direct access to any Minister. This is clearly very essential if the Board is to fulfil its functions but consequent on Federation this legal right is restricted to Southern Rhodesia Ministers despite the fact that some of the Departments concerned with the preservation of the natural resources are Federal.

16. The Board's Annual Report, which deals with all aspects of conservation of the natural resources, is presented to the Southern Rhodesian Parliament which can only discuss those Southern Rhodesia Parliament which can only discuss those sections which deal with matters that are a Territorial function.

17. The conservation organisation in the European areas of Southern Rhodesia is fundamentally based on the very close inter-relation of the activities of the Board, the Conservation Committees and the Federal Department of Conservation and Extension. The Board and the I.C.A. Committees are Territorial bodies, established under the Natural Resources Act, which rely almost entirely on the Federal Department of Conservation and Extension for technical advice on conservation matters related to European agriculture. On the other hand also, it is an acknowledged fact that the Federal Department of Conservation and Extension could not function effectively outside the existing organisation.

18. Legislation dealing with the use of water in Southern Rhodesia is a Territorial responsibility but the Federal Government subsidises the conservation of water in the European areas. Conservation Committees which, as mentioned previously, are Territorial bodies, are financed by the Federal Government. All the legal powers necessary for the conservation of the natural resources in the European areas are contained in the Southern Rhodesia Natural Resources Act despite the fact that conservation in these areas is a Federal function in terms of the Constitution of the Federation.

19. Undoubtedly the most important aspect of the problem of conservation of the natural resources of Southern Rhodesia is in relation to the African areas where considerable devastation of all the natural resources has and is still taking place. In many areas active erosion continues to occur and generally the decline in the fertility of the soil has not yet been halted. The problem in these areas is very great and serious and by comparison the problems in the European areas may be said to hardly exist. However, the ratio of Government funds devoted to the problem in the European areas as opposed to African areas shows that from the truly national viewpoint this fact is not recognised. The reason is, of course, easy to see—the two Governments, Federal and Territorial, examine their financial responsibilities in relation to their separate functions and not in relation to the overall problem of the conservation of the natural resources within the whole area of Southern Rhodesia.

20. In an effort to remedy the difficulties and anomalies which arose from conservation (in relation to European agriculture) becoming a Federal function and bearing in mind that the Board's main function was to "exercise general supervision over the natural resources" of Southern Rhodesia, whether in the European or African areas, the Board discussed with the Natural Resources Board of Northern Rhodesia the question of possible Federal legislation embracing the two Territories but the Board was informed that the Northern Rhodesia Government had made it perfectly clear that it would not consider any proposal which would in any way affect the powers and functions of the Northern Rhodesia Natural Resources Board or the Natural Resources Ordinance. The Board then recommended to the Southern Rhodesia Government that there be two Natural Resources Acts, the one Federal and the other Territorial, to deal with the respective functions of the Federal and Southern Rhodesia Governments in Southern Rhodesia. It was envisaged for convenience and effectiveness that the Boards established under the two Acts would in fact have identical membership and probably the same members as are appointed to the existing Natural Resources Board of Southern Rhodesia. This proposal, however, was unacceptable to the Southern Rhodesia Government.

21. In the opinion of the Board the unsatisfactory situation outlined above stems from the fact that Government Departments with the same basic functions, i.e. the wise and proper utilization (conservation) of the natural resources are separated and responsible to two different Governments.

22. The natural resources of a country surely cannot be divided into European and African natural resources and the conservation or wise utilization of a country's natural resources clearly cannot be properly planned and managed if the responsibility for such planning and management is divided between two Governments on such an artificial basis.

23. It is the Board's submission that all Government Departments, whether at present Federal or Territorial, whose basic concern is the proper and sustained utilization of any of Southern Rhodesia's natural resources, whether they be in African and European areas, should be responsible to the same Government. For the effective functioning of these Departments the Board is not concerned whether the Government be the Federal or the Southern Rhodesia Government.

Oral Evidence

NATURAL RESOURCES BOARD OF SOUTHERN RHODESIA. Representatives: G. Deedes (Chairman), T. A. J. Braithwaite* and P. Haviland (Members)

Arising out of paragraph 20 of the memorandum, Mr. Deedes said that the Board had suggested that there should be two Natural Resources Acts, one being Federal and the other Southern Rhodesian, in order to get over certain obvious difficulties, but the Board appointed in the terms of those Acts would have the same membership. His Board had felt that all resources in the Territory were a Territorial responsibility, and that was the reason for the suggestion. The representations had not been accepted because evidently the Southern Rhodesian Government had felt that it might become too unwieldy and that the Southern Rhodesia Board would lose its identity. The Board had views as to whether natural resources should be a Federal or Territorial function but, of course, it was not for them to say, although they thought that probably it would be better if the function were within the Territorial rather than Federal sphere, even if all agriculture were a Federal function.

The witnesses thought that without question marketing and economics should remain Federal, but that conservation and extension services should be under one government and, from their point of view, that government should be the Territorial Government. Prior to Federation, there had been considerable disagreement between Territories on agricultural matters but this concerned almost entirely marketing and economic aspects. These divergences had a direct impact on the economy of the three Territories at that time, particularly when one was faced with the situation of Southern Rhodesia selling, for example, surplus maize for export which had the effect of impinging directly on the economy of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, and the reverse could also have taken place. Difficulties also arose on the veterinary side and cattle movements could not be satisfactorily checked when this function was dealt with on a Territorial basis.

As far as the research and specialist services were concerned, prior to Federation people in Northern Rhodesia invariably said that people in Southern Rhodesia had these services to a far greater degree than they had them in the north. The position under Federation now is that the north has received and is receiving the benefit of the services, which after all are often very long term, much earlier than otherwise would have been the case. Mr. Deedes mentioned that Professor Davies of the University College had said that Federal Agricultural services were as fine as anything in the world and that they should never be broken up and divided between the Territories. The witnesses felt that difficulties or deterioration in the services would necessarily arise if there was a severance, but if this came about quite obviously care would have to be taken, particularly in the question of staffing in order to avoid competition between the three services. At the same time, they thought it would be unwise to break up any one or more of the small groups to perhaps three or four officers dealing with some specialist services. All in all, they thought it was a very open question as to whether research and specialist services other than the small ones to which they had referred should remain Federal.

Referring to paragraph 14 of the memorandum, Mr. Deedes said that the references there to the departments of conservation and extension, research and specialist services, and veterinary and animal husbandry related to European agriculture only, although in respect of the second of these, namely research and specialist services, African agriculture was able to derive direct benefits from the Federal function.

In answer to a question, the witnesses stated that while there were no Intensive Conservation Area committees in the African areas, there were agricultural committees in the Native Purchase Areas which equated to the I.C.A.'s but these were only able to function in Native Purchase Areas where there were Native Councils. At the moment, eleven such agricultural committees were in operation and these in a sense were sub-committees of the Native Councils. There were 55 Native Purchase Areas in Southern Rhodesia, 22 of which had Native Councils. The work through these agricultural committees was being strongly encouraged, but an important difficulty that had to be faced was the lack of an adequate native agricultural extension service which had been urged by the Natural Resources Board and, although there was an urgent need for extension services, these at the moment were being prevented from being implemented by the lack of finance. The Board was convinced that the Native Agricultural Committees were proving to be of great value. The first of these was brought into operation some 18 to 24 months ago and the eleven existing ones represented something over 2,000 African farmers. Unquestionably, if the Board were empowered to do so, it would form more of these agricultural committees but, as things stood, they came under the Native Councils Act.

The witnesses informed the Commission that the Natural Resources Board could make orders under its legislation in respect of both European and African areas. These orders were made on the recommendation of the I.C.A.'s and native agricultural committees. For its part, the Board felt that persuasion to better farming methods was the preferable course to follow, and the success of this policy was probably borne out by the circumstances that, since 1941, only 34 orders had been issued, but most of these had been rescinded in the meantime immediately the farmer had toed the line. There had been very few prosecutions and, as far as he could recollect, Mr. Deedes thought there had been none of African farmers. The Natural Resources Board used the I.C.A.'s and the agricultural committees as their agents but for this reason and because of the lack of staff the Natural Resources Act tended to become inoperative for practical purposes when there was a Native Purchase Area which had no agricultural committee. He added that the Board was now taking an African member on to the Native Affairs Committee of the Natural Resources Board which was likely to have the effect of making co-operation even keener. In response to another enquiry, the Board said that their experience in Southern Rhodesia was that there had been very little resistance indeed by Africans to the application of good farming methods, and what there had been had been mostly connected with de-stocking, which the condition of any particular piece of land demanded. They said that without going into the political issues they could not satisfactorily give the reason why the Nyasalanders should be so opposed to the application of conservation and extension methods, although it could be because the Nyasaland Government had made no real effort to explain the advantages. In Southern Rhodesia Native Department officials had been at great pains long before any de-stocking, for example, was due to take place to explain the consequences of the Department's action. In addition, they were able to operate through the Native Agricultural Committees referred to earlier in the evidence. Mr. Deedes wanted to stress that there was a great deal of co-operation today between all European I.C.A.'s and African farmers, and he and his Board thought that this was a most desirable example of partnership which almost literally grew up from the grass roots. It was essentially non-political and non-racial.

Mr. Haviland, responding to a question, said that he thought the Board's submission, set out in paragraph 23, could be achieved with research and specialist services being Federal, particularly fundamental research, although it might be that given the staff it would be more appropriate for applied research to be Territorial. He, for example, was quite opposed to the centralization of water supply administration; but he had no objection to hydrological research being centralized. He reiterated that in his view conservation and extension services should be a Territorial function.

In connection with paragraph 9, the witnesses asked that the term "Native Reserves" used there should be read to embrace the "Special Native Areas" which followed the definition in the Act.

Memorandum

GIRL GUIDES ASSOCIATION OF SOUTHERN RHODESIA

1. Historical Background

The Southern Rhodesia Girl Guides Association was officially inaugurated in 1919, though there had been several Companies in existence before that date. It then consisted of European members only.

In 1927, however, a move was made to include girls of the non-European races, but after much thought the Girl Wayfarers' Association was started for these. This Movement was modelled upon a similar organisation in the Union of South Africa, which in turn had been frankly copied from the Guide Association and which embodied many of the ideas and principles contained in Guiding.

Many of the first officers in the Wayfarer Association were already Guiders, and a close and friendly relationship continued for many years. The wife of the Governor was President of each Movement.

In 1936, the Coloured and Indian children were admitted as full members of the Guide Association, and from that time many Guiders felt that a move must be made towards the inclusion also of African girls into the world-wide fellowship of Guiding. Opposition came, however, from the African Movement as much as from the Europeans, on the grounds that with the education of African women as yet in the early stages, it was too soon to expect the African girls to be able to take the tests at the European standard. However in the early 1940's first steps were taken towards the closer co-ordination of the work of the two Movements. In 1945 Wayfarers were included in the Guide Movement as "Wayfarer-Guides". There was still a separate Council and Executive for each, and each had its own Chief Commissioner but were under a Joint President, the wife of the Governor.

In 1947 a Joint Advisory Board was elected and from this a Liaison Committee was formed to draw up a constitution which would include all Racial Groups.

In 1951 this constitution was passed, and the name Wayfarer was dropped from the African Group, and all became Guides. There was one Chief Commissioner, but it was still felt necessary to have two Assistant Chief Commissioners for the European and African Groups respectively. In 1953, however, this was no longer felt to be necessary and these posts were abolished, all Guides under one Chief Commissioner.

Southern Rhodesia has the full status of a Dominion in Guiding, with the exception that, as she is not politically independent, she may not have a direct representation on the World Conference of Girl Guides, where we are represented by Commonwealth Headquarters in London. This year, however, in recognition of the part played by Southern Rhodesian Guiding in the field of Race Relationships, the Chief Commissioner was invited to be a member of the British Delegation to the World Conference in Greece.

2. Training and Camping and the Meeting of all Races in Guiding

Since 1953 more and more has been done within the Movement about closer contact of one race with another. At first Africans took alternative tests which were suited to their specific needs, and environment, but over the years it has been possible to evolve tests with a sufficient number of alternatives to suit all groups, and today all tests are taken by all groups at the same standard, which is considered to be a high one.

Since 1951 all Commissioners' Conferences have been fully multi-racial. From the time of amalgamation of the two Movements Guider (Officers) Trainings have more and more frequently been multi-racial, until today Trainings for a single racial group are the exception rather than the rule. These are, however, held when specific needs are felt, since it would seem only right to keep a balanced outlook in this matter and not to sacrifice special needs to a desire to always be multi-racial.

In 1954, the first Colony Residential Training was held in the Rhodes Estate Preparatory School Buildings. Unfortunately Federal Government regulations regarding the use of European school buildings by Africans prevented African Guiders from being present as residents. Representatives from Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland were present for the first time also. Since this date, however, by the use of non-Government buildings it has been possible to hold most successful Guider Trainings which are fully multi-racial. As a result of all these Trainings it is now possible for use to be made of Guiders of all races as specialised Trainers. More will be said later regarding the provision of Training facilities.

In 1955 the first Colony Inter-racial Group Camp for Guides was held in the Matopos National Park, and again we were delighted to have Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland Representatives there. At this camp specially picked girls from the four racial groups (with the full permission of their parents) camped together for 8 days. Each group had its own small camp within the whole, and meals were planned separately, mainly because of great differences in diet. Otherwise all activities were joint. Long before the end of the week however, Guides were visiting each other at meal times, and mixing was entirely happy and natural. Several subsequent camps of this nature have been held, and always there are a far greater number of applications from all races than can be catered for. Invitations have been sent to Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, as we are glad that it has been possible for them to send representatives on several occasions, giving our girls the chance of getting to know their northern sisters in the Federation.

In 1956 a Conference was held at Goromonzi African Secondary school at which there were present delegates from 13 Commonwealth countries in and around Africa, namely:—Kenya, Uganda, Tanganyika, Ghana, Nigeria, Sierra Leone, Mauritius, Bechuanaland, Basutoland, South Africa, Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland and Southern Rhodesia.

Fifty-two delegates of all races lived and worked together for two weeks, with the greatest possible happiness and co-operation, and in an atmosphere of deep understanding and fellowship. This atmosphere was to the largest extent created by the presence of 66 Rhodesian Guiders of all races, who in mixed patrols did all the orderly work from scrubbing floors and polishing shoes, to the cooking and laundry requirements of the delegates. It was an inspiring sight to watch the happy working together of all racial groups, and much credit was due to the courtesy and helpfulness shown by the European Guiders who set a fine example of team spirit within the Patrols. No person who was present at that Conference, whether adult or child, will ever forget the experience of being free and happy one with another, whatever one's race. Visits were paid by the Governor-General and the Governor, and each commented on the obviously happy spirit of co-operation and friendship.

In 1957 Southern Rhodesia sent a contingent of 33 Guiders and Guiders to the World Camp in Windsor Great Park. The sum of £6,000 for this venture was raised by the parents and children of the Colony and well-wishers, independent of any public fund, and reflected greatly on the good standing of our organisation in the public mind. This contingent was the fourth largest in the Commonwealth. During the five weeks duration of their stay overseas Southern Rhodesia Guide Headquarters received many favourable comments on the bearing and conduct of our Guiders and also on the fact that they made a very happy and integrated group, wherever they went. Three small camps had been held before their departure to assist in this and it was obviously successful, as every Guide considered herself part of the Rhodesian family, and was conscious of the responsibility of representing her country abroad. Many of these children have since met, and others who have not been able to do so have kept in touch by letter. All except two (one African, one European) have kept on with their Guiding.

3. Inter-Territorial Contacts (within the Federation)

The three Federal Territories met together for the first time at the Goromonzi Conference. Although Southern Rhodesia was the hostess country it was possible to speak from time to time with one voice and also to co-operate in the running of a "Federation Night" where I think most of us felt for the first time, that we could co-operate very happily, whilst recognising certain vital differences and accepting these as not being impossible obstacles to closer co-operation.

In January 1958, a first official meeting between the three Territorial Commissioners was held. It was here decided that whilst it was entirely desirable that each country should be fully informed of happenings in the other territories, it was not considered the appropriate time, nor was it deemed necessary that we should be more formally linked.

Following upon this meeting full contact has been maintained, and there has been much interchange of ideas and knowledge.

In September 1959, the 1st Inter-Territorial Conference was held at Zomba, at which three delegates from each territory were present. At this Conference, a more detailed examination was made of the Policy, Rules and Organisation of the Guide Movement as applied in each Territory, and it was found possible to share much. On the other hand it was unanimously decided that no formal link should yet be attempted.

As a result of this Conference it has been found possible to share Training material, and to work on similar tests.

In January 1960 a Training Conference was held in Lusaka with delegates from all three territories. It is envisaged that meetings such as these will now be held at regular intervals. There has been an interchange of Training material and personnel and this is likely to increase. Invitations have now been issued from the two Northern Territories to Southern Rhodesia for the sending of Guiders and Guides to Trainings in those two Territories. As stated above such invitations have been issued from Southern Rhodesia since 1954 and we are very grateful for the opportunity now for Southern Rhodesia children to get to know something of the life in these other territories in our Federation.

It will be seen that our contacts have been in the vital field of Training, and we all feel that this must be of great benefit to the youth of our three countries, and that there is more possibility of an ultimate link-up if we are all working along the same lines.

We are all unanimous that, in our Organisation, this is the right way to tackle the problem of securing understanding and friendship amongst the young members of our Movement, who live in our three territories but who, as yet, know far too little about each other.

4. Finance

The Southern Rhodesian Guide Association has no assistance from the Government other than an annual grant of £50 from the Native Education Dept., which is exclusively for the use of the African Group. The Native Reserves Trust gives £1,000 per annum, also earmarked for this Group. Our Association maintains a Headquarters building in Salisbury, containing office and shop and has there a full-time Secretary and part-time Assistant Secretary, both paid.

The running expenses of the Association are over £3,000 per annum. These include the salaries above, all travelling expenses of Trainees, bursaries for travelling to Training and Conferences outside the Colony, travelling expenses within their areas and to Conference for all Commissioners, and Executive members.

The Association has been most generously supported in the past by the Beit Trust, but since the decision of that Body in 1956 not to give grants towards recurring expenditure, we have been self-supporting. Funds are raised by public subscription, by assessments on all Districts, which are met largely by individual effort, and by the subscriptions of the children, which range from 5/- for European Guiders to 1/6 for African Guiders.

5. Provision for Training in the Future

(i) The Beit Trust and the Dulverton Trust have generously responded to an appeal for the sum of £5,000 for a Colony Residential Training Headquarters, which is at present in the course of erection on a site leased by the National Parks Board in the Robert McIlwaine Park near Salisbury. Here there will be a large Central Conference Room and kitchen, 2 large dormitory blocks (divided into 4 berth cabins) which will house fifty Trainees, and a Trainers' Cottage.

Here at last we shall be able to hold multi-racial Trainings without restriction as to race or creed. We know that this will fill a very great need, and hope that besides serving ourselves we may serve the larger community of making this Headquarters available for use by other organisations holding similar ideals and principles.

The need was so great that the Southern Rhodesia Guide Executive decided to go on with the plan although we had only half of the £10,000 in hand. The Beit Trust is now considering an application for a further £5,000 to meet this, and we are hopeful that our application will be granted, and so release monies which we are able to raise ourselves towards the continued provision of grants towards Training expenses, without which many Guiders could not afford to come to take part in very necessary Training.

(ii) A start is shortly to be made with the erection of a mountain shack on Trust land in the Inyanga area, from which it is planned to carry out Advanced Leadership Training—on "Outward Bound" lines, (and open to senior Guides and Cadets (16-21) of all races.)

Conclusions

Those of us who have had the privilege of serving our country through this great Movement during the past twenty years and more, are deeply impressed at what it has been possible to achieve during the past 10 years. We know that if we can persevere as we have done in the past, along the road which leads towards a full realisation of what is meant by full citizenship in our country we can help in our small way to make for a happy and contented community. On this basis we feel that there is unlimited hope for the future of one and all in this part of Africa.

But we do not minimize the effort that will be required and know how much training will be needed. We know that we need to begin with the young children and to carry this through until adulthood, and we believe that Guiding provides an excellent medium for this training into a realisation of what full citizenship means and demands from each individual in the country.

We believe that while the pace at which we proceed has increased, yet there is always a need to consolidate; to see opportunities for development and close co-operation, and to seize those opportunities and to use them, in the full knowledge that each step passed brings another challenge in its train.

We realise to the full that in the Guide Movement we are indeed fortunate in that the three organisations of the three territories share the same Promise and Law, and work to the same ideals. This makes everything we do in the way of linking up so much easier than in the Political field. We too, have our difficulties, often caused by the political dissensions, but I think as our Movement is concerned we have overcome these at each stage, because we realise that there are bound to be differences in our way of life, and by the acceptance of these differences yet always seeking some common ground upon which we may build. In addition we always try to find some possibility of practical application of what we believe, without undue publicity which so often takes things out of perspective.

Notes

1. The following figures may be of interest:—

	No. of Commissioners	Total membership
1951	32 (No non-European)	5,239
1959	78 (10 African, 1 Coloured)	13,861

(i) of the total membership just over two-thirds are African

(ii) European membership has increased slightly in the last year.

2. It may be of interest to the Commission that the Northern Rhodesian and Nyasaland Governments make substantial annual grants to the Guide Movement in their territories, in addition to providing full time Guide Trainers and their transport.

In addition the Northern Rhodesian Government has asked the Northern Rhodesia Guide Association to run Leadership Training Courses for which Government assistance is provided! The Southern Rhodesian Government has not so far seen fit to give any financial assistance to our Organisation, nor does it sponsor Leadership Training. We have, however much personal support and assistance from Government officials in particular the National Parks, and Native Affairs Dept.

This lack of financial support has perhaps bred a sturdy spirit of independence, but does nevertheless place a heavy burden upon the rank and file of the Movement, and does hamper development and Training.

The Federal Government gives no financial assistance to any of the three Associations.

Oral Evidence

THE GIRL GUIDES ASSOCIATION—Represented by Mrs. Wynne, Chief Commissioner.

Mrs. Wynne stated that she did not wish to add to the memorandum she had submitted but she responded to a number of questions put by the members of the Commission in these terms.

As far as Guider training was concerned, there were no difficulties at all with the Africans, Europeans and other races joining in on a completely equal basis. There was, however, a difference in the pace of their training. Up to a little while ago, there had been different standards of tests applied, but even these were not on a racial basis. They were merely alternatives. A European or African child could elect to take whichever one she pleased. Since 1958, however, the alternative tests had been completely removed.

Mrs. Wynne said that they had encountered certain difficulties in regard to age because the general rule applying to Guides was that they must leave at the age of 17. This rule had met with considerable dissatisfaction from the African groups in the reserves for the obvious reason that normally the girls there would start their training at a much later age. But even so, it was a flexible rule with a right of appeal, and the movement was sponsoring the senior group in the rural areas. The witness said that so far there had been no sign of competitive (and possibly political) youth groups in Southern Rhodesia and, in consequence, it was only lack of finance that was keeping them back from getting Guiding thoroughly established in the rural areas. Distances were great and this meant there was a considerable call on their purse.

Mrs. Wynne stated that Guiding was definitely reaping rewards. There was no question but that it was inducing a wonderful tolerance and understanding between the different racial groups, and she was pleased to be able to say that they were meeting with no difficulty at all from European parents. The lesson they had learned over the past nine years was that it was important to take each forward step as it came, and to meet it then in order to create a completely happy atmosphere. At no time had there been any looking back. She mentioned incidentally that the Guide movement in the Colony had advisedly avoided any flagrant publicity, and she felt sure that this was something that had helped greatly. All the Guiders mingled and in different parts of the Colony, they were brought in at least once a year for their training.

Mrs. Wynne stated that she had strong views on co-education, and she was not in favour of it. She thought that as between the races it could lead to resentment. On the other hand, she had not the slightest objection to an integration of schools of one sex provided that standards were maintained. She agreed that it was essential for the University to be co-educational and, of course, multi-racial. She thought that multi-racial schools should start at the top with the secondary schools and gradually work down to the primary schools. She did not feel that the question of age was as important now as it was only a few years ago because the African primary schools were now taking children in at a lower age.

On the question of numbers in the Guide movement, Mrs. Wynne said that the preponderance of African Guiders over the Europeans, which was probably about two to one, had nothing whatsoever to do with the fact that the movement had now become multi-racial. Nine years ago—she had given figures for 1951—the proportion was probably less than it is today; but this was only to be expected as the movement was always reaching out further and further into the rural areas and among the Africans. She had found that the difficulty in gaining recruits from European quarters arose almost entirely because of their extra-mural activities such as sports. She repeated that the cause quite definitely was not the result of integration.

Memorandum

CATERING & HOTEL WORKERS' UNION OF SOUTHERN RHODESIA—G. Gatora, Secretary.

We wish to start with the History of Settlement in Southern Rhodesia.

Before we start our evidence we wish to make it clear why we have made up our minds so late. The reason is that a number of Africans have given evidence in Southern Rhodesia and we believe that those who have given evidence may have misled the Commission about this country and why Federation is receiving 100% opposition from Africans. They believe the following history will be the basis of the future of the whole Federal area. Read on the history that bring fears to the Federation and the removal of the Reserve Clauses in the Southern Rhodesia Constitution.

In October 1888, a Concession—the Rudd Concession—was signed by Lobengula, King of the Matabele and Rudd, a Representative of Rhodes and the British South Africa Company. This document has been the subject of academic controversy as far as its legal validity is concerned.

The document as known to us today is written in highly technical language, characteristic of all legal documents of this nature. It is believed that this highly technical document drafted and worded in its entirety by Rudd and his party was interpreted to King Lobengula by Helm, a missionary of the London Missionary Society, in Tswana, a foreign language to both Helm and King Lobengula. Helm's incompetence to express himself properly in this language cannot be doubted, especially in translating such technical language. Lobengula, being a Zulu had undoubtedly little command of Tswana and unable to comprehend the technicalities embodied in this document.

The result of this muddled state of affairs was the placing of the so-called "X" signature (if ever he did) by Lobengula on the document which he did not understand fully. In addition to this semi-fraudulent act by Rudd and his men, it is believed and supported by historians that Lobengula was intoxicated by Cape brandy before he was asked to place that controversial "X" on the document. Under these circumstances the legal validity of this document is suspect.

Taking this document, however, as it is believed to be by the settlers, let us consider its contents. The terms of the Concession included the paying £100 every lunar month, the delivery of 1,000 Martini Henry Breech loading rifles, together with 1,000 rounds of suitable ball cartridge to the royal kraal and the delivering on the Zambezi River a steam boat with guns suitable for defensive purposes, in lieu of which £500 would be paid. The concession was subject to cancellation in the event of the monthly rents being in arrears for a period exceeding three months.

None of the terms of the Concession was ever fulfilled. The King received nothing. This was the first violation of the African's faith by white settlers. The concession was a conditional contract dependent on payment of rent and as the rent was never paid, it extinguished itself.

Even if the rent had been paid, the contents of the document specifically stated that the British South Africa Company would be allowed to exploit the minerals of the country and does not state or imply that the British South Africa Company was to be allowed to possess or occupy the land. It was a mining agreement and nothing else.

After acquiring the document, Rudd returned to South Africa and returned with a regiment, not to mine, but to begin manoeuvres of occupying the country by force. This was the second violation of the Africans' good faith by the settlers and the beginning of all our present misunderstandings.

Rhodes having obtained a charter from Queen Victoria, marched into Southern Rhodesia. On September 12, 1890, two years after the fraudulent Rudd Concession, the white settlers manifested their intentions by hoisting the Union Jack below the Harare Hill. This September 12th is called "Occupation Day" and has been an honoured holiday in Southern Rhodesia since that day. It is not only unintelligible, but disgusting and annoying to see this word "occupation" being used in this sense. There was no war fought or any treaty of occupation negotiated. There was no attempt at invasion; the Africans welcomed them as foreigners seeking for fortune. The white settlers had, however, deceitfully turned a mining concession into an occupation concession.

From September 12, 1890, the settlers consolidated themselves and embarked on the first steps to exploit, suppress and dominate the Africans. The Africans who had looked upon the hoisting of the Union Jack as an insignificant ceremony began to get alarmed by the manoeuvres of the white settlers who wasted no time in putting into practice their iniquitous intentions. Forced labour was introduced and the happy land with its peaceful people entered its first phase of political torment and torture. Thus white rule began to spread in Southern Rhodesia.

The vigorous policy of exploitation resulted in an uprising—the Matabele Rebellion in 1893. This insurrection was suppressed with an iron hand. Guns boomed and thundered, killing hundreds of innocent Africans. The rebellion was subdued by the most atrocious methods. This was the first battle for freedom from the fast-growing yoke of the white friends, now turned ruthless enemies.

After the rebellion, a vigorous native policy was brought into operation. The policy was modelled on the pattern of the Cape Native policy with which Rhodes was only too familiar.

Three years after the first Matabele Rebellion, the second broke out in 1890. The Mashonas, also feeling the pinch of white rule, rose and in that year the whole country was in rebellion. These revolts were crushed mercilessly.

The crushing of these rebellions brought all the Africans under the rule of the settlers. Native policy for the whole Colony was welded and Africans entered the second and still existing phase of subjection and exploitation. Provision was made in the Order-in-Council of 1898 for the appointment of a Secretary of Native Affairs assisted by officers called "native commissioners". We will talk about this department below.

In 1898, the British South Africa Company established a government of settlers only, to govern both black and white. This company government succeeded in doing one thing—the complete subjection of Africans and the total deprivation of their political standing in the land of their birth.

The settlers were not, however, satisfied with a company government tied to Britain's Whitehall. The idea of self-government for the Colony was mooted. It was supported by all the settlers, especially when the question of controlling the Africans from within was viewed. Negotiations were entered into between the settlers and the British Government. Africans were not told, nor were they consulted about what was happening concerning the changeover from Whitehall to Salisbury.

The British Government, thirteen years after their biggest political blunder in Africa—namely the granting of Union constitutional status to South Africa—selling millions of Africans there to the settler boers—decided to grant self-government to the white settlers of Southern Rhodesia. The Africans had no part in the talks leading to this constitutional change. Their opinion was never sounded. neither were they told that their new supreme bosses would be the white settlers.

But Britain, conscious of her obligations towards the Africans here and perhaps aware of the blunder committed in 1910 in South Africa, tried to whitewash her hands by retaining a power of veto on all legislation affecting Africans as a community. We say "tried to whitewash" her guilty hands because she has never used the veto since 1923, despite the fact that sets and regulations of Parliament discriminating against Africans have since 1923 been the chief business of the Southern Rhodesia Parliament.

Although Britain has neglected us and left us to the mercy of the settlers here since 1923, we are of the firm opinion that we are still a protected community of the British Government under the clauses of veto in the Letters Patent of Southern Rhodesia. At the time of self-government in 1923 there was, according to available records, about 935,000 Africans and 35,000 Europeans in the Colony. Despite this, an entirely White Parliament was elected. Africans, having not been allowed to enter this white Parliament became fully convinced that Her Majesty's Government in Britain only meant to grant self-government to Europeans and was to continue protecting the interests of the Africans who were voiceless. We still believe this to be the case today.

Part Two

The Southern Rhodesia White Government since 1923

Let us now examine the white settler's government since 1923. We will look into its policies item by item.

I. Franchise

In 1898 a legislative council with some nominated and elected members was constituted. Every white male person of 21 years of age and over was entitled to register as a voter provided he was a British subject and had taken an oath of allegiance and was permanently resident; could write his name, address and occupation; occupied premises worth £75 or had a bona fide wage of £50 per annum. These qualifications excluded Africans completely. The Africans' disabilities were:

- (i) None could write at that time.
- (ii) Their wages at that time were nothing more than 2/6d. or 5/0d. per month.
- (iii) They had no property as defined by the settlers; their cattle was not taken into account, neither were their huts.

The Africans therefore had no voice, they were entirely in the hands of the white legislators.

In 1914, European women were given the vote. Qualifications were raised to £150 worth of property and £100 per annum, income. Literacy tests were still maintained and although many Africans could write by then, their income was not much beyond 5/- per month.

In 1923, the settlers were given self-government by British and the existing qualifications were retained. This still excluded Africans as, though hundreds could now read and write, their income had not improved.

After the second world war, industries began to expand in Southern Rhodesia. Education also began to make some headway among the Africans. The white settlers saw the threat and to safeguard their position a further alteration had to be made. In 1951, therefore, the property qualifications was raised to £500 and income to £240 per annum. The African wage averaged about 30/- to £10 per month, at that time. In 1954, the African wage in Salisbury and Bulawayo was raised to the minimum of £4 15s. 6d. per month, which is £57 6s. 0d. per annum and £182 14s. 0d. less than the income per year required to qualify as a voter.

In spite of this, the white settlers were not safe, they felt. A few Africans in industry began to get substantial wages and a slight increase in secondary education was noticeable. In 1957, another change was thought necessary. A cunning franchise was devised with a two-roll system—mainly to make the democratic world believe that Africans have a vote in this country. These rolls are known as the "Ordinary" and the "Special" rolls; their qualifications are as follows:

(a) Ordinary Roll Qualifications:

- (i) An income of £720 per annum or ownership of immovable property valued at £1,500 with literacy tests.
- (ii) An income of £480 per annum or ownership of immovable property valued at £1,000 with Std. VI education.

(iii) An income of £300 per annum or ownership of immovable property valued at £00 together with Form IV (Std. 10) education.

(b) Special Roll Qualifications

- (i) An income of £240 per annum with literacy tests as above.
- (ii) An income of £120 per annum and two years secondary education.

(N.B. Special Roll will be closed permanently when voters on it reach 20% of the ordinary voters.)

Let us take the above clauses and see how they exclude Africans from becoming voters.

The Ordinary Roll

1. The statutory wage for Africans in big towns is, at present, £6 10s. 0d. per month and much less in the smaller towns. This is £78 per annum and £642 less than the annual income required for a vote. European wages, on the other hand, are between £50 and £200 per month. No African owns property in urban areas, nor are there many owning property in the Colony as a whole. The urban areas under the Land Apportionment Act belong to Europeans where Africans may not own property.

2. In 1957 there were 7,051 African students in Standard Six. Assuming that they all passed, their wage as teachers would be £6 per month, in industry £6 10s. 0d. and the same in other departments of the civil service. None of them therefore, would qualify for a vote.

3. In 1957 there were 107 African students in Form IV. Assuming that all passed (which, of course, is impossible), as teachers they would earn £15 per month; in industry and other civil service departments it would be between £6 10s. 0d. and £20. Thus their annual income would be £240 at the maximum and fall short of the £300 stipulation.

The Special Roll

1. With a minimum wage rate of £6 10s. 0d. and few in the region of £20 per month, few indeed would qualify under this clause.

2. In 1958, there were about 900 African students doing their two or three years post standard six education. This included teachers, in training, carpenters, builders, nurses, agricultural demonstrators, leather work trainees. As teachers they would earn £9 10s. 0d. per month as males, £7 15s. 0d. as females; as nurses or demonstrators, £8 per month; the few in industry may earn £10 per month. All their annual incomes would fall short of the necessary £10 to qualify for a vote.

If we examine this franchise we will see that the white settlers' aim is to raise the qualification each time Africans appear to qualify in a bigger number. Wages are kept low and education is hampered in order to keep Africans off the voters' roll. Franchise is like a carrot tied to a string by a person who is on top of the tree who keeps pulling it up each time a horse tries to reach it. It is kept dangling in such a manner that the horse never reaches it at all.

The Special Roll, it was feared Africans might flood one of these years and was therefore limited to 20% of the ordinary roll. When the special voters reach this figure the roll must be closed permanently. The people who have been civilised and responsible, cease to be. Civilisation and responsibility are taken as the criteria for a vote, although no one is able to define these two terms without revealing the true colours of the settlers as far as the franchise is concerned. Civilisation and responsibility means in practical terms "Europeanism" and Europeanism is the qualification for a higher wage and ownership of property—the very two requirements for a vote.

This device of keeping the franchise qualifications out of the reach of Africans has made it possible to keep the Southern Rhodesian Parliament all-white since 1923. The white parliament passes laws for whites and blacks and what comes of this cannot surprise anyone as there is no restraint. The result, since 1923, has been the passing of oppressive and discriminatory acts against the Africans.

There are today about 90,000 European voters and less than 2,000 African voters. The voters' roll is publicised to the world as common and non-racial. What hypocrisy this is when Africans do not even form what could be technically called a "minority" on the voters' roll.

The trend in Southern Rhodesia is contrary to democracy. In other democratic countries, the trend is to lower the qualifications until adult suffrage is reached. In Southern Rhodesia, the rule is to raise the qualifications when more and more Africans become conscious of their rights. The reason? To keep power in European hands for ever or the foreseeable future—as white politicians usually call it—a phrase that could mean 1,000 years.

II. Land

Before and a few years after self-government, the Africans could buy and own land anywhere, without discriminatory limitations.

This state of affairs was not the right thing to the settlers and they waited for a time when that freedom could be curtailed and the Africans put in their place.

Soon after the granting of self-government, Britain was no more an obstacle. A Commission was appointed in 1925 to investigate the land conditions of the Colony. This was the all-white Morris Carter Commission. Africans were not represented, nor were they consulted and yet the commission was to investigate the backbone of African economy and the greatest asset of every nation—namely land.

The Commission worked for five years and gave its report in 1930. This report was a shock to the African people. By it, the Commission assigned 30% of the land to about a million Africans and 70% to about 35,000 Europeans. This was a direct violation of human dignity and a true manifestation of the thieving tendencies on the part of the white settlers for land.

The Commission recommended that land should be divided into:

- 1. European areas.
- 2. Native Reserves.
- 3. Native purchase areas.
- 4. Forest areas.
- 5. Unassigned areas and undetermined areas.

Of these five groups, only (2) and (3) belong to Africans. The rest are in theory and practice, European areas. It means, therefore, that what is technically called "crown land" is, in fact, European land.

In the same year, 1930, the recommendations of the Commission were embodied in the iniquitous Land Apportionment Act, the basis and foundation of 90 per cent of the inequalities between Africans and Europeans. In 1941, the all-embracing new Land Apportionment Act was passed. The final assignment of land was then:

Europeans	51,987,000 acres
Africans	41,900,000 acres
Forest areas	3,000,000 acres
Undetermined areas	57,000 acres

As stated above, forest and undetermined areas (which include crown land) are European areas. It means, therefore, that under this arrangement, Europeans have 55,044,000 acres and Africans have only 41,900,000 acres. Most of the latter, into the bargain, is poor land out of the watershed.

The Act made a rigid ruling that in all aspects of life Africans and Europeans should live apart. The Act has been defended on the grounds that it was passed to save the Africans from having all their land taken by Europeans. This is, no doubt, a false statement calculated to hide the true reasons of the presence of the Land Apportionment Act on the Southern Rhodesia Statute Book. Giving Africans 30% of sandy land off the watershed while Europeans got the rich land on the watershed can never be reconciled with these fallacious arguments.

- (a) The Act was passed to deprive the Africans of good land and to subject them to a poor economy.
- (b) The Act has been, and is, continuously declared to be and looked upon as the safeguard of the white man's heritage in Southern Rhodesia.
- (c) Some settlers have even gone to the extent that they would leave the country were the Land Apportionment Act repealed.

The 30% of land given to Africans might have been sufficient at the time, in 1925. The population, however, grew and symptoms of land shortage began to manifest themselves. The government became alarmed at this situation and in the early forties began to think of ways and means of reducing the harmful effects caused by the overcrowding. At the same time, with European immigration increasing (particularly after the last war) the European demand for land also increased.

Two ideas emerged within the government. The first was to de-stock as many cattle as possible in African areas and perhaps add a few acres of arable land. The second was to remove Africans then settled on the so-called crown lands to the then existing reserves or to some undetermined areas. These undetermined areas habitually referred to now as "Native Special Areas" are poor lands which were left without specific allocation by the Land Apportionment Act.

De-stocking was started vigorously about 1948. Thousands of cattle were slaughtered or sold at take-away prices. Opposition mounted among Africans but the government proceeded with this policy. This did not, however, improve the situation and something more drastic had to be done. The African population increased rapidly but the land available remained static.

In 1951, the government introduced the Land Husbandry Act. This Act was passed under the camouflage that the government intended to revolutionise African agriculture. This is what the public and experts on agriculture who visit this country are made to believe. Is this the truth? Certainly not. The Land Husbandry Act was passed in order to depopulate the reserves and leave them with only the people the land could carry.

Under the Act, each person (21 years for males and 25 for females) is entitled to about six acres. The government believes that at the completion of the implementation of the Land Husbandry Act in the 33,793,266 acres which comprise the total of African reserves and special native areas, only 307,000 Africans will get land allocations. The African population is over 3 million, but if we put it at 3 million it means that about 2,793,000 will have no land rights at all. They have to go to the urban areas, mines and farms which are European areas.

We have said something above about Africans being removed from what are called crown lands to undetermined areas styled in the government terminology "Special Native Areas". These special areas are remote places where the conditions of living are very difficult, to say the least. To mention some of them, Gokwe, Beit Bridge, Binga, Matsai and Urungwe would suffice. Most of these areas are dry, hot and infertile. Beit Bridge, for instance, has an average rainfall of 5 to 15 inches per year. Tsetse fly, a dangerous fly to stock and human beings is found in plenty in these areas.

To support our arguments concerning these areas here are quotations:

"In the Sebungwe District in Area C, the fly position worsened during the year and it was feared that there would be a large scale infection of the Lupani District." (Chief Native Commissioner's Report—1950).

"Cattle in the Beit Bridge area maintained fairly good condition until October after which they deteriorated considerably. Some deaths were reported". (Chief Native Commissioner's Report—1958).

"In the Urungwe District, which was evacuated a few years ago, the few donkeys and goats appeared to be in good health. While the position is static there is no indication of when cattle will be permitted to return to the reserve." (Chief Native Commissioner's Report—1955).

"In the Beit Bridge area, it was only possible during the year to move few families from crown land along the banks of the Limpopo River into the adjoining Beit Bridge Special Native area. This area is practically arid and the resettlement must depend on the location of suitable water supplies. Drilling for water has continued during the past but the results have been disappointing. There are many thousands of acres of excellent grazing country not being used solely due to the lack of suitable water supplies." (Chief Native Commissioner's Report—1958).

These are quotations of admission by officials of the Native Affairs Department. In the eyes of non-officials, the situation must be worse than is reported here. There is not sufficient rainfall in most of these areas and bore-holes are to be made. In most of these districts cattle are not allowed due to tsetse fly and as a result people have to use their hands for ploughing—these people had many cattle before they were moved to these areas. They were ordered to slaughter or sell them at give-away prices.

All these people were removed from areas in which they had lived from time immemorial. Their areas were declared crown or European lands without their knowledge, in terms of the Land Apportionment Act and their only notification were eviction orders—force being used if they resisted. For instance, the removal of people from Rosedale to Gokwe in 1952 was conducted with brutal force by the police. Bulldozers were used to destroy the villages of people who had refused to move so that they would have nowhere to live and therefore submit and go to Gokwe.

Since 1949, 82,500 Africans have been moved from the so-called crown lands and 21,500 were removed from the Zambesi Basin to these special areas. It is believed that by 1962, all Africans still living in crown lands or European areas will have been removed to these areas.

The right of Africans to buy farms is limited to a few acres. There are special areas technically termed "Native Purchase Areas." Nevertheless, the government has not seen fit to sell more farms to all those Africans who desire them. Where Africans are given six acres to a person in terms of the vicious Land Husbandry Act, European farmers own thousands of acres most of which lie idle, undeveloped, when Africans are crowded and congested in small areas and are hungry for more land.

III. Urban Areas

Urban areas belong to Europeans and the African is legally a squatter there. With the implementation of the Land Husbandry Act, 2,793,000 Africans will drift to the urban areas where their position will be worse than what it was in the reserves.

It is estimated that there are today 600,000 Africans in urban areas of which about half are believed to be from the Northern Territories, Portuguese East Africa and Angola. This number will, of course, rise rapidly as the Land Husbandry Act begins to show results. A completely urbanised African community with neither a place in the reserves nor in the urban areas will be created.

The Africans are aliens in the urban areas because all towns are European land. As a result the African is subjected to the carrying of passes of all types. He has to carry them wherever he is. Failure to do so is an offence and punishable by a fine or hard labour imprisonment.

The economic position of Africans in urban areas, farms and mines is appalling. On £6 10s. 0d. per month, in big centres like Salisbury and Bulawayo and £2 per month on farms and mines he is supposed to live, feed, clothe and educate his children. Where an African gets £6 10s. 0d., a European gets from £60 to £200 or over, yet they buy the same bread, the same sugar and everything at the same price. In spite of getting as little as he does the African is taxed £2 for poll tax, while a European with an income of several hundreds of pounds goes tax-free. The notion of graded taxation is unknown.

In addition to his low income, the Government sees fit to site African townships ten to fifteen miles out of town. The African has, therefore, to pay bus fares everyday which alone costs him £2 15s. 0d., leaving him only £3 15s. 0d. out of his monthly income to support his family.

A commission set by the Government two years ago, brought out a shocking report on the economic position of the Africans in the urban areas. The Plewman Commission stated that it was impossible to understand how African families were living. The report stated that most African families needed twice their present income and how they were able to live the commissioners submitted they were unable to understand. The Government ignored the Plewman report and shelved it to rot.

This meagre wage has resulted in untold misery. The Urban African's children go naked and malnutrition is mounting day by day. It is a common sight in the urban areas to see African children begging for money and searching for food in the rubbish bins.

The shortage of accommodation is shocking. It has become an acute problem. Africans do not own the houses they live in. The houses belong to the municipalities and they can only live there as long as they are employed. In Harare (in Salisbury), for instance, failure to get employment within three weeks will render a family liable to eviction from the house. It is a common sight to see a family stranded with all belongings outside a house, because the husband has been unable to get employment within three weeks. They are penalised for failure to get employment, yet the rate of unemployment is growing.

When it is argued that Southern Rhodesia is booming economically and that all its people share the wealth of the country, it is not difficult to correct the propaganda and to rightly put it that Southern Rhodesia is booming economically and its European population share the high dividends of the country's wealth.

IV. African Workers' Rights

The criterion for the recognition of the rights of workers is based on the colour of a person's skin. Although Southern Rhodesia, through Britain, is a signatory to the International Labour Convention and has time and time again since the inception of the International Labour Organisation, affirmed and re-affirmed the protection of basic trade union rights, an African worker has no rights at all in this country.

The international agreements say among other things, on the part of the workers, that the "International working man's day shall not exceed eight hours a day; every worker has a right to trade union organisation for the protection of his rights; workers must have the right to technical and commercial education as well as apprenticeship in order to improve their efficiency and skill in their work; they must have a right to independent trade unions without obstruction or direction by laws of the governments to the leadership and policy of such unions; labour laws must be made in co-operation and consultation with labour organisations".

The International Labour Organisation has banned any servile labour as inhuman, brutal and savage and not in keeping with the declaration of the basic human rights.

In Southern Rhodesia, the Government has, by laws and custom, snatched away the internal rights of the African people as workers. Under the Master and Servants' Act the African worker is at the disposal and mercy of the Europeans. He is by law, not allowed to withdraw his labour if he deems that his employer is ill-treating him or that his employer is exploiting his sweat and strength without giving him adequate remuneration. If he strikes, he is charged in courts as a criminal. So whether he is satisfied with his work or not, he is legally coerced to continue rendering his services at his family's ruin. Many farm, domestic and mine workers have been prosecuted for daring to assert their rights.

In these occupations the African works anything up to 14 hours a day. This deliberate disregard of the labour conventions has the blessing of the Southern Rhodesia Government. All European workers have the right to organisation in trade unions so that their rights are safeguarded. European workers have unfettered rights to technical education, commercial and apprenticeship training after Standard VII, but Africans can only have commercial training after Form IV (Standard 10) education. There is only one commercial school to cater for all the three million Africans.

Parliament has at last passed the Apprenticeship Act, but since the Government does not consult with African labour leaders the Act will have no practical advantage to the Africans as the body appointed to effect this act is dominated by Europeans. Africans are thus compelled, as workers, to be under the control of the white workers.

By an Act of Parliament the recognition of trade unions is titled more to the advantage of the European workers, and not to all workers in the country. Under the 1959 Industrial Conciliation Act, it is recognised that all unions which were registered under the former Industrial Conciliation Act (which then excluded Africans) are automatically registered under the 1959 Act. Further, by an Act the Government has determined who shall lead the unions. It is specifically stated in the Act that the leadership of the unions should be in the hands of civilised people. By civilised people, as we have stated above, is meant Europeans. In order to see that this is achieved, the Minister is given power in the Act to determine the voting system where Europeans are likely to be outnumbered by Africans. Several Africans will be equivalent to one European when casting votes.

In all, it means that the African worker is virtually destitute of any rights as a worker.

V. Civil Service

When you talk of civil servants in Southern Rhodesia, you talk only of Europeans. Africans are not civil servants but Government labourers. The definition of civil servant in Southern Rhodesia excludes an African employed in the civil service, although in order to muzzle them from taking part in the political activities in the country, they are theoretically defined as such, while in fact they are not.

The civil service posts, except as clerk in the Native Affairs Department, a messenger in Government offices and a helping hand where possible are shut to the African. The Government is not at all prepared to advance Africans. A motion introduced in the Southern Rhodesia House a year ago, calling upon the Government to advance Africans in the civil service was accepted and passed for reasons, that seem now, to have been for propagandist purposes. No one believes that it will be implemented immediately. It appears that it will be kept as such, as the Government can now show its critics that it has accepted the principle of African advancement in the civil service.

Where Africans do equal work with their European counterparts, the African's wage is in great disparity with that of the European. For an illustration, let us take the British South Africa Police force. In this department, Africans outnumber Europeans greatly and do more work than Europeans. An African constable, however, starts at a wage of about £8 and rises to £30 when he attains the rank of first-class sergeant. This is the maximum he can ever achieve. A European constable starts at about £40 plus allowances, whereas the African starting wage of £8, excludes any such allowances.

The treatment of the two constables—European and African—is beyond what can be called normal disparity. An African with twenty or more years service is still lower in rank to a European constable with three months service. He gets orders from him and is more of a messenger to carry orders to his other African constables. It takes an African constable twenty-five years or more to earn and wear a belt used by European constables as soon as they finish training.

Their uniform is different, their treatment is different, their arresting powers are also different. The European constable can arrest Africans and Europeans. An African constable can only arrest an African. He cannot arrest a European, let alone handcuff him. He can only report an incident to a white constable who may effect the arrest.

This is really shameful colour bar practice, yet it is the pattern in the Southern Rhodesia civil service. African advancement is suppressed. The Government would rather import workers from overseas than employ local Africans despite the fact that Africans here hold educational qualifications and experience suitable to fill such posts.

VI. Education

The history of African Education in this country can be credited to the missionaries rather than to the Government. Despite claims by the Government that African education is advancing rapidly and that Southern Rhodesia has the largest percentage of school-going children in Africa, African education is truly lagging behind. In some cases, the lagging is deliberate in order to hamper African advancement, and thereby protect the voters' roll from being swamped by Africans.

The following statistical data will help to illustrate our argument:

Children in School		1947	1957
Sub. A	...	81,821	124,954
Sub. B	...	44,813	91,283
Std. I	...	31,260	69,391
Std. II	...	19,693	48,851
Std. III	...	13,513	38,495
Std. IV	...	7,109	15,926
Std. V	...	3,952	11,576
Std. VI	...	2,211	7,051
Form I	...	618	3,216
Form II	...	428	1,889
Form III	...	19	894
Form IV	...	—	107
Form V	...	—	69
Form VI	...	—	13

Although these figures may show an increase of children in Sub. A—that is from 81,821 to 124,954, it will be easily noticed that of the children who were in the Sub. A in 1947, far less than half got as far as Standard III (a five year education), only one ninth reached Standard VI (eight years' education) and only about one fortieth reached Form V (which includes all post-Standard VI course), only thirteen were in Form VI, and not more than half passed. As Form VI is the minimum entrance qualification to enter the University College of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, this gives an average of not more than two or three students entering the college every year.

The decreasing of the number of children as they go up from Sub. A is not at all the fault of the children. Most of the children fail to a place, especially after they have passed Standard III. Again after they have passed Standard VI there are not sufficient schools for them to pursue their secondary education. There are only eighteen secondary schools catering for 107 central primary schools. The 107 primary schools cater for 2,470 lower primary schools.

The development of the African is geared to "five year plans" etc. and the development, regardless of the conditions, cannot allow the erection of unplanned schools. For instance, in the last Five Year Education Plan ending this year, 1960, thirty upper primary schools were apportioned each year for the whole country. This made it impossible even for those Africans who could manage the building of a school in their area. No permission would be given to run such a school.

Under the new Act—the Native Education Act—coming into operation this year, no school may be built without the approval of the Director of Native Education. The Director has power to refuse on reasons known only to himself and the final court of appeal for such a refusal is the Minister of Education. This ruling is not based on the desire for efficiency in schools, but on fear that Africans would build schools for their children, thereby accelerating African education. It is surprising to hear the Government say that there are not enough schools, yet on the other hand, the Government forbids Africans to build their own schools.

To make matters worse, the Government introduced an age limit in 1955. An age limit, without compulsory education is undoubtedly a fantastic scheme. In spite of the fact that education is not compulsory and schools are few, the Government saw fit to regulate that no children should be admitted into Standard IV when they have reached their fifteenth birthday and no child admitted to Form I after the sixteenth birthday. The scarcity of schools makes children start school late or miss one year and thus, they only find their future blocked.

The reasons for this lagging behind of education have been attributed to lack of money. This argument is most plausible. The problem does not exist at all among European children who are far more expensive to maintain at school than African children.

This argument is really lame. Africans in the rural areas build schools for their children without remuneration. The Government and the missionary superintendents come only to supervise the school and provide teachers. Admitting this shortage, the Government saw fit to debar untrained teachers from the teaching field. The Government, at the moment, has only one teacher training school. Together with those produced by missionary schools, they are too few for the growing population and as a result thousands of children go without school.

VII. Justice

Equality before the law of the land is the first and the main spring of the Rule of Law and Justice. In multi-racial countries like Southern Rhodesia, the notion of equality before the law is a very important safeguard to justice and to law and order.

However, this is not the case, by far, in Southern Rhodesia. In procedural law the African has not the facilities available to Europeans. In criminal cases where a jury panel of eight or twelve reasonable people should be employed so as to give a justic vonetion, the African is given two assessors. The qualifications for these assessors are:

1. He must have been a Native Commissioner;
2. Or must have been an employee of the Native Affairs Department in a capacity dealing much with Africans.

Native Commissioners have claimed to be authorities on African habits, customs, etc. The result is that before they enter the court they carry with them their preconceived ideas. Evidence to them becomes immaterial. They must construe every word said by the accused in the light of their claimed knowledge of African habits.

VIII. Freedom of Speech and Association

Freedom of speech, association and property, the trichotomous liberty of the British people has two of its fundamentals (speech and association) whittled in Southern Rhodesia. Totalitarianism, oppression and intimidation have superseded the cherished liberty and democracy believed to be the traditional uniqueness of the British people.

The African in Southern Rhodesia has become muzzled. He is unable to speak for his rights, neither is he allowed to defend them. He can only speak if he is a member of the United Federal Party, the Dominion Party, the Central Africa Party or any other European parties. The qualification to speak without getting into trouble is to support Government policy or white supremacy, which in general, is always camouflaged under the so-called partnership. This has made Africans who are not in the Government cap or European parties, victims of all suppression, intimidation and arrest. (See below Preventive Detention Act).

Direct and active suppression of all opposition from the Africans against the white settler Government started in the 1950's.

(a) Subversive Activities Act

In 1950 as signs of African nationalism became apparent, the Government passed the Subversive Activities Act. This Act was for the prohibition and suppression of subversive propaganda, namely communism, fascism or otherwise and of riotous and other undesirable assemblies and the dispersal thereof; for the prohibition of persons from attending public gatherings in certain circumstances; for the prohibition of the printing, publication, importation or dissemination of documentary information which may engender feelings of hostility between certain sections of the community or which contains subversive propaganda; for the control of movements of persons who promote feelings of hostility between certain sections of the community or spread subversive propaganda; for the deportation of certain persons under this Act.

It needs no serious analysis to detect for whom this Act is primarily made. Its first application was on Africans. They were deported, suppressed and intimidated under the Government's ill-conceived and ill-defined "subversive propaganda". Well over a score of Africans from Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia have been victims of this flagrant Act.

(b) Public Order Act

In 1954, Africans peacefully went on strike at the Wankie Colliery. The Government without any justified reasons declared a state of emergency, sent armed forces, and used tear gas. There was no valid cause at all to use armed forces there. It was, however, the first direct and serious intimidation and suppression of Africans' free expression of their dissatisfaction.

After this strike the Government was not satisfied with its powers under the said Act, and a new sweeping Act—the Public Order Act—was passed in 1955. Although the Government argued that the Act would affect all races, the like soon manifested itself when the Southern Rhodesia African National Congress came into being. Congress leaders were maliciously prosecuted for nothing more than justified criticism of Government policy—the kind of criticism any person is entitled to air against the Government in any country where democracy is respected.

From April to December, 1958, about sixty prosecutions against Congress leaders and members were made. These prosecutions were all based on sentences as these:

"The settlers got themselves better and fertile lands under the Land Apportionment Act; the Africans were moved to areas that are dry; There is no democracy in this country. The settlers' government is oppressing the Africans but we shall continue to fight for our rights in the land of our birth. Native Commissioners compel people to work on roads, fill dip tanks, without any remuneration in a manner that is against the law; we are discriminated against like dogs; it is obvious that the white settlers hate us."

Utterances of this nature were construed as subversive, inciting and hostile to the Government. Cases were therefore composed of wanting to overthrow the established Government. European politicians are, however, at liberty to say anything against Africans. Their language does not cause hostility at all. One politician declared: "To say an African is equal to a European is just as foolish as saying that a hyena is equal to a horse". Another said: "Africans are barbarians". A notable and veteran politician of the Federation—"Africans are all liars." The Federal Prime Minister has time and again declared that the Central African white settlers will stage a Boston Tea Party if they do not get dominion status here. This is a direct challenge to overthrow British established authority in Central Africa. No Congress man ever said words as irresponsible and subversive as these, yet they were the ones to be prosecuted and jailed. To say Europeans are exploiting Africans is a crime punishable by imprisonment and detention. But to say Africans are liars, Africans are all barbarians, Africans are baboons, etc., is accepted by the Public Order Act as long as the Europeans say it.

(c) Security Branch

With the coming into being of African nationalism, a branch of the C.I.D. known as the Security Branch was constituted. This branch is staffed by Africans and Europeans but only African members are sent to cover meetings of the African political and trade union organisations.

These Africans have either passed Standard II, III or IV. A handful has Standard VI as the highest qualification. With this low standard of education, these poor fellows are supposed to report proceedings and speeches at political meetings. They do not know shorthand and have to use long hand when taking notes. Mass meetings are usually conducted in vernacular languages and they are supposed to translate speeches made in the vernacular into English as the speaker delivers his speech. This is hard even for a well-educated man. If so, how much more for a Standard III detective! His own normal speech in English is unintelligible, nothing more need therefore be said about his translation.

The result is that these men take down bits of opinion of the speech in their own broken English, inserting their own terms and wrongly spelt words. Where the speaker has said, for instance: "discontent has caused bloodshed in other countries but we do not want bloodshed here", the poor security man will only be able to grasp the words "bloodshed here".

When he goes back to the office, the European security officer whose job is to edit the reports takes the notebook. He then comes across those words "bloodshed here". This is good for security. He then consults the African security man and then the words thus: "If the Government will not listen to our grievances, there will be bloodshed here soon". When all the report is properly edited from these bits the African security man is made to sign it. A case is then composed with reference to the relevant section of the Public Order Act and the speaker is charged and brought to court, prosecuted and convicted for inciting people to violence.

That the reports are edited by Europeans and that Africans are then made to sign them has been admitted by the police authorities. The way in which these Africans usually break in courts is a true manifestation of the fact that they testify what they never wrote or heard. They have only a rehearsal knowledge concerning the charge.

This is what is called security in Southern Rhodesia and it is this type of information that the Government relies on and has relied on in landing all African leaders in detention.

The Government also employs civilian informers who are paid very high salaries.

The Beadle Report had this to say about security men:

"The bulk of this type of evidence led by the Minister, consisted of the evidence of African security details of the British South Africa Police, who testified to statements made at public meetings by various individual detainees. The accuracy of this evidence was usually contested by the detainees concerned.

"The standard of education of the average security detail was not high. The great majority had been educated to Standard Six and a few beyond. Their knowledge of English also, for the most part, though good enough to enable them to give evidence without the aid of an interpreter could not be classed as really good. They all, however, impressed the Tribunal as honest witnesses." (Beadle Report—Page 3, Pars. 3 and 4).

(d) Meetings

African freedom of association is controlled in urban areas by location superintendents who are always in touch with the security department. Superintendents can refuse an organisation a permit to hold a meeting. The existence of an organisation is therefore dependent on the wishes of the location superintendent. From May, 1958, because African workers who had no accommodation in the location, organised a procession to the offices of the Native Administration Department in Salisbury under the auspices and support of the Trades Union Congress, the T.U.C. was banned from holding meetings in Harare African Township.

The freedom of workers to meet and discuss their grievances is of fundamental importance in every country. In Southern Rhodesia they are denied the right to do so. Trade union leaders have been prosecuted for disputes with employers which are purely industrial and are for the furtherance of trade unionism. Today some are languishing in detention for nothing else than their legitimate trade union activities.

At all meetings of African organisations scores of policemen and security men are sent to report. Informers are also detailed to report. At one meeting, policemen outnumbered members of an inter-township committee which was meeting to consider the situation of bus transport in the townships concerned.

In addition to reports at meetings, informers and policemen are detailed to report anything they hear anywhere—at parties, sports meetings, beerhalls, etc. It is difficult to say anything critical of the Government anywhere in Southern Rhodesia today, for there are informers everywhere who are paid large sums of money. As their payment is determined by what they bring, informers do not waste time in looking for stories. They sit down, compose a story and take it to the security department. A typical example of such a brewed story can be read on Page 23 of the Review Tribunal Report:

“An excerpt from the evidence of a secret witness who was considered to be reliable illustrates this well. This witness stated that a Congress leader told him this:

“Referring to the events in Nyasaland he (the Congress leader) said that the Government is very stupid indeed by sending all the soldiers to Nyasaland which is only one part of the Federation. He then went on to say that we are waiting for the President to come back. If he had come back we would have started another trouble this end, and we would see how the Government would distribute its soldiers.

This trouble in Nyasaland is not the only trouble because we are waiting for the president, Mr. Nkomo to return from where he is at present (when he comes back he will from a point in the bush press a button which will start everything).

Before we do anything this year we would like to see that we are heavily financed from outside countries as our donations. If Mr. Nkomo returns we are okay and the government had had it thick. We are going to start the trouble from one place to the other, one at a time so that when the Government send soldiers to Northern Rhodesia there is another one in Nyasaland, an automatically one again in Southern Rhodesia in Salisbury, then another at Bulawayo, then Umtali, Fort Victoria and in all reserves and when all places are making trouble we can then see how the government is going to deal with it.

While the government is busy distributing its troops all over the country, we can then occupy some government offices and buildings in Salisbury, Umtali and Bulawayo and so on, and thus taking the government into our own hands.

Every person will be making trouble so much that the Europeans will run away from their buildings and then we can occupy them. All the men will hold the positions while our women will do the protesting to the government that we want our country back. These events will be done systematically and methodically and yet fully organised and we will win our country back from these white savages. When Nkomo comes back our people will have to buy enough food to last a long time during the strike. All of us will then decide to die at that time and the Europeans can do what they like with their guns on us.”

After the above story the tribunal added this:

“These are not the exact words of this witness but they represent the gist of what he said and illustrate the way in which Congress leaders were thinking and talking.”

This, is no doubt, a fantastic story and it is not conceivable that a leader of a political organisation can so lavishly state the strategy of his organisation to anybody, not even to his followers. The man, of course, got a fat cheque for this fantastic brewed story.

This is the AVO system employed in this country today. All freedom is now extinguished. Only those Africans who support the Government or European parties have the freedom to talk—about things in support of the Government or white supremacy in general.

(e) State of Emergency

The growth of Congress and its exposition of iniquitous practices of the government and the Native Affairs Department which in the rural areas exploit and oppress Africans through the rule of native commissioners, who use statutory powers wrongly, began to disturb the Government, especially the Native Affairs Department.

The government felt that something ought to be done about Congress. Nothing else other than banning the organisation could serve the purpose. But it was not easy to simply ban an organisation. Some reasons had to be found to accuse Congress. Final touches were, however, being put to plans. Congress continued to grow and became the largest political organisation in the country. This disturbed the government. Congress continued to expose the injustices of the government, lawfully and constitutionally. The government was, however, eager to see Congress becoming lawless so that they could ban it. In this they failed absolutely.

Early in February, a rumour which, no doubt, must have started in government circles was made to circulate to the effect that Congress would be calling a country-wide strike of African workers on February 13th. This rumour caused general alarm through the country. Europeans bought guns indiscriminately and one gunsmith reported that his stocks had run out. Regulations controlling firearms were relaxed to enable Europeans to arm themselves in general against Africans.

Congress and T.U.C. leaders refuted the rumour and urged people to go to work as no strike had been contemplated by them at any time. The strike failed and the government was in a mess. Something had to be done to ban Congress, yet opportunities were not forthcoming, because Congress continued to work within the law.

Heaven-sent fortune came when sporadic rioting was reported in Nyasaland. To make things better for the government a peaceful strike of workers broke out at Kariba. The African National Congress was not connected with it in any way. Nevertheless, it gave a chance, despite the fact that Section 24 of the Public Order Act only justifies the declaration of a state of emergency in this colony when there is internal trouble and not external danger. The government seized the chance and the Governor was requested to declare a state of emergency in Southern Rhodesia on Thursday, 26th February.

No state of emergency ever existed in Southern Rhodesia as there was no trouble forthcoming or impending. The declaration was a way to stamp out Congress, arrest all its leaders and imprison them. This is fully illustrated by the following quotation:

“Many weeks of planning have gone into this operation which is in progress at the present time. The Federal Government were informed of our intentions about three weeks ago and gave their unstinted approval and their most generous support with all the forces they had available. The closest co-ordination has been built up, not merely between the two governments but between the respective security forces.” (Sir Edgar Whitehead’s statement to the House on the 26th February, 1959).

It needs no further elaboration after reading this quotation to see that the declaration of the state of emergency, was a pre-conceived plan which had nothing to do with the imminent danger to forces of law and order in the country. The situation in Nyasaland had nothing to do with the Southern Rhodesia Government.

(f) Preventive Detention Act, 1959

After the declaration of the state of emergency, the Southern Rhodesia Government introduced one of the most iniquitous bills ever heard of in the tradition of British justice. There was no doubt that the so-called security bills were drafted months before the emergency, as it took the Government only a few days to present before the House these all-embracing bills.

Protests were made mostly by Europeans as Africans were then liable to prosecution under emergency regulations. The Government, however, ignored all these protests and passed the bill. In their effort to justify these measures, the Government quoted instances such as the Regulation 18B of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939 in Britain. This was, however, a war measure and cannot be compared with measures designed to suppress the opposition in peace time. The whole world that respects justice and the fundamentals of “innocence until found guilty”; “no imprisonment without trial”, was no doubt, shocked.

The Preventive Detention Act created a tribunal designed on the pattern of gestapo methods, following no recognised rules of evidence and sitting in a closed court with sealed windows and a strong guard outside. It was a mockery of justice to say the least.

With lies forming the grounds of our detention, we stood before this pseudo-court to have our cases reviewed. Since the Tribunal was merely to review cases, the decision of “guilty or innocent” lies with the Minister of Justice who is both our accuser as well as our judge—a rule which is repugnant to natural justice.

As a result the Minister only discharged three people unconditionally, detained some and rusticated others to Gokwe now commonly called “Central African Siberian Concentration Camp”.

To say that the Beadle Tribunal was instituted to review cases is a political lie. The truth is that the Beadle Tribunal was a sort of Commission constituted to get evidence concerning the grievances of the people from Congress people. This they did and it needs not investigating to know that the Tribunal submitted to the government a full and factual report of what actually Congress stood for, the grievances of the people and the maladministration of the Native Affairs Department in the rural areas.

This was revealed indirectly by the Prime Minister when he said: “The immediate task of the Government would be to remove all African grievances in the rural areas so that when agitators are again out, they will have no leg to stand on”. It knows that therefore there were grievances and that Congress was manifesting these grievances. How then can the two statements “Congress was inciting happy and peace-loving masses” and “my government would take immediate steps to remove grievances” be reconciled? The report of the Beadle Tribunal was a direct verdict rather than a finding. The Devlin Commission which investigated the causes of disturbances in Nyasaland produced a report which inflamed and infuriated the Central African governments. It would appear that the Beadle Tribunal was directed to challenge the findings of the Devlin Commission. The Ridley Report in Northern Rhodesia was equally directed.

However, despite our innocence, we are intended to languish here for five years for no reason other than we were exposing the government's injustices and discriminatory policies. The government has no case against the Congress leaders now imprisoned. If there were a case the government would not have hesitated to bring us before the courts of law.

(g) The Unlawful Organisations Act

Freedom of speech and assembly among Africans has been whittled and finally suppressed. The Unlawful Organisations' Act, an Act designed to stamp out anything like an African organisation as the second of the security bills. The Act in its present form will make it impossible for any African political organisation to live long in Southern Rhodesia.

IX. The Native Affairs Department

We have spoken about the Southern Rhodesia Government in whole but the story of Southern Rhodesia would never be intelligible without examining the Native Affairs Department.

The history of the Native Affairs Department dates back to 1898 when an Order-in-Council of the British Government made provision for the administration of Africans in the country. A secretary of Native Affairs was thereupon appointed, with officers serving under him to be known as Native Commissioners. Since that year the African has undergone untold suffering under the various native commissioners stationed all over the country. The staff of this department appear to be selected for their stern attitude towards the Africans.

The Africans rightly regard this institution to be at the bottom of their troubles and sufferings. It has grown to be a monstrous political oppressive institution—a political octopus with tentacles in the political, social and economic life of the African people; mercilessly directing influence to retard and arrest African progress. It is a vicious political institution opposed to African advancement. It is significant that since 1898, this department has seen fit and proper not to advance any African to a position of responsibility in the Native Affairs Department. To this day, after its 62 years of reign, not a single African has ever qualified to be a Native Commissioner in Southern Rhodesia.

The political purposes of the Native Affairs Department have never failed to peep out for all to see. Whenever an African organisation, or a non-racial organisation was formed to foster Africans political or social aspirations, or to bridge the discriminatory gaps between Europeans and Africans, the Native Affairs Department has always been directed to subvert and discourage the work of such organisations by employing such cunning, false statements as this:

"It is quite true to say that at one time persons who interested themselves in Native welfare were apt to be regarded as negrophilists but today there is a large body of Europeans who give freely and voluntarily a great deal of their time to this work and it would be heartening to see from the Native people a great appreciation and response for what is done to alleviate distress and to promote good works among them. With very few exceptions the more enlightened members of their race who have progressed materially hold themselves generally conspicuously aloof from giving tangible or energetic contributions towards the welfare of less fortunate members of their community. They, however, usually apply themselves quite vigorously to the type of political organisation which is forever finding fault with the efforts of the government on their behalf."

On the same page in the last paragraph the Secretary for Native Affairs concluded by saying:

"Aid societies of various names and description ostensibly insinuated to encourage mutual help amongst clans, tribes or communities, are legion, but in all instances they fade out as rapidly as they are formed usually with a complete disappearance of the chairmen, treasurer and subscriptions." (Both quotations are from the Report of the Secretary of Native Affairs, 1955, page 12).

This statement apart from its general falsehood is no doubt, a deliberate insinuation directed against African organisations that refuse to be under the influence of the Native Affairs Department, hence the department assassinates their character, it would be very interesting were the Native Affairs Department to reveal the number of people accused of misappropriation of public funds in organisations and Government departments in the Colony since 1898, including employees and officials of the department.

Maladministration is characteristic of all native commissioners. Unstatutory powers are employed to exploit the Africans. Among the most misused powers, brought to notice of the Congress at the time it began to spread in the reserves were:

1. People were made to work on roads and fill dip-tanks for several days without remuneration.
2. People spent days at the Native Commissioner's Office without attention being paid to them, whenever they went there with complaints or to pay poll tax.
3. Headmen entrusted with unremunerated responsibility of collecting poll tax, travelled to and from the Native Commissioner's office at their own expense. Where a person of the village was absent and working in the urban areas, the headmen were compelled to find him and collect the £2 tax from him. The headman had to make these journeys at their own expense and without any remuneration.
4. Native Commissioners interpreted Government statutes in their own way, suitable for their stern attitude. For example, at Sipolilo, Weya and in several other districts, Native Commissioners issued grazing permits in a manner contrary to the Act. Thirty people were charged for disobeying their orders in terms of these Acts and 22 were convicted by a magistrate. All the 22, subsequently on appeal had their cases upheld. It was found that Native Commissioners had acted contrary to the requirements of the Native Land Husbandry Act.
5. Instead of being administrators tendering advice to the people they have become a terror to the people and no African would dare go to see them if he could avoid it.

These and numerous hardships which Africans suffer are the works of the Native Affairs Department.

It is not a secret that the officials of the Native Affairs Department loathe the educated and enlightened Africans. They regard these Africans as a threat to their present position of inflated and artificial dignity and to their maintenance of discipline. The Native Commissioners think and act as if they have all the answers on matters concerning the Africans and on the relations between black and white.

The following extract from the report of the Secretary for Native Affairs presented to Parliament in 1953 will suffice to show the ruling mentality of officials of the Native Affairs Department. Commenting on Native education, on page 6, paragraphs 10-16, the Secretary had this to say:

"While on the subject of kraal schools—and I am afraid, somewhat in contradiction of my praise of missionary teachers—I feel I must draw attention to the structures passed by some Native Commissioners on the behaviour of both pupils and teachers. Three quotations will suffice: 'The teacher training work is being developed along lines calculated to impress the teacher with the need of influence in the community as well as in the classroom, but the gulf between theory and practice is as wide as the poles. The lack of discipline and respect shown to others, by both pupils and teachers, past and present, is appalling. In respect of our schools, however, there is still evidence of laxity and incompetence. there is a lack of discipline and organisation is poor. Still more appalling is the average kraal-school pupil's bad behaviour and lack of respect for his elders, both black and white. Their sullen resentment to discipline and authority grows more apparent every year. It may suit the negrophilist, but is of little to help to the general good of a state with a mixed population.'"

The Secretary of Native Affairs then comments:

"I regret to have to draw special attention to this subject but I consider it of major importance. Those three quotations are culled from the reports of three Native Commissioners in widely placed districts and are only examples. I have had occasion, both in my annual reports and in broadcast and press messages to the Africans, to comment on bad behaviour and manners. The old African was a model of good behaviour; family and parental control was strict and familiarity or 'cheek' was unknown.

"May I appeal to All European school superintendents and to all African teachers to remember this and to inculcate once again the virtues of respect, of obedience and good manners. It is not a sign of weakness; it is not 'infra dig' to be polite to one's elders and betters and far more harm than good can be done by well-meaning teachers of both races who are apt to teach that all men are equal!"

It is not necessary for us to point out in detail the causes of alarm on the part of these Native Commissioners and the Secretary for Native Affairs. It is only correct to say that the kind of respect and good manners they require from Africans is a kind of apologetic attitude on the part of the Africans to white officials and to white people in general. Hence reference to "older Africans in the past". Africans are a model of good manners among themselves and among any other people. But when respect is demanded and expected as a right by people who have no respect for others such as the Native Affairs officials, it is only natural for Africans to withdraw their respect for such people.

It was revealed during the Todd crisis when the Cabinet of Mr.

Garfield Todd rebelled against in January, 1958, that one of the causes of this disagreement between him and his Cabinet was the desire on the part of Mr. Todd to abolish the Native Affairs Department on the grounds that this institution was no longer in keeping with the march of time and that it no longer served a useful purpose other than a discriminatory and oppressive chamber for Africans.

We sincerely endorse Mr. Todd's attitude that the Native Affairs Department should be abolished.

X. Discrimination

Since 1953, when the so-called partnership policy began to be vigorously pronounced as the policy of the government of this country, we have seen nothing to this day capable of inducing us to believe that racial discrimination will come to an end. The colour bar is as rife as it was before 1953, if not worse, today. Notice boards bearing "Natives Only", "Europeans Only" are everywhere. The African is as much a victim of discrimination as he was ten years ago.

The government has tried to advance a lame argument that it cannot legislate for social integration. To shield their approval of the colour bar by contending that the electorate would not accept it is a political lie. It is the government, not the voters who are the promoters of colour bar in Southern Rhodesia. No incident ever took place when post offices were made free for all for the first time. If the post office colour bar was peacefully broken down, no reasonable person would think that there would be hostilities in other fields.

For publicity purposes, the government amended the Land Apportionment Act so as to allow hotels to be multi-racial. Unwilling to see that happen, the government put a provision in their amendment that no hotel would be forced to become multi-racial but that they would have to apply. As a result of this provision no hotel has yet applied, but the government uses the amendment as propaganda for partnership. They have no serious intention to see that hotels and restaurants turn multi-racial.

For Southern Rhodesia to tell the world that it is different from South Africa is to us, political deceit. Apart from the fact that Southern Rhodesia chose to call her apartheid by the name "partnership" and South Africa called hers "apartheid" without disguise, there is no other difference. Many writers have stated that Southern Rhodesia to a great extent is worse than South Africa in many ways. John Gunther, an authoritative American writer, in his book, Inside Africa, states that in certain corners colour bar is more ruthlessly pronounced in Southern Rhodesia than in South Africa. A few comparisons will suffice:

Southern Rhodesia	South Africa
1. Land Apportionment Act.	1. Land Act and Group Areas Act.
2. Job reservation.	2. Job reservation.
3. Social-segregation.	3. No social integration.
4. Immorality Act.	4. Immorality Act.
5. Subversive Activities Act.	5. Suppression of Communism Act.
6. Proscribed organisations (Unlawful organisations Act).	6. Bans leaders from attending meetings.
7. Imprisons African leaders without trial	7. Brings leaders to open trial (treason trial).
8. Africans buying through windows at several shops.	8. Africans buying through windows at several shops.
9. No Africans in Parliament.	9. No Africans in Parliament.
10. Native Education Act.	10. Bantu Education Act.
11. Deposes Chiefs for political reasons (recent deposition: Chief Mangwende).	11. Deposes Chiefs for political reasons (Chief Luthuli).
12. Refuses passports to African leaders.	12. Refuses passports to African leaders.
13. Passes Act (Africans only), etc., etc., etc.	13. Passes Act (Africans only), etc., etc., etc.

We can draw a very long list to show that similarity of the government's activities in Southern Rhodesia and those in South Africa, all aimed at the suppression of African freedom. The only difference, if there is really any, is that South Africa is a naked wolf while Southern Rhodesia is a wolf in sheep's skin. As we have already pointed out, these countries have gone a long way to becoming police states.

It is the white settlers in Southern Rhodesia who have caused all the tumult existing in Central Africa today. Federation was imposed on the Africans in Central Africa at the instigation of the Southern Rhodesia white settlers. The aim behind the federal set-up was to hinder Africans in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland attaining independence.

Thus the partnership policy was no less than a hoax by Lord Malvern, who desired to form a great Central Africa under the domination of white settlers. When Lord Malvern was once forced to define partnership, he had this to say. "That it was the relationship between the rider and the horse". That is exactly what it means in this country. The African is the horse and the white settler is the rider.

We reject Federation, because it was designed to entrench white supremacy in Central Africa.

Salisbury

Oral Evidence

THE CATERING AND HOTEL WORKERS UNION OF SOUTHERN RHODESIA—Represented by G. Gotora.

Mr. Gotora said that for the last two years he had been employed as the full-time General Organising Secretary of the Union which had a membership of 2,000 in Southern Rhodesia. He was born in Mrewa, Southern Rhodesia, but he had not lived in either of the Northern Territories—he had only travelled through them from time to time.

Elaborating on his memorandum, he said that he and his Union set great store on a franchise based on the ideal of one man, one vote, because this was the position in the United Kingdom. He said that with a franchise thus based, the voting strength of the African would only be approximately the same as that of the European because there were millions of Africans who, even if registered, would not take the trouble to vote. Another reason why he wanted no qualifications for franchise was that the monetary qualifications were quite useless in this country because the African was far too poorly paid. Indeed, the Government, in their anxiety to prevent the Africans from getting on to the roll, stopped employers paying Africans a reasonable wage. It was essential to increase the African electorate because it was found that even African Members of Parliament never took the trouble to go to their African constituents because they had been elected on a European vote. He also suggested that there should be no educational qualifications; but he agreed it was desirable that candidates should be more highly qualified as this would ensure a better Government. He thought it might be possible to insist that candidates should have studied or taken a degree in such subjects as political science.

In reply to a question, the witness responded with the query as to why should voters have any qualifications when many who have no education whatsoever were wiser men than those who have had a former education and passed certain standards. He said the desire of the Southern Rhodesia Government was to keep the African ignorant. Mr. Gotora said that he was a trade unionist who should really not take any part in politics, but he was a member of a political party. He added that he loved Dr. Banda's speeches.

Memorandum

HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF MONTROSE, M.P.

Autobiographical Note

The Duke of Montrose came to Southern Rhodesia in 1931 at the age of 24 under appointment as agronomist and pasture research officer to the leading firm of fertiliser distributors and continued in this employment for 3½ years. In 1934 he decided to make this country his home, and with the assistance of a Government Settlement Scheme took up and developed as a farm a piece of virgin land 100 miles from Salisbury, subsequently moving in 1938 to another farm less off the beaten track.

From 1939 to 1945 he served in the R.N.V.R. as a Lieutenant and Lieutenant Commander, for the last two years of the War being in command of an escort destroyer.

In 1945 he returned to farming in South Rhodesia as a full time occupation, until in 1959 he was elected a Member of Parliament for Hartley/Gatooma in the Federal Assembly of Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

Factors affecting African psychology that should be considered when contemplating widening spheres of African advancement

In considering our own affairs it is sometimes not amiss to know what others have thought when confronted with a not dissimilar problem. The following paragraph is taken from a Report of the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization of the Sixty-Eighth Congress of the U.S.A. (1923) for in it I think we could with justification read the word "electorate" where occur the words "people" and "population".

"It is necessary to the successful future of our nation to preserve the basic strain of our population. . . . Since it is the axiom of political science that a government not imposed by external force is the visible expression of the ideals, standards, and social viewpoint of the people over which it rules, it is obvious that a change in the character or composition of the population must inevitably result in the evolution of a form of government consonant with the base upon which it rests."

In any case it is certain that any major change from a predominantly European to a predominantly African electorate would inevitably "result in the evolution of a form of government" very different to that at present existing in Central Africa.

It is therefore apposite to consider factors that would cause just such a change in the character of our electorate, if any significant broadening of the franchise were undertaken. This necessitates a study of the ways of thinking—the thought processes—the psychology—of those people who are not now enfranchised but would be if the present qualifications were lowered. It is with such people that I, as a farmer, have been in very close touch for nearly 30 years and had opportunity to assess their psychological approach to the many problems they encounter in their contact with the European and come up against in the European occupied areas of Rhodesia. Problems to be faced when in "transition" from a primitive to a more complicated form of culture.

I think I have made it clear that the points to be made need not be taken to apply to the more advanced and educated Africans who already are enfranchised though even in some such persons all the dust of environment and past generations may not have been entirely blown away. For the purposes immediately before your Committee it is only necessary to consider this evidence as it applies to those who are not now entitled to vote on the common Voters' Roll but who would be enfranchised if the qualifications are further lowered. I make, moreover, no suggestion that changes in other aspects of our national "set-up" are not necessary.

I further hope that in the few points which I wish to put before the Commission I may give some indication that many others, far more qualified than I, have carried out a wide study in the realm of African psychology and to those not already familiar with it I call attention to the fact that the results of this research have been published in an extensive bibliography. I believe that some familiarity with these findings will be necessary to the making of wise decisions in regard to the African Continent.

A work almost essential to this end, since the author quotes liberally from the findings of others as well as his own, is The African Mind in Health and Disease by J. C. Carothers—World Health Organisation Monograph Series No. 17 (1953). A second work with considerable bearing on the subject though it deals with the American Negro and not the African as such, is The Testing of Negro Intelligence by Audrey M. Shuey, Chairman of the Department of Psychology, Randolph-Macon Woman's College (1958). This is a review of seventeen textbooks in the field indicated by the title.

"Both these books confirm the fact that as things are at present there exists a difference between the Black and White Races in regard to average mental ability and psychological approach. The authors make no claim that this difference is hereditary for they admit that it could always be claimed that "environment", in its widest sense is always sufficiently diverse to account for it. The term environment here of course includes the incidence and effects of diseases, malnutrition, and dietary deficiencies both of parents and the individuals under investigation. Such effects are rife even among apparently healthy Africans. This does not get over the fact that these differences are there and are real, and must be taken into account. Should they, or let us say some part of them, be innate there is nothing we can really do about it since human beings cannot be the subject of careful genetical selection and breeding programmes. But much undoubtedly can be done by way of improving the "environment" and there can be no argument about it that such changes as we envisage will not come about if settled European communities disappear from among the African people. The settled European home, bringing up its children and by example imparting a knowledge of values, must be the only way a primitive people can learn how to live."

In dealing with only a few of the characteristics that, when widening of the franchise, would change the character of the electorate I will as far as possible, with each in turn, indicate them as observed and expressed by the ordinary European observer and accepted by him with an uncomprehending shrug of the shoulders, then indicate the form in which they are found and explained by some of the trained investigators.

1. Failure to Compromise

A point that must be considered as racial barriers break down is the inability of the majority of Africans to accept compromise. The African will often abandon a good job or a good contract if some quite minor concession is not made, or an entire labour force may be permanently upset if any one of a list of requests or demands to their employer is not met even though all the others are agreed to.

J. C. Carothers in his monograph draws attention to a probable psychological reason for this "all or nothing" trait of the African mind. He calls attention to the fact that the infant African, for his first 18 months or 2 years, lives a life little different to that of the womb. Carried on his mother's back in close and warm contact with her body he is fed on demand at any hour of the day or night, while no attempt is made at hygienic training. The infant is not made to conform to any sort of timetable and never experiences the need to wait or that all good things, even a meal, come to an end. He "lives a life that in many ways fails to introduce the child to the frustrations of reality and, in psycho-analytical language, the illusion of omnipotence persists till after self-consciousness is established" (Carothers). Then comes the moment when the child is abruptly weaned. The mother's interest is transferred to her next pregnancy and the child suffers a considerable emotional neglect. In the African mind, therefore, "the world is divided into two forces—a benevolent power which would give him everything and a malevolent which would deprive him of even life itself. He cannot look critically at himself and the world and see that neither the goodness nor the badness is absolute and he must somehow contrive to get rid of the badness and recover the goodness—or persuade himself that he has done so." (J. F. Kitchie, Rhodes Livingstone Papers No. 9).

The result is that when one starts to give, either materially or by adopting a more liberal approach, it is extremely difficult to persuade most Africans that at a particular time or point one is not prepared, or is unable, to give any more or go any further.

This undoubtedly has considerable bearing upon the fact that the recent troubles in Nyasaland and the Congo may be said to have occurred in countries where the most concessions had been given or promised.

2. The Desire to Conform

The proclivity of the African to "follow my leader" is a matter of common observation and perhaps in no type of community could it be said with greater truth that the removal of one discontented man may bring to an end what might appear to the uninitiated to be a widespread discontent. This not only applies when Africans appear not to accept the circumstances in which they find themselves but also applies to the fact that they may be persuaded by one or two of their number to accept circumstances that one might suppose they could with justification complain about. Those who have had much to do with Africans have generally come to realise the impossibility of asking a group of Africans to divide themselves left and right on any particular issue. As an example one might say "Those who wish to leave on the left and those who wish to remain on the right". After great hesitation on the part of anyone to make a move, in the moment it becomes possible for them to form an opinion as to the choice of the majority, nine times out of ten the whole group will suddenly move over to that side. This can largely be explained as follows:—from childhood onwards it is borne in upon the African that he must do nothing that might offend the spirits of his people, some of which spirits at any given time are occupying the mortal bodies of his contemporaries though others may, pro tem, be in the limbo of the spirit world, or even occupying some inanimate objects such as a tree or rock or even an animate creature such as a bull. The spirit of his grandfather, for instance, may even now be in his son. Wherever those spirits are it is up to him and the rest of his group to give no cause for offence to these powers. The customs of his people are designed to avoid this possibility. It is essential, therefore, that he should conform to the "social rule" and to that end it is safest to do what others do. Expressions of individuality are discouraged and the need to conform is continually accentuated.

When to this characteristic is added the natural inclination that persists, even in America, for white and black communities to vote on a colour basis, it is suggested that the likelihood of any large-scale division among the lesser educated members of the African community on the lines of purely party policy is most improbable. It may indeed be justifiably hoped that such division may occur in an African electorate where the franchise qualification is kept reasonably high, but among the masses it is almost certain that they would vote "en bloc" for he who promises the greatest immediate degree of gratification.

3. One Track Mind

There is, I believe, an African proverb to the effect that one cannot pursue two buck on the same day. Indeed it is generally accepted by the Europeans that to give an African more than one thing at a time to think about is fatal to efficiency. To the European the African is "par excellence" one track minded and if given only one straightforward task is often capable of performing it up to European standards.

This inability to have more than one thing at a time in mind becomes very apparent when, for instance, an African is informed of a family illness or believes he is the subject of some supposed "evil eye". It is beyond his ability to put such information temporarily at the back of his mind and to continue even to the end of a shift with any sort of efficiency.

Indeed, insistence on his doing so is often the cause of accidents where machinery is concerned. This characteristic is also referred to by Carothers as "the inability to attend to two things at once, or at least to keep the second near to the threshold of consciousness while attending to the first". He refers to African adult psychology as "monoideic".

This lack of aptitude to consider more than one thought at a time largely precludes the ability to see "cause and effect" in their true perspective and politically means that some sudden concept of immediate gratification can be accepted in complete isolation from previous benefits or disabilities or the results that may ensue.

I suggest that the wide acceptance by Nyasaland Africans of the demand for "Independence" is a case in point.

In the sphere of industrial advancement the above psychological characteristic is of major importance and could with advantage be borne in mind when the Commission is considering evidence on the "fractionalisation of jobs" on the Copperbelt and elsewhere. To take a simple example—the European driver of a heavy diesel transport vehicle is expected to have sufficient knowledge of his engine to effect running repairs and to keep the wheels rolling when far from his base. In fractionalisation of this job in aid of African advancement, it may be proposed to break it down into:—

1. a lower category driver who "knows nothing about what goes on under the bonnet" and
2. another employee who cannot drive but goes out to mend the thing if it breaks down.

Some other types of European employment would have to be fractionalised into 3, 4, or even 5 minor jobs to get the greatest efficiency from African employees, and it is knowing this that the European artisan feels he has some security in his stand on "no fractionalisation" and "equal pay for equal work".

4. The Seat of Power

I have already mentioned under 2 the regard held by the African for the power or powers believed by him to be exercised by the spirit world.

In ordinary tribal matters the spirits are consulted through the tribal medium or "mbondoro" who in many ways is of greater influence than even the chief. (See "Medicine and Magic of the Mashona" by M. Gelfand). To the African mind, therefore, it must always appear that he who is the more successful or more powerful is the medium of stronger spirit forces than he who fails. To the African individual it is not his to choose whether the spirits select white or black men as their chosen mediums. His wisest course is to conform to the will of the most powerful medium. The really important thing is to know precisely who that medium is.

The recent events connected with Dr. Banda, his arrival and arrest, provide a most cogent example. Propagandised before his arrival as "The Messiah", his subsequent ability to flout authority and insult the Governor and anybody else he chose, with impunity, naturally created the impression in many African minds that the more powerful spirits had transferred their power and ability from the white man's Government to Dr. Banda. To the minds of others the position was at least obscure and to have any doubts on so important a matter is to be in a very unhappy position. It was, therefore, with absolute truth that Sir Roy Welensky said that the arrest of Dr. Banda caused a sigh of relief among the African people, for once more they knew with certainty whom to heed. That the Government was supported by spiritual powers more powerful than those of Dr. Banda they now knew for certain.

What the effects will be if on his release he is permitted to carry on from where he left off may therefore be imagined.

In the wider sphere of subversive activity generally one must not lose sight of the fact that the ordinary African is never quite sure whether the demagogue or agitator, particularly if he has had considerable contact with Europeans and European education, has not acquired some increased occult powers. A veiled threat then that "something will happen to you or yours, if you do not join the Congress," etc. is a very good reason for playing safe and doing what he who threatens is proposing.

Should an individual or a group of individuals stand out against such veiled threats, the first signs of sickness among one of them or his family, or something amiss among his livestock or other possessions, is enough to make most of them have second thoughts and obey.

5. Some Comments on Comparative Intelligence

It is frequently commented upon that European children often play happily with African children up to the age of 9 or 10 years and thereafter cease to find companionship amongst their erstwhile playmates. The fatuous and ill-informed suggestion was even made recently in a Rhodesian newspaper (with accompanying photograph of two toddlers) that but for the influence of parents this Elysian state would continue indefinitely. But what is the truth?

It is a common observation that the African child is a bright and promising little fellow up to the age of puberty which he reaches, in any case, two years before the European. He then becomes hopelessly inadequate and disappointing and it is well known that this is due to his almost total absorption henceforth in matters of sex. Whatever the reason for this most disappointing state of affairs, the phenomenon is recognised by practically every investigator.

There is every indication that while the intelligence and mental age of European and African children is much the same up to about 10 years of age, thereafter the African (or Negro) starts to lag behind, so that even where a European boy may have no alternative companions he finds that at about that age he has mentally grown away from the African children with whom he once played. Added to this, of course, is the fact that the African child's all absorbing interest in matters of sex is not only condoned but, in many cases, encouraged by the customs of his people and this alone makes the pubescent African an undesirable companion for European children. The effect of this period upon the development of the African was commented on by S. Davidson, Rhodes Livingstone Papers (1949).

The following tables may be of interest in this connection. They are compiled from information given in official Reports of the Central African Statistical Office on Non-African Education, and in the African Demographic Survey (both of 1958).

Standard	European	Coloured and Asian	African
I	8.6	10.2	10 & 11
II	9.7	11.1	12
III	10.7	12.4	13 - 16
IV	11.7	13.3	The median standard of education of any age group never rises above Standard III
V	12.7	14.2
Form I	13.7	15.2
II	14.8	16.3

A similar state of affairs has been shown in many American investigations but to keep within the orbit of official reports the following table is compiled from the Report of the Committee to Investigate Public School Standards and Conditions in the District of Columbia 1957.

Grade	White Schools	Integrated Schools	Negro
3rd	Nat. Average	Grade	-½ Grade
5th	+½	"	-1 "
6th	+1	"	-½ Year
8th	+1	"	-1 Grade
9th	+1	"	-1 "

For other suggested reasons for stalling of Negro mental development see under "Negro" in the 13th Edition of Encyclopedia Britannica, (that is, before the Encyclopedia was taken over by Harvard University and politics expunged scientific information).

Conclusion

It may be some unformulated sense of such limitations that appears to cause some African leaders to feel that Western Ways, the Modern State, and European "hustle", do not hold the prospect of true happiness for their people. Perhaps this was the mood of Jomo Kenyatta when in his book "Facing Mount Kenya" (1938) he produced a sort of "blueprint" for an African State—certainly it was not for the right to establish a European type democracy that his adherents rebelled and fought to drive out the Europeans.

It may be that the African masses can never find happiness and fulfilment among the standards demanded and the ways of thought of a Western-type state. Certain it is that Europeans cannot find happiness in anything less.

In conclusion, therefore, I would remind the Commission of one particular characteristic of the European and that is his propensity to pack up and go when the environment, political, social or other, is not to his liking.

We are all here in Rhodesia because either we or our fathers at some time in the last 100 years pulled up their stakes and "left home".

In this context I hope the Commission will consider the analogy of Mauritius and I quote from A Short History of Mauritius by P. J. Barnwell and A. Toussaint:

"The Moody Report (to give it the name of the chairman of the enquiry into the 1943 troubles) said a change of heart was necessary. The British Government in London might be willing to spend much money on improving the colonies of the British Empire, but money alone would not solve the problems of Mauritius; a changed attitude among the people of Mauritius was also required."

"The Legislative Council had previously included nine officials, ten elected members, and nine members nominated by the Governor, some of these nominees being officials and others non-officials. The new 1948 Legislative Council was to contain three officials, nineteen elected members, and twelve nominees, who were all to be non-officials."

"Under the 1885 constitution relatively few persons were able to vote—only 12,000 men out of 220,000 adults in 1946. Under the 1948 constitution almost all adults were to vote, women as well as men, so long as they could read and write. The main idea behind these changes was that of government by consent of the people."

What has happened? There is today only one elected European in the Legislative Council. Most of the European families, some of whom have been seven generations in the island, have left or are leaving. There are said to be now 30,000 Europeans from Mauritius in Natal alone, while only 10,000 are left in the island. In Southern Rhodesia 48% of the capital of a large new sugar industry is from Mauritius.

It can happen here.

And if it does what chance is there of that breaking away from backward taboos, of that improved nutritional diet, of that whole change of environment, without which, even if his handicaps are not hereditary, the African stands little chance of real advance.

I must apologise to those Rhodesians on the Commission who are already only too familiar with all I have submitted but I feel sure that they will confirm to others that it is no more than the truth.

Salisbury

Oral Evidence

HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF MONTROSE

The Duke of Montrose had submitted a memorandum. Now he presented and had read to the Commission a supplementary paper which was in the following terms:—

With reference to the paper I submitted, I must apologise for some of the rather cumbersome sentences in which I expressed myself but due to some misunderstanding here in the High Commissioner's Office as to the latest date for submitting evidence I had not the opportunity to edit it as I would have liked. However, I hope it was possible to get the gist of what I was trying to say.

I feel that the task of the Commission is very much like that of a pilot or navigator whose duty is to set a course for the captain and those other officers who will have to steer the ship of Central Africa through the stormy seas that lie ahead. It is not out of place then if I use the analogy of navigational ability and the degress thereof needed to navigate a ship upon the ocean—a task with which I became somewhat familiar during the War as a Navigating Officer and a Destroyer Captain.

Now; the Admiralty Manual of Navigation is divided into three volumes. The first confines itself to the fundamental principles of general navigation which in our present context is analogous to the approach of one educated man to a major problem about which he knows little in detail. The second volume teaches the various formulae that must be used, but makes no attempt to involve the would-be navigator in the knowledge of how these formulae were arrived at; or how the correctness of them may be proved. It is sufficient for all practical navigational purposes that he should know the formulae and know how to use them, and so be able to fix his position by "rule of thumb" methods. He can do this without any profound knowledge as to how the relevant Tables are arrived at, and without any profound knowledge of spherical trigonometry. In fact it is at this practical point that the knowledge of the ordinary seaman is sufficient to enable him to bring his vessel across the oceans of the world and into harbour.

Now in the context of your enquiry I believe it is from men and women at this practical "working-knowledge" point in the understanding of African people that you will have received much valuable evidence—from men with a long and understanding background of life among the African people.

To return to my analogy. The third volume of the Manual of Navigation deals entirely with the proofs of the trigonometrical formulae, etc., that the student of the second volume has learnt to use, and the document that I have submitted to you is no more than a very humble attempt to call the attention of those of you who are not already aware, that there does exist in our present context a great deal of literature setting out the results of careful study in the field of African psychology and mental ability by trained investigators. This may be said to constitute the third volume of the Manual of Navigation that is needed in the task before you.

As in the maritime context, if you are prepared to accept the formulae given to you in all honesty by "old hands", then, of course, there would be no practical purpose in studying the third volume. But I have an unhappy feeling that some members of your Commission will discredit as "biased" facts that have been put before you, knowing them to be based on purely practical observation. I would hope, therefore, that some, at least, of you will find time to go into the deeper, psychological aspects of our problems, set out, as they have been, by trained observers.

As I have stated the document I submitted aimed at more than indicating that a great deal of work has been done by others on a subject which is much too intricate and extensive to form part of the evidence I supposed would be welcome today. Suffice it to say that even if all heritable factors are discounted, (and it is probable that at least 50% of our mental make-up is heritable, but even if that aspect is discounted), there is ample difference in the whole pattern of African upbringing, from birth to adolescence alone, as compared with that of the European to account for a very great discrepancy in their approach to problems and their reaction to events. I have no hesitation in saying that this would be confirmed by any psychologist, even without first-hand experience in Africa itself, if no more than a factual account of the African's life as a babe, as an infant, and as a child were set before him.

I feel that I will have performed a useful task today if I should have done anything to persuade you gentlemen, before you make your recommendations, to satisfy yourselves beyond all reasonable doubt whether [and no matter for what reasons, and irrespective of what may be done about it in the future] the African, as he is today and will be for the next 20 years, is capable of running a Western type democratic State, or whether, as many must have told you, he is indeed a man with a completely different mental approach to almost every event. Without that knowledge you cannot hope to assess what will be the results of any policy that you may advise.

Now, I would like to change my theme.

I hope that you have been told, or if not already told, that you will make the United Kingdom Government tell you before you formulate your decisions, what is their goal in Africa, what is their ultimate political object—what is the final picture that they hope to see?—because it seems to me that the present near-objective of indiscriminate Africanisation and handing over control of the whole Continent to the black Africans, and to pursue such a policy heedless of all warnings, is going to prove as big a blunder for Africa as the wartime policy of unconditional surrender has proved to be for Europe. Such near horizon aims that do not follow through to some political finality are most dangerous.

We must surely have learnt by this time that it is necessary to go further than such chimerical objectives as "a war to end war" or a war "to make the world safe for democracy", or in our present context, slogans such as—"Africanisation", "Multiracialism", "Partnership", and so on. We must go further than the pious hope that African controlled states will welcome the presence of settled European communities and that if given their freedom they will be happy enough to receive financial aid from the West to the exclusion of the Soviet Union. We must not assume that because a few Europeans say that they have no racial preferences—I avoid the word "prejudices"—Africans may be found of the same mind. Such things are no more than pious hopes and are

- (1) Contrary to what is already indicated in those areas that have received independence,
- (2) Contrary to what is indicated by African leaders in those countries where the white man is still in control,
- (3) Contrary to the experience, even in America, where preference for one's own kind is still very evident after three or four hundred years of association.

From the point of view of white communities in Africa who have made it their home, black predominated governments mean extinction.

By that I do not mean that European company executives and employees, living in company houses and with company furniture, in Africa for stated periods of employment, and sending their children back to Europe for schooling, will not still be found. In saying that the European will go, I refer to the European who, today, calls Africa his home. One may consider the present exodus from the Congo.

One supposes it is the policy of the Western Powers to keep the African Continent inclining in favour towards the West, but if they think that this can be done by making concessions to backward peoples, I suggest that they are entirely wrong and that this policy is no more than wishful thinking. Some study along the lines I suggested in the paper submitted would be sufficient to indicate that there cannot be, at least for a very long time, sufficient Africans able to make full use of the educational facilities available, in such a way that they would be able to fill a majority of the leading executive positions in Government, Industry and Commerce.

It is in their failure to get from education all that they hope that I think resentment may even be felt against those who have tried to educate them. We come back, once more, to the possibility that at least some of this inability may be hereditary. What then? It is my belief that antagonism to the white man will increase rather than diminish if time should prove that when the white man has opened the door the inherent lack of some factor of mental ability prevents them passing through it. Then will come the rebellion of what Lothrop Stoddard called the "underman" in his book "The Revolt Against Civilisation". If, as I think, the Western Powers believe that a friendly Africa is essential to their defence and they believe Central Africa as a land area to be essential in any major strategy, there is only one sure way of being certain that it will be held for them secure and loyal, and that is for them to see to it that their own kith and kin remain here and remain in control. It is pure fantasy to imagine otherwise. If the East West conflict materialises it is very certain that African governments could never defend this Continent. No one but the white man will or can stem the Eastern Flood.

Apart from strategic reasons the departure of the European at this stage of their development would be a tragedy for the African people themselves. When we view the great mass of ignorance, disease, malnutrition, and lack of hygiene to be dealt with before environment can even be said to have been modified, before we can even assess the African potential, you will see that the Europeans' task in Central Africa has hardly begun.

Perhaps it was, and is, our task not only to go out into the World and preach the Gospel, but to go out into the World and show men how to live and how to live more abundantly. We must remain and we will only remain so long as political control—I do not say monopoly—remains in European hands. We have brought forward a backward people at a great pace. We will continue in this work—only do not push us so that we fall.

The British Government have sown the wind up North and will see the harvest of the storm but we, in Southern Rhodesia, hope to save as much as we can for ordered progress, continued white settlement and that the West may have at least one friend on the African Continent.

When this supplementary paper had been read the Duke of Montrose spoke in amplification of the memoranda.

Arising out of discussion of the tables given in Section V of the original memorandum, the witness stated that they must hope for the best and try to lead the African on. What the African was demanding was equality but what at this stage of evolution he required was really equality of opportunity.

It was quite clear that the only way European leadership could be maintained in the Federation was either by working hand in hand with the African or enforcing that leadership. He was quite satisfied that most of the Africans in the country wished the Europeans to remain. It was only the demagogues, who were self-seeking, who wished the Europeans out of the way, because once that had been achieved they themselves would be able to achieve domination over their fellows. The door was opening or was now open to the Africans to get in so that the two races could indeed work hand in hand but the witness felt that if they did not take that opportunity and achieve results, they should not condemn and regard their failure as something that had been thrust upon them because of the colour of their skins. Unfortunately, far too many African people believe that the word "education" was the open sesame to everything. The witness said that it was essential that all should work together but there was no reason why in doing so there should not be certain minimum conditions. As an instance of that, he suggested that the Europeans might, for example, not like multi-racial schools. If they were of that mind, there was no reason why they should be forced into them.

He thought that the African was only making demands to take part in the government of the country because he was an African and not because he had the ability to conduct the government of the country with merit, and he posed the question to the Commission: was there any African who could be given the ministerial portfolios of, for example, agriculture and-commerce and industry? He was satisfied there was not. Any such ministerial appointments would be completely hollow, as they would have to be carried almost entirely by the European staff. His view was that they should start at the bottom and become proficient, really proficient, in local government and on committees, etc. He agreed that the opportunity to acquire proficiency had only come to the African to enable him to demonstrate his ability within the last three years or so. He was opposed to even moderate political advancement in either the Territorial or Federal spheres on the grounds that the European would find this intolerable and have to leave the country as soon as this came about. What was needed not only by the Europeans but more particularly by the African was time.

The witness remarked that so far as the franchise was concerned, even one of the African members of the Commission had himself drawn the definition between the stage of development of the rural and bundu African and the urban African. He, the witness, was opposed to lowering the franchise; but if it was done well, he did not mind at all who ran the country.

The witness went on to say that if the qualifications for candidates were very high, that is if they were chosen from people who had had great experience, or chosen by electoral colleges, a great deal of good could probably result. He did not for a moment, however, suggest that candidates should be elected to parliamentary seats by electoral colleges. He added that he was in favour of the common roll.

In reply to one question, he stated categorically that his views were certainly not those of the ruling party in the Union of South Africa.

Concluding, the Duke made a plea that members of the Commission should make a serious effort to read the books to which he had referred in his memorandum. He mentioned that when, in another place, he had referred in debate to the psychology of the African, an African member of parliament had approached him subsequently and told him that he had a brother who had been weaned at the age of eight and was found to be completely impossible. The psychological effect on African children who were subjected to this form of nurturing was that he felt that he had been replaced by his father when he was weaned and that the father, who at that stage was by custom able to resume cohabitation, hated him. This bred a resentment to the fathers authority and that resentment to authority persisted thereafter.

Memorandum

THE COLOURED COMMUNITY OF BULAWAYO

Drawn up by representatives of:—The Barham Green Rate-payers Association, Forestvale Residents, Upper Rangemore Landowners Association, Thorngrove Residents.

Preamble

Whilst it is our considered opinion that, in view of the developments in the world generally and the increased tempo of events in Africa together with the growing interdependence of all mankind, Federation—based on the true conception of Partnership—should and can be made to work; nevertheless certain vital aspects must be taken into account:—

1. No scheme of Partnership can be successfully carried out unless all parties are prepared to face up honestly to the problems involved. This includes honesty on the part of Central and Local Governments as well as the four racial groups and individual citizens.
2. What are now minority groups must have their rights protected during the immediate future until everybody can compete on a basis of merit alone.
3. The present differentiation into European, Coloured, Asian and African must be done away with and all referred to as Rhodesians. Emphasis must be placed on a common citizenship, with all having a common loyalty to the country and not, as at present, a loyalty to the country plus an even stronger loyalty to a particular group.
4. The part that the Coloured Community has played in the opening up of Rhodesia must be recognized and the fact that in their veins flows some of the finest European blood ever known in Southern Africa. (A perusal of some of the surnames would be enlightening not only for the Commissioners but also for most citizens in this country). Let us never forget Cecil Rhodes' own words "As to the Coloured People I owe them a debt of great gratitude for the work they have done for me in opening up this country. They stormed the fastnesses of the Matopos not once, but several times; without their help, I could not have achieved what I have. I regard them as one of the great sources of prosperity in this country. I am happy to have the opportunity of making this statement."

Taking the above into consideration we therefore recommend that the Federal and Territorial Governments unequivocally declare that all citizens shall be considered Rhodesians and have equal opportunity based on merit. Further that a law be passed making it a punishable offence to refuse admission to cinemas, cafes, restaurants, theatres, recreational centres, etc.: or to refuse employment, on the grounds of race, colour or religion.

It is imperative that equal pay be given for equal work and that the Government be the first to set an example. It is a cause of much heart-burning that the Government should adopt the attitude—which is reflected amongst the European community generally—that the Coloured Community lives at a lower standard of living than the European and thus makes its salaries, old age pensions and social welfare relief for members of the Coloured Community so much lower accordingly. This attitude is resented strongly by the Coloured Community and by all right thinking Europeans. Two examples will suffice, namely School Matrons and Housekeepers, School Secretaries. The work done is identical for both European and Coloured yet the difference in pay is quite scandalous. If this position is permitted to continue then bitterness will increase and racial feeling intensify between the two groups.

Members of the Coloured Community, suitably qualified, must be eligible for employment in all branches of the Government Service at the same rate of pay as that of Europeans doing an equivalent job. This is definitely not the case at the moment and thus it is considered that the Government is being dishonest in its protestations of Partnership.

1. Government Acts

Which either discriminate against the Coloured Community or are interpreted in a discriminatory manner, consist of:—

- (a) Workmen's Compensation Act.
- (b) Mining and Prospecting Act.
- (c) Immigration Act.
- (d) Firearms Act.

2. Municipality of Bulawayo

All restrictive clauses in title deeds and the bye-laws pertaining to separate latrines must be declared ultra vires the Constitution.

3. Legal

It is quite unfair that children born out of wedlock, but acknowledged by the European fathers (many in the most prominent positions in this country) should be excluded from claiming against the estate of their father, when provision has not been made for them in a will.

Likewise where a European man has lived consistently with a woman of another race, but not legally married, it should be possible for the woman, on the death of her partner, to claim against the estate and thus avoid hardship and in many cases complete dispossession.

Many members of the community have suffered unfairly, when appearing before the courts, through not being able to afford the services of a solicitor or to appeal against a severe sentence. It is considered imperative that the Department of Justice in consultation with the Bar should investigate at once the setting up of a Legal Aid Bureau along the lines of those existing overseas. It is confidently felt that assistance would be given by overseas organisations if this was felt necessary.

4. Education

Whilst partnership in this field must inevitably lead to integration in the schools, it is recognized that this is a long term policy and that, for the immediate future, separate schools will have to continue. In accepting this position it must be stressed that equal opportunity must be accorded to all.

Secondary Education must be made compulsory for all members of the Coloured Community, irrespective of where the parents are living, and the Government should provide adequate Hostel accommodation to make this possible.

The number of Secondary Schools in the Federation are quite insufficient and additional ones must be built. Here it should be stated quite categorically that the official census figures for the Coloured Community do not reflect the correct position. At the time of the Beadle Commission it was estimated that in Southern Rhodesia alone some 10,000 "first generation" Coloured children living with their African mothers in the reserves existed, and because of their environment had been included as "African". Full Technical facilities should be provided and it is essential that proper Technical Colleges be provided for those children who are not suited for an academic course. We deplore the half-measures suggested in providing technical facilities at existing Secondary Schools.

Teacher Training. Whilst a gesture to partnership has been made in allowing Coloured and Asian students to attend Heany Training College, it is a fact that they cannot benefit fully from this because they cannot share in the complete life of the College, and are unable to take part in the social and extra-curricular activities of the College. If all students, irrespective of race can live in at the University College of Rhodesia & Nyasaland, it is a reasonable demand that all teacher trainees be provided with accommodation at Heany. It is an evasion to plead that Heany is only temporary and that things will be different when the new College is built.

5. Housing

Contrary to the report of the Currie Committee, the Community is extremely dissatisfied with the approach to Coloured Housing made by the local authorities (not excluding Bulawayo) and it is felt that Housing be taken right out of the hands of Municipalities and that the Government either set up a Housing Institute or make arrangements direct with responsible organisations within the Community.

6. Health Services

Accepting the fact that a new Government Hospital is nearing completion at Bulawayo for the Coloured and Asian Communities, this has taken 25 years of constant battling and even now the Government has been completely lacking in vision. The new Hospital is inadequate before it is even opened. The number of beds has been gauged on the number of patients at the old Memorial Hospital, entirely overlooking the fact that dozens and dozens of members of the Community have refused to enter this Hospital because of the poor facilities, lack of trained nurses and rude treatment generally.

No facilities exist for the care of T.B. patients and if the Government and local authorities find it necessary to make special provision for both African and European T.B. patients, it is illogical for them to say—when requested to do the same for the Coloured Community—that "modern drugs render the isolation of T.B. patients unnecessary and that they can be treated in the general wards". Definite provisions must be made for the isolation of all infectious and contagious cases.

It is felt generally that the question of Hospital fees should be a matter of consultation with responsible persons who know the Community and in cases of genuine hardship they should be waived. Many members of the Community are carrying a very heavy burden by way of doctors' bills because of the almost inflexible rule that "a private doctor should be called".

A Government doctor should always be immediately available for emergency cases.

It is our considered opinion that all T.B. drugs should be free of charge, irrespective of whether the patient is in hospital or not. This is something which should be carried by the Government. Facilities should be provided at the King George VI Memorial Centre and similar places for the care and treatment of polio victims and other handicapped persons from the Coloured Community. These places were built with public funds and should not be for "Europeans Only".

Facilities must be provided for the treatment of Coloured patients at the Nervous Disorders Hospital. At the moment "in patients" have to go to Ingutsheni where the conditions for the Coloured Community are shocking in the extreme.

Hospital Advisory Boards. Without question the Coloured Community should have direct representation on all Hospital Advisory Boards and not as at present by Europeans who are thought or reputed to be sympathetic towards them.

7. Prisons

Conditions at the prisons generally for Coloured prisoners are bad and immediate improvements must be made. In particular it is requested that adequate provision be made for a Remand Home for Juveniles either awaiting trial or transfer to a Reformatory. Likewise a Reformatory should be provided within the Federation and thus avoid having to rely on the "goodwill" of the Union authorities.

8. Armed Forces

Opportunities should be made in each of the armed forces for those members of the Community who wish to make this their career. There must be equality of rank and pay with the European and no ceiling be placed on their advancement if they are able to measure up to the required standard.

Oral Evidence

THE COLOURED COMMUNITY OF BULAWAYO. Representatives: G. Hendricks, J. van Beek, J. M. Moore, Rev. R. F. Green.

They agreed that a summary of their memorandum would be that insufficient recognition was accorded to their community; they had nothing to add to it and offered to answer questions, in reply to which they made the following points:—

- (1) There were approximately 3,000 Coloureds in greater

Bulawayo. The figure of 15,000 Coloureds was usually given for the Federation, but they thought it inaccurate; they thought the figure was nearer 30,000. This excluded pure Asians but included Indo-Africans.

(2) Among Coloureds there were three different points of view: some wanted to be regarded as Africans; some as Europeans; and some wanted to have representatives of their own in the Legislatures. In fact they had no alternative but to be a group on their own, because of Federal and Southern Rhodesian Government policy. But the general feeling among most Coloureds was that any form of racial representation in Legislatures would be not consonant with partnership; they, therefore, did not ask for special representation. There was a vast range of culture among the Coloureds themselves, and they had had a great struggle for recognition; there were indeed difficulties in referring to them as a community, since they could be rather regarded as a collection of families, primarily concerned with their own security. This gave rise to the fact that some individuals had given to the Commission their own views rather than those of the community generally, which was definitely that they did not want special representation.

(3) The community generally favoured Federation. There was however disagreement among the witnesses as to whether or not the Federal Government had done anything to help the Coloureds. It was true that secondary schools for Coloureds had been put up but they would not accept children from more than 30 miles away. They were also anxious as to what was to happen to the products of these schools, for whom there were very few openings. They thought it advisable for Governments to take the lead in finding suitable work for them. They wanted to be employed in the Civil Service. They agreed that not very many Coloureds were at present unemployed; but that was because they were prepared to take any job whatever the salary. They felt that Coloureds were not treated fairly in respect of employment. In Bulawayo a Post Office vacancy had been recently advertised, on the basis of a Cambridge School Certificate pass. A Coloured boy with Honours in six subjects had applied and been rejected, and the Coloureds thus attributed that to discrimination.

(4) Section 4 of the memorandum (Teacher Training). The reason why the memorandum stated that the Coloureds and Asian students at Heany were unable to take part in the social and extra-curricular activities of the College was because those students had to live at the Stanley Hostel seventeen miles away, and go to and from the College every morning and evening by bus, and thereby lost the advantage of social contacts with Europeans.

(5) The only field of employment for Coloureds was as lorry drivers, or as teachers in Coloured schools. Coloureds were never employed as clerks in Government offices or in the Native Department. They had been making applications for years to enter the Post Offices. Mr. Moore stated that he himself was only a driver, and the majority of the Coloureds were drivers. On the railways the position was better. Plate-layers were now better off than before and there was the possibility of promotion to become Inspectors. In the past, many Coloureds had been dining-car chefs.

(6) There were many first generation Coloured children in the Native Reserves. Some tended when grown up to join the Coloured community, and men stood the best chance of doing so; but girls tended to remain native and eventually to marry natives.

(7) Coloureds generally did not attempt to get employment in the mines, although Mr. Moore knew of two cases of Coloureds working at bulldozing, at lower wages than would be paid to a European. It was natural for Coloureds to be discriminated against in respect of wages throughout the Colony.

(8) Memorandum, Section 7 (Prisons). The Coloureds were mainly affected by over-crowding. They did not go into the European side of the prisons. There was a special section of the prison at Bulawayo separated both from the European and African prisons. They were particularly distressed by the fact that there was at present no special place for Coloured juveniles awaiting trial, while there was a European Remand Home and an African Remand Home. Last year two Coloured juveniles had been kept on remand with adult offenders for three months. Because there was neither a Remand Home nor a Reformatory many cases were never brought to court at all. The Rev. R. F. Green had on occasion pleaded for the committal of Coloured juvenile offenders, but that had been refused. In one case the result had been that the boy had had to be sent to the Reformatory at Cape Town, and now he was past redemption. But the excuse given by the authorities was that it was not an economic proposition to have a Remand Home for Coloureds—but such institutions were not economic propositions in any community. The Union would not now accept non-European convicts.

(9) Memorandum, Section 3 (Legal Aid). This was a general complaint, and did not apply to the Coloureds only. They agreed that there was an Act of Parliament establishing legal aid, but Coloured people had been refused it, and no office existed to which they could go for such aid.

(10) Memorandum, Section 1(a) (Workmen's Compensation Act). This point had been discussed in Bulawayo by a very large group of Coloureds. It arose from the general attitude that Coloureds must inevitably be living at a lower standard than Europeans so that under the Act an incapacitated Coloured person would get less compensation than a European. An African would get still lower compensation. This rule also applied in all social welfare payments.

(11) Memorandum, Section 6 (Health Services). The reference to the fact that "a private doctor should be called" arose from the fact that this was the general rule on reporting to a hospital. It was very difficult indeed to get a Government doctor. A Coloured girl had been shot in Bulawayo and her mother had been forced to pay all the necessary specialist fees.

(12) Wages. They maintained that there was a scandalous difference in the pay of Europeans and Coloureds; this difference could be measured at between £15 and £20 per month. For example a European matron would be paid between £40 and £45 per month and a Coloured matron between £20 and £25 per month. The same applied in the armed forces. The Coloureds were discouraged from joining by being offered low pay. But there was no discrimination when it came to taxation; they all paid European taxes, including income tax. There was no poll tax; there had been one, but it had been abolished.

(13) Memorandum, preamble point 2. They claimed to be citizens of the country, and wanted to have the same facilities as Europeans. This feeling went deep, and stemmed from unemployment, coupled with the present rapid advance of Africans. Firms were already dismissing their Coloured staff in favour of lower paid Africans—for example in the Premier Woodworking factory in Bulawayo. Hence there was already an appreciable unemployment among Coloureds in Bulawayo, and in Salisbury it was even worse.

(14) On constitutional matters, the Coloureds were satisfied with the conditions for voting. If the terms of the Federation were carried out with emphasis on partnership, it would be perfectly acceptable to the Coloureds.

(15) They felt particularly strongly about the rights of Coloured children born out of wedlock. Their African and Coloured mothers were often left destitute. It was also wrong that an illegitimate child could not claim against his father's estate. They realised that the fathers could make wills, but in fact they rarely did so.

(16) They were critical of the Bulawayo Municipality Housing Scheme for Coloureds. The last 49 houses put up, only a year ago, were already cracking. It was because the cost of the houses for Coloureds had been strictly limited. They thought that the Government ought to guarantee loans for home purchase schemes, that a housing institute was needed for housing generally. There was a lack of vision in the Municipality. Generally they were dissatisfied with the provision of housing by the Municipal Councils.

(17) Educational advances for Coloureds had not been due to Federation, but to the Union Government giving notice of the closure of their schools against foreigners. For that reason the Southern Rhodesia and Federal Governments had been compelled themselves to find some means of training teachers for their own Coloured schools.

(18) The first generation of Coloured children were causing an increasing problem in the Bulawayo schools. There was a flow of children into them who could only speak Sindebele. At the other end of the scale children were also going into European schools, being passed off as either Europeans or Portuguese.

Memorandum

RHODESIA RAILWAYS

Constitution of the Rhodesia Railways

1. The Rhodesia Railways own and operate the public railways in Northern and Southern Rhodesia and the Bechuanaland Protectorate.

2. Prior to 1st April, 1947, the Rhodesia Railways were owned and operated by private enterprise.

3. In the post-war years the Company was unable to obtain finance on reasonable terms to meet its obligations to the public in providing increased railway services. Following negotiations involving the U.K. Government and the B.S.A. Company, the Southern Rhodesia Government, with the concurrence of Northern Rhodesia and the Bechuanaland Protectorate purchased the share equity of the Company on 1st April, 1947, and repaid the outstanding debenture debt of the Company.

4. The Southern Rhodesia Government in collaboration with Northern Rhodesia and Bechuanaland then established, by means of simultaneous parallel legislation in the three territories, a statutory corporation domiciled in Southern Rhodesia to take over the ownership and operation of the railways from the Rhodesia Railways, Limited. This was done under the Rhodesia Railways Act, 1949, of Southern Rhodesia, the Rhodesia Railways Ordinance, 1949, of Northern Rhodesia and the Railway Proclamation, 1949, of the Bechuanaland Protectorate. Under these statutes the assets of the Rhodesia Railways, Limited, were acquired by the Rhodesia Railways statutory corporation and the assets were made a first charge as security for the Southern Rhodesia Government's loan of £30,000,000 which was raised for the purpose of purchasing the undertaking from the previous shareholders and for redeeming the debentures. The statutes made the Governments of the three territories responsible in certain proportions for meeting any operating deficits of the statutory body.

5. Responsibility for the higher direction of policy, for the appointment of the Railway Board and the appointment of the General Manager was vested in the Rhodesia Railways Higher Authority which consisted of the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia, the Governor of Northern Rhodesia, the High Commissioner of the Bechuanaland Protectorate and the Southern Rhodesia Minister of Transport.

6. In the discussions between the three participating governments prior to the establishment of the statutory body, after consulting experts in South Africa and in East Africa who had already had considerable experience of publicly-owned railways, it was recognised as a fundamental requirement that the Rhodesia Railways should be operated as a business organisation entirely divorced from party political associations and influences. The fact that the Higher Authority which, as has been mentioned, was responsible for higher direction of policy, consisted of high officers of the governments of the three territories helped to maintain harmony between the aims and objects of the Rhodesia Railways and the policies pursued by the three governments, without causing Railway affairs to be brought into politics in the participating countries. The statutes did, however, require that the annual reports and statements of accounts of the Railways should be laid before the Legislative Assembly in Southern Rhodesia and the Legislative Council in Northern Rhodesia. The Southern Rhodesia Act also required that the Southern Rhodesian Parliament should be given such information relating to the undertakings of the Railways as Parliament might at any time require. These provisions were made in the legislation because of the obligations of the Governments of Southern and Northern Rhodesia to meet the major part of any deficit on operating which the Rhodesia Railways might incur. The idea was that the Legislatures, in the exercise of their rights in respect of fiscal matters affecting respectively Northern and Southern Rhodesia should be kept informed of the general financial soundness of the Railways from time to time.

7. At 31st March, 1954, which was the first railway accounting date after the establishment of the Federation, the loan indebtedness of the Railways to the Governments of Northern and Southern Rhodesia and to other lenders whose loans had been guaranteed by the Governments, was £58,600,000. Soon after Federation the obligations and liabilities of Southern and Northern Rhodesia in respect of these loans were transferred to the Federal Government who thus became the guarantors of the loans of the Rhodesia Railways and also became liable, in the place of the Northern and Southern Rhodesia Governments to make good any losses or deficiencies the Railways might incur. There remained, however, an obligation on the part of Bechuanaland to meet 5% of any deficit, the remaining 95% being the responsibility of the Federation.

8. In 1955 the Federal Legislature enacted the Rhodesia Railways Laws Amendment Act, the principal effect of which was to constitute a Federal Minister (the Federal Minister of Transport) as the Rhodesia Railways Higher Authority in place of the high officers of the three Governments. The Act also transferred to the Federal Government the entire obligation to meet deficiencies and to guarantee loans, etc. This was a logical step as a precursor to Federal and Bechuanaland legislation which would go further towards adjusting the powers, duties and functions of the Higher Authority, the Railway Board and the General Manager consonant with the change in circumstances in the Rhodesias and Bechuanaland which had taken place since the Rhodesia Railways were established in October 1949.

9. The position now is that the Rhodesia Railways are a statutory corporate body owning and operating the railways in Northern and Southern Rhodesia and the Bechuanaland Protectorate. They have no responsibilities in Nyasaland but their responsibilities in Bechuanaland, which of course is outside the borders of the Federation, are no different from those in respect of the Rhodesias. The Rhodesia Railways are therefore not strictly an instrument of Federal Government policy but naturally there is a close liaison between the Government and the Railways. In effect the Railways are concerned with the interests of railway users whereas the Government is concerned with the taxpayer.

10. The Rhodesia Railways, although they have borrowed large sums from the Federal Government and although they are assisted by guarantees given by the Federal Government to external lenders, are an entirely self-supporting financial entity in all other respects.

11. All working expenses and all loan service charges including interest and redemption in full are met out of the Railways' resources. The balances in various reserves are an insurance against the undertaking becoming a liability to the Federal taxpayer. The Rhodesia Railways are unique amongst publicly owned transport systems in the fact that they have not had to call for assistance from the taxpayer and are distinguished among publicly owned railways in Africa, South of the Sahara by the fact that on average their charges are lower than on other Southern African railways.

12. The Railways feel that in respect of any changes which may be made in the Constitution of the Governments of the territories in which the railways operate, it should be recognised that the Rhodesia Railways should continue as an autonomous publicly owned non-political corporation of the nature of a public utility trust. It is regrettable that this principle is not specifically written into the Railway Statutes. The relationship between the Railways and the Governments should be confined to that of a co-operative debtor and an understanding creditor.

Employment Policy with Particular Reference to African Advancement

13. As has already been explained, under the Rhodesia Railways legislation the Railways are required to be operated in accordance with business principles. However there is an additional obligation the railways are required to observe which is not embodied in the legislation. In 1946, in the course of negotiations between the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia and representatives of Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom regarding the purchase of the Railways from the Company it was agreed that the policy regarding the employment of labour by the Rhodesia Railways statutory body should be as follows:—

"It will be the policy of the Commission to promote the welfare and advancement of the African employees of the Rhodesia Railways, Limited, both by progressively improving their conditions of service, housing, health, feeding, etc., and by securing for them opportunities for employment in more responsible work as and when they are qualified to undertake such work. Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom has a special responsibility in regard to African labour both in Northern Rhodesia and the Bechuanaland Protectorate. In the measures which it takes for the advancement of African labour the Commission will of course be required to take into account the interests of all other employees of the Railways and to consult closely on these questions with the representatives of the European and also the African employees. In this connection the Commission will give facilities and encouragement for any steps which the African employees may take towards the formation of a trade union or unions".

(Note: The reference to "Commission" above now means "the Rhodesia Railways statutory body".)

14. The action taken by the Rhodesia Railways to implement these obligations is covered later in this report.

15. A difficulty faced by the Railways was the need to reconcile the duty to make decisions in accordance with business principles, with the duty to provide advancement for Africans and generally to improve their conditions of service, etc.

16. In the opinions of the Railways the situation in the Rhodesias in the years immediately following the establishment of the statutory body in 1949 was not propitious for the advancement of Africans in employment in the Railway undertaking. This was due primarily to the fact that Railway policy was unavoidably dominated by the need to expand railway services to meet the tremendous increase in the traffic demand after the war. In the circumstances it was judged to be essential in the interests of the users of the railways to avoid cause for friction with the Rhodesia Railway Workers' Union and the Amalgamated Engineering Union representing the European Railwaymen.

17. Since Federation there has been a change in the public attitude together with a more liberal outlook on the part of the European Trades Unions, towards advancing the African. Added to this is the fact that since the end of 1957 the Rhodesia Railways have had a surplus of capacity over traffic demand, which has enabled the Railways to take more active steps to bring about changes in the Employment policy in fulfilment of the undertaking agreed upon in 1946.

18. A further difficulty faced by the Railways is the claim by the European Unions that at the time of the establishment of the Rhodesia Railways as a statutory corporation they were given an assurance that the employment rights of European railwaymen would be preserved. This claim is based on a letter dated 19th June, 1947, from the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia to the General Secretary of the Rhodesia Railway Workers' Union, which included the following announcement of a decision taken by the three

Governments involved in establishing the Rhodesia Railways:—

“Conditions of Employment. Existing conditions of employment will continue automatically under state control”.

19. Whatever this statement was intended to mean, the European Unions aver that it gives them the right to expect that Europeans will continue to be employed exclusively in various types of railway work hitherto reserved to them unless arrangements are made to the contrary by agreement between the Railways and the European Unions.

20. The Railways feel that the European Unions are attaching to this extract from the Southern Rhodesia Prime Minister's letter more meaning than was intended and that in regard to employment policy the Railways are not prevented by the Prime Minister's letter from pursuing the undertaking accepted by the three Governments in 1946, quoted above.

21. The Railways' aim is that for all employees irrespective of race, wage levels should be based primarily on the value and quality of the work done.

22. The policy directive to the Rhodesia Railways, regarding African employment, quoted in paragraph 13 of this report covers conditions of service and feeding, housing, welfare, health and hygiene, opportunities for employment on more responsible work, and the formation of African Trades Unions. Each of these is dealt with in the succeeding paragraphs.

Improved Conditions of Service and Feeding

23. In 1949 minimum African wages were 25s. a month in Southern Rhodesia and 20s. a month in Northern Rhodesia plus rations (whose value was 25s. per month) and accommodation. The present basic minimum wage is £6 18s. 6d. per month throughout the system. Rations (estimated to cost about 63s. a month) are no longer issued free but free accommodation is provided. In 1949 the maximum basic wage in the lowest grade was 40s. per month plus rations and accommodation. Today the maximum basic inclusive wage in the lowest grade is 221s. per month. In 1949 the maximum wage in the higher grade was 160s. per month plus rations and accommodation. Today the minimum basic inclusive wage in the higher group is £303 10s. 0d. per annum. In 1949 the maximum wage in the higher grade was 237s. 6d. per month plus rations and accommodation. Today the maximum basic inclusive wage in the higher group is £363 10s. 0d. per annum. As is stated later in this paper a new agreement is under consideration in the National Industrial Council which may result in an increase in the present maximum basic inclusive wages of Africans.

24. In 1955 a family allowance of 22s. 6d. per family per month was introduced. This was paid to married employees in lieu of rations to wives and children. At the present time a family allowance for African employees whose wives are resident with them at their place of work is paid at the following rates:—

Under 4 years' service	37s. 6d. per month
Over 4 years' service	60s. 0d. per month

25. Increased long service gratuities are now paid in accordance with the following scale:—

20 to 25 years' service	35% of the inclusive monthly wage at the date of completion of service, for each year of service.
25 to 30 years of continuous service	...	40%	“ ”
30 to 35 years of continuous service	...	45%	“ ”
35 years or more of continuous service	...	50%	“ ”

26. In 1958 a special allowance of 10s. a month was introduced to be paid to Railway African employees living in accommodation owned or leased by the Railways four miles or more distant from their place of work.

27. In 1951 a special allowance of 12s. 6d. per month was introduced for employees in itinerant gangs who occupy portable accommodation.

28. In 1953 an “Away From Home Allowance” was introduced at the rate of 6d. a day for a maximum period of ten consecutive days, and this rate has since been increased to 1s. 6d. per day for a maximum period of 60 consecutive days.

29. In 1951 a Special Shift Working Allowance was introduced, of 3s. per month. It is now 5s. per month.

Housing

30. During the period from 1st March, 1949, to 30th June, 1959, the Railways have provided 12,571 houses of various types for African employees and their families in both urban and rural areas. Including cost of services such as sanitation, roads, water reticulation, lighting, recreation halls, the total capital expenditure incurred is £2,850,000.

31. African employees are also accommodated in houses leased from Local Authorities. The present level of rental paid to the Local Authorities is £69,000 a year.

32. In 1957 it was decided to improve the standard Railway African urban house and this is now a four-roomed dwelling with a water closet and shower cubicle attached. Electric light is being provided. The plinth area is 456 square feet. The standard area of each plot is 70 ft. by 40 ft. and it is fenced. The buildings are of pre-cast concrete under asbestos roofing. Wood and coal burning stoves or electric hot-plates are being provided. Electricity is paid for by the occupant on the basis of a nominal charge; he only pays for water consumption in excess of 4,000 gallons a month.

Welfare

33. After the War an African Affairs Department was established, within which was incorporated a Welfare Section to organise and conduct welfare activities for the benefit of African staff and their dependants.

34. From small beginnings a trained staff of seven Europeans and 42 African welfare workers has been established. This staff is responsible for organising a comprehensive range of social and cultural pursuits in addition to dealing with individual cases of hardship, and helping with the alleviation of problems stemming from the de-tribalised and cosmopolitan nature of present-day urban African society.

35. The Railways have spent a substantial sum at major depots in providing sports fields, recreation halls, club rooms, beer halls, markets, schools, playground equipment and miscellaneous improvements. Grants from the Railways, coupled with funds raised on a self-help basis by local Railway African Welfare Committees have enabled an extensive range of equipment to be purchased for the day to day requirements of the Welfare Centres. The Railways have also provided specially for the welfare of rural gangs.

36. Facilities made available to Railway Africans today have not only provided them with a wider knowledge of life and standards of conduct, but have also succeeded in developing an esprit de corps. These include:—

For Employees:

Competitive Sport, Military Bands, Dance Bands, Recreational and Handicraft Clubs, Indoor and Outdoor Pastimes, Reading Rooms, Debating Societies and First-Aid Training.

For Wives:

Classes in Sewing, Knitting, Domestic Science, Hygiene, Pre- and Post-Natal Care, traditional modern crafts, Home and Garden Competitions, Home Nursing and Child Welfare.

For Children:

Youth Clubs, Boy Scouts, Girl Guides, Indoor and Outdoor Games, Handicrafts, Choirs, Holiday Camps, Training on “Outward Bound Schools” techniques.

For Family:

Radios for rural employees, Cinemas, Libraries, Railway African Newspaper, Home and Hospital Visits by Welfare Staffs, Traditional Crafts and Design, and other Social Functions and Entertainment.

Hygiene and Health

37. African Health Demonstrators now cover the whole Railway system. They receive an intensive three-months' course of instruction under the Hygiene Officer of the African Affairs Department and at the end of their course are required to pass an examination in theory and practice, of a high standard.

38. Propaganda and the practical example of the demonstrators has had a noticeable effect in an all-round improvement of standards of health and hygiene amongst Railway African employees, their families and their homes.

39. Many African Clinics are operated throughout the Railway system. These are staffed by trained and experienced medical orderlies under the supervision of European Nursing Sisters and Railway Medical Officers. Prior to 1951 no separate African clinics were available within a reasonable distance of Railway African townships. Prophylactic treatment is available for infectious diseases. First-Aid posts are provided where necessary, namely, Plate-layers Gangs, Relaying Gangs, etc.

Opportunities for Employment in More Responsible Work

40. Since the early days of the Railways there has been a division between categories of work carried out by Europeans and Africans. In general, labouring types of work were undertaken solely by Africans and the skilled and semi-skilled work and general administration was carried out by the European. Since 1954, the Railway Board and the Railway Management, in consultation with the Federal Government have made strenuous and sincere efforts to enable increased opportunities to be found for the employment of Africans in types of work hitherto confined to Europeans. In 1955 following discussions with members of the executives of the European Trade Unions, and the unofficial African Union, an officer of the Railway African Affairs Department was detailed to investigate work performed by Africans employed on Railways in territories adjoining the Federation and in industries in the Federation. This Officer's report was completed in 1956. It indicated the possibility of employing Africans in 25 categories of work previously confined to Europeans. In some cases it was considered that the work would require to be "diluted" to enable Africans to acquire the necessary levels of skill and responsibility; in some cases no such dilution was considered to be necessary.

41. The Railways persuaded representatives of the European Unions and the unofficial African Unions to join with representatives of the Railways to form a Standing Committee to make recommendations on African Advancement proposals and to discuss the means by which Africans could be employed in the 25 categories of work considered suitable for Africans. After some initial advances discussions broke down as a result of a hardening in the attitude of the European Unions. The European Unions insisted on the European rate for the job being applied, which meant in effect that there could be no dilution of jobs at present carried out by Europeans to enable them to be brought more readily within the scope of Africans. Unrealistic and "sheltered" rates of pay attaching to certain European jobs would require to be paid to Africans, with consequent repercussions on African employees in similar categories of work outside the Railways. Throughout these negotiations the unofficial Railway African Union and the Railway African employees have been most patient, restrained and co-operative in the interests of promoting an early understanding.

42. After protracted negotiations, complicated by political pressure, and by numerous newspaper articles and editorials agreement was eventually reached on the National Industrial Council for the Railways, representing only European interests. This agreement provided that there would be no dilution of European jobs, that Africans selected for employment in European jobs would, after training, undergo a two-year testing period during which period they would receive £10 per month less than the minimum basic European rate of pay, whilst retaining their African privileges of free housing and free medical services, etc. The unofficial African Union has expressed dissatisfaction with the agreement in view of the restriction on advancement which they feel would result.

43. The intention was that at the end of the two years' testing period if the Africans were found satisfactory they would be placed on a full rate for the job paid to the European and allowances and be required to pay rent for accommodation, and subscribe to the Medical Funds, etc., on the same basis as the Europeans. The attitude of the Europeans Union is that there should be no lowering of standards of work, nor any lowering of standards of pay.

44. The desire of the Railways is that there should be no racial barriers to employment, that wages should be paid in accordance with levels of skill and responsibility, and that persons selected for employment should be chosen on account of their ability and for no other reason. Apart from the obvious practical difficulties preventing the immediate implementation of such a policy the Railways have had to keep in mind the directive, embodied in paragraph 13 of this report that they should "take into account the interests of all other employees of the Railways and to consult closely on these questions with the representatives of the European and also the African employees".

45. A further difficulty has been the absence of any apprenticeship scheme or learnership scheme for Africans in skilled and semi-skilled jobs, respectively. Whilst the Railways see hopes of overcoming the difficulties as they affect learnership, they consider that the more difficult task of apprenticeship is one which can only be handled on a national scale. The Railways' understanding of the position is that technical schools, which are under the control of the Federal Government only provide for non-African education, and African education which is a territorial responsibility gives no opportunity for night technical education in conjunction with African apprenticeship.

46. The cardinal point which the Railways have always had to bear in mind is that in the final analysis, if advancement is to be effected by peaceful means, which are the only means the Railways are prepared to entertain, it is necessary that the European in Railway employment should be persuaded to accept the African in European work. This has meant that the Railways have had to avoid coercive methods and have had to rely on the development of a more sympathetic and understanding attitude on the part of the European Railwaymen, whose feelings are at present dominated by the fear that the work upon which they are engaged will no longer afford them and their children sheltered employment. The undertaking given to all existing European employees on the Railways that they would not suffer any reduction in pay and that they would not lose their employment has done little to ease the attitude of the European Unions.

47. The latest position is that the agreement reached on the National Industrial Council has been referred back to the Council by the Territorial Ministers with the request that certain amendments should be made before it is declared binding on all employees of the Railways. The main points involved in the suggested amendments are:—

- (a) complete removal of discrimination on grounds of race or colour for all jobs falling within the scope of the Council;

- (b) the creation of certain new jobs to which certain stated rates of pay are to apply;
- (c) guarantees of continued employment to railwaymen at present working in jobs covered by the new agreement;
- (d) application of the principle that every job should have one appropriate rate of pay and that this rate for the job shall apply to all persons doing that work;
- (e) the elimination of differential rates of pay which was suggested in respect of the testing period.

48. In regard to (b) above the new jobs proposed have scales of pay generally lower than the present minimum rates payable to Europeans and relate to certain grades of workers in the following occupations:—

Plant Operators.
Crane Drivers.
Drillers.
Road Motor Drivers (excluding Road Motor Service Drivers).
Dining Car Waiters.

49. The Territorial Ministers have also suggested that the agreement should be amended so as to require every person entering any of the following grades of employment to serve a trial period not exceeding twelve months compared with the present maximum period of six months:—

Transportation Department: Shunter, Number Taker, Wash-out Man, Fireman, Commercial Department: Checker, and Copy Typist.
African Affairs Department: Clerk (African Paysheets).
Accounts and Finance Department: Hollerith Punch Machine and Verifier Operator.
Chief Engineer's Department: Handyman, Class 2, Pumper.
Mechanical Department: Battery-hand, Machine Moulder and Core Maker, and Truck Fitter.
Stores Department: Storeman, and Handyman, Class 2.

50. The Ministers' proposals also include an assurance that no railwayman at present employed in any grade or class of work in any of the posts mentioned above, at the time of introduction of the new agreement, shall suffer any reduction in his remuneration, nor shall his eligibility for promotion be in any way impaired.

51. It appears that the effect of the Ministers' proposals will be that all posts on the Rhodesia Railways coming under the National Industrial Council will be open to all races.

52. By making special provision for certain posts as mentioned above, for which the rates of pay will be generally less than those paid to Europeans, which have their origin in suggestions made by the Railways at an early stage of the discussions with the European Unions, the Ministers appear to be making it easier for less educated persons to qualify for these posts. The Ministers' proposals also mean that all employees in these posts will receive all allowances that are normally paid to Europeans and that they will be expected to contribute on the same basis as Europeans for privileges such as pensions, medical, housing, etc., and to enjoy those privileges on the same basis as Europeans.

53. A meeting of the N.I.C. is to take place on the 3rd May, 1960, at which the agreement previously entered into with the N.I.C. and the amendments now suggested by the territorial Ministers will be considered.

African Trade Union

54. The Railways' views on African Trade Unions is that it is desirable for any Union to be a properly constituted and responsible organisation representing African Railway Workers' interests throughout the system. For some years there have been in existence organisations in Northern and Southern Rhodesia purporting to represent the Railway African workers, with which the Railways have been in the practice of carrying out unofficial negotiations. It has been the hope of the Railways that from these beginnings there would evolve a proper African Railway Workers' Union which would be officially recognised and properly constituted in the manner envisaged in the Second Schedule to the Rhodesia Railways Act of Southern Rhodesia.

55. It now seems likely that a Railway African Workers' Union will be registered and the Railways believe that the Territorial Governments, with whom the decision rests, are prepared to authorise its constitution.

Other Matters on which the Monckton Commission may wish to Hear the Railways' Views

56. The Railways believe that there are probably many other matters upon which they could usefully offer to give evidence to the Commission. They feel however that if an attempt is made to cover all these matters in written evidence, the Commission may find that it is being provided with some material with which it is not really concerned. The Rhodesia Railways, in addition to giving evidence on the points dealt with earlier in this paper, would be happy to assist in providing any further evidence the Commission may require on particular points which the Commission may wish to specify.

57. The Railways desire to conclude this paper with the general observation that the Rhodesia Railways, which have existed as an extra-territorial organisation since before Federation, would probably have proceeded, in the matters covered in this paper along lines similar to those they have followed, had there been no Federation. Nevertheless, they feel that the establishment of the Federation in 1953 resulted in the early formation of a climate of public opinion, particularly of European public opinion, in which it was made considerably easier, although never easy, for progress to be made in the advancement of the interests of Africans, not only as workers in the Railways but as persons in whose interests it is one of the duties of the Railways to provide efficient services.

Bulawayo

29th April 1960

Oral Evidence

RHODESIA RAILWAYS—Representatives: Mr. Grey (Chairman, Railway Board); Mr. Masterson (Vice-Chairman, Railway Board); Mr. Cordell (Chief Officer, African Affairs Department); Mr. Collis (Statistical Officer); Mr. Winterton (Staff Section, General Manager's Department).

Mr. Masterson said that he had previously filled the post of Secretary to the Railway Higher Authority, and more recently had been Chairman of the Committee appointed to go into the whole question of presentation of Rhodesia Railways evidence to the Commission. In their memorandum they had tried to be objective, but they were conscious that they might not have drawn attention to all the subjects in which the Commission might be particularly interested.

The constitutional position of Rhodesia Railways was not well known in the Federation. It was an autonomous organisation and had functions, Territorial and external, the latter in the Bechuanaland Protectorate. It was, in effect, in the nature of a public utility trust whose work was directed towards the interests of the users of the railways. In general, the Railway Board considered that political pressures tended to be inimical to the wider interests of the users.

Mr. Grey said that Rhodesia Railways were not truly Federal because they did not cover Nyasaland. The Railway Board met at least once a month, with meetings alternately in Salisbury and Bulawayo. After the establishment of Federation, the railway loans, for which Southern Rhodesia had previously been responsible, were transferred to the Federal Government. The Governments concerned had responsibility for sharing any losses that might arise; in fact there had not been such losses. The Higher Authority was now the Federal Minister of Transport.

In answer to questions, the following further points were made:—

- (a) The fact that governmental responsibility for Labour matters was Territorial raised certain difficulties, because two sets of Labour legislation had to be complied with. Particularly the Industrial Conciliation legislation was difficult as between Southern Rhodesia and Northern Rhodesia. In any negotiations with the trade unions, therefore, the Federal Government had to sit back and wait for the negotiations to end.
- (b) If for any reason there was a political need to help a particular industry, this could not be done by charging differential or favourable rates on the Railways. It was contrary to Railway policy to make one user subsidise another.
- (c) Although the Railway Board recognised that they could not be immune from public sentiment, they felt strongly that they could not be subject to too much political direction. No business could act in the interests of all its users if its affairs were subject to detailed public or parliamentary examination and criticism, or if its surplus funds in any particular year could be taken over by the Treasury.
- (d) If any industry felt that undue preference was being exercised against it, appeal could be made to the Higher Authority. There was provision for a tribunal to be set up to deal with both rates and the services provided. In the normal way, an industry would first appeal to the General Manager, who was responsible for fixing rates. If they failed to obtain satisfaction from him, they could appeal to the Railway Board, and from the Board to the Higher Authority. If prima facie evidence appeared to exist, the Higher Authority could then set up a specially constituted tribunal.

- (e) African advancement had not taken place as rapidly as many would have liked. Nevertheless, there had been a striking relative improvement in the conditions of pay for Africans. For example, while the average rate of pay for Europeans had risen from £668 per annum in 1947 to £1,235 per annum in 1959, the average African wage had increased over the same period from £29 to £140, an increase of 4½ times. Although a number of new senior posts for Africans had been created in the same period, there had been little direct advancement into the European sphere. Negotiations were going on at the same time that the present evidence was being given in the National Industrial Council, and it was hoped that this would result in agreement to redesignate a number of jobs in the interests of African advancement.
- (f) The management was very much alive to this problem and they were hopeful of a satisfactory outcome. During the negotiations the African trade unions had been very tolerant—more so, indeed, than the European unions—but it must be appreciated that European fears of losing employment were not less serious than those of Africans. The management's aim was to try to hold the scales as evenly as possible.
- (g) There had been much criticism of the importation of Europeans, particularly Italians, during the period immediately following the war. This policy had been forced on the management by the Governments concerned as a result of an advisory mission by Sir Miles Thomas. The growth of industry in the Federal area had been expensive after the war, and all the Governments concerned had had the obsession to get ahead of the increased traffic which had been offering. This state of affairs had been achieved at the beginning of 1957, since when African advancement had gone ahead. There was no danger of a "crash" policy of this sort being introduced again; it had been a "once for all" affair to meet a very special requirement.
- (h) Although complaints of discrimination against African passengers had been justified in the past, such discrimination should not now occur. Accommodation and booking facilities for first and second class passengers were provided without colour discrimination. It was recognised that incidents had occurred in dining cars, but the introduction of African waiters should help to minimise this in future.

Memorandum

F. GROSSMAN

If the European and African are to live in a state of partnership and we hope to make a success of Federation, it is of vital importance that the exploitation of the African, particularly if such exploitation is robbing him of hundreds of thousands of pounds, is investigated and suppressed without delay, as this state of affairs will no doubt sooner or later lead to serious repercussions.

I am referring to the monies of which the African Welfare and Development funds are being deprived by a syndicate consisting of a handful of unscrupulous people, and a further score or so who are receiving money in varying amounts to allow this state of affairs to continue.

It is the law of the country that only Municipalities, Town Management Boards and certain industries with special permits are allowed to make and sell African Beer, and the law states that the profits from the sale of such beer may only be used for African welfare and benefits. However, when these laws were framed no-one anticipated that a racket would be evolved to deprive the African of the major portion of this enormous source of revenue.

In the past, the Mines, etc. brewed the beer and the profits went to welfare funds, and this is still largely the case in Southern Rhodesia. For instance, in Salisbury during the last 12 months the sales of beer have given the African welfare funds around £150,000, and the same in a lesser degree applies to all the Municipalities and mines, etc. in Southern Rhodesia.

The same was formerly the case in Northern Rhodesia, but some years back (in 1955) a syndicate was formed by a German (who was interned during the war) for the purpose of brewing African beer, and by means of bribing and corrupting those who could be of assistance to him, he has virtually obtained a monopoly of brewing African beer in Northern Rhodesia.

As a result of this bribery in the right quarters, the Municipalities and Mines gave up the breweries and sold or leased these to the Syndicate. At that time the Syndicate charged the Municipalities 1/6d. to 1/6½d. per gallon and the Municipalities resold for 2/6d., giving a profit to the Welfare funds, but the African was not satisfied to pay such a high price and this led to constant trouble, riots and boycotts, with the result that the Municipalities had to reduce their price to 2/-.

The average cost of producing African beer by the various Municipalities is between 9½d. and 11½d. per gallon, so that the Syndicate, brewing in such enormous quantities, should be able to produce at 9½d. to 10d., but for the sake of argument let us call it 1/-. Last year the Syndicate sold over 12 million gallons of beer and under normal business methods should have made a profit of £300,000, but not one penny of this reached the African Welfare or Development funds. The Municipalities, on the other hand, each of whom of course only sells a small proportion of the total quantity manufactured, adds 6d. to their cost and out of this they have to pay:

Interest on money borrowed for the building of beer halls;
Salaries of European Beer Hall Supervisors;
Electricity and water;
Administration charges;
African staff at the Beer Halls;
Special Beer Hall Police;
Purchase of mugs, etc., etc.;
Wastage and spillage, etc.;

and the Welfare funds receive little or no money.

Why have we not had more outcries from the Africans? Because their leaders, such as Kaunda and Nkumbula, are receiving cash payments from the Syndicate.

If the brewing of African beer is allowed by private enterprise, why should the excessive profits not be payable to African Welfare, or why is this beer not taxed (excise duty) at source? European beer sales pay such duty for the benefit of the population as a whole.

Why does the Syndicate only reflect a profit of around £100,000 instead of £300,000 and more? Because the salaries drawn by some of the Directors are enormous, e.g.:

Dr. Coetzee	£500	per month
Mrs. Ilma Branson	£450	per month
Mr. Max Heinrich	£4,500	per month

A perusal of the list of shareholders reveals an outstanding example of how the Syndicate is protecting its interests and the following are a few of these:
Heinrich Syndicate Ltd.

Max Heinrich	40,800	shares
John Heinrich (his son)	36,000	"
Mrs. Branson	48,000	"
Dr. Coetzee	48,294	"

Dr. Coetzee received this large shareholding free of cost when he held the position of Chief Medical Officer of Health at Ndola.

Petrus Ferreira, Director of African Affairs	2,400	shares
John Dodd, C.I.D. Inspector, Kitwe	1,200	"
Stefanus Venter, Health Officer, Nkana	3,600	"
Dr. Lewin Woolf	9,600	"
Wilfred Raffo, African Beer Hall Manager, Bancroft	4,000	"
Edmund Gordon, Health Officer, Nkana	4,800	"
John F. Matheson, Police Superintendent, Bwana Mkubwa	2,400	"
John Francis Finnigan, Director of African Affairs, Luanshya	1,500	"
Victor Kestell Francis, Director of African Affairs, Broken Hill	500	"

We then get such shareholdings as:

Renati Natali, Maitre d'Hotel, Johannesburg	23,940	shares
Vionia Filip, Beautician, Ndola	1,000	"
Further shareholdings are:
Dr. van Blommestein, Chief Medical Officer of Health of the Anglo-American Corporation	19,200	"
Osborn Bakery, Ltd., the Company of the Macintyre family (Federal Minister of Finance)	23,040	" and obviously many shareholders have hidden their identities by nominee holdings.

I have invented a process for the manufacture of African beer equal to any produced by the Syndicate and have offered this to the Northern Rhodesia Municipalities at 11d. per gallon. I have also visited the Copperbelt, but in most cases could not even obtain a hearing; where I did, it was, of course, without success and I was informed later, "Oh, Mr. — has a shareholding in the Syndicate" and it is therefore practically impossible to break into the market, even if it means money for African welfare.

Recently the Syndicate tried to obtain the concession from the Lusaka Town Council and offered all kinds of inducements to effect a take-over. The following are a few extracts from the Council's meeting on this matter as published in the Central African Post of October 12, 1959:

"The Town Treasurer considers that the Syndicate's offer gives a misleading financial impression" and

"The Lusaka Town Council's profits have increased 45 times from 1955 to 1959 on the sale of beer."

"In 1960 the rental value of the Council's brewery will not be the Syndicate's offered £400 but £4,000."

"Council's revenue from the Syndicate's purchase of 3 plots would be £120 a year compared with a loss of revenue from beer purchases of £29,000, rising to £100,000 a year."

He considered that the provision of small pubs in place of large central Beer Halls (which the Council would have to pay for by repayment to the Syndicate) would further reduce the profit on the sales of beer and might even eliminate any profit.

The Town Treasurer estimated selling costs at 6½d. per gallon. If beer was bought at 1/6d. per gallon (the present price — which is higher than on the Copperbelt) the profit of 3½d. per gallon could be used up in additional administrative and running costs of small pubs. He added: "The brewing of beer is a far more profitable activity than the selling of beer", and further said: "Can it justify handing over to private enterprise a share of public funds which will shortly be in the region of £100,000 per annum?"

This is one instance where obviously honesty prevailed and the Syndicate's offer was rejected, but on the Copperbelt and in other towns the Syndicate was successful. However, sooner or later there will be serious repercussions, and this, to the honest thinking man will be rightly so.

The tentacles of the Syndicate are now spreading into Nyasaland and Southern Rhodesia, where they are breaking my patents by producing beer and Mahewu (another African beverage) by a process patented by me, but I am powerless to fight this matter as I just cannot match their enormous financial resources. I am, therefore, like the African, deprived of my legal rights.

In conclusion, I would like to stress that if partnership and the Federation are to succeed, then it is of the utmost importance that the African is given an honest deal and that which is legally due to him.

Oral Evidence

F. GROSSMAN

Mr. Grossman said that he was Managing Director and Chairman of Farm Foods Ltd., a firm manufacturing food mainly for Africans and having a factory in Gwelo.

The witness submitted a written memorandum giving an example of what he considered to be the exploitation by a private enterprise of Africans on the Copperbelt. This related to the sale of beer by a private syndicate (the Heinrich Syndicate Ltd.) who had obtained a monopoly for the production of Kaffir beer on the Copperbelt.

The witness said that during 1959 12 million gallons of beer had been sold by the Syndicate. He calculated that manufacturing costs amounted to 9d. or 10d. a gallon, which was sold to municipal councils at 1s. 6d. a gallon. The retail price to Africans was 2s. a gallon. On the conservative assumption that the profit to the Syndicate was 6d. a gallon, not less than £300,000 had been made by the syndicate during the year. The law provided that the profits from the sales of African beer should be applied to African welfare. Nevertheless, this large profit had been retained entirely in the hands of the manufacturing company. Out of the retail margin of 6d. a gallon kept by the municipalities concerned, a very high proportion went on administrative costs and only a very small sum was eventually available for welfare purposes. In the witness's view, the failure to devote large sums to African welfare might well be responsible for some of the troubles now centring around beer halls in Northern Rhodesia.

Unfortunately, shares in the Heinrich Syndicate were held by a very large number of people in positions of authority, including mayors, compound managers, police officers and, indirectly through nominees, Ministers and municipal officers. Contrary to reasonable practice, the municipalities concerned did not call for competitive tenders for the manufacture of beer, but had accepted offers made to them by the Syndicate. No fewer than 160,000 shares in the Syndicate had been issued for considerations other than cash, including a large parcel to Dr. Coetzee, formerly the Medical Officer of Health at Kitwe. The Federal Minister of Finance was also associated with the Syndicate.

CEA

The witness produced lists of shareholders in the Syndicate and other associated companies, showing that certain directors, including Mr. Max Heinrich, received up to £4,500 a month as remuneration.

The witness said that it was generally accepted that "small fiddles" went on in connection with some 80 per cent of the breweries, whether municipal or otherwise, brewing African beer. In view of the enormous sums which had been made available, for example in Salisbury, to African welfare from the sale of beer, these "fiddles" were relatively harmless. Profits made by the Heinrich Syndicate, however, were out of all proportion to the sums available to African welfare in Northern Rhodesia. Fortunately, the Lusaka Municipality had been aware of the dangers and had recently turned down an offer by the Heinrich Syndicate.

The witness represented that, quite apart from any possible corruption in connection with the issue of a permit to the Heinrich Syndicate, the law laid down that only municipalities, town management boards, and certain industries employing large labour forces (who were granted special permits) were allowed to make and sell African beer, and the law stated that the profits from the sale of such beer could only be used for African welfare and benefits. Prima facie, therefore, the retention of such large profits by a public company was contrary to the spirit of the law.

The witness disclosed a personal interest in the matter in that he had been attempting to compete with the Syndicate in the manufacture of African beer.

R. H. JAMES

The witness said that he was the son of an English Admiral, and had served in the Royal Marines during the war. He had been demobilised in 1946, and had then started farming in Southern Rhodesia at Umyukwes.

Mr. James said that he hoped that the terms of reference of the Commission did not rule out the breaking up of the Federation. Southern Rhodesia had been induced to join the Federation for two reasons; to get financial benefits for herself, and to give political stability to the Northern Territories; but the latter had not achieved stability. The Federation provided a bridge between the conditions of Southern Rhodesia and those of the Northern Territories.

He thought that racial harmony would develop only if it were possible to build up in Southern Rhodesia a bond of loyalty and a feeling of common purpose in the Community.

He was in favour of removing all "pin pricks" from the indigenous people. In Southern Rhodesia, what was needed was a sense of patriotism among both Europeans and Africans. At present there was no sufficient common tie between Europeans and Africans to build up a nation.

He asked the Commission to consider the breaking up of the Federation, and to think of the possibilities of a purely technical type of association on the lines of the East Africa High Commission.

There was already a feeling in Southern Rhodesia adverse to the influx of labourers from the Northern Territories. Mr. James said that he employed 120 labourers, mostly from Nyasaland, and 17 of them had been with him for 13 years, nearly as long as he had been in the country. He then spoke of the teacher whom he had employed to teach the children of his labourers on the farm. There were 140 children in the school, and the standard had now been raised to Standard V, and next year he hoped that teaching would go to Standard VI. When recently he had said that he would get a Nyasaland teacher to teach the children in their own vernacular, the head teacher had been upset, and had protested that this would only put a Southern Rhodesian teacher out of a job. He thought it a good sign that this man should have thought of himself more as a Southern Rhodesian than simply as an African.

He himself had come out to Southern Rhodesia with no preconceived ideas. He had heard much talk of the idleness of the Africans, but this was partly due to their poor health and living conditions. Some Europeans who came out to the country also became very idle. He would not describe himself as a negro-phile; but he was prepared to see everyone treated on the same basis. He would not mind it at all if the colour bar were abolished. But the Africans themselves would scream about it. Their land would immediately come up for sale, and there would be a free inter-change of commodities; when the economic consequences were realised by the Africans there would be more outcries. Nevertheless there was too much fear and prejudice in the country; when the Post Offices were made inter-racial there had been no fuss, and he thought that no one would really mind dining with Africans at the Ambassador or Meikles; in fact those things were bound to come. Either the colour bar here had to be whittled away or the results would be the same as in South Africa; at any rate the tension in the country would make life unendurable. The people in Southern Rhodesia wanted harmony and peace. Some people had come out to the country to better themselves, and some from a sense of adventure. He himself would like to see Southern Rhodesia as a nation on its own. He was disturbed by the torrent of abuse and criticism from home, which tended to make people anglo-phobe. He could understand now why South Africa wanted to be a Republic—they wanted to have a nation for themselves. It had been just the same at the time of the Boston Tea Party. If this criticism from the United Kingdom went on, it would merely solidify European opinion in Southern Rhodesia.

There were so many tribes in Southern Rhodesia, mainly of Zulu extraction. Matabeleland had been occupied by right of conquest. He had heard old African tales of inter-tribal warfare. But there was now a greater feeling of security in the country, and a spirit of co-operation and African willingness to learn. He thought this was lacking in Nyasaland, which he also knew; he knew nothing about Northern Rhodesia; but the stoning of cars up there did not seem to be civilised behaviour.

He considered the Africans of Southern Rhodesia more civilised than those in the North, because of closer contacts with Europeans. He recognised, however, that the European influences in Southern Rhodesia were not without blemish.

In regard to the Federal concept, he doubted whether any Africans would ever say "I am a Federal citizen" or "I am a Federalee". But if Southern Rhodesia were to be separated it might be possible to get a common loyalty, even inter-racially, among her peoples.

In reply to questions Mr. James made the following further points:—

(1) He belonged to no political party. He had voted for Federation because he thought it would supply a larger unit in the modern world. But he now feared the pace of political development in the Northern Territories. He was afraid of the wholesale political advances in the North, which would then be applied to the Federation, and in turn to Southern Rhodesia.

(2) He had naturally given some consideration to the financial implications of Southern Rhodesia "going it alone". He agreed that development would be slowed down, but he did not think that the Africans would suffer. Southern Rhodesia would be an independent viable unit; and there would be a surplus of African labour arising from the implementation of the Land Husbandry Act which would be absorbed into industries. He was also suspicious of financial arguments because no country had ever really gone on the rocks financially.

(3) He referred again to the attitude of the South African Government in wishing to have a Republic. He thought they were right to do so, so that people would no longer look over their shoulders towards England and Holland. It was different in Canada, where the French had no pretensions; the remainder of the population there were largely Irish. Australia was largely populated by people of British stock, and they had been able to absorb other emigrants; in that country there was no great mass of Italians, Hollanders, or others. He had noticed that his friends in South Africa tended very much to have a British background.

(4) He thought it would be a great mistake to keep the Federation together. The Africans of Nyasaland wanted their independence, and to be given self-government inside the Federation was not the same thing. Northern Rhodesia should also be made free. He was quite sure that Southern Rhodesia would be able to "go it alone". The financial arguments were only a red herring drawn across the trail.

(5) If the Commission did not do the sensible thing and break up the Federation, then at any rate there should be a large transfer of powers to the Territorial Governments. It was not a question of being afraid of what was happening in the Northern Territories; but he thought that they were being pushed politically beyond their capabilities. Africans in Southern Rhodesia ought not to be pushed on in the same way politically in preference to giving them economic advancement. If it came to the point of holding the Federation together by force you could not possibly get a homogeneous nation. The great thing was for Southern Rhodesia to be on its own. He said he had held these opinions since about 1955 or 1956. Although the Federal Government had overriding responsibilities in its own sphere, it was at that time that the British Government had advanced the Northern Territories Constitutions much too far.

(6) It would help greatly if the United Kingdom would make a gift of ten million pounds for the setting up of a full system of registration of births, deaths and marriages for Africans; then it would be no longer necessary to have a system of passes.

(7) He had no objection to a close association of the Territories on the economic side only; but there should only be a kind of consultative body with, for example, mortgages over Kariba and similar schemes.

(8) He would agree to moderate diminution of franchise qualifications over the next ten years; but he did not like time-tables.

(9) He was quite clear that he would sever political connexions with the Northern Territories. He wanted to make a nation of Southern Rhodesia, and equally he wanted no union with South Africa. That would only shake the confidence of Africans in Southern Rhodesia in Europeans.

(10) He knew that there was a great deal of pressure from what was called "big business" to keep the Federation going. It had to be remembered that in 1953 Southern Rhodesia was solvent, although it now had commitments beyond its means. But equally Nyasaland had had more than her fair share of the Federal revenues. If there was a process of "paying back" perhaps Southern Rhodesia would get something out of it.

(11) He was questioned as to whether he applied the same attitude to finance to his farm; and he replied that he made a profit on his farm.

M. FRIED

Mr. Fried informed the Commission that he was a food farmer of Mazoe and that he had been in Rhodesia for 23 years. He was born in Germany and had experience of nationalistic mob rule there. He was married and had five children all of whom were born in Rhodesia. Mr. Fried produced a memorandum which he read and expanded to the Commission. The memorandum was in the following terms:

'Agriculture stands on the threshold of great things. We have gathered much knowledge. Where I used to get four to five bags of maize I now get twenty or thereabouts. Where one beast was run to about twenty-five acres we can with the new methods run a beast to two acres. I have myself produced milk at a cost of 1/7d. to 1/8d. per gallon, vegetables are wholesale sold at two pennies a pound and I produce eggs at about two shillings and sixpence a dozen. These prices could still be reduced, I feel, with more research for which we have no money. We have not touched the managerial problems, etc.

I am saying this because I would like you to see that the African is now at last with rising wages in the position to afford food and particularly animal protein. The bulk of our population in this country lives on only forty-five per cent of the protein (animal) that is the minimum requirement and I have been given to understand that in the northern Territories the position is worse.

I believe that no human being can become a productive person without food and health. Our population is riddled with disease and particularly in the towns desperately undernourished.

Now in order to produce more food, more consumer goods, etc. we need stability, confidence in the future. This is particularly so with the sections who have invested much and have much at stake.

Stability can only be created by removing artificial barriers which irritate, and create goodwill and understanding amongst all sections, and by removing grievances.

Before coming to these grievances I would like to add that I think it is most important that all terms used so often loosely should be clearly defined. What is partnership . . . whose definition is right; left, centre or right? What is a citizen and where does he differ from a voter . . . or does he not perhaps? What are a citizen's rights and what are a voter's? Having defined terms I should like to talk about the grievances and their solution.

The franchise. I favour a low qualification, which once and for all settles the subject and stops the turning of the franchise into a political yardstick cum barometer. Literacy in English, which is equivalent to perhaps a standard six. If there is any doubt about a voter he should perhaps be given a simple dictation in front of a small jury.

Once a man becomes a full citizen all restrictions should be removed. He becomes a full citizen with all its rights, duties and responsibilities. If he is an African he ceases to be administered by the Native Department.

The Land Apportionment Act should be repealed. All citizens should be allowed to buy and sell land anywhere they wish, subject to the laws of municipalities with regards to the number of people per room, etc. and in the country subject to good farming practices.

The Native Dept. would nevertheless still have a very important part to play. They would still have to look after all the protected people who still live under a feudal system. The farmers in the intensively farmed areas would still continue to assist the government with administering to the sick and would continue to arbitrate in minor strifes. And a good thing for the government too, because it saves them an awful lot of money and bother. As more and more people are transferred from the N.D. to full citizenship so that department would contract and eventually when not required any more and when all protected persons have become citizens it could close down or perhaps be converted into a welfare dept.

The reserves would eventually be turned into freeholds and thus become part and parcel of the economic framework. Subsistence farmers could when they become citizens with borrowing power be turned into a valuable part of our economy but of course they would on becoming citizens give up the doubtful advantage of living as protected people in reserves and become citizens living where they wished.

The European areas now thrown open to citizens would become the intensively farmed areas open to all who can satisfy the demands of I.C.A.s and farm to approved standards, and perhaps hold master farmers certificates or have the requisite knowledge. Farmers might assist the younger members of the community and the people who are short of cash by leasing, again with full regard to the standards of farming, acreages, etc. This might also alleviate the pressure on land. Finance for all citizens to be made available on the usual terms and under the usual conditions. I think it is important there that inexperienced citizens should be warned and advised on the judicious use of credit and its very great danger when used unwisely.

The confidence of the established farmers, mostly European, must at all costs be maintained. These people, with their terrific investment and an unlimited potential must not be alienated. A third of all labour in the country is employed by the farming community and their need of labour is still great. It might take ten years to train a native commissioner to become of real value—I assure you that it takes just as long to make a farmer, and then he is just at the threshold of knowledge and experience. I must confess here that I need to spend out of capital and loan fund about two thousand pounds and I am only a small farmer and will not. Just imagine how much is held back by this feeling of insecurity. And land not opened or developed is as useless as a desert.

Education should be fused from the top. Secondary education should be the next object, but full integration can only be achieved if and when English becomes the mother tongue of all citizens. It is important that emphasis be placed on the dignity of labour. There is too much emphasis on academic education. I think we are out of step there with the rest of the world. The ratio should be about one academic to nine technical institutions.

Integration in industry. The rate for the job may be the ideal. But in many cases the job is grossly overpaid. On the railways a steward may get 80 pounds. He is not giving the community the service for this money. There without antagonizing the man, the answer seems to be fragmentation. The steward retains his job, but the job is graded down and an efficiency barrier between the various grades introduced. In commerce these things seem to sort themselves out by themselves. We used to have European drivers of buses and petrol lorries. Now the job has been taken over by Africans and they are making a good job of it. In my personal experience they are polite and efficient. Yet the job is not barred to Europeans, or at least should not be. In a tobacco company European and African clerks work side by side serving customers, and they seem to have a harmonious atmosphere there. Unheard of when I first came here.

The greatest stumbling block to the happiness of the people seems to be the doctrine of exaggerated nationalism. On either side there is a core of people pouring bad will into the community and poisoning the hearts of citizens. I am afraid some of them might never find happiness here and they would be better off elsewhere. The moderate is by nature happy and well-balanced, and perhaps not as intense as the extremist, but here with many problems besetting him, he will have to rule with firmness. The principles we all believe in must be defended by firm and just rule, even though it may seem hard at times. There is so much illwill, so much superstition and ignorance. The religious bodies, educational authorities and all moderate citizens will have to try to educate the masses. Every citizen should be made an ambassador of the ideal. There is still plenty of latitude in the framework of multi-racialism for expressing one's beliefs as long as they are not treasonable against the ideals of the state.

The moderate element will play a most important part there in the binding together of the nation. But no nation will prosper if from the outset one section tries to outdo the other. No nation will survive if one section appeals to the outside.

A way must be found to rule from here, and not from far away. The constitution must entrench the freedom of all people and the courts must be forever outside the pressure of the state.

I sincerely pray that you may so tap the collective wisdom of the people of this country, that we can look forward to a long period of peace and prosperity for all the people of this beautiful country which is also my home, the only one I have, and the happiest day for me would be if a European would be elected by Africans and an African by Europeans.

Confidence, goodwill, happiness . . . if we fail it will be sad for us who can go, because we have some skill and ability, but it will be sadder still for those who will stay, for then it will all have been in vain for them too.

I hope we will succeed and go forward to a happy time when the labourites and conservatives in this country can have a really good fight.

One question was put to Mr. Fried and this concerned the acquiring of citizenship by an African. He said that when a man attained citizenship then his (Mr. Fried's) concept was that he would be free to come and go as he wished, but other Africans would remain under the Native Affairs Department. Those who attained citizenship and lived in the reserves should be given an opportunity to take title to their land. It was true that for the time being they would have to remain under the general administration of the Native Affairs Department but they would have all the other rights, duties and responsibilities of any citizen.

SALISBURY

5TH MAY, 1960

Memorandum

SIR ANTHONY GRAFFTEY-SMITH—Governor of the Bank of Rhodesia and Nyasaland

In all public discussion and argument about the effects and future prospects of the Federation, the economic issues usually rate low and are indeed often ignored altogether. Yet, it cannot be denied that the economic motive was a crucial, if not the paramount factor, behind the federal concept. It is, perhaps, going too far to say that the success or failure of Federation should be judged by the results in the economic field alone; but, negatively, it would seem fair to say that if Federation had not accelerated the growth of the economy, the whole concept could, with justice, be written off as unsuccessful. It is not difficult to show that this has not been the case, whether looked at from the general or the individual territories' points of view.

2. On the economic side, Federation wrought a more fundamental change than anything, on the constitutional or political levels. Whether consciously realised or not, the effect of Federation was to create nothing less than a closely integrated economic union of the three territories. The changes involved the establishment of a full customs union with a common external tariff; the creation of new economic institutions; a co-ordinated investment plan; centralised external borrowing; pooled reserves; and the further development of a single monetary system, the elements of which, it is true, had been in existence even before 1953. The only important exception to full economic integration was on the fiscal side; each of the three territories retains a fair degree of autonomy in the raising of revenues and control of expenditure, although the Federal Government occupies a pre-dominating position in these matters.

3. Once the distinction between the economic and political consequences of Federation is appreciated, an entirely new light is thrown on the arguments and counter-arguments about the shares of the total gain which each territory is supposed to have obtained out of Federation. Since the effect was to create an integrated economic union, questions of relative territorial advantage are, if not wholly irrelevant, somewhat artificial, and all the more so because the premise on which the case is based is often invalid. Thus, for instance, to argue that Southern Rhodesia has benefited unduly by the concentration in this territory of the major part of industrial expansion in recent years is to ignore entirely the fact that the creation of the larger national market itself ensured that industry would tend, by the operation of normal economic laws, to become concentrated somewhere in the new economic unit. The main operative factors bringing about its localisation in Southern Rhodesia were, no doubt, the rail, road and air services, the proximity to the ports and to the Union of South Africa, and the existence of a pool of high spending power arising from the rich tobacco and maize farming centres in this territory. Once industry had begun to concentrate in Salisbury and Bulawayo its growth in these centres became in a sense self-sustaining as more spending power was released, although to a lesser extent, the two Northern Territories have also progressed in the industrial field. This would have occurred even less if they had remained as independent territories; and there would have been a greater tendency to rely on supplies from the Union of South Africa and Southern Rhodesia.

4. The simple truth of the matter is, that in an economic, no less than in a marital, union there is little to be gained by trying to assess which party has benefited the more. What matters is whether the marriage has resulted in a gain to the common weal.

Looked at in this light, it would be difficult for anyone to deny that Federation has led to a general increase in economic welfare. A quick glance at the national income statistics is sufficient to show that in the period from 1953 to 1958 (the latest figures at present available) the total increase in net national income was of the order of £113 million, at an annual compound rate of increase of no less than 7½ per cent. Even if allowance is made for the general increase in the price level during this period, the increase in the real national income of £72 million was by no means unimpressive. And, if the account is taken of the growth of the population, the annual compound rate of increase of real national income per head works out at 2 per cent—a figure which compares more than well with most other developing countries.

5. From the general point of view, therefore, I do not think it is possible to deny that, economically, Federation has been a success. The gain, moreover, has not been confined solely to a rapid expansion of the national income, and it is an unquestionable fact that the Federation, with its more diversified economy, is a great deal more stable than any one of the three territories would have been if left to face the winds of economic change on its own.

6. It has been said that the Federation has had too short a life to prove itself one way or another. On the political side this may well be so; but it is far from true of the economic aspects. Federation has, I submit, fully proved itself to be an economically viable unit and one capable, in the right conditions, of sustaining a rapid rate of growth to the material benefit of all its citizens. More than this, however, it is important to realise that the economics of the three territories have during the past six years been fused into a single closely integrated and mutually interdependent economic union. Any change which has the effect of disrupting this economic union is bound, therefore, to involve serious loss and, whatever the short-term political advantages which they may hope to achieve, not one of the three territories can expect to profit out of its break-up.

7. In many respects the Federation has become a victim of its own success. Everyone has become so accustomed to thinking and acting federally in economic matters that few stop to consider the implications of its disintegration. It is plain, for instance, that much of the development since 1953 has been orientated towards the needs of the internal economy with a market of roughly 8 million. If the Federation breaks up, there is little doubt that many of the country's most prized and expensive developments would cease to be economically feasible. For instance, much of Southern Rhodesia's industrial development which, it should be remembered, has not benefited this territory alone but has given employment directly and indirectly to many thousands of workers from the other territories, would become otiose: contraction would be inevitable.

8. As I have said earlier, it is not difficult to demonstrate that, from the point of view of the individual territories, Federation has been a success in the economic field. The following table bears ample witness to the interdependence of the three territories, with particular reference to movements in the price of copper. It should be noticed that in 1957, when copper prices fell sharply, the Northern Rhodesian share of the gross domestic product fell from £187 million in 1956 to £160 million in 1957, whereas the Southern Rhodesian figure rose from £217 million to £241 million. This is surely a perfect example of how a Federation should work.

9. The benefits to Southern Rhodesia have been touched on earlier, and are so obvious that they need no elaboration.

10. In the case of Northern Rhodesia, it is, of course, true that when the price of copper is extremely high, less flows into the coffers of the Northern Rhodesian Treasury than would have been the case before Federation. Although copper is an embarrassingly large egg in the Federal basket, in the context of Northern Rhodesia, it is dangerously close to making the country a mono-economy. When the price of copper is low, the pooling of resources does materially assist Northern Rhodesia, as will be clearly seen from the table set out above. On two small but important issues, it should also be remembered that the act of Federation disposed of the considerable fiscal payment that Northern Rhodesia used to receive from the Union of South Africa, and also brought about some beneficial modification of the Congo Basin Treaty. But these are minor points, and one has only to envisage a really low price for copper to realise how much Northern Rhodesia would be happy to rely upon the gold, chrome, asbestos, coal, and tobacco of her Southern neighbour.

11. And what of Nyasaland, which has always been the poorest relation in the Federation?

12. At the time of the referendum a substantial body of opinion in the two Rhodesias was reluctant to accept Nyasaland into the merger on the grounds that it would contribute nothing but labour—which would be available in any case—and would prove to be a drain on the financial resources of the Federal Government.

13. It is fortunate for the Commission that they have to hand such an up-to-date, comprehensive and impartial document as the Jack Report. This survey was commissioned in November, 1957, in general, to examine economic conditions, and it provides up-to-date information up to about May/June, 1959. Those engaged in the survey were left in no doubt of the economic benefits and, in particular, the fiscal advantages which accrued to Nyasaland from the act of Federation. In the fourth paragraph of its first chapter, the Report gives considerable emphasis to this point, viz. "We are convinced that the country's economic development has been accelerated as a direct consequence of its federal association with the two Rhodesias, and that the economic benefits which have been enjoyed have been substantial. We think it right to state this view in the forefront of our Report . . . the evidence is conclusive that the greater rate of economic development which has occurred since 1953 must be attributed to the constitutional changes which were made in that year and that this greater rate of development could not be maintained if Nyasaland were to depend entirely upon its own resources."

14. From the outset of Federation, the fiscal advantages to Nyasaland were abundantly clear: at a stroke of the pen, the Government became financially responsible for far fewer services whilst enjoying larger revenue. Without setting out figures in tabular form, it is undeniable that the cost of Government services in Nyasaland is subsidised by revenue derived from the rest of the Federation to the extent of £2,750,000 a year.

15. The Jack Report points out that if the "Federal prop" were removed, a grant-in-aid of about £3,000,000 a year would become necessary.

16. In the field of public capital expenditure, the same pattern is discernible. In the three years before Federation, this averaged £1.23 million and in the three years following Federation, total expenditure by both Governments averaged £3.6 million—a threefold increase. Prior to 1953, Nyasaland was able to raise only one loan for development, but with the growth of the local capital market and the credit-worthiness of the Federation, Nyasaland has been able to share in four Federal loans raised abroad, and in five issues of local registered stock. Once again the Jack Report is unequivocal, viz. "There can be little doubt that without the support which it receives from the rest of the Federation, the Nyasaland Government's ability to raise external loans would be greatly reduced. In the absence of the provision of alternative funds this would mean not merely that several new lines of public development could no longer be contemplated but that certain present lines of development could not be sustained."

17. It is my own personal opinion that Nyasaland would, in the foreseeable future, have no chance whatever of borrowing abroad or locally in its own name. The Federal Government is itself experiencing difficulty, not unconnected with the emergency in Nyasaland, in securing long-term funds in London. For a variety of reasons, including the proposed amendments to the Trustee Act in Great Britain, gilt-edged generally are a friendless market and African issues in particular have experienced sharp falls in price. In the realm of public borrowing, there would be no hope whatever of Nyasaland "going it alone".

18. The increase in public investment, which I have mentioned, brought in its train some substantial private capital into secondary industry. In its turn, this brought a substantial increase in African employment. Private investment in agriculture, the backbone of the economy, also rose. The trend for which the Government was hoping in agriculture was to see further reductions in subsistence cultivation and increased concentration on cash crops. I need hardly point out that a change of this nature will provide the necessary spending power needed to stimulate the growth of secondary industry.

19. No one can deny that the Federation has provided great benefits to Nyasaland; even outside its borders, employment opportunities exist in the other two territories for those many who are unable to secure a reasonable standing of living in their own homeland. It would be a major tragedy if the political situation, which without doubt is putting the brake on economic enterprise in Nyasaland, were allowed to deprive the people of that country of the obvious benefits which must accrue—as has been proved by the past—from participation in a large and expanding economy.

20. To return to the Federation as a whole, it is generally accepted that capital investment, financed in the main by the inflow of foreign money, has been largely responsible for the country's rapid growth. In its formative years, the Federation successfully accomplished a rate of capital investment which few countries in the world could have equalled. The ratio of gross domestic capital formation to the national product in the period 1953 to 1958 averaged as much as 36 per cent—a figure well in excess of the average and higher than in most other countries in a similar stage of development.

21. As mentioned earlier, this pace of advance could not have been sustained without resort to the external capital provided to a large extent from the United Kingdom. With the expansion of the economy and the growth of the national income, an increasing proportion of investment has been provided from domestic sources in the form of personal savings, ploughed-back profits, budget surpluses and internal borrowing. Since the establishment of the Central Bank, a great deal of progress has been made in laying the foundations of a mature institutional apparatus for the attraction, mobilisation and effective use of the country's savings, both African and European. One could instance the growth of the building society movement, the tremendous expansion of insurance, and the advent of new banks and of accepting and discount houses. Through these media, and not forgetting the important role of the Post Office Savings Bank, domestic savings have been greatly stimulated and put to increasingly effective use. During the fairly difficult year of 1959, the Central Bank raised locally on behalf of the Federal Government the sum of £56 million in 3 months Treasury Bills, and £15 million at short and long-term. These figures are vastly in excess of pre-Federation local borrowings. But, while dependence on external sources has been reduced, the need to borrow from abroad is still great. The inflow of capital is, and is likely to remain for a number of years, the critical element in the country's development.

22. It is, therefore, of the greatest importance when considering the country's economic future, on which its political tranquillity largely hinges, to examine the prospects for obtaining overseas capital either by public loans or private investment. On official account (in which category I include the Federal and Territorial Governments, together with the Statutory Corporations and Boards) a total of some £73 million has been brought in from overseas sources in the form of public loan issues and direct loans from other governments and international organisations. Unquestionably this injection of loan capital has played a highly strategic role in the development of the country. Much of it has been utilised to improve basic services, thereby inducing an expansion of private investment.

23. What has to be considered is whether in any conceivable constitutional re-arrangement, which involves some diminution of the present status, such a high rate of foreign borrowing could be maintained in the future. In my submission any disruption of the Federation would have a seriously adverse repercussion on the ability of this part of the world to attract foreign capital. I believe this to be true whether looked at from the Federation's or any individual territory's point of view; and anyone acquainted with the main capital markets of the world would confirm this view.

24. Because of its resources, both financial and otherwise, the Federation is certainly able to command a higher credit-standing than any one of the three constituent territories. During the past six years, this country has succeeded in establishing itself in the queue of borrowers at the doors of the world's capital markets. There have, of course, been occasions when some of our external loan operations have been in jeopardy because of the existence of political fears, real or imaginary. But it is difficult to believe that these would be any the less if the three territories were separated. Indeed, as I have said earlier, one cannot imagine Nyasaland being able to borrow abroad at all on its own standing, except perhaps on quasi-charitable terms or possibly from unacceptable political sources.

25. It is worth emphasising also that the ability to borrow depends partly on the wider economic prospects of the borrower as adjudged by the lenders. It would not be easy to persuade anybody that any of the territories individually could expect to have as bright an economic future as they now enjoy mutually in an economic union. Also important in this matter of credit-standing is the financial status of the borrower and in particular the relationship between available revenues, the burden of existing debts and the size of the country's free reserves. All these factors are weighed in the balance by potential lenders. As a developing country, the Federation has, naturally, been obliged to pile up quite considerable external debt obligations; but on the other hand, the country's reserves (the largest portion of which are held by the Central Bank) are fairly substantial and the revenue-raising potential of the four governments is considerable. In the event of the Federal unit being broken up, it would be necessary to negotiate an acceptable redistribution of the commonly-held reserves and a basis for allocating to each territory its proportion of the joint public debt—surely a Labour of Hercules. Whatever the eventual form of settlement, it is quite certain that from the financial point of view the credit rating of all three territories would be greatly diminished as a result. In each instance, the balance between existing commitments, available reserves and revenue-raising potential would be highly adverse to future borrowing capacity. Moreover, each territory would be faced with an imminent problem of repaying maturing debt—a dilemma which is serious enough for the Federation but doubly so for any individual territory on its own.

26. Turning to the private investment side, it is significant to note that in the period from 1954 to 1957, a net total of £95 million is estimated to have been transmitted from overseas countries for investment in the Federation. This estimate probably understates the true position since no allowance has been made for the re-investment of profits of foreign-owned subsidiaries which, logically, should be included. The biggest source of capital, as on official account, was the United Kingdom, followed by the Union of South Africa. These figures make it clear that the inflow of private capital has been of the greatest importance in the development of the country. Due recognition should be given also to the introduction by foreign-owned firms of the technical know-how and managerial skills which play a vital role in economic development. It is obviously of the highest importance to the region's future growth that this inflow of foreign investment should continue unhindered and, if possible, at an expanding rate.

27. When considering putting capital in an overseas country, a potential investor's mind is, no doubt, conditioned by his assessment of the political risks. It is certain, however, that in reaching a final decision purely economic considerations are likely to prevail, although, of course, it is not always possible to make this clear-cut separation of motives. Among the economic factors, the size of the potential market is perhaps of predominant importance.

Modern-day industrial techniques nearly always put the emphasis on the economies of large-scale production. Below a certain minimum size of the market (or potential market) it is just not feasible to consider setting up certain types of industry. Inevitably, therefore, if the Federation were broken up into three separate smaller markets, the attractions of this part of the world to potential investors would be bound to diminish. Indeed, some already established industries might be forced to curtail or even close down their activities. Such private capital as did continue to flow would be concentrated in Southern Rhodesia to an even greater extent than at present.

28. Whatever changes are found to be necessary in the present constitutional and political framework of the Federation, I am convinced that the welfare of all the inhabitants of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland will be best served if the essentials, at least, of the economic union are kept intact. I realise that this involves a reconciliation of what at the moment appear to be hopelessly conflicting aims, mainly outside the economic field; but I believe that it is possible to find such a solution which is just and fair to all.

29. Lest it be thought that the tenor of my evidence has in any sense been complacent, I should like to conclude by emphasising that I am not suggesting that the Federation stands pat on its record alone—good though, in all the circumstances, I believe it to have been. I am conscious that change in certain directions is necessary; and that progress towards true economic partnership between the territories as well as the races must be speeded up. It is my sincere belief, however, that the solution to these difficult problems can only be found if the economic environment is right and, as I have argued, this is more likely to be the case in a unified economy which has undoubted growth prospects. We have established a firm economic base and, however imperfect it may be in certain directions, we should attempt to build on it. There is nothing at all to be gained by anyone destroying it.

23rd April, 1960

SIR ANTHONY GRAFFTEY-SMITH

CHAIRMAN: Your main observations in the memorandum are directed to showing that on the economic side there is every advantage in the retention of the unit which is embraced in the Federation. In paragraph 28, you state: "Whatever changes are found to be necessary in the present constitutional and political framework of the Federation, I am convinced the welfare of all the inhabitants of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland will best be served if the essentials at least of the economic units are kept intact." You point out that this involves a reconciliation of what appear to be completely conflicting ends, mainly outside the economic field. Assuming for this purpose the necessity of retaining the economic union, can you help us at all as to what you would regard as the essentials of the economic union to be kept intact?

A. The very unity which makes it possible derives from the fact that they share at the moment the financial ups and downs. When one Territory is doing well and the other badly, there is a levelling process because of the fact that we are three. Therefore by essentials of an economic union I mean that, for instance, when Northern Rhodesian copper is low they benefit from revenues which arise from high tobacco prices in Southern Rhodesia. The reverse obviously applies. And Nyasaland shares in both, so that an increase in one is to the benefit of the other territories. Breaking away from that form of uniting the three countries would be disastrous.

Q. Would you care to trespass outside the economic field and say what you think would be essential to retain as a political centre in such an economic unit?

A. You mean how could one reconcile that amount of economic unity with the political difficulties? I think some looser form of economic union might conceivably be possible, but I have not worked out what form it might take.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: Could you help us by giving your view as to what powers would have to be retained by some central authority in order to enable you, as representing all the people in this economic union, to function satisfactorily?

A. I would have said a good number of the existing powers given to the federation in the Constitutional List would in fact still have to be retained by the Federation. I have not a List handy and cannot do it in detail, but in my particular field of banking and currency, for instance, we have been federalised since 1938 and the currency has been a common factor in all three territories since that time.

There was a currency board at one time, but even the commercial banks, I think is fair to say, adopted a global rather than Territorial view. One of the last things to be surrendered would be a common currency. That is something to everybody's advantage: They are used to it, and I have never heard any demands for its being got rid of. On the fiscal side, incumbent on what I have said about the sharing of good things in bad days by one Territory, the fiscal division would have to be not necessarily in the same proportions as at present but it would have to be retained in some form or other—that is the division of the spoils when it comes to tax. The same division is more roughly applied to the raising of capital, and I am convinced that no one individual Territory could hope to borrow with as much success as the Federation itself. Federal credit at the moment is somewhat low, due to events which have happened 1,000 miles to our south. There has been a sharp fall recently. But I do not consider that any one Territory could stand alone when it came to going into the world markets. My experience of all the international banking centres very much reinforces me in that view.

Q. And what about taxation? There would be distribution of functions?

A. Yes, there would obviously have to be some further division of functions. Whether one would slavishly adhere to the same percentages as laid down by the Fiscal Committee one would doubt, if you are moving other things about. But thinking in terms of Nyasaland, I do not see that fiscally they would have any hope of being viable or, as it were, living on their own fat. They would need a share of other people's taxation. The other two Territories are more difficult. Northern Rhodesia, in buoyant days for copper, would probably do quite well as an independent entity, but would be in a bad way indeed if copper should descend into the depths as it did before. Southern Rhodesia I daresay would manage a rather—in my view—shaky viability, with a highly reduced standard of living.

Q. What about the political point of view—would a Federal minister of finance, from your point of view, be essential or not?

A. As opposed to three Territorial ministers of finance? In those circumstances I am not sure whether I would be a Federal bank; but if I am, there must be a Federal Minister of Finance.

Q. Those go together, and then it follows if you have a Federal Minister of Finance certain political consequences follow, unless you are going to have a dictator.

A. The short answer to the question is yes, unless there was complete fragmentation; in which case I do not know what would happen to me: I might become a Southern Rhodesian bank.

MR. MOLSON: How do you think it would be necessary to enable each of the Territories to share in each other's good things? The two main sources of revenue levied by the Federal Government are income tax and Customs and Excise.

A. As revenue goes, you mean on current account and not necessarily capital account?

Q. Those of us who are thinking in terms of relaxing the bonds of Federation are not thinking of going so far as doing away either with collection of income tax by the Federal Government or the collection of a single level of customs all round the three Territories. Supposing those two were maintained—income tax and common customs—would that in itself meet the point to which you attach importance, and which is indeed of considerable importance?

A. I am a little off my own ground here, because I am not a fiscal expert. I would not have thought so: you are continuing to exclude capital borrowing. If one is thinking purely quantitatively, you have to tell me whether you are going to follow this up by making a similar suggestion about capital account. I think I would say no, if it is just income tax and customs, but I have no figures in front of me.

Q. You emphasised the importance of each of the Territories helping the others as commodity prices go up and down. As regards the borrowing of money, I take it as being a sine qua non that there should be a Loans Council and that no government should be allowed to borrow externally without the approval of the Council and on terms approved by the Council?

A. Yes.

Q. Would that go most of the way to preserving the credit-worthiness of this part of Africa?

A. Looked at from the point of view of foreign credit standing, I agree, but from the point of view of the quantity of money necessary to raise, one has to take into account local borrowing as well. Recently, we have perhaps been borrowing more locally than we have managed to secure abroad. I am not including Kariba money, but one has also to couple with that the question of borrowing locally. Generally speaking, that is not covered by the Loans Council proper, but it is covered by representatives of the four governments, which follow a common pattern and also agree on the division, which may vary slightly on the constitutional terms from time to time. That is such an important amount as well as the foreign money, that I think you must continue that too.

Q. Supposing that the recommendations were for a certain relaxation politically and for the preservation of the Loans Council, and if we slipped in a recommendation that the powers of the Loans Council should be extended from external loans to internal loans in order that the Loans Council should be able to effect a real control of the borrowing of all four governments, would that seem to be a step forward in your direction?

A. Yes. The question of actually making it subject to the Loans Council is a matter again on which I am not qualified to speak. I think one would run into certain opposition there, as I think I am right in saying they have in other parts of the world. The conception is correct. Consultation would take place with the four Governments. I do seem to remember when the last Consultation was drawn up this ran into certain troubles, but I cannot remember what they were. I think there have been troubles on this one, but it certainly emerged that the Governments are very close in contact on local borrowing as well. I am on the receiving end of that in so far as I do, as it were, raise the money for the Federal Government which in its turn distributes it. So far as I know those conversations have been fairly amicable and they work. On this subject, the Loans Council is not entirely essential to your question as long as there is agreement between Governments.

Q. I am really thinking of this as a quid pro quo. If our recommendations were for a certain relaxation of the bonds of Federation in order to meet the wishes of Nationalists it might be quite fair and reasonable, in order to preserve the economic unity, to slip in some tightening of that on the economic side as a quid pro quo for a relaxation on the political side. Would that appear to be helpful to you in preserving the credit-worthiness?

A. Yes, I think it would be. I would rather like to ask you, would you insist on unanimity in that form of Loans Council?

Q. I think that is obviously a matter to be discussed.

A. That is an important one, I think.

Q. What I am really trying to get at is to pick your brains about how far we can go in a political relaxation without involving any of the ill effects which you have brought out in your memorandum.

A. I think if you maintain the Loans Council and did something on the lines you have indicated it would certainly help the credit-worthiness, we hope, to stand more or less where it stood before; but, of course, I do not know what your political relaxations are.

MR. TAYLOR: Would you say, Sir Anthony, that in the circumstances envisaged by Mr. Molson the central power would have to possess sufficient legislative authority to be able to operate the entire and complicated machinery of modern governmental control of economic activity?

A. I would indeed,

SIR DONALD MACGILLIVRAY: Would you think it would be likely that the credit-standing of the Federation would be affected in any way if there was some re-distribution of responsibility for services such as health, education, agriculture?

A. No, this is really a change of the Constitutional Lists.

Q. On responsibility for external affairs and defence?

A. I would not have thought that would have had a tremendous effect on the credit-standing.

Q. In the first case you say it would not affect it all?

A. I would not have thought so, but clearly there would be a corresponding adjustment in percentages; presumably that was postulated.

MR. ELLMAN-BROWN: From what you have said you would say basic taxation is essentially a function of a centrally controlled body, basic taxation and legislation?

A. Yes.

Q. You probably would not be surprised to hear we have had considerable evidence that the percentages between the various Territories should be changed. It can be done two ways, by changing the percentages or increasing the Territorial surcharge. Would you say, Sir, knowing the trends of the increase in industrialisation here, and the prospects in Northern Rhodesia, that to change the Territorial surcharge would, in fact impede your main concern of getting that balance. In other words giving the two Territories more taxation means that they will be more responsible from their own resources instead of through the pooling. Would you agree and would you reckon that would have a serious effect from the loan point of view?

A. Yes. I would very much prefer to see an increase in the percentage rather than any attempt to tinker with the surcharge which would have an effect very quickly indeed of putting up the general rate and the rate of the two combined which would not be attractive to immigration and to industry.

MR. ROBINSON: I wonder if you could tell us to what extent the concept of a permanent Federation resulted in a capital inflow into this country, more particularly in the private sector? Put it another way: if there was a loosening of the bonds to any considerable extent would that effect either those who have invested in the Federation or who are likely to do so?

A. Of course it is difficult to know how loose the bonds might be made. What is absolutely clear to me is that both in London and in America—and I think perhaps I can speak about America with a certain amount of experience—that Federation as an act was undoubtedly welcomed. It possibly was welcomed as much as anything because the Americans are very fond of what might be called “bigness”. That was after all one of the selling points of Kariba. It was a monster scheme, it was viable and it had a considerable appeal to Americans who are undoubtedly impressed by size. Even Americans who come here always like to be told that this place is equal in acreage to Texas, California and New York. It is a childish thing to know but they always like being told it. But in any case I am sure that all the people with whom one talked about Kariba money—I had the honour of making the first soundings for the Kariba money—were very pleased and impressed by the size and what they hoped would be the cohesion. I have been there several times since, and on each occasion they are impressed by size and the fact that we were doing well and the thing appeared to be working.

I do not know whether this is the correct thing for me to say but, if you do not know it, it is an interesting manifestation that we are seeing here in Salisbury a great number of Americans at present who have done a sort of South of the Sahara tour. Sometimes they come here to finish up, sometimes they go to the Union, but I have been struck by the fact that they have not been at all pleased with the splintering and fragmentation they have seen elsewhere. They do not like it, and they have asked me quite anxiously if I saw a likelihood of anything similar starting here. I have said that I would regard any loosening of the economic ties as absolute blatant folly but they do express apprehension, of, as I say, a splintering and a disruption which is happening, maybe for good reasons, all over Africa to our north.

I would therefore answer Mr. Robinson’s question by saying that, if the links became demonstrably looser, in proportion to the looseness we should not gain as much capital in the future as we have in the past.

PROFESSOR CREIGHTON: May I ask a question, intended to pursue this matter of the economic functions which it is desirable a central government should possess if the necessary economic unity is to be preserved. For example, would you feel that it was essential for the Federation to retain transport—railways and civil aviation—communications and price control, to mention three?

A. The abandonment of transport and communications would immediately postulate a very difficult question about sharing of the public debt. The debt incurred by the railways and to a much lesser degree by Central African Airways is, at the moment, a Federal responsibility. They are statutory commissions and they operate separately, but nevertheless the debt incurred, certainly so far as the railways is concerned, is in the name of the Federal Government. There would be a fairly unpleasant piece of disentanglement there on the sharing of the public debt which brought all that about.

Price control—as I say I am no constitutional expert and I am not a Civil Servant—is a matter I would not see lost with great agony. I would not mind if that went Territorial, but there may be problems of which I am not aware. I do see difficulties about transport. I was Chairman of the Apportionment Committee which had the job of dividing assets and liabilities of three Governments among four. It also involved very considerable shifting of the public debt to balance those functions. The Governments, I would testify here and now, accepted this very complicated business very well indeed, and by and large it has not worked badly. There have been some stresses and strains, but the thought that I should ever be the Chairman of a Disapportionment Committee fills me with horror.

MR. JUSTICE BEADLE: Would you agree that credit-worthiness in the ultimate must depend on political stability?

A. If you mean absolutely and completely, solely, I would have said that it is highly important. But I should have said economic stability, so far as a man who is lending money is concerned, is also extremely important. I happen to think economic stability should come first.

Q. Can you have economic stability without political stability?

A. Not too well. I also do not think you can have the reverse.

Q. You have to have both together?

A. Yes.

Q. So it is essential in any scheme that may be put forward that the political aspects must receive the most careful consideration?

A. Most certainly.

Q. Mere economic stability alone is by no means sufficient?

A. I entirely agree.

LORD CRATHORNE: To go back to the original question again, it has been put to us by some people that you could have the economic link up without any of the corresponding political association at all on the lines of the six in Europe, they are developing. Do you think that is viable or not?

A. No.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: You do feel that some Federal legislature is essential from your point of view?

A. Yes, I do; and, I would have thought, from the foreign investor’s point of view as well. I think one can say that the economic side and the political side too have been a considerable success. We may be victims of our own success, but whether we like it or not we have had an economic union which has now existed for a number of years and has really proved to be quite successful. I am not trying to sound complacent but it has been successful. I think anybody who invested in the past and wished to invest in the future would be very sorry to see that particular form of stability disappear.

MR. ELLMAN-BROWN: We have had a considerable amount of evidence on the effect, particularly in the Northern Territories, of the general policy of protection of industry. Bearing in mind that there are always stresses and strains in the economy, but that the general concept of the central government is that it is trying to encourage that economy, would you say that should be maintained and the protection, customs, excise and so on, should be a central function?

A. Yes. I think one would get in the most tremendous difficulties if you territorialise customs for that very reason.

MR. ROBINSON: I would like Sir Anthony to comment on the availability of funds outside the United Kingdom and Washington sources. It has been put to us by some witnesses, particularly in Nyasaland, that might be available from other sources, Swiss, German, Japanese and so on and so forth. Could you say what your experience has been in that field?

A. My experience with the Swiss is fairly considerable. The Swiss would be, I think I would be right in saying, the very last person who would lend in any circumstances to any smaller union than we have got now. They are probably the most difficult lenders in the world. They want 25 conditions, including a guarantee of their own currency, before they lend you anything. I would not say they are very comfortable people from whom to borrow money. We have got on occasions fairly near to a loan but by the time all the conditions were put down, including every form of gold clause, it did not become particularly attractive.

The Germans have also been spoken to and I do not see in the long run that Germany as a creditor nation might not lend money here. There again, as I know them, they are rather impressed by the big unit. What has really prevented any further approach to the Germans in recent months is, of course, their extremely high interest rate. A domestic loan in Germany floated by the German Government is, in fact, at a higher yield than even our own in this country, so it is not very attractive to go to them at present. I have never had anything to do with the Japanese. I should think that would be a loan to industry. I should think a straight Japanese loan would be extremely unlikely. Apart from a very small approach to Canada I do not think I know of any other likely creditor nation who would wish to lend to us.

MR. TAYLOR: Sir Anthony, you told us of the value that “bigness” has in borrowing money, and indeed I believe since the Federation came into being, in public issues abroad and in public issues at home, something like £135,000,000 has been borrowed on the strength of a Federal prospectus. What views have you got on the morality, and what sort of attitude do you think people would take who had lent money on the strength of that prospectus, if the security on which that money had been borrowed vanished?

A. I should think we should get just about as bad a name in the world as could be imagined. I personally, if I had been a lender, would regard it as a considerable piece of bad faith.

Q. And most of those loans have a long time to run?

A. They have indeed.

MR. CRAWLEY: But if the alternative was to maintain Federation by force with prolonged civil disturbance, would you consider that a good economic security?

A. Prolonged civil disturbance, of course, is a considerable phrase. If the alternative were to be found to be civil disturbance, then obviously some other means would have to be sought; but not, I would have thought, what would amount in many ways to a general default on debt.

MR. CHIRWA: I think that you appreciate that there are at present great difficulties in maintaining what you suggest, that in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland the Africans do not want Federation, they want to see it broken up. If Southern Rhodesia adopted the same attitude, if they laid down certain conditions which must be fulfilled before they remained in the Federation and one of these was that the Territories in the North must not have African Nationalist Governments: on the other hand, if, those people in the Northern Territories wanted those Governments, how can you reconcile these two elements, at the same time retain Federation without disruption?

A. I imagine that is one reason why the Commission is sitting. I am sure you know, Mr. Chirwa, if I could give you the answer to that everybody would be very happy.

Q. Those are difficulties.

A. I do perfectly well admit that. I did not go on the political side, I am not in politics. But I perfectly well recognise there are political difficulties. I think it was my job to talk about the economic side about which I know something. The reconciliation of these opposite views is indeed extremely difficult but if no reconciliation or amicable reconciliation can be reached it would be a pity to see the destruction of something which I think has been a very considerable success in the eyes of the world so far as an entity was concerned. It has borrowed money; a great deal of the money has gone into the Territories which want to see it broken up. One obviously would deplore for that reason and for many other reasons any form of disruption. As Governor of the Bank of Rhodesia and Nyasaland I must be the last one who would admit it possibly could happen.

Q. I want to raise the question contained in the last paragraph but one. You say that a change in certain directions is necessary. What did you have in mind?

A. We have touched on that in many ways. I meant that there were various frictions on things that are at the moment on the Federal list but not on the Territorial list. They should be moved. There are also frictions about percentages now paid to the three governments, and so forth. There may be room for manoeuvre there.

Q. Then you go on to say that progress towards true economic partnership between the territories should be speeded up.

A. That again is quite general. I merely think, as I hope most well-thinking people do, that greater financial benefits, as it were, must accrue to the African—which one can already see coming, from certain straws in the wind. You happen to come from the poorest territory, and therefore, if Federation persists, in order to satisfy in some degree what must be the demands of the poorest territory, it may be that a greater allocation of funds should go in your direction. I am not saying I have worked that out, but that is the sort of thing I mean.

MR. MOLSON: Going back to the question of the loans—because we want to make sure in every possible way that the economic unit is kept together, whatever political concessions have to be made—could you tell me something about the actual mechanism of the way the service of the loan is ensured, and what could be done in that way? There would continue to be the Federal sources of income: income tax and customs and excise. That is at present paid into the central bank. The service of the debt could be made a first charge upon that, so that if anything went wrong politically and too much money was being spent, at any rate the service of the loan would be made first. In England, for example, the consolidated fund is not voted each year.

A. Every Federal prospectus sets out general revenues as an indication of what they were then receiving. I do not know quite whether you are talking about past loans, or service for future ones.

Q. There is not much doubt about the present Federal Government meeting its liabilities. I am anxious to try and find a means by which existing lenders and future lenders may feel they are guaranteed against any possible political folly or a weakening of things. Looking at the central bank, which is the bank responsible, would it not be possible for the future and for the past to ensure that all government revenue paid into the central bank was earmarked solely, first and foremost, for the service of that debt and that anything else which was voted—for example, the Air Force or education, etc.—would only come afterwards? If the Federal revenue was sufficient to cover that, the lenders would be covered in that way.

A. I do not really like the sound of that. Why could it not still be possible for it to be merely an item in the budget at the time, which would demonstrate to the world that sufficient in the first place had been voted by the Government to service all this outstanding debt? Once you try earmarking particular revenues, you get into difficulty. Frankly, I think the Federal Treasury would have a very difficult time. I would have thought it would have been sufficient for that money to have been voted in the budget—though, of course, I am not aware of the background against which your question is framed. I have a fund of £9m., and when their debts fall due in London, New York or anywhere else, I am instructed by the Federal Government to provide so much for interest, sinking fund and redemption. I would rather leave it like that. I see your point that you want the investors to know they are quite safe; but I would not be particularly concerned if I were an investor, because if the government really went wrong the only place they could get the money would be me: I would have to lend it to them. It might please the investor, but it would not please me. Of course, I am not a Treasury expert.

CHAIRMAN: Is there anything you would like to add?

A. I do not think so, except perhaps I should say that I am fairly biased about this, as you can see. I am a Federal citizen. It is my intention to live and settle here and I have bought myself a piece of land for that purpose; so I am not going back to England at the drop of a hat. I say that only in order to make my position clear.

Memorandum

FEDERAL POWER BOARD

The Federal Power Board was set up under the Electricity Act of 1956. Its general functions and duties are the supply of electricity in bulk to undertakings within the Federation. It succeeded the Federal Hydro-Electric Board which had been set up in 1954 as a construction authority to build either the Kariba or the Kafue project.

The Board is required under the Act to establish undertakings for the supply of electricity as the Governor General may direct. So far the only direction received by the Board has been to establish the Kariba Undertaking. The Board is also required to investigate new or additional facilities for the bulk supply of electricity as the Minister may direct. In that connection the Board is continuing the investigations into the Kafue project and was recently instructed to investigate and report on the Nkula Falls Project on the Shire river in Nyasaland.

The Board has powers to interconnect its main transmission system with other generating stations and on that being done to control and direct their output of electricity so as to achieve the most efficient co-ordination of bulk supplies. The Board's system is to be interconnected to the generating stations owned by the Municipalities at Lusaka, Salisbury and Bulawayo, also to the Electricity Supply Commission generating station at Umniati. When these inter-connections have been effected the Board will have powers to direct the output of these stations. In return the Board is obliged to purchase the output by defraying all expenses properly chargeable to the generating stations. In effect the Board purchases the output at cost, mixes it with the output of Kariba and resells the combined power in bulk to the authorities as distributors. An exception to this is the supply being given to the Copperbelt which is based on a simple commercial agreement with the Rhodesia Congo Border Power Corporation.

There are a number of advantages in having an integrated power system rather than depending on isolated power stations. Some of these are:—

1. Isolated stations each must carry spare plant to cover the loss of the largest generating unit whereas with an integrated system a single spare unit is usually sufficient to cover the breakdown risk on the whole system. The amount involved is considerable and in the case of the Federation the extra capital which would be required if power stations were isolated is of the order of £5 million today and this sum would double in a few years' time.
2. The cost of producing power is less when the power requirements of a country are supplied from an integrated power system rather than from isolated power stations because with an integrated system production of electricity can be concentrated in the most efficient and cheapest power stations. The saving involved is considerable and at present in the case of the Federation for instance a 10% reduction in fuel cost of power would save about half a million pounds per annum.
3. There are serious staffing problems in the power production industry at present and not only in this country. There is a shortage of specialised staff which it is difficult to attract and this difficulty is increased if their promotion is limited to prospects at individual thermal stations. The unification of the power industry eases this problem both by reduction in the number of specialised staff required and the provision of increased opportunity of promotion.
4. The raising of capital is made easier by having one large system as security for loans is enhanced. Bankers generally prefer to lend to a large and flourishing industry rather than to small units whose profitability in the case of some local thermal stations in the Federation has not been very good.
5. To have built additional thermal stations might have cost about 10% less than building Kariba but the first 10 years of Kariba's operation will save the electricity consumers about £32 million in fuel costs alone and thereafter there will be a saving of about 10 million pounds annually.
6. The supply tariffs which were set up by the Board in November, 1959, were designed:—
 - (a) to stimulate industrial and other development;
 - (b) to provide equality of opportunity to all undertakings connected to the Kariba grid;

(c) progressively to eliminate differences in bulk supply costs, and

(d) progressively to reduce the general level of these costs.

Therefore the Board decided—

1. to charge for a supply up to that provided by each undertaking for the year 1959/60 an amount equal to the average production costs of that undertaking. These costs vary considerably and average 0·8d. per unit;
2. to charge for all increased supply £7 per Kilowatt of annual maximum demand plus 0·1d. per unit. This charge is expected to average about 0·45d. per unit which is little more than half the present figure.

None the less the tariffs which the Board is charging will enable half the total cost of the second phase of Kariba, estimated at about £45 million, to be financed from revenue.

Oral Evidence

FEDERAL POWER BOARD—Represented by Sir Duncan Anderson, Chairman.

CHAIRMAN: From the paper you have so kindly provided, it looks as if you are aiming to get some of the advantages we get from the grid in U.K.?

A. That is so.

Q. And you are still looking at the Kafue project in addition to Kariba?

A. Yes. If the rate of growth and demand continues as it has done in the past five years, it will have to be started about 1965/6 to pick up the deficiency of supply when Kariba is fully extended in 1971/2.

Q. The Kariba venture resulted in having to move some people, and questions of compensation arose. Have they been resolved yet?

A. I think a memorandum has been submitted to you on that. The actual cost so far incurred has been resolved and paid. There is some disagreement as to what should be paid in the future towards the development of these people who have been moved. That is only in the case of N. Rhodesia. The problem has been completely solved in respect of S. Rhodesia and we have agreed to make a final payment which is acceptable to the Southern Rhodesian Government. We have met all the disbursements of Northern Rhodesia to date, but they have a very laudable scheme for the development of the people who have been moved, going on till 1978/9—another 20 years. We in the Power Board and the Federal Government feel that is not properly a charge against the electricity consumer in this country.

SIR VICTOR ROBINSON: You operate under the Electricity Supply Act—a Federal Act, I think?

A. That is so.

Q. And the Power Board are the bulk suppliers of electricity?

A. Yes.

Q. Is the price at which you sell to the retailer fixed by the Government?

A. No, we are wholesalers: we fix our own tariffs.

Q. Under that Act I think there is provision for the formation of Electricity Supply Commissions?

A. Yes.

Q. There is an Electricity Supply Commission in Southern Rhodesia, for instance, and it will buy from you?

A. Yes, it will buy in bulk. We start supplying them next week in Southern Rhodesia.

Q. And what happens after that is not the concern of the Power Board at all—what they sell electricity for is their business?

A. Entirely.

Q. Does the Electricity Supply Commission in S. Rhodesia fix its own price, or is it controlled by the Federal Government?

A. I do not think I am the proper person to answer that. It was subject to advice by an Electricity Council to the Minister; but the Minister has power, and in fact recently has decided to support an increase in the tariffs of the Electricity Supply Commission in S. Rhodesia. That is nothing to do with the Power Board at all.

Q. Will you sell electricity to any retailer, or are you tied to the Electricity Supply Commission in S. Rhodesia?

A. We are wholesalers, and we sell to five customers—the municipalities of Bulawayo, Salisbury, Lusaka, the Electricity Supply Commission of S. Rhodesia and the Rhodesia Congo Border Power Corporation in N. Rhodesia, who are the agents for the Copper Companies. Those are our only customers.

Q. Are you tied by law, or can you accept anyone else? Assuming the S. Rhodesia Government were to sponsor some scheme for the supply of electricity, would you sell to them?

A. I do not know if we could, physically. We supply them, in all cases but one, at one point. We transmit at 330,000 volts, and that has to be stepped down to what the present distributors can handle. Therefore we are tied to them.

Q. Is there any practical reason why the retailers of electricity should be controlled by Federal legislation? Other things being equal, it would be quite simple for S. Rhodesia to establish its own Electricity Supply Commission, if it were permissible to do so?

A. And if it were physically practicable.

Q. Yes, and as far as you are concerned, you would supply them if the law permitted?

A. If they had a supply system by which they could have it, yes; but at present they have not.

Q. But you cannot see any reason why the Electricity Supply Commission should be converted to a Territorial body—it would make no difference to you?

A. I do not think the ownership of the Electricity Supply Commission affects us.

MR. TAYLOR: What hopes do you entertain of being able to do anything in Nyasaland?

A. We have been asked by the Minister, within the last month or so, to undertake the examination of the Nkula Falls scheme in Nyasaland. We have done that, and are now awaiting an all-clear to instruct our consulting engineers to prepare detailed drawings and contract documents. That depends on finance being forthcoming.

Q. And if the Federal Power Board are commissioned to go ahead and raise the finance, I take it the Board will, among other things, pledge its existing assets at Kariba?

A. Yes, it is a condition of the Electricity Act that money borrowed must be secured on our own assets.

Q. So that a large and viable scheme at Kariba might be of direct benefit to Nyasaland?

A. It would, yes.

MR. JUSTICE BEADLE: Who determines matters of high policy of the Power Board?

A. The Power Board.

Q. You are free from any form of Government control?

A. The Minister could, in a case of national importance and after consultation, direct us.

Q. What are the sorts of matters in which you might require direction from the Government?

A. I do not think in fact we require direction. We have not come across any need. The Minister can also determine the amount we put to reserve.

Q. How long do the members of the Power Board hold office?

A. That is variable, and at the discretion of the Minister. Appointment is by him.

Q. So he controls that: is he able to re-appoint the members of the Board?

A. I do not know if he would agree with that: I daresay he could do it.

Q. I wondered what the tie-up was between the Power Board and the Government. The power is really exercised by the Minister in the power of appointment?

A. Yes, except in the two matters I mentioned.

Q. So you operate as an entirely self-supporting service, free from Government control?

A. We are autonomous, yes.

MR. HABANYAMA: Would you give us a rough breakdown of the Federal offer, because in your paper you have given the breakdown of S. Rhodesia and N. Rhodesia. I happen to have seen the first offer you made. The Federal Government did definitely omit two or three major items which would affect the progress of the people in N. Rhodesia, one of which was the maintenance of water supplies. I think your Government felt it was not their responsibility to give some money under that heading—and also for the cooperative societies. It may be very difficult for us really to see how those two things could be omitted, because they were very important in the lives of those people in the Gwembe area.

A. I do not think I can answer your question, because they are the responsibilities of the Government and not of the Power Board. As regards the question of resettlement at Gwembe, which I presume you are referring to, it has been negotiated by the Federal Government on our behalf.

Q. But you have not got the breakdown of the Federal offer, just as you did it for the N. Rhodesia submission, so that we could have the comparison? As it is here, it is difficult to see what things were omitted, which is the reason why the N. Rhodesia Government is reluctant to accept the offer of the Federal Government.

A. I think you will have to talk to the Federal Government about that one.

MR. ROBINSON: It has been suggested to the Commission that it might be desirable to have a purely economic association between the Territories. What would happen from the point of view of the loans you have received for Kariba if any such development took place? To what extent, in your opinion, is the money borrowed for Kariba directly linked with the present association of the Territories?

A. The loans by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the Colonial Development Corporation, and the Commonwealth Development Finance Company are all guaranteed by the Federal Government. So to that extent these lenders are depending on that guarantee. The remainder of the loans are technically loans by the Government to the Power Board, so in all but one respect they are the residual £6 m. loans made directly to the Government and passed directly to us without amendment in any way: they are all either direct Federal Government liabilities or Federal Government liabilities in the sense that they have guaranteed them.

Q. With your considerable experience of negotiation in Washington for these purposes, can you tell us whether it really makes any difference what form of association there might be between the Territories for the purpose of raising future money for schemes like the Kafue and the Shire?

A. I was a lender before I became a borrower, and I would say it would be very much more difficult for the lender to accept a disjointed guarantee than the one they have today from one entity such as the Federal Government.

PROFESSOR CREIGHTON: I gather from your memorandum that you are selling entirely in bulk to a very small number of purchasers, and that the distribution which these purchasers make of the power so acquired is in their own discretion, or probably under the regulation of the Territorial Governments. I suppose ultimately what is desired is a general programme throughout the entire Federation of rural electrification. Do you consider this should be left either to the individual purchasers or to the Territorial Governments, or do you feel that your Board ought to have a general supervision over the programme as a whole?

A. There is one thing not quite right in what you have said—that these distributors operate under the regulation of the Territorial Governments: they are quite independent of the Governments. The N. Rhodesia Congo Border Power Corporation is controlled completely by the copper companies: the Lusaka Municipality controls its own distribution, but it is owned by the N. Rhodesia Government; the municipalities of Bulawayo and Salisbury are independent of any Government, except that they need their sanction. The Electricity Supply Commission is owned by the Federal Government. I do not think that the Federal Power Board, as a generating authority, should interest itself in distribution. It is very much a local matter. In England area boards have been set up, concerned with distribution. I think there should be one generating authority in the country, owning the main high-voltage transmission.

MR. CRAWLEY: Leaving aside the loans question, would a loose association greatly complicate the work of the Power Board?

A. I do not know that I could answer your question very easily, except that I believe there should be one generating authority, in the interests of the progress of the country, the exploitation of its natural resources and power: recruitment of staff is also extremely important. If you were to try to break up the generating authority there would be a most serious staffing difficulty. It is extremely difficult to recruit the highly-qualified professional engineer. We have tried, and in fact we are now so much in difficulty that we are trying to borrow people from the Central Electricity Board in England. There are no educational facilities in this country: I think there should be. If you break it up into three it means you have no means of choosing the highest priority of schemes. For instance the next one is Kafue, which will fit into the Kariba grid, and so on. I would deprecate any idea of breaking up the generation side of the power industry. It would lead to trouble.

MR. TAYLOR: Over the next 7-8 years, I believe the copper companies in N. Rhodesia have agreed to accept a power surcharge on the supplies of power sent to them, sufficient to yield in all £10 m. That money is regarded legitimately as a business expense and is therefore allowed as a deduction from taxable income, under the Federal income tax code. If, as Mr. Crawley has just put to you, the unit was divided into three, can you imagine the N. Rhodesia Government being prepared to agree that the £10 m. should be a charge purely on N. Rhodesia?

A. I cannot, but I do not know whether I am really in a position to say. We are in the position of tax gatherers.

Q. I am suggesting that you would be unlikely to gather that particular tax.

A. My thoughts have not taken me as far as that. I think we are in a fairly strong position. Either they pay or they get no electricity.

SIR VICTOR ROBINSON: You said the Federal Government had guaranteed the repayment of the loan to the International Bank. I believe the British Government has too.

A. Yes.

Q. And there is a clause that if any state secedes from the Federation, or Federation is broken up, or if anything happens here which, in the opinion of the National Bank, weakens the structure of the Federation, they call up the loan—and that means they would call up the loan tomorrow?

A. I imagine so.

MR. CHIRWA: I do not understand what is meant by "disjointed control". Supposing you had an economic union and you had a commission to work out the economics of the country, to which the Federal Government surrenders its present loans, and so on, with the agreement of the British Government, I do not see that would be disjointed control because of the loans now being Federal Government.

A. I was using the word "disjointed" in the sense of physical control of the supply industry, not in the context of security of loans.

Q. That would not diminish the strength of the guarantee of the British Government.

A. If the British Government would agree to continue the guarantee, it would not. But I would deprecate the physical breaking up of the industry into three parts.

Q. Supposing the industry remained one, and the Federal Power Board remained as an authority for Central Africa, I do not think you are breaking it up, because after all you are in the form of a Commission, although you are autonomous. If there was to be an economic commission—or whatever name it would be—it would still be under the umbrella of that Commission.

A. I could not answer that hypothetical question because I do not know what the powers of the Commission might be.

CHAIRMAN: Would you like to add anything, Sir Duncan?

A. I spoke a little earlier about the need for education. This will become frightfully urgent. There should be a Faculty of Engineering at our University here, and there should be technical colleges set up so that we can train to a much greater degree than we do today the technicians and engineers we are going to require in the future. With a shortage of these throughout the world today, I do not think we can rely on recruitment abroad; and this is becoming more and more acute. The present political situation is accentuating it quite a bit. Even by offering high salaries—higher than those obtainable in U.K.—it is extremely difficult to get people out here. In my view this Territory must become much more self-reliant than it is in the training of technicians. There is a good paper being written for the University by Professor Griffen, who occupies the Chair of Engineering in London. I am told by the Principal that for a relatively small sum—£300,000, with £600,000 recurrent expenditure—they could set up a Chair in Civil, Mechanical and Electrical Engineering. I would commend that to your Commission most seriously.

MR. TAYLOR: Would the electrical engineering industry contribute to the cost of the faculty?

A. They have not yet been asked, but I should imagine they would be unwise if they did not; and they would also be under an obligation of taking apprentices for practical training, which they say they would be glad to do. We have set up a technical consultative committee within the industry, and have urged that very strongly.

SALISBURY

6TH MAY 1960

Memorandum

K. C. ACUTT

1. This memorandum is presented by me in my personal capacity and not as deputy chairman of Anglo-American Corporation nor as chairman or a member of the various other boards on which I serve.

2. I have, however, drawn on my experience and my knowledge of the mining industry, commerce and banking in the Federation gained by active participation in these and other fields.

3. As much of the statistical information which could be used by me to give weight to particular views is already in the hands of the Commission, I do not intend to include more than a few statistics for illustrative purposes where required.

4. I have known both Northern and Southern Rhodesia since 1925 when I first visited these territories. I have since then spent considerable time in various parts of the country, and in 1954 I came to live in the Federation permanently. In the interests of brevity I do not propose to elaborate on what I have personally seen of the transformation of the territory, which until a few years ago seemed to offer little opportunity for a few, to a land which is equipping itself to be able to offer equal opportunities for all.

Southern Rhodesia

5. The European settlement of Southern Rhodesia which started in 1890 was very slow. The early hopes of rich returns from mining were not realised. By 1907 there were less than 2,000 farms surveyed and occupied by Europeans. There was little stimulus for economic development and the Colony's revenue only reached £1,000,000 in 1920. There followed a period of slow growth checked by the depression, but later stimulated by an expansion of the tobacco trade and chrome and asbestos mining. The outbreak of war brought development to a halt. It is therefore fair to say that the Southern Rhodesian Government was in no way able to begin to think in terms of the progress of its people until about 1947 when the encouragement of immigration and the expansion of agriculture and industry started a phenomenal rate of growth of the economy.

6. When Southern Rhodesia joined the other territories in Federation in 1953 its net income was estimated to be about £135,000,000 of a total Federal figure of £235,000,000 and all the indications were that this was rising. This figure and the buoyant economy at the time effectively dispose of the misconception held by some that Southern Rhodesia was bankrupt when it joined the Federation. It is however true that the solidarity brought to the economy by Federation stimulated the capital inflow and accelerated development of both industry and agriculture. Today, for example, the annual slaughter of cattle is producing as much as tobacco. All agricultural produce has increased and mining is maintaining its position so that the primary products of Southern Rhodesia alone make it a small economic unit providing gainful employment for a large proportion of its own inhabitants and many from the other territories in the Federation. In 1958 the net domestic output was nearly £223,000,000.

7. The country has been opened up to a remarkable degree. Before 1947 there was little employment for the African population which eked out a precarious existence on the land. Disease and malnutrition were beyond control. This state of affairs was caused by a shortage of money and not by a lack of realisation that as things stood the land seemed to offer the best hope of providing a living for the people. As progressive a course as possible was followed and in 1944 the value of agricultural output at about £10,000 superseded that of minerals. Life was hard for all in Southern Rhodesia.

8. In the desperate struggle to prevent a wastage of good soil the African had to be disciplined and forced to give up a semi-nomadic existence. As a result legislation, much of which today might appear to be unnecessarily restrictive, had to be passed. Some should perhaps be relaxed today but the rural African is still concerned with numbers rather than quality and severe overstocking could easily become uncontrollable. Southern Rhodesia has a land and mineral economy and much of its secondary industry has been built up to process the primary products so that industrialisation has been geographically more widespread but not greater than in Northern Rhodesia.

Northern Rhodesia

9. There are records of prospecting in the Fort Jameson district in 1890, but it was not until 1895 that prospecting parties began real operations in the territory. The first real hope of mineral discoveries came at the beginning of this century when the deposits at Broken Hill (lead and zinc) Bwana Mkubwa and Roan Antelope (copper) were discovered.

10. A large number of discoveries were made but few of them attained any prominence and the mineral production of the territory was small when the railway line reached Broken Hill in 1906. Prospecting activities declined until the discovery of the copper deposits in the Katanga stimulated a fresh interest and led to the discovery and the extension of the Copperbelt. Copper production started at Kansanshi in 1908 in which year the copper produced was valued at £32,000 of a total of £39,000 of mineral production. Mineral production in 1915 was valued at only £30,000 but lead was produced at Broken Hill the next year which inflated the figure to £108,000 in 1916. In 1927 the first increase in copper production occurred and only in 1931 did the value of minerals produced reach £1,000,000. From then copper alone has controlled the fortunes of Northern Rhodesia. While, as in Southern Rhodesia, the first steps could then be taken to improve the lot of the inhabitants, very little could be done with the money available by a handful of civil servants in this vast untamed country.

11. The expansion of the copper industry was slow but steady and the value of mineral production increased by about £1,000,000 a year until the war. Then it remained static as a result of a fixed price being imposed by the British Government at between £12,000,000 and £14,000,000. It was not until 1947, when the Ministry of Supply increased the price paid for copper, that a sharp increase in the revenue occurred and copper sales brought in £20,000,000, almost double the average of the war years. Therefore in both Southern and Northern Rhodesia the money to provide much needed social services began to come in at about the same time.

12. In 1953 the London Metal Exchange reopened and most copper sales are now based on this quoted price.

13. The value of copper produced in 1950 was £43,500,000 of a total mineral production of £49,000,000. The following figures show the fluctuation in the value of copper exports from then to date:—

	£m
1951	55.3
1952	74.1
1953	86.7
1954	86.5
1955	110.6
1956	113.8
1957	82.5
1958	67.5
1959	107.5

The effects of fluctuation in the production and price on fiscal revenue is illustrated by the following:—

	1956	1958	1959

14. In order to maintain output or to expand production to keep pace with rising costs a large sum of capital has to be provided each year by the copper mining companies either by "ploughing back" profits or raising new capital.

15. To illustrate the magnitude of this I quote figures for the three mines administered by the Anglo American Corporation as these are readily available: From 1954 to 1959 the total new capital employed by Rhokana Corporation, Nchanga Consolidated Copper Mines and Bancroft Mines for mining, smelting and refining amounted to £73,000,000 and there is every reason to believe that the mines administered by Rhodesian Selection Trust have required similar amounts. These figures alone show that the investment in industry in Northern Rhodesia since Federation has been considerable. Unless, as is often the case, the mining industry is ignored, statistics show that a large share of the capital investment in industry in the Federation has been in Northern Rhodesia.

16. When the mining companies began operations in Northern Rhodesia they had to start from grass roots not only to open the mines but to build houses and amenities. They had to control malaria and provide facilities for the treatment of other tropical diseases. They also had to attract skilled employees to an area with no communications and where initially only rough accommodation and amenities could be provided. The copper companies were forced to adopt a paternalistic attitude to their employees and at the time to pay higher wages than elsewhere. There was no alternative then nor has it been possible up to now to place the burden of hospitalisation, education and other essential social services on Government where it belongs. The companies are often criticised for their paternalistic attitude to employees but this they must accept until it is possible to replace company paternalism by State paternalism which appears to be more palatable.

17. There are nearly 250,000 people living in the seven towns which lie in the Copperbelt; of these 31,000 are Europeans and the balance mainly Africans. There is little likelihood of these figures altering materially as a result of operations by the existing mining companies in the next few years. The provision of added employment for the Africans who are increasingly drifting from the rural areas to the Copperbelt towns is a major problem. Its solution will depend on the opening up of new mines unless more of them are diverted, as they have been in Southern Rhodesia, to the development of the land. The Government has utilised a loan of £2,000,000 made by Rhodesian Selection Trust largely for rural development in the Northern areas and this has shown what can be done. About 94% of the land in Northern Rhodesia is reserved for African occupation and its economic potential has still to be exploited. African agricultural methods in most areas in Northern Rhodesia are still primitive and communal; there is no individual security of tenure.

18. In Northern Rhodesia industrial progress has been immense over the past ten years but it has largely been concentrated and is likely to continue to be in the Copperbelt so long as the main industrial enterprises in Northern Rhodesia are either to do with copper fabrication or to supply the copper mines.

19. Industry in Northern Rhodesia, as is the economy of the territory, is at present largely dependent on copper. This itself could be a deterrent to industrial development of a wider nature if Northern Rhodesia was a separate economic unit. The salaries, wages and benefits which are available to employees of the mining industry naturally affect the cost structure of other industries, although at the Rhodesia Broken Hill mine, with present prices for lead and zinc, the whole scale of emoluments is lower than the Copperbelt and the pattern of wages further south is not far from that in Southern Rhodesia.

20. The mining industry throughout the world generally has to pay higher rates than other enterprises. Underground rates are higher than those paid for surface work. These higher rates are more often than not necessary to attract skilled labour for hazardous work in remote places where climatic conditions are often unpleasant. In due course perhaps if highly skilled technical people are abundantly available and the supply exceeds the demand in Northern Rhodesia, wages might find their own level at lower rates than at present.

21. Emoluments are high on the Copperbelt. This is in some measure a result of the introduction in 1937 of a bonus scheme designed to reduce the frequency of wage demands and generally to allow employees to share in the prosperity of the industry. It is of interest that at the time the scheme was introduced the price of copper was not expected to go very much higher than £40 a ton. During the war years the price of copper was controlled and in 1947 the bonus scheme was reviewed as, despite the upper limits imposed, it turned out as a result of wartime inflation to be quite unrealistic in its generosity to employees in relation to profits earned. A new scheme was introduced but insufficient attention was paid to the danger of the bonus increasing disproportionately to profits as a result of increases in basic pay. The scheme was again revised in 1955 on a basis of surplus of revenue over expenditure and this is in force today. It has been suggested from time to time that the copper bonus which is paid to all employees should, in the interest of wider territorial development, be abolished. Any move to prevent employees sharing in the prosperity would probably set off a series of crippling strikes which would result in a higher basic wage structure.

22. The bonus is not an obstacle to African advancement. It is hoped that with the co-operation of the Europeans the African will be able to advance and the companies are at present negotiating with the European Mineworkers Union an extension of the first advancement agreement concluded about four years ago. It is hoped that a formula will be agreed which will not only provide more advanced jobs for Africans but will also allow, probably theoretically at first, no colour obstacle to advancement into what is now considered to be the European sphere.

23. It has been difficult to find suitable people to fill the advanced jobs available and of a total of about 1,100 jobs already in the advanced category some 266 remain to be filled.

24. During negotiations on African advancement European employees expressed concern that, while considerable training of Africans was being undertaken, no facilities existed for European youths born and brought up on the Copperbelt. It was implied that much of the European resistance to advancement stemmed from a fear that, there being no training facilities, the children of employees would have to go outside the territory for training if the European was to be able to maintain his competitive position in the industry. To dispose of this the companies agreed to provide technical schools through the Copperbelt Technical Foundation. The companies and the employees nominated the Trustees. There has been no pressure on the Foundation to admit Africans but in anticipation of this discussions were held some time ago with both Federal and Territorial Governments on the question of either of them taking over the Foundation so that the companies should not become involved in any conflict which might arise from the different governmental policies. As a result of this a survey is to be conducted jointly by the Governments and the companies into the present need for technical education in Northern Rhodesia.

25. The mining companies have recently announced a plan which will provide primary school education for all the African children on the Copperbelt and this will supplement Government expenditure. The problem in Northern Rhodesia is the same as elsewhere in the Federation. Food and work must be provided for all yet many are ill-equipped to earn a living. Too much time has been taken up with political rather than economic aspirations and the Africans there have been left to believe that Federation is the cause of his present state. There is no cause to apportion blame but if there is any blame it does not lie with Federation. On the contrary the capital investment and the development which has followed is to a large measure attributable to the confidence and stability brought about in 1953.

26. Money for social services has been plentiful in Northern Rhodesia in recent years. It has not been deemed expedient or necessary to apply a territorial surcharge to the Federal Income Tax on individuals but none the less most of the economic expansion has been in one industry and one area. It is difficult therefore to understand how many people in Northern Rhodesia, while professing a benevolent attitude towards those in the rural areas, many of whom are still starving, can on so called economic grounds advocate breaking up the Federation. Other than in Nyasaland, poverty and ignorance exists nowhere else as abundantly as it does in Northern Rhodesia and if the capital is to be found to make it possible to eradicate this a sound and stable government must be maintained and the accent diverted from political to economic advancement.

27. In Northern Rhodesia a buoyant copper industry has perhaps distracted attention from the need to stimulate agriculture and industries to process the other primary products. If, however, the political future of the country is uncertain and there is no assurance of the continuance of a stable responsible Government, Northern Rhodesia is unlikely to attract capital and it will remain almost entirely dependent on the copper industry, an industry which is very vulnerable to world conditions.

Nyasaland

28. There is little that I can usefully say about Nyasaland where to date no economic discoveries of minerals have resulted from a series of prospecting operations.

29. Many large companies including those with which I am concerned have carried out intensive and extensive work and, to assist Nyasaland, De Beers Consolidated Mines have started a thorough exploration of areas available. An ilmenite/rutile deposit is also being examined. Work is continuing but it would, however, be wrong to include mining in any assessment of Nyasaland's economic future. The country is likely to continue to have an economy based only on agriculture and the export of labour. Nyasaland is however fertile but the inhabitants are backward and untrained. Money to develop the land must be found and it will only come from the private sector if there is some guarantee that Government is to remain in competent hands and that European investment is welcome. The migratory labour force returns home with some awareness of the necessity for good husbandry of the land but any ideas he may have of applying what he has learned are soon stultified by the unco-operative attitude of his kinsmen. He therefore relaxes until his turn comes again to go out to earn to keep his family at home.

30. Nyasaland Africans are employed in the mines in South Africa and Northern Rhodesia and on farms in Southern Rhodesia but Africans in other territories of the Federation do not look upon this with favour but are persuaded to accept it as quid pro quo for free movement for themselves. This would be unlikely to continue if Nyasaland left the Federation.

31. The economic benefits of remaining in the Federation are too clear to need elaboration but politics has become good business for some in Nyasaland.

The Federation

32. It will be seen that in both Southern and Northern Rhodesia it was only in 1947 that sufficient money was available to the Governments for them to be able to tackle the whole question of public social services and I therefore submit that only an examination of the progress and achievements of both these Territories since then is of any value. Seven of the thirteen years are since Federation during which period development probably unparalleled anywhere else has taken place. The speed of development however has been geared to the capital investment and to European skills which have made it possible to provide employment for so many. Mines have been opened up, agriculture and industries developed.

33. In Northern Rhodesia the large increase in revenue from the copper industry appears to have created a more lethargic attitude to the need for diversification. Agriculture has certainly not received the encouragement or attention that it has in the South nor has much been done to create home industries or cottage industries in the rural areas.

34. In 1954 the impetus of Federation which at its inception attracted industrialists and investors, because of the greater economic stability of the whole, allowed the individual Governments to turn their attention to equipping the population to play its full part so that gainful employment could in due course be provided for all.

35. It is popular today to accept that African nationalism is motivated by a new consciousness of subjection. In the Federation I believe that the demands for political freedom are motivated by an erroneous belief that this is the road to release from poverty. The African has always been subjected to tribal chiefs and courts and does not object to restrictions which can be shown to be necessary for the wellbeing of all.

36. Political advancement is of course important but it can only come with economic advancement. The less privileged people of this country have a naive faith that "political independence" will automatically produce an international bank loan or adequate funds from some welfare organisation to provide education and full social services for everyone.

37. It is very natural that the African should want a place in the sun and freedom from want but it is sad that for purely political purposes in some Territories they have been led to believe that "Federation" denies them an opportunity to compete and that all frustration and poverty will be removed by self Government. A look at the map alone shows how necessary it is for the Territories to remain closely associated; copper and other minerals in the north, coal only in the south: one steel industry capable of supplying all the needs; Kariba, the main source of power lies in between and everyone has free access to seek employment in this variety in industry. It is unrealistic therefore to take a parochial view that industry in one Territory is not beneficial to the others.

38. Experience may indicate in due course that the responsibilities of the Federal and Territorial Governments should be re-allocated in the interests of good administration but I do not believe that less financial control in the hands of central government should ever be contemplated. A form of loose economic alliance has been suggested by some but surely it was because a closer alliance was advised by the Central African Council which studied the question that Federation was acceptable to those responsible. If a form of loose economic alliance is contemplated, such as the East African High Commission, it is as well to note the position there. The Territories instead of growing closer together have built up an individual nationalism and there are I believe strong pressures on individual Governments to take over responsibility for communications, posts and telegraphs and customs. A loose economic alliance cannot give the stability and assurance of good housekeeping which is so vital if capital is to be attracted.

39. A good stable Government is one of the greatest incentives to investment. The concept of a permanent Federation led to considerable overseas investment. Again because of easy reference and because these figures are not available from any other source, I would mention that companies administered by Anglo-American Corporation have invested over £100,000,000 in the Federation since 1953. This is almost a 200% increase by one organisation in its investment in the Federation in the short space of a few years.

£70,000,000 of this amount was invested in Northern Rhodesia, £7,000,000 in Southern Rhodesia and £22,000,000 in Government stocks and enterprises serving the Federal Territories as a whole. These amounts are only a small part of the total investment since 1953 in enterprise but they indicate the upsurge of money for industrialisation which followed the decision to federate. A central bank has been established; commercial and merchant banks have come to operate in the Federation and an effective and important internal money market is being developed.

40. Industrialisation, and the towns it nurtures of course, creates in itself a problem. The Africans, content in the past to exist on the land, are attracted to the towns not by economic pressure but according to some authorities by the novelty. Professor W. M. Macmillan of St. Andrews University says:—

"There was reason to ascribe the town drift to economic pressure on overcrowded reserves. Here and there economic pressure is still a factor but by and large the movement is voluntary. Africans themselves love novelty fully more than most of us and it is novelty they are after—the new things and the new life they hope to share. It is not oppression that drives them, nor repression that keeps them there.

"But as the African economies are on such foundations they are in general 'out of balance' and this, naturally, in varying degree. The impression left by his latest, very wide-ranging tour suggests one generalization: whatever the motive or the objective of the Africans flocking to the towns—and I'm quite sure it's not political!—the degree of satisfaction attained (and I don't say contentment) is greatest in the more developed parts, in South Africa (Yes! and in spite of all) and in Southern Rhodesia, in the Copperbelt and even the Kenya Highlands. Dissatisfaction or actual discontent, on the other hand, was distinctly greater or more vocal in what are also the less strictly or stringently ruled colonies—Nyasaland and the almost equally all-African Uganda."

41. Whatever the reason, the drift to the towns and, as a corollary of this, the demands of the Africans on the land also, for education and health services has thrown a great obligation on the Governments, an obligation I submit they are attempting to discharge and have been doing from the time that the economic state of the territories, and subsequently the Federation, made it possible.

42. The population is increasing rapidly and there is no way back to the primitive tribal state that some political self-seekers would have. There is only one course open today. Federation has shown that in close economic unity lies strength but economic unity is only effective with political unity. A great experiment has been started and in the short time available great progress has been made. It should be given time to overcome ignorance and poverty and time to prove itself.

43. In the three Territories, where not a tree would have been planted or a brick laid had not European skill and money been available in the past to guide the African to use his labour, the African is being taught to take his full place in building a country. These efforts have made it possible to attract large scale investment and to provide gainful employment for the African population. It was by European co-operation with the African that progress has been made and there is now real hope of eradicating poverty—the real problem of Africa. This hope, however, can only be realised if all the people of the Federation are allowed to go about their work free from distractions, talk of colour and race, and accepting that in economics more than in politics lies the solution of building up a non-racial community and attaining freedom for all.

Oral Evidence

K. C. ACUTT

CHAIRMAN: You have made it very plain in this memorandum that you are giving your evidence based on your experience, but in a personal capacity. You are not speaking for your Company or any of your Companies. You have known Northern and Southern Rhodesia for some 35 years, done business here, and now live here permanently?

A. Yes.

Q. We need not trouble you with the figures but in paragraph 6 of your memorandum you are dealing with Southern Rhodesia and you show how the revenue and net income has jumped up even in the years 1953/1958 from £135m. to £223m.?

A. Yes.

Q. Then you point out that in the struggle to prevent a wastage of good soil the African had to be disciplined and forced to give up a semi-nomadic existence. As a result legislation, much of which today might appear to be unnecessarily restrictive, had to be passed. Some should perhaps be relaxed today but the rural African is more concerned with numbers rather than quality and severe overstocking could easily become uncontrollable. What had you in mind as legislation which might appear now to be unnecessarily restrictive?

A. Largely, I think, the various land tenure acts, certain portions of them, and possibly the Land Apportionment Act. I believe that there is an opportunity to examine all that legislation to try and bring it a bit up to date. I would not like to point to anything specific because I am not really an expert on it, but I think there are perhaps undesirable features now which could be relaxed or changed.

Q. Then the passage on Northern Rhodesia which you know from your experience in the Copperbelt?

A. Yes.

Q. The figures struck me, in paragraph 15, as illustrating the magnitude of the business: you quote figures from three mines administered by the Anglo-American Corporation and from 1954 to 1959 the total new capital employed by Rhokana, Nchanga and Bancroft Mines for mining, smelting and refining amounted to £73m. That is in some five to six years?

A. Yes.

Q. You think Rhodesian Selection Trust probably had figures to a similar order?

A. Yes, I would not like to say exactly what their figures are because I have not calculated it but I know they are a very similar pattern.

Q. In paragraph 16 you say about the copper companies having been forced to adopt a paternalistic attitude and at the time to pay higher wages than elsewhere. Would you like to expand a little on that?

A. Yes, I think I can. As you know, I think I pointed out in the memorandum, the discovery of copper up there was at a time when the communications were very bad and the health conditions were appalling. Malaria killed off people right away and right from the start health services had to be put in, schools had to be built, there was nobody else to do it and the mining companies therefore adopted what is today considered to be a paternalistic attitude. At the time it was commercially a purely necessary attitude. They could not open up the mines without doing so.

Q. You point out that that is an obligation you had to undertake yourselves; there was no one else who could.

A. Quite.

Q. You said in paragraph 30, Nyasaland Africans are employed in the mines in South Africa and Northern Rhodesia and on farms in Southern Rhodesia, but Africans in the other Territories of the Federation do not look upon this with favour but are persuaded to accept it as quid pro quo for free movement for themselves. This would be unlikely to continue if Nyasaland left the Federation. You mean they would not be welcomed or permitted into the other territories?

A. I do not know. I should not say permitted because that would depend on the legislation but they certainly would not be welcomed.

Q. In paragraph 38, you are saying: "Experience may indicate in due course that the responsibilities of the Federal and Territorial Governments should be re-allocated in the interests of good administration but I do not believe that less financial control in the hands of central government should ever be contemplated. A form of loose economic alliance has been suggested by some but surely it was because a closer alliance was advised by the Central African Council which studied the question that Federation was acceptable to those responsible. If a form of loose economic alliance is contemplated, such as the East African High Commission, it is as well to note the position there. The territories instead of growing closer together have built up an individual nationalism and there are I believe strong pressures on individual Governments to take over responsibility for communications, posts and telegraphs and customs. A loose economic alliance cannot give the stability and assurance of good housekeeping which is so vital if capital is to be attracted."

You, therefore, for the reasons you give there, are prepared to present the position that it must be not a loose but a tight alliance?

A. Yes.

Q. You say in paragraph 39 that companies administered by Anglo-American Corporation have invested over £100 m. in the Federation since 1953. This is almost a 200 per cent. increase by one organisation in its investment in the Federation in a few years. I suppose several companies have done something—Rhodesian Selection Trust, for instance?

A. Yes. There are very many other companies too which, of course, have increased their investment.

Q. You are drawing attention to the size of the investment which has been made and can be made if we get the answer to this sum right?

A. The capital was available in the circumstances.

CHAIRMAN: Quite.

MR. CRAWLEY: In paragraph 21, you say: "Any move to prevent employees sharing in the prosperity would probably set off a series of crippling strikes which would result in a higher basic wage structure."

Not referring to the strikes but would not higher basic wage structure, in fact, be a good thing?

A. I should have thought that the basic wage structure on the Copperbelt is pretty comparable with other mining structures and the copper bonus allows the employees a share in the prosperity and so far as experience has indicated, we have not had any trouble when the price has come down. In other words, they have become partners in the industry to some extent and we feel that in some way is preferable to having a permanent rather than a high structure.

Q. Do you extend that to industries outside the Copperbelt? Do you feel that the wage structure is right in industry as a whole or would you like to see it raised?

A. I think it is probably rather difficult to generalise. I think in certain industries there is probably a case for higher wage structures but you have to relate it, I think, to the productivity of the individual and what has happened very often is that wages have gone up yet people have expected still more from the employer.

Q. Is it not the case of the hen and the egg; you will not get greater productivity unless you have higher wages?

A. You might.

PROFESSOR CREIGHTON: Might I come back to paragraph 38 to which the Chairman has already referred. At the end of that paragraph you say "A loose economic alliance cannot give the stability and assurance of good housekeeping which is so vital if capital is to be attracted". In response to a question by the Chairman you said that you preferred a tight to a loose union. Do the economic powers at present possessed by the Federal Government seem adequate to you for the type of union which you would prefer?

A. I think, by and large, they are adequate. I think there might be room for some examination again as to various aspects, but the present concept of Federation gives a fairly tight unit, I think, from the financial point of view.

Q. You have no economic powers in mind which you would like to add to those already possessed?

A. No. All I would like to see is none taken away.

Q. On the other hand you think that your broad concept of a fairly tight economic union could be maintained and other powers might be surrendered, for example, African education?

A. Retaining European education in the Federal control?

Q. I am sorry—European education to the Territorial Governments?

A. Yes, I think that could be done.

Q. You think that Health might be surrendered to the Territorial Governments?

A. No. Can I put it this way: I think it is very difficult to be specific about which particular functions could be separated between Territorial and Federal. I think in principle it is a mistake to divide these things on an artificial basis. I am sure that if some system could be devised whereby you do not have African education in the hands of one set of people and European in others, it would clearly make for harmony. It would, I should think, be easier to operate. As things were divided that clearly was not possible. Whether in any sphere that would be acceptable to the various Territories I do not know. I think I must seek guidance from you gentlemen on that.

Q. But some reallocation of social services such as education or health would be perfectly feasible and your concept of a tight economic union could still be maintained?

A. I should think so, yes.

LORD CRATHORNE: It has been suggested from some quarters that you can have your economic union with really no political union at all. What would your view be about that? Take it specifically on the lines of the European Free Trade Areas?

A. I should not have thought you could maintain it for long.

Q. If you are going to have an economic union you more or less must have what I call a Federal Chancellor of the Exchequer?

A. Yes, I think you must have political unity as well to maintain economic unity.

MR. ROBINSON: It has been suggested to the Commission that the high wage structure on the Copperbelt inclusive of the bonus is one of the factors that prevents the development of industry in Northern Rhodesia because industrialists are afraid to establish industries in competition with that position. I wonder if you would comment on that evidence and give us some idea of how you see the picture in the future, if there is a continuation of the present relationship in so far as industrial development in Northern Rhodesia is concerned outside the mining industry?

A. I think I mentioned in my memorandum that the high wage structure does not really appertain to the whole of Northern Rhodesia. You have the comparatively isolated area on the Copperbelt where the wages and the living conditions are totally dissimilar from any other part of Northern Rhodesia and even so near south as Broken Hill which is about 100 miles away you have a totally different wage structure and totally different way of life. When you get further south it is really not very dissimilar from Southern Rhodesia. I think on the Copperbelt it is true to say that as things stand only industrial development which is there to serve or is related to the copper industry can really be economically viable and I think that will go on, that the Copperbelt will continue so long as these wages are there to provide industrial development of a similar nature, smelting and refining, anything to do with the actual industry and to some extent industries which are there to serve the mines can possibly afford to do it.

But the industrial development in Northern Rhodesia should not necessarily be restricted to the Copperbelt. I think everybody has looked upon it as being the highly industrialised area but there is no reason why industry should not start somewhere else if the raw materials are available.

Q. Would Mr. Acutt give us some idea of the possibility of an integration of the wage structures between African and European employees in the mining industry.

A. At the present moment I think it is true to say that there is not any real integration but the African wages have increased, the gap is narrowing all the time, and I think the gap will narrow and I would say at the present moment there is no theoretical barrier, but that in due course there will be a common curve from the lowest paid to the highest paid and it will not be on any racial basis.

MR. CHIRWA: Would you not say that in view of the action begun by the Rhodesia Railways you would get greater pressure from the African Mineworkers' Union for admission of Africans to the Technical Foundation?

A. I should think you would probably get a better answer from Mr. Katilungu. He is not with us today, I notice.

Q. Do you not think it is desirable that the mining companies should take immediate steps to bring the African wage structure and European wage structure into the same scale?

A. Discussions have been going on for some time. I agree with you, they do seem to be fairly protracted but I am afraid that is the nature of this type of discussion and I do not think the companies are to blame. The Union organisations are not very easy organisations with which to treat. They have always got elections and they have always something else happening which defers the discussions for the time being but I think you can take it quite definitely that the mining companies are in constant discussion on this and trying to achieve just what you say.

Q. Is there any specific reason why Africans are not allowed to enter the Foundation College?

A. I do not think there is any reason at all. At the present moment there has been no demand for this entry. The Technical College perhaps is not an institute. It really is much wider than a technical college. They run a course for such things as dressmaking and various other activities. In addition to that it is not quite clear whether the Technical College falls under the Federal or Territorial Government. We have been trying to sort that out too because clearly it is not the job of private enterprise to set the way for Government. I think one must follow on within the law.

MR. GONDWE: Does the Government give any grant towards the running of the College at all and if so, which Government?

A. Both of them. I am not quite sure of that answer but both of them do give some grant.

MR. McCLELAND: Mr. Acutt, there is fairly strong opinion on the siting of the Federal capital. In the first place it is maintained that it should not have been sited here and, secondly, that it is not too late to move it and, in fact, it should be moved. Have you any views on this matter yourself?

A. On the advisability of moving the Federal capital?

Q. Yes, and the consequences thereto and the possible economic cost as well?

A. I suppose movement of a capital is always fairly expensive. The creation of a capital for a Government is expensive and I should think that there would obviously be a large capital cost involved in the movement of any capital.

Q. Which they would have in any case if they moved to Warren Hills?

A. Quite, which no doubt is why they have deferred the movement.

Q. Do you agree perhaps it was a mistake to put it here and if there is a possibility it should perhaps be moved?

A. I suppose, perhaps in the light of experience, one might have said that it was a political error, but no one was to foresee that. From the point of view of convenience and communications—I believe this was gone into very carefully by quite a number of people—a decision to site it at Salisbury was very carefully taken. I would not like to say whether it was an error or not. I think it does not really matter where your capital is as long as it is accepted by everybody.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: May I ask Mr. Acutt to refer for a moment to paragraph 38, where he says a form of loose economic alliance has been suggested by some but surely this was because a closer alliance was advised by the Central African Council which studied the question that Federation was acceptable to those responsible. I am bound to say that information we have had did not quite agree with that. Could you tell us what you are referring to when you say "closer alliance was advised"? It was not in any published document, was it?

A. I thought it was generally understood that the Central African Council which was the forerunner of the Federation found that it really was on just these particular things that Federation was advisable because in the past the pattern of the three Territories, or particularly the two Territories with separate customs tariffs, totally separate economic units, was extremely difficult for anybody operating here on a wider and purely territorial form.

Q. It was not on the merits of it. It was on the statement that it was advised by the Central African Council. I think there is no publication in which any such statement is made.

A. I do not know. This was purely on my knowledge of discussions which were held at the time.

Q. You were not on it yourself?

A. No, but while it might not have been published, I think it was generally accepted at the time as one of the reasons.

Q. We have sources of information on it and they did not seem quite to agree with what you say there.

A. They did not think so?

MR. ELLMAN-BROWN: During the years and particularly during the last seven years of Federation your Company and indeed Rhodesian Selection Trust have considerably helped, particularly the Northern Rhodesian Government, in the general development of the African people in various ways. Would you say with your knowledge of the position, particularly the rural Africans in Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia, particularly the north western side of Northern Rhodesia, that there is a tremendous amount of development necessary to bring the African up from a subsistence to a cash economy? Would you say that frankly it is a responsibility of the British Government to develop that as fast as possible? It meant considerable finance, this building up, you have put in tremendous funds there. Would you say in your knowledge that this is still not enough to build up a harmonious African rural population?

A. Your question was would I say that a tremendous amount of money is required to do that?

Q. And urgently?

A. I think there is no doubt about it that money is required for that and a tremendous number of other things in the Federation.

Q. As far as the two Northern Territories are concerned whose economy, outside the Copperbelt, is mainly based on what I call rural subsistence agriculture is it vitally necessary we should try and develop the standard of living of those people?

A. Yes.

Q. Would you say too that to break through the customs of the African, particularly on land tenure and the matrilineal system of succession, the only way to put on an efficient basis is to encourage the African to advance those development schemes as far as possible himself?

A. I would not say it was the only way but I should think it would be conducive to getting the thing accepted if one could encourage the African to play some part in it himself. But it would mean one has to accept, in the first place, discipline which has not been very clearly shown in the past when one tries to tamper with what are the existing rights of the African.

Q. Is it your view with your knowledge of the country, particularly Northern Rhodesia, that it is essential to assist the power of the Chief and Native Councils in that north western Territory?

A. I do not quite know in what way you feel that one should assist.

Q. In Nyasaland they are breaking down the powers of Chiefs. In Northern Rhodesia they are trying to build them up and there seems to be a conflict of policy. Have you any views on that, knowing the backwardness of these people, in trying to encourage what I call local government in those areas?

A. I do believe the Chiefs have played a very important part in Southern Rhodesia in maintaining some form of discipline in the area. I do not mean discipline in the unpleasant sense, but in trying to assist and I think they still have a very important part to play in the Northern Territories.

Q. Finally, one other question: the system of law and order in the rural areas of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland is totally different from that in Southern Rhodesia. You know the police in Southern Rhodesia have for years been in amongst the tribes and so on. You have the boma system in the other Territories which conflicts with the police. Would you say to a very large extent the enmity to the police in the two Northern Territories is due mainly to the system?

A. I think it might well be.

SIR CHARLES ARDEN CLARKE: May I revert to the question of technical schools? If my memory serves me aright we did have some evidence on the Copperbelt that there was a demand for technical education on the part of the Africans. You referred to the fact that a survey is to be conducted jointly by the Governments and the Companies into the present need for technical education in Northern Rhodesia. Has that survey started or could you tell us anything more about it?

A. No. It is just about to start under the chairmanship of Sir David Kerr who is the Master of Balliol, and he has agreed to accept the chairmanship of that. When you say demand for it, there is, of course, some demand for it, but it is in a negative sense. There have been very few applications for entry to the Technical College and those that have been received have been received from Africans who are not resident in the area. There have been applications from Africans in South Africa who are not eligible and they have very often been for courses which are not available and I think when I last checked on this there was only one case where one could have said that perhaps the African was eligible for a course and he applied for a dressmaking course, which we felt was the worst one with which to start off.

Q. I think it is fairly well known among the Africans, or at least there is an impression, that they are not eligible so you would not be likely to get applications to go into the existing technical school.

A. There is no ruling on that at all that they are not eligible. The accommodation would have to be increased because it is not there at the moment, and the idea of a survey is to see what is needed and where the various Governments might come in. It might have to be split so that these extraneous classes which are not really part of the technical school should be removed.

Q. Is it possible to give us a date when that survey will be likely to report?

A. It has just started the job and should get on very rapidly.

MR. TAYLOR: You say that your company has invested £22 million in government stocks—has it subscribed mostly to stock supported by Federal prospectuses or Territorial prospectuses?

A. They are mixed. As you know, largely since Federation it has gone through the process of being a Federal loan; but these are not the only loans I referred to. For example, railway trucks for the Rhodesian Railways is one which can be considered to be both Territorial and Federal.

Q. It is clear from your paper, but I would like it to be categorical—you would regard security for those loans and other forms of assistance as being gravely impaired if there was any loosening of the ties of the Federation?

A. It is true to say that. I do not know how gravely, but it would certainly be impaired.

MR. CRAWLEY: In paragraph 25 you say that too much time has been taken up with political rather than economic aspirations, and that action should be diverted from political to economic advancement. If people have political aspirations how can you in fact limit the time you devote to it, and how do you divert them from political aspirations?

A. I think the accent has been really on political rather than economic things because people here have not perhaps realised that political advancement can only follow and go along with economic advancement.

Q. But if people prefer political advancement, even at the expense of economic advancement, how can you cope with that?

A. I do not believe they do. If these facts were made clear to them they would not think so.

Q. And in the last sentence of your memorandum you say that this hope can only be realised if all the people of the Federation are allowed to go about their work free from distractions and talk of colour and race. Do you really feel, in the climate of Africa as it is today, that is likely to happen and that people can cease to talk of colour and race?

A. I believe that can be minimised and that distractions can be reduced by the production in some way of definite benefits. The real point is that in Southern Rhodesia, where there have been considerable economic advances and where the Africans have gone along towards a much rosier economic future as they see it, the whole position has been very much easier. In Northern Rhodesia, which is admittedly a much vaster country, the rural Africans have really seen no advantages from the economic point of view and are therefore distracted entirely over to the political side.

Q. But if you are to maintain the Federation, do you not feel you must face the extraordinarily difficult situation up north and not evade it?

A. Yes.

MR. CHIRWA: How can you reconcile a strong belief in Federation with the fact that Africans in the Northern Territories want their own control of their own governments, and on the other hand the S. Rhodesians do not want them to control their own government?

A. You say the Southern Rhodesians do not want them to control their own government?

Q. Yes: the Africans in the Northern Territories demand that they must have those governments under their own control.

A. But do you not think this is really a case of wanting the government to be in the hands of responsible people? I do not think this is a question of saying the government should be in the hands of either Africans or Europeans but that it is essential, if this country is not going to go backwards, that government should be in the hands of responsible people so that law and order are maintained and that it is able to attract capital. Do you not think that is perhaps the root of the argument?

Q. But would you not say that if you persist in that idea you still get disruptive elements?

A. Irresponsible elements.

Q. Well, disruptive elements. It happened last year. The emergency was declared in the two Territories in the north and the leaders were arrested and taken to Southern Rhodesia. If the aspirations of the Africans are not satisfied we are bound to get into that situation again.

A. I think there is the point that it is only the reasonable and logical aspirations of anybody which should be satisfied. One cannot just bow down to lawlessness: one must not just give up straight away in the interests of the community as a whole.

Q. You feel you would rather say that if the people do not like Federation it can still be maintained by force?

A. No, that does not come into it at all.

Q. How do you maintain it then when the people in the Northern Territories do not want it and you still say you can go on with it?

A. I am not satisfied that the majority of people in the north do not want it. They do not want something they do not understand. I believe they have not really had a chance to understand the benefits of Federation. I would like there to be an opportunity for the governments in each of the Territories to put it to the Africans what they are giving up and what they are in fact discussing. I think a large number of them are not in practice aware of what they are discussing.

LORD CRATHORNE: Do you think that Europeans or governments can put it across? We all accept that it has not been put across by anybody. Have you any ideas on how it might be done? Do you think that Africans must put it across?

A. I think it can be done by co-operation between African and European: it is a tough job.

Q. And it must be done on a very much wider scale than has ever been attempted before.

A. Yes. Unfortunately the seven years have gone by very quickly and people did not realise what was going on; they were so busy getting their house in order. After all there were in practice no Federal Acts in any form for several years. The Legislature was fully occupied in trying to federalise all the time, and very little attention was probably paid to these things. It was only when they became aware that the seven years was nearly over that the Government came to realise what it has in front of it. I cannot help believing that with good will on both sides that could be put across during a further period.

Q. And it would cost money to do it.

A. In the end it might not be acceptable, but at least you would have had a fair try.

Q. It is right that the relationship between the Europeans and Africans in the Copperbelt is now as good as it has ever been?

A. That is correct. Those Africans are closely in contact with Europeans and they have seen the benefit brought by the European. The largest and most vociferous opposition to Federation is in the rural areas.

Q. But to get that relationship established has cost a considerable amount of money?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. And if you are going to do that sort of thing on a wide scale the Government must spend a great deal of money?

A. I think they must spend money.

SIR LIONEL HEALD: Would you say the United Federal Party is or could be accepted as representing African opinion?

A. It certainly has a larger number of members, I understand, and it has African representatives in the House. It is perhaps the only party which at the present time represents both elements.

Q. But is it accepted by Africans on a very wide scale as representing their point of view?

A. When one talks of the African on a very wide scale, I think that is probably where one goes wrong because the African on a very wide scale does not understand that at all.

MR. MOLSON: Does it really make much difference whether the African understands or not, if he is almost unanimously opposed to Federation in the Northern Territories? Where do you think you are going to find the Africans on whose goodwill and co-operation you wish to rely in persuading the masses to accept Federation?

A. My problem is that I feel they are against Federation merely because they do not know what it means. That is the point I made previously. I believe that if there is a chance to explain the whole position to them they will not be anti-Federationists. Possibly the African believes that something miraculous would happen if Federation were broken up, whereas something disastrous would happen. That is why I think something must be put across to them.

MR. GONDWE: You keep saying that the African does not understand what is meant by Federation. I do not agree with that: I think the African does understand what is meant by Federation, but at the beginning he did not understand. Obviously the majority of the African people, in the Northern Territories at least, do understand and of course they have their fears about what is going to happen to them if Federation continues. They are now thinking in terms of running their own show in their own Territories and are asking whether Federation is going to interfere with that. The answer they come to is, "Yes, it is going to interfere with it." You may well ask why—it is because in this territory Europeans are different. Some Europeans would like to see Federation continue and an appreciable number would like to see it disrupted, for their own reasons. They are afraid of the very thing that the Africans are afraid of, but from opposite points of view. The Africans fear that if Federation continues they can say goodbye to self-government. Some Europeans here fear that if Federation continues they will eventually be ruled by Africans: hence the cry of "Government in responsible hands." Have you come across these views at all from Europeans that their fear is based on this question of being ruled by Africans in the future?

A. Not from the majority. I think everybody who lives here accepts the fact that this is a multi-racial state and I think everybody hopes it can be made to work in that way. I was a little disappointed to hear that in your opinion responsible government could not be in the hands of Africans. By "responsible government" I do not mean a colour-blind government at all. I have no colour prejudice at all: all I would like to see is that government is in the hands of people who understand what government means and not in the hands of people who purely look upon it as trying to run their own show. If they run their own show it must be well run and in a sound and responsible manner.

MR. GONDWE: You understand that because people like you are responsible, but there are irresponsible Europeans here.

MR. ROBINSON: Apart from living for some time in the Federation you also lived for some years in South Africa. It has been suggested that the attitude, of Europeans particularly, in Southern Rhodesia, and the general state of affairs here, is akin to that in the Union. This has been suggested to us in the Northern Territories. In your experience would you say the approaches of the Europeans to the question of race relationship here and in the Union are in any way similar and, if indeed it is possible to find some sort of general solution to the current difficulties in the Federation, do you believe there is a possibility of quite considerable company investment coming from South Africa to here and, in that way, effecting a sort of transfer of liberal opinion from the Union to assist in its development?

A. I think there is total dissimilarity between the policies and opinions here on this matter and those in South Africa. I know that there is a very small number of people, at least, in South Africa who think in the same way as Rhodesians and there is a measure of goodwill from them. On the other hand there is absolutely no doubt that even the most violent nationalist in South Africa has obviously looked upon the Federation as being a good risk because a great many of them have a lot of money invested here, and they look upon it from a purely economic point of view. While they may not subscribe in their own country to this policy it is a little odd that they should be prepared to invest in this country as they have done if they feel it is a bad thing.

Q. Do you think there is any chance of Europeans in Southern Rhodesia, if there was a break-up of Federation, wishing to link up with South Africa?

A. Certainly, but not at the present moment. One never knows how people will change, but there is no possible chance on present Rhodesian opinion.

MR. CHIRWA: Could we have your views on the franchise, as regards the question of government being in responsible hands? There is a general feeling amongst Africans that this is said by Europeans because they want to keep Africans out of government. Do you think the present franchise qualifications should be changed or not as between Territorial and Federal?

A. I believe that in Southern Rhodesia there are—I may be wrong in my figures—something like 15,000 Africans entitled to be voters in Southern Rhodesia. If that figure is correct, or whatever the figure is, some have not registered. There are several reasons for that: one of them is a fear of income tax, which is quite a reasonable fear. They fear that immediate registration is going to draw attention to them from that point of view. It is essential to keep a qualitative franchise as things are. Just how high or low it is made is something for the different Territories to consider—to allow in enough responsible people so that one can get a gradual extension on that. What I would like to see to some extent is perhaps an extension of the right to be registered without necessarily having the qualifications which are laid down. At the present time I believe teachers and religious people and chiefs have the right to vote. It might be possible to extend that in some way so that anybody who had been in service for a considerable number of years and had demonstrated that he was a responsible individual would also be entitled to vote, without necessarily having the qualifications laid down. It should be possible to extend it without in any way just throwing it open.

MR. CROSS: May I ask you to define the word "responsible"?

A. I believe that government must be in the hands of people who understand the responsibility of government, who have responsibility towards the individual in the country and, to simplify it, to really behave in what is accepted as being a civilised and reasonable manner. I heard a story the other day which is apparently perfectly true: a minister in a northern country who was due to take over the portfolio of Minister of Finance in a short while asked for the keys of the safe. He complained that the keys were being withheld from him and asked how he could take over the finances of the country when he could not see what was in the safe. I do not really think that he could be regarded, perhaps, as a responsible individual to carry out the duties of Minister of Finance. You must have people who are trained and educated.

SIR DONALD MACGILLIVRAY: You spoke about the ignorance in the rural areas, a point you also made in your memorandum. You say "... the demands for political freedom are motivated by an erroneous belief that this is the road to release from poverty" and, further still on page 7, "The less privileged people of this country have a naive faith that 'political independence' will automatically produce an international bank loan or adequate funds from some welfare organisation to provide education and full social services for everyone." At the end you say that Federation should be given time to overcome ignorance. It was ignorance of this kind, I believe, you were referring to?

A. Yes.

Q. Can that be left to the normal processes of education of children in school? I have no doubt it could be got over in the schools that economic benefits will not just flow from political freedom, but time is in rather short supply in this matter and it would seem that something must be done with the adults because one has not time to wait for the children to come out and take part in the political life of the country. Do you think sufficient is being done at the moment to put it over to adults in the rural areas? Is it sufficient just to issue a pamphlet explaining the benefits of Federation?

A. No.

Q. How would you tackle it?

A. It is an omnibus question. Not enough has been done for adult education because, as you will know, the process of increasing the education in primary schools is only going on now and you clearly have a large number of more elderly or more mature Africans who really have had neither education nor opportunity to share in any part of community life. I have always been very keen on adult education. As you probably saw, on the Copperbelt we carry out quite a lot of that very thing. The question of explaining that to the rural areas is again one of cost, and the Government, placed as it was with education generally, probably took the right line with limited money of starting at primary levels in the hope that they would catch up; but I agree there is not much time and something should be done to get it on the adult level. It is available here in the urban areas but not in the rural areas.

Q. And what about a series of courses using visual aids?

A. Civil courses, social courses.

Q. Would you give it high priority?

A. Yes, you must if you are going to do anything of this sort: but the problem here is that if one tries to give anything high priority it means that something else has to have lower priority. Unfortunately everything we need seems to be of high priority here.
